On 18th May, in a passage quoted by Coxe, he states that he had been informed by Lord Godolphin of Queen Anne's intention to "keep the place of Master of (the) Horse for my return"; which gives him occasion to recall the fact that "almost all the great places of the kingdom" had been offered to him at one time or another. In December following he indignantly repudiates the notion of the Italians that he could possibly have any correspondence with the so-called "King and Queen of England" at St. Germain; and he mentions (p. 767) a belief that the latter was an illegitimate daughter of Louis XIV.

While in Rome Shrewsbury was suspected by the Pope of plotting "against his State" (p. 769), and spies were sent to the receptions held by the Countess Adelaide, on which he remarks: "That little concerns me, for I have nothing to do here, nor will have anything to do either here or elsewhere, and should be glad such good spies were put about me as might discover that I have no business; for, if I would engage in business, I might have a post that would become me better than being a little agent or spy at this wretched Court" (p. 771). In other places he makes some unflattering remarks on the Papal government of that day.

His grandfather, the Earl of Cardigan, died at Deene, in Northamptonshire, on 15th July, 1703. The new Earl and his brother, Mr. Brudenell, were then in Rome, and sundry allusions are made to them and their doings.

The Countess Adelaide was a widow, and had a daughter, who became a nun. On 23rd October, 1703, she received a proposal of marriage from a certain Frenchman, and Shrewsbury, as a friend, advised her not to decline it. On 23rd July, 1704, she told Shrewsbury that "the reason of her some time since desiring Lord Cardigan to come not so frequently to her house was that Bishop Ellis had been twice with the Pope, to complain as if she designed to trepan him into a match." Shrewsbury remarks: "I have already observed how great a liar this prelate is, and here he shows his malice." Cardigan's "Lady" is afterwards mentioned, but his marriage is dated 1707 in the New Peerage.

In several places in the Journal Shrewsbury mentions periodical attacks of his old complaint. Under 30th July, 1704, he narrates his peculiar experiences in a Roman bathing-house. On 4th August he writes: "Comte Mattei was with me, who says that a year ago I was so ill in the opinion of the Pope that it was thought a crime to go near me; now that they fear the Duke of Marlborough and his redcoats should come into Italy, his Holiness does nothing but commend me."

Shrewsbury first proposed marriage to the Countess Adelaide on 24th April, 1705. Whether he was then accepted is not stated, but he left Rome three days later. He went first to Venice, whither Lord Cardigan had preceded him. While there he had an attack of gout, and on recovering went to Padua, and visited the tomb of his aunt, Catherine Whetnal, in a church there. From Venice, on 27th June, he seems to have sent a further proposal to the Countess, but here, as before, the entry is in cipher. He had already made his will (pp. 783, 790). On 5th July he "set out from Venice," and arrived on the 16th at Augsburg, where he was taken ill, and in consequence suffered from lameness. On 28th August he sent by post to the Countess asking her to come to him. Meanwhile he interviewed the Lutheran minister at Augsburg and Senator Van Stetin on the subject of his proposed marriage, informing them of the Countess's change of religion, and the minister referred the question to "his superior." The Countess joined the Duke on the 18th September, and they were married on the 20th. Her friends at Rome had petitioned the Inquisition to give her leave to marry Shrewsbury, but had been refused. On 10th October the Duke and his wife left Augsburg on their way to England. At Frankfort they signed a deed resigning the new Duchess's "portion at Bologna" to her mother, who is said to have been a descendant of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester.

These facts, apparently now published for the first time, disprove the usual story that Shrewsbury was compelled by Lady Adelaide's relatives to marry her at Rome. Clearly there could have been no compulsion under the circumstances. None of her relatives were even present at the wedding ceremony.

The Duke and Duchess stayed at Frankfort from 17th October till 10th November, and in the interval Marlborough arrived there, and remained a few days. Shrewsbury had several interviews with him, during which his "discourse was to show how averse the Queen of England was to a peace," and to persuade Shrewsbury "to come into business," that is, to take office. The Duchess soon after made her "recantation" before a Reformed French minister. At Cologne she was visited by her brother, Ferdinando Paleotti, who from there accompanied them on their journey, but whether he came to England is uncertain.

At the Hague Shrewsbury was constantly in the society of Marlborough, who informed him of "all the plans for peace now proposed to these people." One day they both "drank tea" with the Duchess. From a French merchant Shrewsbury heard some news from St. Germain, where, it was said, "Queen Mary has disgusted her whole Court, who once had thoughts of publishing a factum against her; and they have thoughts of conveying the young Prince to Scotland, but the Court of France will not consent."

Shrewsbury's travels were now at an end. He left the Brill in one of the Queen's yachts on 7th January, 1706, and arrived at Deptford on Sunday following, the 13th.

During his absence abroad the Duke appears to have maintained little correspondence, but it is quite probable that he may have destroyed most of it. Coxe prints a few letters from Marlborough, Somers, Godolphin, and Halifax, and there are a few more in this Report, supplemented by many other letters from George Stepney at Vienna, Sir Lambert Blackwell at Florence, Sir Cloudesley Shovell in Leghorn Road, and others. There are two letters from Shrewsbury to Sir John Talbot announcing his marriage. After his return he had some correspondence with the Duke of Buckingham, Burnet, and Harley, and with Benjamin Furley, whom he had met at the Hague. The undated letters and papers at the end probably belong to the period of his second Secretaryship.

Much of the fresh information here collected touching the principal facts in Shrewsbury's life has now been indicated. It will be seen that these additional papers, like those printed by Coxe, do not in any way support the common belief that he was a Jacobite at heart, and kept up communications with the Stuarts. On the other hand, they do help us in some measure to comprehend "the charm of manner" for which he was so greatly admired by his contemporaries.

We may now turn to the illustrations they afford of the events of the period. There are sundry references to Queen Mary, but she did not apparently take an active part in public affairs, and seldom presided, in the King's absence, at meetings of the Committee of the Privy Council, or the Cabinet Council, as Shrewsbury terms it (p. 85). On 4th September, 1694, Shrewsbury informed Secretary Blathwayt, then with the King in the Netherlands, that the Queen had been "a little indisposed"; but a few days after he announced her supposed recovery, which was attributed to her "having let blood." She proved, however, to be suffering from smallpox, from which she did not recover. Archbishop Tillotson, Shrewsbury's valued friend, had died only a month previously. Admiral Russell in his letters lamented the deaths of both. He states that the fleet under him in Cadiz Bay went into mourning for the Queen; and he urged Shrewsbury to secure the succession to Tillotson of "a man that won't be too strict with us rigid Presbyterians."

The allusions to King William are naturally very numerous, and illustrate most of the events of his reign, and his actions at home and abroad. The long, unsigned letter to him of 25th December, 1689, is supposed to have been written by Thomas Wharton, afterwards Lord Wharton. It reproaches him for his coldness, and for his neglect of those who had assisted in establishing him on the throne. There is also a copy among the State Papers, and the entire text is printed in Dalrymple's Memorials, vol. ii., app. ii., p. 84.

Many of the letters and official papers relate to the alleged designs of Jacobites to assassinate William, while returning to Kensington after hunting, or to seize him and convey him over to France. Shrewsbury believed in the probability of their existence, on the ground that "the fate of us and of Europe seems to depend so much upon the life of one man." Others relate to the expected invasion of England by James II. Sundry warrants for the arrest of certain persons for high treason are noticed on pp. 56, 95, 96.

Particulars of the unsuccessful naval attempts on Brest and Dunkirk, in 1694-6, will be found in the correspondence of that period, among much information relating to the Navy and naval commanders. A secret voyage planned by one Neckson also came to nothing. The French Admiral Du Bart, who is mentioned in many places, was at one time "master at sea," and the King thought it would be unwise to encounter him with an inferior fleet. Admiral Russell was annoyed at "the honour two flag-officers received in kissing the King's hands," as being injurious to "discipline in the Fleet." It is remarkable that Sir George Rooke frequently complained in strong terms to Shrewsbury of the inferior quality of the crews on board the ships under his command, describing them in one place as "a miserable mob" (p. 218). Many letters relate to the disputes with Denmark and Sweden touching the failure of their ships to salute the English flag.

The difficulties encountered by the King in his passages between Holland and England, owing to unfavourable wind and weather, are illustrated by several letters of Secretary Blathwayt in October and November, 1694. At length he arrived in the William and Mary yacht at Margate, where he "took coach" to Canterbury, intending to dine the next day at Dartford.

Before going to Holland again, in 1695, the King, in consequence of the Queen's death, appointed Lords Justices to carry on the Government during his absence, Shrewsbury being one of them. The occasion was quite novel, there being no Royal family from which a "Keeper of England" could be selected, as in the days of the Edwards and Henrys, and the title now adopted was settled in Council. Several much corrected drafts show that considerable pains were taken to draw up instructions for the guidance of the Lords Justices. Whether these were actually formulated does not appear; there seems to be no fair copy among the State Papers; at any rate it was decided that the Lords Justices were to follow such instructions as they should receive from the King from time to time.

While the Jacobites abroad were encouraging themselves with the supposed unpopularity of "the Prince of Orange," Shrewsbury, on 6th September, 1695, was urging that William should return to England earlier in the year than usual; adding, "I believe he will find the nation so full of gratitude for the pains and dangers he has undergone, and so thoroughly well disposed to his and their own true interest, that it will be happy if this seasonable opportunity be taken for the summoning a new Parliament."

A letter of Lord Keeper Somers shortly after throws light on the intrigues incident to Parliamentary elections in those times. One party, for some reason, wished the poll (for Westminster) to be taken in Hyde Park; and it is related that "the Duke of Leeds gives a great deal of roast beef against Mr. Montagu." Shrewsbury was asked to aid the latter with his presence, if possible. William Penn wished to obtain a formal protection while travelling in the west during "so busy a time as that of the Elections," and received a letter from Shrewsbury, intended to serve that purpose; but Somers complained that Penn made an "ill use" of it, by employing all his interest in the election at Bristol.

The King was making a Progress at this time, accompanied by Shrewsbury, and was expected to pass through Oxford, on his way from Althorpe and Welbeck, about the time of the University Election. Secretary Trumbull writes: "I was very glad to find the University so generally well affected and dutiful to his Majesty as they frequently expressed themselves." They desired to entertain the King on the occasion, but were informed that "a treat was not expected from them"; only certain customary ceremonies were to be observed.

The long-expected defection of the Duke of Savoy from the Grand Alliance became an accomplished fact in the middle of 1696. Copies of his correspondence, real or imaginary, with the French generals were furnished by the Duke himself to Lord Galway, commander of William's forces in Italy. On 4th July, new style, Mr. Hill, Paymaster in Flanders, writes from Ghent: "I dare not presume to make any remarks on these letters, but I can assure your Grace that the King is under great disquiet. I fear it is equally impossible to send money to his Royal Highness and to my Lord Galway, for want of which the one will have a pretence to treat, and the other be under an impossibility of keeping his few troops together." And on 9-19th July: "What seems most provoking for us is, that H.R.H. seemed careful to manage the honour and interests of the Emperor and the King of Spain in some manner, but never so much as mentioned our King, or the States. . . . The King is more melancholy than I have ever seen him, and I fear the ill news which I bring him of the great necessities of his Army, and the little hopes I can see of subsisting it to the end of the campaign, have added to his chagrin."

William's resources were indeed at a low ebb. Shrewsbury writes from Whitehall on the 14th July to Secretary Blathwayt: "The Treasury have declared to us today they find it absolutely impossible to send any speedy and considerable supply for the Army, so that if any way could be found out to get credit for them abroad, for their (the Army's) support for some time, that seems to be the only expedient left to preserve them from immediate ruin."

No wonder the Allies were ready to treat for a general peace, though William was still eager "to attempt and do something" in order secure better terms. As the Dutch would not "lend a stiver," he proposed to raise money by pawning his jewels. However, negotiations were begun with the French, but were much delayed by the procrastination of the Emperor and Spain. The Emperor Leopold seems to have been already acting on the maxim which he afterwards enunciated—"La nostra tardanza non ci ha mai pregiudicato" (p. 770).

Among other things, proposals were made for William's marriage to a French Princess, but Shrewsbury pointed out the insuperable objections to it under the Bill of Rights. It was certainly thought that William intended to marry again. Other Princesses of Brandenburg, Hesse, Cleves, and Denmark, and a daughter of the Emperor were proposed for his selection, but it seems doubtful whether he ever had serious intentions in this direction. Shrewsbury remarks: "The posture of affairs in our King's reign has a great resemblance with that of Queen Elizabeth, some things excepted. She made great advantages from the several propositions of marriage she hearkened to, and found her interest in being coquette to many. I know not whether the same politic (policy) may not yet be good, and it may prove as useful to his Majesty to give hopes to many as to engage himself to one. But perhaps my own practice may help to convince (convict) me of partiality against matrimony."

Shrewsbury might have drawn a further parallel between the two reigns in the matter of favouritism. Keppel was now superseding Portland as chief favourite of William, and there are sundry references to their rivalry and quarrels.

At this time Matthew Prior, English Secretary at the Hague, was writing in an entertaining style to Shrewsbury. He gives an account of the journey to Cleves undertaken by the King for the express purpose of seeing the Princess of that House, and of the King's warm reception by the Elector. "In the Electrice's apartment, after they had talked an hour standing, the King, the Electrice, and the Duke of Zell went to ombre for five good hours; the King had an armed chair, the Duke of Zell an ordinary one, and she sat on the bed. The Electrice has a face not unlike our poor Queen (Mary), upon Queen (Catherine) Dowager's body. . . . The Princess is not ugly, but disagreeable; a tall miss at a boarding-school, with a lean neck; very pale, and a great lover, I fancy, of chalk and tobacco-pipes; nobody can tell if it be a match or no, but as much as one could guess he (the King) does not much dislike her." At dinner the Elector had a separate table for "the best English," while "there was a great deal of good meat and ill wine for everybody else; but they filled it (the wine) in such mighty glasses, and it came about so fast, that people grew drunk before they had half dined."

The French Refugees were now "very busy everywhere to get themselves included in the Treaty; they would fain make out that the Kings of England were garvands of the Edict of Nantes"; but Hill thought they "would not go home" even "if the door were opened."

The Emperor's stipulations, when at last they became known, proved to be so unlikely of acceptance that Shrewsbury wished the negotiations for peace had not proceeded so far as they had done. In spite of the low state of the King's revenue he declares: "I am confident the Parliament will do their part to maintain the war, and though we are poorer than we were, yet (we) are not in so desperate a condition as the disaffected Party would represent us."

The Army in the Netherlands was still in want of money in March, 1697, and it was feared that some great "disorder" might happen in it, which would put an end to all hopes of peace. Hill writes: "We are so far in arrear and in debt that both officer and soldier are put upon a dangerous trial. . . . I hope the King will not bring any more battalions over hither, my Lord; I fear the Regency (the Lords Justices) may have as much need of 'em in England as in Flanders."

However, the King went over to Holland in April, as usual, to prepare for another campaign, which was indeed commenced, though the treaty was still in progress, the plenipotentiaries having enough pretensions before them to occupy them "till Doomsday." The characters of the English negotiators, who were Lord Pembroke, Sir Joseph Williamson, and Lord Villiers, are amusingly sketched by Hill (pp. 475, 476, 560).

Matters appear to have been expedited by informal interviews between Portland and Marshal Boufflers, which caused some jealousy to the Imperialists and Spaniards. No doubt at these interviews various subjects were discussed, but the "main point" which concerned William was to obtain from France an acknowledgment of himself as King of Great Britain, with a guarantee not to assist James II. in any attempts to recover the Crown, and, if possible, for his removal from St. Germain to some place "further off."

William did not indeed hesitate to intervene for the settlement of other points in dispute. Villiers writes that the King had urged the Imperialists to come to a speedy determination "in the whole affair," and intimated his opinion on one of the principal obstacles, "that it was for the interest of the King of Spain to take an equivalent for Luxembourg." The Imperialists at first objected, "but this is referred to his Majesty, who certainly knows the interest of these countries better than any man, and if he pleases to have an equivalent taken it will avail but very little what our Germans say to the contrary."

As the Imperialists remained too long obdurate, the time fixed for the conclusion of the treaty, 1st September, new style, passed by, and warlike operations were recommenced by the French, who had become elated by their recent successes at sea, and in Spain. Fresh informal negotiations were nevertheless opened between Portland and Boufflers, though the former had in the meantime threatened to retire from the King's service, owing to "the slights" put on him. But the French now withdrew some of their previous offers, especially that of surrendering Strasburg; so that the Emperor for once did not benefit by his proverbial slowness.

After this the articles of the Treaty of Ryswick were settled with remarkable speed in comparison with the previous dilatoriness; and so on 10-20th September Williamson was able to inform Shrewsbury that "having, by the blessing of God, finally adjusted all our points, we are here this afternoon to sign the Treaty; it's now writing fair over." The reasons of the French for being so ready to conclude peace were the subject of speculation. Hill says: "'Tis certain our enemy was in a condition to carry on the war with great superiority everywhere, and I can see no political reasons which could move him to such a peace as we have now, by which France gives up more to Spain and the Empire than ever was given up by any treaty of peace that I know of. We must seek for the true reasons hereof in the age or devotion of the King of France, in his inclinations, or in those of Madame Maintenon. But a peace we have, and the Lord of Peace be thanked. I think I must go to Loo and receive the King's orders about the disposition of his Army, and where it must winter; I hope, in England. The Elector (of Bavaria) and the Prince of Vaudemont design to go visit the King at Loo, who are better company than the Czar would be," Peter the Great being then on a visit to Holland. The Treaty was provisionally ratified by the King a few days after, till the formal ratification under the Great Seal should arrive from London; and it was proclaimed at the Hague early in October.

The foreign troops in William's pay, Hill writes elsewhere, "are now grown useless, I hope, since the peace is made; but we owe these troops so much money, and are so unable to pay 'em at present, and the King so averse to the discharging any of 'em until they are cleared, that I fear we must keep 'em all the winter." As to the British troops, Hill stated his intention of getting most of them "sent every man to his own home," though he foresaw "a good deal of opposition," meaning, no doubt, on the part of the King.

Portland was appointed as Ambassador to Paris, "an honourable kind of banishment"; and the King gave him Lord Clancarty's estate. It has been alleged that Shrewsbury and the other English Ministers had no hand in the treaty, but Williamson congratulates the Duke on "the part your Excellency has had in bringing to a conclusion a Peace which does so universally rejoice." The Duke's correspondence during the negotiations with the King, Portland, and the three plenipotentiaries before named, will be found in Coxe. He would have been consulted more frequently but for the state of his health, and the King and Williamson apologised for troubling him as much as they did. The other Lords Justices also appear to have been in constant communication with the King.

After all, nothing appears to have been settled in respect of the residence of James II., and on this Shrewsbury remarks to Hill: "I do not yet understand that anything is agreed concerning King James removing further from Paris. His remaining so near will surely be very undecent, when our King has an ambassador there, both with respect to himself and the King of France; and it will be extreme(ly) inconvenient to the quiet of his Majesty's affairs to have him in a place where such easy recourse may be had to him. The nation in general is much pleased and satisfied with the Peace, but there are some who will like nothing, who will be ready to find any fault they can. The uncertainty of this (which I am sensible might not properly be inserted in the public Treaty), and the Article about Hudson's Bay, are the only two objections I have yet heard mentioned."

It is important to observe that William had signed "a separate peace" (p. 569), for the Imperialists and the Catholic Princes of Germany delayed signing the Treaty till 30th October, n.s. In the meantime a clause was secretly "foisted" into the Treaty by "underhand" collusion between the Catholic Princes and the French, to the effect that the Protestant religion and churches should not be restored in the provinces given up by the French. Most of the Protestant Princes at first refused to sign the Treaty as thus unwarrantably altered, but the Elector of Brandenburg and others could not well afford to be left at the mercy of France, and it was utterly impossible for William to renounce his own stipulations and re-open the war.

On this Villiers, now Earl of Jersey, remarks: "This manner of proceeding is a little rough, and is warning enough for us not to rely too much on the peace we have now made." Williamson points out that it was contrary to the professions made by the French during the negotiations; and he gives some account of the subsequent proceedings of the Diet of Ratisbon, where at length the Treaty was ratified by all the German Princes, the Protestant deputies signing with "a kind of reservation," which was entered in the register of the Diet.

It was expected that the King would in future be able to give more attention to domestic affairs. On 18-28th November, Hill writes from Antwerp: "His Majesty is got out of an ill war very gloriously, and he is going now, I suppose, to settle his reign upon such methods as may make him more glorious in peace. . . . I know, my Lord, that the King has of late been pressed, by all those who dare press him on that subject, to marry; and I know his Majesty shows no great aversion to it now."

William was however in no hurry to oblige his advisers. On 9-19th March, 1698, Hill reports that the Queen of Spain, anxious for an alliance with England, "would fain help our King to a wife; she offered first one of the Emperor's daughters, and afterwards one of her Lutheran cousins, but his Majesty could not be tempted." The temptation no doubt was great, for the Queen's object was to counteract the intrigues of the French ministers at Madrid, where "the ill health of the King gives great expectations to all those who pretend to share in the succession." With that object William was no doubt in full sympathy, for, as Hill remarks, "the French King has this day more men and ships ready, and more money in his exchequer, than all the Princes who were lately allied against him. That alliance is disbanded, and no new one made."

In another letter Hill expresses his alarm lest French armies should take possession of the entire Spanish monarchy, as soon as the Spanish King should die. "In the meantime the Parliament of England is busy about trifles, when it might be making preparations for securing Mexique and Peru." Some months later Hill expressed an opinion that the best plan would be for the King to "play a sure game, and enter into such measures as may be reasonable with the French themselves, and set a son of France upon the Spanish throne, upon the best terms we can," though it was "almost treason" to say so. This was after the flattering reception of Portland in France.

From December, 1697, to March, 1698, the Earl of Manchester was at Venice as Ambassador extraordinary, and wrote frequently to Shrewsbury. After many tedious formalities he was received by the Republic, and presented a memorial requiring reparation to be made to English merchants for certain injustices which they had suffered from the Signory; but he had to return without obtaining a satisfactory reply. It was supposed that the Venetians intended shortly to send an Ambassador to England.

At the same time Sir Lambert Blackwell, who had previously been Consul at Leghorn, was appointed Ambassador extraordinary to the Republic of Genoa, and to the Grand Duke of Tuscany at Florence. At Genoa he presented a memorial on behalf of the English Factory (at Leghorn), and experienced the same impossibility of obtaining a definite reply as Lord Manchester did at Venice. He managed, however, to secure the release of two of the King's subjects from the galleys, to which they had been condemned merely as "heretics." From Genoa he went to Florence, where he made similar remonstrances on behalf of the English merchants at Leghorn, which had been declared a free port as far back as 1593. He remained at Florence till 1703. In the meantime, in 1701, Shrewsbury visited these cities, and was entertained by Blackwell; he also met several English gentlemen, including Mr. Addison.

There is very little in this collection for the last two years of William III. When his death was reported in Rome, Shrewsbury did not at first believe it. He says: "We were told that (the French) Cardinal Jansen had sent about the news of the King's death with that joy and triumph that it is shameful; pray God send it prove as false as formerly." A few weeks later he writes: "The great character which King William has in these parts is chiefly owing to the old Prince Vaudemont, who, when he was in Rome, gave them a true notion of that great prince, (and) how much it was their interest to wish well to one who curbed the exorbitant power of France; before, they (had) esteemed him a tyrant and a monster."

William's successor had not to wait so long for recognition at the Roman Court. After an interview with Cardinal Sacripanti Shrewsbury writes, on 21st July, 1703: "The Cardinal always mixes, as he did now, in his discourse, how the Pope recommends to his missionaries not to meddle in politics. The Cardinal called the Queen of England Queen several times."

Subsequently to the death at Rome in 1703 of the Abbé Scarlatti, who had received a pension of a thousand crowns yearly from King William, Shrewsbury in 1704 recommended the Comte Mattei, as one who would serve the Queen well for a small annuity, though he could have no "public character," and could only be remunerated as "an intelligencer or spy." The Elector of Hanover also had an agent at Rome, the Baron Scarlatti's nephew, at which Shrewsbury expressed much surprise, and, when he met him, gave him but a cold greeting. Some time after, at Augsburg, Shrewsbury was informed "that the House of Hanover is in reputation in Germany to be very indifferent in matters of religion, meaning that they have little, and have bred up their children to practise that (which) was most convenient where they were married."

In 1703 the letters from Blackwell, Ambassador at Florence, to Shrewsbury recommence. After so many years Blackwell was still memorialising the Grand Duke on the subject of wrongs done to English privateers, mariners, and merchants in the port of Leghorn, especially to one William Plowman, who had been capturing French ships as prizes. The Ambassador was instructed to complain of the undue favour shown there to French privateers. In June Blackwell was eagerly looking forward to the arrival of Sir Cloudesley Shovell, with the English fleet; and the Admiral, as soon as he arrived in Leghorn Road, in September, demanded "immediate satisfaction" in the Queen's name, and the removal of the Governor there. Shovell threatened, in case of non-compliance, that the charges of his fleet would be added to the damages claimed on behalf of her Majesty's subjects. The Grand Duke made some concessions in respect of the arrival and departure of mariners of the Allies, but apparently did not settle any of the claims. On this Stepney remarked in a letter to Shrewsbury, that he "could not but be concerned to find so honest a man as Sir Cloudesley sent so far to no purpose."

In the following year Blackwell was commanded by the Queen to require the English merchants at Leghorn to settle their affairs there and withdraw their effects; but they resented this interference, and declared that "they reckoned themselves as safe at Leghorn as at Whitehall." They even presented a remonstrance to the Queen against Blackwell's proceedings, declaring that the Grand Duke was innocent of the charges made against him, and that Plowman was a Jacobite. The same paper contains a statement which is noticeable as occurring at so early a date: "The sovereignty of the sea is and hath ever been the undoubted right of the Crown of England, and always reckoned a part, and the greatest part, of that Empire" (p. 695).

An unsigned letter to Blackwell, from Genoa, 6-17th Nov., 1703, mentions two persons who had been sent from London to the Vaudois, with letters from the Queen. They had assured the writer that there were 15,000 men in England who had "all signed a covenant to succour those people."

Between May, 1703, and April, 1705, George Stepney, Ambassador at Vienna, addressed many letters to Shrewsbury, then in Rome, giving him notice of all occurrences in connexion with the war which had been declared by Queen Anne, Holland, and the Emperor against France. The English and Dutch fleets were sent into the Mediterranean under Shovell "to second the designs" of the Emperor on Naples. Stepney had no great hopes of their success, but thought there was a possibility of "another Revolution (in Naples) almost as wonderful as that wherein your Grace (Shrewsbury) had so eminent a share." If the fleets could arrive "in the neighbourhood" at the time of the anticipated Papal election, it was thought that this would be an advantage to the Imperial interests at Rome; but no such election took place for many years.

It was hoped that the Duke of Savoy would "still show France the same slippery trick as he did the Allies towards the close of the last war." Hill, whom Stepney calls "our fat friend," was engaged at Turin in endeavouring to procure this result, but Stepney had no great opinion of Hill's methods. The Duke at first declined to come over to the Allies, though his conditions had been accepted; but in the end he "cut his fingers by paring his apple too finely," after all "his refined politics," and was glad to enter the second Grand Alliance, which Venice was also expected to join.

Shovell, while riding at sea off Leghorn, expressed his opinion that the fleet required to be supported in the kingdom of Naples by regular troops, who could show the people of the country "how to keep their ground when an enemy approach, and learn 'em to stand when they see men killed." He adds: "I have seen the experience of militia and mob, of (between) which there is little difference, for neither of 'em will stand against disciplined troops."

The rest of Stepney's letters give many details of affairs in Germany, Italy, Poland, Hungary, and Turkey, with some allusions to the military operations of the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, and other commanders. These are also referred to in Shrewsbury's Journal. Thus, under 27th September, 1704, Shrewsbury makes the following entry: "I am told that Madame Maintenon, writing to Cardinal Jansen upon the defeat at Hochstet, said they were so used to success that every little disadvantage seemed much to them. She called that little!"

From another entry in the Journal about the same date it appears that the French considered it was easy to make an agreement with Queen Anne, by providing that she should "reign for her life, and that the Prince of Wales should reign after her." On this Shrewsbury expressed the opinion that "the nation would never bear it, and that any Minister who should treat such a peace would lose his head." A similar proposal had been made before to King William (pp. 350, 447), though this has been denied. The negotiations for a general peace in 1705 are discussed in the Journal (pp. 796-799).

The long letter of Benjamin Furley in 1706 is a valuable contribution to the history of commerce between England and the Low Countries.

Many papers of more domestic interest have been passed over in the foregoing chronological review, such as Sir Samuel Morland's curious scheme in 1689 for the opening of suspected letters at the General Post Office, substituting counterfeit hand-writings, so as to retain the originals for evidence against the writers, and re-sealing the letters with counterfeit seals or wafers. These operations he had first introduced to the notice of Charles II., who attended late at night, once at Lord Arlington's office, and once at the Post Office, in order to see the working of the "models." Morland alleged that "all these things" were practised at the Post Office by that King's order till the Fire of London, in which "all the machines and utensils belonging to those arts" were destroyed. King William however "thought that the secret ought to die with him, as too dangerous to be encouraged"; yet some such practices seem to have been still carried on in 1696 (p. 386). In 1694-5 the Post Office Commissioners were troubled about the loss of packet-boats between England and Holland, and between Ireland and England.

The establishment of the national Bank is referred to by Shrewsbury with some distrust: "This morning (8th June, 1694) the Commission for taking subscriptions for the 1,200,000*l.* towards erecting the new Corporation called the Bank of England was finished at Council, and there signed by her Majesty. It is generally believed the money will come in apace, but many question what the consequence may be if they grow to such a greatness as they promise themselves." Two years later the Bank did "a great service" to the State in lending 200,000*l.* for the needs of the Army abroad, when the Exchequer was in very low water.

The "villainous trades of defacing and clipping our coin," and of sending the clippings abroad, after melting, are alluded to in a letter of Gilbert Heathcote, 18th March, 1695. In that year there were "several meetings" in Shrewsbury's office to consider the proposals for "reforming" the coinage, and the question was afterwards submitted to Council and to Parliament. There is an elaborate paper by Sir Joseph Child on this vexed question, in which he objects to the proposed remedy of raising the value of the crown-piece to 6*s.* 3*d.* or 6*s.* 6*d.*, as he thought there would be much melting of unclipped silver, except by the Directors of the Banks, who "have so much honour, or too many eyes upon them."

On 9th June, 1696, Shrewsbury writes to Blathwayt: "The want of current money in the kingdom begins to create disturbances in many places. . . . I apprehend, when the poor understand that a remedy is not like to come suitable to their hopes, they will be very unruly." And on the 16th: "The Treasury have directed their under-officers of the Revenue to receive such (money) as is punchable, but not such as is clipped, nor sixpences." The people had a notion that the Window Tax, which was specially imposed to provide for the renewal of the currency, could be paid with "the little money," but the Excisemen objected, and one of them "had liked to have been knocked on the head and his money taken from him at Halifax." The best money had for some years been employed in payment of the foreign soldiers in the King's pay (p. 271); and the debased condition of the coin remaining in England was used as a principal argument in favour of making peace with France (pp. 398, 437).

One feature of these papers is the large number of tavern and coffee-houses in London and the suburbs which are referred to, chiefly as the resorts of Jacobites. "Like clothes made in Long Lane," was a synonym for anything unbecoming. Fleet Street is alluded to apparently as being a favourite place for duels (p. 677). Watermen on the Thames used to "scold" (p. 763). The fire at Whitehall palace, and the plans for its rebuilding, are mentioned.

In regard to Scotland, there is some correspondence which, though intermittent, is of much value. In March, 1689, the Duke of Hamilton and the Earl of Perth received letters from Ireland on behalf of King James, exhorting them "to stick by him," and expressing the hope that "the King will find some friends in Scotland, as well as in England." Perth also received a letter from Melfort explaining James's intentions, in purposely obscure terms. James himself, in his commissions to Balcarrais and Dundee, announced his intention of going over to Scotland with part of his troops, and that he had "sent letters to the chiefs of the Clans to arm." He wished the nobility and gentry to assemble, to summon the bishops and burghs, and to call themselves a Convention of Estates. He declared that "the Presbyterians are not good masters in any government," and that the ancient Cavalier party were "the only true basis that Monarchy can rest upon in Scotland."

On 13th April Tarbat wrote to Melville, anticipating that "the attacks from Ireland will be both speedy and violent," and that the greater part of both the Highlanders and Lowlanders would "concur"; and lamenting that "the very embarrassing of our King (William) in the present conjuncture will be more hurtful to the Allies than Scotland is worth." Tarbat thought the Government in Scotland had been too severe on "people who were half-persuaded," and that such severity would impel many to "engage in mischief." It was, he urged, absolutely necessary that the King should personally assume the Government of Scotland, establish a Council, and send forces thither sufficient to repel an invasion from Ireland, or a Highland insurrection.

Melville had already been with the King at Whitehall, and afterwards, on 16th April, wrote to him from Edinburgh on the same subjects, apologising for having assisted in proclaiming the King and Queen, and in drawing up an "Instrument of Government," without previously obtaining their sanction. He refers to the seizure of James's Declaration and of many letters from Ireland, doubtless including those before noticed. Some of the persons written to by James had been arrested, but much time had been lost in disputes between the members of the temporary Convention, and if there had been "one man of brains and courage" among the late King's party, Melville believed "the kingdom in all probability had been lost." There was some jealousy, he adds, as to what persons should be appointed to wait on the King (and Queen) "with the offer of our Crown," which James was declared to have "forfaulted." He urged William not to delay in taking the oath, and not to make any scruple as to the clause regarding the extirpation of heretics, as an Act could soon be passed for prohibiting the prosecution of people merely for their opinions.

There are a few other letters between the King, Shrewsbury, and Hamilton on these matters.

In 1695 the Chancellor, Tweeddale, obtained orders from the King to Admiral Russell to remind the Government of Algiers that under the treaty with Algiers all Scots trading in the Mediterranean Sea were entitled to the same freedom as English, provided they carried passports from the Admiralty in Scotland.

The treaty with Tripoli was in different terms, but the Scots were presumed to be comprised in it as the King's subjects.

Letters from Secretary Johnston, in July, 1695, relate to the indictment of Lord Breadalbane for high treason, committed in treating with the Highlanders in favour of James. It was hoped he would "throw himself on the King's mercy," so as to avoid a trial. Orders for continuing the Parliament were expected from William, then abroad, but the packet-boat was "a-missing," and "the sitting without them being treason," the Commissioner, Tweeddale, had to close it abruptly. Both Tweeddale and Johnston write about the enquiry touching "the slaughter of Glencoe," and the vindication "of the King and Government." Shrewsbury says nothing about this in his replies, having found that the King had "no mind" that he should meddle in Scottish affairs. He was, however, anxious to obtain particulars of the discovery which "a fine lady" (in Scotland) had promised to make. In October Tweeddale mentions the release of Breadalbane with disapproval, and declares he found it would be impossible for him to remain in so divided a Government. Thenceforward Shrewsbury had no further correspondence with the Scottish Ministers.

In Captain John Scott's list of Jacobites in France, dated 18th January, 1696, are the names of many Scotsmen, with particulars of the journeys made by some of them between St. Germain and their native country. In the following February it was rumoured that Du Bart was convoying to Scotland three or four thousand men under the command of the Duke of Berwick, in order to distract attention from the proposed invasion of England by James; but Russell could learn nothing of them.

The rooms formerly belonging to the Scottish Secretary at Hampton Court are mentioned (p. 645).

Under 28th July, 1702, Shrewsbury enters in his Journal a report circulated in Rome that the Duke of Berwick was "gone for Scotland, which agrees not ill with the account we have that Duke Hamilton and seventy others have protested against the Parliament."

On 25th June, 1703, Somers writes that "the Parliament of Scotland has not acted according to expectation," and that efforts were being made "to force England to think of coming to a Union with them in good earnest."

At the close of his letter of 26th December, 1706, Benjamin Furley, in writing about the proposed Union between the two countries, makes some shrewd remarks on the folly of those who opposed the repeal of the Test Act, by which Presbyterians were disqualified from bearing offices, and foretelling that, unless the repeal was enacted, Scotland would "seek another King than that of England" on Queen Anne's death. To this Shrewsbury replies that he had been informed that "the aversion to the Union is not such as it appears," and remarks that "it is easy to procure addresses for or against anything," and that the inclination of the people, and not that of the Parliament, should be studied.

There is a copy of the speech made by William Talbot, Bishop of Oxford, in defence of the English Bishops for voting in favour of the Act of Union, and of the recognition of Presbyterianism as the religion of Scotland (p. 654).

A large proportion of these volumes consists of correspondence relating to Ireland. On 9th January, 1689, Lord Mountjoy assured the Prince of Orange that he did "not want some servants" there. On 15th March Tyreconnell sent advices to Scotland of James II.'s arrival at Kinsale with troops, and that 50,000 more had been raised for him in Ireland.

The letters between Shrewsbury and Lord Capel, one of the three Lords Justices of Ireland, begin in April, 1694. The very first letter evinces Capel's distrust of Sir Charles Porter, Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Shrewsbury thought a Parliament "would much conduce to the satisfaction and settlement of that kingdom," under Capel's prudent management; and Capel sent over Chief Justice Pine to state his views thereon. Having discussed the matter with Pine and others, Shrewsbury writes that some people objected to the holding of a Parliament, "upon the probability of their renewing old quarrels." Three things were likely to "cause heats"—(1) the proposed confirmation of the Articles of Limerick and Galway; (2) the passing of an Act of Indemnity for offences during the war; (3) the difference between the Government and Parliament about money-bills.

As to the first, Shrewsbury's advisers were doubtful whether an Irish Parliament could be prevailed on to make good the King's promises ; as to the second, they hoped sufficient time had now elapsed to remove former difficulties ; as to the third, they differed. This last was known as the question of "the Sole Right" of originating money-bills. It had been regarded as one of the King's prerogatives, but had been claimed by the previous Irish Parliament, though no similar claim had ever been made by the English Parliament. Some "honest gentlemen" thought it "a prerogative of the King's better lost than kept," but Shrewsbury would not hazard an opinion on so nice a point.

In his reply Capel commends Shrewsbury for "so prudently stating (the) three questions most necessary to be resolved," but warns him that "this kingdom must in short time come to a manner of desperation," a debt of 80,000*l.* having been contracted in that year alone. From a copy of his letter to Secretary Trenchard on 14th July, it appears that Capel's views were not shared by the other Lords Justices. In that letter he specifies the financial and other difficulties of the Government, and gives a curious list of proposed fresh laws.

"Many of the angry gentlemen of the last House of Commons" had promised Capel that they would not in future "differ with their Majesties," knowing that another rupture "would utterly undo them, and leave the country untenanted and unimproved." This promise was relied on by Capel, but distrusted by some of the privy councillors and judges, who were of opinion that "the sole power of money-bills" would again be insisted on. Some opposition was also anticipated in respect of the two other matters in question, but Capel had received assurances which made him hopeful of the proposed measures being passed conformably "to the King's honour and word." Consequently he recommended that a Parliament should be called in the autumn, or early in the following year. The other two Lords Justices gave independent advice, but their letter is not here.

A letter of Colonel George Philips, a member of the previous Irish Parliament, gives some account of its debates, and recommends the abolition of the statute for burning heretics, and the enactment of various "coercive laws." That letter, and another from the senior Mr. Brodrick, a leading advocate for the Sole Right, were subsequently forwarded by Capel to Shrewsbury in justification of his own views.

On consideration of the conflicting opinions placed before them, the Council in England deferred the holding of an Irish Parliament, giving as their reason that it could not meet before November, "which being a time the Parliament of England is to sit, the old established maxim, that the two Parliaments ought not to be held at the same time, will make it impossible to think of doing it before the spring."

From this decision Capel gathered that "there was a coldness in the Council towards the calling of a Parliament"; and in his letter of 8th August he protests that "were the misrepresentations on your side taken away, little would remain of differences to be composed here; the miseries of this country consist not in divisions amongst themselves, but poverty and insecurity are the motives of their disquiet." At the end he adds: "Here is (to me) a surprising letter this last post come to us as the result of your counsels, . . . that we should be sure to signify to the gentry that the King will not depart from his right in the raising of money-bills; as if one should say, unless you promise this, you shall have no Parliament." This he thought injudicious, the country gentlemen being generally so well disposed.

In his reply on 16th August (not 6th, as in the draft; cf. pp. 111, 147) Shrewsbury denies that he had insinuated any "coldness in the councils (counsels) here," but states that he had represented to the King the danger of delay, and that the King had assured him, through Portland, that the sitting of a Parliament should "not be deferred longer than the next spring."

Shortly after Shrewsbury, in a letter to Blathwayt, refers to applications received from the Lords Justices that corn might be exported from Ireland to countries in amity with the King and Queen, "all sorts of grain being such a drug in Ireland." The only objection to such export was that supplies "might steal" to France, but it was thought this would be "better winked at," rather than the total prohibition should be maintained. In reply, William asked the opinion of the English Council.

On 7th October, Lord Coningsby, the previous Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, writes from Loo that the King had "fixed to have a Parliament in the spring," and expresses the hope that it will "meet in such a temper as will encourage him to have one yearly"; adding, "I found there had been here the same doctrine I met with at London, that Irish people could not settle Ireland, and that a Parliament of England must." Coningsby had recommended that Shrewsbury should "go Lord Lieutenant," but the King answered that he could not spare him. Coningsby then proposed "our friend" (the Marquis of Winchester, son of the Duke of Bolton?) as Lord Deputy; to which the King made no definite reply. This recommendation seems to have caused some jealousy to Capel (p. 154).

On 19th October Capel urges that it was high time "to own the calling of a Parliament in the spring," in order that the necessary Bills might be prepared, as they had first to pass the Irish Council, which was a slow business, and then to be submitted to the English Council, where they had "seldom a quick dispatch." The bearer of this letter was Mr. Brodrick, with whom Shrewsbury had some discussion, but found it necessary to ask Capel for information touching the characters of official personages in Ireland.

The required information is given at great length in Capel's of 15th November. He alludes to the general dissatisfaction with Porter, the Lord Chancellor, who had been elevated by the King on the advice of the Protestant gentry, but had discovered "his inclination in favour of the Irish;" to the incapacity of some of the Judges; to the constant absence of Sir John Temple, the Attorney General; to the ignorance of the Commissioners of the Revenue; and to the indifference shown by certain members of the Irish Privy Council to the King's interest.

In the same letter, and in another towards the end of the year, Capel states what he had done towards inducing "the gentlemen of this country" not to insist upon the Sole Right, but to "pass one money-bill at least that had its rise from the Council." They had done this out of regard to Capel alone, but if "another" were "added" to him in the Government, he says, it was not to be expected they would be so compliant.

No Parliament was however held in Ireland in the spring of 1695, as proposed, and in May of that year Capel was still urging the necessity of one. By the death of Secretary Trenchard the affairs of Ireland had then come more immediately within Shrewsbury's province.

Several letters relate to the estate in Ireland granted by the King to Mrs. Villiers, afterwards Lady Orkney, and which he wished to be confirmed by an Act of the Irish Parliament. It was not part of the Crown lands, but part of the "lands of Regicides" which had formerly been given to James, Duke of York, who on his accession retained them as his private property.

In June, 1695, Capel, now Lord Deputy, was preparing Bills for the Session of Parliament, which began on 27th August. Differences at once arose as to the election of the Speaker, but the measures proposed did not excite much opposition. By reading the Bill for an additional Excise, the Commons, Capel considered, practically renounced "the Sole Right." They granted to the King a supply of 163,325*l.*, a larger sum than had ever been voted before, though the country was "miserably poor." They insisted however on inquiring into "the state of the nation," and passed a vote "that the continuance and favour which the Irish Papists have had in this kingdom during the late Governments here, since the year 1690, have been another cause of the miseries of this kingdom"; the allusion being to the times of Lord Romney, Sir Charles Porter, and Lord Coningsby. Besides Capel's letters there are others from Thomas Brodrick on these matters.

Articles against Porter were next "exhibited" in the Commons, charging him with divers "high crimes and misdemeanours"—taking new and excessive fees, exceeding his powers, imprisoning a creditor to compel him to discharge a debtor in the custody of the Sheriffs of Dublin, ejecting the Usher of the Court of Chancery from his office, placing adherents of King James and Irish Papists on commissions of the peace, favouring such persons in causes pending before him as Lord Chancellor, and acting arbitrarily in causes between parties. But Porter, according to Brodrick (5th October), had a large number of supporters in the Commons, consisting of "attorneys, six clerks, and officers depending on the courts," besides relatives and dependants, and friendly members chosen "wherever the Irish could influence elections," with persons having causes in Chancery, the whole making one fourth of the House. These supporters managed to negative the question put, that the articles contained matter of impeachment, by 118 (or 116) to 96. Brodrick was alarmed at this result, and declared that "my Lord Chancellor is too great for this kingdom to cope with, unless relieved by the King, whose name is made use of for supporting him in everything complained of." Capel likewise made some strong remarks on this occasion.

In October the Emperor's envoy informed Secretary Trumbull at Whitehall "that the Roman Catholics of Ireland had complained of the breach of the capitulations made with them in the late war," and that the Emperor would be obliged if the King would "have a regard of them."

On 28th October Brodrick sent to Shrewsbury a long account of further proceedings against the Lord Chancellor, during which there had been conferences between both Houses. It was agreed that witnesses should be examined, but Porter was allowed to come into the Commons to make his defence, which is set out. He denied having taken fees; said that "he had never been a favourer of Jacobites, Irish, or any other enemies of this Government"; and gave instances of his activity in bringing the war to an end. On his withdrawal from the House, a debate of some hours ended in a vote "that what my Lord Chancellor had said is satisfactory without any proof." Sir Joseph Williamson, a friend of Porter's, then ironically moved that the thanks of the House should nevertheless be voted to those gentlemen who had undertaken the proofs of the articles; but this was dropped, after the gentlemen themselves had naturally objected. Out of Parliament the Bishops were espousing the Chancellor's cause, even in a sermon before the Lord Deputy, and his defence was taken up in the coffee-houses.

In his reply Shrewsbury says little about Porter, but commends the zeal of Thomas Brodrick and his friends for the public good. The matter which most troubled him was the "heats upon the past governments," particularly that of Lord Romney, and he asks Brodrick for information, which is given at great length a week later, with special reference to the interpretations placed upon the Articles of Limerick.

According to Capel's letter of 17th November, Porter's friends celebrated his triumph "by great assemblies in public houses, and by illuminations in taverns and great feasting." Porter threatened to fix on Capel the responsibility for the "prosecution"; but some of his opponents proposed "to seek for redress" in the English Parliament, which the King, through Shrewsbury, desired Capel to prevent, if possible, under the excuse that the time of that Parliament was more than sufficiently occupied, and nothing could be more "prejudicial to his service and the common good." In fact, Shrewsbury's letter clearly shows that the King strongly resented the proceedings against Porter of some of "his servants" in high stations, though Capel was acquitted of having encouraged them. The persons particularly meant seem to have been Robert Rochford, the Attorney General, and Alan Brodrick, the Solicitor General (p. 279).

There are other letters on this subject, and on Irish Parliamentary matters in general. The Session was adjourned by command in December, till 28th March, and from then till 27th June. Shortly after, Shrewsbury wrote to qualify his statement of the King's displeasure, but adds that the King thought "it would be an ill precedent to be obliged to remove a man upon the dislike of a party in the House of Commons, when what his enemies would charge him with appears to his Majesty of no great weight."

Capel's administration is however greatly praised by Coxe, who seems to be quite unjustified in his inference that "the weakness of the Crown is manifested in the inability of William to remove so obnoxious and refractory a servant" as Porter.

On 11th January, 1696, Capel gives personal reasons for complaining of Porter's conduct, in refusing to admit a King's serjeant and a King's counsel on his warrant. He frankly charges him with being inclined to the late King's interest, and with covering "the corruptions of several of the officers and persons here"; and he commends Lord Abercorn for his usefulness in the House of Lords. Shrewsbury thereupon wrote to Porter, commanding him to obey Capel's warrant, which he did.

In the spring Capel became seriously indisposed, and appointed Lord Blessington and Colonel Wolseley as Lord Justices during his retirement from Dublin. His real object was to provide successors in case of his death, evidently to keep out Porter, but Shrewsbury on 12th May reminded him that his commission did not allow of this, and that in such an event the election lay with the Council. There seems nevertheless to have been some dispute on this point, and on 29th May the Lords Justices in England asked the King to empower them to appoint such persons as the King should name as soon as a vacancy occurred.

They were too late. Capel died on the very next day, the 30th, and on 3rd June Sir Charles Porter in very few words announced the fact, and his own election as Lord Justice by the Irish Council. His letter also mentions robberies by the Tories, or Rapparees, in many parts, and the activity of French privateers on the Irish coast; and on the 17th he insisted on the need for cruisers at the mouth of the Northern Channel. In Ireland there was some "dissatisfaction at my Lord Chancellor's so soon procuring himself to be elected sole Justice," and complaints were made to Shrewsbury, who sent to ask the King to nominate without delay.

Shrewsbury did not reply to Porter's first letter till the 20th, when, without taking any notice of his election, he informed him that the Lords Justices in England were waiting to know the King's pleasure touching Capel's successor or successors, that they had postponed the meeting of the Irish Parliament, and that the Admiralty had been asked to clear the coast of privateers. Three days later he states that the Admiralty had already sent two ships, but complained of the unsatisfactory disposal of the ships already under the direction of the Chief Governor, which, when not employed as "passage-boats," remained idle in the port of Dublin.

On 27th June Porter announces the meeting of the Parliament, in his turn taking no notice of the order for its postponement. He complains of Chief Justice Pine's behaviour towards himself, and of a design to question the power of the Irish Council to elect a Lord Justice, on the ground "that the Council meant by the Statute of Henry VIII. was the whole body of the Peers;" but he had been congratulated on his election by both Houses, and was confident that the late "heats" had been dissipated. He denied that there was any "such distinction amongst English Protestants as Whig and Tory," though there were "several sects of them, as in England;" in proof of which assertion he mentions that the Commons had unanimously expelled Colonel Sanderson for refusing to sign "the Association" in defence of the King's person.

On 9th July Shrewsbury informed Porter that the Earls of Montrath and Drogheda had been joined with him in the Government. From another letter on the 14th it seems that the Parliament was not at liberty to sit for the transaction of business till instructions should be received from the King. Such authority was not given for some months, as the King wished first to be assured that they would grant a Supply, and confirm the Articles of Limerick. The attention of the home authorities was moreover now engrossed by Fenwick's affair, and by the negotiations for peace with France.

On 24th November the Earl of Meath revived the complaints against Porter, the "Lord Chancellor," as he slightly calls him, alleging that "the strength and power of the Irish" by his means "is greatly encouraging to the King's enemies at home and abroad"; but Porter died shortly after.

On 25th January, 1697, Bridges writes from London that there was "a new commission going for Ireland, including Lord Galway and Lord Clifford." Three Lords Justices were subsequently appointed, namely, Lords Winchester, Galway, and Villiers, as stated in Shrewsbury's letter of 23rd April. There was some question as to the selection of their Secretary (p. 465). Winchester and Galway assumed office on 31st May, and at once began writing their long series of letters, but Villiers was still engaged at Ryswick. They found Capel's party anxious for Parliament to meet, while "the others" wished to defer it. Soon after the new Lord Chancellor, John Methuen, writes that "my Lord Galway's prudence and application to business, and the Marquis's good intention and easy humour, please all people, . . . an advantage no Government here hath yet had."

The Bills for confirming the Outlawries and the Articles of Limerick and Galway were agreed to in the Irish Council, but the Papists had become alarmed at the proposed explanation of those Articles, and were collecting funds for sending deputies to England, to the King, and to his allies the Catholic Princes. On the other hand Methuen considered that "it must now appear to his Majesty that the Protestants of Ireland are more moderate than they have been represented to him"; and he admitted that "Lord Capel's friends" had proved very reasonable. Particulars of all the Bills sent over to England by the Council for approval are given in Shrewsbury's letter of 13th July; other letters detail the resolutions of the Council in England in relation to them. Galway describes one of them as a Bill for suppressing convents and banishing monks. Afterwards a clause as to "concealed lands" was added to this Bill in England, which was complained of as affecting many Protestants, contrary to the Act of Settlement.

The Irish Parliament reassembled on 27th July. The subsequent letters of the two acting Lords Justices and Methuen state their opinions and the proceedings on the various Bills at great length; but most of the joint letters from the Lords Justices to the English Council are not in this collection. It was soon found that the late Lord Chancellor's party showed a disposition "to revive faction in the House," but Lord Capel's friends were more moderate. There is much about the fierce "feud" between Mr. Philip Savage, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the two Brodricks, but the former was induced by Winchester to promise his assistance "in promoting the King's business."

On 30th August Shrewsbury expressed his desire that "some Bill" for the encouragement of the linen manufacture in Ireland might be passed at once, to divert the Irish from the woollen trade, which "the English are so jealous of." Papers on this subject will be found among the undated documents (pp. 743-745).

Trouble arose in the Commons over the Bill for the Poll-tax, owing to the impending change in the value of moneys. They wished to add a clause that the old coinage should be accepted at its nominal value in payment of the tax, which Winchester thought the King "would never allow of, as a thing that touched his prerogative." In the end they confined themselves to presenting an Address on the subject. Even this was not acceptable to the Lords Justices, but Galway writes: "Il me semble que des sujets peuvent tousjours représenter à leur Souverain ce qu'ils croient convenir à leur estat present."

The Lords Justices met with still greater opposition in the Upper House. Winchester writes on 4th September: "There are some Bishops in the House of Lords that are very troublesome, and would fain have thrown out the Bill of Attainders" In another letter he names certain Bishops whom "my Lord Capel made the worst of them all"; but he thought that Lord Drogheda was the real leader of the opposition, in which he was assisted by Lord Abercorn, who "is a great manager against everything," thus expressing an opinion as to the latter utterly at variance with that of his predecessor, Capel. The number of the opposition was sixteen, according to Galway (p. 558); and these were almost equal to the supporters of the Government (p. 562).

On 9th September Galway writes very fully on the disagreements between Mr. Savage and the Brodricks, with the former of whom he had angrily remonstrated. The "affair" had been appeased by Methuen's adroitness, and the two parties of which these turbulent members were chiefs had broken up, but Savage's conduct in the House was still offensive. Galway protested against Winchester's recommendation of him to be a Commissioner of the Revenue; and Winchester himself wrote of Savage, "he is as bad a Whig in Ireland as my Lord Wharton is." Among other things, Savage managed to revive the question of the Sole Right (pp. 558, 563). He appears to have been the chief cause of the disagreement between Winchester and Galway (pp. 566, 601).

Methuen on 8th October gives a succinct account of the manner in which the Bill for the confirmation of the Articles of Limerick passed both Houses. In the Commons, after much debate, "it was openly declared that the Protestants sacrificed their resentments and wrongs to the King's honour, and voted unanimously for the Bill. In the House of Lords, on the contrary, all the objections against the Bill were, that it was not favourable enough to the Papists."

Sir Francis Brewster went over to England at this juncture to give an account of all these matters to Shrewsbury, who was however in retirement. At their interview, after complaining of the Bishops, Judges, and others, he surprised Shrewsbury by asserting that "many of consideration are become disaffected, even to his Majesty's Government, and that there is such a thing as a Protestant party of Jacobites in Ireland, in which there are too many employed by the King." He concluded with giving his opinion, "that nothing but a very considerable change of hands could set Irish affairs in a good posture." Galway, on hearing this, wrote that Brewster "s'est eschaufé la teste," and that the number of disaffected persons was really small.

As one improvement, Shrewsbury thought that "the Commission of the Revenue should be mended," and that Brewster would make an excellent Commissioner, but only if joined with others of good judgment and "less fancy"; and he mentions as a possible coadjutor Mr. Hill, who "could make himself fit for anything."

In his letter of 13th November Galway writes that the conduct of the House of Commons had become quite satisfactory, and that the fault of all the previous difficulties lay at the door of the Council, which was composed of too great a number of persons, little versed in public affairs. The Clerk of the Council was suspected of being unfaithful and of evil practices, and had been charged with a serious fault in the preparation of a Bill (p. 573). On the 18th Galway states that the King's resolve to send "the French regiments" of refugees to Ireland had created some jealousy against him, it being probably assumed that they would be placed under his command.

On the 27th, Galway reverts to the proceedings of the House of Lords. "The party of King James" had contrived to throw out the Bill of Association for the preservation of King William's person and Government. Lord Ross, a Jacobite, who had hitherto refused to take the oaths, now did so, for the purpose of voting; and Drogheda had presented a proxy from the Duke of Ormond against the Bill. Methuen gives an account of the influences brought to bear in the Lords and in the Commons on this occasion.

Galway states that a Bill for the manufacture of linen had been proposed in the Commons, and drawn up by the Irish Council, but on being sent over it had been found unsatisfactory by the English Council. He hoped to produce a better Bill in the next Session, on receiving the report of a skilled Frenchman whom he was sending to explore the country. He feared, however, that the English Parliament would "proceed with heat against the commerce of this realm, supposing that the only object was to increase the trade in wool."

The Irish Parliament was prorogued on 3rd December, and Methuen was sent to England to report in detail.

Although Villiers, now Lord Jersey, had been absent all this time, in March, 1698, he laid claim to "his third part of the salary" of the Lords Justices, to which the other Justices demurred; and Galway points out that he had formerly been in the same case, under the commission to Lords Monrath and Drogheda and himself, without receiving any advantage.

On 10th October, 1698, Winchester and Galway write joint letters to Shrewsbury and Somers touching two Bills they were preparing, one for the establishment of the linen manufacture, the other for a duty on woollens. The former was not so obviously a money-bill, but the latter was unquestionably one, and the Irish House of Commons could not tolerate that such a Bill should originate with the Council, though "the Sole Right" was not actually mentioned. They proposed to evade the difficulty by entering the impost among the "heads" of the Bill for the Supply; and the Lords Justices recommended that this expedient should be accepted, as their own Bill would certainly not be passed. To this the English Lords Justices consented. It appears however from Galway's letter of 2nd February, 1699, on the prorogation of Parliament, that the Bill for the duty on woollens was passed, and that thereby the Government had "absolutely surmounted the pretensions of the Sole Right"; while the Bill for the linen manufacture, which had been expected to meet with little opposition, did not pass.

Methuen gives an epitome of the proceedings of this Session in a letter dated 3rd February, 1698, which must be meant for 1698-9, notwithstanding the endorsement (p. 599). He remarks that by the passing of the Bill before mentioned "the Sole Right is much more removed from all controversy than by my Lord Capel's expedient." No open "breach" had occurred during the Session, but "people here are in such a temper that there is much more to be feared than hoped; the Commons are possessed with a desire for imitating an English Parliament; . . . and although the several parties differ amongst themselves, yet they agree in desiring to be independent of England." The Scots in the North especially opposed everything the King desired.

In March, 1699, Winchester succeeded his father as Duke of Bolton, and as he was thus compelled to return to England, he proposed that Marsh, Archbishop of Dublin, should take his place as Lord Justice; but Galway recommended Methuen. In November Galway sent his own resignation to the King, and explained the reason to Shrewsbury. Mr. Prior had been appointed Secretary by Lord Jersey, while Mr. May had been appointed by Bolton and Galway; but apparently Prior claimed to be Secretary to all three Justices, and obtained an order from the King for the removal of May. This Galway regarded as an insufferable "affront."

In 1700 the office of Lord Lieutenant was offered to Shrewsbury, but refused by him, as before stated. Bolton had been making "pretensions" to it, but dropped them on being erroneously informed that Shrewsbury had accepted; and there is a letter bitterly complaining of the "usage" he had received from the King and from Shrewsbury on this occasion, and announcing his retirement into the country.

Thus ended Shrewsbury's correspondence with the Irish Government. There is nothing here about his own Lord Lieutenantship in the reign of Queen Anne.

These volumes further comprise many valuable documents relating to the East and West Indies, the North American Colonies, and Canada.

In 1694 there was much discussion between the Privy Council and the East India Company touching the "new regulations" to be made under their recent charter. One object of the Council was to discover "whether they export goods of the product of England to the value of what they were obliged in former regulations" (p. 143). In 1695 there was a "terrible clamour raised upon two rich East India ships being taken" by the French Admiral Nesmond. In 1696 three French ships were for a long time "cruising off Galway, in expectation of the East India-men." The answer of the Dutch East India Company to certain English claims will be found at the end of November, 1698.

There are also papers relating to the Turkey or Levant Company, and to convoys sent with the merchant-ships passing through the Mediterranean Sea.

Two regiments were sent from Plymouth to Jamaica in 1694, and another regiment was desirous of going. Care was taken to prevent disagreements between the Governor and the commanders, such as had happened in previous "expeditions." A French fleet was preparing for America and the West Indies about the same time. The French landed in Jamaica, and did much damage, carrying off 1,300 negroes, but their loss of men was great, and many men in their ships were "dying of sickness." In 1696 French cruisers were lying in wait in the Irish Channel for the West India ships belonging to Liverpool, Whitehaven, and other ports.

From New York in 1696 Colonel Robert Livingston sent accounts to Shrewsbury and Romney of the arrival of Captain Kidd, who had been commissioned to suppress the numerous pirates in the Red Sea, but found it "too late to pass the Capes"; and having captured a French prize, he took it to New York to have it condemned (in the Admiralty Court there). These letters contain other curious particulars as to privateers and pirates, and the King's share of the prize moneys is referred to. Livingston complains that the commission given him by the King had been "suspended" by the Governor and Council of New York, a thing "without precedent in the Plantations"; and he requests Romney "to appear at the Council Board in the maintaining his Majesty's prerogative."

The undated papers in Volume XXIV. have been kept together in the order in which they are bound (pp. 721-745). Most of them relate to the Colonies, and were probably consulted by "the Committee of Plantations" (p. 127), for the purpose of drawing up the draft patent appointing Commissioners of the Plantations in America, in 1695 (p. 285). The commission was issued to John Locke and others on 16th December, 1695, and is to be found on the Patent Rolls, where also there is a similar Commission to the Lord Keeper and others dated 15th May, 1696 (p. 336).

In two lengthy papers J. Nelson relates his experience in North America during twenty-six years, especially in Nova Scotia and Canada. While in the employment of the Governor and Council of New England, he had been captured by the French, and sent to France, where he had some discussion with the French ministers about a treaty of neutrality "for those parts." He gives reasons for apprehending that the French, aided by the Indians, might invade New England, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Virginia, and other Colonies; and he contrasts the policies of the English and the French in dealing with the natives, and in their treatment of the settlers. Some Indians had been sent over to the Court of France, and thence to Flanders, to witness the splendour of the French armies. Nelson proposed that "the chiefs of the divers nations" should in like manner be sent to England, and given "a sight of the City of London"; and that "our hunters about Albany" should be encouraged to accompany and assist "our Indians" in their expeditions against the French Indians. He mentions that Major Schuyler in 1691 very nearly made himself master of Montreal; and states it as his opinion that if all the small Governments of the English Colonies were united under one Governor, it would be easy to make "an entire conquest" of Canada.

In the second paper Nelson gives particulars of the French settlements in Canada, and explains his proposals for its invasion, and the advantages to be derived from its possession.

Then follows a paper on New England by Richard Daniel, describing the oligarchic form of government of the original Puritan "Company," which had been abolished, and how the King's "late Charter" had been adopted. He expresses surprise that the Planters did not defend themselves better against the incursions of the French and Indians, and agrees with the reason for this inactivity given by the Mohawks, "who say it is because the English are divided into so many petty governments." As one result of the remedies proposed in his paper, he anticipated that the French might easily be driven back "at least to Quebec."

Another paper, the author of which is not named, comprises some general observations on the importance of the trade between England and the Plantations, and recommends the appointment of Lords Commissioners, with certain powers. He prophesied that many wares then purchased from foreigners might in future be obtained from the Colonies, while the latter would be prevented "from falling into those manufactures" with which they were supplied from England.

Two short papers relate to a scheme for a Council of Trade and Navigation. Another contains proposals for the establishment of a Company of Proprietors of New Albion, a country to the west of Canada, a description of it being given. It proposes that the Governments of New York and New England should be united. This would induce many persons to "raise a fund and begin this noble undertaking, which, once established, would deprive the French, without fighting, of that trade which nourishes Canada."

Lastly, there is what is termed "a brief account of the present declining state of the West Indies," especially of Barbadoes. Their "calamities" were threatening the extinction of the large export trade from England, and of the import trade in sugar, cotton, and other produce of those islands, with which England "abundantly supplied" Holland, Hamburgh, and Germany. Many heavily laden fleets and single ships had been destroyed, partly in the war, and partly by being compelled to make the voyage in "the fatal time of winter." Their mariners had even been impressed by men-of-war. Several remedies were proposed for making the West India trade "more secure and easy."

These remarks merely give an outline of the varied contents of the Shrewsbury Papers. Many biographical and topographical particulars have necessarily been omitted. The letter-book kept by Shrewsbury during his embassy to France, in 1713, was discovered too late to be included in this Report.

V.—THE SHREWSBURY PAPERS.

THIS collection, now preserved at Montagu House, comprises the correspondence and papers of Charles Talbot, twelfth Earl and first Duke of Shrewsbury, in the reigns of Charles II., James II., William and Mary, and Queen Anne, bound in twenty-five volumes, mostly quarto. He held the high offices of Secretary of State, 1689-1690, and 1693-1699, Lord Chamberlain of the Household, 1699-1700, and 1714-1715, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1713-1714, and Lord High Treasurer, 1714; but there are no letters here later than 1708.

A few of the Shrewsbury Papers were printed by Dr. Thomas Somerville in the Appendix to his "History of Great Britain during the reign of Queen Anne," in 1798; and he states that he was indebted to the Duchess of Buccleuch for the use of many of these volumes. He also made a manuscript Catalogue of ten of the volumes, now kept with them, the dedication therein to the Duchess being dated at Jedburgh, 30 Nov., 1800.

A large selection from the correspondence, consisting of letters from and to King William III., the Earl of Portland, Admiral Edward Russell, afterwards Earl of Orford, Viscount Villiers, afterwards Earl of Jersey, Lords Somers, Sunderland, and Wharton, the Duke of Marlborough, and others, was published by Archdeacon William Coxe in 1821, in a quarto volume, entitled, "Private and Original Correspondence of Charles Talbot, Duke of Shrewsbury, with King William, the Leaders of the Whig Party, and other Distinguished Statesmen." Coxe's work was dedicated to Elizabeth, Duchess of Buccleuch, by whom these volumes, or some of them, were lent to him. He shows how they came into the Duchess's possession in the following passage on the Duke of Shrewsbury:—

Three thick volumes of these letters consist entirely of letters from James Vernon, Esquire, first Under-Secretary and afterwards Principal Secretary of State, addressed to the Duke of Shrewsbury, from 1696 to 1708. It was the Duke's usual practice to keep drafts or copies of his letters, but no drafts or copies of his letters to Vernon are preserved in this collection; possibly they are to be looked for elsewhere. Many of Vernon's letters to the Duke were published by the late Mr. G. P. R. James in 1841, in three octavo volumes. Many others are omitted by him, and large portions even of the letters which he printed are also omitted, mostly without any indication of the fact; and his text abounds with faulty readings. He appears to have edited from extracts furnished to him by his publisher, Mr. Henry Colburn, without having any opportunity of collating them with the originals.

A description of the contents of all the twenty-five volumes here follows.

VOL. I.

Letters from the Earl of Shrewsbury to Sir John Talbot.

These letters mostly relate to the writer's private affairs, and to his matrimonial negotiations, between 1673 and 1678, with two letters of 1705 at the end, and others being undated. A letter of Mr. John Talbot, grandson of Sir John, in 1768, shows that this correspondence was delivered up by him to the then Earl of Shrewsbury. The letters and papers in this volume are numbered from 1 to 84, and copies or extracts from the more interesting will be given. Some of the letters are addressed, “For Sir John Talbott, at his house about the middle of Lounge Aker” (Long Acre). No. 9 is a copy of a letter from the Countess Dowager of Shrewsbury, Anna Maria Brudenell, to her son, in the latter's hand, without date. No. 11 is a copy of a letter to Lord Halifax, also without date. No. 17 is from James Morgan, at Paris, to the Earl's guardians; and there are others by the same writer.

VOLS. II., III., AND IV.

These three volumes contain the letters from Secretary Vernon, between the years 1696 and 1708. Many of them have been printed in G. P. R. James's three volumes, as before stated. A few of them have been printed by Coxe, and two by Somerville. None of them are included in the present volume. The dates and contents of each volume are as follow :

Vol. II. Sept. 1696—Feb. 1698. Nos. 1-198.

Vol. III. March 1698—Oct. 1699. Nos. 1-248.

Vol. IV. Nov. 1699—to Nov. 1708. (None in 1705 or 1706.) Nos. 1-201.

Vol. V.

Letters from King William III. to Shrewsbury, two in 1689, many between 1694 and 1697, and one in 1700. They are all in French, and are translated and printed by Coxe, as will appear in the Table to be found further on. At the beginning of the volume there is a letter from King James II. to the Earl of Middleton, dated 22 Dec. 1688; and also a letter of the Prince of Orange, dated 2 Nov. 1688.—“49 letters.”

Vol. VI.

Drafts of letters from Shrewsbury to King William III., a few in 1689, many between 1694 and 1697, and one in 1698; all printed by Coxe, except two, dated 11 Sept. 1694, and 15 Aug. 1696.—“69 letters.”

Vol. VII.

1. Letters from William Bentinck, Earl of Portland, to Shrewsbury, 1694-1699, in French.

2. Letters from Shrewsbury to Portland, 1689-1697.

3. Letters from Henry de Massue, Earl of Galway, to Shrewsbury, in French, and a few from the latter to the former, 1695-6.

Portions of these three series are printed by Coxe, the French ones being translated.—Nos. 1-188.

4. Letters from Mrs. Villiers and Mrs. Lundee to Shrewsbury, with drafts of his replies, and a draft of a letter from him to Mr. [Thomas] Wharton, in Nov. and Dec., 1693. Most of these are printed by Coxe, who gives some of the dates inaccurately.—Nos. 1-16.

Vol. VIII.

1. Letters from Edward Villiers, Lord Villiers, afterwards Earl of Jersey, to Shrewsbury, with drafts and copies of letters from Shrewsbury to Villiers; 1696-1699. Many of these are printed by Coxe.—Nos. 1-83.

2. Letters from Mr. George Stepney, Ambassador to Germany, 1703-1705.—Nos. 84-118.

VOL. IX.

Letters from Lords Halifax (Savile and Montagu), Sunderland, Somers, Wharton, and Godolphin to Shrewsbury, with drafts and copies of his letters to most of them; 1695-1706. Many of these are printed by Coxe.—Nos. 1-141.

VOL. X.

Letters from and to Sir William Trumbull, Secretary of State, Lords Rochester and Manchester, Abraham Stanyan, Sir Joseph Williamson, and Sir John Stanley, 1695-1700. Some of the letters from and to Williamson are printed by Coxe.—Nos. 1-116.

VOL. XI.

1. Letter from the Earl of Clarendon to the Princess of Orange, 21 May, 1688.

2. Proposed Declaration by the Prince of Orange.

3. Letters of Irish and Scotch noblemen, and some letters of William III., 1689.

4. Two commissions by James II. to Scotch noblemen, dated at Dublin Castle, 29 March, 1689.

5. Copies of letters from Shrewsbury to the Lord Privy Seal, Lord Paget, and Sir James Ogelvie, 1696.

6. Letters from Henry Guy, Lord Romney, Col. Robert Livingston, the Marquis of Normanby, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, Thomas Brodrick, Gus. Hamilton, Major Gen. William Steuart, Lord Meath, and Brigadier William Wolseley, with sundry papers, copies of letters to Thomas Brodrick, &c., 1696-1697.

7. Letters from and to the Lords of the Admiralty, 1694-1695.

8. Letters from and to Bishop Burnet, 1697, 1708, and undated.

9. Letters from the Duke of Buckingham, 1707.

10. Letter from Robert Harley, 27 July, 1708.

11. Letters from and to Benjamin Furly, 1706.

12. Letters from M. de Fontenay to Lords Bath, Lansdowne, and Shrewsbury, 1689.

13. Two letters from Shrewsbury to Portland, 22 Dec., 1694, and 1 Jan., 1694-5, draft and copy. A letter of the Elector Palatine, 1705.

14. Letters of Mr. Matthew Prior, from the Hague, 1695.

15. Letters from Lord Tweeddale and Secretary Johnston from Edinburgh, 1695; with drafts of some letters to the latter.

16. Letters from and to William Penn, 1695.

17. Articles against Sir Charles Porter, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 1695.

Nos. 1-107.

Vol. XII.

Letters from Secretary Blathwayt to the Duke of Shrewsbury ; with drafts and copies of letters from Shrewsbury to Secretary Blathwayt ; 1694.—Nos. 1-116.

Vol. XIII.

Copies of letters from Shrewsbury to Secretary Blathwayt, May to September, 1696.—Nos. 1-37.

Letters from Secretary Blathwayt to Shrewsbury, with copies of letters from Shrewsbury to the Secretary, April to August, 1697. There are also some copies of papers of earlier dates, and one letter from Blathwayt of 22 Nov., o.s., 1698.

Vol. XIV.

Letters from Mr. Hill to the Duke of Shrewsbury from [May 28-] June 7, 1696, to [June 26-] July 6, 1698, dated at Brussels, Gand, Antwerp, Bruges, Loo, the Hague, &c., all in his own handwriting ; intermixed with copies of letters from Shrewsbury to Mr. Hill, between the same dates.—“ 112 letters.”

Vol. XV.

Letters from Admiral Edward Russell, afterwards Earl of Orford, to the Earl and Duke of Shrewsbury, with drafts of letters from the latter to the former, from 1 December, 1693, to 5 August 1700 ; all holograph.—“ 150 letters.”

Some of these are printed by Coxe ; see Table.

Vol. XVI.

“ Lord Berkeley and Sir George Rooke’s Letters to the Duke of Shrewsbury, 1695-1697.”

There are also many letters from Shrewsbury to Berkeley and Rooke—drafts and copies—and many enclosed letters and papers, especially in Rooke’s letters.—“ 155 letters.”

Vol. XVII.

1. The letters from Lord Capel, Nos. 1-58, are dated at Dublin Castle between April, 1694, and March, 1696, with one letter dated at Chapell Izod in May, 1696. Only one or two replies from Shrewsbury are among them.

2. Nos. 59-70 are letters from Mr. John Methuen, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, dated at Dublin between June, 1697, and Feb., 1699, with some replies by Shrewsbury, and with two letters of Methuen's dated at London, in 1700.

3. Nos. 71-118 are letters between Lord Galway and Shrewsbury, between May, 1697, and May, 1700, Galway's being all in French, and mostly dated at Dublin Castle.

VOL. XVIII.

These are notes by Shrewsbury of proceedings in the Council, from 6 March, 1693, to 11 April, 1697; very roughly written.—“66 papers.”

VOL. XIX.

“Miscellaneous State Papers, 1694-1696.”

This volume contains letters from various persons to Shrewsbury, and many papers in the Duke's own hand, with other papers, dated between 1691 and 1697, but not arranged in order of dates.—“95 letters and papers.”

VOL. XX.

“Miscellaneous Papers on Irish Affairs, &c., 1694-1700.”

These are drafts and copies of letters from Shrewsbury to Lord Capel, letters to and from Charles Porter, Lord Chancellor, and Lord Justice, letters to Lord Galway, letters to and from Lord Chancellor Methuen, letters to the Lords Justices, letters to and from the Marquis of Winchester, and various papers, between the dates above mentioned.—“94 letters.”

VOL. XXI.

Journal of the Duke of Shrewsbury, in his own handwriting, and kept by him during his travels abroad, in 1700 and following years.

[VOL. XXII.]

“Miscellaneous State Papers, Letters, &c. 1696, 1697. Vol. II.”*

It contains:

1. Papers relating to Sir John Fenwick, 1696.
2. Letters from G. Bridges to Shrewsbury, 1696-1697.
3. Letters from Ulysses Browne to Shrewsbury and others, with informations, and with some letters from Col. G. Talbot, 1697-1699.
4. Petition, letter, and papers of Sir Samuel Morland, 1689.
5. A letter from the Vizier of the Ottoman Empire [Feb. 1697-8].
6. Papers relating to the Treaty with France, the inhabitants of Cevennes, James II.'s protestation against it, memorials by him, &c., 1697.

7. Drafts of the commission and instructions to the Lords Justices during the King's absences, undated; and a letter to the King against his Councillors, 25 Dec. 1689.

61 letters and papers.

[Vol. XXIII.]

“Miscellaneous State Papers, Letters, &c. 1689-1705. Vol. III.”

Twelve papers.

[Vol. XXIV.]

A folio volume labelled—“Sir Lambert Blackwell's Letters on the Leghorn Trade, &c., &c. 1696-1704.”

“This volume contains 72 letters and papers,” many being of 4<sup>to</sup> size. Besides Blackwell's letters, there are others from and to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Cavalier Coriolano Montemagni, Sir Cloudesley Shovell, and others; and papers, mostly undated, relating to the Coinage, the reduction of Canada, the English Colonies in America, the West Indies and Barbadoes, the Council of Trade, the linen manufacture and coinage in Ireland, the Eastland merchants, toll on the Elbe, the merchants and factory at Leghorn, &c.

[Vol. XXV.]

A folio volume labelled “Admiralty Office Papers, 1695, 1696.”

It contains many lists of “his Majesty's Ships now in Sea Pay,” or “in Port.” At the beginning there is “a copy of Mr. Russell's Account,” 1691-5.—“38 papers.”

Many of these volumes have two book-plates, one bearing the words “Deene Library.”

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1674, April 26.—“ I have only given order to my tailor to send me down a handsome riding suit; as for the rest of my clothes I will advise with you when I come to town, which will be the 6th or 7th of May, as my uncle Tutchett tells me; but he did not speak to me till I spoke to him, which was the day before he went into Wilts, and he told me my grandfather; and he had agreed upon that time, but you shall certainly know what day I do come up. I have bespoke a periwig of my own periwig-maker, who lives within ten doors of you, of the same side of the street; his name is Mr. Peter, a Frenchman. Pray send for him to you, and let him know that I am grown above a handful since he saw me, and give him what other directions you please, for if he does not make me a very good one I will not have it. I am very sorry my mother§ has changed her resolution.”

JAMES MORGAN TO THE EARL OF CARDIGAN AND THE REST OF Lord Shrewsbury's Guardians.

1674, June 20, Paris.—“ In compliance to those orders I received from your Lordship and the rest of my Lord of Shrewsbury's Guardians, I have addressed these, first, to acquaint you with his safe arrival at Paris; and next, to beg a speedy supply in order to his settlement here. His journey has proved favourable, and his undergoing the difficulties of it, beyond expectation. Your Lordship knows we embarked on Thursday in the afternoon; on * Answered, May 27, n.s.

† Robert Brudenell, second Earl of Cardigan.

§ Anna Maria, daughter of the same Earl.

† Answered 5 July.

Friday night we anchored before Margett, and ere day was spent on Saturday we rid within sight of Dieppe; but being forced to expect the turn of the tide, to enter into the harbour (the wind blowing too high to venture his Lordship in a shalloupe), it was four a clock on Sunday morning ere we came on shore. The remainder of that day was spent at Dieppe, rather to provide us with a convenience of going to Rouen, than that his Lordship required it to recruit himself after his journey at sea; where his Lordship was so well in health, that one may believe he was rather designed to become an admiral at sea, than to be esteemed a passenger, the first time he ever was on ship-board.

“Having hired horses on Monday, we came to Rouen, where his Lordship spent two days in visiting what that town could afford worth his curiosity; so that on Thursday morning we set out with the messenger for Paris, and on Friday night came to those lodgings in the fauxbourgs of St. Germain’s, where his Lordship has remained ever since. I have waited upon him to Navarre College, but do not find his Lordship inclined to shut himself up in the walls of it; wherefore I have found him out a lodging, whose door almost joins to that of the College, and his window looks into the great court; here he intends to fix. The pension will be but little dearer than that of the College, but the expense of the furniture the same. We shall scarcely compass all things under less than a hundred pounds; wherefore your Lordship sees the necessity of a speedy supply, knowing very well his Lordship had only a 100 pounds returned hither; and the 50 pounds, which was, almost, as well spent, as designed for his journey.

“Had his Lordship, according to your first design, brought a letter of credit along with him, we should not then have been at that inconvenience for money which we are now at present; for, besides that his Lordship lies at a far greater charge, whilst we are in the fauxbourgs St. Germain’s, than his allowance (as much as I understand you design it) will bear, he also suffers the loss of his time, which cannot possibly be well employed for his advantage and improvement till he be settled, and in a condition to attend and follow what he undertakes. His Lordship has been visited by most of the English in town, and has been to wait upon Sir William Locker [Lockhart], his Majesty’s Ambassador here, who sets out this day for England, though with the design of a speedy return.”

J. MORGAN TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1674, Oct. 17, Paris.—“I do not doubt but that my last caused you much trouble, by the ill news I sent you of my dear Lord’s being fallen sick, and I am sure, that of the small pox would add much thereunto, did not I at the same time assure you, it is like to be so favourable, and he finds himself so well, that (considering it is a disease that most men have sooner or later, and the older they are the more dangerously) Mr. Arden and I . . . are so far from being alarmed, that we even rejoice at what is happened, and would not have him well upon any other terms than those of having cancelled a debt most men are solvable for, contracted in their mother's womb. For all things are so favourable, both of the weather, the declining of the moon, his age, the course of them this year which is observed not to be mortal, and their coming out so kindly, and his being so merry and well (for he says he is as well as ever he was in his life), that, I say, all things considered, I would not, were it laid in my choice, have it otherways than it has happened out. . . . I have procured him an able doctor, who has generally the approbation of all people, and a careful and experienced nurse-keeper." . . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1675, June [12-]22, Paris.— . . . "I had given you an account of our journey to Pontoise before this, but by reason of my distemper, since I came from thence, which (thanks be to God) is now quite over. My mother, my grandfather, and myself were there all the month of May, and my mother's way of living, whilst she was there, gave very good content to my friends. In that time she went to wait upon the Lady Abbess of Mobison (which is near Pontoise), who is Prince Rupert's sister, and was admitted into the monastery, where she did see that virtuous lady's austere way of living, which did work very much upon her.

"At our return to Paris, she stayed with me in my lodgings one week, and in that time my Lord Abbot Montague took her Ladyship and myself to Versailles, to show us the house and waterworks there, which, by his interest, he got to play for us. We were also treated there, by the Captain of the house, very handsomely: but neither King nor Queen, nor any of the Court, were there, for if they had [been], she had not gone. She hath ever since been in her monastery, and I do not, as yet, hear anything of her leaving it, or her return for England. . . . My grandfather says, she is now endeavouring to part with her Irish land." . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1675, Oct. [16-]26, Paris.— . . . "You complain, 'why might not I know of your journey out of Paris?' I do assure you, when I came out of Paris, I designed waiting upon my mother no further than Pontoise, whither I was invited at the same time by the English Nuns, to see a clothing, where there was [were] above forty English. I did not know of my going to Roan half an hour before I went." . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN [TALBOT].

1676, Jan. [12-]22, Paris.— . . . "I was obliged to attend for some days our Ambassador at his entrance and audience at St. German's. My Lord Abbot Montagu brought me the copy of a letter penned by himself for me to write to my Lord

Arlington, which in substance was that I desired his Lordship's favour in being assisting to my mother to procure her the honour of kissing the Queen's<sup>e</sup> hands; that I was highly satisfied with her retirement whilst she was heré; and that I did not question but all the relations of my father's family would be concurring in the suit I made to him, and that by granting it he would highly oblige both them and me.

"To this forwardness of his I made some demur, as you may easily imagine, whereupon he told me my grandfather had writ to me in order thereunto; which letter I have since received, and Mr. Morgan another from my mother, and Abbot Montagu also one from her, all much to this purpose, that nothing was now wanting to her admittance at Court and the Queen's favour, but a request to that effect to be made by the family of Talbotts, and that chiefly by me (as Ralph Montagu has particularly writ to his uncle, my Lord Abbot Montagu); and that I would write to my two uncles, Gil. and Tho. Talbott to be concurring in the business, and that the Queen had given her word to those of our family not to admit of her without their consent; that she was the only lady of her quality that was restrained from paying her duty to her Majesty; that she had no intention to become a courtier, and that her design of going to Court was only to wash out the particular blot that lay upon her; that it was her intention and would be more to her honour to have the power of going to Court, and yet use it but seldom.

"Upon these letters, Abbot Montagu, good man, believing there was no other difficulty in the business than in penning the letter I was to write to my Lord Arlington, took that pains upon himself, and brought it me to copy over, and told me it was very convenient it should be so, and that I must write it against next post, and he would come and call for it. But when he came I made him observe by my grandfather and mother's letter it was a promise made by the Queen to our family, and not to me alone. . . .

"Pray be as speedy as you can in your return, and advise with those friends you think properest for this business, which I conceive are those that gave their opinions what was to be done when the dispute was, of my seeing my mother before I came over. I have writ to my two uncles." . . . †

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1676, Feb. [16-]26.—"I have received yours of the 7th [o.s.] and give you thanks for the contents thereof. As to the first of your two postscripts, it seems to differ much from the contents of a letter I received from my mother dated the 3rd [o.s.], where she writes thus—'Sir John and Sir Gilbert got my Lord Arlin[gton] to speak to the Queen, not to agree to my coming to Court till the family of the Talbotts agreed to it; and as you say the difficulty is best to be removed by those that were the cause, so I have chose that way, by my Lord Arlington, Sir John's friend.'

*Catherine, Queen Consort of Charles II.

† There are several other letters on this subject.

"This was a novelty to me, neither having heard so much before, either from her Ladyship or yourself. Abbot Montagu brought me the letter, and his was as urging as mine, to the speedy dispatch of one to my Lord Arlin[hton], which I put off for a time, first, upon the contents of your postscript (which I showed him), quite of a different style from my mother's; and next, that I had writ to my grandfather, who said you were concurring with my Lord Arlington, to desire you and him to send me the draught of a letter which would be properest for me to write; and this letter I expected within a post, or two, at farthest. Thereupon he remained satisfied, till I had heard again from England.

"As to the second, which is my coming over this spring, . . . it will be great interruption and loss of time in my exercises, besides a great charge." . . . (Refers to negotiations for his marriage with Lord Northampton's daughter.)

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN [TALBOT].

1676, March [4-] 14, Paris.—"I have received yours on the 24th of February [o.s.], and in it your resolution for my coming over, though in a much different style from what I expected by your former; for in that you asked me whether, when, and for how long I desired it? whereas now you fix a necessity upon the thing; limit a time that circumstances make impossible to comply with, nay, your own orders contradict; and lastly tell me of a month's stay, as if you designed me nothing but the drudgery of a troublesome journey to and fro.

"As to the first, though it is necessary I should have a view of the young lady, yet I cannot see the necessity of this particular time, or at least how you should not necessarily have foreseen it, and so be able to have given me timely notice, that I might not have been forced upon the disorder I am now in to prepare myself, upon such a troublesome journey as I must expect from a Lenten accommodation, and such a distraction as I must necessarily receive in the Holy Week, a time far differently employed by other countries, and other beliefs, than that you live in. It is an easy thing to give orders; those that comply only find the inconveniences that attend them. If you had reflected on that maxim, may be you would have concluded after Easter had been as proper a time to travel as Lent; a competency to have prepared in, much easier than precipitation; a yacht more commodious than a nasty packet boat. But by a good fire-side, in a handsome room, and good company, none of these unpleasant circumstances have admittance; and so it was resolved I was to come over in ten or twelve days' time, though the impossibility of my compliance is sufficiently grounded upon the contradiction of your own orders; for you would have me bring over two suits of clothes, two suits of linen, periwigs, belts, hats, gloves, shoes, boots, &c. (for all must be new, nay, even my lacquays' liveries too, having delayed from time to time both the clothing them and myself in expectation of this journey); and to prepare all this tackling you allow me bare two or three days' time, whereas under ten or twelve Chedreux will not undertake to make a periwig, and it is a great favour if he keeps his word.

"When I reflect on the troubles and inconveniences of my journey out of England, and those that I am like to meet with in my return back again, I conclude I was not born under the favourable influence of that wandering planet which bewitches so many travellers with the unquiet passion of visiting worse countries than their own; though (may be) hereafter, when the reins are in my own hand, I may chance to change my opinion, for it will be then in my own power to avoid those rubs which hitherto I have uneasily jolted over. But in the mean time I hope this will be the last which will be thought fit for me to undergo. What relates to my stay in England I shall better discuss when I am with you than at this distance; only, in a few words, a month's time is very short to enjoy my mother [and] my sister, and wait upon the rest of my friends, especially since this journey will not prove so much an interruption of my studies as a conclusion of them; and the weather and season, at my return, like to be too hot to begin any exercises in the Academy.

"But, in conclusion, as for my coming over, you see a moral impossibility at the time you have prefixed, and therefore you must not expect me by the 15th or 16th of March. All I can promise you is, that I will make the greatest haste I can. But lest more haste, worse speed, should prove to be the true as well as the old proverb, I must acquaint you I shall not come by Calais, for I hear of great robbing, and parties of the Spanish garrisons from St. Omer's, Aires, Cambray, &c., which makes that road very unsafe, and I am sure none of you would be willing I should run the danger of being stript of all I have, when I may avoid it by going to Deepe. Besides, I shall not be able to brook a Lenten accommodation by the messenger, nor the company I must associate myself with, if I go along with him, especially there being so many English now in town, who will be witness of the manner of my setting out; wherefore I am resolved to go by Deepe, and to be there about Thursday or Friday, the week before Holy Week (your account and ours this Lent falls the same); whither you must not fail to send me a yacht. I reckon this letter will be with you by Wednesday at farthest, and the orders may be got, and the yacht setting forwards to Deepe, by Saturday following. In four days' time it cannot fail to be there, nor shall the captain fail to have an account of me at the inn called the Bastile at Deepe.

"What letters you intend to write to me after the receipt of this, I shall take order to have sent after me with all imaginable haste, though (for certainty ['s] sake) you will do well, at the same time you write to Paris, to write to the same effect to Deepe, and direct it for me at the Bastile, for it is likely I shall be there as soon as your letter. If the yacht comes according to my calculation, I shall be in London about the middle of the Holy Week; but if either wind or anything else should stop the speed I aim at, you must find the best expedient you can to get my Lord of Nort[hampton] to delay his daughter's going out of town; for he, being concerned to the full as much as I am to be no longer upon uncertainties, without doubt will be ready to contrive things so that I may have a view of the young lady without the world's taking notice of it. And this (I am confident) had you but reflected of, you might as well have obtained for after Easter, and so have spared me the trouble of this Lenten precipitated journey.

"You speak of my equipage as if I had choice of servants to bring over or leave behind me; but unless I should bring over my cook-maid, my whole family is comprised in Mr. Morgan, Arden, and my footmen, and I never had the thoughts of anything else extraordinary, which both by my grandfather's and your letter you seem to intimate unto me. My m[other] expresses in her letter to me a great esteem both of your candour and capacity, and says she values you equally to what I ever have done and ever will do."

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1676, Oct. [18-]28, Paris.—"Mr. Morgan being safely arrived, though as yet not quite quit of his distemper, I am now beginning my exercise of the Academy, which cannot be performed without a coach to wait upon me, so that we are considering which will be the cheapest and honorablest way of doing it, and we find that hiring a coach by the month will be both cheaper and more serviceable, since we shall run no hazard of killing a horse (which is a very dear commodity here), or being forced to stay at home for the lameness or sickness of one of them; but the question is whether this coach (though it be new and has my crown and arms, if I please, and the coachman wears my livery) be so honourable as my own, which if it is not, I would rather undergo the charge than do a thing below myself. I have writ to the same effect to my grandfather, and desired him to communicate it with my mother and yourself, that so you may all advise me what will be my best way."

[1676, Dec. 30-] 1677, Jan. 9, Paris.—"I received yours together with the news of my mother's reception at Court, and am confident that what you have done is most for my advantage, so much I rely in your friendship and prudence, but cannot choose but wonder it was so secretly carried on that I should not hear of it till 'twas done. I must desire you will send me word what part you had in this business, which you leave to be related by others ; since when I received a letter from my mother, which mentions nothing of it, neither do I expect a relation of it from any but yourself. My obligations to you are so great that I am glad I have anything (though never so inconsiderable) that may be convenient for you, and therefore do desire you will please to accept the next presentation of Aston Giffard parsonage.

[P.S.] "I have not heard how the rents of Aston Giffard farm are paid, but do not doubt but you take care about it."

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1678, [Jan. 30-] Feb. 9, Paris.— . . . "I am very glad you have discoursed the Duke upon this business, and that he is of our judgment. I think you did very well in advising with him concerning how I should dispose of myself ; it was a civility due to the kindness he showed." . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1678, Feb. [6-]16, Paris.— . . . "I am very glad to find by your last, you approve the answer I made to the proposition [of a match]. . . . If my mother has had a hand in this, 'tis a riddle to me that she has not only [not] said a word of it, but of three months before she owned her marriage<sup>o</sup> to this day I have received but one letter, which was in three words, to tell me she was married, and that not till six weeks after she owned it in Town." . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1678, [Feb. 20-] March 2, Paris.—"If anything can rejoice one that ought to wear the willow garland for the loss of a mistress, the news yours of the 14th [o.s.] brought me has done it in a high degree, to find that his R. H. [the Duke of York] is positive in my waiting on his person, which I assure you I embrace with as much joy and content as can be. As for my meeting of him in Flanders, two or three months hence, I believe, when once war is declared, the road thither will be inconvenient enough, especially for English ; and I should desire you would explicate yourself as to the reasons his R. H. gives for my not coming to London, which I do at most but guess at, you having never mentioned them before. I suppose neither the Duke's going, nor the declaration of the war, are yet certain enough, to give orders for an equipage, but we must expect some further assurances of a war, and then 'twill be convenient I consult my grandfather in it ; and if he refuses his advice, I have at least done what was fit and decent for me to do in such an occasion. As yet I shall not mention anything to him of it, for the politicians on this side the sea are positive for a peace, upon the account the King of France does nothing all this while. When you know anything of a certainty I suppose I need not desire what timely notice you can give." . . .

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[16]78, [Feb. 27-] March 9, Paris.—“Since the writing of my last, I have received both yours of the 18th and 21st [o.s.]. In the first place, you advise my putting off my coach and horses, to be more prepared for a sudden remove, which I have some difficulty to resolve on, till we see some farther certainty of a war; for should a peace be concluded, it would be both infinitely inconvenient and chargeable to be without a coach of my own. As for the choice of a livery, which you leave to me, I am clearly for blue, and for the embroidery for the clothes, and lace for the coats. I shall desire you to choose what mixtures you like best, and I believe it is yet full time enough to bespeak those things, considering the incertainty of affairs. The reason why I most incline to blue is, first, because red is too near the King; and besides, it is in France, and I believe in all other countries, the common livery everybody gives, which made me, since my last coming to Paris, give blue. Pink is not so common, but it does not wear well, nor last long handsome. I believe I shall be able to put off my coach-horses at a pretty good price, but am afraid the coach will not bring much; and in case I can get little for it, what if I brought it over? It is not extreme fine, neither has it the lustre of a new coach, but it is yet neat enough for anybody to ride in. . . .

“I cannot think it will be proper for me to make a campaign, or do anything in that nature, without advising with my grandfather, which, when I do, it shall be in such a manner that he shall not have room to contradict my intentions; for nothing now can be an excuse for to hinder me from waiting upon his R. H., since his commands are positive for my going. We have here news of a great many officers nominated for the new Regiments, among which you are named; but I believe 'tis all but conjecture hitherto. I should be very glad to hear you were employed according to your own desire, for nobody wishes you better success than” (&c.).

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[16]78, March [6-] 16, Paris.—“I find both by yours of the 28th [o.s.] and by all other letters of the same post, that the attacking Gaunt has made the King of England take those resolutions that seem so like a war that I can see, methink[s], very little probability of its ending otherwise than in a rupture, though here they still talk of a general peace. I suppose the Duke's going in person is yet uncertain. Some here affirm absolutely that he will go; others again think it very improbable, and indeed we have so many flying reports made according to persons' inclinations that there is no heed to be taken in what they say. Two posts since we were assured that commissions were given out for fourteen regiments of foot, the Colonels named, and you were one of them, which since by your last I find not to be true. I think the rest is much to be suspected. You easily, I believe, imagine, I have a great longing to know my destiny, but time will discover all things to us I hope to the best, and we must be contented to wait the leisure of our masters." . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1678, March [16-] 26, Paris.— . . . "Now your commissions are given out, I perceive your campaign is almost unquestionable. Were I as sure of mine, I should not delay the providing an equipage; but in the uncertainty I stand in, I think it were not prudent to be at such an expense, and perhaps make a noise which, should I not go, would reflect upon me. I believe there are many others whose affairs depend upon the same man's remove or stay; so that I hope to be ready as soon as they, though it were infinitely more convenient to have some reasonable warning, if it were possible. As for my liveries, which you mention, I think red would be suffered without doubt in Flanders, but it will be an inconvenience not to be endured, to change always upon one's return. But perhaps you may be permitted to give it in England by reason of the colour of your regiment, but I have no such pretext, and I do not fancy pink, neither handsome nor lasting."

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[1678,] March [20-] 30.—"By yours of the 14th [o.s.], which I received this morning, I find my motions are so far settled by the Duke's express order you mention, that I have writ to my grandfather, the copy of which I have here enclosed, and another to my mother, much to the same effect. We have now so little time to lose that I should desire you would bespeak those things you shall think most necessary, and that will take up most time [in] the making, as the embroidery for the clothes for led horses, which I would have upon blue, lined with orange; the colours for the embroidery I leave to your fancy. I am so unexperienced in these kind of equipages that I do not know what else to bespeak, but leave the management of it to your prudence. I have writ to my uncle Westmorland, and Brudenell, as you advised. I think, when I have received an answer from my grandfather (suppose we have no alterations in the design of a war), I ought as soon as I can to prepare myself to come over, for though I hope you will put things in some readiness, yet 'twill be necessary I be in town some time before I go into Flanders. I suppose you will examine the old leases of the tenants, as well as the new, for Arden assures me there are some in Burghfield (as Brookes for one) that lie under the same obligation of providing money or men upon these occasions; for I must look not to run myself too much in debt, for I perceive by the last post you will allow us no employments, but the honour as volunteers to stop bullets, and so try both our active and passive valour. I have been mighty busy this morning, and 'tis now very late."

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1678, [March 23-] April 2, Paris.— . . . “I writ to my grandfather and mother by the last post, the very same moment I received the Duke’s orders, by your hands, not to lose one minute that was possible to be gained, and for the same reason am putting myself in readiness to remove at a short warning, for I am much of your opinion, that we have no time to lose, and when I am present things will sooner be got ready than at this distance, when answers must be waited for; and therefore, in my judgment, the sooner I am coming the better. And the tenants ought to be sent to for their money, but I believe my grandfather will neither be so well satisfied with me nor with my journey as to sign that order.” . . .

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[16]78, [March 27-] April 6.—“The greatest part of my grandfather’s actions are at this time so extraordinary that they do not now surprise me, though I must confess his asking the Duke’s advice and consenting to my coming over does make me a little wonder, since I believe my going to the army was the least of his thoughts. I have not yet received any orders from him, and apprehend that my letter to acquaint him of my intentions will alter his, since I believe he designed me an idle life in England, as secure from danger as honour; for I believe, since his R. H. goes, nobody in my condition will stay at home; and therefore I hope he will not be persuaded by none of my fond friends to hinder my waiting of him, for I am so fully resolved of it that I prepare all things ready to go. I hope to sell my coach and horses today, and the rest with all speed; so that with some small warning beforehand I shall be ready for a yacht when you will. I would rather you would send it to Deepe, the way by land being shorter and more convenient for what goods I have, which are not many, for I do not design to bring any clothes, but some books, which I am afraid will be most troublesome, though they are not at all belonging to controversy; but I am told French books in general are hard to pass, so that I believe we must endeavour to make friends with the Archbishop of Canterbury [Saneroff]. Everybody here is a-removing; my Lady Northumberland goes Saturday come sevensnight for Borbon waters; my Lady Cleveland with her family soon after for England. The Ambassador [Ralph Montagu] does not yet speak of going, but I suppose he depends upon orders.”

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1678, April [3-] 13.—“I am I believe in full as much haste as you were when you writ yours of the 28th, and therefore have not time to write a longer letter. I have by this post received my grandfather’s letter, which presses my coming over with great speed, so that I shall not have time to expect a yacht to be sent for me, but will be coming away as soon as ever I can. When I resolve which way to come, by Diepe or Callice, and can give you an exacter guess at the time you may expect me, you shall know it. In the mean time I must desire you, if you have not as yet bespoke the clothes for the led horses, you will do it, and what else you foresee will be the longest a-providing, that we may be in as little a bustle as we can, for let us do the best we are able, we shall have but too much of it."

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[1678,] June [6-]17, Chareleville.—“If I had taken you to be so ignorant as some I have writ to, I would have ventured, whilst I was before Luxemburg, to have given you an account of what passed there; but being sure of my own ignorance and your knowledge, I durst not venture upon a thing [which] would have become me so ill; and for the general matters of fact, which was all I ventured upon, you have heard and I have writ them so often that it would now be tedious.

“I am now upon my march to Marshal Schomberg’s army, where we shall either find the news of a peace or of some considerable siege. Were I not afraid of appearing too much a soldier in your peaceable country, I would declare my inclination, being much more charmed with this sort of curiosity than I expected, and the little I have seen serves only to make me more inquisitive, though not much more knowing. I desire you will keep this a secret from your Lady, to whom I desire my service, for she will else forbid me your company, who have been already too well inclined to these frolics.”

The EARL OF SHREWSBURY to SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[ ] Dec. 14.—“I have received my Lord Halifax’s and your joint opinions as to coming to town, and do extremely agree with both of you in it. I have sent my Lord my thanks in a letter this post, and assured him I will come up as soon as I have used necessary precaution to avoid being stopped by the way; but give me leave to discourse the thing more at large with you concerning the manner of coming up. You propose by Worcester coach, that goes up of the Monday, but then I must be obliged to travel thither of the Sunday, which is not to be done; or else be there a Saturday, and lie all Sunday in Worcester, where I apprehend my name will make a great noise. Therefore I will propose all the ways that I can think of and desire your opinion which is the safest, whether by a coach that often passes by here in its way to London, but the inconvenience of that is that it goes no more till towards Twelfthtide, or else by my own horses either publicly or privately, or else post. These are all the conveniences that I can think of, and I fear none of them free from the importunity of the watch, who are so strict, that at Kuittermuster they have stoppèd an ancient Papist gentleman for travelling, though he has a justice of the peace his band that he has been sick at his son's house, and unable to travel till now that he is going home to his own house and estate. This and such stories have persuaded me from coming away till I have advised with you, what way one may be secure from these inconveniences, or whether there is any pass to be had, to secure one from them, or whether I have any privilege to plead, or what I am to say if questioned. Pray let me have your speedy answer."

THE EARL OF SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

[ Dec.] 21, Stourton.—“ This day I have sent to Worcester, to take places in the coach for the next return, but I cannot yet give you an assurance when to expect me, for I am informed (how true I know not) that no coach goes from thence till after Twelfth-tide and the Bridgenorth coach will not be at London again till the Saturday after Twelfth-tide, which is so long, that I think if I cannot go up by Worcester's convenience sooner, rather to hire Bridgenorth coach wholly to myself, and come up the week after Christmas Day. I fear I shall not receive an answer from Worcester, time enough to write by the next post, but as soon as I can, you shall not fail to know my fixed resolution, as to the day I shall be in town. As for lodgings, you may be pleased to take them where you find them most convenient, but I suppose it will be time enough for that when I can set you a day for my arrival. I know not what you mean by your former letter, where you mention sitting up nights and playing hide and seek. I have often done both, but know no particular story depends on either, but I suppose, whatever it is, it has lost nothing in the telling. I am glad I pass among the women for a silent young man, it being, in my judgment, much a (sic) more advantageous character, than what commonly their sex can challenge. I only fear they have guessed as ill in that, as in the rest, and then I may be destitute of all good qualities, though never of the desire to be," &c.

PROCEEDINGS IN COUNCIL respecting LETTERS OF REPRISAL.

1680, May 12.—“ At the Court at Whitehall, the 12th of May, 1680.

Present:

The King's Most Excellent Majesty.

His Highness Prince Rupert.	Earl of Essex.
Lord Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.	Earl of Bathe.
Lord Chancellor.	Lord Bishop of London.
Lord President.	Mr. Hide.
Duke of Albemarle.	Lord Chief Justice North.
Marquis of Worchester ( sic ).	Mr. Finch.
Earl of Ossory.	Mr. Secretary Jenkins.
Lord Chamberlain.	Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.
Earl of Bridgewater.	Sir Thomas Chichely.
Earl of Sunderland.	Mr. Godolphin.

“This day a Memorial presented to his Majesty by his Excellency the Ambassador Extraordinary from the States General of the United Provinces was read in Council, setting forth how that, according to information given upon oath, Sir Edward Graves, Knight, and George Carew, Esquire, were equipping and arming a small frigate called the Mary, under the command of Tyrence Byrne, to be employed against the subjects of the States General, and particularly to surprise and seize the ship called the Emperour, wherein part of the said Lord Ambassador’s equipage was embarked, in order to his return to his own country; which equipping and arming was by colour of a Commission or Letter[s] of Reprisal bearing date the 29th of May, in the 17th year of his Majesty’s reign that now is, and granted in favour of the creditors of Sir William Courten and others, and praying that the said Letters of Reprisal might be revoked. His Majesty considering that the said Commission was suspended by his Majesty’s Proclamation bearing date the 10th of August, 1666, for divers great and notable misdemeanours committed in execution thereof, and that by the Treaty of Peace and Alliance made with the States General of the United Provinces at Breda, the 21st July, 1667, it is agreed that all suits and pretensions that the subjects of his Majesty or the States General might or could move or prosecute one against another for any matter or thing before the date of the said Treaty shall remain void, obliterated, and be annulled; and that all Letters of Reprisal, Marque or Countermarque, both general and particular, are by the said Treaty inhibited and revoked, which said Treaty was restored in its former vigour, and confirmed by a subsequent Treaty made at Westminster in the month of February, 1674; by which Treaties all Letters and Commissions of Reprisal are entirely revoked and annulled; his Majesty likewise foreseeing of what mischievous consequence it would be to all his loving subjects if the States General, upon the execution of the said Letters of Reprisal (contrary to the meaning of the said Treaties, and after the annulling of them by the same), should grant Letters of Countermarque against the said subjects and their goods, to the hindering of commerce and the ruin and damage of many particular men, although unconcerned in the case of such Reprisal: his Majesty doth therefore hereby order Sir Creswel Levins, his Majesty’s Attorney-General, to prepare the draft of a Supersedeas to pass the Great Seal of England, whereby the said Letter[s] of Reprisal may be in due form of law superseded, revoked, and declared to be void and determined to all effects and purposes whatsoever, to the end the States General may rest satisfied of his Majesty’s care to have his Treaties duly executed, and that it be made known and may appear of record to all his loving subjects that the said Letters of Reprisal are revoked and declared void, to the end also that none may hereafter presume to act by virtue thereof, and if any do, that they may be proceeded against as pirates acting without commission, and as infractors of the Peace and alliance between his Majesty and the States General.

Enclosed in Sec. Blathwayt's letter of 22 Nov. 1698.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON TO THE PRINCESS OF ORANGE.

1688, May 21, London.—Has received her letter of the 14th. Is grieved that his brother has fallen into her displeasure, not only for not waiting on her, but for other reasons. They are both ready to do anything she demands. Will never do anything to offend the Prince or her. Never had an opportunity of showing regard to her interests till he went into Ireland. “I do most humbly beseech you, if there be anything particular which either of your R. Highnesses, in this critical time, would have done, that you will vouchsafe to let me know something of your pleasure, and I dare undertake it shall be improved with all advantage and fidelity, for your service. . . .

“It is a very great consolation to me to find that your R. Highness is satisfied in the sense I have concerning taking off the Tests. . . . Mons. Dykevelt knows that he asked me, the last summer, my sense therein, because he said the Prince would be glad to know the thoughts of particular men, and I then told him that I could not be for repealing them. Madam, religion is too serious a thing to be trifled with, and according to the true practice thereof a man must expect to be happy or miserable to eternity.

“I had the happiness to be bred a Protestant, by a father who did not only understand his religion, but (as can be evidently made appear) suffered and was ruined for his steadiness in it. . . . I could much more willingly go to the stake in defence of it than live the greatest man in the world. . . . The more I pursue the practice of the religion I own, the better I shall be able to serve the King whenever he thinks fit to make use of me; for if I will be honest, it is [as] impossible to serve the King contrary to my religion as it is to serve your Highness any other way but by being steady to my religion.

“I can with a very good conscience give all liberty and ease to tender consciences, for in truth it is against all conscience to hinder men from worshipping God their own way; but I cannot in conscience give those men leave (as far as lies in me to prevent it) to come into employments, in the State, who, by their mistaken consciences, are bound to destroy the religion I profess, and, as they call it, the Northern Heresy. . . .

“I must not conclude without giving your R. Highness an account of an affair of very great importance, which it is fit the Prince and you should know.

“I suppose it can be no news to tell you that the King has lately reinforced his Declaration of Indulgence, and that he ordered it to be read twice in all the churches throughout the kingdom, which, your R. Highness will easily believe, our clergy could not well digest. My Lord's Grace of Canterbury took the matter into his serious consideration, and sent to as many of my Lords the Bishops to come to his assistance as could come to town in regard of the shortness of the time; and after mature and solemn deliberation, they resolved to make an humble Petition to the King, setting forth the case, and the reasons why they could not comply with his Majesty's commands in reading the said Declaration in their churches; which they did, and delivered it to the King on Friday last in the evening.

"The Petition was presented by the six Bishops who signed it, a copy whereof is here enclosed. It was all written in the Archbishop's handwriting. He did not go with it, because he has not been at Court almost these two years, being upon the matter forbid, for the King told him so long since that he need not come thither. The Bishop of London was of the same opinion with the rest, but 'twas not thought convenient for him to sign the Petition, in regard of his suspension.

"The King at first received the Bishops very graciously, but when he had read the Petition he expressed his displeasure very warmly, told them he did not expect such an address from them, that it was a great step towards rebellion, that he would remember them, and that he would be obeyed.

"The Bishops answered his Majesty with great duty and submission, but withall with great courage. The particulars of what they said I should but spoil in the relating. This was on Friday night; what the King will do hereupon, we are yet to see.

"Yesterday, being Sunday, was the first time appointed for reading the Declaration in London and the parts adjacent, but it was read only in four churches in this great city and liberties, so unanimous are our clergy. One of the four places was Westminster Abbey, where the Bishop of Rochester is Dean; he ordered one of the petty Canons to read it, but went out of town himself over night; he's a poor-spirited man.

"The Bishops of Gloster and Norwich came to town on Saturday, who are of the same mind with the rest, and letters are come from five or six others to the Archbishop, declaring themselves to be of the same opinion. What the Bishops of Coventry and Lichfield and Lincoln will do, nobody can tell; they are old, and very odd men. No others are suspected, except the two scabby sheep Chester and St. David's, who are indeed very bad men; as they have no reputation or interest, so they are despised by those whom they court.

"I hope this affair will not be displeasing to your R.H. Whatever shall be further done in this matter you shall be sure to have an account of, and so of all things of moment within my knowledge, as often as I can meet with safe messengers, for I am satisfied it is not fit to write of these things by the post, as I doubt not but your R.H. does well imagine.

"These good Bishops who are in town are all of my acquaintance; I always see them when they come, and I am sure they are full of devotion to the Prince and you. They have now desired me to find a way to present their duties, and to let you know that they never omit you in their private as well as public prayers. The Bishop of St. Asaph being the senior Bishop here, it fell to his lot to present the Petition, and to speak the first to the King. The Roman Catholics were of old no friends to him, and they will not be the more so for this, but he will always do his duty.

"I know the Prince ought to be informed of these affairs, which I know he will be by your Royal Highness, and should be so by me, but that I fear I have given him too many troubles of this kind; but I will do therein for the future as you shall please to direct me." . . .

PROPOSED DECLARATION by the PRINCE OF ORANGE.

[1688.] — "The Declaration proposed to the Prince of Orange from several persons in England."<sup>o</sup>

. . . "That there is the greatest need imaginable of giving a speedy stop to the arbitrary proceedings of those Popish counsels which now prevail in these Kingdoms is so manifest, that it is not necessary to descend to particulars to convince the world of it. However, because I am desirous to satisfy the minds of all honest men that my undertaking is not founded upon any private or sinister designs of my own, but is wholly intended for the preservation of the known Laws of these Kingdoms (by which only the profession of the Protestant Religion can be protected, the lives, liberties, and properties of the professors of it be defended, and the right descent of the Crown maintained), I think it proper to give some account of those motives in particular which have induced me to the attempt of rescuing them from those great and imminent dangers which are ready to break in upon them."

Refers to the illegal Commission "put in execution against the known Statutes of the Realm and rights of the Universities;" under which many men have been "dispossessed of their very freeholds and possessions, and both Bishops and others of the Clergy have been suspended," making way for "the most scandalous and unworthy men." "The specious pretence of granting liberty of conscience to Dissenters" is intended "to deludé some Protestants to be assisting to them [the Papists] in their design to destroy the rest." What favour the Protestants can then expect may be judged "by the cruelties which were used not long ago by them [the Papists] in Ireland."

Both ecclesiastical and civil laws have been interferred with, and every man's liberty and property is at the Sovereign's mercy, or that of mercenary judges. Even Papists are made judges, though their judgments are invalid. In all counties uncomplying Lord Lientenants, Deputy Lientenants, and Justices of the Peace have been removed. At Parliamentary elections men have been questioned beforehand as to their votes. Ancient charters have been forced from most Corporations, whereby, with the assistance of Popish sheriffs, members can be returned to Parliament who will promote the repeal of the Test, &c. Monasteries have already been established, and mass-houses. Jesuits dare to sit in the public Councils, though their presence is high treason, and scarcely permitted in any Popish government. When any petition, as in the late case of the seven Bishops, is made to the King, it is declared a libel against him, and the petitioners are imprisoned. The people are left without any certainty when a Parliament shall meet.

The condition of Ireland is much worse, being under an Irish Papist, who has changed the Protestant army into a Popish one; "there needs but the word to be given there for the extirpation of all the Protestants at one blow." That kingdom can only be regained by force. The like change is threatened in the armies and navies of England and Scotland. Irish and Popish strangers are being daily introduced into the Army, and Protestants removed; yet many good Protestants remain in the Armies and Navy, who will "lay hold on this opportunity of saving their religion, laws, and country from so miserable a slavery."

"The lawful successors of the Crown" have been educated in the Protestant Religion; yet "it hath been in an unparalleled manner contrived to impose a male child upon these kingdoms as Prince of Wales, and right heir to the Crown, who was never born of the body of the present Queen Mary of England, now wife of King James the Second, as I doubt not will be proved by undeniable circumstances impossible to be contradicted; although their own conduct of that affair all along hath enough showed the world that they durst not give any further proofs than they did of the Queen's great belly, or of the birth of the child, although they very well knew the design was so much suspected from the beginning that they could not possibly have given more public satisfaction than was necessary to have made it believed; but this (as all the rest of their proceedings) must be sanctified by the meritorious end for which it is designed, which is to perfect that religious work of keeping as well as reducing those (sic) heretic kingdoms into the bosom of the Church of Rome, for the attaining of which no action can be wicked or unjust.

"As these are the grounds upon which I come to give the best assistance I am able towards the relief of these kingdoms, so I hope Almighty God will give a blessing to my endeavours in so just an undertaking, and the nobility, gentry, soldiers, seamen, and all Protestants will I hope be so sensible of the great benefits which on the one hand they will receive by securing their religion and laws, and the uttermost danger which they must certainly run on the other hand both to themselves and their posterity if the Popish party should prevail, that I cannot but promise myself to find a cheerful and universal concurrence through the whole kingdom of England and Scotland to give all manner of assistance to so good a work, wherein we all stand so equally concerned. And that none may be discouraged with any fear or led into any misapprehensions concerning any designs which I may have in case it shall please God to bless my endeavours with success, I do hereby declare that I desire nothing but that, for the doing of right both to my wife and these kingdoms, there may be a free Parliament called according to the laws of the land," &c. Promises that all who join him in "this undertaking" shall be rewarded and preferred.

The PRINCE OF ORANGE to LORD [SHREWSBURY?].

1688, Nov. 2.—“My Lord,—I received just now yours of the 1st instant, and am glad you found so good a reception at Bristol, and that the Magistrates were so ready to do their parts towards it. As for what you say relating to the ships loaden with Tobacco, I leave the conduct of it wholly to you, to abate them what you please, so as the residue may be ready money, which is a necessary commodity amongst us, and am willing to abate the last duty in consideration of it. As for Sir John Guyse, I have herewith sent you an order for his immediate marching to Gloucester, as also another for Col. Cunningham [am's] commanding in chief till further order. It seems the northern Lords have rescued my Lord Lovelace, and will join me at Hungerford next Friday night; where or at Oxford I hope Mr. Trenchard will be able to bring me a considerable sum of money. You may tell Mr. Trenchard that Mr. Harberd hath adjusted the matter with Mr. York (?), who hath engaged to pay him at Mr. George Long's house in eight days two hundred and fifty pounds, which he must receive and bring to me [;] amongst the rest you may give Col. Cunningham an order, it being late. I am your affectionate friend—29ber, 88—

(Signed) “PRINCE D' ORANGE.

“I am willing Sir John Guyse should have those two commissions, and will send them to him.”

This postscript is struck out, and the following is added in the Prince's own hand:

“Mr. Harbert est si fatigue qu'il ne peut depešcher la commission pour le Col. Cuningam pour commande[r] par provision a Bristol, mais l'on luy l'envoyera, ainsi vous pources cependant l'installer. J'ay bien de l'impatience de vous revoir, et suis tout a vous. G.”

KING JAMES II. to the EARL OF MIDDLETON.

1688, Dec. 22, Rochester.—“I haue thought fitt to withdraw myself, but must not tell you where it shall be; if honest and loyal men will declare for me, and stand by me, I shall soon come to them. Lett the two Dutch Cap. know that I am obliged to them for their ciuility to me; tell James Graham he should give each of them a ring of a hundred pounds, and a horse of fifty to the old Lieu. of horse that was at the Battalle of Dunkerke with me. Lett my Protestant seruants keep to gather, and either stay here or go to London, as may be most convenient, with my Coaches; for my Catholike ones, lett them dispose of them selus as they thinke best for them selus, and have a care that my Chaplin be secured; he is a forrainer. As for your self, I am very well satisfyd with you; you have been always loyal, and I make no doubt but will continu so, and enter into no associations. "J. R."

[LORD] MOUNTJOY to [the PRINCE OF ORANGE].

[16]88[-9], Jan. 9, Dublin.—“Your Highness’s care in undertaking the re-establishment of our religion and our laws, the dangers you have exposed yourself to, and your success in it, makes you not only the subject of our prayers, but will make your name the blessing of our posterity; but there is yet some work to be done in this poor kingdom, of which this gentleman, Mr. Cuff, who is a man of consideration and of entire virtue, goes to give your Highness an account. He will inform your Highness in what state we are, and I hope will satisfy your Highness, that you do not want some servants here, who, when the common cause requires it, and your commands come, will exert themselves, in which number I humbly beg your Highness may reckon,” &c.

[16]89, March 15, Dublin Castle.—“If I were not verily persuaded that you are the self-same Duke Hamilton in all things, that you were when I had the honour to be known to your Grace, I should not venture to assure you of my most humble service and respects at this time, nor inform you that upon Tuesday last, the 12th of this month, our King arrived at Kinsale, in the west of this kingdom, with a fleet of 37 sail of ships, with arms for 24,000 foot, 4,000 dragoons, and 4,000 horse, and, which is better, 800,000 French crowns in ready money. This news I am confident will be welcome to your Grace, as also that I have 50,000 horse, foot, and dragoons raised for him here, well armed and disciplined. The King brought over with him 200 French and Irish officers, some of which were wanted. This good posture of his Majesty’s affairs will I hope encourage your Grace and the rest of the King’s friends there to stick by him and yourselves. I hope before the end of July to have the honour to embrace you in Scotland, and by word of mouth to assure you how truly I am,” &c.

[LORD] TYRCONNELL to the EARL OF PERTH, Lord Chancellor of Scotland.

[16]89, March 15, Dublin Castle.—“Whatever your Lordship’s condition may be, I am persuaded you will not be sorry to hear that the King arrived at Kinsale in this kingdom upon Tuesday last, the 12th instant, with a fleet of 37 sail of ships, store of arms, ammunition, 200,000*l.* st[erling] in ready money, and 200 good officers. I take post tomorrow morning to attend him at Cork, where he has commanded me to come to him, and hope by the 10th of April to show him 50,000 men well armed and disciplined, of which number 10,000 are horse and dragoons. If your Lordship be a prisoner, and that this do come into your hands, it will be some consolation to you to hear that your King has yet some friends that will stick by him; if you be at liberty, you will make the right use of this good news for your master's service. I have writ by this same way to my Lord Duke Hamilton. I hope the King will find some friends in Scotland, as well as in England, that will stick by him and themselves."

DECLARATION by [Dr.] ROGER BIGGS (or BIGGE),
Student in Physic.

[1689, March 27.]—He was at dinner in Lady Ivey's house in Westminster, and one Mr. James Cornelius with him, when Sir Robert Clarke, said to be Lady Ivey's son-in-law, and his Lady also came in. Lady Clarke was very much indisposed, and said "that her head had never left aching with violent pain since that rogue, the Prince of Orange, landed, and that she hoped that she should see him served as Monmouth was," &c. After dinner Lady Ivey and Lady Clarke withdrew into the next room, and desired "the Doctor's" company, leaving Sir Robert playing with his little son. The Doctor heard Lady Clarke say that "she wished the child had been drowned before it had come to this," but he knows not what child she meant. "The Doctor went in a few days to wait upon Lady Ivey again, but found her absented from her house, the King being newly fled; and the Doctor found the neighbours in a great mutiny, and [they] did declare the Lady Ivey to be an ill woman, and that the late King with Sir Robert Clerke and a cabal of Jesuits was seen to be conversant there on several nights; and that there was [were] great lights and great noise all night in the house." She was in private lodgings, at a farrier's house by Fleet Street, at Fleet Ditch, where she told the Doctor that Sir Robert Clerke had fled to France, and his Lady was absconded. She came to the Doctor's house, and asked him to explain to her "the art," on discovery of which she said it was supernatural, and desired him to proceed in the highest degree against Mr. Neale, whom she wished to overcome, and that I (the Doctor) would again restore King James to the throne, and bring Sir Robert Clerke and her daughter out of all their troubles. "At the same time she did declare to me that the Prince of Wales was her daughter Clerke's child, and that the people was [were] mad to know what was become of the child." Afterwards she lay one night "on our side of the water ; and one Mrs. Daffy, living in Salsbury Square, in Fleet Street, in the house which was Doctor Brown's, she being the late relict of Dr. Daffy, that made and sold Daffy's Elixir, lay with her all night ; who told me that Lady Ivey said unto her that the Prince of Wales was her daughter Clerke's child."

[MEMORANDUM by T. NEALE.]

1688-9 (sic), March 27.—“There having been some rumour of the Lady Clerke's son being the nominal Prince of Wales, Mr. Neale on enquiry has been informed by one Dr. Bigs” (&c.)

“Note: Lady Clerke had a son the beginning of June last. That son is not now to be heard of. Sir Ro. Clerke went with King Jeams. Lady Clerke is flying, and will be gone Friday next . . . for France.”—T. N.

KING JAMES II. to COLIN, EARL OF BALCARRASE.

1689, March 29, Dublin Castle.—

“JAMES R.

“Right trusty and well beloved Cousin and Councillor, we greet you well. Whereas we have been informed by Sir Archbald Kennedy of your faithful and loyal deportment in this conjuncture, we would not delay any time to send you our Royal and most hearty thanks, and to let you know that, by the blessing of Almighty God, we are come safe to this our kingdom, notwithstanding the malicious designs of our enemies ; and that our affairs are in such a condition by the present posture of this country, and the assistance we have brought with us, and that which we have yet coming after us, that we are not only in a condition to defend this kingdom, but to send you such supplies as you may judge fit for our service. We have therefore resolved to send our commission to you of Colonel of horse and foot, that you may raise as many of either as you can, with commissions blank for the inferior officers, to be filled up by you. Being resolved to come ourself as soon as it is possible for us to do it with safety, and that all the things of our army here, which we intend to have very numerous, shall be put in order, we have thought of sending five thousand men, whereof 100 horse and 150 dragoons, believing that a greater number of horse and dragoons will be inconvenient to ship over to you, and that you may get some there. We desire to know your opinion of this number, and what you can propose to us for their subsisting in the country, and that you would let us know where you think fit we should land them, with what else you may think for our service, especially in reference to our revenue for the subsistence of our troops.

“We have sent letters to the Chiefs of Clans to arm, and to most of the nobility we had reason to judge faithful to our interest, and by the forces we send over commissions shall be sent to you and the rest of our friends.<sup>o</sup>

“The officers of our standing forces we will require to attend you by proclamation, and such as are with us we shall immediately prepare for their journey as soon as we hear from you. As soon as our forces or any considerable body can be brought together, we think fit that the nobility and gentry should call the Bishops and Boroughs,+ and by our authority call themselves a Convention of Estates, to declare for us, and put the kingdom in a posture of defence. We need not tell you the necessity you lie under to defend yourselves. The Presbyterians are not good masters in any government, much less with you, where their particular quarrels are revenged in those public confusions. But assure yourselves we will stand by you, and if it shall please God to give success to our just cause, we will let the ancient Cavalier party know that they‡ are the only true basis that Monarchy can rest upon in Scotland; and we have found such effects of our mercy in times past, as will make us now raise our friends on the ruin§ of our enemies.

“What may be fit for you to know more the bearer will inform you of; only we think fit to add. that as it ever was our intention to maintain the national Protestant religion, so now we will confirm it to our subjects, and their property and liberty, which, let them fancy to themselves what they will, can never be assured to them by any other means. As for yourself, you may be assured that as your services to us all alongst have been eminent, so, when it pleases God to put it in our power, the reward shall be the same. In the meantime expecting your immediate answer to those particulars, and what else you think for our service, we bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court in Dublin Castle, the 29th day of March, 1689, and of our reign the fift[h] year.

“By his Majesty’s command,

the account of the barbarous usage you met with, bred in me, you would pity my condition, for my imagination represented to me the danger and sufferings in the ugliest dress. God be blessed who has hitherto spared you, and may you be happy here and hereafter. It is with some joy we hear that [the] E[arl] of Mar will declare for the King, and that being, we might suppose you at liberty before this, but, alas ! such news are such strangers to me, that after they are thrice confirmed I shall but begin to believe them. God send you your liberty.

“The letter to Lt.-Col. Middleton, and all the letters I had in list are done, and many more ; the bearer will give you full account of all, and therefore to him I must refer you. The time is precious, and therefore we would not stop this to have a prin[cipa]ll declaration sent by him ; the copy is sent to you. And I am in pain till I shall hear from you what more may be to add to it. The scheme of the affair you will see in a letter to E[arl] Coline, which you may break up. The good man has a mind to visit his Lordship shortly, but first he must put the 40,000 M. he has in this kingdom, in sure hands. In the first place he will send his spending money consisting in 5,000 M. there, to see if he can put it [to] usury, and he will send a friend along with it, and consign it into the hands of John Grahame, the bonnet-maker ; and if he finds that thrive, he will bring over a stock able to put life in all our trade once again. You may open the bonnet-maker’s letter, and see all, and send your advice. James (sic) has had a mind to write to you, but has been hitherto hindered, but he will by the next post give the orders in all our concerns, and lay the orders upon us, and they shall most surely be obeyed. Inform yourself of all by the bearer, and nothing shall be omitted which you shall advise. God be with you heartily ; adieu. I know not where you are ; therefore this is short.”

[LORD] TARBAT TO LORD MELVILL.

1689, April 13, Edinb[urgh].—“My sickness is heavy enough, but it adds to my trouble that I am altogether disabled from attending the meeting, to serve my country. I wish and hope that my absence shall do little hurt, yet I cannot but be solicitous, when I consider that the interest of our King and kingdom are (sic) not yet so fixed as to be out of danger. I pray God disappoint my fears, many of which arise, perhaps, from my ignorance, yet I have seen great mischiefs arise from as small appearances. I cannot doubt but that the attacks from Ireland will be both speedy and violent, and I as little doubt but many of this nation, who have too little religion, and several who consider not the danger of the Protestant Religion, both in Britain and over all Europe, will be too ready to join with the Irish. This may be expected, that not only the greatest part of our Highlanders, but the far greatest part of the Low Country people benorth Tay, and very many besouth it, especially in the south borders, will concur in this ; and the very embarrassing of our King in the present conjuncture will be more hurtful to the Allies abroad than Scotland is worth. What then would it be should greater success attend the Popish arms? My Lord, allow me to think that it had been no bad measure if at this time people who were half persuaded should rather have been invited to compliance than terrified from it, and such as would give assurance to live peaceably should have been now owned as friends, and a little time would no doubt have made them truly so.

“I cannot believe that people who are led by unexperienced heat, or who mind more to resent private injuries, or to repair their private losses, are the fit tools at present for his Majesty’s service ; not that I think they should be altogether excluded as far as they are capable, nor that unjust forfeitures and fines should not be redressed in a prudent method when the Government is settled ; but I crave leave to think that the chief trust should be put into moderate and serious hands, and that terrors of severity against many should be altogether taken off, for I am sure that would prevail on many thousands to lay [lie] still, who without such assurance may do [too?] readily engage in mischief. My Lord, give me leave to wish you at London, and to say that you would be more useful there in a day than here in a month, as matters stand now, for if things be represented there with as great partiality, as much private interest and design, as some seem to intend here, the King may be induced to take measures very far contrary to his true interest, and which might be easily helped now, but not without great ruin afterwards. What means it, that there is no union amongst yourselves in proposals either as to persons or things? Are officers in Scotland of such value that the King and kingdom’s interest must be exposed to danger for private projects in these? Cannot poor men or sufferers be otherwise made up than at the expense of the hazard of the Commonwealth?

“My Lord, I know not if I shall live to see the effects of either peace or war, yet I cannot hinder myself from thinking and wishing so long as I live, and I must adventure to say that unless the King do speedily take upon him the Government, and govern us by his prudence, and not by our humour ; unless he settle on us a Council and officers who will govern for the common good, and not private ends, not in heat, but in moderation ; unless he send us competent forces to sustain an Irish attack or intestine insurrection ; unless ships be sent to secure the seas betwixt this and Ireland ; and unless an effectual course be taken to prevent or dissipate an Highland insurrection ; the King’s affairs may be disturbed and this country ruined, whatever be the last effects, and the very disreputation of a war in Britain, although it were but in the Highlands, will no doubt animate our enemies and discourage our friends, and perhaps produce more evils than I am willing to nominate (?).

“As to this last point of the Highlands, it were much easier to prevent their rising than to suppress them. If the Marquis of Atholl, the Earls of Argile and Broad Albin in the South

Highlands, the Earl of Marr, Strathnaber, Grant, Lovat, and what little help I could give them, in the North Highlands, should act cordially in the King's service, I doubt not but we might keep the Highlanders from doing any great mischief; at least, I am sure I could have hindered many in the North from joining with the Papists. Of this I spoke a little to the King at Whitehall, and proposed all this here before I did fall sick, but Duke Hamilton and others were not of opinion that we should leave the meeting, and I myself was very willing to stay, but all of us by our stay could not do so much good here, as by preventing of ill there. One reason I had to draw me North, was to have secured my unhappy son, who, what by his distracted religion and his anger at my giving my estate to his brother on his change, may* I fear irritate him to mad actings; but I hope few of my relations will follow him in them, and I think none, though he should play the fool. And I have written to all the Earl of Seafort's friends, so as I hope they will not engage in his bad cause.

"I expected not strength to have said so much, when I did begin. I have not strength to say more, and I believe my next foot shall pay me for saying so much; and therefore I shall end with expostulating, why so great delays in sending our vote to the King and Queen? What can we design in acting, being a body without a head? What means (sic) such limitations on a King whom we have so little reason to doubt? And why do we delay our own security, and England's satisfaction, by trusting ourselves in the same hands as they have done? These things occasion great thoughts in many, and give real trouble to," &c.

[LORD] MELVILL to KING [WILLIAM].

[1689,] April 16.—"I desired my Lord Staires and Mr. Castaires to give you an account of what passed in our Convention, Thursday last. I could have wished our Instrument of Government had been otherwise in some things, but it could not be helped unless we should have made longer delay; there was but too much before, which hath been occasioned partly by too many self designs, and partly by humour, not to say worse.

"Upon your Majesty's being proclaimed here that night, there has not been so general and cordially (sic) joy expressed of a great many years, though but too many disaffected likewise; but there is a wonderful change in the countenance of people since from what was the day before.

"Our affairs were in a very bad condition not long ago, and yet we are in as much hazard as we are worth, should the late King attack us before we have sufficient assistance from England. Your Majesty may justly think it strange that we should not only have proclaimed you and the Queen for our King and Queen, and an Instrument of Government in some kind annexed as a qualification, and in some manner the condition, without ever acquainting your Majesties to know whether you were satisfied, &c.; as also that this proclamation should have been printed and published so soon, so that the Court of Vienn may have an account of our procedure before your Majesty have it, in such a way [th]at it ought to have been signified to you; for private accounts you are not obliged to regard, and may, if there be any such, be but for private designs. All I shall say to this (for it will suffer an apology), [is,] that our actions may justly seem to be incomprehensible to those who live at a distance, and too many of ourselves does [do] not well understand ourselves, our interest, or our duty, but I desire not to lay open the nakedness of my country.

“There is one Mr. Bridy apprehended, who was servant to the Earl of Murray once, I know not if to Melford, who was in France with the late King, was sent to England and to Scotland, was here with the Duke of Gordon and the late Chancellor Perth, from thence went to Ireland<sup>o</sup> to K[ing] J[ames], brought back many letters to several persons and K[ing] J[ames’s] declaration, which were all sealed; whether all have come to our hands I know not; some says [say] otherwise. I was called amongst some others to [a] review of the papers, and afterwards to be a witness to the examination of the person, but I must say I cannot be altogether satisfied with the methods we take. I will not say that some of us desire not to win (sic) to the bottom of this affair, and that all that is in it may be brought to light; but if not so, we use not all the prudence in the world in managing our business. By what we have seen, the Earls of Balcarras and of Dundie are the persons [who] seem to be most entrusted by the late King.

“For this, Brydy was directed first to Balcarras, then to Earl Dundee, to be directed by them, &c.; yet such has been our management that though they were known to be highly disaffected, they were let slip, as many others. To wrett [write] all what hath been our way and method would be but tedious. We have been alarmed of a good while from several places of the kingdom, but not any rational way taken for our security; it hath been desired to be looked to often, but neglected. But this discovery being so palpable, &c., it was moved that some of those chiefly concerned and most dangerous might be secured, and it might have been easily done; it was offered to take Dundee and some others of the activist of that party, which though not directly and absolutely (sic), yet not so listened to as one might rationally judge it was much desired. However, since there was a professed willingness such should be secured, there was an order given by D[uke] Ham[ilton] to secure Balcarras and some gentlemen in the County of Five, qr. [where] some few of Leven’s men were, and that was immediately set about, before any advertisement could be given by any, and they are all brought prisoners to this town this night, except one gentleman, not of much significancy, who escaped, not having hands enough, and wanting his officers, and some of the best of those come down sick, though one of his own great comrades and his brother-in-law's brother be one [of] them[,] Lev. (sic) Col. Balfour : he would have undertaken to have secured the Earl of Dundie likewise, if some had pleased.

"I suppose the account of this discovery made may [be?] sent to your Majesty [by?] such as some pleases. We have not yet appointed any to wait on your Majesty with the offer of our Crown, and our Convention is adjourned to Tuesday. There is brighning enough who shall be the persons. I have never concerned myself to be one of the number, though I wish your Majesty as well as any in the Convention.

"We have had since I came here many foolish debates and janglings, trifled away much time, though we had no reason, considering our danger, for if there had been one man of brains and courage amongst [those?] of the late King's party, as things have been managed, the kingdom in probability had been lost.

"We have yesterday made ourselves prisoners by passing a vote that none should go out of the kingdom without liberty from the Convention, and this day there hath several wild proposals been made in relation to such who shall be employed to wait on your Majesty. I fancy much of this hath been in relation to me, lest I should come up, but they mistake my humour far; but I can compliment none of them how great soever, and my way suits not with the designs of many. I thought fit to acquaint your Majesty with this, not that I have any inclination to travel more—I may be wearied of that kind of life—but if I should think that your Majesty's service and the public interest required my waiting on you, that I resolve not to trouble myself whether the Convention give me liberty or not, since I see there is more of selfish designs in this their way than anything else; and if [I] durst presume to be so bold, I would beg of your Majesty that you would consider well upon the settling this poor country. Things are not as I could wish in it, and any wrong step in the beginning will not be so easily recovered. Your Majesty may easily cure many of our distempers, and needs not value as to persons what some may represent to you otherwise than in effect they are; if you take right measures at first, your Majesty may easily prevent and frustrate the foolish and selfish designs of some pragmatial people.

"If your Majesty has time to allow, you may call for the bearer, Mr. Lokart, who will give you some account of our present affairs, which are bad enough.

"Your Majesty need not be much stumbled at our Instrument of Government and grievances, which are other than I could have wished, but they are loosely drawn, and may be helped in Parliament what dissatisfies. For the word forfaultry in vacancy of the Crown, we could hardly otherwise secure your interest, and it's not the Convention forfaults; they take no such thing upon them, only declares (sic) that the K[ing] hath forfaulted his right. We have some pragmatial persons who have strange schemes of government in their [minds?] and tongues, but if we be quit of the late King's invasion, these things may quickly vanish ; but there are so many pretenders to places, preferments, &c., that it does greatly disturb affairs.

“I dare not take upon me to give your Majesty any advice ; you know I neither an nor pretend to be a statesman. I pray God Almighty give your Majesty counsel, and bless and preserve you. You have great need to make a good choice in naming your officers of State and Council, so as men fit to serve your Majesty and their country be employed, and others as little disoblged at this time as may [be]. This will not want its difficulty, though [to?] defer a little in naming, at least the completing these, especially of beneficial places, until you be well informed, it will not be amiss, for often the most proper persons are forgot, because they do not seek after things as others ; and sometimes quality is not to be looked to, if your Majesty can find persons qualified for your service ; you can put them in a capacity otherwise.

“As for the Articles of the Instrument of Government, though they are passed, and many of them are according to the true fundamentals of the government, yet there are some mixtures of debatable matters ; however, they are not to be proposed as conditions of your Kingship (the contrary being declared in the Convention), but as claims of right to be considered by K[ing] and Parl[iament] ; so that all your Majesty (it seems) needs to say to this, is to make a fair promise to concur with (sic) to have all these, and what further can be judged fit for religion, liberty, and property, adjusted in Parliament and secured to your people in the most fit method ; but your Majesty would not delay to accept the Government and take the oath. There may be some occasion of scruple possibly to you in the oath as to the extirpating heretics, but it's only when convict by law, as you will see ; the oath could not be touched to change this any way, because one as (sic) a fundamental, and that which K[ing] James the VI., K[ing] Ch[arles] I. and Second took. The best way in this, if your Majesty have any scruple, [is] that in the next Parliament there be an Act made prohibiting to prosecute people merely for their own opinions, when they [do not?] trouble State or Church with them.

“I beg your Majesty a thousand pardons for this and my former presumption and freedoms ; I shall only add this to them, that your Majesty would beware in employing great men in too eminent employment, and too pragmatcal men in such employments where they may be faschions [factious?] and troublesome.

“There would be something done presently for the peace of the Highlands, for if once all be inflamed there, it may [be] very expensive, and take a long time before they be reduced. I wish two small frigates with some arms were sent to cruise on our east coast, which would be of great use and keep the north on the east side [of] Scotland in awe. I wish some money in time were bestowed to break the Highlanders amongst themselves. I think Tarbatt might be very useful to help to break their combination, but I am so blamed, because I cannot be unnatural, and though there were no relation betwixt us, that I cannot be so revengeful &c., as others, that I shall say nothing to your Majesty in this. You may easily reflect on my way all along, and I wish heartily that if your Majesty think that I have used partiality or sought my own interest in any representation of person or affair, that you would be pleased to tell me freely.

“I have enclosed here a letter Tarbatt sent me, which I thought fit to enclose to your Majesty, in which some things are good; you know I do not approve all of many sentiments; as also I send you his desire for himself, which is his own hand, the other a borrowed, for he is very sick; your Majesty may do as you judge fit. I am the more shy because of my relation.

[P.S.] “Your Majesty may be pleased to call for the bearer, who can show somewhat of our condition, for I can have no time to wreat [write] what wei S<sup>td</sup> [we settled?]; he is one who always has been jealous for your Majesty’s interest, even before you come (sic) from Holland, and so deserves your countenance.”

[The DUKE OF] HAMILTON to KING [WILLIAM].

1689, April 17, Holyroodhous.—“So soon as I heard any certain account of the late King James being in Ireland, I despatched by a flying packet the notice thereof to the Earl of Shrewsbury. In a few days after there was taken one Mr. Bready, who some months ago had come from France with letters to the Earl of Perth, and was by him despatched to Ireland, and now is returned with many letters from the late King to all he thinks of his party in this kingdom, and some letters under his own hand to some in that kingdom, as the letters and his Declaration will more fully inform your Majesty of all his designs; which are all sent by this bearer, my son Selkirk.

“Sir, seeing so great designs laid down against us, and many ready to lay hold on the occasion to disturb our peace, I judged it high time to press on the settlement of our Crown on your Majesty and the Queen, which on Thursday last we got done without a contrary vote, except one; and immediately thereafter the Estates went to the Crose of Edinburgh, and proclaimed your Majesty and the Queen, King and Queen of this kingdom. The Estates are not yet come to a resolution of the manner and way of sending up to your Majesty for your acceptance and taking the oath proposed by them, there being like to be some debate about it, which I will not in this trouble your Majesty with the particulars of, but shall do all I can to prevent it.

“Now give me leave most humbly and heartily to wish your Majesty and the Queen joy of being King and Queen of this kingdom; and that you may both have many long and happy years to govern over us shall be the constant prayers of,” &c.

[SHREWSBURY?] TO LORD [MELVILL?].

1689, April 25, Hampton Court.—“The King has commanded me to write to your Lordship upon the occasion of what was omitted in his Majesty’s letter by this post in relation to my Lord Tarbat’s exoneration and promise of pardon, which his Majesty was willing to have despatched, believing it for his service since it came recommended from your Lordship, though it does not otherwise seem ready yet for the King’s signature, since the formality is not passed of the Crown’s being offered and accepted, and the person is not named into whose hands the records should be put, nor is there any mention who are to tender the oath upon the delivering up of the records, and what directions are to be given them about it, which yet my Lord Tarbat in his letters hints as necessary to be done. However, the King will have this sent to your Lordship to show his intentions of gratifying my Lord Tarbat as far as you think it advisable to be done; and if any use is to be made of it at present, it is left to you to fill up the blanks with the proper dates, and the names of such persons as are to be inserted.”

[KING WILLIAM III.] TO THE DUKE OF HAMILTON.

[1689, April.]—“I have received your letter of the 16th instant, by Mr. Lockhart, which confirms me in the opinion I have long had of your concerns for my interest and service, which I shall be as ready on my part to acknowledge in any occasion that may offer for your satisfaction and advantage. Though it were to be wished that in some things the Convention has [had?] proceeded otherwise than they have done, yet I am persuaded that no pains nor industry of yours has been wanting to prevent those errors, and I do agree with you that something is reasonably to be sacrificed for the gaining of time, since no inconvenience is more irreparable than that of delay. Your advice would be so extreme useful to me, that if the orders of your Convention are not absolutely binding, your presence here would contribute so much to my service, that I hope you will make what haste you can hither; and since I would have you take care that that be not greater than will agree with your health, I desire you will send me an express with an account in writing of your opinion of all matters now depending, and what may be fit for me to do in them, with all plainness and freedom, which will ever be most acceptable to me. Since you think my Lord Tarbatt can be serviceable in quieting the North, I hope you will encourage his going thither, and to that end I have sent you his discharge in the form it is desired, which you will make use of or not, as you see opportunity.

“A distribution of money among the Highlanders being thought the likeliest way to satisfy them, I have given orders for five or six thousand pounds to be sent to Major-General Mackay for that purpose, as also for two frigates to cruise on the north-east coast as you desire; and hope in some time our affairs will be in so good a posture that we shall be so far from apprehending an invasion from Ireland, that we may be in a condition to send over forces sufficient to support the British interest there."

[KING WILLIAM III.] to the DUKE OF HAMILTON.

[1689, April.]—"I have received your letter of the 17th instant, sent by my Lord Selkirk, together with the intercepted packets, in which, as well as in many other particulars, I am to acknowledge your care and prudent conduct in bringing things to such a conclusion that I hope to be in a condition to consider your services and good intentions towards me in such a manner as they deserve.

"It is needless for me to recommend to you the pressing on what remains, or to have a watchful eye over anything that may appear to disturb the peace of that kingdom, which I am satisfied you labour in with such integrity and prudence as will always engage me to be" (incomplete).

PETITION of SIR SAMUEL MORLAND, Bart., to the KING.

[1689, June.]—Prays for payment of 300*l.* in arrear of his pensions, amounting to 800*l.* yearly, granted to him by Charles II. for saving that King's life, when the design of murdering him was ready to be put in execution, and for other services. Is in years, lame, and in debt.

SIR S. MORLAND to [SHREWSBURY].

1689, June 18.—Waited on Major Wildman at the General Post Office on Sunday evening; and has since sent him a paper of proposals by his (the Major's) own agent. Asks for ten or twelve lines in the King's own hand, sealed with his seal, and for five or six sheets of the same paper, and a stick of the same wax. Refers to the arrears of his pensions.

Enclosing—

Copy of Sir Sam. Morland's Proposals.

1. Offers, at his own cost, to provide engines and utensils, and to discover to the King the true secret of opening letters, counterfeiting hands and seals, and quickly copying long dispatches of foreign ministers and others, as heretofore discovered by him to Charles II.

* It rather appears to be from the King.

2. Offers, at the King's charge, to provide all sorts of engines and utensils which shall be judged necessary by Major Wildman, for putting in practice all the said mysteries at the General Post Office; and to instruct others. His severe usage in France, and losses since his return, have ruined his domestic affairs. Asks to receive privately the arrears of his pensions, unpaid only by reason of this late Revolution, as appears by Sir Robert Howard's certificate; also for a dormant warrant for their payment in future. Must search the City and suburbs for able workmen, but will so contrive that they shall not know what these engines are designed for. Desires the return of this paper.

[STATEMENT by SIR S. MORLAND.]

[1689, June.]—"About two years before the Fire of London, Sir Henry Bennett (afterwards Lord Arlington) . . . told me that the Spaniards had a way of sealing up their letters, so as it was utterly impossible to open them without being discovered. And having heard that I pretended to those arts, for experiment sake, he went into a private room, and wrote ten or twelve lines, and sealed it up after the Spanish manner, and gave it to me to try my skill.

"About two days after I waited on him, and having first given him, in a loose paper, a copy of what he had so written and sealed up, I put into his hand his own letter, and four more. All which when he had opened with all the care imaginable, and could by no means find which was his own hand and seal, he immediately left me (being not a little surprised!), and acquainted the King with what had happened, and showed him all the papers.

"The King being very desirous to see the operations, a time was appointed, and late at night in the Secretary's Office, when all the clerks and messengers were gone, I showed his Majesty and the Lord Arlington the operations of several models in little; with which he was so well pleased, that he sent for the Postmaster General, and ordered him to prepare two rooms at the General Post Office to put these things in real practice, which in three months after was done; and the King himself, with the Lord Arlington and one more, went privately in a coach about eleven of the clock at night to the General Post Office,* and there stayed near three hours, to see with admiration and very great satisfaction—

"1. The manner of opening (and that with great ease and expedition) all manner of seals, as well in wafers as in wax, and then closing and sealing them up again, so as never to be discovered by the most curious eye.

"2. The several ways of counterfeiting all sorts of seals, and giving as sharp impressions as with the original seals; which is by most men thought impossible to do, especially in wafers.

* "Went in a private gentleman's coach between 10 and 11 at night from Whitehall to the General Post Office"—in another paper.

“3. The counterfeiting all manner of writing, so as to make it impossible for any person to know or distinguish his own handwriting.

“4. The sudden and exact copying out of any writing, though it be a whole sheet of paper close written on both sides, for which there is little more than one minute’s time required, and so proportionably, be there never so many sheets.

“Whereupon, by his Majesty’s special order and command, all these things were practised at the General Post Office, and with great advantage to the Crown, till such time as the Fire of London, by the Postmaster’s negligence or design, consumed all the machines and utensils belonging to those arts. And afterwards, the Lord Arlington declining in his interest, they were never set up again; the Postmaster finding better ways of making his private advantages by suing Col. Whitley for twenty-one thousand pounds, &c. . . .

“1. By these arts, and by the frequent inspection of letters when the practice is unsuspected, a King soon knows the temper of all his principal and active subjects throughout his dominions.

“2. If any person be suspected, and his letters found, it’s easy to make him and his accomplices correspond with only copies, and to keep their originals till their designs are ripe for a discovery and conviction. And this person may sometimes happen to be a favourite, or a privy councillor, or a great military officer, and nearly concern the Prince’s life and government.

“3. Whereas all Ambassadors and Foreign Ministers, knowing what is practised by their own masters, are very careful to send all their letters and dispatches of consequence as late as is possible to the General Post Office, that so therè may be no time given to visit or inspect them; we oftentimes opened such dispatches, and copied out ten or twelve sheets in the space of so many minutes, and had always time enough and to spare to open and inspect whatever was required by the Secretary of State. . . .

“There were always great clamours made by public Ministers and others for opening their letters by one Mr. Dorislaus, who had a salary for that purpose, but, alas, understood no better ways than to cut letters open with a penknife, and then drop wax under; which was the occasion of their sending their dispatches of consequence by expresses and under merchants’ covers, &c. . . .

“His Majesty may please to employ me at Hampton Court in setting up some waterworks there, and so I may have an opportunity of showing him and your Lordship all things in little. Afterwards it may be set up both at the General Post Office, and also in some private room near your Lordship’s Office, for many times letters will come to your Lordship’s hands not fit to send to the Postmaster.” . . .

In Morland’s hand.

There is also a similar paper in a clerk’s hand, with sundry variations. It begins with a statement that the writer “had been versed in affairs of State during Cromwell’s government, and afterwards till the Restoration of Charles II.” It also refers to writing in cipher used in foreign dispatches. "This art ought to be put in practice in the General Post Offices of England and Scotland, and hereafter in the General Post Offices of Ireland."

Note at the end of this paper, in Shrewsbury's hand: "The King made a very honourable answer, that Sir Sam. should be considered, but he thought that the secret ought to die with him, as too dangerous to be encouraged."

M. DE FONTENAY TO LORD BATH.

1689, July 21.—"Monseigneur,—Ayant esté commandé du Roy, par quelque polittique de la Cour, dont j[']informeray vostre grandeur, si jay l'honneur de l'entretenir, de passer en Irlande, jay esté pris par des vaisseaux de la flotte angloize, et par bonheur pour moy dens mon sort, jay esté mis sur le bord de Monsieur le Colonel de Greinfeld, vostre fils, que j'avois eu l'honneur de voir en France lorsqu'il estoit a Poitiers, ou, pendant quinze jours que jay en l'honneur destre avec luy, nous avons eu quelque entretien ensemble sur des affaires que beaucoup de raisons ne me permettent pas descrire, et que je reserve a vous dire de bouche. ————— to the KING.

1689, Dec. 25.— . . . “ I think it my duty to lay before you the desperate condition you are brought into, by the flatterers, knaves, and villains you have the misfortune to employ.” The seamen, the Army, Parliament, and Scotland are disaffected.

The causes are: first, "gathering together King James's army, which was dispersed," and refusing honest men; next, many of King James's friends have been received into his councils, and the former evil Ministers are employed. "The whole Town is filled with infamous stories how they sell all employments more publicly, and with less shame, than in either of the two last reigns." They would have vested the regal power in the Queen alone, &c. "This spirit that is risen up against you is spread over England, as well as about the town." The Militia should be employed to prevent risings.

"There is another part of your conduct which hath been of great prejudice to you, that you have carried yourself with such coldness, slowness, and indifference, in all business, and between all parties, [that] the hands and the hearts of your friends have been thereby weakened, and your enemies strengthened against you."

"The proposal of settling a revenue by Act of Parliament upon the Princess Anne of Denmark was fortunate for your Majesty, for thereby you saw the number of your friends. . . . The design was plain, to give the Princess a great revenue and make her independent upon your Majesty, that she might be the head of a party against you. This was laboured by the Tories and High Churchmen, and carried for you by the honest old Whig interest;" &c.

[MRS. VILLIERS TO MRS. LUNDEE.]

[1693,           ,] Friday night.—“Pray write to my Lord Shrewsbury, to desire to speak to him tomorrow night, at what hour he pleases, or as soon as it is dark, I would rather. You are to say something to him, if you please, which I will tell you tomorrow morning, but it is nothing of great consequence. Pray let me see you then.”

[MRS. LUNDEE] TO SHREWSBURY.

[1693,           ,] Friday night.—“I received the enclosed this minute; that is excuse enough for me for troubling you with this. I doubt not but you will comply with it, but let me know, however, whether you will or not. Don't take notice that you are sent to, at least till I see you.”

MRS. LUNDEE TO SHREWSBURY.

[1693,           ,] Friday morning.—“I considered last night at least as long, my Lord, as you did, and I must confess grew every moment more and more of your opinion; therefore I earnestly ask your pardon for all I said to persuade you to the contrary, for I was so apprehensive of the agony your denial will give her that I did not give myself leave to reflect enough upon the great uneasiness it's very possible it would involve you in. But my Lord, if I had continued in the same mind you left me, yet sure you could not judge so wrong of me as to think I would not use all my endeavours to appease her, though I was too angry then to tell you so; but I would not have you believe that all my thoughts were upon this subject, for I had a thousand fears after you were gone that you might not get safe home; but I am so glad to hear you are well that it gives me new strength to undertake this terrible journey, for I know I am sincerely your Lordship's humble servant."

* This paper is along with several warrants dated 1694, and was probably used as a precedent.

On the dorse: "This letter must be burnt for several reasons. I'll write to you when I get to London, though I know not very well what direction will bring it safe to your hands."

[MRS. VILLIERS TO SHREWSBURY.]

[1693, .] Monday morning.—"I am not vain enough, my Lord, to hope any reason I can give could change you, but flying from hearing is a proof to me, as I am sure it is to yourself, that you are in the wrong; for why should your temper carry you from things your judgment brings you to? at least, why should you show so much weakness where the nation is concerned, for the first time? I must say I am sorry for it, for I could 'a thought you not in the right with more satisfaction before I heard you than I do now. If you have reason, stay; if you have none but what I heard, come, and be convinced. I know your character so well that I writ[e], which I would not do but to yourself, for to have it known is improper, though my design is justice. If you don't change, it is impossible to think you believe me; and when I am convinced of that, I can resent at least in my thoughts equal to the injury in your opinion. If you come back, I wish your ease, which I can't but say I expect. Since you could resolve to go, you need not fear being persuaded. If not, I shall say that, that in a compliment I am only obliged to do, that I am your Lordship's humble servant.

"I don't doubt you will burn this the moment you receive it."

Endorsed by Shrewsbury: Letters to persuade me to be Secretary the second time, from Mrs. Lundee and others.

[MRS. LUNDEE] TO SHREWSBURY.

[1693, .]—"I flew with your letter, and though there was enough said to engage her [Mrs. Villiers] to grant your request, yet I'll vow I was forced to beg heartily you may be excused from seeing the King. She has faithfully promised you shall not, and I don't wonder, since you are resolved not to serve him, that you avoid seeing him. She is going to Kingsington at 5 a clock. I shall hear the King's answer. If you have any curiosity to know it, appoint what time you can come to me, and you shall hear it, for I am to give it you. I am at dinner, therefore forgive this. I am in great joy that you will be plagued no more, for, as I am a Christian, I believe they are very near their destruction."

MRS. VILLIERS to [SHREWSBURY].

[1693,       ,] Monday. night.—(This is printed by Coxe, p. 19, except the following passage in the middle of the letter.)

“I know I am undone unless it succeed, but I am but a little part of England, and I am willing to be the first, since I am persuaded the whole will follow soon without you. I am sure he [the King] has not passion enough left to forgive so great a disappointment, if this fail, which can't be.”

Ends :—“This will engage me to be, what I have wished extremely, your Lordship's humble servant,

“ELIZA: VILLIERS.”

[MRS. LUNDEE] to SHREWSBURY.

[1693,       ,] evening, half an hour after nine.—“I know I torment you, but as I hope to be saved, it's none of my fault; for Mrs. Villars came to my lodgings this evening, but, missing me at home, she never rested till she found me, and begged I would be once more persuaded to trouble you in desiring I may see you this night for a quarter of an hour; because she is willing I should let you know something of that she designs to say to you herself, before you see her; for the King is, I find, perfectly fond of you, and has desired her to speak to you herself, which she intends, if you will meet her here tomorrow, at half an hour after four a clock. She is straitened in point of time, and can't allow it to be later. I know I have writ nonsense, but I have the chollick, and can't help it. I wish, though, I could see you tonight, that you may have more time to consider, for you will be much pressed.”

On the dorse : “Let me know as soon as you can, if you will do what you are desired, as to coming here.”

[SHREWSBURY] to MRS. VILLIERS.

[16]93, Nov. 24.—(This is printed by Coxe, p. 21, but he gives the date as 4 Nov., erroneously. It is an autograph draft, in which the following passage, among others, is struck out.)

“I am in all the confusion imaginable, Madame, to make difficulties upon a thing that so many others of greater merit than I can pretend to would rejoice at. I have more gratitude than one can express to the King for the favourable thoughts he has of me, and no less obligation to you for having interested yourself so far in it.” (This is at the beginning, before “It is impossible,” &c.)

[MRS. LUNDEE to SHREWSBURY.]

[1693,] Nov. 28.—(The greater portion of this letter is printed by Coxe, p. 21, under the erroneous date of Nov. 10. He omits the following passage, at the end.)

“There is [are] some resolutions to be taken this night, which as soon as I know you shall hear. You must burn the lady's two letters. She makes it your request; she believes it's all you will grant her; you are an ill natured devil, and so adieu. Be sure you burn all mine. I believe she will expect to see my letters<sup>o</sup>; therefore if you have anything to say you would not have her know, write it upon another piece of paper. Forgive this long letter. You may bear with it in the country, where, in this weather, you can have no diversion but drinking strong ale with the parson.

“Your letter came safe to my hands this morning.”

[Mrs. LUNDEE] to SHREWSBURY.

[1693,] Dec. 1.—(The greater portion of this letter is printed by Coxe, p. 24, but he omits the following lines at the end.)

“It's past two a clock, and I am so sleepy the pen is ready to drop out of my hand; let that make some excuse for all this stuff. I have a great deal to tell you when I see you. Direct your letter for Mrs. Mary Ghrimes.”

Addressed: For the Earl of Shrewsbury, at his house at Eyford, near Stow.

“I don't doubt but you will burn my letter.”

Endorsed: Mrs. Villiers's letter.

[Mrs. LUNDEE to SHREWSBURY.]

[1693,] Dec. 2, London.—“I never had a letter that was more welcome than your last, for the irresolution you seem to have now makes me hope you will soon fix upon what all your friends thinks [think] so highly your interest to accept of. Mrs. Villars is so pleased to find there is the least abatement of your terrible obstinacy, as she calls it, that it has made her lose all the remains of her resentments against you, and indeed express herself after such a manner in your favour that, partial as I am for you, I know not how to tell you the particulars till I can be sure you will do something more to merit it from her; and the consequence of that, my Lord, will give you the ease you are so sincere to own you want now; for, granting retirement may be more agreeable to your temper, yet your judgment will always upbraid you for neglecting to use those talents that Providence has given you a purpose to be beneficial to the rest of mankind; and sure they must be favourites of Heaven who is [are] qualified for so noble an end as serving their country, and doing of good to thousands o[f] people. But I am afraid, my Lord, my earnestness for the good of the whole has extremely injured myself, and instead of the acknowledgments you are pleased to make me in your letter, I wish you had given me your pardon for intermeddling to the degree I have done in this affair; for I have both

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1693[-4], March 18, Kensington.—“Committee of Council.

“Sir Paul Ricaut's letter to Mr. Vernon of the 9th of March was read, and directions given to know more particulars of what the Swissers are who desire to go for Ireland.

“The petition of Guernsey being read, my Lord Monmouth's officers are to be directed to go to their command[s] there. And care is already taken for most of their other demands.

“Upon representation of the Ordnance, the order of Council is resolved to be recalled, and the victuallers are to be directed in Council to do the service.

“Pierre Guerin to be sent for.

“And the officers of the Admiralty are ordered to make a report of the complaint of the Commissioners of Sick, and to lay it before his Majesty here.

“These two last things were directed by his Majesty to the Lords of the Admiralty by word of mouth.

“And also that ships should be sent to intercept the corn ships.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, March 25, Kensington.—“Committee. King, Lord Steward, Lord Keeper, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Rochester, Lord Sidney, Mr. Secretary, Sir Ed. Seymour, Mr. Russell.

“The letter of the Admiralty of the 24th of March, concerning the Com[missioners] of Sick and Wounded, being read, the Lords of the Admiralty were directed to make a full and distinct report of the whole accusation, whereas this is but one particular.

“Mr. Secretary informs me that Consul Butts' proposal for some small ships in the North Seas has heretofore been laid before this Committee.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, April 8, Kensington.—“Committee. The King, Lord Privy Seal, Lord President, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Sydney, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Godolphin, Mr. Russell, Mr. Secretary, Sir Ed. Seymour.

“A letter from the Commissioners of Sick and Wounded, dated the 6th of April, 94, directed to me, and a paper delivered in to me by Doctor Wellwood, endeavouring to prove a trade with France upon Wm. Churchil and 'S. Alston.

“The Lords of the Admiralty were ordered that a ship should be sent to bring over these [those?] prisoners that could be depended upon not to trade.

[HENRY, LORD] CAPEL, [Lord Justice of Ireland,] to SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] April 12, Dublin Castle.—“I was much surprised by my Lord Canterbury's the last post, who tells me the Bishop of Lincoln's (sic) comes not over to be Archbishop here; which I explain to be that the good Bishop has been drilled on, with such a hopes, till my Lord Chancellor [Sir Charles Porter] and our friend Lord S[ydney?] has obtained it for the Bishop of Kildaire. My Lord, if this be true, you will signally serve the King by putting a stop to it, for there cannot be a more dangerous man to frustrate the ends (sic) I am sure I aim at, which is, to heal all parts in order to a fuller strength amongst ourselves, to oppose our common enemy. Lord Keeper [Somers] will give you a fuller account of him from my former letters, and [I] doubt not but will join with you. Besides, my Lord, let the King depend upon it, he is a rank Jacobite.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, April 15, Kensington.—“King, Lord Keeper, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chancellor, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Rochester, Lord Godolphin, Sir Ed. Sey[mour], Mr. Secretary, Mr. Russel, Lord President, Lord Portland, Lord Sydney.

“The Dutch Amb[assador's] letter to Mr. Secretary being read and delivered to me, I was ordered to take care that if any of the men were detained, the Admiralty should see them released.

“The Swedish Secretary's memorial being read, to desire a pass for the Wyn fatt (?), I was directed to speak with him, to see if it would give any satisfaction to the Court of Swedland in case it were granted.

“Lady Wheeler's petition was read and ordered to be referred to the Admiralty, to know what may be done by the rules of the Navy.

“I represented from the Com[missioners] of the Post Office that so many privateers were between the Dutch coast and Harwich, that the packet-boat could not pass, and they doubted much (?) that another boat was lost. Nothing was ordered upon it.

“The Lords of the Ad[miralty] delivered their report upon the Com[missioners] of Sick and Wounded, and upon the petition of the Com[missioners] they are ordered to be heard at a Committee, when the whole Council are to be summoned.

“The Turkey merchants being called in, desire their ships that have escaped may go forwards. They complain of my Lord Paget's raising money upon them, and desire to know, if any should resolve to venture again, whether they may have a convoy about September. They were directed by the King himself to resolve among themselves, and then apply to the Government, and they need not question but everything possible would be done to support that trade.

“They press hard that their ships in the Straits might take their venture and go on, but nothing is resolved upon that till the foreign news arrives, there being now three posts wanting.”

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1694, April 17, Whitehall.—“Yours of the 12th of April, which I received this morning, has given me an occasion to acknowledge the favour of that of the 14th of the last month. . . I should very carefully and zealously have represented your thoughts to his Majesty, but that I conclude what you apprehended has not happened, for the Gazette has informed me that the Archbishop of Cassells is removed to Dublin, and my Lord of Canterbury and my Lord Keeper tell me, since the Bishop of Lincoln declined it, they think it is well disposed. . . .

“I cannot but think that a Parliament would much conduce to the satisfaction and settlement of that kingdom, and might be so managed by your prudence and popularity, which are both much extolled here, that the heats of the last Session might be avoided.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, April 22, Kensington.—“King, Lord Keeper, Lord President, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Rochester, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Godolphin, Lord Sydney, Mr. Russel, Mr. Secretary.

“Being proposed that a Parliament in Ireland should be called, Mr. Secretary was directed to write to the Justices to deliver their opinion whether the Parliament will insist upon the right of beginning Money Bills, as they did the last Sessions.

“The Turkey merchants again press that their ships with any small convoy may proceed on their voyage.”

In Shrewsbury's hand.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] April 29, Dublin Castle.—“This bearer, my Lord, Chief Justice Pine, I can better intrust in acquainting your Lordship with my thoughts in calling a Parliament, than anything of my own expressions; for he is true to the interest we professed in this Revolution, and knows my thoughts thereupon. You must bear with the warmth with which his temper is attended, which none can better allay than yourself, and then I am sure the public will be benefited by your conferences, and I shall be satisfied that I have done good offices to my country by bringing you acquainted.

“Mr. Armeror has delays in his own business, caused by the mismanagement of friends, but in time I hope your desires shall be observed.

[P.S.] “I desire you will give credit to Sir Rob. King, who is a man of great virtue and true to this interest.”

Re. the 19th of May, 1694.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, May 3, Bretania, at St. Helen's.—“I confess 'tis a very ill excuse to my dear Lord Shrousbury to tell him business has hindered me from doing what I suppose all London has done, wishing you joy of what I read in the Gazet; but I am very sure, and I hope you believe me, that no friend or servant you have in the world is more sincerely delighted at what pleases you than myself; and [if] 'twas possible to wish a man better fortune in every respect than I do myself, 'tis to you I would wish it; and that I may live to see some of the race of a man I from my heart love, I hope you will enter into the honourable state of matrimony, provided you can find a woman whose fortune will considerably add to yours. So much for this subject.

“I won't trouble [you] much with our sea affairs; what I have to say, you will see it from Sir Armstead (?); but I am going to sea with the ships [of which?] I sent a list up, and it has been a trial of my diligence to get them ready, though the King thinks me lazy. The want of paying the Fleet in due time has been a most horrid trouble to me. I could not bring myself to carry ships to sea, and the men unpaid, when hundred[s] of poor women was [were] waiting for their husbands' money, to support their children and families.

“I am afraid,” &c. [The rest is printed by Coxe.]

Re. May the 4th.

THE DUKE OF SHREWSBURY TO MR. SECRETARY BLATHWAYT.*

[16]94, May 8, London.—“I hope this will find you safely arrived on the other side the water, and the inconveniency at land recompensed by a good passage at sea. On the 5th of this month two foreign packets arrived together, and bring little worth communicating to you, except some expressions in a letter from Mr. [James]† Cressett, dated Zell, the 24th of April, which possibly may be worth his Majesty's being acquainted with. His words are these:—

“I was yesterday at W[al]cheren, where the Duke (who is always pleased to be free in his discourse) talked much to me concerning his bad neighbours the Danes, telling me he greatly wondered how any of the Allies could in the least entertain the smallest hopes of doing any good with that Court, which expected only French money to begin a new diversion in these parts. His jealousies making him ever uneasy on that point, his Highness is apt to apprehend a too favourable disposition in England and Holland for that Crown. I was more surprised when his Highness began to argue very zealously for peace, and told me he thought the Allies ought to give some sort of Project for it, before the campaign began.'

"I find by Mr. Greg's letter of the 24th of April from Copenhagen that he has given you the same account he has sent to me of the corn ships designing to part very suddenly from those parts. I have given the Admiralty an account of it, but whether they have ships, or power to dispose of them, to do any such service, I cannot determine. As soon as I have an opportunity I shall also lay it before her Majesty, and think it would be of great use if the French could be disappointed of this supply.

"My Lord Faulkland has applied to me to prepare his warrants and other papers for his dispatch to Holland. I perceive he expects, and I suppose his Majesty will make no difficulty, to allow him the same [as] was given to my Lord Durseley, viz. five pounds a day as Envoyé, and three as Plenipotentiary. However, not having received his Majesty's directions as to the last three pounds a day, I shall acquaint the Queen with the difficulty, and without her express commands proceed no farther in it, till I receive his Majesty's orders by you, which I desire may be as soon as conveniently you can.

"Some days before the King went away, my Lord President [Duke of Leeds] told me he had intelligence one Peirson, a Doctor of Physic, a short black man, about forty-five years of age, that lived at Amsterdam, had a design to get himself made one of the King's Physicians, in order to do him a mischief." . . .

WILLIAM BLATHWAYT, Secretary of State, to SHREWSBURY.

1694, May 8-18, Hague.—"Having by his Majesty's commands signified his pleasure to Mr. Secretary Trenchard relating to the Fleet, I have nothing more to present to your Grace than the enclosed account of his Majesty's safe arrival here."

Re. the 11th of May.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, May 9, Whitehall.—"Lord Keeper, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Shrewsbury, Mr. Secretary.

"To speak to the Queen that there may be directions to the Admiralty that some ships be sent to intercept the corn-ships from Flickero, and the Admiralty give an account what ships they have to employ upon such service.

"Memorandum: this day was the first time that I was at any meeting concerning the attempt upon Brest; and being now probable that the French squadron is out, and no other service appearing of great consequence to be done there, it is my opinion, and I have so delivered it, that nothing of the Brest preparation should delay the sending the Squadron into the Mediterranean, that being, in my opinion, the service that deserves preference.”

In Shrewsbury's hand.

[SHREWSBURY] to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

[1694,] May 11, Whitehall.—Sends a copy of a letter from the Lords of the Admiralty as to what they are able to do in order to intercept the corn ships. As our own ships will not be sufficient, it would be well if his Majesty could order some Dutch ships to join them. Powers are being sent to Mr. Stepney for his negociation. “I have seen nobody whose relations [reports] are more exact and ingenious than his; so that, without being personally acquainted with him, I cannot but think him very deserving of the King's favour. . . . I still have frequent applications from the Duke of Bolton in favour of Codrington to have the West India Regiment, formerly commanded, I think, by Floyd.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, May 11-21, Hague.—“The King is gone this morning early to Loo, whither I am following as soon as the post shall be dispatched.

“His Majesty is treating with the Dukes of Wolfembu[t]tle for some troops, and is therefore pleased to direct that a full power be sent me under the Great Seal of England to conclude such a treaty, according to the enclosed memorial. It is necessary that the commission be dated at least the same day this arrives. I shall continue to send to your Grace his Majesty's letters for the Queen.

[P.S.] “The Dauphin is to command the army in Fländers this campaign, but the time of his coming is put off for a fortnight longer than was at first intended.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, May 14, Whitehall.—“Lord Keeper, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Rumney, Mr. Secretary.

“It is my opinion that any way should be taken that forwards the ships to Mr. Russell, for fear the Straits service should suffer, which seems much more probable and important than that of Brest.

“The Flux is ordered to sail from Spitehead to join Mr. Russell, those ships unpaid as well as those paid, and to take the money and clerks, and pay them as they sail.

“A letter to Mr. Russell, if the wind stands southerly, to remain at Torbay; if the wind comes westwardly, to come to Spitehead or stay as he shall think fit.

“Mr. Talmash to be himself trusted with the service of the Mediterranean.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, May 12 [14]-24, Loo.—“I have read your Grace’s letter of the 8th instant to the King, so that his Majesty has taken notice of what is therein mentioned to be written to your Grace by Mr. Cresset. As for the corn ships that are coming from Denmark, his Majesty is very desirous they should be intercepted, and would have the necessary orders given in it in England. His Majesty does likewise think fit that my Lord Faulkland have the same entertainment in all respects as my Lord Dursley.

“We do not hear of any such as Dr. Pierson, but after the caution that has been given by your Grace, there is no fear of his coming into his Majesty’s service.

“By the last post I signified his Majesty’s pleasure to your Grace that full powers should be sent for me to conclude a treaty (in concert with the Commissioners appointed by the States) with the Duke (sic) of Wolfembuttle for some troops. His Majesty continues his resolution that such powers be dispatched, but now thinks fit that Mr. Wolseley’s name be inserted in them instead of mine, he being in the same quality and station as Mons. Dyckvelt, who is to sign with him in behalf of the States.

[P.S.] “The King has ordered an encampment of the new Regiments of Horse and Dragoons on Hounslow Heath, for which his Majesty’s pleasure is now signified to the Duke of Schonburg.”

Endorsed: 14-24 [May]. R. May the 19th.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

[1694,] May 15, Whitehall.—Will dispatch powers under the Great Seal for concluding a treaty with the Duke (sic) of Wolfenbuttle. “Mr. Cresset’s of the 8th of May, which I have just now received, acknowledges the receipt of a letter I writ to him by his Majesty’s particular direction upon a design proposed as I conceive by Mr. Schuts, with one also to Sir Paul Ricaut, which Mr. Cresset has sent forward, and I find thinks the thing so feasible that he is in great hopes of it succeeding.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, May 17-27, Loo.—“No letters being come out of England since those of the 8th inst., his Majesty has only commanded me to signify his pleasure to your Grace that two of the Acts desired by Mons. Schutz should be immediately dispatched and sent over, viz., the Ratification of the Treaty of Ratzebourg, and the Act of Guaranty of that Treaty, which is to be conceived in such terms as are usual on the like occasions. The Act of Possession his Majesty does not think fit, at least for the present, to order.

“Our stay here is like to be until Monday next, and the day after the King will be early at Breda.”

Re. May the 22nd.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

[16]94, May 18, Whitehall.—Prosperous beginning of Mr. Russell at sea. Sends the powers for Blathwayt to treat with the Dukes (sic) of Wolfenbottle. “Harry Killegrew has just been with me, and is much alarmed that he should be left out of the Commission of Hackney Coaches after the directions his Majesty had once given to provide for him. He desires he may be mentioned to the King, lest his condition be forgot.”

Autograph draft.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, May 22, Whitehall.—The ratification of the treaty of Ratzbourg, &c., shall be dispatched. Sends the powers for Mr. Wolseley. “By a letter of Mr. Stepney’s of the 11th of May, and by a copy of one from Count Kinski to him from Vienna, I find there is some possibility of a treaty of peace between the Emperor, the Poles, and the Turks, and that Count Kinski wishes a minister from the King were at that Court. I have therefore this morning given my Lord Lexington an account of it, to hasten his attendance upon his Majesty, to be in a readiness in case his immediate dispatch to Vienna should be thought useful.

“My Lord Faulkland is taken ill of the small pox. Her Majesty has signed his warrant for those allowances the King has directed; but if he escapes with life, it will be impossible that he can in a considerable time be in a condition to appear in Holland.

“Col. Fitzpatrick having assured me that he has had his Majesty’s promise, and kissed his hand some time since, for the government of Landguard Fort, I offered the commission to her Majesty; but it being a thing she was not acquainted with, for greater security she was pleased to direct that I should know the King’s pleasure upon it from you.

“Last night I had the good fortune to seize Col. Parkér; and having heard that there was formerly something said at the trial of Granfeild as if he had a design to assassinate the King, if any such evidence can be got against him, it would be of great service I [think?] certainly to send those persons over, for nobody can doubt but he knows a great deal of the Jacobite designs here; and most people believe that if he were pressed he is not so incapable of fear but that he might be prevailed upon to confess. I [am] just come from examining him, but he denies all, and is gone to the Tower.

“I have this day received a letter from the Admiralty, whereof this is the copy, which will inform you concerning the squadron they design to intercept the corn ships. I must again add that I wish some of the Dutch might be ordered to join them.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, [May 22-] June 1, s.n., Breda.—“My last to your Grace was of the 17-27th past, since which time I have received and read to the King your Grace’s letters of the 11th, 15th, and 18th.

His Majesty has been here attended by the Pensioner and Mons. de Wildt, Secretary of the Admiralty of Amsterdam, (as with most of the men of business of Holland), with whom he has consulted what may be most fit to be done for the intercepting the corn ships from the Sound; and has thereupon commanded me to signify his pleasure to your Grace that, if it can be done, a further number of ships be added on our side to those designed for the Broad Fourteens by the Commissioners of the Admiralty; and that all those ships, or so many as can be spared for this service, be ordered to sail and keep their station towards that end of the Broad Fourteens that lies nearest the coast of Holland, eight leagues from the shore, or as near that distance as may be judged safest for them, where they will be joined as soon as possible by four or five Dutch men-of-war, which are ordered to be got ready and to sail thither. His Majesty thinks it of great importance that these ships be intercepted, but has reason to believe their convoy will be very strong, for which we ought to provide accordingly.

“The King has seen some letters from Mr. Cresset and Sir P. Rycaut concerning the business your Grace is pleased to mention, wherein they give good hopes of success.

“I have dispatched the commission to Mr. Stepney, but have not as yet any order from his Majesty to alter his character. The notification being now come to his Majesty from the new Elector of Saxony of his brother's death, his Majesty thinks fit that the Court at Whitehall do go into such mourning as is proper for the occasion; which your Grace will please to represent to her Majesty.

“The King has seen the account of the burning of the French ships in Bertaume Bay, and likes the action very well.

“His Majesty has not yet declared his pleasure how the West India Regiment shall be disposed of, nor whether Harry Killigrew shall have a place in the Commission for Hackney Coaches, but seems to intend one for Wat. Overbury.

“Enclosed is the Treaty of Ratzbourg in the original, as it was given me by Mons. Schutz” [not here].

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

[16]94, May 23, Whitehall.—“I have sent two letters so unluckily, one of the 5th and another of the 19th of May, that I doubt they are neither come to your hands; and you appear to have reason to blame me for not acknowledging your kind letter of the 3rd. The clearing myself from this appearance of an omission to one I would not have suspect me one minute is occasion sufficient for me to give you this trouble; but, besides, I think myself obliged to acquaint you that upon the 19th of this month, I received a letter from the King dated the 14th, from Loo, which has no other business in it but to recommend to me the doing all in my power to hasten your going to the Straits. His very words are, that one can no longer doubt but the ships gone from Brest are joined with those from Rochfort, and sailed into the Mediterranean; and that therefore you ought to lose no time in following them, which he depends upon me to press you to do with all speed, though it is not immediately in my province; and that you would commit the execution of the design upon Brest to the squadron you have in these seas. He repeats again in his letter that it is necessary above all things that the Straits squadron lose no time before they sail, for if they do, they will certainly come too late to hinder the designs of the enemy in those seas. Such an account of his Majesty's disposition I thought could be no disservice to you."

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1694, [May 24-] June 3, Breda.—“We are just going to the Camp at Bethlehem, where his Majesty will be this evening.

[P.S.] “Mr. Wolseley has just now delivered me the enclosed letter, to which he gives much credit [not here].

“The King orders me to explain to your Grace that the end of the Broad Fourteens, within eight leagues of which our ships are to have their station and to meet the Dutch, is intended to be the nearest end to the Mase.”

Re. the 30th of May, o.s.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, May 25, Whitehall.—“Having received her Majesty's letter to enclose, I will add these few lines to acquaint you that yesterday my Lord Faulkland died. The employment the King designed him being profitable, easy, and honorable, I conclude there will many pretenders appear. Sir Scroop How has already mentioned it to me, but I much doubt whether the King would approve of him for that post, and whether his Majesty would resolve to send anybody upon an expense that seems very unnecessary, at least this summer.” Sends a letter from Admiral Russel, &c.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] May 26, Saturday, Bretania.—Sends a copy of his letter to Mr. Secretary Trenchard.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SEC. TRENCHARD.

1694, May 26, St. Hellin's.—. . . “A small breeze of wind coming northerly, I have now made the signal for unmooring. I hope we shall have more, and then we shall be gone before night. I think, 15 or 20 days after we are departed from the land, 'twill be convenient that all the dispatch be made to hasten the necessary quantity of provisions. When I speak of provisions I do not mean beer; that will be unnecessary. The credit I formerly mentioned must not be long delayed; that is the least sum that can be provided, besides short-allowance money; for if any accident happens to us in our passage, not to be foreseen, credit will be then wanting, though I hope, upon an extraordinary occasion, my own credit in those parts may help us upon a pinch.

“Admiral Almonde has been with me, and though he is the obedient’s (sic) man imaginable to any commands of her Majesty’s, this matter he says is not in his power to comply with, not having any ships with him fit to supply the room of those wanting; nor has he provisions to supply them with; but he questions not the ships wanting will be here the first wind, and I have given him the last rendezvous for them to come to before we enter the Straits. I hope they may come time enough. He will leave a ship here to meet them, with orders to prevent their coming into this place. He has ordered one ship more of 72 guns, which is all he can do. He is extremely concerned lest the Queen should be displeas’d with him, but I have taken the liberty to assure him she would not, since ’tis not in his power to do otherwise. He will write to you on this subject, and I have promised to do the same.

“Now we are going, give me leave to offer to you my opinion. I shall not speak upon the business of the Straits; in that I assure you what service I am able to perform there, I will not be wanting. But those ships designed to Brest with the land-men, how successful they may be nobody can make a judgment; but ’tis to be feared that since the delay has been so much greater than could be expected or imagined, it has given the enemy time, upon the alarm, to make preparations to oppose them. Therefore may it not be convenient that the General [Thomas Tollemache] should not be tied up too strictly by his orders, that in case he has the good fortune to do service there, he may also have liberty, if approved of by a council of war of general officers, both of land and sea, to attempt any other place that by good information they may hope for success upon? Or, in case the opposition they meet with at Brest be so great that they can hope for little success, why may they not run to Port Louis, where I am told it is feasible to destroy, if not their ships, their magazines of stores? . . .

“Since the men are embarked, all things necessary provided, and the world full of expectations, they certainly ought not to return without attempting something that may be of benefit to the nation; and this number of men cannot be of that consequence to the King in Flanders as they may prove to him this summer in annoying the enemy on [in?] their marine ports.”. . .

Copy. Re. 28.

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, [May 28-] June 7, s.n., Bethlehem Abbey.—“I have read your Grace’s letter of the 22nd past to the King, who has ordered me to inform yourself whether any of the witnesses at Grandval’s trial have anything to say against Parker, wherein your Grace may be further satisfied in two or three posts.

“The King does think fit to give Col. Fitzpatrick the command of Land-Guard Fort as former Governors have had it. His Majesty is sorry to find the Commissioners of the Admiralty have lessened the number of the ships designed for the intercepting the corn vessels, it being thought that the French will have no less than a squadron for the convoy, to consist of their own ships and privateers, or of their own and some of the Danes and perhaps Swedes jointly.

“The Treaty with the Dukes of Wolfembuttle is signed by Mr. Wolseley, according to the powers sent him, and by the Minister of those Dukes, as it had been before by the Commissioners of the States. His Majesty commands me to send the enclosed copy and the defensive treaty mentioned in it to your Grace, together with an estimate of the charge of these troops, that they may be communicated to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, with his Majesty’s directions that his Majesty’s part of the subsidies and of the daily pay, which is two thirds of the whole, may be transmitted to Mr. Hill and paid over to him according to the Treaty, those troops being already come within few days’ march of this place.

“The French give out that they will have a stronger army in these parts than they had the last year, though they do not yet seem to intend any enterprise, but take most care to preserve the forage, of which there is very little to be found in Brabant. This occasions his Majesty’s keeping the cavalry at a distance as long as may be, the want of forage being the greatest difficulty we can foresee this campaign.

[P.S.] “Just now a gentleman is come from the Elector, who is at Brussels, to inform the King that salvoes are heard from all the French garrisons, which makes it feared the French have gained some considerable advantage in Catalonia, either by a battle or taking of a town.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, May 29, Whitehall.—“I have received yours of the 22nd of May—1st of June, and immediately signified his Majesty’s pleasure to the Adm[iralty] that a further number of ships if possible should be added to those designed for the Broad Fourteens. I acquainted them with the station his Majesty directed they should keep, the number of ships it was hoped the Dutch would join with them, and that the convoy they were expected to meet was designed very strong. I have also discoursed with some of the Board, who allege ships for cruising are very scarce with them, but they will do all they can to comply with his Majesty’s commands, and return me an answer, which as soon as I receive I will by the first post give you an account of.

“I have acquainted her Majesty that the notification is come to the King of the Elec[tor] of Saxony’s death, upon which the Court I suppose will be all (?) in mourning the next Sunday. Upon this occasion I will observe to you what the Bishop of Salisbury told me out of his reading and remarks upon the Order of the Garter, that it has been an ancient settled maxim of the Sovereigns of that Order not to dispose of Garters from father to son, from elder brother to younger, or to continue them successively in a House without intermission, to avoid the claim that else some of the great families might have crept into of expecting that as a right which it was always in the King's power to bestow as a favour. The reason appears to be very good, and though I know it has sometimes been practised otherwise upon extraordinary occasions, yet I thought it worth setting down here, as an ill (?) excuse for the King to this Elec[tor], in case there is anybody else he has a greater desire to confer that honour upon.

“The five Irishmen who were condemned as pirates and reprieved, when four others were executed for the same fact, have petitioned her Majesty to be pardoned or transported, they lying here in misery and at the charge of the Government for their maintenance in gaol. By their being saved when the others suffered it is to be presumed they were not designed to die; but the Queen, not knowing what the King designed to have done with them, commanded me to write to you for his Majesty's pleasure.

“I am extremely inportuned to know his Majesty's commands upon a petition from Mr. Fitzgeralds, Irishmen and Papists, who, having served the late King in Ireland during that war in civil, not military, employments, stand now outlawed; but, having no estate in Ireland, but considerable effects abroad, one as a merchant, the other as a lawyer, are desirous to return to their native country; and to show that it is not to save anything, they have forfeited them; but merely to return and live quietly at home, they are willing to convey all their estate real and personal in the kingdom of Ireland to his Majesty.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1694, May 29, Whitehall.—“I suppose Mr. Sec. Trenchard has returned you an answer to yours of the 26th. I cannot see how the Queen can be advised, without consulting the King, to dispose of those seven regiments contrary to what he designed them; but I suppose that will be no hindrance to the service, since his Majesty's letter will undoubtedly arrive and find Mr. Talmash before he can have occasion for any fresh orders. We are here very solicitous about the wind, and when that comes fair, I shall not be less in pain for the success and safety of our dear Mr. Russell.

[P.S.] “Mr. Vernon has an information that he did not dare but send you, though I do not find he, no more than I, give[s] entire credit to the matter.”

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SEC. TRENCHARD.

[16]94, May 29, St. Hellin's.—“The wind is now fair, and we are going. I hope we shall have good luck, both those to Brest and to the Straits; but I must observe to you before we go, that I would make as few complaints as 'twas possible, since I saw they would produce no effect; and the delays, being the only subject I should then have spoken upon, were not to be remedied. But now you must give me leave to write freely my thoughts. I apprehend by the delay the alarm in France will occasion a great resistance at Brest, but I hope it may have no other effect than their not being able to perform service so considerably as in all probability they might have done if they had gone in any degree within the time proposed, but 'tis now five weeks later. I am sure Mr. Tallmach will perform what is possible to be done.

"We are going but with five bomb-vessels, and shells for the mortars that will not hold playing above four days at most, [and] machine vessels without powder, though we have by contrary winds stayed so much longer than was designed; nor have I heard, nor anybody else, when they may be expected. By this means I am like to go without a bomb-vessel, which for aught I know might have proved very serviceable. Where the fault lies I won't take upon me to determine, nor is it my business, more than to be sorry things of this nature are carried on by the proper officers with no more dispatch.

"A squadron's going to the Straits cannot now be a secret, for it has been so far from being so that I am told a month since 'twas reported as a thing determined. I hope the French won't give credit to this piece of news; if they do, I fear all we shall perform will be to send the Turkey ships up, and show we are masters of those seas. I beg you will let me hear from you as often as possible, and desire you will send your letters to the Consul of Alicant till August; then we must be drawing to Cadiz, for the great ships ought to be home early in September, at least, I think so. You will let me know the King's pleasure for my proceedings. Twenty thousand pounds' credit will not suffice, if the victuallers do not send credit for short allowance-money, which will come to near 4 or 5,000*l.* per month; the men ought not to want this to preserve their health.

"I here enclose you the orders I have left with my Lord Berkley; if any part of't (sic) be not agreeable with her Majesty's thoughts, you will be pleased to alter it, and I hope you will send often from Falmouth or Plymouth to them.

"I here also send a copy of the order for the Admiralty, which you will please to let be delivered when you judge a proper time, as also a list of the ships I carry to the Straits, for as yet I have taken no notice to them of the design. When you think it convenient, pray let them know both, it being for the service they should be acquainted with it, when you believe 'tis no longer necessary the names and qualities of the ships should be unknown. Some ships that are designed for the Fleet are not yet arrived; 'twill be I think convenient they should be hastened away to Brest.

[P.S.] "The Dutch from Amsterdam that are to go with me have but six weeks' provisions on board; the rest they expect in the ships to follow, which is not right." . . .

Copy. R. May the 30th.

ORDERS by ADMIRAL RUSSELL to JOHN, LORD BERKELEY, Admiral of the Blue Squadron.

[16]94, May 29, Britannia, at St. Hellin's.—To proceed to Brest with the land-soldiers under Lieut.-Gen. Talmach. To land the officers and soldiers where it shall be agreed on by a council-of-war. When the service against Brest and the enemy's ships there is performed, it is to be considered whether any further service may be done against any other ports or places. When nothing further can be done, to receive the forces on board again, and return to Torr Bay or Spithead. Part of the seamen to be put ashore to assist the land forces, if necessary.

*In the margin is a list of 40 English ships and 23 Dutch ships.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]94, May 30, St. Helen's, Bretania.—“I here inclose to your Lordship a copy of the orders I shall leave with my Lord Barteley (sic), as also a copy of the letter I send to Mr. Secretary Trenchard. We are very unlucky, having rid here ready to sail since Wednesday night.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, June 1, Whitehall.—“Here enclosed I have sent you the copies of three letters I have received from the Lords of the Admiralty, with my answer to them, by which you will perceive how much they are frightened with the Dunkirk<sup>s</sup> squadron. I hope nothing in these letters will hinder the Dutch from dispatching with all expedition the ships they intend for this service to the station before designed; for if I could have a greater certainty from you than I have yet received, what time they will be ready to join us, the Lords of the Admiralty would not I hope be so cautious as to advise they should then avoid a few privateers, or be alarmed with an invasion from Du Bart, which I am told is part of the information they have received.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, June 4, Whitehall.—“Being obliged to go to Windsor this evening, from whence I doubt I shall hardly return time enough to write by tomorrow's post, you will find this letter of a date a day older than any you will receive by this packet. Having had none from you since the 3rd of June from Breda, I have little to trouble you with, except an information which my Lord Keeper and Mr. Secretary Trenchard have joined with me in opinion it is fit should be communicated to his Majesty. It is from a man who says he has been engaged in several desperate projects of the Jacobites, and was not long since sent out of France with a design to join with others to attempt upon the life of the King; but finding within himself some scruple to act so villainous a part, he made a discovery of it here, by which that plot was defeated, but he not known to be the discoverer; since which time he names* a person who told him, in company of one that lately came from St. German's, that since the design upon the life of the King was detected and prevented,† it was there resolved to try another way, which was, to cause several gentlemen and others of the English and Scotch nations, and some French of seeming quality, to desert from the French army in Flanders, early this campaign, and watch the first opportunity they could find to attempt upon his Majesty's life.‡

“Though villainy is not often accompanied with such a contempt of life as is necessary for an undertaking of this kind, yet since there have been such desperate wretches in the world, and that the fate of us and of Europe seems so much to depend upon the life of one man, one ought to think nothing impossible from a sort of people who I hope now more than ever have reason to despair.

“Whilst I am writing, an information is brought me concerning one la Foulerness, a copy of which I have here enclosed. I will endeavour to have his letters and himself observed; but they likewise tell me that this same man was over before here, and so remarkably busy that he was ordered away by his Majesty's particular direction. He is now come as I understand under the pretence of being governor to the Count de Rantzau, a young man of great quality of Holstein.” . . .

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, June 4-14, St. Hertogendale, or Valduc.—“I have the honour of both your Grace's letters of the 25th and 29th past, which have been laid before his Majesty, who easily believes there will be many applications for the employment at the Hague upon the death of my Lord Faulkland; but his Majesty commands me to let your Grace know that as my Lord himself was not to have gone thither before the winter, so his Majesty has no thoughts of sending anyone else thither before that time. And as for the solicitations of Sir Scroop How, his Majesty would have your Grace endeavour to dissuade him from pursuing them, the nature of the business being such (and if the negociation of peace goes on is like to be much more so) that the employment must needs be too troublesome for Sir Scroop How. This is his Majesty's opinion, as it seems to be your Grace's too. But that there may be somebody at the Hague to do what is necessary in the mean time, his Majesty thinks fit that Mr. Prior, my Lord Dursley's secretary, who has been always very careful in that station, may be continued as the English Secretary, with the usual allowance of 20*s. per diem*, he having, besides other business, the trouble of giving out passports and examining all unknown persons that desire to go for England.

“ His Majesty is pleased to direct that the five Irish who were condemned as pirates and reprieved, be transported as soon as may be; and agrees that the two Fitzgeralds be pardoned and have leave to return home, provided they comply with the conveying to his Majesty all their real and personal estate, as proposed, if there appear no further objection to the contrary.

[P.S.] “ Just now some Boors come in, that say the French army, or part of it, is advanced as far as Flerus; but reports of this kind are not immediately to be believed.

“ The Baron de Leefeldale, who was the chief witness against Granval, is coming to the camp, that I may examine him about Parker.”

Re. the 11th.

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, June 7-17, Valduc Abbey.—“ I have read to the King your Grace's letter of the 1st instant, with all the papers your Grace had sent to and received from the Lords of the Admiralty; which, with what has been written at the same time by Mr. Secretary Trenchard, having been considered by his Majesty, I am commanded to acquaint your Grace that the Dutch ships have already joined ours upon the Broad Fourteens, and will keep the station mentioned in the enclosed paper. But whereas the squadron of Du Bart may be yet stronger than ours, his Majesty's pleasure is that the necessary orders be given that five other ships or more, if there be occasion, be taken from the Channel squadron and added to those now cruising on the Broad Fourteens, for the strengthening of which his Majesty will endeavour to get a proportionable number of some Dutch ships. All which being joined upon the Broad Fourteens, and upon certain intelligence that shall be had of Du Bart's being gone out of Dunkirk towards Fleckeroe, his Majesty thinks fit they should immediately sail thither and attack him, if it may be conveniently done, or else to lie before that port and hinder the coming out of his squadron and of the merchant ships laden with corn that will be there, as 'tis said, to the number of at least one hundred and eighty; which will be a service of the greatest importance, and is thought the most effectual means of preventing so considerable a supply to France, where 'tis so much wanted.

“ The French were not only come to Flerus, according to the intelligence that was brought when I was making my last letter to your Grace, but have since advanced part of their army as far as Gemblours, which is within three hours of this camp. This occasioned his Majesty's sending for the horse, which was cantoned in the neighbouring villages; but the French making no further motion, and our retrenchments (sic) being finished on that side where the Army lay most exposed to a surprise, his Majesty has thought fit, for the better managing the forage, which is very scarce, to send the cavalry back to their villages, after having reviewed this morning the English horse and dragoons, wherewith his Majesty was extremely satisfied.

“We are expecting very soon the Elector of Bavaria with his troops, which being arrived, the whole Army that will be together will make up ninety-nine battalions of foot, and two hundred and twenty squadrons of horse, which, at 600 in a battalion and 150 to a squadron, makes above ninety thousand men. 'Tis not believed, whatever is given out, that the French will be so strong but they intend upon occasion to make use of the Maréchal de Boufflers' flying army, as his Majesty will do in that case of the Brandenburg forces that keep themselves between the Rhine and the Meuse to observe the others. This is the condition we are in, which we cannot but hope, under his Majesty's great conduct, will be attended with good success.”

Re. the 12th. Paper enclosed :—

“In case of separation, the rendezvous shall be at the furthest (northwards) W.N.W., about thirteen leagues from the Texil, and as there shall be occasion a little more southerly, towards the outside of the Broad Fourteenths (sic), to the height of the Maez inclusive, eight or ten leagues distance from the shore.

“From on board the ship Prince of Frizeland under sail, Gravesend bearing S.E. and b. E., distant  $11\frac{1}{2}$  leagues, the 3-13 June, 1694.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, June 8, Whitehall.—The Lords of the Admiralty have ordered the ships cruising upon the Broad Fourteens to return from their station unless they were joined by the Dutch, owing to the intelligence of Du Bart's squadron. Is informed that “this squadron” has taken a Dunkirker of 28 guns, laden with corn. Has communicated to the Lords of the Treasury the estimate for the Duke of Wolfenbuttle's troops, his Majesty's share bring two thirds of the expense; and they have sent for Lord Ranelagh.

“I think myself obliged to repeat what I have heard discoursed lately by some Members of Parliament, well-wishers to his Majesty and his Government, upon the occasion of subsidies in general, and the charge the nation had been at to support the alliances abroad. They said they were now well satisfied that that expense would now be lessened, having been promised by those who managed for his Majesty in the House of Commons this last Sessions that we should for the future pay no more than an equal share with the States General, and not two thirds as before. I made no reply, not being acquainted with the matter of fact, but suppose you can as well as anybody remember how far any for his Majesty did in the House advance such an agreement.

“In case his Majesty shall not think fit to order any Minister immediately to the Hague, it will be necessary that Mr. Prior stay there, and that 20s. a day, or some moderate allowance, be made him during his continuance.

“This morning the Commission for taking subscriptions for the 1,200,000 towards erecting the new Corporation called the Bank of Eng[land] was finished at Council, and there signed by her Majesty. It is generally believed the money will come in apace, but many question what the consequence may be if they grow to such a greatness as they seem to promise themselves.

“Yours of the 7th, s.n., from Bethlem Abbey, is the last I have from you. This day two posts are due, which we wait the arrival of with impatience, and fear of the bad news we expect from Catalonia. I wish we may be recompensed by what we shall now receive from our own fleet, the wind being at last come fair.

“Mr. Vernon tells me he writes you all the news that is here, and I am sure he is more exact than I could pretend to be.”

SEC. BLATHWATT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, June 11-21, Camp near Tirlmont.—“I have laid before his Majesty the information contained in your Grace’s letter of the 4th instant. We had from divers parts the like advices of attempts designed against his Majesty’s life, which gives all those that have the honour to be near the King occasion to be the more cautious and watchful when any unknown persons shall endeavour by such insinuations to approach his Majesty.

“The King knows La Foulereffe, and has a very ill opinion of him as to his inclination to Denmark, and consequently to France; for which reason his Majesty thinks it necessary he should be observed. But the Count de Rantzau having waited on his Majesty at the Hague, and obtained leave that La Foulereffe might attend him into England, where the Count being not to stay long, his Majesty thinks it would be a great disappointment to him to part with his conductor; so that his Majesty would not have him sent away unless a further occasion be given for it. It is the same person that delivered an insolent memorial, as by order from the King of Denmark his master, and was sent out of England for it.

“The Baron Leefdale, who has said something in his informations against Parker, is not yet come to the camp.

“There was [were] very great apprehensions that Prince Lewis de Baden would have been overpowered by the French; but his having since possessed himself of a very advantageous post gives him an opportunity of being strengthened by the Saxons and others. I have nothing more to offer than the enclosed paper [not here].

[P.S.] “The Dutch ships having joined ours on the Broad Fourteens, the last order of the Admiralty will not take place.”

Re. the 16th.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

[1694,] June 12, Whitehall.—“I have received your two letters, that of the 4th yesterday, and the 7th today; but the packet-boat preceding these being carried to Dunkirk, I must desire that in case any commands were sent me by that post, I may have them repeated.

“By two letters I have had these last mails from Mr. Robinson, I perceive the Swedes put in their claims for reparation for the ships we have seized. I conclude he gives you the same account, and that he will receive his Majesty's instructions thereupon from you. His letters show him to be a man discreet and well deserving, and as I am informed much esteemed by his Majesty's friends in that Court. In case such a negociation should fall into his hands, it were perhaps worth his Majesty's consideration whether some advancement of character might not be reasonable. I am told Mr. de Lyancroon will give me a memorial upon the same subject. I should be glad to receive his Majesty's directions beforehand in what manner I am to treat with him.

“I have delivered the Admiralty the copy of the rendezvous of the Dutch ships upon the Broad Fourteens in case of separation; and Mr. Secretary Tren[chard] and I have discoursed with them upon his Majesty's orders, upon which there are these difficulties arise (sic). If by the squadron of the Channel out of which the King intends these five or more ships should be taken, is meant the fleet under the command of my Lord Berkley, the distance they are at will make it impossible to command any hither time enough to be useful for this design; besides the inconveniency of lessening that fleet, by which the land-forces would be unreasonably crowded, unless there were time to send transport vessels in their room. If his Majesty means that these five ships should be taken out of the cruisers and ships designed for convoys and other services, the Admiralty say they can order such a number, but then some other services must suffer; of all which they will meet together and consider, and you will receive an account by the next post. I will only add this, that if so be his Majesty thinks it advisable to attack them in the port of Fleckeren, it will amount to a declaration of war with Denmark; and being of that consequence, it is necessary his positive directions should be sent.

“If the Baron de Leefdale can say anything material against Parker, it will be necessary he should be sent hither with all speed, for he has moved for his habeas corpus. . . .

“His Majesty has been often moved by my Lord Cutts to grant a pardon to the brother of the late Lord Kingstown of Ireland, who is outlawed, and by my Lord Cutts' encouragement came hither. Though his Majesty refused to grant the pardon, yet he thought it not reasonable to prosecute the man here, but that he should have leave to return; upon which I have given him a pass for Flanders. My Lord Burlington and several persons of quality desire that his case may be laid before the King, which is, that he was always a very inoffensive man, and a servant only in King James' household; that he did desire a pass to return before his brother died; and that his brother has disinherited him, so that the King gains nothing by his forfeiture.

“Kick makes application to me to be made Consul of Rotterdam. . . .

[P.S.] “Since the sealing up of my letter this enclosed melancholy account is come of the attempt upon Brest, which I thought proper to lay before his Majesty, that he may have all the time possible to consider what he will direct these forces to do. The officer who delivered this letter to me says there are not above three or four hundred killed and wounded. I do not find the Gen[eral] and flag officers have called any council of war, where they deliver any opinion what remains fit to be done. I will not upon these hasty thoughts presume to give any from myself, more than that something methinks if possible ought to be tried to save the credit of this great expense and expectation.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

[1694,] May [June] 13, Whitehall.—“By last night's post I sent you what account I received from my Lord Cutts of the attempt upon Brest. This morning the enclosed letter, and councils of war, came from my Lord Berkley. I believe nobody can reasonably blame them for not opiniating to land when they saw the French so well prepared to receive them. That which alone surprises me is that Mr. Talmash should understand he was not left at liberty to make any other attempt upon the coast of France which should be agreed upon between himself and Mr. Russell, and, in Mr. Russell's absence, the commander of that fleet that remained with him upon that service. I am sure it was the intention of her Majesty, and everybody that advised here upon that subject, that such a power should be left with them; and Mr. Secretary Tren[chard] has showed me an order from her Majesty and a letter from himself of a later date to Mr. Talmash to the same effect. How this mistake happens I cannot yet tell.

“I am just going to attend some Lords her Majesty has appointed to meet and consider what is now advisable to be done. The result of their opinions you will I suppose receive from Mr. Secretary, and I will trouble you again, if I have anything to propose that I think worth it; but my Lord Lexington telling me he is just going on board, I would not omit this opportunity of acquainting you with what we know here.”

Autograph draft. Endorsed: The 13th of June, 1694. Sent by Lord Lexington.

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1694, June 14, Whitehall.—“I perceive by my Lord Chief Justice Pine, and by everybody that discourses of the affairs of Ireland, that a Parliament might much contribute to the advantage and settlement of that nation. Those who are most apprehensive of the consequences of that assembly as to their own private interest, or who have an aversion in principle to frequent Parliaments, nevertheless have not the confidence to dispute that point, and therefore lay the stress of their argument against it upon the probability of their renewing old quarrels. The particulars that seem most likely to cause heats are these: the confirming the Articles of Limerick and Galloway (sic), the passing an Act of Indemnity for all trespasses done during the war, and the difference about beginning Money Bills.

“The first they think concerns the honour of the King’s word, and if broke would render it impracticable for him in time to come, if there should be occasion, to treat with enemies or rebels, unless a Parliament were assembled to ratify his concessions, and, thinking that to be the most difficult of all points to overcome in an Irish Parliament, hope, and I believe with reason, to get them confirmed here, and from thence argue that the English Parliament must sit first to remove this bone of dissension.

“To the second, they hope that time will diminish those animosities that obstructed it before.

“As to the third, there are very various opinions among honest gentlemen how far another Irish Parliament will insist upon that privilege, which does not seem to have been much countenanced by the Parliament here. Others think it a prerogative of the King’s better lost than kept. I confess myself so ignorant of the Government of Ireland and its true interest that I will not undertake to decide so nice a point, but think with very little light one may discern that unless a Parliament do meet speedily, it will be very prejudicial to that kingdom, and therefore could wish that everybody would apply their thoughts to the proposing such methods as might give a reasonable prospect of agreement in case of a Session. And this recalls to mind what was directed at a Cabinet Council some time before the King went, upon the debate of an Irish Parliament—that Mr. Secretary should write to the Lords Justices to give their opinion how reasonably it might be hoped that a Parliament would meet and sit in good temper, and what methods they would propose to effect it; to which I have never seen or heard of any answer, but conclude it is come since the King went away, and if sent after him is in danger of being no more remembered till his return. This was intended to go by my Lord Chief Justice Pine, but this gentleman telling me he goes tomorrow, I would not delay this enquiry.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, June 14-24, Camp near Tirllemont.—“Having had the honour to answer your Grace’s last letter of the 8th instant, I am only commanded by the King to take notice of a letter I have received from Mr. Robinson, enclosing the demands of the Suedes for damages sustained by them by the seizing and detention of their ships in England. I do not send your Grace any copy, because mention is made in those papers that duplicates will be presented by the Minister of Sweden to the Queen; but his Majesty's pleasure is that, when they shall be received, they be taken into consideration by the Cabinet Council, and such an answer transmitted to his Majesty as may be fit to be returned to the Court of Sweden.

"We have just now received information that the packet which had the letters of the 11th instant has been carried into Dunkirk. I have therefore sent your Grace a copy of the letter I then writ, though it may signify little now the Dutch ships have joined ours on the coast of Holland.

[P.S.] "I send your Grace the order of battle as the Army was drawn up at the last Camp."

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, June 15, Whitehall.—"I am sorry I must again begin with ill news, and this I have now to relate is, I fear, of as ill consequence to his Majesty and the public as any part of this unfortunate attempt. What I mean is the death of Mr. Talmash, which happened upon Tuesday in the evening, at Plymouth.

"I have received a memorial from the Swedish Minister here, with an account of their demands, the same with that you had from Mr. Robinson. I have sent it to Sir Charles Hedges, to consider what objections he can make. . . .

"My Lord Dursley has delivered to me the States' letter to the King upon his recall. . . .

"Since the Fleet is come into the Channel, and before this, I conclude, at Spithead, it will I suppose be more easy to comply with his Majesty's directions, intending some more strength to join those on the Broad Fourteens; but I can acquaint you with no positive resolution till we receive an account from the Fleet of their condition and what they propose."

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, June 18-28, Roosbeck.— . . . "In answer to what is mentioned by your Grace of the port of Fleckeroe, his Majesty is pleased to explain his directions that Bart be not attacked in the port itself, if there be any such, but that in the road or any other place where there may not be the same reasonable objection of bringing the Danes to a declaration of war, the squadron be ordered to attack him, and to seize all those vessels that are bound with corn and contraband goods to the dominions of France.

"The Baron de Leefdale is come this afternoon to the Camp, and is now with me. I have disposed everything to as near a compliance as may be with what your Grace proposes for hindering the release of Parker, and accordingly send your Grace his deposition, and with it one of his Majesty's messengers that saw him sign and swear to the truth of the paper ; which, if it be thought necessary, the messenger will make oath of before the Judges. His Majesty does further intend to dispatch Leefdale himself to England tomorrow ; but because he may by some accident not come time enough, his Majesty hopes the deposition so attested may in that case suffice to prevent his being bailed.

“I have not been able by this post to acquaint your Grace with his Majesty’s pleasure touching the late Lord Kingston’s brother, his Majesty coming late this evening from a review, and other business intervening to take up his time.

“The King has had no thoughts of referring Mr. Kick to your Grace, nor of appointing him Consul of Rotterdam, nor is like to give any order in it, unless it be judged necessary in England.

“His Majesty has been informed by your Grace’s last letter, and by my Lord Cutts’s relation, of what has passed in the expedition against Brest, and of the return of the Fleet and land-forces. And for what concerns their being further employed, I am to acquaint your Grace that his Majesty is very desirous of it, and has therefore commanded me to signify his pleasure that it be considered by the Committee attending the Queen what may be fit to be undertaken ; and that if anything be agreed on as practicable for annoying the French upon their coast, her Majesty’s directions be given to the land-forces and to the squadron to execute the same in such manner as shall be agreed on by a council of war of the commanders of the squadron and land-forces ; but if it shall not be thought practicable to give the French any further annoyance upon their coast, that the forces be then landed and disposed of into their garrisons and quarters, the Regiments of Cutts, Colier, and Rada only excepted, which are to be forthwith sent by the best conveyance from Portsmouth to Ostend, either by tenders or transport ships ; or, in case any of those Regiments should have suffered too much in the expedition, one or more other Regiments that are in better condition of service are to be sent in their stead ; and the Regiment of Belasyse, when relieved, is to be likewise transported to the same place from the River of Thames. And in case no such conveyance do offer in time from Portsmouth, his Majesty’s pleasure is that then those Regiments as above mentioned, not exceeding three in number, do march to London, and there with the Regiment of Belasyse do embark for Ostend or Willemstadt on board such ships as may be immediately ordered to transport them to one of those places, his Majesty desiring rather, if it can be brought to pass, that they be carried to Ostend ; his further pleasure being that in case of the landing of the forces, the squadron be disposed of in such manner as the Queen shall think most fitting.”

They were pleased to approve what I had already done, which was to send directions to Sir Charles Hedges to set down the reasons [which] induced him to condemn those ships [which] were sentenced in his Court. . . . Sir Paul Rycaut informs me that some ships in this list have been claimed by Hamburgers. . . .

"I perceive Sir Paul Rycaut, in his letter to me of the 12th, thinks it will be difficult to seize the person of H., but that a way might be found to seize his papers without giving cause of any resentment between the K[ing] of Den[mark] and any other princes; but of this I conclude he informs you, and will receive his Majesty's commands."

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, June 21.—"Lord Keeper, Lord Privy Seal, Duke of Devonshire, Duke of Shrewsbury, Marquis of Normanbie, Mr. Secretary.

"It being proposed whether the Fleet should have orders to take the ten Regiments, or as many as they could conveniently, on board, to make some attempt upon the coast of France:

"It was resolved that they take the ten Regiments.

"I was of opinion that it should be left to the opinion of the Council of War, what numbers of the land-men they thought useful for the attempts they designed.

"Mr. Secretary was of opinion that only four Regiments should be put on land. The other four were for ordering all the ten."

In Shrewsbury's hand, and endorsed by him: Cabinet Council at Whitehall.

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, [June 21-]July 1, s.n., Roosbeck.—"Herewith I send your Grace a duplicate of my last letter for fear of miscarriage, and the rather as it is likewise an answer to that from your Grace of the 15th past, which has brought the ill news of Mr. Talmash's death. The King is very sensible of this loss, and of our misfortune before Brest, but has nothing to add to his pleasure already signified touching the Channel squadron and the land forces; nor does his Majesty think fit to give any directions concerning the Suedish demands until he receive the opinion of the Lords of the Committee, when they shall have taken them into consideration, according to my letter of the 14-24th past; and then, in case it shall be thought fit to have the matter treated of at Stockholm, his Majesty does resolve to give Mr. Robinson, by whom the business will be managed, the character of Agent, with an allowance of 40s. per diem.

"I will endeavour for the next post to know his Majesty's pleasure concerning the late Lord Kingston's brother.

“His Majesty has received the enclosed letter from the States General for a review in the case of the ship Jager, wherein his Majesty would first have the opinion of the Lords of the Council before any answer be given.

“There could be no better nor more speedy conveyance found for the Baron de Leefdale than the packet-boat, by which he now takes his passage, in company with an officer of the Dutch Guards that speaks English, and will serve for his interpreter. They will immediately upon their arrival at London wait on your Grace, and receive your directions, which I hope may be in time.”

SHREWSBURY to the EARL OF PORTLAND.

1694, June 22, Whitehall.—“Application having been made to the Queen, by Mr. Johnston, brother to the Secretary of Scotland, to be reimbursed money he had laid out upon intelligences, her Majesty was pleased to direct that I should inform myself from him of the particulars; whereupon he delivered this enclosed paper into my hands, the heads relating to matters unknown to her Majesty, and of which nobody but the King or yourself has any knowledge.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, June 22nd, Whitehall.—“I have here enclosed sent you some remarks Sir Charles Hedges has already made upon the demands of the Swedes. Unless he very much mistakes, which I hope and believe he does not, we shall be able to give a better and quicker answer than I could have imagined.

“By the mistake of the Captain of the Montagu, who commanded that squadron which joined the Dutch upon the Broad Fourteens, the English ships are come to the Gunfleet, but were immediately ordered back by the Admiralty, with an addition of other ships, and Rear Admiral Hobson to command them. We had information yesterday that whilst our ships had quitted their station, a considerable fleet, to the number of 300, were passed from the Sound to Dunkirk, convoyed by three men-of-war, and met by Du Bart with seven or eight more; but not hearing this confirmed today, we hope it is not true, and that our ships will be again in their station time enough to intercept them. However, I have recommended to the Lords of the Admiralty, and they have promised, that the matter shall be examined, the mistake being upon their own orders, of too great consequence, and too plain, as they represent it, to be passed over without examination.” . . .

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, [June 25-] July 5, s.n., Roosbeck.—“I have received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 13th past but yesterday by the hands of the Earl of Arran, my Lord Lexington having taken Amsterdam in his way, to settle his credits there, and not arriving in the Camp before this day.

“Your Grace’s letter of the 15th I have already answered, and that being the last from England, I should have little to say at present were it not for the misfortune that has happened to the Dutch ships that were cruising on the Broad Fourteens, which, besides the loss of the men-of-war, has all the ill consequence that the relieving of France at this time from the greatest necessities can be of to us. For the particulars I refer your Grace to the abstract I have drawn from the letter the King has received from the Captain of the Rosendael Frigate, that escaped very narrowly.

“This unfortunate accident and disgrace will be imputed to the want or absence of our ships after so long a warning and appointment of the place of rendezvous. But there being no help for what is past, his Majesty has been pleased to turn his thoughts towards preventing of further mischief, and avenging the affront; to which purpose his Majesty has sent his orders, a copy whereof is here enclosed,<sup>v</sup> to Rear-Admiral Hopson to pursue the enemy as soon as he shall get ten ships together. And because his Majesty does think the increase of that number would be more effectual against De Bart, in case he can be met with, his Majesty commands me to signify his pleasure that orders be given to the Admiralty for the sending a reinforcement of ships as soon as possible; and in case there be any other men-of-war nearer than the Fleet, which may be employed upon this service, his directions are that they be sent immediately to join Rear Admiral Hopson upon that part of the Broad Fourteens that has been appointed for the rendezvous; which ships may be replaced from the Channel squadron, unless it be judged as expeditious that a detachment may be made directly from thence, wherein, if that method be thought most advisable, his Majesty would have all possible dispatch used, to prevent the great inconveniencies that may otherwise happen by leaving De Bart master of the Northern Seas.

“Your Grace’s last letter mentioning your desire to know to what time my Lord Dursley shall continue in pay as his Majesty’s Minister in Holland, I am commanded to acquaint your Grace that his Majesty is pleased to agree that the delivery of the re-credentials shall determine his Lordship’s entertainment.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, June 26, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 18th, and conclude that by this post Mr. Secretary will acquaint you the Fleet is ordered to sail with the ten Regiments on board. I am sorry it is no more possible to obey his Majesty’s commands as to the corn-ships, since you will have heard they are got by into Dunkirk, and we apprehend with some danger to the Dutch, at the very instant our squadron quitted their station, as I feared in my last. The Captain pretends that because the Dutch would not join,* he was directed by the order of the Ad[miralty] I formerly sent you to come away if he were not in company of three Dutch ships, [and?] not to remain longer in that station, because the Duthe [Dutch] flag with the ships under him would not immediately join and be commanded by a private Captain.† There are such a number of unlucky accidents [which] conspire to this misfortune it is a sort of fatality; but all proceeds from giving a command of this nature to one that understands neither sense nor his own business any better. The Ad[miralty] promise to examine and punish him.‡

“These enclosed papers relate to a debt due from his Majesty to the Pr[ince] of Den[mark], and will fully inform you of the occasion of it. I put them into my Lord Godolphin’s hands by his Majesty’s express directions, and he having informed himself of the state of the case from my Lord Nottingham, as you will see by my Lord’s letter of the 18th (?) to my Lord Go[dolphin], he has returned the papers to me; by which it plainly appears that the King is engaged to the Prince for the whole money, and the States to his Majesty for the one half. Now as nobody would propose that during the exigencies of this war his Majesty should part with so considerable a sum, so on the other side the debt is so just, and his Majesty’s honour so far engaged in it, that I presume, whenever we have a peace, and that the debts of the Crown should be laid before Parliament, this will be inserted as one occasioned by the war; and therefore, to lessen the sum as much as may be, and that the King may pay no more than his due, I should think it were not improper that Mr. Dyckvelt were put in mind of the engagement the States are under upon this account; for if they fail to pay what they have promised, the debt will fall upon the King, who alone is engaged to the Prince of Denmark for the whole.”

1694, [June 28-] July 8, s.n., Roosbeck.—“We have yet no fresher letters from England than those of the 15th, which makes us fear the packet-boat may have been taken by the French; and because the like misfortune may have happened to the last going from hence, De Bart being master at sea, I send the enclosed duplicate,|| which contains his Majesty’s orders relating to the squadron that is to go in pursuit of him.

subsidies to the Elector, and only bread and forage to the troops, according to a particular Treaty in that behalf. Now his Majesty and the States are desirous to take those troops absolutely into their own service during the war, and to pay them as the Danes, without giving any subsidies. His Majesty takes eight regiments and the States four into their respective pay, for which between his Majesty and the Elector a new Treaty is necessary and a Project made; which being to be signed by Mr. Wolseley as that of Wolfembuttle, his Majesty would have powers under the Great Seal immediately sent for Mr. Wolseley to conclude and sign such a Treaty, wherein your Grace will please to observe that his Majesty and the Elector are the only parties, the States making a separate agreement for their regiments. It is requisite that the powers do not bear a later date than the 2nd or 3rd day of this month, old style, and that it may precede the date of the Treaty.

“I have read to his Majesty a letter from Mr. Kirke, Consul at Genua, part whereof relating to the trade of that Republic, his Majesty commands me to send your Grace the enclosed extract, that consideration may be had of the proposal, and such orders given by the Queen as shall be judged most proper.” . . .

R. 7.

KING WILLIAM III. to REAR-ADMIRAL THOMAS HOBSON.

1694, [June 29-] July 9, Camp at Roosbeck in Brabant. —“Whereas we have already signified to you our pleasure that upon joining with the Dutch ships of war at the Broad Fourteens, you should forthwith go in pursuit of De Bart, and endeavour to seize or destroy the squadron under his command; and we having since that time received information of the said De Bart's being gone into Dunkirk, we do hereby further direct and require you to consult with the Commanders of the Dutch men-of-war that shall join you, and with them to concert and agree on what may be fittest to be done to annoy the enemy and to put in execution our intentions against De Bart, or otherwise to hinder him and his squadron from coming out of Dunkirk, which is to be done either by lying with the ships you command as aforesaid before that port in proper stations, or by further pursuing the said De Bart when he shall come out of the said port, according to the former directions which you have received from us.”

Copy, enclosed in Blathwayt's letter of 2-12 July.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

[16]94, June 29, Whitehall.— . . . “I have little to trouble you with but my apprehensions that the news of the Dunkirk squadron is rather worse than we feared at first, though we have no particulars but from three Swedes' ships loaded with corn that one of our cruisers brought to Deale from out of a great fleet of theirs and the Danes', which are now we suppose sailing through the Channel, and which the Queen has directed my Lord Berkley to send out a squadron to endeavour to bring into the first port that lies most convenient, to stop them till they are examined.

“The Captain that commanded our squadron designed to join the Dutch upon the Broad Fourteens does not allege that the dispute in command occasioned this misfortune, but that, receiving the Admiralty’s order to come away immediately if he were not then joined by three Dutch men-of-war, he thought himself obliged strictly to obey the order, and to come away; the Dutch being at that time at one end of the Broad Fourteens, and he at the other, though they had before met and agreed upon all signals. He is sent down to be tried by a Council of war at the buoy of the Nore, but it is thought cannot be punished for having too strictly followed the letter rather than the sense of his order.”

INFORMATION by JOHN WILSON of CHIPPIN.

[1694, June? ]—About four or five years since Mr. Thrilfall of Goosner and Mr. John Lunt came from King James out of Ireland into Lancashire, and brought several commissions, declarations, and other papers to Roman Catholic gentlemen and others. They bought great quantities of arms, &c., 2½ years ago. Mr. Lunt was at Dungenhall with Mr. Walmesley, who had lately come from France, with a commission; and Mr. Lunt [en]listed several men for King James. Mr. Charles Harris, of Farrick House, and others are mentioned.

Not signed, and undated.

[INFORMATION by COL. PARKER? ]

[1694, June? ]—“When King James left the kingdom upon the arrival of the Prince of Orange, I then went immediately after him into France, and upon my coming to St. German’s was introduced to kiss his hand in his private closet, by the Lords Thomas and George Howard. From thence I was ordered with the rest of his Guards to go for Dublin. When we came there, immediately upon our arrival, one Dr. Bromfield came there also from England, expecting to meet his Majesty, and brought over with him an account of the condition and readiness of his friends the Papists and Jacobites here, but more particularly in London, Sussex, and Kent, and in Staffordshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire, and from them all desired of his Majesty Commissions for the several persons of quality hereafter named, with blanks for their inferior officers, which accordingly his Majesty caused forthwith to be issued forth both for England and Scotland.”

The writer was engaged to carry the commissions into England. He was told by Lord Milfort that the King had ordered the officer of the Guards, who was a Frenchman, to cashier him, in order “to blind the business.” Mr. Thrilfall, of the Ashes in Goosner, Lancashire, and the writer were dispatched to England, and Mr. Gourdon, also cashiered, to Scotland. They carried declarations, commissions, and other papers. The persons to whom the commissions (as Colonels, etc.) were delivered were:—

- Lanc. Lord Mollineux's son William.*
 „ Thomas Tildesley, Esq.
 „ ——— Dalton, of Thurnham, Esq.
 „ ——— Sherburn, of Stonyhurst, Esq.
 „ ——— Townley, of Townley, Esq.
 „ ——— Girlington, of Girlington, Esq. Protestant.
 „ ——— Westby, of Mobrick, Esq.
 „ Lord Molineux had Instructions, as Governor of Liverpool.
 Chesh. ——— Lee, of Lyme, Esq. Protestant.
 „ Sir Thomas Stanley, of Aldersley. Protestant.
 „ ——— Chumley, of Vale Royal, Esq. Protestant.
 „ Sir Rowland Stanley.
 Northt. Lord Brudenell.
 „ Sir ——— Frogmorton.

Other papers were delivered or sent to Mr. Jackson, Lord Griffin, Sir William Penn, the Quaker, Lord Dunbarr, Lord Preston, Lord Faifax, ——— Strickland, Sir Thomas Gascone, and Sir ——— Stapleton.

The writer was afterwards made a prisoner, but after some time was discharged, and went over to King James, who sent him back with a promise to come to England in the following spring. Lord Melfort sent a paper with him for Capt. Griffith, in the Meuse (Mews?), who spoke to him about the proposed “cutting off the Prince of Orange,” while hunting, and introduced him to several gentlemen at the Queen's Head, in White Hart Yard, in the Strand, where “the method of doing it” was discussed. Griffith said he had about sixty brave fellows engaged in the business. Some of these, including Whitney, the highway-man, were afterwards taken and secured.

The writer then describes his journeys between England and St. Germain's, in connexion with the proposed invasion of England, and the attempt on the Prince of Orange, in which last business he personally engaged himself. He mentions several officers at Dover and Feversham, who were implicated. Being troubled in his thoughts, he consulted several priests, his friends and relations, in France; some were positively against it as damnable, others for it as meritorious. Resolved, on coming to England, “not to be one in it,” and was persuaded by a friend to acquaint Secretary Trenchard. Told him of the Kentish men's design on the King's life, and the design of seizing the Tower and Tillbury Fort, and how these were to be seized; also Sherness, Dover, Foulston, the coast of Rumney Ma[r]sh, Hull, and the north parts.

Refers to another meeting at the Queen's Head, attended by Lord Griffin, Lord Baltimore, Lord Feversham, Capt. Tozier, and others, where it was said that a large army was ready to meet at 24 hours' warning, under the conduct of certain Lords and Colonels (named).

* Sir William Gerrard, elsewhere.

Was afterwards informed that as the Kentish design on the King's life had been prevented "by some traitor or other," it was resolved "to try another way upon him in Flanders" (described).

Left many of his papers at Brudges, in Flanders, with Father Confessarius, at Prince Neuff. While at Rochester, he was introduced to several commanders of the King's men-of-war, who trod upon King William's commissions, and drank King James's health. Can point out many places where quantities of arms, &c., are kept. Knows the names of great persons who have supplied King James with money, and who made up the 30,000*l.* which Lord Middleton carried with him.

PORTLAND TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]94, July [2-]12, Camp at Rostbeck.—Has had no news to send since Shrewsbury's letter of 22nd June. The enemy threaten to bombard Liege or Maastricht. Is not acquainted with the particulars of Mr. Johnson's disbursements, but knows that he has been extremely laborious and active in discovering persons ill intentioned towards the King, as Mr. Secretary Trenchard also knows. It is only just that those who are zealous for the service should be reimbursed the money advanced by them. We much regret here the ill success of the attempt upon Brest, and the death of Mr. Tolmach; and the "rencontre" of J. Bart makes great noise in Holland, and is harmful to "the reputation of our public affairs."

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, July 2-12, Roosbeck.— . . . "His Majesty has not taken any resolution about the getting an Imperial mandate for the better seizing of H., or the seizing of his papers without it.

"Your Grace is before this time fully informed of all that has happened to the Dutch cruisers in reference to De Bart and the provision ships he has released. Nothing could be more unlucky than the mistake that has been made. However, your Grace will have understood from Mr. Prior what ships are fitting out in Holland to follow De Bart if he go out of Dunkirk, or to keep him in there. By the enclosed copy of his Majesty's order to Rear-Admiral Hopson<sup>o</sup> your Grace will see what are the King's intentions; and his Majesty further commands me to signify his pleasure to your Grace that they be pursued by sending out such a strength and number of ships as shall be thought fit in England, which are to join the Dutch squadron on the end of the Broad Fourteens where they were met with by the Captain of the Mountagu, orders being given in Holland for the Dutch ships to expect ours there. The Pensioner has [sent?] the original order to Hopson, who will receive it at the intended station.

"I have read to his Majesty the papers relating to the debt due to the Prince of Denmark, and his Majesty does accordingly resolve to remind Mons. Dyckvelt of that part for which the States have obliged themselves.

"Having laid before the King the enclosed letter from the Consul of Legorn, with the annexed paper, his Majesty commands me to send them to your Grace, being favourably inclined towards the Consul if his request be found reasonable.

[P.S.] . . . "The French have moved their right wing from St. Tron to Tongres, which is nearer Maastricht and Liege. If they advance further towards either of those places, we shall follow them, which in all probability may bring on an engagement."

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, July 3, Whitehall.— . . . “My Lord Berkley has met with the fleet of Swedes and Danes, which are to the number of about sixty or seventy, and sent them into the Downs. They are most[ly] laden with Norway goods, as deal, masts, &c., and some with corn, all bound for France. I doubt by our last Treaty with Denmark corn is not prohibited, though with that of [by that with?] Sweden, under the general word provision or comeatus, it seems to be comprehended. I should desire his Majesty would give us his instructions, as much as can be at this distance, in what manner we are to deal with these ships; whether the utmost rigour is to be used; and, in case the treaties will not reach to condemn them, whether they ought to be brought here, rather than be suffered to proceed to furnish France; and particularly whether, in case the treaty will justify the condemning corn ships belonging to the Swedes, and not to the Danes, that rigour should be extended to the Swedes, whom the King has sometimes appeared more inclinable to favour than the Danes. I speak more at a guess in this matter than I ought to do, or than I should, could I get a sight of Mr. Molesworth’s last treaty, which not being to be found in the office, I cannot yet, though hope soon to do.

“I am desired by Mr. Bainton to write a word in his recommendation to succeed Mr. Butler, who is dead, in the place of Equerry, in case he be a person Mr. d’Auverkerk approves, who next after his Majesty ought to be considered and satisfied in this recommendation, and that Mr. Pope decline his pretensions, which are certainly more just than anybody’s.” . . .

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]94, July 3, Dublin Castle.—“I received the honour of your Lordship’s by Col. Coningham three days since, besides one of the 14th of April, and another in favour of Col. Gustavus Hambleton; the two former of which I had answered, but for my sickness; and for fully answering this last, I am deprived this post, for in truth I have not been able yet to get my companions to resolve what advice to give upon the subject matter for calling a Parliament here. As to myself, I have in some measure given it already (which I hear was read at the Cabinet); but they promise in a day or two they will, which I will take care shall be immediately transmitted over to the Queen.

“My Lord, it is of infinite satisfaction to me that you bear a sense of the miseries of this poor kingdom by your so prudently stating three questions most necessary to be resolved in order to the calling of a Parliament. I will by the next give you an account thereof. Certain it is! that this kingdom must in short time come to a manner of desperation, for that the debt we have contracted this year amounts to four score thousand pounds, and next year is like to be less, for that it is not (sic) like to increase by the many hardships England puts upon us. Excises the same; depopulations still continuing for want of a settlement of titles by Parliament; so that we have nothing to depend upon but the quit-rents."

SEC. BLATHWAY TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, July 5-15, Roosbeek.— . . . "There has been lately some appearance of a disposition in the Turks to come to a treaty of peace with the Emperor and the Allies, and to that purpose the Envoy of Poland that had been sent to the Han of Tartary, upon his return had given hopes that the Grand Signior would send his Ambassadors to Strye, a place in Poland upon the borders of Transylvania, where the Christians were to send theirs, and the treaty to be carried on under the mediation of his Majesty and the States General. To which the Court of Vienna have given so much credit as by the Count d'Aversperg (who is attending his Majesty) to desire orders might be given to my Lord Paget to repair to Strye in the quality of mediator at the time that should be agreed on. This has been accordingly done by a letter from his Majesty to his Lordship, which has been delivered to Count Aversperg; but by the freshest informations from those parts we are assured the Turks, upon the late change of their ministry, have laid aside all thoughts of a treaty, so that no ambassadors will be sent from the Allies without further encouragement, nor will my Lord Paget have at least so soon the trouble of so long a journey."

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, July 9-19, Roosbeck.—“The letters of the 29th past, which are the last we have received from England, being already answered, I have only to acquaint your Grace that his Majesty does agree to the proposal of Mons. de Wildt that in consideration of the number of ships, English and Dutch, appointed to follow De Bart, which your Grace will have understood from Mr. Prior are twelve from Holland, some of the Dutch ships may be spared to act separately for clearing the coast of privateers, which will be ordered accordingly. The English squadron under Rear-Admiral Hopson is expected upon that part of the Broad Fourteens where they were last directed to meet the Dutch.

R. the 16.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, July 10, Whitehall.—“Upon Saturday last I received four of yours together, dated the 1st, 5th, 8th, and 12th of this month, n.s.

“I only expect the return of Mr. Robinson’s letter to lay the whole matter of the Swedes’ demands before the Lords of the Committee, pursuant to his Majesty’s directions. Sir Charles Hedges has prepared and delivered to me some time since an answer to the greatest part. . . . I am glad the King intends to advance Mr. Robinson’s character, and that he shall treat this matter at Stockholm, because I believe he will do it better than anybody, being thoroughly versed in it. I hope in time his Majesty will consider Mr. Stepney, whose zeal, success, parts, and application deserve encouragement.

“I have discoursed with my Lord Keeper and Mr. Secretary concerning what may be proper to do in answer to the Consul of Genua’s letter; who know not what to propose, that Republic having never acknowledged his Majesty, unless directions were sent to Mr. Russel to intimate something to them of the same nature the Consul proposes; and in case his Majesty should please to send any such commands, I desire they may be directed to Mr. Secretary, it relating to the Southern province, in which it is improper for me to meddle.

“Pursuant to the directions in your two letters of the 5th and 12th, I writ to the Lords of the Ad[miralty], a copy of whose answer I have here enclosed, and also of what orders they now send to Vice-Ad[miral] Hopson. I hope these may be more fortunate than the last to the Captain of the Montagu. I cannot yet learn whether the reason that the English and Dutch did not join was because our ships were not on the station his Majesty did direct by you to me, or whether the Dutch altered their station after your letter, but the mistake was of great consequence as it fell out. Several prisoners that are come from Dunkirk, and were there when Du Bart returned with his prizes, relate that he himself owned that had the other five ships behaved themselves as well as the three [which] were taken, he must have run, or been carried to the Maes, as now he carried them to Dunkirk, there being above 100 guns more in the Dut[c]h than French squadron. Du Bart himself was in a very weak ship built of fir; and his only strength consisting in being extraordinarily manned, it seems to be an oversight in the Holland Rear-Admiral to suffer himself to be boarded so soon.

"I have by this post sent you the ratification of the two treaties concluded by Mr. Stepney, and the powers desired for Mr. Walseley.

"It is some time since the case of the Jager was laid before the Queen in Council, upon a memorial from the Dutch Ambassador. My answer to him, a copy whereof I have here enclosed, will fully confirm you of the state of that case.

"Mrs. Heyford, wife of the Colonel who died in his Majesty's service in Ireland, has ever since subsisted upon the King's bounty. . . . Her husband was well known to me, and once my mayor (?). . . .

"I sent to the Prize Office to enquire concerning what is alleged by the Consul of Leghorn; who return me this enclosed answer." . . .

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1694, July 10, Whitehall.—"This gentleman, Mr. Molesworth, having been ill used by some of the late Ministers for being too stiff to that principle which you and I have been ready to own, is really a man of great industry and of such true zeal to his country that he might be very useful, but that I doubt something remains with our superiors of the ill character has been given of him by those I hope they do not listen now to in other matters. . . . It is pity such partial representations should lose to the Government a man of his understanding and application. . . ."

fit to give any orders concerning the Danish and Suedish ships that are seized, leaving that matter to the determination of the Council according to the Treaties ; his Majesty being withall very willing that the Suedes may perceiue they are distinguished in their treatment from the Danes—where there is room for favour—without showing too great a partiality.

“ His Majesty has not yet disposed of the Querrie’s (sic) place, but Col. Pope is in expectation of it. Mr. Bains succeeds Col. Butler in the Guards. Tomorrow we march towards the Mehaigne, where it is probable there may be an engagement with the enemy, at which we cannot but be concerned while his Majesty’s person is in danger.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, July 13, Whitehall.—“ Yesterday the Lords of the Council took into consideration the Danes’ and Swedes’ ships stopped in the Channel by her Majesty’s orders. They were pleased to direct that those of both nations that were in ballast should be immediately dismissed. It was also pressed that they would examine the passes and bills of lading of such as had only deals, clapboards, and pipestaves on board, in order to discharge them also, if they were found really to belong either to Swedes or Danes, without putting them to the delay and expense of passing the forms of the Admiralty Court ; but their Lordships were pleased to refer the judgment of all, except only those in ballast, to the Judge of the Ad[miralty], with directions to sit from day to day, and judge as summarily as possible, beginning with those freighted with planks and pipestaves. I have here enclosed sent you a list of all the ships, with their lading. There are now two posts due.

“ The Eastland merchants who furnish his Majesty’s Fleet with naval stores from the Baltick, have been with me to advise what method will be most safe to secure their ships from being stopped in case the Swedes or the Danes should be enough provoked to offer at such reprisals. The consideration is of the last consequence, and I have informed myself as well as I can what orders will be proper to give.” . . .

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] July 13, Phenix Park.—“ I cannot yet get the other two Justices to a resolution, but in a few days they promise they will. Here (sic) is a secret in it, which my Lord Keeper can tell you, having sent him this day, by a private hand, a letter touching this matter.

[P.S.] “ I had your Lordship’s touching Mr. Savige.”

[CAPEL TO SEC. TRENCHARD.]°

[16]94, July 14, Dublin Castle.—“My indisposition hath for some time hindered me from giving an answer to yours of the 15th of April, concerning calling a Parliament here, and of late my desire to join with the other Lords Justices in a representation thereof; but finding they have not the same sentiments in this matter with myself, I think it my duty humbly to offer my own poor opinion upon this occasion, which so nearly concerns the King’s affairs.

“That there is a necessity of calling a Parliament no man can doubt, who will consider the want we have of money. There is an arrear of 180,000*l.* to the Civil and Military Lists grown due since the beginning of the Establishment, January, 1691[-2]; the general officers of the Army, the officers of the Ordnance, and the governors of the several Forts and Garrisons, with many others, unpaid. There are likewise many considerable debts owing from the Crown, not comprehended in the Establishment, which ought to be satisfied, nor is there any prospect when our condition will mend, the charge of the Establishment exceeding the produce of the growing Revenue, by a modest computation, at least 60,000*l.* per annum.

“The several garrisons and forts of this kingdom are out of repair, and must also be furnished with stores, and other provisions of war.

“An Act should likewise pass for settling the Militia, which is now almost quite laid aside, and will with great difficulty be called again together. Great heats and disputes have lately arisen between the Governor and Deputy Governors of the County of Dublin, and the colonels and other officers of the Militia, about the raising thereof, and the opinion of lawyers produced to us upon that matter, which has set them at distance among themselves, and will, I fear, be of ill example to the rest of the counties. Besides, there is no legal course at present to be taken with the Irish to compel them to contribute to the charge thereof; so that the kingdom is not in a fit posture of defence, and should the enemy land with a small number of men, upon any part of the Western coast, we should find great difficulty to suppress them, and the Irish (who were never more insolent in those parts than now) will be ready upon any opportunity to join with them.

“Some temporary laws expired the last Parliament, which, being of great benefit to the people, ought to be revived; and we want many other laws, which, after so great a Revolution ought to be enacted, for strengthening and securing the English and Protestant interest; such as are bills, for disarming Irish Papists, for preventing them from keeping horses above five pound value or thirteen hands and a half high; for restraining foreign education; for taking Tories; for observing particular holidays and no other; for the settling of civil bills, &c. Many private bills are also wanting for the benefit of particular subjects.

* This is not in Capel’s hand, nor is it signed by him.

“ An Act of Parliament is likewise necessary for the rebuilding and repairing of churches ; most of the parishes in this kingdom either having no churches at all, or, if any, out of repair, and not fit to celebrate divine service in, which causes many to depart from our Communion ; and this their separation may justly be imputed in a great measure to the non-residence of the Clergy, and a total failure of their duty in very many parts of the kingdom.

“ The meeting of a Parliament will also have this good effect ; it will assure their Majesties’ Protestant subjects of their affection to them, and of their care for their preservation, notwithstanding the reports (as if there would be no more Parliaments in Ireland) which some have of late too industriously spread about, who either [do] not know, or do not wish the good of the Government.

“ The argument used against [the] meeting of a Parliament here, I find, is the probability of their renewing old quarrels, and that they will fall again into their former heats, about the Articles of Limerick, and their sole right of beginning money-bills ; which should they insist upon, it would make a greater breach than is already, and prejudice their own, and their Majesties’ interest.

“ For my own part, I have made it my business ever since my coming hither to enquire into this matter. I have conversed with all sorts of people, and with many of the angry gentlemen of the last House of Commons, upon this subject, and they all tell me they will not differ with their Majesties. And though no man can be sure what a Parliament will or will not do, when they come together, yet I am really of opinion that all heats will be laid aside, and that another Parliament will meet in a temper and resolution to do their Majesties, and their country, all the service that can be expected from good English men and Protestants, and will contribute to their utmost towards the support of the Government, being sensible they have been burthensome enough already to England, and cannot reasonably expect any further supplics from thence.

“ This is the language and disposition of all the eminent lawyers and leading men I discourse with upon this occasion, and I am verily persuaded they tell me their minds, and the truth ; for it will be of infinite advantage to them to have a good settlement in Parliament. Another rupture with their Majesties would utterly undo them, and leave the country untenanted, and unimproved. ’Tis therefore their interest not to differ with the King, and interest can never lie ; and for this reason I am the more confirmed in my belief, that they will do well, and answer the ends for which they are called.

“ I must needs confess, that some of the members of the Privy Council and Judges are of another opinion, and have told me, should a Parliament be called, they will stand to their former vote, of having the sole power of money-bills, but they do not instance in any particular persons, and therefore I am apt to believe they are apprehensive of the consequence of such an assembly as to their own private interest. I am loth to think they are afraid of a good agreement between their Majesties and their people.

“As for confirming the Articles of Limerick and Galway, I find the first and the sixth Articles may meet with some opposition. The first, if confirmed, they say, establishes the Popish religion, which can't be digested by any Protestant; and for the sixth, they who object against it say, they would readily agree that where any goods, horses, cattle, money, &c., are taken in pursuance of any military or civil orders for the use of the public, the persons so seizing shall be pardoned; but where any persons (sic) acted without authority, and converted the goods to his own private advantage, he ought to be answerable to the party injured; and this is also an objection against passing an Act of Indemnity for all trespasses done during the war. But even in this case they tell me they will have a due regard to the King's honour and word, and I hope will be prevailed with to pass an Act for a general oblivion.

“For the time of calling a Parliament, it may meet conveniently enough after Harvest, at the latter end of September, or after Christmas. If at the end of September, then the Houses may sit for a month or six weeks, and pass such bills as shall be ready against that time, and may be afterwards (if it be thought fit) adjourned to the beginning of March following, with an assurance that they shall then meet, and determine such other matters as shall lie before them.

“I have here with all sincerity and truth, for their Majesties' service, according to the best of my judgment, delivered my opinion concerning the calling a Parliament in Ireland, and with all humility submit the same to their Majesties' gracious consideration.”

PORTLAND TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, July [16-]26, Camp of Mont St. André.—Our march will have alarmed many well disposed persons. A battle was indeed expected in these plains, where the enemy would have had an advantage, but they have removed further off. Gives particulars of their positions. The King acts with the greatest caution, but cannot remain with such an army in a corner of the country without injury to his reputation. Asks him to communicate this news to Lord Romney.

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY

1694, July 16-26, from the King's quarters at Mont St. André.—“Mr. Collins the messenger brought me your Grace's letter of the 10th instant the same night we arrived here. I have since read it to his Majesty, who has given me no orders upon it, except that, in answer to what your Grace says of the mistake of our squadron, which was to have joined the Dutch, I should observe to your Grace there would not have been any such mistake if either the Captain of the Mountagu had not received the Admiralty's orders about his coming away, or had not misunderstood them, which was the occasion of that misfortune.

"The enclosed paper gives your Grace an account of our march, and of the situation of both the camps. The French are covered by the Jecker and the Mehaigne, so that they cannot be attacked without great disadvantage; but if they shall think fit to attack us, they will find our army in a readiness to receive them.

"The King has been in a continual fatigue since Thursday night, and the weather being excessive hot has made his Majesty very faint and somewhat indisposed, which I hope will be without any further consequence.

"We have no certain news from any place of Admiral Russell's being come into the Mediterranean.

"We are expecting Count Frise here every day, to whom I will deliver the ratifications of the Treaties with Saxony, or send them to Mr. Stepney, the matter requiring no haste, since the first payment of the subsidies is made and the troops marched."

1694, July 17, Whitehall.— . . . "I see in a letter from my Lord Berkley to Mr. Secretary Trenchard that it is his private opinion no more than four of the ten battalions which are now on board the Fleet ought to remain there, they being useless for any attempts they can make, and will endanger a sickness in the Fleet by being too much crowded this hot weather. If this be the opinion of the council of war he intended to call, which probably it will be, he has directions with his first conveniency to put these six battalions ashore; after which I suppose his Majesty will expect that the orders he sent of the 18th of June should be put in execution, viz. that the three Reg[iments] of Collier, Cuts, and Rada be sent to Ostend, if they be all in a condition; if not, such others in their room as are; and that Bellaysse be relieved and sent to the same place."

Recommends that directions be given to the Minister at Stockholm to treat with the Court of Swedland, &c.

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

[1694,] July 17, Whitehall.— . . . "The chief occasion of my giving you this trouble is that Sir James Houblon was two days ago with me to offer to settle an intelligence in the Mediterranean, that we might have an account what is done at Thoulon or elsewhere. He tells me that a master of a felouque of Genoua, an active, intelligent man, who speaks good English and has sailed much with our nation, and [was] very conversant formerly among the English at Tangier, and has frequent opportunities to go into the French ports or fleet, has offered to Giles Balle, his correspondent at Genoua, to do this service. I doubt it may be too late for him to be useful to you; however, I desired Sir James to settle this for the future. . . .

“Mr. Vernon writes all public news; therefore I will only inform you that young Mr. Hampden (sic) has had two fits of an apoplexy at my Lord Montagu’s in the country, and since his return to town he has owned his marriage with Mrs. Cornwallis.

[P.S.] “Since the writing this letter, a Dutch post arrived, and informs us that upon the 27th of this month (sic), ne[w] style, you were over against Barcelonne, and following the French fleet, who were retired to Thoulon. Pray God send you good success.”

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] July 17, Dublin Castle.—“Your Grace in yours of the 14th of June was pleased to remind me of a letter formerly writ to us by Mr. S[ecretary] Trenchard, to give our opinion concerning the calling a Parliament here. I have by this post, in obedience to his Majesty’s commands, declared my mind freely upon that subject, and here enclose a copy of my letter, in which I have endeavoured to give an account of the several particulars your Grace desires to be informed of.

“Should his Majesty think fit to call a Parliament here, we must (as your Grace very well knows) all apply our thoughts to the proposing such methods as may have a reasonable prospect of a good agreement in the Sessions. The ready way to effect it is, to convince the English Protestant gentlemen that there is a real intention in the Government to do them good. Some of them are so free as to tell me, they will trust me in this particular; that is, they say they are assured that your Grace, and such other of the present Ministers that I shall apply to, will really concern themselves to do this poor country all the good they can reasonably expect. ’Tis this that makes me presume to give my opinion so freely concerning the calling a Parliament, hoping the continuance of your Grace’s favour and friendship upon all occasions, and that you will please to believe my only design is, in the close of my life, to do their Majesties and this lamentable, wasted country what service I can.”

Re. the 23, 1694.

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, July 19-29, Mont St. André.—“I have laid before the King all the considerations of your Grace’s letter of the 13th instant relating to the Suedish and Danish ships that are now under prosecution in the Admiralty Court; and the security of ours that are to bring home the necessary stores for the Fleet; upon which his Majesty can give no positive orders at this distance, both the northern Crowns being no more to be relied on than as their interest and other accidents may guide them.

Nor does his Majesty conceive how the rendezvousing of our ships under a strong convoy off of Murstrand can secure them, if they be to take in naval stores in the Danish or Suedish dominions, or to pass the Sound with them, so that a great deal is to be hazarded by the owners and freighters of the ships ; his Majesty not desiring withall that rigour be used by the Court of Admiralty in their examinations, but that justice be done to all parties, which is the only rule can be given at present.

“ His Majesty thinks fit that Mrs. Heyford have her usual yearly allowance from the Treasury, out of the Secret Service money ; wherein your Grace will be pleased to signify his Majesty’s directions.

“ The weather is very much cooled by the rain, and his Majesty now seems to be in perfect health.

[P.S.] “ His Majesty has thought fit to recall Mons. d’Hervart from Suisserland, believing there is no occasion for a minister in those parts.

“ The enclosed is an extract from a letter from Mons. de Pontchartrain, by which your Grace may see what value the French set upon Crosby, and the injustice that is done Mr. Cox.”

Re. the 25.

COL. GEORGE PHILIPS to [LORD CAPEL].

[16]94, July 19.—“ I would not presume thus bluntly to address myself to your Lordship, had I not been encouraged by my worthy friend Col. Torward. . . .

“ I was present in the late Parliament, and was so in a former ; and having thereby been somewhat conversant in Parliamentary customs and proceedings, I was much concerned to observe such an unnecessary eagerness in many of the Members about matters very trivial and of small importance ; which gave me cause to expect a greater warmth in our future debates, when things of greater moment should come under consideration, and from thence to presage an untimely dissolution. I took notice, that when the Lord Lieutenant did by his Secretary proffer to the House an immunity from postage of letters, some of our Members stood up, and would not have that favour received ex gratia, but ex debito ; and on some other occasions I observed a great ingenuity disfigured by too much heat. I confess I was not present at the eruption of that flame, which was kindled by that capricious vote concerning Privilege (being then confined to my chamber by a fit of the gout) ; but I foresaw a collection of the fuel in several cabals and committees. And I am persuaded that as the contest between the Government and them was not fomented by the major or wiser part, so I confidently believe that upon a more calm way of proceeding the matter might have been accommodated, to the mutual satisfaction of King and people.

“ I may with modesty affirm, that very many of the Members were learned, judicious, and well principled ; yet I know the majority of the House were fermented into a little frowardness, being crossed at their first sitting in that choice, which they conceived to be their inherent right to determine. And now, upon presumption that at another meeting the minds of men will be better composed, and disposition to passion and stiffness be wholly stilled, I offer it as my humble opinion, that it would be a most commendable office in my Lords the Justices to advise and solicit their Majesties to call a Parliament. Such reasons as do occur from matters of State and Government it does not become me to understand or meddle with ; but I may be allowed to represent to your Lordships (sic) what benefit may accrue thereby to the kingdom, by curing and preventing many epidemical grievances.

“There are many obsolete and useless statutes now in force, and some dangerous, which for the ease and honour of the nation ought to be abrogated. How near were we in the last reign to feel the direful efforts of a bigoted clergy, actuated by Popish principles ? and therefore how necessary it is to abolish that statute, De heretico comburendo ! We want many beneficial laws relating to religion, peace, and our secular interest, in which England is beforehand with us, and has set us good precedents, easy to be copied. We have no coercive laws against Papists, nor punitive, besides that 1<sup>mo</sup> Elizabethæ; and though by a side wind we drive them from sitting in Parliament, yet should they be hardened by a Jesuitical equ[iv]ocation to claim their right, we cannot directly oppose them, having no express law on our side. The statute of Stabbing hath been found very available in England, while through the defect of it here, the murderer escapes by the benefit of clergy. A fine or the pillory does not terrify a flagitious villain from taking away his neighbour’s life or estate, by forgery or perjury, since the punishment bears no proportion with the crime. Those devilish sort of men called Tories, or Rapparees, do begin to swarm in every country, while we stand in need of some positive law for the taking and killing them, or bringing them to justice. The laws at present in force are not extensive enough against counterfeiting and clipping of true coin, or bringing in of false. The kingdom is grown lean for want of trade. If some well contrived laws were enacted to encourage foreign commerce and domestic manufactures, it would infallibly prevent the consumption of the body politic.” . . .

SHEREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, July 20, Whitehall.—“Here enclosed I send you the copy of a letter from the States to her Majesty, and two memorials from their Ambassador here, desiring a review of the sentence against the Jager. The first of these memorials I did by her Majesty’s directions immediately lay before the Council, who were then unanimously of opinion that it would be endless to consent to such reviews ; upon which I writ to the Ambassador that letter I formerly sent you, and he appeared well satisfied with it. But upon some wrong representation of this matter in Holland, he has received fresh orders to insist upon it again.

The States have writ the enclosed letter to her Majesty, and the Ambassador has delivered this second memorial, both which I did yesterday lay before the Lords of the Council, who are again unanimously of opinion that by no means a review ought to be granted; that the Treaty is fully complied with by the judgment given by the Lords of Appeal, which being a Commission of the whole Council, and of none but Privy Councillors, doth fully answer the 12th Art[icle], which they insist upon; and my Lord Keeper in Council did declare that, it being a case of property, the Queen in Council could not determine it." . . .

1694, July 24, Whitehall.—“I received your Lordship's of the 17th of July, and was yesterday by the Queen's directions at a meeting where some Lords were appointed to consider of your letter, and of that of the other two Lords Justices; and though I must do most of the Lords that were then present, the right to say that they inclined to your opinion in hoping all former differences might be accommodated, and all of them agreed that a Parliament would be necessary to the settlement of Ireland, yet when we came to consider of the forms requisite before that can be called, we computed that though the King should upon the first application give directions for the summoning a Parliament, it would be November before they could meet, which being a time the Parliament of England is to sit, the old established maxim, that the two Parliaments ought not to be held at the same time, will make it impossible to think of doing it before the spring; and I earnestly recommend to your Lordship to use your interest in the meantime to unite the divisions, that we may in time give the King so good a prospect of that Session that it may not fail at least then to be held.”

By the next post I shall be able to give you an account in what readiness we are to send over the four Regiments, it having been considered before the Lords of the Committee here whether something might not be attempted with success upon the Port of Dunkirk by my Lord Berkley. In that case my Lord says it will be easy for him to take the Regiments on board and land them at Ostend, without the charge or delay of transport ships. This will be resolved tomorrow or next day; if negatively, ships shall be immediately provided.

“ Since his Majesty is of opinion that the Swedish demands be treated by Mr. Robinson, he shall by the next post have what assistance can be sent him from hence, and I hope sufficient to lessen extremely their pretensions.

“ The Duke of Newcastle, who, by the King's direction and the Duke of Devonshire's resignation, is Lord Lieutenant of Nottinghamshire, does likewise desire he may be Custos Rotulorum of the same county. When my late Lord Kingstown died, who enjoyed both, the Duke of Devonshire passed a patent for Lord Lieu[tenant], but not for Custos, so that ever since there has been none. I suppose, this being the case, and the King having conferred other marks of his favour upon the Duke of Newcastle, [he] will make no scruple of adding this; but her Majesty would take no resolution till I received his Majesty's pleasure upon it.

“ The Spanish Amb[assador] has made great application to her Majesty for saving the life of <sup>o</sup>Claudius Wilt, who was condemned at Worcester this time twelvemonth for a robbery, and then reprieved by the Queen; but, as I am informed, his Majesty, examining this matter further the last winter, thought fit to recall the reprieve, and the man was to be executed about this time; but two or three days ago the Amb[assador] assuring her Majesty that the Elec[tor] of Bavaria so far interested himself in the life of this person that he would make it his request, and a reprieve would certainly come from his Majesty, though possibly too late to save the man's life, her Majesty has once again respited the execution till the 17th of September, and in the mean time desires his Majesty's pleasure whether the man shall then suffer, or be pardoned.

"I here enclosed send you what answers have been made this post by advice of the Council to the States' letter to the Queen and to their Amb[assador's] memorial about the Jager. Sir Paul Rycaut and Mr. Cressett write both very despairingly to me concerning the matter they have been particularly concerned in, so much that Sir Paul proposes the discharging the myrmidons he has kept in pay upon that account. ## SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 3, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 10th of this month, new style, and have in answer to it writ a letter this evening to the Lords of the Treasury in behalf of Mr. Cressett.

“My Lord Berkeley, who has this night orders to go to Dunkirk to try what he can do upon Du Bart, and what Mr. Matthews (?) can do upon the forts, has orders to receive on board and land at Ostend the three Regiments of Cutts, Collier, and Rada, so that you may expect them very soon there, but in an equipage I doubt to do*but little service, they being weak as to men, not 500 the strongest, and wanting horses and other equipage for the officers, which must be sent from hence at the same time as Bellasysse, who, for want of money, transport vessels,<sup>s</sup> and other excuses, I conclude, will not embark but with Winn’s Dragoons, which will be about a fortnight hence.

“I have dispatched to Mr. Robinson by this post great part of his instructions. I find he is a little frightened at the negotiation, and thinks it will not end so well as I persuade myself it must, unless the Swedes are more unreasonable than I can suspect any people to be.”

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] Aug. 4, Dublin Castle.—“Col. Hamilton, in pursuance of his business, will wait upon your Grace for your favour towards the dispatch of his grant. . . .

“He is certainly worthy your Grace’s espousing his concerns, and if you find my hand not to the report, it’s not out of unkindness to him; for the other Lords Justices and myself differing in the last clause touching the repair of the garrisons being applied to every report that now goes from us, I conceived the King was too confined; the which sentiment of mine I did convey to the King by the hands of my constant good friend, my Lord Godalphin, which was afterwards read, as I am informed, at the Cabinet; and it has so happened for we have had several letters (in extraordinary cases of merit since) from their Majesties, for the disposition of some of those forfeited lands.”

[MR. BRODRICK, SENIOR, TO LORD CAPEL.]

1694, Aug. 5, Corke.—“I have here had an opportunity of discoursing most of the gentlemen of this county, and several of the counties of Limerick and Kerry, and in my way down took as many as possibly I could, and have not met one single man of another mind than what your Lordship desires; and I dare answer for it, they will not fail your expectations. But they are generally desirous of having those previous things done before the meeting of a Parliament, which I mentioned to your Lordship; several very honest men being jealous of a Parliament’s being called only in order to give money; and this I am very confident is spread abroad by our enemies in order to startle and render them dissatisfied.

“My Lord, I do not speak my own words only. If I have any credit with your Lordship, give me leave to pledge it, that your Lordship will find our party as entire as ever men were, and every one of them as faithful to the King’s interest, and as truly devoted to your Lordship’s service, as ever were yet known in this or any other kingdom. And though we cannot brag of great riches, yet, with the greatest alacrity in the world, we will lay the last groat we have at the King’s feet, not doubting but that his Majesty, when he shall be truly informed, will be graciously pleased to give that settlement, and free us from those oppressions, which we promised ourselves from his happy accession to the Crown.”

“That Sir Clowdesley Shovell having writ to me showing a desire either to have Capt. Bemboe or Capt. Warren for the executing the attempt upon Dunkirk, that the Lords of the Admiralty be desired that one of those two officers be commanded to him.

“An order from the Queen to Mr. Russell to pursue the contents of these enclosed instructions dated the 14th August, though they should not be delivered to him till after he come on this side Cadiz, provided he be not so far advanced in his way towards Eng[land] that he shall judge it inconsistent with the safety of the Fleet to return. And that Mr. Russell, upon the receipt of this, immediately send away ten ships of the third rate, or above that rate.

“A letter to the Admiralty to provide and send away some proper vessel that is a good sailer, to carry orders to Mr. Russell, and to give him such instructions as may most properly meet Mr. Russell if he should return from the Mediterranean.

“Instructions to the messenger that is to be sent, for the throwing overboard the orders in case he should be taken by the enemy.

“That an extract of that part of the King’s letter dated the 9th of September that relates to Mr. Russell be sent him.”

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1694, Aug. 6.—“I have your Lordship’s of the 8th of August and cannot recollect that in any of mine I did insinuate there was a coldness in the Councils here towards the having a Parliament in Ireland. I must declare quite the contrary, that persons appeared promoters of it I did not expect it from, and nothing in appearance did obstruct it, but the impossibility of calling one before that here must necessarily sit.

“I have represented this inconvenience to his Majesty and to my Lord Portland, not only as to the prejudice the delay may be in Ireland, but likewise, that if the people of that country shall think they have reason to despair of having a Parliament sit of a long time, they will undoubtedly address themselves to the Parliament here, for the relief of those complaints they hoped to have remedied there; and nothing that the King’s worse enemies can devise will more effectually interrupt the King’s business than such an application, which cannot be thought unreasonable in the gentlemen of Ireland, if it will appear to be their only refuge.

“This argument, with what else has been alleged, has inclined the King to assure me by my Lord Portland, that the sitting of a Parliament in Ireland shall not be deferred longer than the next spring; and he has commanded me to assure everybody that positively they may depend it shall no further be delayed. If your Lordship has not already had the same directions and assurances, when you write to my Lord Portland, I wish you would take notice that I have acquainted you with such a resolution of his Majesty’s, but that you think it would be for the service that you were empowered to promise the same thing, as what will most effectually stop any applications from thence hither. I can think of nothing better, unless it were advisable immediately to summon one, and continue it by prorogation till that time; but this is a sudden thought just come into my head whilst I am writing, and may possibly be liable to great objections.

“I send this by Col. Ham[ilton], who, upon the short acquaintance I have had with him, seems a very honest, well disposed gentleman to the public.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Aug. 6-16, Mont St. André.—“I have the honour of both your Grace’s letters of the 27th and 31st past, upon reading of which to the King, his Majesty does very much approve of the sending over the four Regiments by the way of Ostend, in case it be thought fit that my Lord Berkeley do make an attempt upon the Port of Dunkirk.

“His Majesty has been inclined, by what your Grace has writ, to have the Suedish demands examined and inquired into by Mr. Robinson at Stockholm, but has given him no orders as yet to treat of their satisfaction, since the justice of their pretensions is first to be made appear.

“What your Grace proposes with relation to the Duke of Newcastle is agreed to by his Majesty, so that your Grace may be pleased to give the necessary orders in it.

“His Majesty has heard nothing from the Elector of Bavaria nor anyone here about Claudius Wilt, so that his Majesty sees no reason why the sentence may not be executed upon him.

“Sir Paul Rycaut has, according to order from hence, discharged the people he had in pay.

“ I am now to signify his Majesty’s pleasure to your Grace that Mr. John Hawks be made one of their Majesties’ Counsel-at-law. And his Majesty has further commanded me to take notice to your Grace that the term for settling the Regulations of the East India Company expiring at Michaelmas next, and his Majesty thinking they cannot be well settled before that time, [he] is desirous that the Company do agree to the prolonging of the term, that there may be more leisure for the settling the necessary Regulations.

“ His Majesty has been pleased to appoint one Mr. Kerby, an inhabitant of Amsterdam, to be their Majesties’ Consul and Agent there.

“ The French having made preparations to pass the Meuse and to reinforce Mons. La Valette, who commands in Flanders that way, we are like to march in a day or two to Flerus, which leads the same way, so as to take our advantages by being beforehand with the enemy.

Re. Aug. the 10th.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 7, Whitehall.—“ We are in hopes the Fleet is this morning sailed, though we have yet no account of it, to put in execution those designs upon Dunkirk I mentioned in my last, The wind is fair, and they taking the three Regiments with them. I suppose it will not be long before they are landed at Ostend, where they will stand in need of orders from you. It has been proposed that a draft of men should be made out of the Regiments who have remained here out of service this whole summer, and be sent over to reinforce these three, who are now gone out of the way of being otherwise recruited, if his Majesty directs that it may be done; but then it should be considered that there being several prisoners taken at Brest, which I suppose will be exchanged and return again to their respective Regiments, if these are made up complete, when their prisoners return, they will be above their complement.

“ Upon the death of Phil. Darcy there is a vacancy in the Prize Office, which may give his Majesty an opportunity, if he pleases, of satisfying one Mr. Paschull, a very industrious, indefatigable man in any business, and one whose principles incline him to be very zealous for his Majesty, and he appeared among the earliest gentlemen who came to Exeter, but since having been overlooked in all employments he has been a little angry. But that which will speak most in his favour is, what you I suppose know better than I, that he had an equal number of votes with Sir James Houblon this last Session to be in the Commission of Accounts, and lost it only by the Speaker’s casting vote; so that his Majesty by employing him will seem to approve the choice of the House of Commons. He is an active, busy man that can do considerable good or harm in the City, and in ta[1]king amongst a multitude of acquaintance has (sic), and has a very particular interest with the present Lord Mayor. My Lord Keeper I believe has mentioned him to the Queen, for he and Mr. Secretary and I agreed in our wishes this morning that he might have the place."

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] Aug. 8, Dublin Castle.—“Your Grace’s of the 24th of July coming so soon after the reading our letters before the Queen, and the judgment of the Lords not unfavourable to that of mine, the first is an instance of your great favour and kindness to me, and the other of no little satisfaction to me. But methinks, my Lord, something I observe in your letter, as if there were a coldness yet in the Council towards the calling of a Parliament. From whence this should arise I know not, unless the King expects, before they are called, an assurance of the confirmation of the Articles of Limerick. If that be the obstacle, and you will let me know it, I will send you word how far that is like to be obtained.

“However, in the meantime, I will do as you advise me, and, to use your own words, earnestly endeavour to apply all the little interest I have to compose differences, in order to so noble an end, as bringing King and Parliament together, in order to a right understanding between them. But to the best of my apprehensions, were the misrepresentations on your side taken away, little would remain of differences to be composed here; for the miseries of this country consist not in divisions amongst themselves, but poverty and insecurity are the motives to their disquiet. Men do not purchase or cultivate, in despair of no settlements by Parliament, and the apprehensions they have of future rebellions.

“As to the Government, that groans under the burthen of a daily increasing debt. In my Lord Sydney’s time it was but 70,000*l.* which he demanded of the Parliament, and it’s now increased to a 184,117*l.* 1*s.* 9½*d.*, being able only to pay the subsistence, and the remainder by little parcels towards satisfying the Civil List. And ’tis no less than sixty odd thousand pounds that will be the yearly increase of the debt, considering there is no hopes of the increase of the Revenue whilst the war remains. So that if some Ministers who truly love the King and this interest do not endeavour to settle this kingdom, I fear they will be a prey to the next comers, or be under-hand dealing with the Parliament of England for protection.

“Here is (to me) a surprising letter this last post come to us as the result of your counsels upon reading our two letters, viz. : that we should be sure to signify to the gentry that the King will not depart from his right in the raising of money bills; as if one should say, unless you promise this, you shall have no Parliament. Besides this, there is little in S[ec.] Trenchard’s letter; whereas the country desires to forget what is past, and settle the kingdom upon the next meeting of a Parliament, and give the King what money is necessary. To justify which, I will here send you a letter out of Munster from a leading person there, and in Parliament for the sole right, which came to me this morning.<sup>o</sup> I likewise send you the copy of a letter from a prudent person, whose sentiments I desired to have touching the last Parliament and calling of another."†

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 14, Whitehall.—“I here enclosed send you a letter from Sir Clowdesley Shovel, which will give you some account of an affront a Danish man-of-war has offered to his Majesty’s Fleet in the Downs. The seamen are so picked [pique], and the nation is so concerned for anything that may prejudice that dominion on the seas which they think the Crown has great interest and right to support, that I am apprehensive this may lead us to an extremity with the Danes which may be inconvenient to the public cause, especially if that Court resent it in the same haughty, unreasonable manner that their Agent here expresses himself in; who has this day sent me a letter upon this subject, blaming our men-of-war, and excusing his master’s, in language so insolent that I think he deserves worse usage than what the frigate has met with. Mr. Secretary, who has received the full information of this matter in a letter from the Admiralty, will I suppose acquaint you how their Lordships have stopped this man-of-war with the merchantmen under his convoy, and what other orders they have given, till such time as his Majesty has considered and given directions in the matter.

“The Lords of the Com[mittee] have appointed tomorrow morning to meet about it, and in the meanwhile have directed me to write to Mr. Gregg to give the same notice he did the last year to the masters of our merchant ships which are homeward bound from the East Sea, that they make no stay at Elsinore or any other port of the King of Denmark’s, but that they make their rendezvous at Gottenbourg, and there wait for the convoy that is to bring them home. I was the readier immediately to dispatch this order, as I have done this night, because of a surmise I find in a letter from Sir Paul Rycout, grounded upon one he received from Mr. Gregg of the 4th of August, which is a fresher date than any I have received from Copenhagen, as if the King of Denmark, being at Elsenour (sic), had invited the commanders of our ships to dinner, with a design to have secured them all in revenge for the ships we stopped here in the Channel, but that the wind coming fair before the dinner was ready deprived the officers of that honour, but secured them from the treachery if any was designed against them.

“My Lord Berkley writes from the Downs that he designed to send the three Regiments yesterday in the evening to Ostend if the badness of the weather did not prevent him.

“Saturday night last Col. Parker made his escape from the Tower. My Lord Lucas and the Deputy Governor, upon examination finding it impossible that he could get out any other way than by the door, though some contrivances were used to persuade that he got up the chimney, have seemed to intend to prosecute the Warders and Gentleman Gaoler, whom they suspect to have conspired his escape. A proclamation will be in print tomorrow with rewards for whoever shall retake him.

“According to the direction in your letters of the 6th and 9th I have discoursed with Sir John Fleet, the Dep[uty] Gov[ernor] of the East India Comp[any], and endeavoured to persuade him to a compliancy with his Majesty’s desires. I perceive he thinks that the very noise of prolonging the term for settling the Regulations would be a great blow to their reputation, which is not in a good condition to bear it; but he says, though he be Dep[uty] Gov[ernor], he is but lately come into the Comp[any], and is ignorant of their concerns, so dares make no answer without calling a Court, which it will be necessary to allow some time for the doing, most of the leading men being out of town, Sir Tho. Cook at Tunbridge, others at their own houses and at the Bath; but in conclusion I got him to promise he would summon one with all possible expedition, if he be as good as his word.

“I shall tomorrow write to the Lords of the Treasury in relation to the Brunswick troops, but I fear you will not receive so speedy an answer as you may expect, their Lordships having been adjourned for some time, and do not as I am informed design to meet before a week or ten days at the soonest.”

Re. the 25. of Aug.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 17, Whi[tehall].—"In my last I acquainted you with this unlucky occasion of difference that has happened between us and Denmark, and what was ordered thereupon by the Lords Com[missioners] of the Ad[miralty]. Her Majesty, by the advice of those Lords who have met to consider what was fit to be done to repair this injury, has commanded the Danish man-of-war to be brought up and secured in the River of Thames, but the Danish merchantmen detained upon this occasion should be discharged. I was likewise directed to write a letter to Mr. Gregg to the effect of this enclosed, but it being a matter of too nice a nature for anybody here to judge how far it may consist with the whole scheme of his Majesty's designs to resent this injury, which is certainly both in the nature and extent of it a most sensible wrong to the Crown of England, and must some way or other be repaired, I was commanded not to send the letter directly to Mr. Gregg, but to enclose it to you, that if it receive his Majesty's approbation it may by you immediately be sent forward as directed; but if not drawn agreeable to his Majesty's inclinations upon this subject, it may then be stopped, and his Majesty will please to direct you to write to Mr. Gregg what may more exactly suit with his Majesty's pleasure.

"The Lords were of opinion that it was not advisable to examine more narrowly into the Captain's orders, which the Danish Commissary or Resident mentions as a justification for him (and which will be better explained to you in his last letter to me), first because what he recites of those orders seems only to command him to wear his flag in all places, which nobody disputes with him, and does not forbid him to strike his flag, the not doing of which is what we complain of; but chiefly because they apprehended, if it should be made plain that the orders were so injurious to his Majesty's right as to forbid him striking to the King's ships anywhere, the Queen would have been under a necessity of resenting this as an injury done by the King of Den[mark], which it will be time enough to take in such a manner if that Court shall think fit to justify their commander.

"In the mean time it was advised that such a complaint as you will find in my letter should be writ against this insolent small Minister for the expressions you will read in his first letter to me; and that when he came to me for an answer, I should say no more to him, but that the mistakes he had committed in his letter had run him into expressions so indecent that I was commanded to return him no answer, but to make my complaint of his carriage at the Court of Denmark.

“It is not to be doubted but this is a very unhappy dispute and fallen out in a most inconvenient time, when the great strength of our Fleet is proposed to be kept at such a distance as will make the Danish marine force, added to what the French may put out, very uneasy to us; but at the same time, if this affront be passed over without a just resentment, it is not to be imagined what clamour it will create, and how the people, who are proud and fond of their Empire in the Sea, will cry out that the honour of Eng[land] is sacrificed; and yet how far the Allies will stand by us in such a quarrel is another question.

“I hope his Majesty will give us directions in this important affair. I have enclosed to Mr. Gregg a copy of the Resident’s first letter only, but have sent you the second also, which I thought not so proper for his view, with a copy of what I writ by the last post and have repeated by a duplicate this,<sup>o</sup> and sent it the straight way to him, to use what precautions we [he?] can to hinder the Danes from seizing upon our ships in the Sound.

“Before I close this letter, it may not be improper to add what I have heard discoursed by those who think themselves best informed in these particulars, of which I confess myself most ignorant. The English men-of-war do never strike their flag in no foreign port, but salute the castles only with the same number of guns they expect should be returned to them. They lay claim to such a dominion in all those seas that are called British that they demand from all nations to have the respect of the Flag paid them everywhere within those limits, and most commonly it is not contested; but if in this case it is sometimes avoided, no nation in no time did ever make a difficulty of striking to the English men-of-war in the English ports; and Sir Charles Hedges informed the Committee that within less than twenty years a Spanish privateer with the King of Spain’s commission was tried and fined for refusing to strike I think to a single man-of-war of England in the Downs; and though there is no treaty that yields this superiority of the Flag or mentions it that I know, except that with the Dutch, yet custom uncontested for a long time does seem to give a very strong a title” (sic—strong title?).

His Majesty admires the insolence of Pauli, and approves of your Grace’s letter to Mr. Greys, with the alteration only which your Grace will find in the enclosed from me, which I forwarded last night with the other to him. And it is to be hoped, by what your Grace will receive by this packet from Mr. Robinson, that whatever resolution the King of Denmark may take, the Suedes will disavow this proceeding, as they have the measures the Danes had proposed to them upon the late occasion of our having brought up and examined the ships of both nations.

“The three Regiments arrived at Ostend will be put in quarters of refreshment, and for the recruiting of them, it is his Majesty’s pleasure that orders be given for making a draft of three hundred men out of the several Regiments of foot that are near enough to London (the Guards and the Regiments of Norcott and Faringdon only excepted), and embarking them for Ostend from the River of Thames. Your Grace will please to signify his Majesty’s directions herein, and some officers of each of these three Regiments may be soon expected in England to take care of the men, for whom 40s. per head will be paid by the Regiments, besides a consideration for the clothing they shall take away.

“The Regiments of Norcott and Faringdon are designed by his Majesty for Jamaica; and because the force that is now in England will be lessened by it, his Majesty thinks fit that Sir H. SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 24, Whitehall.—“I have here enclosed sent you a copy of the answer I received from Sir John Fleet, Gov[ernor] of the East India Company. Upon discourse with them I find they think the suspension of the Regulations is such a rod over their heads that the very disreputation of it would inevitably cause their ruin. It is therefore to little purpose to endeavour to persuade them to consent to it. I had her Majesty's commands to lay it before the Lords of the Committee, who could advise nothing else to be done, but to return the answer by the first opportunity to his Majesty, and desire his further commands upon it; for I perceive the Lords could not among themselves propose any new regulations they thought necessary or proper.

"You will be informed by Mr. Sec[retary's] letter that her Majesty has not laid aside the attempt upon Dunkirk. The objections my Lord Berkley had to undertaking it, arose chiefly from consulting pilots, who, as we are informed, were ignorant of the place, and from a want of small frigates to sustain his fireships, machine vessels, or what others should be necessary to send in to destroy either Du Bart or the forts. As to the last defect, her Majesty, upon laying up the great ships, has commanded Sir Clow. Shovell, with what frigates were belonging to the main Fleet, to join with Hopson; and has writ a letter to the Commander of the Dutch upon that station to assist in whatever upon their joining shall be thought advisable for annoying the enemy. If those Dutch ships make no difficulty of this service, and Du Bart remains still in the Road, I have great hopes of success in this business, and could wish for greater security that his Majesty would send an order to those Dutch ships to obey Sir Clowdesley Shovell, or the Commander-in-chief of the English squadron, upon this occasion; it may possibly come time enough to them to remove difficulties.

"And for the procuring pilots better acquainted with that place Mr. Maisters is gone to Ostend or Newport, where he promises himself he shall find them, but desired me to write to you, that the King would get from (sic) the Elector of Bavaria [to] send to him an order to the Governors of Ostend and Newport to furnish Mr. Maisters with such a number of pilots as will be necessary for the service. There are now three posts due."

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, [Aug. 27.-] Sept. 6, Camp at Wouterghem, between Deinse and Thielt.—"Sir, . . . Yesterday my Lord Lexington set out from the Camp on his way to Cologne, from whence his Lordship will make a step to the Courts of Lunebourg to visit those Princes, who have expressed a great desire to see his Lordship. From thence his Lordship will proceed to Vienna, where his presence will be the more necessary upon the alarm that will be taken from the apprehension of Admiral Russell's returning home this winter with the Fleet. The King was pleased to give his Lordship some additional instructions, a copy whereof I have here enclosed, and pray your Grace to observe that by the last instruction it will be necessary that powers be sent in the usual form from England, to be made use of by his Lordship in the case therein mentioned.

R. 1 [Sept.].

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, [Aug. 30.-] Sept. 9, Camp at Rouselaer.—"His Majesty has seen your Grace's letters of the 21st and 24th past, and in relation to the Parliament has commanded me to acquaint your Grace that as he cannot reckon upon his being in England before the latter end of October, new style, his Majesty leaves it to the Queen to put off the Parliament to such time as shall be thought fit.

“His Majesty has understood by the accounts received directly from Rear Admiral Hopson, the difficulties he meets with by remaining so long upon that coast; but inasmuch as by Sir Cloudesly Shovell’s instructions the ships under his command are to be likewise assisting in the enterprise against Dunkirk, his Majesty does not think fit to give him any directions from hence, but is willing that the Lords of the Admiralty dispose of that squadron as they shall judge most fitting.

“Mr. Meesters is arrived in these parts, and is going to Ostend and Newport for the procuring such pilots as may be necessary, wherein he will be assisted by the Government here. His Majesty is not satisfied with the answer of the East India Company.

Re. the 6th, o.s.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 28, Wh[itehall].— . . . “Intelligence being come that Du Bart with his squadron is gone into the harbour of Dunkirk, any attempt upon that place is not judged so pressing, but that Hopson, complaining much of the condition of his ships, and the hazard they lie in, is ordered to the Downs, leaving a clean ship and an advice-boat to give an account of Bart’s motions there, and to send a frigate to Ostend to convey<sup>d</sup> Mr. Maisters and his pilots to the Downs also; where Sir Cloudesley Shovell will, upon advice with them all, be better able to resolve what can be done upon that place, our English pilots making such difficulties that, if the Dutch do the like, the very carrying in the frigates to favour any attempt will be hazardous.”

[MR. BENJAMIN LODINGTON to CONSUL BLACKWELL.]

1694, Aug. 30, Tripoli di Barbaria.—“The 25th ultimo, the Dey of this place sent for me, and after some Turkish compliments he told me that contrary to his will the war was made with the English; for which excusing himself with the damage the French did to the town, and the danger of their doing more, and also their importuning them to make war, which action contrary to their minds they condescended to, as being always very desirous of amity with the English, and no act of hostility having happened, they are willing to renew the peace again, and if I would assume the place of a Consul that they would esteem me as the same, and so a cessation of arms to be held firm for six months, until the King should order some of his ships to come and conclude a peace with them. I thanked them for their kindness, as also for the many favours I had received of them, but to take any charge upon me I could not do it; but if they pleased to write [to] the King of England and acquaint him how well they are inclined to a peace, it would be accepted by him, and accordingly he would send to treat with them. So having brought them to this, for want of a conveyance to forward their letter to his Majesty. I freighted a barque for Malta, which sent [I send?] to my brother, to whom they also write that, if he had orders to renew the peace, not to stay for men-of-war, but if he'll please to come they would give him all honourable entertainment. This business I have had in motion some time, but the French faction kept it off till I found a way to make a division amongst them, and so carried it in spite of all what the French envoy could do to the contrary; which put him into an intolerable passion, and in his rage [he] used some extravagances to the Dey, upon which he narrowly escaped being banished and sent in a boat to Tunis, besides most basely abused with words."

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, Aug. 31.—"Lord Keeper, Lord President, Lord Normanbie, Lord Shrewsbury.

"That with the memorial relating to the Fees, the Lords of the Adm[iralty] be desired to send an account of the Establishment, to be laid before her Majesty.

"A letter to the Ad[miralty] signifying her Majesty's pleasure that, notwithstanding her commands signified by Mr. Secretary yesterday, it is now her Majesty's pleasure that Vice-Admiral Hopson continues (sic) to follow his former orders till he shall be relieved, and then to follow such other orders as he shall receive from the Lords of the Admiralty. And that upon Sir Clow. Shovell's going to the coast of Flanders, the Lords of the Ad[miralty] have power to dispose to other service the ships that are with him as they think advisable."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Aug. 31, Whitehall.—. . . "By advice of the Committee Mr. Secretary did signify yesterday the Queen's pleasure to the Lords of the Admiralty to call Hopson to the Downs, as acquainted you in my last; but a Committee meeting this morning, and considering the consequence it might be to permit Du Bart in that interim to escape, destroy the fishery, take the East India ships expected to (sic) Holland, or intercept the fleet of stores coming from the Sound, their Lordships have changed their opinion; and upon their advice her Majesty has commanded me, in Mr. Secretary's absence, to signify her pleasure that Hopson remain there till he be relieved by Sir Clowdesley Shovell, which I have accordingly done this afternoon; and the Admiralty have promised that the contradictory orders to Vice-Ad[miral] Hopson shall be sent this evening.

"The Lords of the Admiralty have represented that it is of absolute necessity a strong squadron be immediately ordered to protect the stores-ships expected from the Sound about the middle of September; for the Navy Board have laid before them that in case the Danes should detain those ships, the Fleet cannot be equipped the next year for want of stores. It is designed that when Sir Clow. Shovell joins Hopson upon the coast of Flanders and takes his station to observe Du Bart, or, if it be found feasible, to destroy him or the harbour of Dunkirk, that then Hopson be detached northward with such a strength as the Danes cannot immediately set out to stop the merchantmen, especially they having before had orders not to touch at any port belonging to the King of Denmark, but to rendezvous at Gottenberg.

"I find Sir Henry Bellasys' Lieut.-Col. is very desirous, and pretends the whole Reg[iment] are so too, to go to Jamaica, but I suppose they will be embarked for Flanders before his Majesty's pleasure can be known upon that. However, the Lieut.-Col. himself is so fond of the journey that he desires he may stay behind the Reg[iment] one week, to know his Majesty's pleasure whether, if a Reg[iment] be sent thither, he may not be thought worthy of that command. I am a stranger to the gentleman and his merits, but it is what I believe many in his post will not be found fond of."

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Sept. 3-13, Roselaer.—. . . "Orders are given to our Army on this side the Lis to hut,* which shows the intention of staying in our present camps until the troops shall be disposed of into winter quarters. His Majesty I believe will be very desirous to see an end of the siege of Huy before his leaving the Army."

Re. the 14th, o.s.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Sept. 4, Whitehall.—"Mr. Secretary Trenchard being gone for some time into the country for the recovery of his health, and having in his absence entrusted me to open and answer his letters, I am to acknowledge yours to him as well as to myself of the 2nd and 6th of September, n.s.

“The Committee of Plantations have frequently met to put everything in a forwardness to obey his Majesty’s commands, which they have now received. Transport ships are preparing to embark the two Reg[iments], one at Portsmouth and the other at Plymouth; but the Commissioners represent it as a difficult task to provide enough. Notice has been sent to the Colonels Norcot and Faringdon. The last is now in town, and Mr. Smith of the Treasury, who is his uncle, and others of his friends have desired me if possible to get him with the Regiment excused. The same must be expected from Col. Norcot when the news comes to his knowledge, who is now in the West. At the same time Col. Lilliston came to me yesterday, and offered his and his Regiment’s service, seeming rather to desire to go than to remain here; and his Regiment, being quartered at Plymouth, lies as convenient for transportation as any other, if his Majesty shall think fit to direct it. But the land-men will certainly be ready before the ships which are to carry them, and before the provisions and other necessaries that must be sent at the same time. By the last paragraph of one of the enclosed papers you will see what naval strength is designed. I thought the whole worth sending, because it is a state the Lords of the Ad[miralty] did lay before the Committee some time since, of what ships remain here for all services.

“I have likewise sent you an account of such ships as are designed for Dunkirk, the Sound convoy, and the fisheries; which last the Dutch being inquisitive to be informed of, I have sent it also to Mr. Prior. We have yet no news that Sir Clow. Shovell is sailed from the Downs, which I admire at, but doubt, by a postscript I see in a letter from him to the Lords of the Ad[miralty], he has mistook the orders to him. By the first opportunity I shall write to Mr. Stanhop to the effect you recommend in yours of the 2nd to Mr. Secretary.

“According to his Majesty’s commands in yours of the 2nd to me, I have directed Mr. Clerk that a draft of 300 men be made out of the Regiments near London, the Guards [under] Norcot and Faringdon excepted, and sent with all speed. We hear nothing yet of any officers come over to receive them.

“Her Majesty commands me to acquaint you that she will write to the King about Mr. Hill’s succeeding to the Master of St. Cross, but I doubt I am too well informed that it is not in the King’s but in the Bishop of Winchester’s gift, who has already disposed of it; but I have sent to Mr. Attorney to inquire into his Majesty’s title.

“A[a]ron Smith informs me that one Lieut. Drommond, in the Lord Stranaver’s Regiment, will be of great use here upon some trials, and does earnestly desire he may be sent hither with all speed.

“Whilst I am writing they bring me a paper which Col. Lilleston (sic) has left here, a copy of which I enclose to you, not so much for anything in it, as to show that I imagine, if he goes, he will expect some distinction or advancement beyond a Colonel; and I should be glad to be informed how far his Majesty will approve of any such favour to him or to either of the other Colonels, if they are to go.

“Her Majesty has been a little indisposed with a cold these two days, but has taken the air this evening, and is better; but that you may not be in pain till the next post arrives, you may be sure, if any alteration should happen for the worse, his Majesty shall be acquainted with it by express.”

PORTLAND TO SHREWSBURY.

Mr. Blathwait n'en a auquune cognoissance. Vous jugerez peut estre ce que le Roy de Den<sup>k</sup> veut faire sur le sujet de son Cap<sup>e</sup>; il me semble que ces ordres sont concus de maniere quils se contredisent; les termes sont fort fiers, de la premiere lettre.

“La guarnison de Liege doit avoir investi Huy aujourd'hui, ce qui retiendra apparemment le Roy plus long temps en campagne quil n'avoit creu lui mesme. La cavallerie du Roy marche demain pour s'approcher d'ici, et pour cantonner derriere cette armée. Lon dit que Mr. le Dauphin doit partir demain ou apres-demain pour sen retourner en France.

Il advoua quil avoit esté suborné pour le faire, et nomma les gens qui lavoit (sic) induit a cela. Il a esté bruslé tout vif quatre jours passé; en mourant il ne temoigna point de repentir, disant quil avoit voulu servir son Dieu et son Roy. Il pretendoit avoir esté obligé de quitter l'armee de France pour sestre battu, et il demandoit de l'employ, que lon navoit garde de lui donner, puis quon ne le donne a personne de ces sorte de gens, ausquels nous ne nous fions pas quant ils pretendroit (sic) avoir quittez pour la Religion.

Copies of two letters in German from the King of Denmark to the Danish Councillor in England, dated 7th and 25th August, authorising him to complain to the King of England and the English ministers of the conduct of certain English commanders and captains of English and Dutch frigates, who, in convoying a large Couvardie<sup>2</sup> fleet from Cronenburg to the West Sea, failed to render the ancient and accustomed homage to the King's palace and castle; and also touching an attack by an English captain on a Danish captain off the English coast, in the Downs.

SEC. BLATHWATT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Sept. 6-16, Rouselaer.—“I have the honour of your Grace's letter of the 28th and 31st past, and one of the former date from Mr. Secretary Trenchard, which at the same time I take leave to answer to your Grace, as Mr. Secretary upon his going out of town has desired me.

“I find your Grace under an apprehension that the packet-boat with our letters of the 2nd, if not those of the 6th instant, may have been taken by the French; for which reason I enclose copies of what I writ by the first of those posts, as I should do of the second, if there were anything of present consideration which has not been since repeated. . . .

“I have a letter from Mr. Meesters, dated at Ostend, the 14th instant, wherein he says Sir Cloudesly Shovell was arrived the day before with the Fleet before Gravelines, and that he was going on board with the pilots he had got, so that we are expecting the good success of that expedition, after which his Majesty hopes the design against Calais may be yet proceeded on this season.

“His Majesty approves of the precautions that are intended to secure the return of our Eastland ships, but observes withall that it will be very difficult to put it out of the power of the Danes to stop them, since they are to pass through the Sound and under Cronenburg Castle, where all merchant ships are obliged to give an account of their lading.

“His Majesty has considered Mr. Secretary's letter and papers enclosed, and approves of the measures that are taken in everything as far as relates to Admiral Russell's Fleet; his Majesty intending likewise to take care that the Dutch convoys be ordered to accompany ours to Cadiz as is proposed. . . .

“[P.S.] One Thomas Bew, of Thame in Oxfordshire, left England about three years past upon an accusation of robbing upon the highway, and has ever since rid in the Third Troop of Guards, where he has behaved himself very well and been wounded in the two last battles; in consideration whereof his Majesty is pleased to grant him his pardon, and would therefore have your Grace do what is necessary for passing the same upon the application of some person from him.

“The enclosed extract of a letter from Mr. Kirk<sup>o</sup> is to shew what has been done in the dispatch of the King's orders to Admiral Russell, who sailed westward from Barcelona the  $\frac{1}{2}$ <sup>o</sup> past.

“The news from Brest comes usually to Mr. Secretary Trenchard, but I send this copy to your Grace upon account of the preparations therein mentioned for the West Indies.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Sept. 7, Whitehall.—“I will begin with acquainting you that her Majesty, God be thanked, is perfectly recovered of her late indisposition, having let blood upon Wednesday.

“I have a letter from Maisters since his arrival at Margat with his pilots; he is once again in great hopes of the success of his undertaking, and as soon as the weather permits the Fleet will sail in order to that attempt.

“I am to acknowledge yours to Mr. Secretary and to myself of the 9th, n.s. The Committee met and sat so late last night to dispatch the orders to Mr. Russell, that though I maintained his Majesty’s directions relating to Calais, and his dissatisfaction to (sic) the answer of the East India Company, there was not time to come to any resolution upon either. I hope before the next post to give you an account of what is directed in both.

“Her Majesty has put out a Proclamation for proroguing the Parliament till the 25th of October next. I hope before that time his Majesty will be here.

“The enclosed order is dispatched this night to Mr. Russell, with duplicates of her Majesty’s instructions to him of the 14th of August, and her order of the 27th of the same month, which I forbear sending you copies of, concluding Mr. Secretary has done it at the time they were first dispatched to Mr. Russell. The commander of the vessel that carries them hath instructions from the Lords of the Ad[miralty] to steer such a course as may be most probable to meet Mr. Russell in his return.”

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1694, Sept. 7, Whitehall.—His Majesty thinks it of great importance to the common cause that Russell should continue this winter at Cadiz. Sends orders accordingly from her Majesty. Refers to former orders of 14th and 27th August, the latter for sending back ten ships to England.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, Sept. 8.—“Lord President, Lord Normanby, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Romney.

“By her Majesty’s command, a letter to the Lords of the Admiralty to give directions to Sir Clowdesley Shovell.

“That in case those pilots Mr. Masters has brought from Flanders, on purpose for this present service against Dunkirk, will undertake to carry in such ships as Mr. Masters shall propose for the executing this service in the best manner, that he then proceed with the first opportunity to put in execution the design against the Pier, Harbour, [and] Town of Dunkirk, [and] the ships riding in the Road there.

“That the establishment of the Sec[retary] and other officers of the Admiralty Office is approved by her Majesty, not doubting but the Lords of the Admiralty will take care that the end for which those salaries are approved be pursued.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, Sept. 10.—“Lord President, Lord Keeper, Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Romney.

“Signify her Majesty's pleasure to the Lords of the Admiralty that when the attempt upon Dunkirk is over, that Sir Clow. Shovell, with such a number of ships as they shall think proper, do go to Calais, and endeavour to destroy and burn that place, if Sir Clow. Shovell do think the attempt practicable.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Sept. 10-20, Rousselaer.—“His Majesty has seen your Grace's letter of the 4th instant, and does think fit that Colonel Lillingston's Regiment be sent to Jamaica instead of Colonel Faringdon's, but that no other distinction or preeminence be given to the former than is due to his commission; everything else being to be settled in such manner as the Committee shall judge most convenient for his Majesty's service, and particular care being to be taken that the interfering and disagreement of the Governors, Commanders of the squadron and of the land forces, as happened in the two last expeditions in the West Indies, may not render ineffectual the great expense their Majesties will be at on this occasion.

“By this change it is probable both the Regiments will embark at Plymouth; which garrison being at the same time to be relieved by an entire Regiment, his Majesty commands me to signify his pleasure that most especial care be taken that the two Regiments be complete when they go on shipboard, and that no servants be mustered as soldiers; and that if any of the Regiments or companies be found defective on shipboard, the full number be made up out of the Regiment that remains at Plymouth, which is therefore to be one of those that have not suffered at sea, that of Faringdon becoming now liable to the intended drafts as well as any other.

“His Majesty is likewise pleased that the Regiments that have been at sea this summer be excused from the draft of 300 men that are to be sent hither towards completing the Regiments of Cutts, Collier, and Rada, whose officers have had fresh directions to hasten to England and to receive the draft at the Red House, at which place his Majesty directs that the Regiments appointed to furnish the men do deliver them over when shipping shall be ready to take them on board.

“Lieut. Drummond may be expected over with the next packet-boat.

“His Majesty is very much concerned that the Fleet has lost so much fair weather, which might have been made use of against Dunkirk and Calais; the news we had of its being come upon this coast not being confirmed.

“Mr. Methuen having made application to the King for leave to come home for two months, his Majesty has thought fit to grant his request; which your Grace may be pleased to signify to him by the Groin packet-boat.

“I must not forget to acquaint your Grace that Lieut.-Col. Lutterell, of Norcott’s Regiment, being a Member of Parliament, is excused by his Majesty from going with the Regiment to Jamaica.

[P.S.] “The King has ordered the Dutch troop of Guards to begin their march tomorrow for the placing of parties upon the road between this and Loo, so that his Majesty may probably leave the Army within ten days at the furthest.”

R. 26.

SHREWSBURY to the KING.

1694, Sept. 11, Whitehall.—“I shall trouble your Majesty with a few words only to remember you again, Mr. Maynard being dead, what your promise was to Mr. Palmes, and of how great consequence the obliging him will be to the success of your business in Parliament. Though I had writ by the last post, the Lord Keeper [Somers] made me promise to repeat it again tonight.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Sept 11, Whitehall.—“Some merchants trading at Dantzigg delivered me a letter from the Magistrates of that town to his Majesty, complaining that two of their ships were detained here contrary to justice. I informed myself from Sir Cha. Hedges, who tells me these were ships that each of them delivered a lading of wheat at Dunkirk. . . .

“The Danish Minister has been several times with me as a private person, and is much humbled and alarmed at the complaints he has heard have been made of him. . . .

“I have so often told you that the ships were sailing or sailed upon the attempt against Dunkirk, that I am almost ashamed to repeat it. Sir Clow. Shovell, having no great opinion of the design, desired a positive order, and the Admiralty having sent the enclosed, I hear from Deale that yesterday about noon he was sailed out of sight. I suppose you will hear sooner of him than we shall.

“I have also signified her Majesty’s pleasure to the Lords of the Adm[iralty] that when this design upon Dunkirk is over, that they direct Sir Clow. Sho[vell] to attempt the burning or destroying of Calais; and whilst I am writing the Lords of the Adm[iralty] have sent me the enclosed copy of their order to that effect.

“The Lord Maynard’s son, who was Teller in the Exchequer is dead, and a very good employment void.

“Perceiving his Majesty dissatisfied with the answer from the East India Comp[any], by her Majesty’s command, and the advice of the Committee she referred the consideration of it to, I did yesterday discourse with Sir Jo. Fleet and Sir Tho. Coock (sic), the Gov[ernor] and Dep[uty] Gov[ernor], endeavouring to persuade them quietly to agree to prolong the time for regulations; but they persist still to declare, that such a discouragement will infallibly break them, and resolve rather to submit to any regulations [which] shall now during the time be imposed upon them, than consent to have this rod continued longer over their heads, by which all people will be disheartened from coming in to them. I think her Majesty will resolve to summon these gentlemen the next Council day, receive their answer, and, if they still refuse to comply, determine upon y<sup>m</sup> [them] as shall be then advised.” . . .

ADMIRAL RUSSELL TO LORD GALWAY.

1694, Sept. 12, Alicant.—“I detained this gentleman, the bearer, a day or two after I had acknowledged the receipt of a duplicate of the letter he brought me, in hopes that I should be able to send by him a fuller answer; but the fever I then laboured under continuing still upon me, has not only prevented my doing it, but obliged me to go on shore at Alicant, and to send the Fleet to sea under the care of Vice-Admiral Aylmer.

“I was in hopes the feluca this gentleman came in might have been of use to me in going to Toulon and bringing me intelligence of the enemy’s proceedings. and therefore proposed it, with such a reward as might be thought more than sufficient, but the people belonging to her declined it. The officer was very willing, and has indeed behaved himself in the affair you employed him on with very much affection to the service.

“Your Lordship knows ere this that the Fleet is to winter at Cadiz, and if there can any way be found to give me advice of the enemy's proceedings while I am at that port, I know your zeal for the public good too well to doubt of your communicating it to me; and I hope that my present indisposition will not so long continue but I shall be able in a short time to write your Lordship my thought (sic) at large."

1694, Sept. 13, Livorno.—“I have this week delivered Colonel Kirkby, commander of their Majesties' ship the Southampton, three months' provisions for 230 men, and supplied him with such boatswain's, gunner's, and carpenter's stores as the ship wanted; that, being now watered and fitted, will sail first fair day according to his instructions, in company of a Dutch man-of-war of 50 guns. We have yet no further news of Admiral Russell, nor of the French at Tollon.

“By a barque from Tripoli Mr. Benjamin Lodington (brother to our Consul of that place, who[m] the Dey admitted to remain there) sends me the enclosed account of occurrences; so 'tis plain that the breach was forced upon them by the French, which they would willingly excuse and renew the peace; that if in return his Majesty will order my dispatching the Tartan Velocità thither, it shall be done without loss of time, and may have the same effect as if a man-of-war were sent, since they are so desirous of a friendship. I am without the honour of any from you to answer, or further worthy your notice.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Sept. 13-23, Rousselaer.—“Your Grace's letter of the 7th instant brought us the most welcome news of her Majesty's recovery.

“I must repeat to your Grace the great concern his Majesty expresses that so much fine weather passes away without any attempt upon Dunkirk or Calais, the bombarding of which last place is by all thought very easy, and his Majesty is desirous that it may be yet put in execution this season.

“His Majesty has seen the last orders to Admiral Russell, which are agreeable to his intentions; and upon taking notice of the proclamation for the meeting of the Parliament, his Majesty was pleased to say he hoped he might be in England before that time; in order whereunto his Majesty does now direct that the yachts be hastened over with such a convoy as shall be thought sufficient, which are to come to the usual stations, with such vessels for his Majesty's horses and baggage as the Commissioners of Transportation have at other times provided for that service, wherein your Grace will give the necessary directions.

* Enclosed in Blathwayt's letter of Oct. 8-18.

“The Colonels of the three Regiments have been backward in sending over their officers, but it is yet hoped they may arrive time enough, so that the men may come under the convoy that shall be appointed for his Majesty.”

1694, Sept. 13-23, Camp at Rousselaer.—“The Marquis de Rada, coming to Bruges, found one Henry Bateman and his wife in the prison there, who offered himself to give evidence against Mr. Walmesly and some others that are under criminal accusations in England. His Majesty, having been made acquainted with it, has thought fit that they be carried to England in the custody of a messenger, who brings them to your Grace in order to their examination; it being withall left to your Grace to judge how credible witnesses they may be in respect of their life and the occasion of their being imprisoned at Bruges, which was upon suspicion of having stolen a calice (sic) in France or in the way from thence, some broken pieces, as the Marquis de Rada informs me, having been found upon them.”

1694, Sept. 17-27, Rousselaer.—“The King has seen your Grace’s letter of the 11th instant, and as to the Dantzickers, who are subjects of Poland, his Majesty knowing of no treaty nor convention with them, nor of any reason they have given to be favoured by us, would have the rigour of the law take place against them.

“His Majesty, having considered Mr. Gregs’s letter to your Grace of the 14-24th instant (a copy whereof he sent to me) together with the protocol of the Council of Denmark, is well pleased to find that Court in so good a disposition towards the giving satisfaction for the misbehaviour of their Captain in the Downs ; but the expressions of the protocol being not so clear as may be necessary, and the form of the declaration being not so authentic as it ought to be, his Majesty would give no final order to Mr. Gregs in this matter without having first received the advice of the Committee, whose opinion therefore his Majesty does expect as soon as possible what may be fit to be further demanded from the Court of Denmark for composing the present difference and vindicating their Majesties’ right of the Flag ; to which purpose I send your Grace copies of my two last letters to Mr. Gregs, wherein mention is also made of the two points that are insisted upon by the Danes.

“We admire very much not to have yet any certain news of the arrival of Sir Cloudesly Shovell before Dunkirk, and now the wind begins to blow strong from the West, which may render it unsafe to approach the harbour.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWATT.

1694, Sept. 18, Whitehall.—“There have been several applications from the Lords Justices of Ireland, and some from my Lord Capell to me and others, representing the benefit it would be to that country if corn were allowed to be freely transported from thence to parts beyond seas in amity with their Majesties. At present I think there is a prohibition to their shipping out any but what shall be allowed to go with convoy. This I suppose was intended to hinder them transporting corn to France, under pretence of carrying it to other countries, but is represented as so uneasy a restriction, convoys being hard to obtain, and they obliged to stay long waiting for them, that it is not worth their while, and therefore does in effect amount to a total prohibition. I cannot say any other methods proposed of bonds, &c., though they may in a good measure restrain their carrying corn to France, is (sic) pretended by the Lords Justices to be such a security as will absolutely hinder it; but all sorts of grain being such a drug in Ireland, this leave would be so great an advantage to that country that the question is whether an inconsiderable supply to France, such as might steal thither by thus opening the trade, is not better winked at, than so great an inconvenience as the Lords Justices represent this total prohibition to be to that whole kingdom abounding with corn, and no way to dispose of it. I think this question will in a great measure depend upon the scarcity that is now likely to be in France; if that be such as will reduce them to extremity, no consideration ought to suffer us to connive at their being helped with one ship-load.” . . .

Proposal made by the Resident of Denmark for settling differences, &c.

“As to the attempt upon Dunkirk, I confess I do not thoroughly understand how it was conducted. Mr. Maister says he will wait upon the King and give him an account of it, but I think it is agreed that it was not undertaken in a manner to give hopes of success to anybody; and therefore for my own part, without having any opinion of the machines, I am so far from being discouraged that I think, a safe place being now discovered to ride in within two cannon-shot of the wooden forts, and that they cannot bring above six guns apiece to bear, I do not believe it will be hard to find ways, by the help of frigates and such fire-ships as might be contrived for this purpose, to destroy these forts, as soon as a seaman can be found that will not begin with declaring it impossible.” . . .

1694, Sept. 25, Whitehall.—“By the enclosed copy of a letter from Ad[miral] Russell to Mr. Sec[retary], you will find he has received his Majesty’s orders, and though under some surprise and a little spleen at the first notice, yet he prepares to obey, and I am confident will do it in the best manner. . . .

“Saturday, yesterday, and all this morning have been spent in Council, preparing heads of Regulations for the East India Company, which are given to Mr. Attorney [Sir Edward Ward] and Solicitor [Sir Thomas Trevor] to be drawn into form by them and offered to the Council upon Thursday morning; hoping they may pass the Great Seal within the time reserved by the Charter, which is Friday night. Upon Thursday it will be known what advice the Council will give, and what resolution her Majesty will take upon the whole, which I shall be able to inform you of by the next post.

“Yesterday the Spa[nish] Amb[assador] had an audience of her Majesty, who was pleased to refer him to me for an answer; but I having been all day in the Council Chamber, he sent me a letter, of which the enclosed is a copy.* I think it would be very hard, after what his Majesty has done for the preservation of Spain, that they should dictate to him where his Fleet should winter; besides, though the harbour at Port Mahone be extraordinary good, yet it is at too great a distance from hence, and in a place where the sea is so large the French may easily pass by, and our Fleet know nothing of it. There are many other objections I will not trouble you with, but the answer I returned the Amb[assador] was the orders (sic) the King had given was not that the Fleet should winter in the Med[iterranean], but at Cadiz, which was so settled he could not expect it should be altered.

“The Danish Resident, according to the trust I formerly told you he pretends to put in me, has given the enclosed copy* of his orders from the Court of Den[mark], and made three demands, which I have also sent you a copy of,* which he says are only en particulier; but all looks as if they would be glad to compound for owning the fault, and have the punis[h]ing this officer all to themselves.” . . .

“I can recollect nothing more I have to trouble you with, but an account of what has passed in the business of the East India Company, which kept the Council sitting yesterday from ten till four in the afternoon, partly in debates which would be too tedious to relate in a letter, but chiefly in adjusting the draft of new Regulations suitable to the heads their Lordships had prepared the Tuesday before. One head is more certainly to discover whether they export goods of the product of Eng[land] to the value of what they were obliged in former Regulations. The rest in the greatest part relate to the putting more power in the General Courts, and taking it out of the Courts of Committees, at which some of the principal managers I hear are much offended; but this night they will be put under the Great Seal, being the last hour their Majesty's had reserved in their Charter for the imposing Regulations."

LORD CONINGSBY TO SHREWSBURY.

1694, Oct. 7, English style, Loo.—“ I have had several opportunities to discourse the King about the affairs of Ireland, and I can in the first place assure your Grace that he is now fixed to have a Parliament in the spring, and the gentlemen of that country may depend upon it; and I hope they will resolve to meet in such a temper that will encourage him to have one yearly till they come to a better settlement than they have at present, which only can be brought about by themselves. I found there had been here the same doctrine I met with at London, that Irish people could not settle Ireland, and that a Parliament of England must; but assuring them that they would have business enough without that, made them easily persuaded to lay aside that notion.

“I presumed, my Lord, to name you the first and fittest to go Lord Lieutenant, but the King immediately answered he could not spare you. I then ventured to tell him that, if his Majesty kept you here, he ought by some means or other to find a way to make your station more proper for you, which I hope he will not fail to do. Your Grace need not apprehend but that I did this in such a manner that it seemed to come entirely from myself. I then proposed our friend, and the King’s return was ‘[Is] it to be Lord Lieutenant?’ I said no, but Lord Deputy. He answered nothing more than this, ‘Will his old father never die?’ By which and some other hints I fancy, if he can be persuaded to go Lord Justice, in conjunction with the Lord now there, it will be no hard matter to bring it to pass with the King.

“We leave this place soon, the King intending to be at the Hague on Friday, as he told me this morning, and from thence the next day, if the wind is fair and the yachts come, which we hear nothing of yet; and that makes us fear the news may be true of Du Bart’s being out, and that he has intercepted the packet boat.

“Palms his son is, I suppose, sure of his place of Teller, and I am confident, if your Grace can think of a proper person, the King will be prevailed upon to make that necessary alteration in the offices of Attorney and Solicitor; but then you must lay it before him as a thing of absolute necessity, as I have presumed to do, and I am sure it is hardly possible to carry on his affairs in Parliament without it be done.

“We are mightily satisfied here that the Turks are retired, and the news from Amsterdam is that the French fleet, concluding ours gone, are out in the Mediterranean.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Oct. 8-18, Loo.—“We are very impatient for English letters, and to hear of the yachts and convoy designed for the King, the want of which has inclined his Majesty to remain here until Friday next; who is resolved not to stay twenty-four hours at the Hague after the arrival of the ships, if the wind be fair.

“Consul Blackwell having sent me the enclosed letter and extract of another from Mr. Lodington, which I have read to the King, his Majesty thinks fit that a commission be immediately dispatched to some person at or near Tripoli to conclude a peace with that Government, and in the meantime I have signified to Consul Blackwell his Majesty’s intentions to the same purpose, that the Tripolines may be encouraged to desist from any further acts of hostility against the English.

“Your Grace’s last letter is of the 25th past.

[P.S.] “Your Grace will be informed from Germany of the Turks having withdrawn themselves from before Peter Waradin, or rather having raised the siege of the Imperial Army.”

Endorsed: Re. the 17th. This letter with the enclosed papers<sup>o</sup> was left in Mr. Sec. Trenchard's hands the same day I received it, Tripoly being in his Province, and he kept them two days. Oct. the 19th.

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1694, Oct. 9, Whitehall.—“I understand by Col. Wooseley that your Lordship has heard nothing from me concerning his Majesty's intentions that the Parliament in Ireland shall certainly sit till the next spring; which makes me conclude a letter I sent dated the 16th of August by Col. Ham[ilton] of Talimore is not yet come to your hands. I take the liberty to enclose a duplicate of the same, which is all I can say upon that subject.

“In relation to what your Lordship recommends concerning the exporting of corn, that matter will be considered the next Council day, where I shall endeavour that your Lordship's desires may be complied with, being at present in very great haste.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Oct. 9, Whitehall.—“By your letter of the 2nd I find the Dutch will not be ready to go with our first convoy to the Straits, but propose to send such a quantity of all necessaries with the second that they think no third will need to go towards the spring. If the Fleet were to be furnished with stores only and such things as would be requisite for refitting the ships, I should think they were in the right; but such a quantity of provisions as will be necessary to victual our squadron cannot possibly be provided so early in the winter as the second convoy is designed to go, nor perhaps, if it could, would it be very advisable.

“A messenger has delivered me a letter from you of the 13th Sept., and brought one Bateman and his wife. Mr. Secretary and I took their examinations, but they appear to be people of such a character, and some things they say seem so improbable, that though they have had the good luck by these means perhaps to save their own lives, I think they ought not take away the life of anybody.† The Lancashire and Cheshire gentlemen go down tomorrow in order to take their trials in those countries.”

1694, Oct. 12-22, Hague.—"I am come hither this evening from Loo, his Majesty intending, upon my leaving that place, to be here about the same time; but the weather has been so fair as to invite the King to hunt once more, so that his Majesty is not expected here sooner than tomorrow, having sent by an express the enclosed letter for the Queen.

"I had before my coming away laid before his Majesty your Grace's letters of the 28th past, 2nd and 5th instant, but his Majesty, designing to embark for England as soon as the wind shall permit, did not think it necessary to give any directions to your Grace in the mean time.

"The convoy and yachts arrived on Tuesday last, and will be accompanied in their return by some Dutch men-of-war that lie ready in the Mase, which is very convenient, since 'tis said that Bart is at sea with his squadron."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Oct. 16, Whitehall.—"Her Majesty having sent her letter to enclose, and I being unwilling a post should go without writing, is the occasion of this letter; otherwise the wind is now fair, and you so immediately expected that I can hardly imagine this will come to your hands. . . .

[P.S.] "By a ship that parted from Jamaica in August, and is lately come to Bristol, we are told that the French have quitted that island, having carried away about 2,000 negroes and done other mischief. A farther account is expected by other ships that set out at the same time, but this being a light vessel, the others are not yet arrived."

1694, Oct. 16-26, Hague.—"I have the honour of your Grace's letters of the 9th and 12th instant, to which your Grace will expect no other answer than that his Majesty commanded me to acquaint the Pensioner with the resolution that is taken in England to send the first and second convoy together to Cadiz, and to dispose the Dutch to hasten their preparations so as to be ready to accompany our ships thither, which there is reason to believe they will be able to comply with.

him ; but from Paris we are assured that the French fleet is sailed from Toulon, but whither or on what design is not mentioned.

“The King will have finished all business here in a day or two, by which time it is hoped the wind, which is now N.N.E., may come more to the eastward and calm the sea a little (which is very much raised by the westerly storms), so that his Majesty may embark with some probability of a good passage.

[P.S.] “There are but six ships come from England to convoy the King, of which two are fifth rates.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Oct. 19, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 8th and 12th. The wind being now changed, we are not in so immediate hopes of his Majesty’s arrival as when I writ my last.

“The contents of your letter of the 8th, with Consul Blackwell’s and Mr. Loddington’s letters relating to the affairs of Tripoly, I have communicated to Mr. Secretary Trenchard, he being now in town, and those parts in his province. You will receive I suppose from him an account of what he has done upon it.

“Sir Joseph Herne has a letter from his correspondent, Mr. Fetherstone, at Allicant, of the 10-20 Sept., that says our Fleet was then at anchor in that road, and Mr. Russell sick of a fever. We have this account from no other hand, yet I doubt it is true, and am sure it is of mighty importance.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Oct. 19-29, Hague.—“Since my last I have acquainted the Pensioner with the resolution that had been taken in England to send away the first and second convoy of provisions for Cadiz at the same time, which were in such a forwardness as to sail within less than a fortnight, when it was hoped the convoy from Holland might be in a readiness to accompany them. The Pensioner promised me to inform the Admiralties of it, as he has since done, and assures me their convoy will sail with the first fair wind, with eight months’ provisions for their fleet, and will call at the Downs to join our ships. He is very desirous to know how many men-of-war and of what force are appointed in England for this service. They have not yet determined the number of theirs.

“I have the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 16th instant, and fear it may not be the last, there being no great appearance of a sudden change of the westerly winds.

“I have not yet taken notice to your Grace that your letter to Mr. Gregs with the enclosed protocol, as it was amended at the Committee, had been read to his Majesty and immediately dispatched to Denmark. The King defers the signification of his pleasure concerning the exportation of corn from Ireland until his arrival in England."

Re. the 23.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] Oct. 19, Dublin Castle.—“With a duplicate of yours dated Aug. the 16th, I have this post received your Grace’s of Oct. the 9th, but the original of the former, delivered to Mr. Hamilton of Tullimore, never came to my hands.

“I have by this post writ to my Lord Portland for leave from the King to own the calling of a Parliament here in the spring, the common discourse of which will answer here to what you propose in calling a Parliament now, and by adjournments to hold it on to the spring. And were it declared immediately, there would be time little enough for preparing the Bills for the time then appointed; for when your Grace considers that the Bills must first pass all here at the Council, where matters of such natures move slow, especially after a Revolution, where Bills must well be digested, and after that must go to the Council of England, to which place we can make but one transmission before the Parliament meets; and considering the business of Ireland has seldom a quick dispatch there, there must be allowed several months for the perfect dispatch of all Bills, besides of other necessaries to be done before the opening of a Parliament, wherein the King’s pleasure must be known.

[P.S.] “This bearer, Mr. Brodericke, is best able of any man I know to give your Grace a faithful account of [this] kingdom, and of the true interest thereof. Pray, my Lord, be kind to poor Mr. Harrington. I have known him many years, and ever true to his country.”

Re. the 25th, 1694.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SEC. TRENCHARD.

“I acquainted you in a former letter that I did intend to write to the Government of Algier, and herewith I send you a copy of my letter to them, and of their answer thereto; as also so much of Consul Baker’s letter to me as relates to the public. I hope I have not done amiss in it, for I thought it might conduce to the service. . . .

“With submission to better judgments, ’tis not very unlikely, if the Brest squadron winters here, but they will be sending out ships by two and three till their number may be much superior to ours. If great care be not taken to supply us timely with men, I don’t know what we shall do. You will see by the account I send to the Admiralty that great numbers are wanting, and what we have will daily decrease. I question not but such a concern as this Fleet is to England will occasion a continual thought about us. . . .

[P.S.] "By the letters from the Government of Algier and Consul Baker, you will find how useful the Tartan has been, which lately attended on the said Consul; and if his Majesty will please to continue her as formerly, during such time at least as the Fleet stays in these seas, the Consul may not only have an opportunity of obliging the Government, but of gaining intelligence for me of the enemy's proceedings." . . .

They think this no improper time, since they are informed there are now two companies vacant in that Regiment, one by the removal of Col. Withers to my Lord Cutts' Regiment, the other by the death of one Col. Taylor, who was a captain in that Regiment of Guards. Mr. Talmash's memory is yet so dear to a great many honest gentlemen, that I think his Majesty could not do a more popular action than to show some marks of his favour to this son, who is besides a very pretty youth." . . .

1694, Oct. 25, Whitehall.—"I have just now received the favour of your Lordship's of the 19th Oct., and am glad the duplicate of what I sent by Mr. Hamilton, of Talimore, is come to your hands; I wonder the original is not yet received.

“I have discoursed a great deal with Mr. Broderick of the affairs of Ireland, and am confirmed in what myself thought, that a Parliament alone will not be sufficient to settle that country, but that some steps must be made before, without which that Parliament will not answer the ends it is called for, nor the kingdom afterwards receive that benefit which might be expected if a more thorough reformation were made. Some of the most apparent obstacles to persons who view at a distance I have long since taken notice of to the King by letter, and should be ready at his arrival (which we expect every day) to endeavour to convince him of the rest, but that I dare not be so positive as is necessary to persuade upon confidence on (sic) persons I have not acquaintance enough with to rely entirely upon. I know no man in these kingdoms can give so clear and full instructions what would entirely heal and settle all as yourself.” . . . Requests him to state his thoughts on the subject.

SHREWSBURY to the EARL OF MONTAGU.

1694, Oct. 26, Friday.—“The contents of the letter your Lordship put into my hands this morning is of a nature that make me uneasy my Lord Capel should remain one minute under such thoughts of me; and therefore, being to go a-hunting to-morrow by four of the clock in the morning, I return your Lordship your letter, and desire by to-morrow’s post that you will answer for me, that nothing of this kind ever entered into my head, and that my manner of writing to the King upon the affairs of Ireland has been in a style so different from this that no friend he has could more set forth his praise than I have done, and at the same time write no more than all the Irish have said to me upon his subject.” . . .

There appears to have been great villainy among the King’s evidence, and some who put them upon swearing this Plot in order afterwards to discover their perjury. My information being from letters only, I cannot yet be very clear in relating the contrivance; but when the Judges and his Majesty’s Counsel return, so as the fact may be known, I hope all the actors in this villainy will be prosecuted and punished to the utmost.

“Bateman and his wife, who were sent from Bruges, and not thought fit to be made use of as evidence against Mr. Walmesley, are run away from the messenger that had them in custody, having first robbed him of several goods in his house.

SEC. BLATHWATT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, [Oct. 26-] Nov. 5, s.n., Hague.—“We received yesterday answers to our letters of the 19th past, s.v., which is more expeditious than ever happened before. Your Grace’s letters of the 19th and 23rd have been laid before his Majesty, who expressed his willingness to give a captain’s commission to Mr. Tolmash’s son, though not in the Guards till he has served some time longer. I shall therefore take care to put his Majesty in mind of the first vacancy that may happen for him. His Majesty does not design to give my Lord Cutts’ late Regiment to Col. Withers, but rather to Col. Seymour, Lieut.-Col. of the Guards.

“I have communicated to Mons. de Wildt the list of our ships intended as convoy to the provision vessels for our Mediterranean Fleet, and I send here enclosed his answer as to the time of their convoy’s joining ours, and place where.

“The Danish post is at this instant arrived, and I have opened your Grace’s packets from Mr. Gregs, as he has desired me, of which I find I have duplicates, and so transmit the papers to your Grace, though I have had no opportunity to show them to the King, who is gone to bed, as I shall do the copies tomorrow morning, it being withall very probable his Majesty will desire again the opinion of the Committee whether this second protocol in matter and form may be satisfactory. I am afraid his Majesty may stay so long as to receive an answer here, the wind and weather showing not the least disposition to a change.

“Upon reading the Great Duke of Tuscany’s letter to the King, which I had not seen when I mentioned it last to your Grace, I find it is a formal and plain acknowledgment of his Majesty, as your Grace may judge by the enclosed copy.”

Re. the 31 Oct.

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1694, Oct. 27, Whitehall.—“What I have learnt from my Lord Keeper and my Lord Montagu of the informations your Lordship has had relating to me, makes me perceive that the letter I writ by the last post was far more improper than I thought. . . . Since the time of my coming into the King’s service, in every word I have spoke or writ upon the subject of Ireland, I have not failed to commend your Lordship’s carriage in that country. . . .

“As to my Lord Conisbie, he is a man who owns some former obligations to me, and told me, when he went into Flanders, he would say upon the business of Ireland the words I should put in his mouth. . . . In all the discourses I ever had with him, unless sometimes when he has wished I might go<sup>9</sup>, which I took as a courtier’s compliment, at all times it has constantly been taken for granted that your Lordship must stay. But it matters not much what his opinion is, since I hope your Lordship will not easily believe that will be a guide to (move ?), or that, whilst I am writing to you with the freedom I have used, I am undermining you for my own, or the interest of any other.” . . .

ADMIRAL RUSSELL TO SEC. TRENCHARD.

1694, Oct. 29 [o.s.], Cadiz Bay.—Believes the French are resolved to winter at Thoulon. Last heard that they were plying with a Levant to windward from Cape Rosas, and were much shattered by a storm in the Gulf. If they venture through, we may have the good fortune to meet them. Numbers of men are wanting in the Fleet; 1,500 to 2,000 old disciplined soldiers would be serviceable.

“So soon as I learn what the French do, I will send home two ships, in lieu of the Suffolk and Edgar, convoy to the wine and fruit ships; but if the French fleet winters in these seas, I suppose ’tis not expected I should send home the ten ships directed by the Queen’s order, till the same number arrives with me, unless ’tis designed to reduce the present number. I shall very hardly be able to find a convoy for the ships bound up to Turkey; you will please to consider that those ships when sent are lost to me, and whether their places ought not to be supplied from England.

“I should have been glad to have received your opinion concerning the instructions given to the Turkey convoy that went up in the summer. The time draws near for their coming down, and if I possibly can, I will send a further strength to meet them; but, with submission, I ought to have directions how to govern myself in this case. For aught I know the Turkey Company may have desired orders to be sent to them contrary to what I gave, and may thereby make it useless to send more ships (if I can) to the place I design.

“I have been in this bay twenty-one days, and have cleaned ten ships, which I mention in the margin, by which you see I have not been idle, though this place affords nothing for our assistance. The Adventure, the second day she came out, took two prizes bound from Marseilles to Lisbon; they were delivered carefully to the Consul, as directed, but I have ordered him forthwith to sell them, that the money may be employed for the King’s use here, which will save the drawing of bills, and may be discounted for with the Commissioners of the Prizes.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1694, Oct. 30, Whitehall.—“Since my last I have received yours of the 2nd Nov., s.n., with an account of the bountiful promises the Spaniards have made. I think they ought to be pressed to performance whilst they are in this liberal humour, for if once the matter cool and grow an old debt, I doubt it will prove not worth much.

“I have a letter from Sir Will. Beeston of the 7th of August from Jamaica, with a large relation of all that passed for about five weeks that the French were expected and actually landed upon the place. The sum is that they were then retired, and left the island, having had about 350 of their men killed and wounded; but many more in their ships dying of sickness, he computes their whole loss to [be] about 700 men; on our side 100 men of all sorts, and 50 sugar-works destroyed, besides many other plantations, and above 100 horses burnt, and about 1,300 negroes carried off.

“I have a letter from Mr. Stanhope of the 3-13 Oct., acknowledging the letter I writ to him by his Majesty's directions during Mr. Sec[retary's] absence, to acquaint the Court of Spain with the supplies of ships and men his Majesty was sending to the West Indies, desiring his Catholic Majesty's orders to his Governors in those parts to give them all assistance against the common enemy; upon all which he had given in a memorial, and was expecting an answer.

“I must add, out of Sir Will. Beeston's letter, that he apprehends the French will return to revenge their disappointment, and therefore earnestly presses the dispatch of succours.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO [SHREWSBURY].

1694, [Oct. 30-]Nov. 9, s.n., Hague.—“I was in hopes that there might not have been any occasion for writing this letter, the wind having been good for our passage since Saturday last, but the great ships belonging to the convoy, having been forced by the bad weather to get into the Goree, could not come out before this morning, when his Majesty went to the Oranje Polder very early, in order to his going on board his yacht, but found the wind come about to the S.W.; so that, it not being thought advisable to embark, his Majesty is returned to this place, where we shall expect a fair wind.

“I have since the last post read to the King the Danish protocol, as it has been altered by that Court; and though his Majesty takes it now to be very full, yet he has not thought fit, as I foresaw, to signify to Mr. Gregs his being-satisfied with it until he first know the opinion of the Committee, which your Grace may therefore be pleased to acquaint me with, in case we should stay long enough here.

[P.S.] “Since the writing of this, his Majesty has given me his commands to let your Grace know that he does not write to the Queen, as being in expectation every minute of a change of the wind to get on shipboard, the great ships continuing in the road on purpose for it. We have today the news of the Polanders having given the Tartars a great defeat near Caminiech, and taken their convoy of provisions they were carrying into that place.

“As I was closing my letter, an English post arrives with your Grace’s letter of the 26th past, and one from the Queen, but his Majesty being gone to bed, I have no return to make at present.”

Re. the 4th No., o.s.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] Nov. [1], Dublin Castle.—“Since my last to your Grace, Mr. Hamilton has delivered on the 19th Oct. your letter to me.

“I was surprised at an expedient he says is approved of in England, for the remedying that great contest about the word sole, which, as he states to me, is this: that the Speech in opening the Parliament here shall mention nothing concerning money, but the House of Commons shall no sooner meet, but immediately they shall resolute themselves into a Committee of the whole House, and, before all other things, shall vote heads for bills of money to be presented for the Government. If this be [the] proposition, according to my poor apprehension, ’tis giving up the point. I believe it will not have much credit; and being of opinion that it is intended by this gentleman to embroil the King’s affairs here, I have done what I can to make it of no effect. But this to yourself alone.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1694, Nov. 2, Kinsington.—“Mr. Russel’s letter of the 29th, old style, that part of it that relates to his not sending the ten ships directed by the Queen, was read, and nothing ordered upon it, but that the Admiralty and I should repeat the orders the Admiralty have already sent, to return as many ships [as] were sent and he kept with him.

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Nov. 2-12, Hague.—“We continue yet here, and are like to do so longer, the wind coming about more to the west, which makes it impossible for our convoy to get out of the Goree, so that we must expect with patience a change of weather. I acknowledge the honour of your Grace's letter of the 26th past.

SEC. BLATHWAYT to [SHREWSBURY].

1694, Nov. 6-16, Hague.—“The wind, coming yesterday to the N.N.E., brought the great ships out of the Goeree, so that his Majesty thought fit this morning to go on board his yacht, the wind continuing yet fair; but the weather was so calm that the yachts not being able to get out of the Mase with this day's tide, and the wind chopping about to the West, his Majesty is returned to this place, with a resolution to go on board tomorrow morning, or as soon as the weather may be proper for it.

“Your Grace will easily believe the King is very uneasy under this disappointment, more particularly in relation to the Parliament, for the putting off of which his Majesty gives no order, but leaves the whole direction of it to the Queen.

“I have nothing to add to the acknowledgment of your Grace's letter of the 30th past but that I am with you all respect,” &c.

1694, Nov. 9, Friday [o.s.], William and Mary yacht, off of Marget.—“The King has had a very good passage, being gone on board his yacht in the Maes yesterday, about one o'clock in the afternoon, and arriving here this day at noon. His Majesty is immediately going on shore at Marget, where he will take coach in order to lie this night at Canterbury, and to dine tomorrow at Dartford, which your Grace will please to acquaint the Queen with."

Re. the 10th, two of the clock in the morning.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] Nov. 10, Dublin Castle.—“Your letter of the 29th instant gives me all the satisfaction imaginable, there being nothing more uneasy to me than lying under a person’s displeasure (as I apprehend I did under your Grace’s) whose friendship I value to the last degree, and whose character and worth is so esteemable by all men.” . . .

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1694, Nov. 10 [o.s.], Cadiz Bay.—“The chief business of this letter is to beg I may receive some directions after what manner I am to behave myself towards the ships and vessels belonging to the Republic of Genoa. They are the carriers of all French commodities to the several ports of Spain. I have frightened them, but that is all I can do. Searching their ships for French goods will not bring the captains to confess, unless I was empowered to detain them upon suspicion. I have brought them to be very humble, having laid three of their captains by the heels. I do not remember that State has ever sent to acknowledge his Majesty as King of England. Why should not the town be visited by the Fleet the next summer? The sight of some bomb-vessels would make them say, do, or give anything.

“I will not make a doubt but that some scheme or design will be laid this winter in England how to employ the Fleet the next summer. If the King’s pleasure and the service requires their continuing in these seas, I will use my utmost endeavours to know whether Thoulon can be forced, or bomb-vessels come near enough to Merseilles. Both places, by the best account I can receive, were made very strong this summer. I have the plan of the latter, as ’tis now fortified.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1694, Nov. 13, Whitehall.—“I have your Lordship’s of the 1st of this month, and as to the expedient that is mentioned by Col. Hamilton, I must acquaint your Lordship that this gentleman was introduced to my Lord Keeper and me, as one who could very much contribute to the quieting any differences which might arise in the Parliament of Ireland. . . . As he had no authority to name us or either of us, I hope his discourses in our name will not prejudice the business. . . .

“His Majesty is in such a hurry of business upon his arrival that I have not yet had an opportunity to discourse to him upon the affairs of Ireland; when I do, I will give you a further account of that matter.

“The transporting of corn from Ireland will certainly now be very soon considered and determined.”

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1694,] Nov. 15, Dublin Castle.—“His Majesty, I understand by your Grace’s letter to me of August the 16th, is resolved to have a Parliament here in Ireland the next spring; but I fear they will not so well answer the ends for which they are called, nor the kingdom receive the benefit intended by it, unless some reformation be first made; and though it be an ungrateful office, and against my nature, to say anything of particular persons, yet the real duty I owe the King, and my desire to serve this poor country, redeemed by himself (the Protestants of which are entirely in his interest), makes me think it necessary humbly to lay my thoughts before his Majesty, upon this occasion.

“In the first place, I think myself obliged to acquaint your Grace, that the Clergy here, by all I can find or learn of them, are wholly devoted to their Majesties’ service; and as for that part of the Army which is in Ireland, I must bear them witness, they are truly loyal, and their Majesties may depend upon them. Their behaviour in the country at their quarters is very fair, and few or no complaints come to us from thence against them; so that I am verily persuaded no obstacles will arise either from the Clergy or Army to obstruct a good agreement in Parliament.

“I wish I could give the same assurance of the Civil Government. The Lord Chancellor of this kingdom [Porter] over the Judges here has a great superintendency. He is a man of great temper, and hath a reputation generally of determining causes with affebilly [affability] and skill. I must likewise own, he hath behaved himself with great civility towards me, and that I have a tenderness for him. But, on the other side, I must acquaint your Grace, there is a general dissatisfaction against him in the Protestant gentry, as thinking him not in the British interest of this kingdom, which alone they think to be their Majesties’ interest here. And this belief is much increased, since his last return from England, by some indiscreet words, which I am told he let fall in the Court, discovering his incli[na]tion in favour of the Irish ; and the Protestants, believing the character they gave of his administration in the late reign might something weigh with the King to raise him to this great trust, do the more resent his giving cause of suspicion that he is not firm to the present Government, and I fear they are become irreconcilably his enemies.

“ The Judges here, many of them, are not the most expert in their profession, and some of them not well able to answer the Bar, and want credit and authority enough to keep the Courts in that order and decency, as the dignity of their station does require. So that, except the Lord Chief Justice Pine, and Baron Ecline, there are few of the Judges in whose opinion I should think I might safely rely. The Chief Baron [Hely] is, in the judgment of many discerning men, improper for that post, and may be contented to be made one of the puisne Judges of the King’s Bench or Common Pleas, especially should his Majesty think fit to increase the Judges’ salaries to 800*l.* per annum, as he hath been pleased of late to declare he will when the Revenue will bear it. And if his Majesty should think fit to advance one of the best men we have here to be Chief Baron, and make a remove among the puisne Judges, two or three may be found out fit to be superseded, and doing it will bring credit to the Courts, and be of good example in making the rest of the Judges careful to do right for the future ; and this will give a general satisfaction to the whole kingdom, who now have a low esteem of many o[f] the Judges.

“ The two great springs that move this Government are the Attorney and Solicitor General, to whom all public matters are referred, and in whose opinion and integrity the chief Governors are safe. Sir Jo[h]n Temple is perfectly skilled in the affairs of this kingdom, but never here, by which means the whole business devolves upon the Solicitor General [Levinge], who, seeing all public matters must of course come through his hands, grows dilatory and disobliging ; wherefore it is requisite the Attorney General should be upon the place, and if he will not be prevailed withal to come over, his Majesty had (in my opinion) had [sic] much better give him a pension of 400*l.* per annum (which he may deserve for his advice in the affairs of Ireland), and put another in his room ; which will give great satisfaction, in having both an Attorney and Solicitor here, and I am sure no disadvantage to their Majesties’ Revenue.

“ I cannot give any commendation of the Commissioners of the Revenue, many of them being no ways versed in affairs of that nature ; and as for the Commissioners of Inspection into Forfeitures (of whom Mr. Justice Cox is the chief), by what I can observe of them, their principal design (having good salaries) is to prolong their Commission with more regard to their own private advantage than any profit to the Crown.

“ I had almost forgot to mention the Privy Council. Five of the members are Judges, whereas formerly the three chief Judges only were of the Privy Council, and who were enough to attend that service. And I must crave leave to say, I have often been surprised at the coldness and indifferency I have seen there in promoting matters I thought absolutely necessary for their Majesties' and the people's interest; wherefore I conceive it reasonable that some gentlemen of good estates shall be made of the Privy Council, as Sir Robert King, Sir Christopher Wandisford, &c., and that likewise one or two of the general officers of the Army should be of that number, whom we have often occasion to consult, when detachments of the Army [are?] to be posted for to suppress the Raparees and Tories; and these gentlemen will always be ready to do their Majesties and the country right, and keep up the true interest at the Board.

"If his Majesty should think fit to make any alteration in the Courts, or a new Attorney or Solicitor General, the gentlemen of the long robe of this country, who are men proper to serve their Majesties in these stations (and 'tis for their service to choose the best), are Mr. Broderick, Mr. Rochford, Mr. Whitehed, Mr. Sergeant Donnella and Mr. Doria (?). These are gentlemen of good esteem and reputation, and well beloved, and the placing some of them in employment will do their Majesties good service against the meeting of a Parliament here. And I must humbly offer it to his Majesty's most gracious consideration, whether it may not be expedient to have some such reformation forthwith made which may put the minds of the Protestants at ease, who are a people sedulous and diligent enough in pursuing their own interest, and do well understand it, and will with great gratitude and duty receive and own the care [care?] his Majesty shall therein express of their welfare.

"Your Grace thus sees how freely I have declared my mind, and with a liberty which nothing but the duty I owe the King could have forced from me; nor have I any other design in proposing what I have herein mentioned, but to take away all occasion of offence, or that may create any misunderstanding between their Majesties and their people when a Parliament meets. And I beseech your Grace to assure his Majesty, that in all my negotiations with the gentlemen of this country, whom I have discoursed with in order to keep up a good correspondence in Parliament, I have ever had a due regard to assert the rights of the Crown, and have plainly told them, they must not insist upon the sole right, but pass one money bill at least, that had its rise from the Council. And I find them generally willing to pass that for an additional Excise; and therefore whenever they come together, I have great reason to continue my belief that all heats will be laid aside, and that they will meet in good temper, and not by an unreasonable obstinacy justly forfeit the favour of the Crown, but that they will contribute to their utmost, to support the Government, and do their Majesties and their country all the service that can be expected from good Englishmen and Protestants."

R. the 2nd Dec. 1694.

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1694, Dec. 4, Whitehall.—“Mr. Secretary Trenchard being indisposed, I am commanded by his Majesty to acknowledge your letters of the 19th and 29th October. . . .

“His Majesty has directed the Lords of the Admiralty to advise with the Turkey merchants, and thereupon to send you instructions, if any be necessary. . . .

“Orders are given out for some bomb-vessels to be prepared, and it is hoped they will be in a readiness to go with the victualling ships in January. In the mean time his Majesty is desirous to be informed, as near as you can guess, what time this spring the Fleet with you will be in a condition to sail. . . .

“His Majesty’s own thoughts are, that a particular regard must be had to the protecting the trade, and to the defence of the coast of Spain, especially Catalonia. To concert with the Duke of Savoy, by the means of my Lord Galloway (sic), if any descent can be made upon Provence; and to assist in that or any other reasonable design he may propose against France. To inform yourself if the harbour of Thoulon, crowded as it now is with double the number of ships that usually did winter there, may not be so bombarded as to give reasonable hopes of burning many of them, in case they should remain there till you come before that place; or if they should be out sooner, or the harbour so [secure?] that it could not be bombarded, whether the town of Thoulon might not be fired with bombs; and the same of Marseilles, whether the town, or the galleys that lie in the harbour, either or both, might not in the same manner be destroyed by bombs. . . .

“At such a time as this, when there appears to be a prospect of doing something to weaken France in their naval power, which is so immediately the interest and security of England, his Majesty is earnestly concerned that such an opportunity be not lost, which in an age may not offer itself again.

“I have here enclosed sent you an extract of the late intelligence which came to Mr. Secretary of the ships at Rochfort and Brest. The letters from France continue to mention their resolution of sending many of their seamen from Thoulon and those parts over land to West France.” . . .

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]94, Dec. [6-]16, n.s., Cadiz Bay.—As to proposed measures against the French in the spring. “Bomb-vessels will be necessary; the name in this part of the world is very terrible.”

[P.S.] Dec. [7-]17.—“I have only to add that by the next convoy, that will depart in ten days, I shall send you some wine; and I have used my best endeavours to procure two fine Spanish horses as a present to the King, which I hope to have by that time.”

MR. SIMON WEELD'S ANSWER TO MR. VERNON'S
INTERROGATORIES.

1694, Dec. 8.—“In September 89, I was sent with letters to King James in Ireland by Sir Patrick Maxwell, of Spring Bell, and brought others back. . . .

“In the month of July 90, I came to Sir Patrick Maxwell's, and . . . he desired I might go and see if I could find out the Earl of Hume, and to know his resolutions. . . . With him [the Earl, at Morbottell,] was the Laird of McKerstone, the Laird of Gladstaines, Graden Ker, Capt. James Deyell, and four or five gentlemen more, whose names I do not know, but then an insurrection was designed; but before they would do anything in the matter, they would send to the Earl of Arran, that was then privately at Edinburgh. . . .

“In the month of April 89, to the best of my knowledge, I went to Sir Patrick Maxwell's to demand some money which he owed me upon the account of tithes; where I see [saw] two strangers, both Englishmen. The one went by the name of Mr. Harrison, who some time after I understood to be my Lord Griffin. The other went by his own name, who was Mr. Renny Grahame, brother to my Lord Preston. . . . Mr. Harrison, alias Lord Griffin, told us that he wondered at the King's stay, for he had received a letter from him, assuring him that he would be in Scotland some time in March, and desired that he with some others of his friends would come and join him; whereupon Col. Leg, Capt. May, and Capt. Hardy, and some more that were in the Borders (whose names I do not know), were com[mande]d to join him. . . .

“When I left Scotland, Sir Patrick Maxwell recommended me to my Lord Griffin, who was then at his house in Northamptonshire. . . . When Admiral Russel beat the French fleet, and burned many of their ships, I was then in London, and lodged with Mr. Elliot in Rupert Street, but was not privy to any who furnished them horse and arms, nor to their consults; but Mr. Doughty, chaplain to my Lord Arundel of Trevis [Trevise], told me that he was certainly informed there was a fund of money to carry on the designed invasion. . . .

“Captain Dunbar, who lodges at the Crown and Thistle Tavern, in King Street, Westminster, told Mr. Johnstone and me, walking nigh the Dyall in St. James's Park upon the 29th day of Sept. last, in the evening, that at the time Admiral Russel beat the French fleet, that there was [were] ten or twelve thousand horse in and about the City of London and Westminster, ready to have joined King James in case he had landed. . . .

“Last spring Mr. Tho. Apprice, Mr. Cox, a plumber in Pickadilly, and I were at the Horse Shoe ale-house in St. James's Street, drinking our morning's draught, . . . Mr. Apprice speaking very cheerfully, ‘I hope very soon to see my old master King James.’ . . . So soon as I met with Dr. Monro, I gave him an account of what had passed, and that King James was expected very quickly; upon which the Doctor regretted the want of a horse for the expedition. . . .

“The first year and more after I came to London, I wrote sometimes for my Lady [Griffin] (but never for my Lord); but her letters were so mysterious that none but her correspondent[s] could know what to make of them. . . . My Lady gave me a catalogue to transcribe, wherein were the proper names of a great many persons of quality; . . . the proper names were writ first, and then a dash, and under them the improper names; . . . and by this catalogue my Lady writes to her correspondents. . . . But I wearied of the employment, and then Archdeacon Baynard, who was Archdeacon of Koynyer, in the diocese of Down and Koynyer, in Ireland, was her amanuensis; he did lodge near the sign of the Black Horse, at the further end of Pickadilly, as you go to Hyde Park gate. I was first made privy to an insurrection when my Lord Griffin was in Scotland, and the second was in July 90, as I have said already.”

Received moneys from the late Bishops of Bath and Wells and Peterborough; Mr. Barkly, a clergyman; young Madam Windham (?); the City clergy, who used to collect for the relief of the Scots clergy; and now from Princess Ann’s charity to the Scots clergy in London, &c. Was informed Mr. Irwin had made his escape.

“Last summer Dr. Monro and I was [were] walking in St. James’s Park, where we were discoursing of King William. The Doctor says how easy a thing it were for a hundred good fellows, either as he were [was] going [to] or coming from Harwich, to seize him, but some among the hundred would discover the design. But I said, ‘What would you do with him?’ The Doctor said he would take the first ship he came at, and press her, and carry him into France. ‘O how pitifully’ (says he) ‘would he look when he came before King James and the King of France!’ . . .

“Mr. Johnstone and I was [were] discoursing about Capt. Williamson’s trial, and that one Col. Brerton was the chief evidence. Mr. Johnstone told me that he knew some that would invalidate his evidence; . . . that he would meet any gentleman next morning by nine a clock at Cumberland Coffee-house; whereupon I immediately wrote to Mr. Cooper, and he came at the time appointed, and we went to the Angel ale-house in Angel Court.” . . .

The writer appears to have been in Newgate, in irons. He sent letters to Mr. Lindsay, who lodges at the sign of the Black-moor’s Head, at Charring Cross.

“I was informed by Mr. Robert Elliot that the three presbyteries, viz., Jedburgh, Kelso, and Selkirk, joined together and agreed to send one of their number weekly to the Archbishop of Glasgow, then at Edinburgh, to receive instructions from him” [as to non-swearing].

Mentions the ship in Charles Street; the pamphlet called “the Answer to Dr. King,” of which Mr. Leslie was the author; many persons who had a hand in it; the sign of the Goal near St. James’s Street; a statue-maker’s in Pickadilly, near the Sun Tavern; pamphlets called “the Anatomy of the Jacobites,” “Delenda Carthago,” “the Original Contract,” “the Parallel betwixt O. P. and P. O.," "the Original of Sir John Knight's Speech," and "the Hist[orical] Romance;" Mr. Pops', an ale-house in Hugging Alley, near Gutter Lane; the Horse-shoe ale-house in St. James's Street; the Sarazen's Head Inn, in Friday Street; a house near Claringdon Park; a pamphlet called "the Dialogue betwixt A. and B. concerning the times," the author being Mr. Irwin, with whom the writer dined at the Dolphin and Crown, a cook-shop near St. James's Street; the printing of certain pamphlets, and disposal of the copies; pamphlets called "The Authority of the Civil Power over the Church," "The Vindication of Some among Ourselves," "Great Britain's Just Complaint," "The Present State of England," "The Colonel's Speeches," "The Poor Man's Petitions," and "The Price of Abdication"; the George Inn [at] the head of Hay Mercat; the reprinted "Letters to Sir John Holt"; verses in print called Ελιμινηκη, in Latin; and "the private press." Many persons are mentioned as being concerned in the distribution of pamphlets.

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1694, Dec. 18, London.—“A letter having been writ by the King of Spain to his Majesty, of which the enclosed* is a copy, I am commanded to recommend the contents of it to you. It is obvious that those men they desire your assistance to transport will be much wanted in Catalonia, where if the French should have the same success they had the last year, the consequence may be very prejudicial to the common interest. His Majesty therefore does not doubt but you will help them in what you can, so it be no disappointment to your other designs, and, if it can be done, concert matters so with them as to make it as little inconvenient as may be.

“By what Mr. Secretary writ the last post to Consul Blackwell, of which here enclosed is a copy, you will perceive the necessary orders are given for the employing the Tartanne you thought would be of use to you.

“The last letters from France mention four ships fitting at Brest for cruisers, and ten at Thoulon; and that 1,600 of those seamen which were going from thence to West France are returned to Provence; but of this your intelligence I conclude will be fresher and surer than ours.

“When your last letter, I think it was of the 10th Nov., arrived—for I have it not now by me—I had been taken with a lameness in my knee, which has given me great pain, and continues still such a weakness upon that part, that I am confined to my house. . . . I sent it to the King.” . . .

But in the mean time it is our opinion the number will be [so?] inconsiderable that it is not worth his Majesty’s consideration to think of sending any soldiers that way; and therefore, if his Majesty’s pleasure is any soldiers should be sent to the Straits, we think it necessary that transport ships be provided for them.”

[1694, Dec.]—"I am to acknowledge the receipt of your Grace's of the 11th instant, and return you my thanks for your favour in showing mine of the 15th [Nov.] to the King.

"By the last packet I was informed by a letter from my Lord Conesby, that a Parliament being to be called the next spring, 'tis resolved there shall be a change in this Government, and that, as he supposes, it shall not be in one hand, but another added to me, which report coming over also in other letters, and spread here in town, has occasioned many gentlemen to tell me that though they [were] contented to waive the sole right, yet they did it in hopes of a lasting settlement, and good laws, which they expected from me, in whom they had a confidence; but if this hope were taken away, and another added to me, they did not think it reasonable I should expect they should continue in the compliance I had brought them to, when (as they say) it may not be in my power, in conjunction with another, to make the returns they assured themselves of; nor could they confide in any other till they had good experience of his inclinations.

“I know it ill becomes me to speak to your Grace after this manner, but my ambition to settle this poor kingdom, and to confirm the people thereof in their duty to the King, together with my fear of being disappointed, if joined with any other, and almost certainty of success if left alone, gives me confidence to write my mind freely to your Grace, having this reason for my presumption: that it is the interest of the people here to have a settlement in Parliament, and they having some kindness for me in memory of my brother's Government, make[s] me persuade myself they will not by an unreasonable obstinacy (after having given their words) disoblige the King, which may deprive them of that settlement so essential to their own present and future happiness.”

SHREWSBURY TO PORTLAND.

1694-5, Jan. 1.—“I have here enclosed sent your Lordship an extract of that letter I mentioned to you last night, mentioning Du Bart's being expected at Dunkirk with a fleet from Fleekeren; and another fleet from France with provisions. I have discoursed with Sir George Rooke, who says the best station for intercepting the first is off of the Broad Fourteens and between Yard Goree; and that they have and will have some ships out to endeavour to meet with the second. I asked him whether, considering the season, the station he proposed were so safe as that, in case we had a number of ships ready, he would propose their being sent upon this service. He assured me he should make no difficulty of it, and that the station Gower (?) lay in this time twelve-month upon the same account, was less secure. If Du Bart could be met with, it would certainly be of great service.”

They have pitched upon Cornell [Colonel] Seymour to be Captain of the Guard when they design to seize the King; he is very great with Malborow, and was always a great Jacobite. They send away the address tomorrow, and will do nothing till they receive an answer. He is to come without an army. My Lord, I hope the King will pardon my husband; he is a young Lord, and is drawn in by the old ones. When the answer comes I will give you notice. Pray, my Lord, let me see you will not reveal to anybody else what I write to you, for nobody is privy to their design but my brother and I. CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1695,] Jan. 12, Dublin Castle.—"Sir James Gefferys, the bearer hereof, is Governor of Duncannon, and who has leave of the Government to wait upon the King. He was sent for out of Sweade by the King's special orders in my Lord Nottingham's time, and intends to apply himself to his Majesty for some more immediate command, whereby he may show his zeal to his Majesty's service. He has ever behaved himself in the post he is in with diligence and care, and therefore whatever favour your Grace is pleased to shew him will not be unserviceable to the King's affairs."

Re. March the 9th 1694.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to [SHREWSBURY]. (Private letter.)

[16]95, Jan. 13-23, Cadiz Bay.—“This letter comes to thank the Duke of Shrewsbury, as my friend, not as Secretary of State, for the favour of your private letter of the 4th of December. I am glad you think my humour altered for the better. It has always been my desire to please and make easy my friends in everything that lay in my power, which I shall endeavour to practise, since you are pleased to approve of it.”

Expects reports from Tholone and Mercelles. “The advice I at present have is, that Tholone is made so strong that 'tis impossible to come to bomb or do any prejudice to ships or town. A draft of the place, as the guns and mortars are placed, I shall send you by the Barwick, who (sic) will sail in three days. Mercelis I am also told is not to be attacked but at one place called Flemish Roode; and they are so satisfied of that, that they have made preparations to fortify that place, which 'tis said may be done in 48 hours, to make it the strongest part of the town; yet (?) I very much question but at present there is [are] but 12 guns mounted.” Will go himself to those places next spring, and consult with Lord Gallaway (sic).

“Pray God send the victualling ships safe here. So far I will venture to say that had not the French been fools, not a ship in this bay should 'a been able to 'a stirred out of it next summer. But I'll say no more on this subject. If the King be pleased, I am not so ill a courtier to be dissatisfied.

“The present news in our Fleet is the honour the two flag-officers has [have] received in kissing the King's hands. Pray don't believe I am in any kind shocked at it, for I am either nothing or about [above] anything those people can pretend to; but I will only just hint to you that if the King designs to be well served at sea, and have a good command, carried (sic) in order to introduce discipline in the Fleet, this is not the method to attain to that end. My reason is easily guessed at, without troubling you with the particulars.”

Will endeavour to procure horses from Barbary for the King. Hopes to send two Spanish horses fit for the King's saddle.

“Pray God send a good man in the room of the worthy late Arch-Bishop [Tillotson]; so I call him, and I hope all people now thinks [think] the same. Pray, my Lord, have regard to a man that wond [won't] be too strict with us rigid Presbyterians; for I can't suffer persecution, no more than my friend the Bishop of Sarum [Burnet] can the Scotch Bootes(?)”

Re. March the 5th 1694.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY. (Public letter.)

1694-5, Jan. 13-23, Cadiz Bay.—Has received his letter of 4 Dec. Sea and landmen required for the Fleet. Hopes to put to sea in March. Provisions scarce.

“I have the last post received several papers from the Lords of the Admiralty relating to the Turkey ships. I find an order dated the 30th of March to the commander-in-chief to remain at Smirna, till an advice-boat was sent to them. This order I had no cognisance of, and therefore have not made provision for that service, and now 'twill be too late; at least, I ought to think so, by a letter I had some time since from the Levant Company, letting me know they expected their ships would be ready at Smirna in December. I have taken the best care I could about that trade, by sending six ships to cruise off Cape Passaro till the 12th of February, in order to protect their coming to Messina, and then to call at that port to bring them down if they be arrived. A copy of Capt. Killigrew's orders I do this post transmit to the Lords of the Admiralty."

Remarks on Mercellis and Thoulon. Proposal for a squadron to be employed on the coast of Italy next summer, while the writer is watching Thoulon. Will ask Lord Galloway if he can be serviceable with the Fleet in any design the Duke of Savoy may have with the Army.

[P.S.] Has received a letter from the commander of the ships at Smirna, of 27 Sept., stating that he had received an order of 30 March, &c.

[1695,] Jan. 16, Dublin Castle.—"I am extremely obliged to your Grace for yours of the 22nd Dec. . . .

"My Lord, if no Parliament should be called this spring in Ireland, it is to be considered (all circumstances weighed) the thoughts that men may have about addresses for one; or otherwise, whether they may not reserve themselves for the next sessions of Parliament in England, in order to obtain wholesome laws, by which they may prevent future insurrections, to the destruction of the [their?] fortunes and families.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1694-5, [Jan. 28-] Feb. 7, n.s., Cadiz Bay.—His letters delayed by a postmaster. The weather is still very bad, and prevents the Fleet fitting out for sea. The Rumney has arrived in seven days from the Start, and the Bonadventure in nine days from Plymouth, the latter with two victualling ships. Letters from and to Lord Galloway.

"I here send your Grace some news that comes from a priest in the late King's family. I have a letter every post from him. I do not know how well he is acquainted with things, but I believe he writes what he hears. They come to a merchant in this place, that money has prevailed upon to keep this correspondence. I lament extremely the loss of the Queen, and we are expressing it in the best manner we can by mourning."

NEWSLETTERS FROM MARSEILLES and TOULON.

1695, Feb. [1-] 11, and [5-] 15.—(1) "Extract of a letter from Mercellis, Feb. 11, 1695, n.s.

"I came from Thoulon four days since, in which place I was six days, where I had a full view of all their ships, which are in number sixty. They are all unrigged, and not yet begun withall to caulk or refit in any kind. They have very few seamen in the town, and only a guard of men in some of their ships. They discourse as if their orders were come from the Court to fit the fleet at Thoulon, which was to be joined by forty considerable ships that are expected from West France.

(2) "Extract of another letter from Thoulon, Feb. 15, 95, n.s.

"I have this day been here a month, and have had opportunity to view the ships in this port, by rowing near them. I durst not go on board, lest they should wonder at my curiosity. This fleet (I mean, ships for a line) are about sixty, most of them good ships. It does not seem to me as if they would arm out all the ships here this summer, though they talk much of it, and say orders are come from the Court to put it in execution. All things are very scarce and dear, especially cordage and canvas of all sorts. They are preparing some bread and flesh, but not any great quantity. As yet they have done nothing towards careening any of their ships. 'Tis said five ships of consideration will be armed out with diligence. Orders are certainly given for fitting all their galleys, on which they very much depend. They report here that your Fleet is in great (sic) of provisions, and from deserters and sickness is in want of eight thousand men. I could have convinced them of their mistake.

"The fortifications of Thoulon (I mean the entrance in) I could only see at a great distance. It seems to be very strong, with many bombs intermixed with their guns. It appears to me to be a difficult matter to attempt it, though, by the concern most people here appear to be under, I fancy there is a weakness somewhere that will be difficult for me to discover."

1694-5, Feb. [11-]21, n.s., Cadiz Bay.—Has received his letters of 18 Dec. and 1 Jan., and a duplicate of his letter of 4 Dec., and Sir Charles Hedges’s Report relating to the Genoezes. Offered, at the King of Spain’s request, to send a number of ships to convoy their [the Spaniards’] men [from Italy] to Barcellona, if they would procure shipping within a certain time, but they still delay; “sloth is so natural a qualification to a Spaniard.” Has sent to Lord Galloway. “I have sent to you by the Berwick the plan[s] of Thoulon and Merseilles.” The wind being westerly, no ships have been able to get out of the Straits for more than two months. The English and Dutch victuallers have arrived. The ill weather has prevented the fitting [out] of the Fleet. Sends some observations on the Ministry at Madrid.

use of before the summer is ended. The rest of the ships not marked are too weak and crazy to remain abroad longer than the haith [height] of summer. If they should be kept out, to return in the month of September, I very much fear many of them would in the first storm go to the bottom. I have not sent the Lords of the Admiralty the like paper; therefore, if you please, not to take any notice that I sent it; but if occasion offers, please to make what use of it you think fit." . . .

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1694-5, [Feb. 25-] March 7, n.s., Cadiz Bay.—"I have very little more to trouble your Grace with at this time, than to acquaint you that I have received a letter from the Governor of Cadiz, that he has provided here a sufficient number of shipping to transport the soldiers from Italy to Barcellona, desiring a convoy for them. This service he completed by the 29th (sic) of February, n.s., which proves to be within one day of the time I desired, when I agreed to supply them with a convoy. The ships of war might return back to this place, but their delays in everything are so terrible, and their necessities so great, that my inclinations being to comply with everything his Catholic Majesty desires, they force me upon many difficulties and hazards, as particularly in this matter, the season of the year being so far advanced that I may probably expect the French has [have] ready armed a greater number of ships to intercept them than 'tis proper to detach from this Fleet; but your Grace may be assured that I will do what lies in my power to make everything easy to them. The Fleet here will be ready in fourteen or fifteen days, if the weather proves fine, and upon that consideration I think to perform this service at the time when the whole Fleet will be nearest to sustain them. I have advice from Mersellis that orders are come for refitting their galleys and ships with all expedition, and though 'tis thought that men will be wanting, yet we have always found the French King has been able to remove that difficulty.

"In my humble opinion 'twould be much for the service of the nation, if some present were sent to the Government of Algier, which I am told they expect; and if such a thing be approved of, and your Grace will please to let me know it, I will send them that advice to keep them in better humour.

[P.S.] "Being informed that the Portuguese ships and vessels transport French goods to this and other ports of Spain, I have detained one or two that I had good reason to suspect, in order to her [their?] being visited. Probably there may come a complaint of this from the King of Portugal. If I am too busy in this matter, your Grace will please to inform me."

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, March [11-]21, n.s., Cadiz Bay.—Regrets to learn that his health is not perfectly restored. Writes only because people will be asking, what news from Cadiz, and to satisfy Lord Nottingham. Has careened all the three deckts [deckers] but two, and all those of the third rate that were most to be feared, &c.

"I give you a thousand thanks for your favour to me in speaking to the King. I would not make him uneasy by my asking, but much rather have it fall. I am afraid I am thought an uneasy man, and I swear, if I know myself, I had rather be a dog than deserve that character. If people will judge of my temper by my being uneasy at wintering here, that I can't help. Whatever froward expressions the first surprise might occasion, or my peevishness after my sickness, I hope nobody will charge me with neglect. . . ."

Re. 19 April 1695.

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1694[-5], March 12, Whitehall.—"Whilst I was in the country I received your two letters of the 23rd January and the 7th Feb., both n.s., and have read them to his Majesty. I was in hopes this Fleet, designed to carry the men, bomb-vessels, and provisions, would sooner have been ready, but at my arrival here find they are not yet gone, though now waiting nothing but weather to carry the transport ships, on which the four Reg[iments] are designed to embark, from the River to Portsmouth. If they have as expeditious a voyage as that you mention of the Romney or the Bonadventure, I hope they may yet arrive soon enough; for his Majesty is very desirous you should lose no time in putting to sea, and concludes my Lord Galloway and you will agree upon such measures as may be most for his service and the public good.

"Several accounts we have from France agree with what you have received from Marseilles, that the French will put out no fleet this year, at least, not their great ships. I may very well be mistaken, but I am rather apt to give credit to that than to your other letter of intelligence, that they design invading us this summer. However, when there is but a bare possibility of such an attempt, and that one considers the strength you have with you, and what is left for the defence of us and these seas, you will agree his Majesty cannot reasonably think of diminishing the strength here; but, notwithstanding that, and the list you have sent of the ships at Thoulon, [he] hopes you will have force sufficient to do what can be done in those seas."

The order of 30 March to the commander at Smyrna was countermanded by another from the Queen of 21 Aug. A letter had from Capt. Wakelin of 21 Nov. says he had received the latter. Col. Steward commands the landmen designed for Cadiz, and is leaving for Portsmouth. The victualling and bomb-vessels with the convoy are at Spithead.

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1694[-5], March 14, Whitehall.—“His Majesty has been pleased by me to direct Sir Geo. Rook and Mr. Preistman to draw a project in what manner a fleet may be kept the next winter in the Mediterranean, equal if not superior to that the French have in those seas. These gentlemen are of opinion that as there are many of the ships now with you [which] will not be in a condition to continue there another season, so there are some here too old and too weak to be ventured upon such a service. They therefore agree that if his Majesty resolve upon a strength equal to what I have mentioned, it must be composed partly of ships now at Cadiz, which may be able to stay there another winter, and partly of such ships as may be sent from hence, you returning hither those that are unfit to continue there.” . . .

Autograph draft. Endorsed: A duplicate of this was sent (&c.).

GILBERT HEATHCOTE TO SHREWSBURY.

1694-5, March 18, St. Swithin's Lane.—“The Eastland Merchants having been with the Lords of the Admiralty to desire protection only for forty men to fit out five ships to carry out our manufactures to several ports of the Baltick Sea, it was denied them; upon which they petitioned his Majesty in Council, offering (I think) unanswerable reasons, and a necessity for it, and attended again last night at the door, but it was not granted.” Considers this an injury to trade, and consequently to the revenue, on which the continuance of the war depends. Refers to “the villainous trades of defacing and clipping our coin; it being computed that to the value of eight or ten hundred thousand pounds of their clippings have been melted into ingots and sent abroad.” Scarcity of silver, &c. Signed.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SEC. TRENCHARD.

1695, [March 25-] April 4, n.s., Cadiz Bay.—Has received his letter of 12 Feb. Is sorry that he is not better in health. "I am afraid your correspondent in Provence [Provence] mistakes the number of ships in Thoulon, for by all the accounts I have received their number is sixty at least, and ships of greater strength than what he puts down. I do not find they have any design of arming their whole number this summer, but those advices I do not entirely rely on. I should be very glad the victualling ships and men were arrived with us, both which I am in great want of, and am afraid shall hardly be able to proceed up the Straits till they come to me, which may prove to be of ill consequence if the French make any early attempt upon Catalonia. I do not trouble you with the news of our cruisers in the Levant, believing you have received an account from Livorne."

Signed. Endorsed: R. May the 3rd, o.s.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

[1695, (March 25-) April 4, n.s., Cadiz.]—"I can now send your Grace word that the ships here with me are all ready for the sea, but we want the main ingredients, men and provisions, both which I am hourly expecting; and if I have no news by the next post of their departure from England, I will, if it be possible for me to complete the Fleet to six weeks' provisions, venture up the Straits with these transport ships, for if those men were put into Catalonia, I should not be under any great apprehension of the loss of that kingdom, without which they are not in a condition to make the least resistance.

"Long before this will arrive I suppose your Grace has had, by the way of Livorne, the news of my cruisers taking two French men-of-war; therefore I do not trouble you with the account of it. The King has lost a pretty officer in Captain Killigrew, who was a very good man, and one I had a particular kindness for.

"I herewith transmit you the news I have from Marselis and Thoulon,* which I am inclined to believe, I having three persons in those parts, whose relations pretty near agree with one another. The French are even with me, for in this town they have spies in abundance, one of which I was very near having in custody about ten days since. They have three fellows [who] lie ready to go with any extraordinary intelligence, which I suppose they depend upon for making greater diligence than a Spaniard will. The French give more money to protect them than I can to have them seized, so they are likely to remain for the service they design them.

* See Feb 1-11.

“Your Grace will please to acquaint the King that he must not expect any ships or galleys of the King of Spain’s to join his Fleet this summer. I have set up two half-galleys, that will be constantly going this summer between Barcellona and Finall, by which means letters will pass between my Lord Galloway and me with more expedition than by land.”

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695, March 26, Whitehall.— . . . “Sir George Rook and Mr. Preistman have laid a scheme before the King. . . . By the calculation they can make, I find it will be very hard to pick out a force sufficient to be masters there another summer. . . .

“The plan of Thoulon which you mention is come to my hands, though from whence I cannot well tell, having had no letter to inform me. The King has another from my Lord Galloway, who says he has sent the same to you. He has also in writing set down the difficulties of attempting to burn the ships or town, of which I pretend to make no judgment; only it seems to me that if a few Regiments could be got from the Duke of Savoy to join those the King has in pay in that service and the four Reg[iments] you will have on board you, they might be strong enough to possess some post upon the hills near Toulon, from whence the town and the haven might be bombarded. I heartily wish something of this kind could be done, because the destroying those ships is to be preferred before a success of any other kind one could wish for. Then either peace or war would be safe to England.

[P.S.] “I have just received a note for the wine and the Parmesan cheese you have sent me, for which I give you thanks.”

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695, April 9, London.—Has received his letters of 21 Feb. and 7 March, both n.s. “His Majesty seems well satisfied that the Fleet will be ready so soon to put to sea. He has directed me to enquire what has been the custom of presenting the Government of Algiers, being willing to show them the same civilities they have formerly received, but not to create new precedents. A return to this (sic) you shall receive by the next post, and also an account of what answer his Majesty has commanded to be made to the Portugal Envoyé’s complaint of your stopping and searching their ships.” Encloses copy of a complaint by one who calls himself the Agent of Genua.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, April 12, o.s., Cadiz Bay.—“This morning the convoy with the victuallers and bomb ships arrived in this Bay, which was at a time when they were very much wanted, I having concluded to put to sea with the Fleet, with no more provisions than for one month.” Sends this by an express going to Madrid.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, April 16, o.s., Cadiz Bay, on board the Britannia.—Has received his letters of 12 and 14 March. “Nothing but the weather prevents my going to sea; as it has been all this winter, so it still continues. I very impatiently wait for that good hour, fearing Catalonia is in a very ill posture of defence, and therefore would fain have that small addition of men from Finall to reinforce that kingdom, which the Spaniards do daily solicit for. The Dutch convoy with provisions is not yet arrived, which they are in great want of. I find by Brigadier Stewart the officers with him are in great want of money.” . . . Sends a list<sup>s</sup> of ships able to stay abroad another winter. Stores in custody of the commissioners here, &c. Has not yet had an answer from Lord Galloway.

Signed. R. 17 May.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, April 16-26, Britannia, in Cadiz Bay.—Has received his letter of 12 March. Sends this to the Corrona [Corunna] by express. “I am extremely proud,” &c. (See Coxe.)

On 7 Feb. sent a list of ships that might be kept abroad another winter; this does not appear to have been received. Sends another, with additions. It is impossible to leave men behind; most of them have been absent from their families two years, and few ships have more than necessary; and at least 500 must be sent to bring the two French ships home from Massina. The Commissioners will transmit an account of stores to the Navy Board. The ships to be sent out should be largely supplied with stores, which would come in as good condition as if sent by transport ships.

“The next thing,” &c. (See Coxe.)

“The orders which are to come about these matters I desire may be sent by the way of Madrid, to be forwarded to me by Mr. Stanup [Stanhope]; as also to Livorn, Genoa, or Finall, lest they should miscarry or come too late to execute what his Majesty designs. At Finall I have settled two boats to go and come between that place and Barcellona, but as yet have not had any trial of what diligence they make. . . .

“I suppose the King does not design to have here any more than three English flags; that I think a number sufficient for the squadron. I found one here, and therefore continued him. I fancy all these will be changed for others from England; but lest there should be any thoughts to the contrary, I must beg your favour that Vice-Admiral Aylmer may return with me," he being in ill health.

Signed.

1695, April 23, Whitehall.—“I send you a copy of the Portugall Envoy's memorial, presented to the King, concerning two ships that you have stopped in the Port of Gibraltar, as also a copy of the answer his Majesty commanded me to make; by which you will understand his Majesty's intentions in these and the like cases, that the Portuguese have not any disturbance in their commerce any further than as they shall be found convoying French goods, which ought not to be more privileged in their ships than our merchants' effects are, the Treaty between Portugall and France being the same they have with us.

“At the desire of the Bishop of London [Compton], his Majesty would have you write in his name to the Emperor of Fez that a reasonable ransom be set upon all the English, Scotch, and Irish who are now in slavery under him, which I suppose is in order to have care taken for their being released.

“The Chancellor of Scotland [Tweeddale], since his being here, has solicited his Majesty that it might be recommended to you to use your endeavours that the Scots trading into the Mediterranean might no more be molested by the Governments of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli than the English are; which his Majesty commands me to signify to you, and that you procure them what security you can. By our Treaty with Alger (sic) it is expressly agreed that a passport from the Adm[iral] or Commissioners of the Admiralty in Scotland shall be equally considered with the like passport from England; and his Majesty has lately appointed a Commission of Admiralty in Scotland, composed of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Yester, the Advocate, the Justice Clerk, Sir John Maxwell, Sir Francis Scott, and Baillie Charters. His Majesty therefore would have you put that Government in mind, either by the Consul or what other way you think fit, that they give orders to have those passports duly respected. The Treaty of Tripoly takes notice only of the English passports, but 'tis no doubt the others were equally intended, though they are not expressly mentioned. It's further provided, where there are no passports, the vessel shall go free when the major part of the ship's company are subjects of the King of Great Britain, which includes the Scotch as well as the English, and therefore his Majesty would have you take care in some manner that they enjoy the freedom of trade, as his subjects.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[1695,] May 12, Dublin Castle.—“I cannot omit my particular thanks to your Grace, for your care of this poor country, in obtaining for them the King's order to the Admiralty to send us two fourth-rate frigates, it being so answerable to the assurance your Grace has ever given me, of being a friend to it.

“I must likewise assure your Grace of the satisfaction I take in your being, by the death of Secretary Trenchard, in the office which brings the business of this kingdom so entirely into your hands. I shall therefore apply myself in the public matters (as well as what may concern me in particular) to the assistance and favour of your Grace.

[P.S.] “Since my writing this, a packet is come in which brings me your Grace's of May the 1st, which makes me concerned for the remaining illness of your eyes, and I shall ever be so, when anything befalls your health or interest.

“It is very reasonable for Mr. Keightly to say those things he did to a person so much my friend as your Grace is pleased to be ; but I think I have too good grounds not to believe what I mentioned to him in the bit of paper enclosed in my letter to him. To be free with your Grace, I fear this gentleman is more in concert with some in great place here, who have left no stone unturned to prevent the meeting of a Parliament, or at least to get others joined with me (which they knew I would not submit to), than free to join those that would willing[ly] set this miserable people upon a secure Protestant bottom, and consequently an increase of strength to his Majesty's interest.

“And to satisfy your Grace this kingdom can as little subsist at the rate the Revenue falls, as it can without a Parliament to settle it after so great a Revolution, I have enclosed a paper given by the Commissioners of the Revenue, where it appears that this last quarter it is fallen 5,832*l.*, and the ablest of them tell me they believe it will fall this year near forty thousand pounds.

“I take this more unkindly of Mr. Keightly, for if ever I obliged any man, by engaging my Lord Portland for to assist him in his grant, it is he.

“Pray, my Lord, forgive the ill manners in writing your Grace such a long postscript, but the post will not permit me to write over my letter again.

[P.P.S.] “Since the writing my letter, I have word brought me that my Lord Chief Justice Rennalls of the King's Bench is like to die, and that Mr. Justice Coote will, on the other side of the water, put in for it. He is so young a man, and so unread, that 'tis not possible the subject can have the benefit of the laws under his administration ; and therefore I hope your Grace will prevent his endeavours, and (when it is proper) I will endeavour to represent the most able men for that station to your Grace, though (God knows) there are very few such here.”

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695, May 21, London.—"Upon the 17th of this month I received a letter from you of the 12th of April, and at the same time two more, both dated the 16th of the same month. His Majesty being then gone for Holland, I dispatched copies of them and of the papers enclosed in them by that night's post to be laid before him there, and have this day communicated the originals to the Justices here, who have writ to hasten his Majesty's resolutions upon the several particulars you desire orders upon. My Lord Godolphine tells me that the Treasury have taken care, with the assistance of the Admiralty, to furnish the officers with money who are in Col. Stewart's Brigade, and whom you seemed concerned for.

"I here enclosed send you a duplicate of what I writ to you upon the 7th of May by his Majesty's command; and also an extract* of such intelligences as I have had from Mr. Sec. Trenchard and other letters I have seen of the preparations the French make towards setting out ships in their several ports, the Lords of the Admiralty acquainting me you desired some information of this kind. That which comes from Marseilles will be old to you, and less exact I suppose than other advices you may receive.

"Our postmasters here complain much of the delays given to letters that pass through Spain. It is of that importance very often to have them dispatched that I desire you will represent it to the Court of Madrit, believing they will take much more notice of what you shall say than if it came from Mr. Stanhope, to whom I have also writ by this post to complain of this negligence, which in this conjuncture may prove of ill consequence to the common interest."

The EARL OF GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695, June 3-13, Camp before Casal.—Has received two letters from Admiral Russell, from Cadiz, of 2nd May, and from the Cap de Rose of the 21st. He reports that his fleet is in good condition, and that the troops which had arrived under Brigadier Stewart were in good health. Refers to designs upon Toulon, Nice, and Marseilles.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, June 4[or 7?], Dublin Castle.—“I have received your Grace's of the 11th of May, wherein you are pleased to signify to me his Majesty's commands in reference to an Act to be brought in this session of Parliament for confirming the private estate of Mrs. Villiers, that if there be no occasion for such an Act, his Majesty had rather the matter should not be mentioned there, but if there be a want of such a confirmation, his Majesty does consent, and gives leave that such a Bill be prepared.

“For my better information in this affair, I have advised with Mrs. Villiers her counsel, who think it necessary such an Act should pass for confirmation of this estate, for the grants already made to Mr. Guy and Mr. Topham are without any consideration. There is likewise no quitrent reserved, which is required by the Act of Settlement upon any alterations of this estate, other than for lives or for years. This private estate was also never in charge in the Exchequer, nor any forfeitures thereof found by inquisition or otherwise upon record, so that 'twill be liable to be resumed by the Crown.

“'Tis fit your Grace should know the other two Lords Justices refused to pass this estate from Mr. Topham to Mrs. Villiers according to the King's letter lately sent over, though they passed it before from Mr. Guy to Mr. Topham, well knowing for whom it was in trust; and I think Sir Cyril Wich also counter-signed the warrant for passing the first grant to Mr. Guy. I am told they value themselves now in refusing to pass this grant, which has caused the more notice to be taken of it, and indeed some impressions against it.

“Since my being alone in the Government, upon application in behalf of Mrs. Villiers, I have signed the warrant for passing the grant, but told those concerned for her, I thought it more advisable to forbear passing the patent till the Parliament had met, and then, without mentioning the lady's name, there might be a Bill framed for vesting this estate in the King, to be disposed of as his Majesty should think fit; in the passing whereof they would be assisted by my Lord Romney's and the Earl of Athlone's friends, who have grants from the Crown, and will press for the like Acts of confirmation in Parliament; but Mrs. Villiers' counsel and agents pressing me to pass the grant according to his Majesty's letter, I signed the warrant for the same.

"As to my own opinion, since the Bills must pass the censure of the House, I should think it more proper to have the heads of it arise there, than to be sent over in the first transmission. And if they would forbear passing the patent (for the warrant yet is only signed) till the sessions of Parliament, whereby it would not be so apparent that the interest was in Mrs. Villiers, the Commons would, I am persuaded, more readily concur in giving their assent to what is desired."

Signed. At foot: "This is a copy of my former letter which was thrown over board with the three packets."

Endorsed: June the 4th. Re. the 19th. Enclosure:—

[Opinions respecting the proposed Bill relating to Mrs. Villiers' Estate.]

"The following matters are offered as motives and reasons, that it is highly advisable to have a Bill for vesting the private estate in the King, that the grants intended to be made of it, or any part of it, may have the effect designed by his Majesty.

"The private estate is that estate which was vested in the Duke of York by page 111 of the Act of Settlement, which vests the lands of Regicides in the Duke of York and his heirs, and the reprise he had when any part of the lands of Regicides were evicted. For a great part of these lands the Duke never took out any patent, nor was there any need of one, the lands being immediately in him by the Act. There never was any office, inquisition, or other matter of record finding what were the lands or estate of which the Regicides or any in trust for them stood seised; and after the Duke of York's accession to the Crown, that estate was never put in charge in the Exchequer, but managed and kept as a private and particular estate, so as no title yet appeareth on record in the Crown to those lands, nor what lands the private estate are or consist of, which seems necessary before the King can effectually grant them.

"By the said page 111 of the Act of Settlement, and page 43 of the Explanatory Act, if those lands be aliened otherwise than for years or lives, they are thereby made liable to the full quit-rent equal with Soldiers' and Adventurers' lands, which is more than the rent intended to be reserved on the grant to Mrs. Villiers, and therefore, to prevent doubts, it is thought most secure to be done by Act of Parliament.

"The first patent, dated June 93, to Mr. Guy, Mr. Rochfort, and Mr. Hutton, being in trust for the Crown (as is said) for want of a consideration therein, and also because the patentees, pursuant to directions of subsequent letters patents, conveyed their estate to Richard Topham and his heirs, which was a declaration of such a trust, who conveyed the same to Mrs. Villiers and her heirs : the conveyance by Richard Topham to Mrs. Villiers, and the patent now intended to be passed to Mrs. Villiers and her heirs, having no better consideration than the first patent, will be liable to the same objection, which cannot be remedied anyway so well as by Act of Parliament. Several leases and contracts have been made by Mrs. Villiers and her agents, and rents have been paid to them since the passing the patent to Mr. Guy, Mr. Rochfort, and Mr. Hutton, for Mrs. Villiers' use ; and it will be for the security as well of the tenants as those that have received and paid over the rents to have what leases and contracts have been made and rents paid ratified by Act of Parliament.

Rob. Rochfort.

Alan Brodrick.

“ Though I be not clearly of the same opinion in relation to the trust, but rather think that this last patent, when passed, will extinguish all trusts for the Crown, yet I am of opinion that both from the nature of the thing itself and the particular instances mentioned in this paper, Mrs. Villiers has sufficient motives to desire an Act of Parliament, declaring the private estate to have been vested in the Crown at the time of passing the letters patents, and confirming her title, and also providing for the leases, receipts, and payments of her trustees and agents.

JAM[ES] CLINCH to Lord Ailesbury.

[1695, June 8, Paris.]—“ The next day after I arrived here the King [of France] ordered [me] to wait upon Mr. Croisey, and lay before him the state of matters as they stood at my departure. . . . He seemed entirely convinced there was a very great disposition there for the King [James], and lamented his master was not at present in circumstances to profit of it. . . . He said that if the concerts for the King were so wide, and the disgust against the P. of Orange so general, as that seven or eight thousand could do the work, that was a thing his master could do at any time, and in any season. . . .

“ I had a pretty long discourse with Lord Middleton upon what I had the honour before to entertain him, and I found him in all the disposition imaginable to enter into the strictest ties of friendship with you. I must confess he was a little shocked at the preliminary of Mrs. Sweetable's letter, where there was a clause that he should not show your letters to Mr. Lindsey before he had read them, or communicate them to Mr. Jones. As to the first, he said the letters were generally opened before the King, and read before they came to be perused by anyone, and that afterwards Mr. Lindsey never saw one that came from one of your importance. . . . As to his standing up for the Constitution, I found him entirely in your sentiments, both as to that and his being against the confirming [conferring?] of any new titles.” . . .

J. CLINCH to MRS. SWEETABLE.

[16]95, June 8.—“The inclosed is for Lord Ailesbury; where there is anything [un]intelligible in it, you will be able to expound it to him. . . . You will have a letter perhaps by this occasion from Lord Middleton, which was writ before he and I discoursed together. . . . The Prince's family was yesterday declared, and all his servants have taken their places accordingly. This has caused some angry reflections amongst Mr. Kemp's old servants, but all will vanish in time. I can assure you one thing, that Mr. Kemp was never more resolved to push his affairs with vigour than at present, . . . and so is his brother, whom he intends to see this day, and fall forthwith upon measures.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695, June 10-20, Camp before Casal.—A council of war was held on the 17th, at which the siege of Casal was resolved on. Represented the good state of the Fleet, and insisted on the siege of Nice, but the proposal was rejected on the ground of want of time, money, and means of transport. Has informed Admiral Russell of the resolution, and that he must not expect succours from hence. Believes the Admiral will be able to remain master of the sea. The enemy's coasts are guarded by large numbers of troops, and have been fortified. It is sufficient to have saved Spain, and to have ruined the commerce of the French, especially in the Levant.

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695, June 11, London.—“By command of the Lords that are here, Mr. Vernon will give you an account of all that has passed with relation to the orders you will receive by this post. This only comes to acknowledge yours of the 2nd May, and to wish you all success in whatever you may undertake.

* Sic.

"At your desire in my last I sent you an account of such intelligences as we receive from time to time of the French preparations at sea, and in that there was a list of the ships at Brest. I here enclosed send you a list<sup>o</sup> of what they have at Rochfort, and likewise at Toulon; but this account differing from what you sent, I conclude yours the more exact, though it can do no hurt to let you see both."

1695, June 12 [o.s.], Bretania, 6 leagues from Tholone.—
 "This comes to your Grace in so much haste, being sent with the ship that conveys the land-soldiers from Fenall to Barcelona, and a fair wind presenting, that I have not time to return your Grace the thousand thanks due for all your favours. I have made a reply to the paper you was pleased to send me. I confess 'twas a very surprising thing to me not only the unmannerly expressions of that fellow, but knowing how strict my behaviour has been in that matter of taking money all this winter, I wondered how any pretence should be taken for a complaint, but my secrecy [sincerity?] has mortified the Genews (sic) and French merchants, as also the Governor of Cadiz. From these reasons I suppose the complaint arises, for the same thing I read in a French gazet (?). I hope you won't believe the report true. I am sure, had I taken money, my circumstance[s] would not be in the posture they now are. I won't trouble you with that relation, but I assure you I have not upon any pretence touched a farthing, though I might justify the doing it in many respects; but I had a thought above such advantages.

"I am extremely glad you did not press the K[ing] about the Vice Admiral of England. By the time I get for [to?] England I may possibl[y] be of another opinion than to desire it." . . .

SHREWSBURY to [GEORGE, EARL OF] BERKELEY.

[16]95, June 17, Whitehall.—"I have laid the several letters which your Lordship did me the honour to write me before the Justices, who have directed Mr. Vernon this day to make you an immediate answer. If Admiral Allemonde have as good an opinion of the attempt upon Dunkirk as it is said he has, I find the King is very earnest he should undertake it; and I hope that may not hinder your Lordship from attempting St. Malo's at the same time, since by the council of war enclosed in yours of the 15th I perceive you had resolved upon it, without the help of the Dutch, with the assistance of such frigates as the Lords of the Admiralty say they have already furnished you with."

M[ATHEW] PRIOR to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, June 18-28, the Hague.—“If anything had occurred here worth your Grace’s knowledge, I should have presumed to trouble you as regularly as if I were still under your province. At present I write upon Mr. Blathwayt’s order to inform your Grace what I know concerning one Wall. I wrote Mr. Vernon word the 4-14 December past, that the day before this Wall came to me, and told me he was brother to my Lady Oglethorp; that being here on his own private concerns, his circumstances low, and he amongst the Jacobites here, and looked upon as one of that party, he was employed by Edward Roberts of Amsterdam to help forward the correspondence between those sort of people in England and their brethren in France; that I should know what passed between these people, &c. Accordingly he brought me two or three letters, which (as I thought) contained nothing of great consequence, which however I remitted to Mr. Vernon.

“In the meantime he had addressed himself to Sir John Trenchard, and intimated to him that he could not do much service here, and that upon any encouragement from Sir John he would go for France, and from thence give him an account (through my channel) what was doing there. Sir John Trenchard sent him 20 pounds, and hastened his voyage, which yet upon divers pretences he shifted off; sometimes he was too much in debt here, sometimes he could not yet get away from Roberts, who would send letters by him, and at other times his designs were not yet ripe; and at every time a little ready money was the main business, till I grew weary of giving him any till he might deserve it. At length he came to me about March, and said he was resolved to leave Roberts unsatisfied, his debts unpaid, and to break through all difficulties to do his country some particular service, which he said he was sure he could compass, and which he would not discover to me. Having therefore instructed him in what I thought convenient, and given him some money and clothes, I took my leave of him, and he parted he told me for France.

“What I desired him to instruct me in was, first, by what means and through what hands the letters from France hither passed, though I already knew this in good part. Secondly, that he should write me word what Jesuits and priests received deserters and others from France in their convents at Bruges, Gaunt, &c. Thirdly, that he should inform me of the estate of Dunkirk (where he was recommended to Sir James Gerardine), what number of ships he found there, what men, cannon, ammunition, powder, and what else might be necessary for the Government to know; and upon these informations I told him I would render my masters an account of his services, and do my endeavour to have them rewarded. But from that day to this I have not heard from Wall, and so neither know if he has deserved or will deserve your Grace’s protection.

“I represent to your Grace that though my Lord Dursley and myself have had reiterated orders from Lord Nottingham, Sir John Trenchard, and from his Majesty here that none should come into England without a pass, the masters of the Packet boat take in all sort of people without any regard to passes, saying 'tis sufficient for them that from the Post-office they have no orders to the contrary; and the Post-Master at the Brielle orders that affair so that his clerk puts all sort of persons on board the Packet without any passes, nor does any require passes of me but such as design to beg with them, though I am always ready to give them, and have never exacted anything for my so doing. I have spoken of this matter these three years, and only add this word to your Grace now, that if the thing be thought of use to the public, orders may be given that the abuse be prevented, or at least that I may be able to give a less confused account of it to my Lord Villiers at his coming hither, whatever may become of me after."

R. the 25th.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, June 18, Dublin Castle.—"In obedience to his Majesty's commands, signified to me by the Lords Justices, I have without loss of time caused such Bills to be prepared in Council as are thought necessary to pass in the next Parliament, and have sent them over in form by express.

"'Tis fit I should acquaint your Grace that the Bill for an additional Excise being the only money-bill sent over in this transmission, and not valued above 20,000*l.*, some have made their objections against it, as if not of consideration sufficient to induce the Crown to pass the other Bills therewith also transmitted in favour of the people. But your Grace may please to remember that in the representations I made concerning the point of the sole right, which bred so much heat in the last House of Commons, I always laid it down as my opinion that for asserting the King's prerogative, 'twere fit that one money-bill should be tendered to the House. And having good reason to believe that, that for an additional Excise would pass without any opposition, I humbly proposed the sending over that Bill only; and that his Majesty's right being asserted, as all agree it will, by their passing that Bill, it would be gracious in his Majesty to leave the preparing the heads for the other money-bills to the House, who will undoubtedly consider of further ways and means to raise such other sums as shall be demanded for the support of the Government. And having never received any account of his Majesty's dislike of this my proposal, I have therefore transmitted only this one money-bill for an additional Excise.

"It may be expected that a Bill should be now sent over for confirming the Articles of Limerick. My Lord Chancellor has told me a Bill was prepared the last sessions for confirming part of the Articles, but it was mislaid, and I could not have a draft of the Bill till Friday last, when his Lordship brought one to me. The King is obliged by the 12th Article to use his endeavours that the Articles be confirmed in Parliament; but I apprehend this should be done upon a petition from the Irish, and they never having addressed for any such Act, it is to be considered whether without such application any such Bill had best be brought in, for they have little reason to complain of the Articles not being performed to them. Wherefore I did not think it convenient to send over a Bill for confirming these Articles, in the first transmission."

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

[1695, June 21,] Friday evening.—“I give your Grace this trouble to advise you that the Rochester is now at Portsmouth, and I think will be a proper ship to be employed on the service of Neckson; and the captain being now in town, if your Grace please to signify the Lords Justices' pleasure to the Admiralty that he attend you for your commands, I will draw his instructions for your Grace's approval tomorrow morning.”

Endorsed: June 21, 95.

[SECRETARY] J. JOHNSTOUN TO [SHREWSBURY].

[16]95, June 21, Ed[inbu]r[gh].—“I wish the trouble in your eyes proceeded only from want of sleep, as mine does, which obliges me to ask your pardon for using another hand. I hope you do me the justice to believe that your interposition will always have its just weight with me; and I may venture to say as much for the greater and better part of this Parliament, though many of them have not the honour to be known to your Grace. I am sorry that the doing what you desire at present can be no proof of this, since we cannot do otherwise; for to proceed to the execution of a person of my Lord Bradalban's quality without consulting the King, may have been practised in the late reigns (though even then the Ministry had previously the secret), but I am confident will never be practised in this unless that Lord's friends, who it seems, having done it formerly, apprehend retaliation, should come to have the power of doing it again. I am sure none that I have interest with will copy after them. So groundless such an apprehension is, that though none that know my Lord Bradalban will trust him, either in public or private matters, if they can shun it, yet I know not one man in the Parliament who's inclined to have my Lord Bradalban lose either life or fortune.

“It is an old business that he is accused of, and he never dipped in blood in the late reigns, as others now with him in the Government did, and possibly of several men of his way whom this nation will never trust; he is the man they would rather have borne with (if they must bear with any of them) had he kept to his character of going along quietly with his party, and making what money he could; but since his late alliance he would needs be the head of the party, and act above board, practising upon the members by threatenings and other undue means, and bidding defiance to all mankind. This did irritate, and he would have been reached upon the head of bribery (he is a Commissioner of the Treasury), when the informations of treason came in against him, which was a mere incident.

“The Parliament has done nothing but what is of course, and have not pressed for the indictment, because the Commissioner inclines to hear from the King, and he himself begs a delay, and the witnesses are not all yet brought to town. That he is guilty of treating with the Highlanders in favours (sic) of King James at the same time that he was employed by the King to treat for him will appear upon the trial undeniably; nay, his friends do not deny the matter of fact, though they palliate it, but whether the evidence will amount to a legal proof or not I do not yet know, for two of them had only the articles from Major General Buchan, with whom Bradalban treated, but were not at the treaty. Glengary, the head of the Macdonalds, which, next to Argyll’s, is the greatest name in the Highlands, and a man of the best character amongst them, was present for King James, and cannot believe that Bradalban will deny the treaty, which both parties abstained from signing by agreement. Others present are in France or dead, except some still alive and in the Highlands, who are sent for.

“Bradalban should throw himself on the King’s mercy, and endeavours may be used to shun a trial. The Parliament will be satisfied if he be laid aside. I have desired one to tell him this. He wrongs himself by showing so much fear, which is understood to be the effect not of the discoveries already made of a business past four years ago, and of which he knows the proofs to be doubtful, but that he is conscious to himself of later practices that may happen to be now discovered. There are letters to be produced, particularly one from the same Major General Buchan at the Court of St. Germain’s, bearing that my Lord Bradalban and my Lord Linlithgow are very well there, and encouraging them to continue to support the Jacobite party, &c.

“I hope my brother has opportunities to wait on your Grace, and to inform you of the state of affairs here, such in a word as, if his Majesty beat the French in Flanders, may prove tolerable enough for awhile, which is all that can be said of it. I might indeed add that there are remedies at hand, to wit, honesty and stren[g]th enough to support the Constitution against any enemies it can have within this kingdom, were these remedies well applied, I mean honest and sufficient men employed; but the difficulty of getting that done is such that it minds me of a rigid Predestinarian, who, having damned all his hearers by decreed perversity, told them at last, to comfort them, that they might be all saved if they would.”

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS of the ADMIRALTY.

1695, June 24, Whitehall.—“His Majesty having commanded a ship to be prepared and sent to the Westward upon a particular service, and a vessel called the Fortune, lying now in the River, being ready for that purpose, I desire your Lordships will forthwith direct a man-of-war to convoy the said vessel to Torbay or Plymouth, and that the Captain of the man-of-war designed a convoy be ordered to London, and receive from me such directions as I have his Majesty's commands to give him for his conduct between the River and Torbay or Plymouth; and after having been in either or both of those places as I shall direct him, he will have performed the instructions I have to give him, and then your Lordships may be pleased to command him upon any other service you think proper."

SHREWSBURY to MR. PRIOR.

[16]95, June 28, London.—“I received your letter of the 18th by the last post, and an account of that Wall, which Mr. Blaithwayt directed you to inform me about; but having reason to believe the person I am inquiring after is not the same that offered himself to you and Brigadier Levison's brother, I desire by the first opportunity you will give me a description of his person with whom you treated, and also of his age, and, if you can, send me some of his handwriting.”

Autograph draft.

SHREWSBURY to PORTLAND.

1695, June 28, London.—“Having received his Majesty's commands by Sir George Rooke, and at the same time signified to me by Mr. Blaithwayt, to give the necessary assistance to the prosecution of a design which has been long proposed by one Wall, alias Nickson; upon speaking with this person I was under some doubt whether he sincerely intended executing what he offered, or only to get into his hands and then run away with those ships which it would be requisite to trust him with, and be furnished at his Majesty's expense to be a troublesome privateer upon his own subjects.

“I immediately sent over these suspicions of mine to Mr. Blaithwayt, who ordered me from the King to enquire of Brigadier Levison concerning the character of one Wall, who had some time since presented himself to his brother in Holland as my Lady Oglethorp's brother, and pretended to do service by discovering intelligence that passed between England and France by the way of Holland. At the same time Mr. Blaithwayt did also direct Mr. Prior to give me an account what he knew of this same person.

“I have discoursed with the one, and had a letter from the other, who both represent that man as a needy tricking fellow, upon whose undertakings nothing ought to be relied; but upon further discourse with this person here, he utterly denies any knowledge of Mr. Prior, or any relation to my Lady Oglethorp, so that he must either be a very impudent impostor, or else not the same man as Mr. Blaithwayt has set me to enquire after; and I have these reasons to believe he is not the same, because my Lady Oglethorp's brother was once described to me as a very young man, which this is not, and I have a letter of his to Bri. Levison's brother, which is quite a different hand from what this man writes, and is subscribed P. Wall, whereas this goes by the name of Matthew Wall. . . .

"Upon consideration that the expense has been made already, and the man trusted with his ship in such a manner that he might run away with her any time these two months, which he has not done, but on the contrary performed everything on his part to forward the attempt; upon these encouragements everything is prepared, and he wants nothing now but a wind to proceed, if he have time to execute his design; if cross winds delay him till his commission be expired, then to renew it, in order to return and hereafter attempt the same thing; but it being most likely the West winds will continue for some time, and stop his going out of the Downs, I was willing to give your Lordship this account, understanding he has discovered his project to you." Has had no directions from the King touching Capt. Baker.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695, June 28–July 8, Camp before Casal.—Sends regularly to Mr. Vernon the journal of what passes here. Mr. William Plowman has been here two days. Presented him to his Royal Highness, who referred him to the General of Finances at Turin, but has given orders for the appointment of a commission of experts in commerce to endeavour to establish "our project." Does not know what resolution the King has taken about the Fleet, but thinks it would be advantageous to leave it at Cadiz or in some other port of the Mediterranean during the winter, both for our commerce and for Italy. Hopes to succeed at Casal, and to undertake something more if the Fleet be allowed to remain. If it be withdrawn, Barcelona will be in danger. The same sum as before may therefore be demanded from Spain. Is writing to the King on the subject. Mr. Plowman is a Papist, but is employed by well disposed persons at London and Leghorn. It is difficult for an Englishman who has become a Papist not to be somewhat of a Jacobite, and favourable to France.

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1695, July 2.—"Since the writing of my other letter of the same date, the Council have met, where my Lord Antrim and two other gentlemen petitioned, in the name of the Ro[man] Ca[tholics] of Ireland, to peruse the Bills, alleging they had been refused it in Ireland, and that they were informed they contained things contrary to the Art[icles] of Lim[erick] and

Galloway ; but they producing no powers from any number of persons concerned, it was thought not reasonable to give such a delay, since it was what every particular person concerned had the same right to expect, if asked. Therefore the Council proceeded to consider the Bill for settling Intestates' Estates, which they agreed to without amendment. The Bill for discharging Sheriffs' Accounts they have also passed, altering the term of one year, as your Ex[cellency] had sent it over, to four years, as it is here in England.

“That for disarming Papists was also read, but admitted more debate, because the general clause disarming all Papists seemed to take away the benefit of the Art[icles] of Lim[erick], which promised that such as are there described shall have the arms by those Articles allowed them ; whereupon Mr. At[torney] is ordered to bring in a clause tomorrow, when the Council will sit again, describing and excepting the same persons mentioned there, but not naming the Art[icles] either of Lim[erick] or Gall[oway] ; and is also directed to make an alteration in that part that gives a liberty to examine persons for concealing of arms upon oath to accuse themselves. Though I had troubled you once before today, yet I thought it proper to give you this account.”

M. PRIOR to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, July 2-12, the Hague.—“I have received your Grace's letter of Friday last, and according to your commands send you the account which Wall gave me of himself, and that too written in his own hand.

“As to his person, he is of a middle stature, lean, about 24 or 26 years of age, wears his own hair brown and short, has a flat face, a good lively eye, winks when he speaks, and hardly looks a man in the face ; has a great volubility of tongue, but full of vulgar expressions, and has a slyness in his mien betwixt that of a priest and a pickpocket. He has been initiated amongst the Jesuits formerly, yet is not overstocked with Latin, speaks French but with an English accent, and Portuguese ; has been designed for a merchant, and made a voyage to the Indies.

“He has not writ to me since he left the Hague, nor to anybody else, I think, though he promised solemnly he would, particularly to one Trepsac, a young French Proposant in Theology, whom Wall has made privy to his secret, and whom, since Wall's going off, I have employed to intercept Roberts's letters, and have an eye upon his conduct ; of which I should have informed your Grace, if his observations had produced anything of effect.

“I spoke to the Pensioner yesterday concerning another Knight of the Industry, one James Sommerville, who has been with Mr. Kirby, the Consul of Amsterdam, to inform him that he was employed by Sir William Trombull in some particular service, and wanted money and assistance from the Consul; but since a letter he has produced, and the Consul has sent to the Hague, (by virtue of which the man said he was to act,) is not Sir William's hand, or the form of it well concerted, it is undoubted the man is a cheat, and as such the Pensioner has ordered him to be arrested till he may see what he says for himself.

"I beg your Grace's pardon that I entertain you this post with rogues and villains. One would think my letter dated from Newgate, and I savour (as Trincalo says of his comrade) more of the spy than the Ambassador.

"I know not how my own affairs may turn; doubtless extremely well, since my Lord Duke of Shrewsbury is pleased to be their patron."

SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, July 8-18, Camp before Casal.—Has not yet received a copy of the capitulation, as the clerks of M. de St. Thomas have been too busy. Mr. Plowman has almost agreed with his R.H. to supply the clothing of the army. Hopes by this means part of the subsidies may be paid in cloth, and that insensibly commerce may be established with England, and prohibited with France. His R.H. will await the return of his adjutant, whom he has sent to Viene. He will then join his army, leaving here 3,000 men to demolish the place.

French. R. 29.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, July 11-21, Camp near Casal.—Sends a copy of the capitulation. The demolition is proceeding. Renders account to Mr. Montagu of the commercial affair. Believes it would be for the King's service to have some one at Geneva, without any title, but charged to look after his interests, and to inform the Ministers of what passes there, and of French news. The Mar. d'Arselliers is at Berne, but useless at present, M. Nervart being there; he has a pension of 100*l.* from the King, on which he is able to subsist, as M. Nervart lodges him and his wife. If the King doubled his pension, he would establish himself at Geneva. He is a man of quality of Dauphiné, and was sent into Switzerland with M[r]. Cox, and it was to be wished that this minister had believed him, as Shrewsbury is aware. The French have a resident there.

SHREWSBURY to PORTLAND.

1695, July 12, Whitehall.—Received the two little papers of cipher, and sent them at once to Oxford, but Dr. Wallis answers that he apprehends more than ordinary difficulty in deciphering them. Has informed the Lords' Justice of the bounty of 200*l.* granted by the King to Capt. Baker. The description of Wall received from Mr. Prior differs from this man. "Before his machine vessel was ready, the date of his commission was so near expired that he desired he might return and renew it, upon which errand he is now gone, so that till his return back, or till we hear from him (which he has promised we shall), nothing can be expected from that design."

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1695, July 18, Whitehall.—"In mine of the last post I forgot to give your Excellency an answer to that part of your letter that proposes the erecting a Paper Office for preserving the orders, &c., of the Chief Governors in Ireland. The proposal seems reasonable and useful, but 'tis what cannot be brought well to a conclusion in his Majesty's absence.

"From a belief that your Excellency will be ready to do a kindness to one who will ever be glad of any opportunity of serving you, I desire the favour of you, to make some enquiry into the case of my Lord Bellew, who is at present under an outlawry, but, by his own story, has good pretensions to the benefit of the Articles of Limericke. He is proposed as a match to a Popish relation of mine, but if his case be not what the King's Justice cannot refuse to relieve, I would encourage no treaty of that kind, for I will never employ the little interest I may have with his Majesty to persuade him, in consideration of me, to do anything of this kind, more than the justice of the cause will oblige him to."

SECRETARY J. JOHNSTOUN TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, July 19, Ed[inbu]r[gh].—"The Nonconformist ministers in Ireland have sent one of their number to me, to solicit you. They are sensible of your goodness to them in procuring them an order for their arrears, and they hope your Grace will extend your goodness further in procuring them in the Parliament that is now to meet in Ireland a toleration by law, as it is in England. The reasons for toleration in general are so strong, that I hope there will be found no objections to this in particular sufficient to balance them; but no doubt my Lord Lieutenant [Lord Capel] and others who know the case have written to you fully on it. I only wish that if the thing be practicable that people may owe to your Grace's interposition for procuring the necessary orders about it, the greatest obligation that can be laid upon them, and which if they may not expect in the present state of affairs, they can hardly expect it at any other time.

"The orders for continuing the Parliament being lost in the packet-boat that is a-missing, and the letters that came after bearing only in general that such orders were sent without mentioning the time, and we having only asked the half of July, we could not but conclude that the time allowed did not exceed the time asked; and even the sitting without them, though they were granted, being treason, the Commissioner was necessitat[ed] to end the Parliament somewhat abruptly. And to end it calmly, and without consuming time, by which many people that had their private business before it would have been disobliged, we resolved not to bring in the Report about my Lord Stairs, though it had passed the Committee of Security, and consequently would have passed the Parliament, as all other things have done that have passed that Committee. But my reason was, that to insist still against that family after the Glenco business was not worth the while, and would have made the proceedings of Parliament look too much like private pique and faction.

“As to Bradalban, the proof could not have failed, even of his sending Major Menzies to King James to convince him that he was serving him in that negotiation, which sure was never communicated to the King. But the Parliament having made a shameful appearance at my Lord Melfort and my Lord Midleton’s trial, two thirds of them going out or not voting, we were not fond of trying Bradalban. Even honest men’s minds are going fast wrong here; they think the King neglects the nation, and that they have no security by the Government of it. The King gave no order for stopping the trial, which no doubt he would have done had Bradalban formerly owned to him those Articles, as it seems he does now.

“The King is displeas’d with the communicating the Report about Glenco to the Parliament, and with the other proceedings, but it seems is desirous that his displeasure should no way appear at present. It were wish’d it did not, for if new irritations be given instead of remedies, matters here upon the least misfortune abroad will scarcely wait for remedies. It’s no wonder that the King be displeas’d, for all those here of this nation, and others too whom your Grace knows, do unite their strength in giving bad colours to the proceedings of the Parliament; and however careful the King be to conceal his displeasure, the authors of it take care to publish it; and even the King’s secret to me about Bradalban, which I was told Bradalban and others did not know, was published by Bradalban and his party. Nay, letters are written here to some of the members that are most dipped in all the proceedings in the Parliament, that all their share [will] be pass’d over, and they be call’d up to Court, if they will separate from others.

“I know all this is calculated against me, and who is at the bottom of it; for my own particular concern I am as wearied of this post as ever a porter was of a load, and, were I once free, will never engage to serve but where interest and inclination are of a piece. I desire not to be thrown out disgracefully on the one hand, nor to throw myself out foolishly on the other, as if I did it on a sudden heat or humour; and I desire not to do anything that may look like abandoning the honest party here, which I have kept united together, nor to do anything that may prove a delivering up the cause to knaves. Nay, I can have patience in being uneasy for a time, that is, so long as I can make such men share largely in the uneasiness with me; but if after all a handle shall be given me sufficient to justify me for quitting, notwithstanding all these reasons, I’ll embrace it heartily, and I hope your Grace will bear me witness (for which reason I write to you of it) that I shall not have done it on the sudden.

“I have written fully to the Archbishop about the Church business, which is now in a fair way of settlement, for the Episcopal Clergy are dispos’d to take the oaths; but if his Majesty’s displeasure at the proceedings of Parliament be published, as some begin to do, and that the Episcopal Clergy get hopes that the laws of this Session will not be executed, as happened after the last Session of Parliament, they will no more take the oaths now than they did then. This is a matter of great moment to the stability of the Constitution in this kingdom, and may deserve your Grace's speaking with the Archbishop, and interposing with the King that those about him do not hinder it by writing hither of his displeasure at the proceedings of the Parliament, but that he allow the Archbishop to write both for the encouragement of such as shall take the oaths, and the discouragement of such as shall continue still obstinate.

"As to the business of Glenco, those concerned in it, as they had the dexterity to lay it at Court to the charge of the Presbyterians, so here in Scotland, to blunt the eagerness of the Presbyterian ministry to have it enquired into, they persuaded them that the King would be found dipped in it. But if the vindicating the King and Government of it hath done him as much service in England as it hath done him in this nation, it may be worth your Grace's while to convince him of it. By what my Lord Bradalban and the Master of Stair have said of that matter, some others it seems must at least have acted inconsiderately in it, which I shall explain to your Grace when I shall have the honour to see you. However, those others will find it their interest to give what assistance they can in stifling that matter.

"The Chancellor is become ten years younger than he was, by sitting in Parliament in this hot season often nine hours, and for the most part six. Never Commissioner did behave himself with more dignity and consideration, and when he spoke he did it with much weight, and so precisely to the point that though sometimes he spoke pretty long, he lost not one word. He has been honest and firm in business, like a rock, which hath not been his character the former parts of this life, but he says that he is going off, and that he is resolved his exit shall be honourable. The truth is, would he die now, he would do it with the applause and esteem of the whole nation, and never did a conclusion so much exceed the premises; but his health mending with such fatigue looks like a miracle. He has a great appetite, and it is evident his concern in business has the same effect upon him in making all pass that exercise has upon other men.

"The bearer, Sir Thomas Livingston, is both an honest and a discreet gentleman, and, though he was bred in Holland, understands the business here very well. He is going to Flanders. Your Grace may have heard how my Lord Portland, having procured him a gift of the Earl of Dumfermling's forfeiture, did, after he was gone to Scotland it seems, through some mistake or other, procure a new gift of the same to the Earl of Linlithgow; so that both gifts coming to the Exchequer, there arose a competition, both pleading my Lord Portland's favour and the King's gift, and the dates but of a week's difference. The plea being referred to the King, there is no decision yet come.

"I hope I have your leave for using another hand, and that you will pardon this long letter."

[SHREWSBURY] to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

[16]95, July 23, Whitehall.—“I write this only to enclose some late advices* I have received concerning the squadron fitted out at Brest under the command of the Marquis of Nesmond, which will inform you what their strength is, which way they are gone, and what is thought of their design by those who observed their preparations. I must leave it to you to make your own judgment upon it, and accordingly to give such directions as you think requisite, particularly if anything be intended against the convoys we are expecting from the Straits, that it may be prevented as far as it is possible.

[P.S.] “I think fit to add that the account the master of the Swedish ship gives of the strength of the squadron now gone from Brest agrees with what has been writ to me in former letters from France.”

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, July 23.—“Mr. Meesters was with me this morning, and told me the fireship will be ready tomorrow night. I do believe the Coventry may do the service as well as the Rochester, but the Captain must come to town for his instructions. I wrote last night, as your Grace directed me, to Neckson, to come up without delay, and do hope he may be in town tomorrow night.”

SHREWSBURY to BERKELEY.

1695, July 24, Whitehall.—“I have just now received a letter from Mr. Blaithway of the 20th, o.s., with an account that Dixmude is surrendered to the French, and that it is now again feared that Newport may be attacked; whereupon his Majesty commands that all things for the attempt upon Dunkirk be immediately dispatched; which I thought fit to transmit to your Lordship by express, not doubting but the importance of the matter, as well as his Majesty's orders, will oblige your Lordship to use all possible expedition to appear upon that coast, and put in execution what you shall think advisable there.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, July 25-Aug. 4, Camp near Casal.—Sent the packet for the Admiral by way of Genoa. The French have received orders to arm their vessels at Toulon, and give out that 4,000 sailors are coming from the west by land, and that they are pressing all the boatmen of the Rhone and other rivers, &c. Has sent word to the Admiral, lest the French should arm, and pass the Strait. Two Irish Capuchins have passed by here, coming from Rome; they are going to Ireland by way of France and England. They asked the writer for a passport, but he told them he could not give them one by that road. The older of the two gossiped a good deal with the writer's people, and apparently thought he had said too much, as they have both departed without calling for the money promised them by the writer for their voyage. Sends what an English minister gathered from this monk, who is evidently employed on some mission, but does not know "all the secret." Is persuaded the French are amusing the Pope with proposals and expectations touching the re-establishment of King James. This monk belongs to the neighbourhood of Karrigfargus, and while in Ireland was protected by the Marquis of Antrim, during the last war. Unfortunately his name has been forgotten.

All the troops are marching to join the cavalry in Piedmont, except seven battalions, which remain here with the writer. His R.H. has summoned all the general officers to be at Turin on the 8th or 10th, to determine what is to be done. Nothing can be done at sea this year. Hopes measures will at once be taken against next year. His R.H. is set upon the conquest of Pignerol, which would enable great things to be attempted at sea, where the troops now defending Piedmont could then be employed. We are impatiently awaiting news from Namur, and hope for the King's success; the undertaking is a glorious one, but very audacious.

French. R. 14 Aug.

[1695,] July 25.—“Some discourse being passed about the sudden surrender of Casal, it was said that the Pope was a better politician than the whole Society of Jesuits put together, because he had effectually done that which they have long endeavoured to little purpose. With the zeal of an Holy Father he had so espoused King James's cause that he was the more obliging to the King of France upon his account, not doubting thereby of carrying it on with its desired success.

“In order thereto it hath been projected at Rome that the King of France must by degrees take off that jealousy which the Catholic Princes of Europe have of him, and retort it upon the King of England, commonly stiled the Prince of Orange, beginning with the Princes of Italy first, by a cautious surrender of those towns which he holds from them; whence it was known in Rome, two months before the siege of Casal was begun, that it was to be surrendered within nine days after the trenches were to be opened; and it is now expected there, that the same surrender of Nizza and Pignerol will be made when the Confederate army in Piedmont shall besiege either of them in form. The reason of which is said to be, that the Italian Princes, seeing the French King to surrender these towns in a time wherein he is well able to defend them, may be persuaded that the French King doth this for their sakes, and his own desire of a public and a lasting peace, and not for the sake of such an universal monarchy as they have so long pretended to fear.

“What is to be done for King James is, that his Holiness the Pope will transmit a considerable sum of money to the Congregation de propaganda fide, in order to be employed in his service or elsewhere. What is at present to be done for him in France is, that fifty sail of men-of-war, carrying eighty guns each, are now ready at Brest, if not gone, to transport him into Ireland, where several missionaries are gone already from Rome to attend him.

“When all is done, the chief hopes are that the French King’s declining of an universal monarchy on the one hand, and his great zeal for the Catholic religion on the other, will so far undeceive all the Catholic Princes engaged against him as to permit him, if not to join with him in his righteous undertakings against the Prince of Orange, which are to know no end until his Brother the King of England shall be re-established on his throne.

“All that was material in relation to the Fleets was, that the French King was resolved to follow the advice of the late Cardinal de Mazarin, which is, that he would dodge both English and Dutch fleets so long, that after their long and great expenses at sea he would be able to deal with them, as they have deserved, by bringing a great part of them home in triumph.”

THE MARQUIS OF TWEEDDALE TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, July 27, Edinburgh.—“This noble Lord the Earl of Annandale hath so well acquit himself as President of our last Session of Parliament that he merits the countenance and favour of all concerned in the King’s service, and I do heartily recommend him to your Grace; whom you may safely trust in the account he can give you how matters have passed in our Parliament, and of the behaviour of persons, some whereof have boldly given an account of themselves, and to the prejudice of others, especially to Flanders, of which we have a report from thence, taking advantage of the continuing the Parliament four days longer than was allowed at first, though the King had by an order upon the fifth day allowed it to sit six and twenty longer; whereof seventeen having dispatched our affairs, and preventing a new application to the King for changes of persons in the Government, which I had reason to believe would not relish with him, I adjourned them ten days sooner than he allowed their sitting; and besides, taking advantage of the laying the Report of the Commission for enquiry into the slaughter of Glenco before the Parliament, upon their repeated instances and zeal to vindicate his Majesty's Government from so horrid a murder, as doth appear by their Address, have misrepresented that which I humbly conceive was the best service I could have done the King in my station; but I hope the King will understand better that what was done in those two particulars, and that of my Lord Bradalbin (which was an emergent in the enquiry about Glenco), was done for his service, and that there was much more forborne both in relation to my Lord Stairs, President of the Session, and others, to avoid aspersing such as the King hath thought fit to continue so long in the Government here notwithstanding of (sic) the renewed desires of his Parliament, which they have left to himself at this time, in confidence that he will do it of himself, to express his care of the safety and security of the kingdom in all events. If your Lordship have anything to enquire concerning the affairs of this kingdom, my Lord will abundantly supply all that can be said by," &c.

Signed. R. Aug. 2nd.

[SECRETARY] J. JOHNSTOUN to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, July 27, Ed[inbu]r[gh].—"The bearer, the Earl of Annandale, can inform your Grace thoroughly of our proceedings since he preceeded [presided] in the Parliament. You have heard of the wrong steps he made formerly, being seduced by his brother-in-law, Sir J. Montgomery; he also suffered in his reputation, because of his ingenuity, in which he was rather unfortunate than guilty. Any man might have done what he did, since what he did was to wrong no man, and could have wronged only those who, having engaged him in a plot, betrayed him by discovering it without his knowledge. He has, since that time, acted for the Government with so much both capacity and zeal that even his enemies do him justice. He has a considerable estate and interest in the country, and your Grace's friendship to him, of which he is very desirous, will both be of use, and will be a particular obligation upon your Grace's," &c.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, July 27, o.s., H.M.S. Britannia in Barcellona Road.—"Since the letters I troubled their Excellencies the Lords Justices and your Grace with from this place, I have ordered a survey upon the ships in the Fleet of the first, second, and third rates, and though most of them (according to the surveys) ought now to be upon their way for England, the ships mentioned in the margin [Sovereigne, St. Andrew, Duke, Sandwich, St. Michael, Suffolke, Vulture Fire-ship] are found to be in so miserable a condition that, unless they proceed immediately, 'tis impossible there can be any hopes of their getting home; and truly I am in some pain, fearing they may meet with ill weather in their passage. Now these are gone the Fleet of English consists of thirty, first, second, third, and fourth rates, and the Dutch of fourteen, so that your Grace will see I am forty-four in number from the fourth rate upwards. I hope it will not be long before I am joined by more ships of either nation, or that the enemy will not have any advice of my strength; but if they have, I will make the best defence I can.

“I cannot help telling your Grace I am not very forward to struggle with so great a disproportion of strength as probably I may meet with. I foresee many difficulties I shall lie under the latter part of the year, as ships not being able to return for England, the soldiers too numerous to be brought home in so few ships, and many others which I decline troubling your Grace with.

“The ships that are now under orders for England are directed to join the Turkey convoy at Cadiz, and proceed with them home under the command of Capt. Munden. I have set down in the margin what ships of war returns [return] with that convoy, by which you will see I have taken care of their safety. [Grafton, Warspight, Edgarr, Tyger Prize, Sunderland, Chatham, Loy<sup>ll</sup> Merch<sup>t</sup>, Princess Ann, Greyhound, Griffin Fire-ship.]

“The Vice-King of this place has desired my assistance in regaining Palamos. I am now sailing to Blancos to consult with him there. This expected service and the few ships I have with me has induced the Flag-Officers to alter their former resolution of going before Thoulon.”

Signed. R. Sept. 10th.

SIREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695, July 30, Whitehall.—“Since mine of the 23rd, which was sent over land to my Lord Galloway, to be conveyed to you, giving an account of two ninety-gun ships and four from fifty to sixty guns, with two fire-ships, which are lately gone out from Brest under the command of the Marquis of Nesmond, by further advices I am informed that squadron is strengthened by one man-of-war, [which] joined them from Port Lewis, called le François, whose force I do not exactly know, and one more fire-ship, so that now they are supposed to be seven men-of-war and three fire-ships. . . . I confess myself altogether at a stand what to guess of their design, but thought it my duty to acquaint you with it.

“I have since received fresher accounts that on the 12th of July, o.s., this above-mentioned squadron was not sailed from Brest, but remained there ready, expecting nothing but orders.

“I must not forget to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 14th June, o.s. His Majesty has been acquainted with the inconveniencies arrived from the Dutch ships wanting provisions and cleaning.”

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1695, July 30.—“I understand by Mr. Molesworth that he intends very soon to go for Ireland, to be present at the Session of Parliament; and further discoursing with him upon occasion of his name's being mentioned by mistake as made a Privy Councillor of Ireland, instead of Mr. Aldworth's, in one of the foolish printed newspapers that are common here, I plainly discovered that such a mark of his Majesty's and your Excellency's favour would not be displeasing to him. . . .

“I have this day signed a letter recommending my Lord Bellew's and one Mr. White's cases to your Excellency.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1695, July 30, Whitehall.—Mr. Secretary Trenchard has delivered all his letters on “the business of the commerce” to Mr. Mountague, who is better instructed in that matter than the writer. Has acquainted Mr. Blathwayt with his suggestion touching a resident at Geneva.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, July 31, Chappell Izode.—“I can never make any omission to your Grace that it is not a trouble to me, but my not answering yours of the 13th when the Bills were returned, was caused by a little journey I took, to run for a plate, the better to discourse with the gentlemen of the country.

“This last post has brought me one of the 16th and [one of the] 18th instant, the former of which shows me his Majesty's gracious allowance to my recommendation of Dr. Walkinton, the success of which (I hope) will give me such credit with the Church, as that I shall be able to make that part of the State sound to his Majesty and the Protestant religion.

“My Lord, I will inquire into the case of my Lord Bellew, as to his outlawry, and give your Grace a speedy account thereof.

[P.S.] “I am to the last degree under trouble to hear this post that Mr. Russell is returning into England. I hope it is not true.”

R. Aug. 5th.

SHREWSBURY to SECRETARY JOHNSTOUN.

1695, Aug. 1, Whitehall.—“I give you many thanks for the favour of yours of July the 19th. I was out of town that evening Sir Thomas Livingston called at my house to deliver it, and returned so ill of the cholic that in three or four days I was in no condition to see company, which prevented me the favour of a visit he designed me before he went for Flanders, for which I should be glad he knew I were sorry.

“Some of the Dissenters of Ireland have applied themselves to me upon the same subject they solicited you, but it falls out that the Council there not having transmitted any Bill to that effect, the forms, as I am told, will not allow a second transmission after the first is returned, before the meeting of Parl[liament]. It is likewise objected by several of the Bis[hops] and Church party in Ireland, that a toleration there at present is not so reasonable as it was here, until the Dissenters will agree to pass an Act for qualifying themselves by the Test, which is not in force there as it is here; so that if the toleration passed without the other, the Nonconformists in Ireland would be in a better condition than those in England, which many think not reasonable, but dangerous to the Established Church, they being so numerous in that kingdom; but for all this, when the Par[liament] meets, if the Council think fit to transmit such a Bill, it shall have all the assistance I can give it here. Having had this summer several occasions of writing to the King, I have often made use of them to express such thoughts of the affairs in Scotland as I conceived were agreeable to your opinion by the papers your brother has constantly showed me, but he never once has returned any answer to that part of my letters; a sure sign I take it that he has no mind I should meddle in Scotch matters. However, that has not hindered my writing once again as you desired in your last.

“No man can more readily and sensibly comprehend the uneasiness of your station than myself. I never yet was a month in business without wishing thirty times to be out of it. Even when things go the best, it has its disgusts; but to be in a post where much good is expected, and see how little one is able to do, is hardly to be borne; and yet, whilst one is able to do any good, or prevent much mischief, when it is plain one’s retirement would make room for knavery and treachery, I doubt one is obliged to consider the public so much more than one’s self, that it is hardly honest to retreat. This doctrine is much easier, I confess, to preach than to practise.”

SHREWSBURY to BERKELEY.

1695, Aug. 2, Whitehall.—“I communicated your letter of the 29th July to the Lords Justices, who were extreme ready to contribute everything on their parts to hinder a meeting between your Lordship and Sir George Rooke. He is not intended to go on board in the Downs, but at Ports[mouth]; and I suppose you will receive directions from the Admiralty to expect in the Downs fresh orders, after having performed the services at Dunkirk, Calais, or other places upon that coast.”

Autograph draft.

1695, Aug. 3, Whitehall.—“Your brother has informed me of a very considerable discovery from a fine lady that he hopes he shall put into your hands to forward. Your packets have such ill luck, that I shall enlarge no further, concluding he does, but only assure you that I believe it is in her power to tell what would be extremely for the interest of his Majesty, the public, and of us in particular to be informed of. It is reasonable to imagine she may insist on good terms, and to have what is promised better secured than generally those sort of rewards are. I am so very desirous his Majesty should know the bottom of what I am sure she can say, that I will join in making any representation shall be thought reasonable, and pawn my own credit for the performance of what shall be promised. I have your letter of the 27th, though I have not seen my Lord Anandale, but shall be very ready to observe what you recommend on his subject."

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1695, Aug. 3, Whitehall.—"Mr. Molesworth designing to attend upon your Excellency and the public business this Session of Parliament, I could not let him go without saying something from him to you, I am sure his modesty would not allow him to say to your Excellency himself," &c.

"I extremely rejoice at the disposition I am told appears to be in Ireland of a happy session."

Autograph draft. Endorsed: Sent by Mr. Molesworth.

BERKELEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Aug. 6, between Dover and Calais.—"This morning one of the seamen of my ship came to me, and desired a private hearing. He confessed to me that he was one of the sentries that went away with Sir James Montgomery; that he is lately come from St. Germin's, and can discover affairs of consequence if this confession of his be kept secret. I examined him no further, but have secured him. If your Grace pleases privately to send a messenger to the Downs for him, I will deliver this man to him. His name is Thomas Smith, a Wiltshire man."

R. the 7th.

SHREWSBURY TO BERKELEY.

1695, Aug. 7, London.—"I was at Windsor, waiting upon the Prince and Princess, when I received your Lordship's letter, with the account of your no success at Dunkirk. Mr. Meesters is come to town, and endeavours to lay the fault upon his not being protected by the frigates, brigantines, and well-boats, as was agreed at the council of war; for which reason, he says, the masters of the smoke-ships were obliged to set their vessels on fire before they could be laid to do any execution, to prevent their own ships being taken prisoners. For the same reason, he says, he ordered the machines off, because, there being no strength ready to sustain them, they must have unavoidably fallen into the enemy's hands. This is the sum of what he alleges; to which if your Lordship thinks it worth your while to furnish me with a reply, I will make the best use of it I can for your service."

BERKELEY to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Aug. 8, Downs.—“This morning early I delivered the seaman to your Grace’s messenger, having encouraged him beforehand. He promises to be very silent till he comes to your Grace, and then tell all he knows. He seems now to be much an Englishman, by reason, as I guess, that he was not well rewarded in France. Howsoever, I have given the warrant to the messenger, bidding him not make use of it unless he found it necessary.

“As for Mr. Meesters, it has been my ill fortune to have to do with him; I foresee [foresaw] it, and did all I could to avoid it, but it was inevitable. My Lord, he is certainly near akin to the father of falsehood; but to lay down such matters for truth, as in some cases I can bring a hundred witnesses, and in others his own hand, to vouch the contrary, I protest, though I pretty well know the man, I wonder at his confidence or forgetfulness; sure he takes no notes. The frigates of which he complains stood the enemy’s fire above half an hour, staying for Mr. Meesters; some of the Captains spoke to him, and told him that if he would bring one of his ships to them, they would carry them as near as they pleased; others of the frigates were within pistol shot of the smoke-ships, and no enemy’s boat near them when they set on fire. As for the brigantines and well-boats, it was agreed at the last council of war on board the Charles Galley, which good Mr. Meesters has forgot, that they were not to go on till after the machine vessels, which Mr. Meesters took care we should not see the trial of. As for his denying his taking the machine ships with him when he came away, besides that the whole Fleet are witnesses of it, I have an order by me, signed by him, to five of them (to follow him immediately as they would answer it at their perils), in case they had not, as they all did, sailed with him. This shows his sincere way of dealing, and I suppose he has carried up three captains of smoke-ships, who, two of them, set their ships on fire much nearer to us than the enemy, to be his vouchers.

“I send a short account to Mr. Vernon of the whole transaction with Mr. Meesters, taken from a little higher, to show your Grace when you are at leisure. Since I frightened Mr. Meesters, I am glad the ship I sent after him missed him, for he would have been a trouble to me, though I should be very glad some way were found to have this business tried, to prove where the fault lies. He was so little himself when before Dunkirque that he had ordered all the provisions and spare things from the machines on board the Ephraim, and next day having, I suppose, forgot it, clapped a bag or two of tow in her, and burnt her for a smoke-ship. He said, since he came away, that he would not have gone on the attack of Calais for a thousand pound; there I give him credit; nor on that of Dunkirque for three.

“I beg your Grace’s pardon for troubling you with his follies, but if one did not contradict a prating fellow, some there are, who would believe him. All our bomb vessels are, thank God, got in safe, but several of them miserably shattered. I shall send an account to the Admiralty, so soon as I can get it ready, of their defects. There may be three or four in pretty good condition, which, if thought worth the while, with two or three frigates, might burn two or three pretty trading towns to the westward of Diep."

R. 9th.

SHREWSBURY TO BERKELEY.

1695, Aug. 8, Whitehall.— . . . "With the first opportunity I will observe your Lordship's directions, in representing the matter of Dunkirke to his Majesty as you desire; but take the liberty to observe to you, that if Admiral Allemond's opinion of Mr. Meesters' proceedings be as I understand it is, one line from him to the King, or my Lord Portland, will be of more weight than what any of us can say, because he will not be suspected of partiality against his countryman, whatever others may."

SHREWSBURY TO BERKELEY.

1695, Aug. 9, Whitehall.—"By the order you will receive to-day from the Lords of the Admiralty, you will understand the desire we have here that an attempt should be made upon Calais, not only that the campaign might end with something more successful than the business of Dunkirk, but also because we remember how dissatisfied his Majesty was the last year that Calais was not bombarded, though the summer season was then, I remember, farther advanced than it is now." . . .

BERKELEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Aug. 9, Downs.—"I am mightily importuned to write to your Grace about the renewing Captain Peterson's pass, that was formerly sent to Brest, and stopped by a Guernzy privateer. The merchants have certainly a design of traffic by this underhand; your Grace will judge whether the intelligence he can now bring from Brest will countervail the damage the nation may receive by their endeavouring to import some few French commodities."

R. 15.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Aug. 9, Chappell Izode.—"Your Grace's of the 30th of July came safe to me yesterday, and the hint you there give me touching the making Mr. Molesworth a Privy Councillor here agrees the most with my inclination that can be. But the means at present how to bring it to pass (considering a passage in your Grace's letter) I doubt will have difficulty in it; and yet, should this sessions of Parliament prove successful, many of the obstacles he meets withall at Court (I conceive) would vanish, because I am persuaded no man is likely to be so well heard, and to have an interest in those that will pretend to be popular, as himself. . . .

“I have not yet heard of the letter you mention in behalf of my Lord Bellew and Mr. White, but when I do, nothing shall be neglected on my part therein.

“I had your Grace’s in favour of Mr. Keightly, who doubtless did do me right to the several persons mentioned by him; but by his most secret intimacies here with some persons, especially with one, I cannot but judge him by the rule of the Spanish proverb; and though he may find he shall live easily with me, and that I will preserve him in his post, yet I must confess I become void of all friendship to those that do not assert (without reserve) the interest of this Prince, that has done so much for us.”

R. 15.

All business is now over here till winter.”

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1695, Aug. 15, Whitehall.—“I am extremely satisfied with what your Lordship says in relation to Mr. Molesworth, and do not doubt but he will be so too.

“What I writ concerning Mr. Kightley was true so far as was mentioned in my own knowledge, though what you suspect may be true at the same time, and if it be, I have nothing to say in his defence.

“I have here enclosed sent your Excellency an extract of a letter from my Lord Gallway, mentioning two Capucin Friars that design coming through France and England into Ireland. Their mission and the intent of it you will perceive by the papers. I wish they were better described, that they might be discovered, but all I have I send.”

Copy, with a postscript in Shrewsbury's hand: “Mr. Henry Boyle does not go into Ireland as I sent you word, this Parliament, but my Lord Clifford, his elder brother, does the first opportunity.”

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY

[16]95, Aug. 15, Chappell Izode.—“In mine of the 18th of June I acquainted your Grace that I did not think it convenient to send over a Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick in the first transmission.

“My Lord Chancellor has lately been with me, and told me he looked upon himself concerned to get those Articles confirmed; that he was personally interested to have it done, lying under great difficulties, and many censures passing upon him for his proceedings in Chancery in reference to suits for trespasses committed during the time of the War, which could not be well avoided till this matter of the Articles were settled in Parliament; and pressed me to write to his Majesty to that purpose, or that he might do it himself (which I could not refuse); and yesterday he shewed me his letters upon this occasion to the King, to my Lord Keeper, and to yourself.

“Tis fit I should repeat to his (sic) Grace what I have formerly said upon this subject; that I believed the sixth Article (made to indemnify all persons within the Articles from being sued or molested for any trespasses) would never be confirmed in Parliament in the same latitude the Irish desire it may be interpreted; but that if his Majesty should not think fit to mention the Articles to the Parliament, the Commons would not take any notice of the Articles. That the King is indeed obliged by the 12th Article to use his endeavours that the Articles be confirmed in Parliament; but then I conceive this should be done upon a petition from the Irish, and they (who were the best judges of their own interest) having never addressed for any such Act, it was to be considered whether bringing in such a Bill might not revive the remembrance of past injuries, and turn more to their prejudice should the Bill be rejected, which might probably happen to be the case; for I could never observe any tendency or disposition in the Council, or indeed in any of the country gentlemen, that such a Bill should be prepared; nor did my Lord Chancellor ever think fit to move it at the Board.

“Fearing therefore it might discompose his Majesty’s other affairs in Parliament, I must confess I was never over forward to encourage the bringing in of this Bill. And having formerly writ my thoughts upon this subject, and receiving no further direction, I did not think it reasonable, upon what my Lord Chancellor said privately to me, to propose bringing in a Bill to the Council Board for confirming the Articles of Limerick, without having some intimation first of his Majesty’s pleasure.”

TWEEDDALE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Aug. 17, Edinburgh.—“I have yours of the first of August after I had wrote by the Earl of Annandale, who I hope before now hath given your Grace a full account of our affairs, and the condition of the Government at present, wherein I find myself as much embarrassed as ever by the constitution of all the Courts, whereof I can expect no remedy till the King’s coming over, and therefore resolve to have few meetings of the several Courts till then, and such only as are necessary. We have got the affairs of the Revenue settled to the best advantage, and considerably beyond what was expected, whereof I will not trouble your Grace with a detail.

“The Treasury is reduced to the quorum of three by the death of the Earl of Linlithgow, and the Earl of Cassilis his going to London, the Duke of Queensberrie’s going to the country, and the Earl of Bradalbin being the Parliament's prisoner. And because the King may be early spoke to, even before he comes over, for supplying the Earl of Linlithgow's place, I must entreat your Grace, if the multitude of your affairs with the King will allow it, and that it be agreeable to you so far to interpose in the affairs of Scotland, in the government whereof England is not a little concerned, that you will be pleased to write in my son's favours, who possibly is known to your Grace, and of whom you may have an account from others, he having lived much in England. I dare only answer for his integrity and faithfulness to the Government, and he is in some measure known to the King. Mr. Secretary Johnstoun is gone north, who could have said more of him than I can. The apprehension of being prevented hath prevailed thus far with me, with the confidence that your Grace will believe that it is no private interest but the King's service is intended therein."

SHREWSBURY TO PORTLAND.

1695, Aug. 23, Whitehall.—“It is so fit for me to expect that his Majesty should take his greatest leisure, to give me the honour of a letter (if he does it at all), that I am only ashamed he should give your Lordship any trouble on my account.

“The posture of your affairs are [is] so critical, not only to you that are to be engaged in the immediate action, but to us and all Europe, whose liberty and beings depend on your success, that as we are not without our apprehensions, so our wishes and prayers are for your success and safety, and mine particularly for your Lordship.”

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Aug. 23, Portsmouth.—“The errand of this is to inform your Grace that yesterday afternoon the Shrewsbury, Cambridge, Yarmouth, Lyme, and Blase fire-ship arrived at Spithead. . . . I must confess to your Grace my apprehensions will not be little that the consequence of coming upon service with the ships under the miserable mob the generality of our men are, may be very fatal to us; so that in my humble opinion the Mary's and the bomb vessels['] men will be absolutely necessary to put the ships into a tolerable condition to proceed on their intended voyage; the qualities of the men in these ships lately arrived from my Lord Berkely being so far short of my expectation, that with all the helps I propose I do despair of putting the Yarmouth into a condition to sail with me."

R. 25. Enclosure :—

"An abstract" of the numbers of men on board the ships above named, and others.

SHREWSBURY to TWEEDDALE.

1695, Aug. 24, London.—"Though I cannot presume my writing will have much effect, yet I would omit no occasion to show your Lordship my readiness to obey your commands, which I did by last night's post. When I consider the father's services and the son's merit, I cannot in the least question but your desire will have the success I wish, unless his Majesty should be pre-engaged, which I think not likely in this case.

"The affairs of Scotland no doubt have a very near relation to those of England. We are the same island, have the same secret and open enemies, are embarked in the same cause, and one must be very short-sighted not to perceive we cannot long remain quiet if disturbances arise among you. These reasons make me glad to see so much of the administration trusted in your Lordship's hands. If at any time I can be useful towards the improving his Majesty's confidence in a person that so justly deserves it, my poor endeavours shall ever be at your disposal, from my good wishes to Britain and our common interest."

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Aug. 26, Queene, at Spittheade.—"To enable me to comply with your Grace's commands in relation to the service of Neckson, I sent for Captain Misters, who showed me a copy of the orders he has left with the master of the Fortune; by which I think he has exposed that business more to discovery than the Dutch Gazette did before, so that I do despair of any good effect from it. And therefore, if your Grace does not hear from Neckson very soon, I think it will be best to save the King a further charge of that machine, by ordering the Admiralty to pay her off, and lay her up as the rest are. Your Grace cannot but remember the pains that was taken to explain the orders to this blockhead, which I thought was done so effectually, as it would be impossible for anything endued but with a moderate share of human reason to make so great a blunder ; but your Grace sees with what tools we are forced to work, this man being what they call a true thorough-paced tarpawlyn, and truly not the worst of them that we have in the service."

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Aug. 27, Whitehall.—“ Having laid your letter of the 23rd before the Lords Justices, they thereupon discoursed with the Lords of the Admiralty, and [I] find they have ordered you not only, as you desire, the men belonging to the Mary and the unserviceable bomb-vessels, but also some out of the Kent, so that I hope you will be furnished with men to your content.” Encloses advices from Toulou. Wishes to know what has been done by Capt. Mister[s] as to the ship he convoyed to Portsmouth. Has heard nothing of N[eckson].

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Aug. 28, Dublin Castle.—“ The Parliament met yesterday, where the appearance of Lords and Commons was considerable. There was [were] some apprehensions of heats in the election of a Speaker, the friends of Mr. Attorney General Rochford, and Mr. Thomas Broderick's, being both desirous they should pretend to it. But when the House met, it appeared so clear on the side of the Attorney General, that Mr. Brodericke most readily became one of the attenders of him up to the chair, and this was done in a short space of time ; Mr. Sloane (in this time) taking another part, of blasting both their characters as men quitting their country's interest by taking to be the King's servants ; closing his motion by proposing a third man, Mr. Anslow, of the North, a great stickler for the sole right ; but I am assured there did not appear six voices for him. A fourth was acting covertly by the means of my Lord Chancellor, Sir Jo. Williamson, but his name was not mentioned, Mr. Attorney's party being so superior to anybody's else. Upon all which proceedings your Grace may please to observe that it does not yet appear that this nation are so mutinous towards the King, since they are so unanimous in choosing Mr. Attorney to be the first Commoner of Ireland.

“ When the Speaker is approved (which will be tomorrow), we shall go on to business, and there shall be nothing wanting on my part to make all things easy, provided the rights of the Crown may be asserted, as by law is established.

“ It was of great service, the favour you did me by the early notice your Grace gave me of Mr. Harry Boyl's coming over, which was soon guessed here to be in order to be Speaker. But had he come, he had met with some opposition, for Mr. Attorney and Mr. Broderike readily agreed to join both their interests to oppose him ; and if it had come to my approving of him, I was resolved to have disapproved of him. And I have lately observed, upon his name being upon the stage for this place, that he would have found but cold reception here, the people being generally persuaded that he is under the management of my Lord Rochester and my Lord Ranelagh, neither of which have either a credit here in reference to the good of this country or the King's service.

"My Lord, till Sir Francis Brewster came hither (which was but lately) I was never truly informed by whose hands it was that the 14 Bills I sent over were so soon returned; but I am now fully satisfied it was from your Grace's care they did so well succeed; and I assure you, my Lord, I am heartily glad of it, because I would have this country restored to his Majesty's favour, and a lasting settlement here made within the time of your Grace's administration in public affairs.

"I have received yours of the 10th of July in behalf of my Lord Bellieu and Mr. White; August the 3rd, another in behalf of Mr. Moulsworth; and August the 15th, a third touching the satisfaction you were pleased to express in my concurring with your Grace in favour of Mr. Moulsworth; in which letter of the latest date was [were] enclosed two papers from Turin. It is unhappy that the names of the two Capucins are not expressed, but I will do my utmost to meet with them."

R. Sep. 2nd. Enclosure:—

Copy of the Lord Deputy's speech at the opening of the Irish Parliament.

SIREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1695, Aug. 29, Whitehall.—"Upon what my Lord Chancellor writ to me, I was obliged to lay it before his Majesty as his opinion that a Bill should be prepared and offered to confirm the Articles of Limerick, but I have at the same time endeavoured to use arguments with his Majesty which I hope will prevent his interposing in anything of that nature that might very probably spoil a promising Sessions of Parliament in Ireland.

"The good news we have received of the surrender of the Castle of Namur has put our hearts at ease as to the event of that matter, and in a great measure delivered us from the continual apprehensions we were under for his Majesty's safety. The next thing we have to hope is the good news of your success."

SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Aug. 30, Whitehall.—Believes the vessel convoyed by Capt. Misters will be found to be intended for some secret design. N[eckson]'s project will hardly be guessed, and therefore he should shortly return without having given suspicion to the people where he has been. "This ship methinks might be disguised, and the men changed, so as to create no jealousy." Hopes Rooke will hasten his own departure.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 1, Queen, at Spittheade.—“I have your Grace’s letter of the 30th of August, and upon what you are pleased to say about changing the men in the Fortune, I believe it will be the best way of stifling any discovery C<sup>t</sup> Misters’s orders may have made; so that, if I have any opportunity, I intend to send C<sup>t</sup> Misters to Dartmouth, to take out his mate, who is master of the vessel, and all his men but two to look after her, and the carpenter Mr. Misters put in, who knows and is to shew Neckson the trick; and whenever your Grace has any account from N. that he is coming and will prosecute the service, there must be another ship appointed, and the captain to man her, and have the same private instructions for her delivery that C<sup>t</sup> Misters had.

“I am sure there shall be nothing wanting on my part to hasten my departure, and I wish the men I am expecting in the Mary from the Downs were here and paid, they being absolutely necessary to enable some of the ships to proceed. I have yet no intimation what orders are given for the filling up vacancies of officers in the land forces, nor any directions about the marines, of both which I have wrote to the Admiralty.

[P.S.] “I should be glad to know if your Grace has any answer from the King about his Majesty’s thirds of prizes.”

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Sept. 3, Whitehall.—Refers to the design of N[eckson]. The four land regiments have been ordered by the King to return with Admiral Russell. The disposal of the prizes has been entrusted to Consul Blackwell.

“By the explanation the Lords Justices have made this day to your instructions, you will perceive that, besides what Admiral Russell is to come home with, they expect you should follow any strength the French should pass the Straits, with at least an equal force, either yourself in person, or some other you shall entrust the command to; it being of the last consequence to our safety to be stronger in ships at home than the French can set out in the Ocean; so that, when we consider our strength here, we are not only to reckon what the French pass from the Mediterranean, but what that squadron would be, joined with the ships now at Brest, Rochfort, and Port Lewis, a list of which if you have not, I will send you, if desired, by the next opportunity, according to the best accounts I have of them.”

SHREWSBURY to TWEEDDALE.

1695, Sept. 5, Whitehall.—“By the post which arrived this morning, I received an answer from Mr. Blaithwayt, by his Majesty’s command, to what I writ about my Lord Yester’s succeeding my Lord Lithgow in the Treasury in Scotland. Mr. Blaithwayt's words are, that his Majesty seems inclined, but is pleased to say he will do nothing in it before his return for England."

Copy.

SHREWSBURY to CAPEL.

1695, Sept. 5, Whitehall.—“I had your Excellency's of the 28th of Aug. yesterday, and extremely rejoice at the happy beginning of the Session of Parliament, since it looks to me as if the Members were inclined to avoid as much as possible all heats and differences, which will certainly be most for his Majesty's, the nation's, and their own interest.

“If your Excellency have no pre-engagement, and that Mr. Molesworth behave himself as I have reason to hope he will, why might not we endeavour to get him into Mr. Sedgwick's place of the Revenue? My Lord Keeper will join. . . . I have ventured to mention him already to his Majesty.

“I am obliged to Sir Francis Brewster for the account he has given you of my intentions. I did really press the dispatch of those Bills as much as I could, but there was little need of it, for not only all the Lords Justices but almost all the Council were as zealous to hasten them to you as I could be.”

Copy.

1695, Sept. 6, Whitehall.—“If I did not sooner assure your Lordship of my joy for the glorious success of the siege of Namur, and my particular satisfaction in the good news of his Majesty's and your Lordship's being safe, it was my unwillingness to give you a trouble, to profess a thing I hoped was before out of doubt.

“I am extreme glad to receive the hopes your Lordship gives me in yours of the 6th, n.s., that his Majesty will return sooner this year into England than formerly he used to do. I believe he will find the nation so full of gratitude for the pains and dangers he has undergone, and so thoroughly well disposed to his and their own true interest, that it will be happy if this seasonable opportunity be taken for the summoning a new Parliament.

“I think there is no objection to what his Majesty has ordered in seizing the Marshal de Boufflers, unless it be that the same was not done to more of the garrison.”

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 6, Queen, at Spitheade.— . . . “What your Grace says of the King's persisting in his commands of having the four regiments come home with Mr. Russell, gives me many melancholy thoughts; for if the ships he leaves should not be in so good a condition as to men that I may depend upon their mending the quality and increasing the number of these I carry with me, I must confess to your Grace I am apprehensive the consequence of our coming to service with this raff and scum may be very fatal to us." . . .

R. 7th.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 6, Dublin Castle.—“His Majesty’s Bill of Excise has been received, read, and now ordered to be engrossed, with great respect and duty to his Majesty’s pleasure upon that subject required.

“Upon the first debate, whether the Bill should be received, the sole men (as they call them) were fully heard; yet when the question came to be put, the negatives amounted but to five or six, and upon the second question for reading the Bill, it was without one negative.

“To the best of my judgment, all things seem here to answer to his Majesty’s pleasure, and what may be most for his service. The unanimity of the House makes me hope that we shall proceed prosperously and dispatch speedily, for there has not been a division yet, and in the same space of time [in] the last Parliament (I am informed) there were above twenty.

“One thing I must observe to your Grace, that the whole transaction of affairs is generally carried on by the body of the House, I having ordered the King’s officers and servant[s] only to be ready as assistants whenever they are called upon; by which means the two Brigadiers have got good credit by assisting the House in a complaint against some soldiers appearing at an election in a forcible way.

[P.S.] “Our friend Moulesworth seems to have pleased nobody, neither as to the timing his speech nor the contents of it, upon the business of the sole right; so that if it [is] reported to the King, I doubt it may increase the weight he lies under, and prevent your good intentions, and my readiness to concur with your Grace in his service.

“Since my writing this letter, this Vote<sup>o</sup> is sent to me in the proceedings of this morning.”

R. 12th.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 7.—“Since the writing my letter to your Grace, both Houses have desired me that I would pass the Bill of money (and other Bills ready) on this day, which accordingly I have done, and in Mr. Vernon’s packet there is a copy of the heads of them for your Grace.

“I shall not need trouble you with the paper mentioned in the postscript of my letter, Mr. Vernon having all the Votes now sent for your Grace to persue (sic).”

Endorsed: R. 12, 1695. This letter is answered the same day it was received, and is entered in the Office book.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 8, Queen, at Spithead.—“I have the favour of your Grace’s letter of the 5th inst., advising me that their Excellencies the Lords Justices had given orders for Col. Northcott’s Regiment of foot to embark and proceed with us, for which I have received the proper orders from the Lords of the Admiralty, and have given the necessary directions for their embarking tomorrow morning ; though I wish this Regiment do not bring their distempers among us, that raw, unseasoned men generally do, which, if his Majesty had thought fit to continue any of those already abroad, it had prevented our being exposed to that danger.

“The wind is now at N. and NNE., and if it veer more easterly and settle, I shall very unwillingly lose the opportunity of sailing, though many of our men are yet unpaid, and the Mary not arrived, notwithstanding Admiral Almonde with a squadron of Dutch came hither yesterday from the Downs.”

R. 10.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 9, Queen, at Spitheade.—“We being now employed in embarking Col. Northcott’s Regiment on the Fleet, by a computation of them I find they will enable all the ships to proceed [on] the voyage, except the Dorsetshire and Yarmouth, whom I must leave behind for the men we have so long expected in the Mary.” . . .

R. 10th.

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Sept. 10, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 7th and 8th before me, but having this post received a signification of his Majesty’s pleasure from Mr. Blaithwayt, that an exact account be sent to him of the condition and strength of your Fleet, and that your sailing be deferred till his Majesty receive that account, and an answer return from his Majesty hither, I think the contents of your letters do not press now for an answer; and I am this minute about signifying his Majesty’s pleasure to the Lords of the Admiralty, who I suppose will send you the orders accordingly.”

Copy.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 10, Dublin Castle.—“The telling your Grace that the House yesterday voted the sum I asked of a hundred [and] sixty-three thousand pounds without a negative, is all I can write to your Grace this post.

“Mr. Savage seems to me to be the chief person that would spoil and blast the hearty proceedings of the House, and today was for taking away the right of the Crown in naming Judges for civil bills, and placing it in the freeholders of the county, in which attempt our friend Moulsworth deeply engaged himself. But the House would not have it; so they both lost their credit, and the right remains in the Crown.

"I received your Grace's of the 29th, and today that of the 3rd instant. I doubt, if Mr. Moulsworth goes on this way, it will not be in our power to serve him."

R. 16.

THO. BRODRICK TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 10, Dublin.—"It is not from any doubt of your Grace's having an account of everything that passes here, from much better hands than mine, that I presume to give your Grace the trouble of this; but lest silence might look like want of a true sense of those favours which every Protestant of this kingdom must own to your Grace, who have been so very truly a patron of us and our interest, I hold it my duty to acquaint your Grace with what has hitherto been done.

"The last post carried an account of his Excellency's [Lord Capel] having given the Royal assent to the Act for an additional Excise, and to five other public Acts, all that were then ready.

"It may perhaps be thought by some, that my Lord Deputy might have been too early in this, the quantum of the Supply not being then voted; but when your Grace pleases to consider that the matter of the sole right was not only yielded by receiving and reading the Bill, but the Bill passed (a thing beyond even the King's demand), and that this was the most likely way his Excellency could propose for obtaining so great a sum as seems absolutely necessary for defraying the charge of the Government, I humbly hope your Grace will not be of that opinion.

"The country is miserably poor, and a hundred [and] sixty-three thousand three hundred [and] twenty-five pounds (the sum demanded) more than ever yet was given, payable in one year; to the granting which no argument proved more prevalent than his Majesty's great favour in placing a Governor over us, who had showed so entire a confidence in us as to part with what was worth more than all that money, before we had agreed to give it.

"The sense hereof brought us yesterday to an unanimous resolution of promising what was asked, without considering how we should be able to pay it; but promised it is, and how hard soever it lies upon us, it will be fully performed.

"We have now sat a fortnight, and are got over those points from whence our enemies hoped a breach, with so much ease that hitherto there never has been one division of the House, so very inconsiderable are the party (if I may so call them) who would have given trouble.

"The settlement of a ruined country must give the greatest satisfaction to everybody that belongs to it, but our doing what your Grace has in some measure promised in our behalf, is what pleases most among us, as much as the prospect of future ease and quiet.

“How inconsiderable soever we may have been thought to be, I humbly hope that this perfect harmony and agreement between his Excellency and us, and the avowed resolutions of us all, to stand by his Majesty and assist him against all his enemies, may and will animate his friends, and dispirit his foes.

“These, my Lord, are not words only; should there ever be occasion for it, our actions will be found to verify what we say.”

TWEEDDALE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 10, Yester.—“I have the honour of your most obliging letter of the 24th of August. I am credibly informed that endeavours are using with the King for a present settlement of the affairs of Scotland, even in Flanders, and especially for the enlargement of my Lord Bradalbin, and I make no question it is, that he may act as on the Treasury, we being only a quorum, so that upon the indisposition of any of us there can be no meeting of Treasury, nor Exchequer; wherein if they prevail with the King, I cannot express the hurt and prejudice will arise thereby. It will be to the general dissatisfaction of the most faithful to his Majesty’s Government. I have wrote to the King last week, that the supplying the Treasury with two new Commissioners in place of my Lord Linlithgow, who is dead, and my Lord Bradalbin, who is incapacitated by the Parliament, seems necessary at present, and to suspend further changes till he comes over; and I know no better method.

“The Act of Parliament concerning the Church hath had so good effect that the greater part of the Clergy who stood out have now qualified themselves by taking the oath of Allegiance and signing the assurance with great cheerfulness and alacrity, so that there are but few recusants; and I hope more steps shall be made towards the uniting this kingdom in their affections to his Majesty’s Government and service, which shall be the constant endeavour of,” &c.

Signed.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 12, Queen, at Spitheade.— . . . “It seems to be a set of fair weather, and very likely to be a fair wind; so that should such an opportunity of sailing be lost, it may produce unhappy consequences, it growing very late in the year for ships of this mighty weight to cross the ocean; though I must confess the risk in respect to the danger of the sea is much greater to those expected home.” . . .

Re. 13.

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Sept. 13, London.—“I have received your letter of the 12th, and my Lord Godolphin has promised care shall be taken at the Treasury that this Regiment of Norecot be subsisted in the same manner the others were to have been if they had stayed. . .

“The inconveniences of your being stopped are very obvious; the reasons for it I know no more than as Mr. Blaithwayt expresses them—that his Majesty would be informed of the condition and strength of the ships, as also of the time they will be ready, but that they must not proceed till his Majesty’s answer be returned; at which time, he adds, probably some of the Dutch may be ready. Whether there be any other cause I cannot say, but this stop happening just at the same time with the terrible clamour raised upon these two rich East India ships being taken, and we being doubtful how long the Fleet with you might remain useless in port expecting orders, whilst the merchants so pressing and reasonably desire to be protected from Mr. Nesmond, has occasioned the orders of this day’s date for sending part of your squadron to that purpose. . . . Tomorrow I go into the country for ten days or a fortnight.” . . .

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 13, Queen, at Spitheade.—“I have received your Grace’s letter of the 10th instant, with a copy of that to the Lords of the Admiralty; since which Admiral Almond has informed me he yesterday received the King’s orders to take the first opportunity of proceeding with the squadron under his command to Holland, and that the men in these ships must be turned over into those designed for the Mediterranean; which gives me apprehension our late stop by his Majesty’s direction is in order to stay for their joining us. If so, I must, in duty to my King and country, as well as from the particular honour and respect I have for your Grace, humbly beg you will oppose these ships of the first rank’s going out in the depth of the winter; for should any misfortune attend them by so wrong a proceeding, it can never be justified either at home or abroad.” . . .

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Sept. 15, Queen, at Spitheade.—Sends an account of the ships that were intended for the Mediterranean. By orders from the Admiralty eight ships are detached and at St. Hellen’s for immediate service. Would have been pleased to command them. “Wherever the fairest prospect of service is, there is the properest station for the commanding officer; and I do take seven sail of ships in that circumstance to be a fitter post for the senior flag than twice that number at an anchor, out of all probability of service. And I must beg leave to mind your Grace, that whenever the enemy have a design upon us, though it be but to intercept a fleet of merchant ships, they usually employ one of their best officers; and though I cannot assume that character, yet, from what I have observed, I must conclude myself one of the willingest. For one is in love with his wife, and can’t go; another’s in love with his money, and he won’t go; a third is neither in love with his wife nor his money, and yet he generally desires to be excused too.” . . .

R. 16. Two enclosures.

SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Sept. 18, Eyford.—“I have writ to Mr. Blaithwayt pursuant to your advice in yours of the 13th, and strengthened my own with your opinion, which I am sure will have weight with the King. The reason given in Mr. Blaithwayt's last letter for this stop is, that his Majesty is willing to see how the French dispose of their Toulon fleet. I doubt we shall stay till they have disposed of it as they design, and then it will be too late to send.”

Autograph draft.

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1695, Sept. 20, Eyford.—“The favour of your Excellency's of the 10th gives me occasion to repeat my satisfaction in the good success of the affairs of Ireland, from the benefit the King and the public will receive by the unanimous concurrence of that people to his and their own interests, and that so happy a union should be effected under your Excellency's administration.

“I have little acquaintance with Mr. Savage, but am truly concerned for our other friend's indiscretion, for, if he had pleased, I had great inclinations to serve him.”

SHREWSBURY TO MR. BRODRICK.*

1695, Sept. 20, Eyford.—“The success of the affairs of Ireland, and the considerable share you have had in them, has been a great satisfaction to me. The happy union that has been effected during my Lord Deputy's Government puts his management above such little cavils as you mention, which might impose upon some had he miscarried; but the contrary happening, it is not to be doubted but the prudence of his administration will be justly esteemed, and it ought to be every honest man's part to represent to the King the desire the Protestants of Ireland have showed to this reconciliation, as proceeding from their great duty to him, and their zeal for the public; and the chief promoters of this happy change will deserve his Majesty's particular consideration, among which I am glad nobody can pretend to be more eminent than yourself.”

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 27, Dublin Castle.—“I have recommended Brigadier Wolseley to the Lords of the Treasure (sic), that the King's favour to him by his Majesty's letter to me to provide him a 1,000*l.* a year in custodiam (sic) may be made good to him, which, by the list of lands I have now sent over, will go near to do.

“I find he thinks his business never so well prospers as when your Grace shews him your favour and protection; and indeed, my Lord, there is no man (as to the Army business, or the Parliament) is of more use to me than himself; and therefore, as your Grace will do a service to the public by letting him have your favour in his pretensions, so you will likewise particularly oblige," &c.

R. Oct. 3rd.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Sept. 28, Dublin Castle.—“Our affairs here in Parliament go on pretty well, God be thanked. The heads of the Poll Bill will, I am told, be finished this day, or in one day more at farthest, and I am assured by the Commons that they will give the King the 163,000*l.* they have promised, or more.

“There happened on Monday last, when the House had under their consideration the State of the Nation, some heats, which begot the Vote you will see in the print—That the continuance and favour which the Irish Papist[s] have had in this kingdom during the late Governments here, since the year 1690, has [have] been another cause of the miseries of this kingdom; and I am told it was mentioned in the House, that the Governments meant were during the time my Lord Rummy, Sir Charles Porter, and Lord Conesby were chief Governors here.

“Yesterday the House resolved itself again into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the State of the Nation; and it being expected they would go on in the same method, I used the best endeavours I could, that my Lord Rummy and my Lord Conesby’s names should not be upon the stage; and, indeed, most of the leading men promised me not to meddle with them.

“And as for my Lord Chancellor, he has so great an interest in his place, having power over all men’s estates, and people are so much in awe of him, by having suits depending in his Court, and the Jacobites here are so firm to him, that his party is strong in the House; so that yesterday, when the matter came upon debate, it passed over without the least mention of my Lord Rummy, or indeed without any great heat, and I hope all things will do well.

R. Oct. 3rd.

ARTICLES AGAINST SIR CHARLES PORTER.

1695, [Sept.]—“Articles of High Crimes and Misdemeanours against Sir Charles Porter, knight, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland.

“First. That the said Sir Charles Porter since his Majesty’s happy accession to the Crown, contrary to his oath, office, and duty of Chancellor, and in manifest breach of the trust reposed in him, hath by himself, his agents, or servants corruptly and illegally exacted and taken from his Majesty’s subjects new and excessive fees, contrary to the laws and customs of this realm, and to the evil example of other ministers and officers, and to the great oppression of the subject.

“Secondly. That Sir Charles Porter in his office and place of Lord Chancellor hath used and exercised a power above and against law, and to the subversion of the fundamental laws and established government of this realm, extending such his power at his mere will and pleasure, without any reasonable or warrantable cause, over the persons and estates of his Majesty’s subjects of this kingdom.

“Thirdly. That the said Sir Charles Porter, in execution of such his arbitrary and illegal power, without any reasonable or warrantable cause, and contrary to all rules of law and equity, did on or about the 26th of September, 1694, imprison Elnathan Lumm, of the City of Dublin, esquire; [and] the said Sir Charles Porter refused to discharge the said Elnathan Lumm until the said Lumm enlarged one Parker, who then was in custody of the Sheriffs of the City of Dublin upon a capias in a debt of 1,200*l.* due to the said Lumm and partners; which debt was lost by the said Lumm’s confinement, he being forced to enlarge the said Parker to procure his own enlargement.

“Fourthly. That the said Sir Charles Porter, in further execution of his said arbitrary and illegal power, in or about the month of March, 1690, without any scire facias for trial or judgment, disseised Thomas Tillson, of the said city, esquire, of the officer (sic) of Usher in the High Court of Chancery, in which office he, the said Tillson, had a freehold by grant under the Great Seal; and the said Sir Charles Porter refused to hear the said Tillson by his counsel to make out his title and justify his right thereunto, although the said Tillson petitioned his Lordship to be so heard.

“Fifthly. That the said Sir Charles Porter, being disaffected to his Majesty’s Government, and a great favourer of the late King James, his adherents and the Irish Papists, put into Commission and continues several persons in Commission of the Peace who have been active in the said late King James’s service against his Majesty, and are unfit persons to be in commission, some of them having embrewed their hands in Protestants’ blood, and others indicted and outlawed for high treason committed against his Majesty; and the said Sir Charles Porter had sufficient knowledge of the aforesaid matters relating to the said Justices of the Peace.

“Sixthly. That the said Sir Charles Porter, contrary to his oath and duty, hath notoriously favoured the Irish Papists against Protestants in causes depending before him, using great delays in favour of the Irish Papists, and not giving such judgment, as appears by the cause [between] Burt and Carthy, the cause between Sir Arthur Gore and the Lord Dillon, and the cause between Robert Twigg, plaintiff, and Henry Ball and Robert Ball and Richard Yates, and several other causes of the like nature, contrary to Magna Charta; and the said Sir Charles Porter hath showed such favour as well to Irish Papists that hath [have] not claimed the benefit of any Articles, as to others who have not been adjudged within any Articles.

“Seventhly. That the said Sir Charles Porter, contrary to his said oath, office, and duty, hath acted partially, arbitrarily, and illegally in causes before him between parties, and particularly by releasing George Phillips, esquire, when in execution at the suit of Morris Bartly, and by committing the Sub-sheriff and bailiffs of Edward Dean, esquire, High Sheriff of the County of Dublin, for taking the said George Phillips in execution.

“All which said crimes and misdemeanours were committed by the said Sir Charles Porter during the time of his being Lord High Chancellor of this realm, contrary to the great trust reposed in him, and to the subversion of the known laws of the kingdom.”

SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

[16]95, Oct. 1, London.—“Whilst I was in the country I received yours of the 15th of the last month, and can assure you that at the time Mr. Hopson was ordered out, it was asked by the Lords Justices whether it was a command proper to desire you to undertake, and answered that it was not suitable to your flag; upon which he was sent.

“I am surprised I hear nothing of any kind from N[eckson]; I doubt he has some other project than what he proposed. Had he been anywhere upon the coast of France, or in their ports, I think we must have heard from him before this; but I fear he may be gone somewhere a great way off, to do mischief. The ship that waits for him, I think, ought no more to lie at expense; but I will direct nothing now, the King’s arrival in probability will be so near.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, October 1-11, Turin.—It is necessary to keep up a plan of campaign, in order that the movements of the armies on land and sea may be made in concert; otherwise it is to be feared that nothing will be done in this quarter. We shall not be ready to attack Nice, or assist in the bombardment of Toulon or Marseilles, unless a diversion be effected by an attack on Pignerol; nor will the Fleet be able to assist, unless the coasts be threatened, which will oblige the enemy to keep many troops thereon, &c.

Has received the list of the Irish prisoners at London, and of the French [Huguenots] who have been taken at sea and are in the enemy’s hands. Will endeavour to effect an exchange. The French are disarming the fleet which they had made ready at Toulon.

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1695, Oct. 3, Whitehall.—“I have just received your Excellency’s of the 27th and 28th Sept. I have ever had great inclination to serve Brigadier Wooseley upon his own merit, but being now recommended by your Excellency, will very much add to my zeal for him.

“I am extremely rejoiced to hear the public business goes on so happily. I think you are much in the right to discourage personal heats all you can, besides that it proves your Excellency's great moderation, not to endeavour to set off your own administration by showing the fault of the former." . . . .

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Oct. 5, Whitehall.—“The last letters having brought positive orders from his Majesty for your proceeding without further delay to the Straits, what you had writ to the Admiralty, as well as your letter to me, made the Lords Justices and the Lords of the Admiralty more cautious in immediately dispatching those orders, till they advised with some people they thought could judge of the hazard it would be for the three-decked ships to enter upon this voyage at this time of the year; in order to which the seamen of the Navy Board, and some of the chief of those captains who returned from the Straits were called before the Admiralty Board, and there unanimously gave their opinion, that they conceived no more danger in the three Dutch ships' going, than in those of 70 or 80 guns. This, coming upon his Majesty's commands for your departure, is the cause of the orders you have received from the Lords of the Admiralty; and I think you yourself will judge that less could not be done here.

“In the last letter I received from Mr. Russell of the 4th Sept., which mentions his resolution of coming soon for these seas, he speaks of two things very proper, I think, for your knowledge; one is, that 16 of the Dutch ships now with him designed to return at the same time he did; and the other, that by reason of the recall of all the four Regiments, he should be forced to leave the ships that stayed behind but ill-manned. These I know must be two very uncomfortable advertisements to you.” . . . The Admiralty propose to prepare the Victory and some other ships.

WILLIAM PENN to ———.

[16]95, Oct. 5, London.—“My noble friend,—When I had my liberty, that it might not prove injurious by surprise, Sir J. Trenchard gave me a letter, that was [to] protect me in enjoyment of it against any inconveniency that might attend me from the ignorance or prejudice of any busy person. He being dead, and [I] having occasion to travel westward and southwest through several counties, lest in so busy a time as that of Elections I may be misunderstood, and so exposed to some officious persons' interruptions, I pray from the Duke a letter of the same import, that I am fare [fair] with Government, and under the protection of it, and that if any should, notwithstanding, give me disturbance, that upon my writing it should be removed. I beg pardon; I seem to say what to one that knows so well what and how upon all occasions, and next that I may have leave to be of the number of those that profess to be, as I truly am,” &c.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Oct. 5, Queen, at Spittheade.—Has been on some business in Wiltshire, but is now expecting orders to proceed to the Straits very suddenly.

“At my return last night I found an express from Rear-Admiral Hopson, wherein I perceive he is under unreasonable apprehensions of ships of a hundred tons; when I dare say no nation but this will venture ships of that weight into the sea at this time of the year. But I will say no more on this occasion — only observe to your Grace that even in a Dutch war the Government would never suffer the great ships to be without the buoys on any occasion after Michaelmas; and I am sure the danger of those seas have [has] no kind of proportion in relation to great ships with the Ocean.

“I cannot be of your Grace’s opinion that N[eckson] is gone on any long voyage, because he had neither provisions nor money.” . . .

R. 6.

THO. BRODRICK to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Oct. 5, Dublin.—“I am to own the great favour and honour of your Grace’s, which has confirmed the Protestants of this kingdom in the hopes they has [have] always entertained of being fairly represented by your Grace. Your Grace’s power in effecting it nobody ever doubted, and we have as little reason to question your will.

“Time alone can show (and certainly will) that our entire dependence is on the King, under whom alone we can expect the settlement of our ruined country. Our inclinations lead us as strongly into his Majesty’s service as our interest does; and where these are joined, our dutiful behaviour and firm adherence must undoubtedly be past question.

“In order to a future settlement (for no farther was it designed) Articles were exhibited against my Lord Chancellor [Sir Charles Porter] in the House of Commons. We could not upon computation hope to carry anything against him by a majority of voices, considering that by reason of the extreme poverty of the country very many gentlemen of considerable estates avoided being chosen, as not well able to bear the expense. This gave an opportunity to lawyers of a meaner sort, whose practice depends on the favour of the Courts—attorneys, six-clerks, and officers depending on the Courts—of coming into the House of Commons. These sort of people, as well as my Lord Chancellor’s relations, servants, and immediate dependants, spared neither pains nor charge in elections, which the country gentlemen seeing, and not being able to bear, were forced to waive competitions; beside which, wherever the Irish could influence elections, my Lord Chancellor’s friends were chosen. These, and those who have causes now depending in Chancery, make one fourth part of our House.

“Your Grace I am confident will soon determine whether a party prevail as such, when you please to consider that a negative has been put upon the question that the Articles do contain matter of impeachment. They were not hardy enough to do it bare fact [faced], but by a previous question did that in effect which no man living would avow. I humbly presume to send your Grace a copy of the Articles, and do submit the case to your Grace.

“The constant method of Parliament in coming to this resolution upon the averment of two members, who took upon them the proof of every article, was insisted upon; but this being overruled, twelve gentlemen of very considerable estates stood up after each other, and severally took upon themselves the proof of the Articles, many of them averring the truth of several of the Articles from their own knowledge; but neither would this do. Proof was demanded by my Lord Chancellor’s friends to every Article; this we consented to, provided a chief judge or judges might examine upon oath, in the presence of a Committee of the Commons, and the depositions to be read in the House; in order to obtain which, my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs’ examining after this manner, in the time of the Plot, was cited; but this was also rejected.

“I shall not presume to trouble your Grace with the arguments on either side; the matter of fact speaks too plainly the design of carrying it in my Lord Chancellor’s favour by numbers.

“I humbly hope your Grace will please to consider our condition, and whether carrying things thus with a high hand can be for the King or country’s service. My Lord Chancellor is too great for this kingdom to cope with, unless relieved by the King, whose name is made use of for supporting him in everything complained of. ’Tis plain the one side can have no other end than the good of the country, being to get nothing but equal administration of justice by the removal of my Lord Chancellor; but many of the others so entirely depend on him as they must be ruined thereby; notwithstanding which, we were ninety-six to a hundred and eighteen, and this after a debate of eight hours, to which every one of his friends stuck close, when the country gentlemen, quite tired, had left the House.

“My Lord Deputy I am very confident is sensible of our condition, but his station forbids his appearing in a matter of this nature; but to him do we appeal. Whether to this, or to something much worse, is to be attributed the appearing of those who eat the King’s bread, and cannot live without it (I mean civil officers), I know not, but they are the most industrious advocates my Lord Chancellor has.”

R. 16.

J. ROBINSON TO SECRETARY SIR WILLIAM TRUMBULL.

1695, Oct. 5, Stockholm.—The French and the Danes encourage this Court to contest the matter of the flag, but it is desirous of an accommodation, and contrives expedients to prevent like accidents in future, such as the lowering of the upper sails of their convoys when in British seas, as they have neither flag nor pennant; and that this King’s convoys shall take no Danish ships under their protection, &c. There is a favourable disposition towards succouring the Allies. The Swedish minister in Paris writes that the French are much more haughty and untractable of late, and are unwilling to hear of a peace.

SHREWSBURY to MR. PENN.

1695, Oct. 6, London.—“ I hope nobody will be so over-busy to interrupt you in your journey, upon a mistaken zeal to serve the Government, since I am persuaded your professions are very sincere, and that you design not its prejudice, but advantage. However, should the too great officiousness of any give you the least trouble, if you please to acquaint me, I will not fail to do everything in my power to remove it, and shall be glad of an occasion of doing you any other service, more difficult or considerable.”

Autograph draft.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Oct. 6, Dublin Castle.—“ I am heartily glad I can now acquaint your Grace that the Commons have passed the Poll Bill this day, and have sent me the heads of it, so that I shall now order it to be prepared with all diligence imaginable, that it may be transmitted in form. There were some few attempts to have an appropriating clause in it, but without effect. Others were for having the Bill drawn by the Commons, and not the heads of the Bill, endeavouring thereby to have brought the business of the sole right again upon the stage, but it would not pass, finding very little encouragement in the House, so entirely are they in their real affection and duty to his Majesty.

“ Your Grace I doubt not has heard of the heats that are arisen in the House against my Lord Chancellor, for those against my Lord Rumney and Lord Conesby seem to be at an end. You will see by the Votes of the 5th that several of the Members have taken upon themselves the proof of the Articles against Sir Charles Porter, and some of them averred several of the said Articles to be true to their own knowledge; but after long debates, whether the said Articles contained matters of impeachment, the previous question being put, that the said question be now put, it passed in the negative. The yeas were 96, and the noes 116.

“ My Lord Chancellor’s party consists chiefly in lawyers, attorneys, and solicitors, who make the considerable part of the House. The Commissioners of the Revenue and their collectors are all on his side; many gentlemen likewise that have suits depending in his Court, and all the Irish and Jacobite interest are entirely at his devotion; but the most considerable gentlemen of the House, both as to estates and credit in the country, vote against him, looking upon him as a man of no integrity, being verily persuaded he is not true to the King’s interest, and that should any occasion happen (which God forbid), he would do his utmost for the service of the late King; so that I verily believe they are become irreconcilable to him, and will never think themselves safe under his administration.

“ ’Tis fit your Grace should know my Lord Chancellor has been often with me, and pressed me to stop this impeachment against him, telling me I could do it if I would, and that it would tend to the King’s service. Nay, he has been so plain with me as to say that, if I did not do it, mischief would come of it; to which I always replied that I was unconcerned in this contest, but told him, if he would let me know his mind by any letter in writing, I would endeavour to comply with his desire; but he refused to do anything of this kind.

“ I doubt not but the House will forthwith proceed to consider of further ways and means for raising such other sums as are necessary to complete the 163,000*l.*, which I presume will be raised by an additional duty on tobacco, and several imported goods, for as yet they will not be prevailed with to come to a land-tax, many of the lands in the several counties lying waste and untenanted; and that there will be time enough to pass it into a law before the Parliament of England meets. For, notwithstanding my Lord Chancellor’s suggestion, I find this business of his so far from obstructing the King’s business, that till this heat against him had some vent in the House, the money matters went slowly on, but since that, they have sat almost de die in diem, which, to the best of my remembrance, is more than ever I knew done in any Parliament in England.

“ I thought it my duty to give your Grace this account of our affairs here.

[P.S.] “ I had almost forgot to tell your Grace that the Articles against my Lord Chancellor do not in the least touch upon anything done by him during the time of the war, or upon the Articles of Limerick, but are for facts done since in his office of Chancellor generally in favour of Irish Papists.”

R. 16.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 7, Queen, at Spitheade.—“ I yesterday received my orders for proceeding to the Straits, and after noon Rear-Admiral Hopson arrived with the squadron under his command. I immediately gave directions to the several captains to use all diligence in supplying their ships with water, stores, and other necessaries, to enable them to proceed, and hope to get them all dispatched in a day or two; in which I will see no time shall be lost, the wind at present inclining a little northerly, which gives me some hopes of a fair opportunity to get out of the Channel. I have yet no directions about paying Col. Northcott’s Regiment subsistence, so that, if it cannot be sent to me before my departure, I humbly pray your Grace’s care they may come after me.”

R. 8th.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 7, Queen, at Spitheade.—“ I have your Grace’s letter of the 5th instant, by which I find the fine passage the Straits ships have had home has in some measure reconciled the captains’ judgments as to the danger of the seas with the great ships in the winter season; but neither that, nor the fair weather we have at present here, calms my apprehensions for them. I cannot forget the 3rd of September, '91; and had these gentlemen looked back to their journals of that day, I know they must have been of another opinion; for had that gale of wind had the continuance of a winter storm, it would have been a woe-day to England. But I shall execute my orders with all the cheerfulness imaginable, though what gives me the most anxious thought on this occasion is that part of your Grace's letter which tells me the squadron at Cadiz will be so very weak, both as to the number of ships and the meanness of their condition as to men. The latter of these is a misfortune that I am afraid will not be mended after my departure, I having observed the great difficulties the Admiralty has had to supply this defect, even while the Fleet was under the direction of Mr. Russell, nor could it have been provided for last year but by the land forces. So that, in my poor opinion, it would be better to send half these ships with a number of men to put those abroad into a condition for service, than the whole, under the unhappy circumstances we must be [in] in case we arrive in safety at Cadiz, for upon the melancholy prospect I have at this distance, all I can hope for is to be pent up in that port; for if the ships left there should be foul, as these I carry with me are, it will not be by any means reasonable, though never so well manned, to lay in the way of the enemy's fleet, lest, by their exceeding us in number and the advantage of their cleanness, it should produce such fatal consequences as I hope I shall never live to see; but if it please God to send me well there, I shall act according to the advice and opinion of the flag-officers.

"But, my Lord, if the enemy shall be comè away into these seas, and I miss them in my passage out, which is the best can be hoped for, it will be very dismal to come back again in the midst of winter with the great ships; and should they happily return through all these great difficulties, I cannot hope they will be in a condition for the next summer's use; it being obvious to every seaman's reason that a winter's passage out and home must needs rack and wear them more than seven summers' service. This is the case, my Lord, as plain as I can state in so few words, which I humbly refer to your Grace's and their Excellencies' consideration.

[P.S.] "I have by this day's post given the Lords of the Admiralty an account of the ships [which] are already sickly by the rawness of the soldiers and the nakedness of the marines, many having not clothes enough to appear with decency."

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Oct. 8, Whitehall.—"I have received your two letters of yesterday, and laid them before the Lords Justices, who, being very sensible of the inconvenience it may be to the service to have the squadron Mr. Russell leaves so ill manned as he represents, and no method taken to supply it, will not content themselves with recommending a remedy to the Lords of the Admiralty, but, when his Majesty arrives, will humbly represent it to him, and endeavour some way or other that men may be sent to man them completely. A warrant has been this day signed to empower you to pay Norcot's Regiment, and I suppose it will be transmitted to you by this night's post.

"The Lords Justices are sensible that this unexpected return of the Dutch squadron does alter the circumstance of your case from what it would have been had they remained, as it was affirmed they should, till they were relieved by a fresh squadron from hence; and possibly this alteration might have induced them to have reconsidered your instructions. But the wind being now fair, and the King so soon expected, they resolve immediately to lay the whole matter before his Majesty, who, being acquainted with what is designed in Holland, both as to the recall of the one squadron, and the time of their sending a new one, as well as the strength of it, can best judge what directions to give upon the several cases that may fall out; which, if it occasions any change in your present orders, shall be dispatched after you by an advice-boat, the Admiralty having orders to keep one ready at Falmouth for that purpose, we concluding this easterly wind and fair weather will invite you to go to sea with what expedition you can, and I hope the voyage will be as safe and successful as it is wished by," &c.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 8-18, Turin.—Believes the King will have returned to England before the arrival of this letter. Our troops are still encamped, notwithstanding very bad weather and a great dearth of provisions. Thinks his R.H. will soon send them into their winter quarters. Refers to the non-payment of two Regiments, and to the money which he brought from England when he first came into this country, &c.

Is also embarrassed by another affair. Since last year his R.H. has been levying an Irish battalion, and in order to make it complete he keeps officers in the valleys, where deserters from the enemy's army resort. These officers have brought in some English, who, having been taken in Flanders, had been forced to recruit the Irish regiments serving in the army of M. de Cattinat. These Englishmen being now in an Irish regiment, under Irish officers, and with a pay two-thirds smaller than they used to receive in England, it will be understood that they do not serve willingly, and that they avail themselves of the pretext of religion—of which, however, they make no exercise—and daily worry the writer to obtain their dismissal, but he has been unable to do so, although he has offered to repay the money they cost. This difficulty was foreseen by the writer. When this Irish battalion was first raised, the Colonel prayed him to forbid our troops to press (prendre) any Irishmen. Did so, on condition that no Englishman or Scotchman, or even Irish Protestant, should be enlisted [in the battalion], but that all such men should be placed among the King's troops. Has accordingly on his part given up all Irishmen, but the Colonel, though a friend of his, has had orders not to observe the condition. Requires only about 25 Englishmen to be given up; but if any of these soldiers, or any of the officers here, should write about this to England, it would be much to his discredit to have it reported that he permits Englishmen to be forced to serve a Roman Catholic prince without being allowed to exercise their religion.

Desires the King may be informed of these two matters, so that the minister of his R.H. may be urgently spoken to about them, and that he (the writer) may know positively how to act.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 8-18, Turin.—“Depuis ma lettre escrite, j'en ay receu une de M. Ronsele, qui me fait sçavoir que uous avés eu la bonté d'entrer dans le detail de tous ses malheurs. Son grand zele pour nôtre religion et le service du Roy luy a fait beaucoup souffrir, ayant esté longtemps dans une facheuse prison à Gallway, et ayant perdu tous ses biens. Il rendit un grand service pendant sa prison, ayant contribué à faire sauuer beaucoup de nos prisoniers, qui se rendirent maistres d'un uaisseau, qu'ils menerent à Dublin. Il a une femme angloise de beaucoup de merite, qui est dans un estat pitoyable par sa paureté et mauuaise santé, que les tourments qu'on luy a fait en Irlande pendant la prison de son mary luy ont attiré. Enfin, my Lord, ceste famille merite uostre protection; ce sera une grande charité, et peu de chose la peut tirer de la misere.”

Endorsed: R. 28 [Oct.] 95. In favour of Baron de Ronsele.

1695, Oct. 11, Queen, at St. Hellen's.—“I have your Grace's letter of the 8th instant, and am thankful to your Grace and their Excellencies the Lords Justices for their intended care for manning the ships left behind by Mr. Russell at Cadiz, and wish it may prove effectual. The more I think of what I proposed of keeping these great ships at home this winter, the more I am confirmed I was in the right. For if the enemy resolve to come into these seas this winter, in probability they are passed the Straits' mouth ere this; and if they are, in my poor opinion, it is as probable they will give us battle here next summer. And if our ships are fitting either at home or at Cadiz, they will be in a condition for the next summer service; but if they are employed in ranging the sea all winter in their passage out and home, as I intimated to your Grace in my last, though they should return without any ill accident, I am apprehensive they cannot be fit for the next summer's use. And whether the Navy be in so good a condition to admit of such risks of impairing it, I cannot presume to determine, though in my opinion it is not. And, my Lord, I do humbly propose, in case the enemy be come from Tolloone, that a light squadron of ships, such as may be spared from the service here, will maintain the King's honour, and support the trade of his subjects and Allies abroad, and likely give the enemy some diversion from hence. I have no ends in imparting my thoughts to your Grace on this subject but the service, for which I think in my conscience what I offer is best, for the more ships proceed with me, and the greater force I appear with abroad, certainly the greater advantage it is to my reputation; but I am one of those weak Englishmen that always prefer the public good of my country before my own private interest.

"We are unmoored and ready to embrace the very first opportunity of sailing, though at present the weather is calm, and seems as if the wind will be about westerly; but I shall slip no opportunity of proceeding, and wish it may succeed for the best, in which no endeavours of mine shall be wanting for promoting his Majesty's service, to which I am devoted with a very true zeal and affection."

EXTRADITION OF AN IRISHMAN.

1695, Oct. #### H. GREG to SEC. TRUMBULL.

1695, Oct. 12, Copenhagen.—Presented the memorial against Capt. Juel, by his Majesty's order, three months ago. Was referred to Mons. Plessen, who has not yet arrived. The Danish ministers alleged that it is far from their King's thoughts to dispute the honours given to his Majesty's flag by other crowned heads, but that the lowering of the flag, pennant, or topsail of every foreign man-of-war on every occasion of meeting the least English frigate in the British seas, has never been yielded by the French or other Kings, &c.; that the English have given up the point by several treaties with the French in Cromwell's time and since; "that if Philip II. of Spain did strike to Queen Mary's flag, it was in the River Thames or on the coast of England, and that chiefly perhaps out of complaisance, when he came to court the said Queen"; that English ships do not pay such respect to the Danish flag in this King's seas; that Capt. Juel did fire a salute to each of the two English frigates, which they did not return, but fired their broadsides upon him, and killed and wounded several of his men; that he acted only in self-defence; that he did not carry a flag, but only a pennant, and the demand for taking in the pennant was a novelty; "that for this reason they looked upon the dispute with Capt. Barfoot to have been merely occasioned by the particular consideration that the officers of the English fleet had for the Royal Chamber of the Downs, as a kind of sacred place, as Sir Cloudesly Shovel then called it"; and that not long before one of the Danish captains passed through Admiral Russell's fleet at sea, and saluted him with guns, but was not required to take in his pennant. Asks for instructions on several points. Captain Sested, "who was in company of the Swede in the rencounter with the Sea-horse," has been degraded for lowering his pennant on that and on a previous occasion.

SEC. TRUMBULL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 22, Easthampstead.—“ When I left London, I hoped the Election for the University of Oxford would have been over before I should have come thither, and so have had nothing to have hindered my return as this day ; but by accident the precept was delayed, and the Election could not be till yesterday, when the Vice-Chancellor called a Convocation, and they unanimously chose me to be one of their Burgesses, and Mr. Finch the other ; which has kept me a day longer than I expected. I was very glad to find the University so generally well affected and dutiful to his Majesty, as they frequently expressed themselves, with their most earnest desires to see the King there in his way from Burford to Windsor. They remembered a letter his Majesty was formerly pleased to write to them (upon his not coming from Abingdon thither), promising the honour of his presence at the University ; and I heartily wish your Grace would prevail with him to gratify them when he comes so near Oxford ; I hope it would be for his service, and therefore recommend it to your favour to persuade him to it.” . . .

TWEEDDALE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 24, Pinkie.—“ After Mr. Secretary Johnstoun went from this, I thought it not necessary to give your Grace the trouble of an account of affairs here, not doubting he would do it, especially of my Lord Bradalbin, which with no small struggle is got over; but it was of more considerable importance than at first we were aware of, that upon the conclusion of a session of Parliament a person imprisoned for treason by them should be set at liberty without condition or qualification, besides the endeavours were used to expose the King's directions to his Advocate thereanent, which his Majesty intended should be kept secret; wherein I hope the King will be satisfied with what hath been done. And if upon the importunity of my Lord's English friends (who should know better how such a thing would relish with an English Parliament) the King should be prevailed with to give him liberty, I hope it will be qualified with laying him aside from all employment in the Government, and upon condition of his giving bail to appear at the next session of Parliament, as the Council shall appoint. And by this affair I have made a discovery how impossible it will be for me to bear the burden of my employment in so divided and split a condition of persons employed in the Government with me, who stand not equally affectionate to it, the one half acting mostly with regard to their own interest, to the prejudice thereof; and though I dare not offer so great changes to be made as the settlement and quiet of Government requires, yet so much as is necessary for its preservation and safety I shall offer now upon his Majesty's return to be, a new Commission of the Treasury, whereof reckoning two places empty, as the Earl of Linlithgow's, and the Earl of Bradalbin's, and two of the other three almost always absent, the Duke of Queensberrie and the Earl of Cassilis, and the third, my Lord Raith, taking upon him as Treasurer Depute, which is inconsistent with a Commission of the Treasury, the title of Treasurer Depute being only used to supply the place of an officer of State in Parliament, and being son to the Earl of Melvill (who himself is Privy Seal, and another son of his Captain of the Castle of Edinburgh, and he and they being members of all the Courts, and carrying in the last session of Parliament, as Mr. Secretary Johnstoun can show you) needs a mortification. So if the King change three in the Commission of the Treasury, whereof my son, whom you have been pleased to recommend, and the Justice Clerk [Sir Wm. Hamilton], whom the King knows very well, and my Lord Ruthven, who was formerly in the Treasury, would make up the number. But if it were possible to get a new Commission of Council and Exchequer both, it would produce an excellent settlement in the Government here, and quickly put the nation in a condition of safety and firmness to the King's Majesty and his Government, and soften the animosities amongst the Clergy, which is not possible to be done without changes in the civil government. Now, whether to write to the King upon the whole matter, or as to the first part, to wit, of the Treasury, I can hardly resolve without your Grace's advice, whose affection to the King's Government and welfare of both kingdoms I have so perfect a confidence of as, excuse me to say, I cannot proceed without it, and must therefore crave pardon for the trouble is given you by," &c.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1695,] Oct. 24, Dublin Castle.—“Yesterday being the 23rd of October, and so the state-day of the greatest ceremonies, I was not able to get the Bills under seal at the Council till this morning; and being resolved to send my private secretary, Mr. Stone, away with this same in the afternoon, I have not time to write to your Grace concerning the Bills, as likewise touching the adjournment or prorogation of the Parliament; but, resolving to send a transmission of the last Bill of money within these very few days, I will then fully express my thoughts thereupon concern[ing] these matters.

“If your Grace will please to give an audience at any time to this bearer (he being a Member of the House), [he] will give you a full account of the whole affair of my Lord Chancellor’s. He is a very faithful and prudent young man.

“My Lord Anglesey will arrive at London with this packet. He is an ingenious man, but perfectly embarked with the sole right men, and entirely in the interest of my Lord Chancellor. In the House of Peers he has been at the head of all the embroilments, and likewise in those that have [been] like to happen between the two Houses. But this, if you please, to yourself alone.

[P.S.] “I have received your Grace’s letter of Oct. 15th concerning my Lord Belliew, and will take great care therein.”

R. No. 9th, 95. Enclosure (?):—

[Proceedings in the Irish House of Commons.]

“The minute after the Report from the Committee of the whole House for granting the Supply was made, the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the House, having voted a Supply, would think of the rights and liberties of the subject, and prayed that it might be an instruction to the Committee appointed to consider what laws of England were fit to be passed into laws in this kingdom, that [they] do forthwith prepare heads of the Habeas Corpus Bill; and after some short time he (though not Chairman of that Committee) reported the heads of the Habeas Corpus Bill without consulting the Committee; and it is to be observed that he never spoke one word in the dispute upon the sole right.

“Mr. Sloane moved that an appropriating clause for the debts due to the country from the Army might be added to the Poll Bill, and that Commissioners for Accompts might be appointed by the said Bill, before whom all money granted by this Parliament might be accounted for; and that the heads of the said Bill might be reduced into a Bill and read in the House before the same should be sent to my Lord Deputy.

“Sir John Meade, one of the King’s counsel, moved that the heads of the Poll Bill might be fairly engrossed and read again over in the House before the same was sent to my Lord Deputy. But neither Mr. Sloane’s nor Sir John Meade’s motion met with any countenance, by reason of the great delay the same must have given to the Supply.”

SEC. TRUMBULL TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 25, Whitehall.—“About a month since Mr. Roope, the Governor of Dartmouth, acquainted me that a vessel, pretended to belong to Sweden, one Peterson master, had taken in a person in a very suspicious manner, and that he was informed he was bound for Morlaix in France. . . . I am informed by my Lord Berkeley and Sir Cloudesly Shovel that Mr. Roope is under a mistake.” . . .

[P.S.] “Mr. Heathcott, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Raworth desired me to recommend the enclosed case to his Majesty, and I entreat your Grace to move the King for his favour to them, in consideration of their great losses, which they hope by this means in some measure to repair.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. TRUMBULL.

1695, Oct. 25, Althrop.—The King will pass through Oxford in his way from Burford to Windsor, early in the morning, but cannot stay to dine. The day proposed is Monday, 11 Nov., but “some of us that are here, and who wish that the King would be prevailed upon to return as soon as conveniently he could to Kensington, that he might have the more time to settle his business before the meeting of the Parliament, are not without hopes to get his Majesty to go from Burford” on Saturday, the 9th. The University is to be informed “that a treat is not expected from them.” The King will not be able to dine with Lord Abingdon at Rycaut. The enclosed petition is to be laid before the Council. His Majesty has avoided being attended by the militia in other counties, and Lord Abingdon is to be requested not to put the country to an unnecessary trouble and expense.

LORD KEEPER SOMERS TO [SHREWSBURY].

[16]95, Oct. 26.—“I thank your Grace for the favour of getting my Bills signed. I must beg the like as to the Bill for the Recorder to succeed Serjeant Powys. If I am not misinformed, Mr. Penn makes but an ill use of what he obtained from your Grace, for he is got to Bristol, and makes all the interest he can for Sir John Knight. But of this I may perhaps give your Grace a more certain information. The business of the County of Middlesex is in such a posture that I am very much troubled that your Grace is not here to direct us. The Duke of Bedford is disturbed at the apprehension of charge, but his agents have endeavoured to make an interest, and that actually before any notice of the Cambridgeshire Election. Besides this, so many persons have been engaged for him and Sir John Wolstenholm, and the appearance of success is such, and it is so universally understood that your Grace and I gave the first motion to this thing, that I am afraid it cannot be desisted from without a good deal of reflection.

“Let me beg your Grace’s opinion in this matter. Mr. Montagu is very earnest to have the thing proceed, and so is Baron Bradbury. If it does go on, the Under-Sheriff (who is a friend) says it would be of great consequence if the poll might be in Hide Park. You can best tell if that may be obtained, and in what manner. The Duke of Leeds gives a great deal of roast beef against Mr. Montagu. I should be glad to hear some good news from you, for I do assure you your Grace’s absence, and my Lord Romney’s, &c., does a great deal of hurt. I do not know what answer your Grace had from my Lord Lucas, and so we do not know how to act with him. I beg your pardon, for I have wrote with such white ink that I cannot see what nor how I have written.*

[P.S.] “Your Grace was not misinformed when you were told that my Lord Cutts joined with Sir Rob. Cotton, and your apprehension was very well grounded, as I hear, though by chance it succeeded well.”

1695, Oct. 26, Whitehall.—Is informed by the Emperor’s envoy “that the Roman Catholics of Ireland had complained of the breach of the capitulations made with them in the late war, and that the Emperor prays his Majesty will please to have a regard of them, which he will own as a particular obligation. He said, he meant only to such of the Irish as keep within the bounds of their duty, and that those who transgress may be liable to punishment. He spoke also much of the good disposition of Sweden to the affairs of the Allies.” He desires his Majesty will give directions to his minister in Sweden to make some compliment to that King about this late rencounter at sea, and that some expedient may be thought of to prevent such hostilities in future.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 26-Nov. 5, Turin.—His R.H. is to return here today. The enemy’s fortifications have been destroyed by the rains. Hopes that, after hearing Admiral Russell, Shrewsbury will deem it fitting to have “a man of consideration” at Genoa, in order to encourage commerce. Is expecting Mr. Plowman to bargain for the clothing of his R.H.’s troops. The company “du lustrin” has caused some merchandise to come to Genoa, for this country; it asks for a reduction of customs, and its memorial has been presented by the writer to his R.H. Sir William Waller passed through Genoa, and has arrived at Venice, where he hopes the King will employ him in his affairs; but he is extremely ill. M. de Mongomeri [Sir James Montgomery], who escaped from English prisons, has passed by Coni in coming from Genoa, after having been in France, and in Hungary with Teckeli. Has sent orders for his arrest to the frontiers of his R.H.'s states. Wishes to know if he should be detained here till an opportunity be found for sending him into England.

1695, Oct. 27, Althrope.—His Majesty is desirous that the Irishman should be delivered up. He would not have patience to hear Mr. Gregg's long letter read. He thinks the good disposition of the King of Sweden should be improved. Lord Villiers presses that the ratification of the Grand Alliance should be immediately despatched, and his Majesty directs that it be prepared.

“Mr. Recorder of London sent the enclosed list of persons convict for his Majesty's determination upon them, but it being impossible for the King at this distance to be informed of the circumstance of their cases, [he] is pleased to direct that you summon the Archbishop, Lord Keeper, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, [and] Lord Godolphin to meet with yourself; and if in the opinion of those Lords, having heard the Recorder, any of the persons condemned are judged proper objects of mercy, that execution be stayed upon them till his Majesty's further pleasure be known, and that the law pass upon the others who shall not be thought so deserving of favour.”

[P.S.] As to the person taken at Brest, Shrewsbury once employed him “for intelligence to Brest,” &c.

SEC. TRUMBULL TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Oct. 28, Whitehall.—“This afternoon the Council met here, and some of the petitioners against my Lord Athlone's Bill were heard, and the rest of them are to be heard at Council on Thursday next.

“The Commissioners for exchange of prisoners acquainted the Council with a letter which they received from their agent at Dover, giving an account that the French prisoners there had an expectation of the arrival of shallops from France with arms, wherewith they were to force their escape, and that the town wanted soldiers to guard the prison. I was hereupon directed in Council to write to your Grace to move the King that he would be pleased to send orders to the Duke of Schomberg for two or three companies of foot to march thither as soon as may be.” *

THO. BRODRICK to [SHREWSBURY].

1695, Oct. 28, Dublin.—“I presumed formerly to give your Grace an account of the procedure in the House of Commons against my Lord Chancellor, as far as it had then gone; which being now at an end, I hold myself in duty bound to acquaint your Grace what has happened since my last.

“The Commons, pursuant to their vote of examining witnesses on oath, sent a message to the Lords to pray that their Lordships would give leave to the Chief Justice [Sir Richard Pyne] and Chief Baron [Robert Doyne] to swear the witnesses in the Speaker’s chamber, who were afterwards to be examined in the House of Commons. The Lords hereupon send for a conference, and thereat gave their reasons in writing why they could not comply with our desire. The Commons desire a conference, and in writing give their reasons why they think their request ought to be complied with by the Lords. These conferences begat a free conference, which was desired by the Lords, when the Commons produced precedents, and enforced their precedents with the reason of the thing. The Lords afterwards adhered; the Commons did so likewise; Friday last being the day appointed for examining witnesses.

“The House of Commons were then to consider of a method for having the witnesses sworn, when Mr. Savage, Chancellor of the Exchequer, moved for leave that my Lord Chancellor might come into the House to make his defence. It was unanimously agreed that his Lordship have leave as he desired, but the time of his coming occasioned a long debate, his coming in being opposed till first the House had settled the way of swearing witnesses. However, the question of his coming then in was carried in the affirmative. His Lordship came in, a chair being set for him on the right hand within the bar; and, laying the purse and his hat on the chair, stood behind it, and there gave his answer to each of the articles; the greatest part whereof was a confession of fact, but so circumstantiated as that he hoped ’twould not be looked on as any crime, and that no judge was punishable for error in judgment, and that if he had misjudged there lay an appeal.

“That he never had taken any fees, and therefore could not be charged with taking excessive ones, for that he left the taking his fees to the officer with whom he accounted for them; that if his servants or agents had been faulty herein, he hoped they, and not he, should be accountable for it. That for what Justices he had put into the Commission of Peace he had good recommendations. That he never had been a favourer of Jacobites, Irish, or any other enemies to this Government.

“His Lordship concluded with his having refused the inheritance of fifteen hundred pounds a year offered by my Lord Tirconnell to have come over to their party, when he was first Lord Chancellor; and that he had served this kingdom beyond what anyone beside him could have done, by joining with another (I suppose Lord Coningsby) in getting some officers of the Army (I suppose Kirke and Laner) removed, who had no mind to put an end to the war, and others put in their places, more likely to effect it. That after the taking Gallaway the General [Ginkell], thinking he had done enough for that year, resolved on a blockade of Limerick, but that Lord Coningsby and himself had persuaded him to alter his measures, by turning the blockade intended into a formal siege, for the carrying on of which, the heavy guns being at Athlone, he took without law seven hundred horses, and sent them to draw the guns, and among them six of his own; that this was surely an instance of his fidelity to this Government and kingdom.

“His Lordship being withdrawn, the several Members who had taken upon them the proof of the Articles stood up successively in their places, and said that they had with great attention heard and duly weighed what his Lordship had said in his own vindication, notwithstanding which they were very sure they should be able fully to prove each article against him, and therefore prayed that the House would consider of fitting methods for coming at proof upon oath. This motion was opposed, and the question proposed, that what my Lord Chancellor had said was satisfactory without any proof. This begat a long debate, but the number of his friends being likely to carry it in the affirmative, an addition was moved to the question in the following words: Notwithstanding that the members who brought in the Articles did aver that they were able and now ready to prove every article.

“This amendment was opposed, but about eleven at night, insisting positively upon putting the question whether the amendment offered should stand part of the question, it was put, and carried in the negative.

“This we very well foresaw, but have gained this point by it, that 'twill appear to all mankind in our printed Votes, that this whole matter has been carried by numbers, who refuse to hear evidence offered them, and in the next vote have declared that what my Lord Chancellor had said is satisfactory without any proof. I shall not make any remarks on this procedure, but refer this to your Grace's consideration.

“One thing I must take notice of, that the first rub laid in our way was the Lords' refusing leave to the Judges. Their Lordships' most material objection against it was, that no person could be sworn abroad to give evidence in the House of Commons, but to that, we have in our Journals precedents in point, besides those of England when my Lord C[hief] Justice Scroggs examined; examinations likewise taken in Fuller's case, and that of the Marshal in Holborne; all which were reported, and read as evidence in the House of Commons. But their Lordships adhering put us to the finding out new methods, or we must have so far broke with the Lords as to have hindered the King's business, which we resolved carefully to avoid, which sufficiently appears by our parting with the right of standing covered at a conference, which the Commons of this kingdom have ever till now been in possession of, though it is otherways in England.

“These difficulties brought over several to my Lord Chancellor's party, who feared the ill consequence of a breach between the Houses, and could not see well how to avoid it, my Lord

Chancellor's friends having industriously spread it, and I really believe 'twas of great use to him.

"After the vote for rejecting the Articles, Sir Joseph Williamson, who has all along stuck very close to my Lord Chancellor, moved that forasmuch as it appeared to him that the gentlemen who took upon themselves the proof of these Articles did it with design to serve their country, not knowing what was to be said in my Lord Chancellor's behalf in mitigation of what might to them look like great crimes, that therefore they should have the thanks of the House for what they had done. This motion was seconded by another of my Lord Chancellor's party, to soften, I suppose, those whom they could not but know they had injured, and who probably may in another place make their application, hoping to meet with more indifferency.

"The gentlemen concerned stood up one after another, and declared that what they had done was by instructions from their country who had sent them to Parliament; that it was out of a real sense of its being a duty incumbent upon them that they undertook so disobliging a task, by which they very well foresaw they must necessarily create enemies; that their countries had not only approved of what they had done, but had also returned them thanks (some of them offered to show their letters of thanks); and therefore they did not desire any other acknowledgments, nor could they think it consisted with the dignity of a House of Commons to give them thanks for bringing in what the House thought fit to reject without examination.

"This was warmly seconded by some of those gentlemen's friends, who said that since the Articles did not, in the opinion of the House, carry so much weight in them as to deserve examination, they could not but think it fitter to order their being burnt by the hands of the common hangman, than that they should have thanks for giving so much trouble to the House in a matter which they had just before voted so trivial; but they who had thrown them out by majority of voices had it in their power to stop this, which very prudently they did, or something of this kind had certainly appeared in our votes, for it wanted not seconding, and being pushed as far as they could do it, and indeed it had looked all of a piece.

"Besides the advantages my Lord Chancellor had in the House of Commons by relations, dependences, &c., our Bishops espoused his cause heartily, and made it the subject of several sermons, even before my Lord Deputy, and the inferior clergy failed not following the example of their diocesans. From the pulpit, the dangerous consequence of this matter got into the coffee-houses, and became the subject of table talk, that the Church was struck at in this great churchman, and that nobody could tell where this might end; and indeed I am humbly of opinion, it is not easy to say when it will; for it is beyond controversy plain, that the consequence of such proceedings, when the representatives of a whole kingdom are enquiring into the grievances of it, can end in nothing but distraction, by discriminating persons, and giving broad hints from the pulpit of factions and parties, malicious prosecutions, and such like stuff; and I do not think it very improbable that the House may at one time or other take notice of these things.

“I wish, for the sake of a distracted and unsettled country, they may be forgot; for if we must bear it, lying quiet under the load will be better than, by struggling, endanger the ruin of the whole. Some have already determined quitting the kingdom, and I fear will keep their words. My stake in this unfortunate country is too good not to put me upon using my utmost endeavours in making the best of a bad market; I wish they may be anyway successful.”

“We have, after all, this to say for ourselves, that the Bills sent over will certainly be forty thousand pounds more than they are given for, and this I hope will justify our being unalterably fixed to his Majesty’s interest, however we have been and probably are still represented. I humbly hope your Grace will please to do us right herein, and that you will pardon this unreasonable trouble.”

1695, Oct. 30, Welbeck.—His Majesty has given directions for two or three companies of foot to march to Dover. He has deferred the consideration of the East India petition till his return to London.

He directs [reply to be made] to the complaint of the Emperor’s envoy “that the Roman Catholics of Ireland are not well used, and that the capitulation is not kept with them—as to the last, the fact is not so, and as to the other, all tenderness and indulgence is showed to them that can a[ny] ways consist with his Majesty’s interest and the safety of his government.”

1695, Oct. 31, Whitehall.—The Lords mentioned in the letter of the 27th met yesterday, “and having called the Recorder before them, they did not think fit, upon his report, to interpose for any of them for his Majesty’s mercy. I laid before them particularly the case of Morgan Brown, with his certificates, who was the person recommended by the Duke of Ormond; but the evidence against him was so strong that he was not excepted.” Cannot do anything in the ratification of the renewal of the Grand Alliance, as Mr. Yard cannot find the original instrument in his Grace’s office.

SEC. TRUMBULL TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Nov. 1, Whitehall.—As to the Bills from Ireland, yesterday evening the Council went through the Earl of Athlone's Bill, and all the petitioners were heard against it; and the Council heard Mr. Attorney General read an abstract of the heads of the Poll Bill, which are to be considered on Tuesday next.

“I crave leave to trouble your Grace with some particulars and requests relating to his Majesty's reception by the University of Oxon, which I thought it convenient to acquaint you with; namely, that they design to meet the King on horseback, in their formalities, as far out of the town as they have ever gone, and on the way to Woodstock, presuming his Majesty will from Burford make his entry that way. The Vice-Chancellor will make his compliments where he meets the King; and offer to do it upon his knee, as usual; but former kings, as I am informed, have always commanded them to rise. It is humbly desired that his Majesty would first go directly to his own college, Christ-Church, and from thence to the Schools and the Theatre, where they pray he will please to accept of a small banquet, which they cannot be persuaded it is fit for them to omit.

“I take the liberty at the same time to pray his Majesty will be pleased to take in his way my college, which is All-Souls; and I suppose the Bishop of Oxon will desire the same honour to Magdalen College, whereof he is president; which, with what other colleges the time will permit to visit, I humbly submit to his Majesty's goodness. I have taken the best care I can that the speeches which will be made to his Majesty shall be short, by reason of his haste.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Nov. 2–12, Turin.—His Royal Highness has nominated three commissaries for the matter of commerce. Sends a copy of the order sent to all the Generals to state in writing their opinions with regard to the next campaign. Is persuaded that there will not be sufficient infantry to undertake the siege of Pignerol or of Nice. Some other enterprise on the coasts may be proposed. Admiral Russell will be able to suggest some attack on the French navy. Remarks on affairs in Switzerland. His Royal Highness would readily consent that part of the King's troops should pass the mountains and oppose the French. Has to visit the regiment of Saconay at Aouste, and will go thence to Vevay under pretence of seeing his relatives there, at the time when the deputies of the Protestant Cantons are at Geneva, in order to see whether he can render them any service.

An Irish physician, named Donn O'Brien, who is at Pignerol, and has served the troops of King James since they have been in France, asks for a passport to return to Ireland, and has inquired of the writer whether the King would grant it.

[16]95, Nov. 4, Broadgate.—“ I have read to his Majesty your letter of the 1st instant, who continues in his resolution to pass through Oxford on Saturday morning in his way from Burford to Windsor. Whether that be the same road that goes to Woodstock I cannot tell. His Majesty designs to go to the Theatre, but desires to be excused from calling at any of the Colleges or Schools, since if he sees one he must see many others, which will take more time than the length of the remaining part of his journey will allow ; and the King, having formerly seen Oxford, does not make this visit out of curiosity, but kindness to the University, and to gratify their desire of seeing him there. As to the ceremonies, it is not to be doubted but the same will be offered to be paid his Majesty that has [have] been done to any of his predecessors, and that they will meet with the same indulgence from him that has been usual.”

SEC. TRUMBULL to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Nov. 5, Whitehall.—“ The King using to make a present, as your Grace knows, to Count Oxensterne, the beginning of every year, Mr. Robinson in his last letter tells me he has been obliged not long since to advance him 800 crowns of it, and wishes he had been able to have done more, because it would have been much for his Majesty’s service, the Count being in great want of money ; for which reason he presses hard the speedy entire payment of that gratuity.” Desires to know out of what fund his Majesty will have it paid.

“ If the King would please to visit his own college, Christ’s-Church, it would be a satisfaction to the University, and a great condescension to my request if he would afterwards look in to All-Souls, which is just in his way ; but I must not press this too far.

“ There have been several meetings at your Grace’s office about reforming the money, in order to lay the matter before his Majesty at his return ; which I hope will in some measure be ready, that something may be done about it before the Parliament meets.

“ The Irish Bills were again laid before the Council this afternoon, and the Poll Bill gone over, with the continuation of the Excise to 1698, and some other private Bills ; which are all approved, and ordered to be engrossed. The rest will be taken into consideration on Thursday.”

The Sheriff of Pembroke being dead just before the writ for electing members for that county came to him, it is necessary to choose a new sheriff to receive it. Was directed in Council to send a roll for the King to prick a sheriff for Pembroke. The first person therein named, Sir Gilbert Lort, Bart., related to the Duke of Newcastle, is unfit to serve, being much indisposed. Sends the Ratification for his Majesty’s signature.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Nov. 6, Dublin Castle.—“As my thoughts are ever here employed in what may tend to his Majesty’s service, I think it convenient to recommend to his Majesty’s favour, for to be made a Peer, Sir Robert Callvill, of Gilgorme, in the county of Antrim. His estate is at present five thousand pounds a year. By the marriage of his son, there will come fifteen hundred pounds a year more; and for money and other personal estate, he is accounted one of the most wealthy men in the kingdom. He is a man of good parts, sound judgment, and true to his Majesty’s interest. The noblemen here do desire there may be an addition to their number, for that they are (that attend the House) generally less in number than the Bishops. If his Majesty vouchsafes this honour to this gentleman, it’s humbly submitted to his [consideration] whether he will please to make him a Baron or a Viscount; but usually here gentlemen of much inferior a fortune do pretend to apply themselves to [the] Crown for to [be] made Barons. Of this affair this gentleman knows nothing; so it is in his Majesty’s breast to do as he pleases therein.

“My Lord, I think it may be convenient in this private letter to give you some account of the four gentlemen mentioned in my other letter to your Grace, that offer themselves to raise regiments for his Majesty’s service. Sir Robert Adaire’s greatest pretence is that he married Sir Robert Calvill’s daughter, and he desires it. Sir Nicholas Atchisson and Mr. John St. George are men well qualified, both by their interest, estates, and zeal for his Majesty’s [service], to be so trusted. Mr. Upton is the person that married my Lord Chamberlain’s sister, and so well known in England. He and his father are great Dissenters, and the son was not to be brought off insisting to the last for the sole right; otherways entirely (this whole Sessions) in the interest of his Majesty as to the gift of money and passing other good Bills, the Habeas Corpus Bill excepted, for which he was zealous, but I think it not a good Bill for this country. How far his Majesty will trust arms in the hands of a person in the North of Ireland who is so unalterable in matters relating to Government, though easy and free in what relates to present supplies, is humbly submitted to his Majesty’s great wisdom.

“Your Grace may possibly have expected that I should have recommended Dr. Ash, Bishop of Cloyne, to this see of Limerick; but really, my Lord, I was under apprehensions of the King’s displeasure should I have done it, for besides two or three things that grated upon the Prerogative in the Lords’ House, or at least embroiled them, this gentleman was not only assisting there, but has made it his business too much out of the House (as well as in it) to promote the Bill of Rights, so zealously carried on by a couple of young Lords.

“My Lord, these personal things are very uneasy for me to mention, and I have no relief herein, but that I trust a person of great prudence and honour, and who will not apply anything herein but to his Majesty’s service.”

SHREWSBURY to SECRETARY [TRUMBULL].

[16]95, Nov. 7, Burford.—His Majesty thinks the present to Count Ox[enstiern] should be rather better than formerly. The King will not visit any colleges, but only the Theatre, so as to avoid "exception." The Bishop of Oxford was here yesterday. The Lords who have been meeting about the coin are to be at Windsor next Sunday afternoon, and the Secretary is to bring the papers. The King has named George Lloyd of Cormyloine, Esquire, to be Sheriff of Pembroke, but, having never pricked sheriffs but in Council, is doubtful whether the forms allow it to be done elsewhere. The Lord Keeper and Mr. Attorney's opinion is to be taken. The Ratification and warrant for affixing the Great Seal are returned signed, but delay has been caused by their being sent hither by the common post.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695, Nov. 12, Whitehall.—"Lord Keeper, Archbishop, Lord Steward, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Portland, Lord Chamberlain, Shrewsbury, Mr. Secretary, Lord Godolphin, Mr. Smith, Sir Ste. Fox.

"The fact relating to the imposi[ti]on upon moseline, &c., in the Irish Act, to be laid before his Majesty, to know whether he will have it considered by the officers of the Custom or any other way; whether he will hear the East Indian Company before the Bill be put under the Seal, or whether it shall pass without further delay or consideration.

"Doctor Davenant's paper read. He is of opinion it is not advisable to new coin the money.

"To take more care of the Trade, and with the help of the Legislative restrain the merchants from hazarding their ships for private and exorbitant gain.

"To have a Council of Trade established by Parliament, who would have leisure to mind that one business.

"My Lord Keeper to propose the scheme of calling in the money; and the heads of the proclamation to that purpose."

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695, Nov. 13, Kensington.—"Archbishop, Lord Keeper, Lord Steward, Lord Privy Seal, Shrewsbury, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Godolphin, Lord Portland, Mr. Secretary.

"A Council to be summoned to meet at Kensington tomorrow at _____ a clock.

"The Commissioners of Sick and Wounded to attend.

"Mr. Attorney to send an account by what time the Irish Bills will be transcribed and ready to be put under the Seal, and at the same time a short abstract of such clauses as grant any duties in that Act we discoursed on last night, and if possible whilst the Treasury are attending on the King this afternoon, who are appointed to be with his Majesty at four a clock.

“To speak to Mr. Stone about the manner the Commons have taken in proposing heads.”

PRIVY COUNCIL, MINUTES.

1695, Nov. 14, Kensington.—“Lord Keeper, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, Shrewsbury, Lord Portland, Lord Godolphin, Mr. Secretary.

“I have reported what Mr. Stones (sic) says concerning the forms of the Commons addressing for Bills, which, with what my Lord Keeper and Mr. Secretary said, was satisfactory to his Majesty.

“The list of all the Bills depending in Council was read, and Mr. Attorney to be asked this afternoon what Bills he had under his consideration, and several others ordered to be considered, as I have marked them.

“My Lord Capel's letter of the 5th of Nov., about proroguing or adjourning the Parliament, was read; and the King directs me to order my Lord Capel to adjourn the Parliament, when the Money Bills are over, to the 28th of March, '96.

“A petition from the East India Company to recommend their case to the Parliament in general, which his Majesty agrees to, and I am ordered myself to know what they desire.

“Dean Smith to be made Bishop of Limerick.

“Mr. Attorney and Solicitor to be asked whether the petition of the East India Company for buying their goods may be granted by law.”

[SHREWSBURY] to MR. BRODRICK.

[16]95, Nov. 14, Whitehall.—“I was attending upon his Majesty in a long Progress when I received your last letter. You will easily believe that constructions have been put upon the actions of several (?) in the past, and particularly in relation to the pros[ecutio]n against my Lord Chan[cellor], according to the different opinions or interests of men. For my own part, who have reason to be convinced of your zeal for the King's and the public good, I have always endeavoured to give yours and your friends' proceedings that turn which in reality I think they deserve; and I believe it has not been without some good effect, though great pains have been taken to the contrary. That which I have been most posed to excuse is some heats upon the past governments, and particularly upon my Lord Romney, with expressions as it is reported hard upon his person. This looking more like passion and animosity than a desire to look forwards, I have had the more difficulty to answer, and, if we are not like to see you soon, should be glad to receive something from you on this subject, and particularly whether any expressions of disrespect were used upon his person. You will excuse the haste that the present hurry of affairs occasions.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Nov. 15-25, Rolle, in Switzerland.—Saw M. de Leganes at Turin, whither he had come touching the next campaign. Told him the conquest of Nice would be important, but it is more difficult than that of Pignerol. Swiss affairs. The Cantons of Zurich and Berne are pleased with the offer made to them of the King's troops under the writer's command. M. d'Arseliers, at Geneva, requires instructions as to certain articles, which the writer forwards, and a warrant for his pension of 100*l.*, which must be made to correspond with that for a similar pension already paid him by Lord Ranelagh since the King's accession.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Nov. 17, Dublin Castle.—“ Since the adjournment of the Parliament there has been cabballing (sic) on both sides. Those that brought in the Articles against my Lord Chancellor are preparing fresh ones, which, together with those rejected the last Sessions, they resolve to lay before the Parliament of England, and to appoint managers, and make subscriptions for the carrying on of this prosecution to the utmost; whilst the other party, by great assemblies in public houses, and by illuminations in taverns and great feastings, express an unbecoming joy in a matter wholly Parliamentary, and [which] consequently ought not to appear out of the walls of that assembly, especially not with the countenance (or at least connivance) of a minister in so great a station as a Chancellor. This being now made known to me before the meeting of the Parliament, I have endeavoured, and doubt not but I shall be able, to prevail with them (though I find them very refractory) to prevent their making further application on your side of the water; so that the close of our Sessions (I am persuaded) will go off with a good grace in reference to his Majesty's service in this kingdom.

“ I am credibly informed that Sir Charles Porter intends, by some of his friends, to acquaint his Majesty that the prosecution here against him was wholly on account of his behaviour for supporting his Majesty's honour in the maintenance of the Articles of Limerick, and that he will endeavour to fix the prosecution on me, in regard the Speaker and Solicitor, several of the officers of the Army, and both my Secretaries voted against him, which he presumes they would not have done, had they not been influenced by me; whereas I was surpris'd at the first Vote that passed against the several Governments (in which myself was compris'd), neither were the Articles carried on with my privity or consent. Some of those gentlemen that voted against him have in discourse told me, that in the Articles exhibited against him there is not the least complaint of anything relating to the Articles of Limerick, or to those formerly brought into the House of Commons in England, but [they] were purely (as indeed they are) for misdemeanours committed by him in the office of Chancellor; and that [he] being charged with these high crimes, they were willing to have the matter brought to the test, and this was all they desired, but they were over voted, and the Articles thrown out without being admitted to be proved. As for a Bill to be passed this Sessions for confirming the Articles of Limerick, I proposed that matter to the Council, who declared this was not a proper time to prepare a Bill for that purpose, and advised me to give your Grace an account thereof, which I did in mine of the 28th of October, and here enclose the minutes taken at the Council for that purpose."

Minutes taken in [the Irish] Council, Oct. 11, 1695.

"His Excellency my Lord Deputy brought to the Board a letter from Mr. James Vernon, Secretary to the Lords Justices of England, with a copy of a letter from Mr. Blathwayte, signifying the King's pleasure upon my Lord Chancellor's letter to his Majesty about the Articles of Lymrick.

"Upon the debate (being put to the vote) the majority were of opinion that it was not a proper time to prepare a Bill for that purpose, as also desired my Lord Deputy to return an answer thereunto himself, and not from the Council."

Endorsed : The advice of the Council to my Lord Deputy upon the Articles of Lymrick.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695, Nov. 19, Kensington.—"King, Lord Keeper, Lord Archbishop, Lord Steward, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Portland, Shre[wsbury], Mr. Secretary, Lord Godolphin.

"I reported what Sir John Fleet said about the request of the East India Company, that the King would recommend their case to the Parliament.

"Advice from Paris of the 14th Nov. was read, speaking of the expectation there is in France that the two ships expected will be taken by consent and appointment, as the others have been.

"To speak to Sir John Fleet, and shew him the above intelligence; expostulate with him their not having told where their ships were expected, but rather told wrong; know what they expect for the security of these.

"To read the letter from the Admiralty of the 16th Nov. to the Council on Thursday next, and the Admiralty's private intimation to prepare for paying off the men, as they propose in their letter.

"A letter from the Council of Ireland to me about the French Protestants' relief was read, and I delivered it to my Lord Godolphin.

"What expedients for stopping the dispute with Sweden about the flag was debated, and Mr. Secretary ordered to inform himself of ancient practice from old seamen; and also of the instructions how the respect expected should be expressed.

"My Lord Godolphin made the report about lessening the exportation.

"I am to speak to the Envoy of Genoa about lending money, and speak home to him.

“ Write to Mr. Russell about offering the seamen one shilling in the pound advantage to receive the money here instead of the Straits.

“ To have an account from the Admiralty what the Fleet in the Mediterranean has spent there in victuals and beverage since they have been there.”

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695, Nov. 19, Whitehall.—“ Among several proposals that have been made to the King for lessening the exportation of money, it has been mentioned that an offer should be made to the seamen that are or shall hereafter be in the Mediterranean, to give them twelve pence in the pound more than their wages for as much of it as they will order to be received here, which, besides the supporting of their families, and avoiding that clamour, would in some measure save the sending money abroad. However specious this proposal seemed to his Majesty, before he would take any resolution upon it, he ordered me to know your thoughts how far this were practicable or convenient.”

SHREWSBURY TO CAPEL.

1695, Nov. 19, Whitehall.—“ His Majesty commands me to signify his pleasure to your Excellency that as soon as the Bills for Supplies now sent over shall be passed into Acts, you take care the two Houses be adjourned to the 28th day of March next; or, in case you find any difficulty therein, that your Excellency then prorogue the Parliament to the said day.”

THO. BRODRICK TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Nov. 21, Dublin.—“ I have the honour of your Grace's of the 14th, to which I will give a faithful and full answer, and must always in a most particular manner acknowledge your Grace's favour in giving me leave to do so. My Lord Rummy (to my knowledge) has not been named more than once in our House, and then by myself, this being on the occasion of our general vote; I presume 'tis what is taken exception to. The occasion of naming his Lordship and the other Lords Justices (for they were all named in a breath) was to ascertain the time intended by that vote, not the least syllable of reflection either mentioned or intended at that time on any one of them. It was indeed moved by one who is a little warm, that the vote might run thus—That the Irish had been favoured by the late Governments. This I opposed, and moved that the word ‘during’ might stand, for which I assigned this reason, that I believed 'twould appear the favour they had received was from other hands than the Governments.

“ This met with neither opposition [n]or debate, but was immediately agreed to, and to the best of my remembrance carried nem. cont. Nothing could be plainer by all that had been said than that the favour complained of and intended at that time was what they received by virtue of reports made for them to the King's prejudice. To put this past dispute, this answer was given to a member who urged that the favour they received was by orders out of England, viz., that those orders were grounded on reports from the Government; that the Government grounded their reports on reports made to them by those to whom they referred the matters here; that these were the people who I apprehend were the first authors of the favours the Irish had received, and that there I believed it must and would terminate; for the truth of which I appealed to Mr. Southwell, who was then in the House, and, having attended the Council Board of England, was able to give an account of this matter.

"This I am sure he must remember, for he very well knew that his friend Sir Richard Cox and the rest of the Commissioners of Forfeitures were directly levelled at, and not any of the Governments. The true state of which I presume to lay before your Grace.

"The Irish on several pretences petitioned his Majesty; their petitions, being referred to the Government here, were by it referred to the then Solicitor-General (Sir Richard Leving) or to the Commissioners of Forfeitures; the law part, and what was reasonable for his Majesty to do, to the former; the value of what was desired, to the latter; from whom they seldom failed of such reports as I always thought more than favourable. Hereby very great incumbrances have been allowed without any reason, and the King's hands taken of [off?] estates, which no private man would have lost on such pretences. This I thought very well worth the inquiry of a House of Commons on the King's account, and this was so understood by those concerned, who could find no other or better way to cover their faults than by sheltering themselves under the name and character of a great man. This is no new stratagem, for in truth 'twas by this means that the last Parliament was prorogued in heat, and afterwards dissolved. I shall not now trouble your Grace with that matter, but do take upon me to prove it beyond denial, whenever it shall be thought fit.

"I was then and still am of opinion that my Lord Rumnye's intentions were perfectly just and kind to the Protestant interest of this kingdom. However, he was persuaded by some (whom I could never entertain the same thoughts of) to do what I believe was contrary to his inclination. If what I say be now truth (and this I have freely long since told his Lordship), can it be imagined that I should cast any personal reflection on him? I am sure I have done him service without ever letting him know it, in abating the heat of some who have not the same thoughts of his Lordship that I have; and so far I went herein as that I rendered myself suspected by some of my best friends. This was private among ourselves, but upon the faith of a Christian 'tis truth.

"I have always professed personal service for my Lord Rumny, but if I proved false, had he no friend in our House to say that this would be a reflection immediately on him? if they so understood it; but this takes its rise from afterthoughts, not from any then in the House; nor could I have given myself leave at that time to have offered at anything of this kind, had I designed it at another, for 'twas very plain nothing could conduce more to the King's service and our happiness than a good agreement among us; for looking forward towards a settlement was what every man's thoughts were fixed on; and I dare confidently say, had it been our good fortune to have had my Lord Chancellor removed before the meeting of the Parliament, there had not been an angry vote, nay, I believe word, during the whole session. To my knowledge some who have appeared against him, and whom he looks upon as not the least considerable of his enemies, have offered to join in any application that he should think advisable to his Majesty for a pension for the support of his family, who I fear are under ill circumstances, by which it is plain we were desirous to purchase our peace, and what we apprehended our safety, by the softest and easiest means possible, though at our own cost.

“I have given your Grace a just and faithful account of this matter; by the truth of this I'll stand, or be contented to fall; and surely I am greatly injured if what I hear from my friends out of England gain any credit. I would not return your Grace's favours by palliating a matter, or misinforming you. If what I have here said be not strictly truth, I'll never venture to look your Grace in the face.

“Thus much having been coined out of nothing, I cannot but believe much more has been said to my prejudice in a matter for which there is some grounds, though I have nothing more than hints of it from my friends in England. I most humbly beg your Grace's pardon and patience in relating it, which I will do with truth and candour. Heads of a Bill for attainting those who died in rebellion were thought necessary by the House of Commons for supplying the defect of the law therein, for no inquisitions could be taken, and consequently the King could not be entituled to the estate. At the end of these heads was brought in a saving for the Articles of Limerick. This, being entirely foreign and unnecessary, occasioned great jealousies, for none but those who died in rebellion were by this bill to be attainted, and such could not be thought to be comprehended within the Articles. Hence arose a just suspicion of something more intended than was expressed, which let us into some disquisition of the Articles.

“This I spoke to, and will to the best of my remembrance give your Grace an account of what I said; I am sure I'll do it in substance.

“I told them I should not enter into the reasonableness of making those Articles, or the contrary. They were made, and must, in my opinion, be maintained as far as was consistent with the safety of our religion, and as far as his Majesty was in honour bound; which, howmuchsoever to our prejudice, I thought no man in the House would say no to, for that the King's honour (who had done so much for us) ought to be preserved inviolate. What was then properly to be considered fell under two heads. First, how far we could go with safety to our religion established by law. Secondly, how far the King was in honour obliged, for I declared I laid aside all thoughts of the legal part of the sixth Article, being of opinion, that if the King's honour obliged him to more than what is now law, it ought to be supported by a new law.

“As to the first Article, that in my opinion can never be confirmed by Act of Parliament without settling Popery on the same legal foundation that the Protestant religion now is established in this kingdom. The Article says that they shall enjoy the exercise of their religion as they did in the reign of Charles the Second, or as is consonant with the laws of this realm. The latter part they had a right to without the Article, which must be supposed to grant something, and must therefore intend them the same freedom of their religion as they enjoyed in King Charles's time. 'Tis said 'twas then by connivance; this is true; but if this Article be confirmed by Act of Parliament, it can no longer be called or taken to be connivance, but what before was so, will after it obtain the force and have the right of law; and by the last words of the Article (viz., such further security), 'tis plain this was intended by them, for 'further' must imply more than they had before, which is giving them a legal right, when before 'twas matter of favour; and in my humble opinion such a confirmatory Act would repeal the Act of Uniformity, and all the penal laws now in force against Papists.

“The foundation on which the sixth Article stands is this: that putting an end to actions of trespass for what was done during the war, would create a reconciliation between the Irish and the English; and to make the Article seem equitable, both sides are to take advantage by its being reciprocal. If these suggestions on which the Article is grounded prove true, well may the King say he will endeavour to have it ratified in Parliament, for 'tis the interest if so of his people in general to do it.

“Upon these suppositions, I suppose, the Article was assented to. As far as these are of force I think the King obliged in honour, and I humbly hope no farther, for the suggestions are laid down by the Irish as the reasons and equity why they demand the Article. On this we'll join issue with them. As to the reconciliation, two hundred years' experience affords us too many instances that kindness and indulgence will never reclaim the Irish. The conquerors can never be safe against the conquered but by strength. 'Tis indeed the interest of the Irish to be indemnified, and detain what by rapine they now possess; but to say that the English who under pain of death were not to stir out of their parish; who durst not oppose the Irish plundering at noonday; who never did (for they durst not) take a pennyworth from the Irish that can be comprehended within the sense of this Article—to say that they shall be forgiven, in return whereof the Irish who possessed themselves of all the English had,<sup>o</sup> is monstrously gross, and can never be thought reasonable. Nobody will deny but the Irish took all the English had. Now what the English took from the Irish comes under two heads.

“First, what they took from them as enemies, with their swords in their hands : for this no action will lie, and therefore herein the Article is of no advantage to the English.

“Secondly, what they took from them who were under our protection : in this case recoveries have been had in all the parts of the kingdom already ; not an Irishman thus injured who has not been countenanced in his suit. Our protections were to be made good, and this was never thought within the intention of the Article ; where then is the advantage the English have by this Article ? The word reciprocal may make it seem plausible to strangers, but we know 'tis of no advantage to us ; we neither want [n]or desire any advantage or indemnity by it ; we renounce both, as what would lay this blemish on us to posterity, that we who have always complained of the outrages committed by the Irish in former rebellions, have in this last been guilty of the same thing, or we should not need a reciprocal indemnity, and this confirmed by an Act of our own framing.

“Were an Act desired for indemnifying the Irish against such actions as might be brought for trespasses committed in order to the carrying on their common cause, or for such goods, &c. as they had seized by orders of the late King, or had applied to his use, or accounted for to him ; this indeed (though law will not justify them) carries such a face of equity as they may with some reason expect such an indemnity ; and of this nature it seems most reasonable to think were the actions designed to be barred by the Limerick Articles.

“But that outrages which their own laws and government would have punished ; that the Englishmen's goods and estates which they have converted to their own use, and by which they have so much enriched themselves ; that these should be thought within the Articles, or the King obliged in honour to maintain them in this sense, is inconceivable, and it seems reasonable to think that the quantum in nobis est, which his Majesty has been graciously pleased to insert in the confirmation of the Articles under the broad seal, had a special regard to actions of this kind.

“What must certainly put an end at one time or other to these disputes, is an Act of Parliament. Let us then consider how far the King's honour is engaged. Let us put ourselves in their cases, and give them the full extent of that equity we would expect. No more I hope will be demanded. God forbid thus much should be denied. But this proviso is of another nature ; it remits all without discrimination, and therefore I am of opinion it ought not to stand a part of this Bill.

“I have truly given your Grace the sense of what I said, as briefly as I can (though too, too long for your Grace's perusal) ; but I have very good reason to believe that those who have on other occasions represented me so falsely, will not stick at omitting the constant care and tenderness which I expressed (whenever it could properly be brought in) of his Majesty's honour ; which I did not out of form, but with real zeal.

“I am very confident such a Bill might be prepared as would at the same time effectually do it, and by putting a just and equitable construction upon this Article leave the English to recover from those who have now great estates in France the produce of the Englishmen’s goods which they sent thither. This would oblige their bringing them home to satisfy those they have injured, and would quiet the minds of the Protestants; for ’tis not (as has been falsely suggested) the poorer sort they would fall upon out of desire of revenge, but such as are restored to very good estates, or are known to have such in France. This would so settle the affairs of this kingdom as that people would again cheerfully fall to their business, and look forward; but a general Act for confirming the Article will in my humble opinion overthrow all that has hitherto been done.

“I have lately gone through a great part of the kingdom, and could not but observe the general sense the people have of the manner of my Lord Chancellor’s acquittal, which has created such heartburnings as nothing but time can allay. Another Session will I hope prove quieter, before which if something of this nature were thought on, by moderate and unbiassed men, I dare say it might be brought to a good issue.

“I beg your Grace’s believing that what I say on this subject proceeds from a just principle for his Majesty’s service. I ever was led by inclination into his interest; my all depends upon his success and welfare; and therefore I must renounce common sense by declining my own interest whenever I act anything to his disservice. I know the minds of a great many, and am sure we are all in the same bottom.

“We hope that my Lord Deputy does us right in representing us as subjects truly loyal and dutiful. Let our actions be impartially scanned on fair representations, and let us be judged by them. It was not without great reluctancy that we did anything without first consulting his Excellency, but the business of my Lord Chancellor was too nice a thing to be communicated to a chief Governor; we knew he would have interposed for preventing it, and we foresaw, at least apprehended, ruin thereby. I[t] was not choice but necessity put us upon attacking him this Session; he had made a great party by industry, and otherways, in order to get an Address of thanks to him for his good administration, for which they could never have had such proofs as we had ready to every article against him. We had no other way left us to make our grievances known, and do think that such an acquittal has laid no blemish on our cause. We all have and will serve the King faithfully, as any subjects he has, and as such do humbly beg the continuance of your Grace’s protection.

[P.S.] “I have in charge from the County of Cork, for which I serve, to remonstrate the dangerous consequence of my Lord Clancartye’s estate falling into the hands of a Papist, and to offer that the County will for their security become purchasers of it at three score thousand pounds. I have told them that I think this an improper time, resolving to stop it till I had first given your Grace an account of it.”

SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

[16]95, Nov. 22, London.—“I have yours of the 1st, 8th, 12th, and 26th of October, with one of the 2nd November, all o.s., to acknowledge, which the continual motion the King has been in during his late Progress, and the hurry of business since his return, has hindered me doing sooner, for till this morning I could not have an opportunity to receive his Majesty’s directions.

“As soon as Mr. Russell comes back from the country, where he will not continue for above a week to take the air and visit his own house, his Majesty will discourse him and endeavour to be informed if anything can be attempted by our Fleet upon the French ships in the Med[iterranean], or their coasts in these parts.

“His Majesty agrees what you say about the two regiments that are not paid are [is] very reasonable, and recommends it to you to do the best you can that it be done, for to imagine they can be furnished from any other fund is impossible, and the King does not think this a proper time to propose a new capitulation, since that may draw on new demands.

“His Majesty does not only think it reasonable but necessary that those English and Scots which are detained in the Irish Regiments should be delivered, and desires you to represent it as such. Upon these two particulars I am directed to speak to the President de la Tour, which I will not omit the first occasion.

“His Majesty has taken no resolution what ministers he will employ to the States in Italy who have lately acknowledged him; but seems to think it necessary that some man of business should be sent to Genoua. I doubt Sir William Waller will hardly obtain the post he proposes to himself.

“I believe you need not trouble yourself about apprehending Sir James Montgomery, for we here take it for certain that he has been dead many months since in France.

“If your Lordship can bring the matter of the Commerce and the clothing the troops to any good end, you will do a most beneficial service to the public, for the large exportation of our money to the troops, and for the subsidies abroad, is at present the greatest, and I may almost say the only, difficulty we have to struggle with.

“The King positively refuses to give Doctor O’Brien a pass to return to Ireland, and is willing those sort of people should rather be anywhere abroad, and thinks they can do less harm than in his territories.

“His Majesty ordered me to leave your Lordship’s opinion upon what should be undertaken the next year with him, and was pleased to say he would answer that himself.”

SHREWSBURY TO LORD DEPUTY [CAPEL].

1695, Nov. 23, London.—“His Majesty has directed I should lay your Excellency’s letter of the 16th before him, the first time a Committee of Council waits upon him, which I think will be in a day or two.

“I had an opportunity of discoursing his Majesty on that part of the contents of your Excellency’s letter of the 17th, that mentions a design of some of those persons who have been disappointed of success in their prosecution against my Lord Chancellor, to seek for redress here this Session of Parliament, and also of your real endeavours and hope to prevent it. His Majesty commands me earnestly to recommend to your Excellency the using your utmost care and interest to hinder anything of that nature being brought to interrupt and take up our time here. The season is already so far advanced that it is much doubted the many and weighty considerations which the King has this day recommended to them, and others which perhaps will occur to them as necessary, will take up more time than can conveniently be allowed for the Sessions; therefore I find your Excellency can do nothing more agreeable to his Majesty than to stop those gentlemen’s applying themselves here for remedy against Sir Charles Porter. The King commanded me to say these words to you, that he hoped your interest with them would prevail, as you seemed to hope it would; and that for those among them that were his servants, he thought he might expect from them that they would encourage nothing so prejudicial to his service and the common good at this time.

“I do not find the King has any suspicion that impeaching my Lord Chancellor, or any other heats that have arose among you, proceed from any encouragement has been given to them by your Excellency. I cannot say he has the same opinion of some others who serve him in very considerable stations, and nothing will so effectually reconcile his Majesty’s thoughts to them as their promoting moderation upon this occasion.”

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Nov. 23, Dublin Castle.—“I have received your Grace’s of the 14th instant, and am confident it has been through your care that his Majesty has been so fully satisfied in the misrepresentation of Bills instead of heads of Bills delivered to the chief Governor to be laid before the Council, which gives me a fresh opportunity to be sensible how happy we are here under your Grace’s administration; and I dare venture to assure your Grace that, if I may but know what is said against me, it will appear that I act nothing here but for increase of honour to the Crown, and to set this kingdom upon a footing suitable to those ends his Majesty was so graciously pleased to come over for in relief to these poor kingdom’s (sic).

“I am very sensible of your favour in promoting the officers I recommended in Col. Coningham’s Regiment, and most humbly submits (sic) to his Majesty’s placing a Captain Lieutenant upon [e] so personally known to his Majesty.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695, Nov. 24, Kensington.—“King, Archbishop, Lord Privy Seal, Shrewsbury, Lord Steward, Lord Godolphin, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Portland, Mr. Secretary.

“I reported what I said to Sir John Fleet; Mr. Attorney and Solicitor’s opinion that the East India goods could not by law be permitted to be bought; expostulated with him why he told wrongs (sir) as to the coming of the last ships taken; he said he durst not trust the Admiralty with the secret; that nothing but a squadron sent out to sea could do them good; that he was well satisfied with the care taken by the Admiralty of the two expected.

“I told the advices I had from Russe[ll?] of seven ships, and from Brest of three; the first were gone out, the second going.

“The letter from the Admiralty of the 23rd Nov., with the enclosed extra[ct], read.

“That I should speak to the Admiralty to order the victuallers to make an estimate as near as they can of what the[y] suppo[se] the Fleet may spend of fresh provisions and beverage in the sp[er]ing [of] the next year.

“My Lord Deputy’s letter of Nov. 16th, read. My Lord ordered to prosecute those he has full proof against; and the time not allowing an Act to pass this meeting, he should advertise the King of it before the next meeting of Parliament.

“A list of Irish Bills not yet referred was read, and the seven first pub[lic] Bills to be offered and referred on Thursday, and the last private Bill.

“Capt. Wickam’s petition read, and refused.

“The Admiralty gave in a list of 16 ships left by Mr. Russel in the Straits, 13 gone with Sir Geo. Rook, and 6 going. They propose 21 of the Dutch, which in all will be 56. Two of the 6, being ready, are ordered to go with the Dutch ships now coming.

“The Admiralty say they have satisfied the East India Company in sending three men-of-war to cruise off Gallway.

“The Admiralty are ordered to direct the victuallers to send an estimate, as near as they can guess, of what the charge will be the next year in fresh provisions and beverage, as the Fleet is now designed for the Straits.”

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1695, Nov. 29, Whitehall.—“ Having received your Lordship’s letter of the 15–25 Nov. this morning, I had an opportunity of receiving his Majesty’s commands immediately upon that part of it that relates to your endeavouring to incline the undertaking for the next year towards Nice rather than Pignerol. I find the King of opinion that the latter may be of greater advantage to the common cause, and therefore by no means would have you oppose it.

“ His Majesty had not leisure to answer Mr. d’Arselieres’ queries at this time. I shall take the first occasion to know his pleasure upon them.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[1695,] Nov. —, Dublin Castle.—“ Upon the arrival of Mr. Stone yesterday with the Bills, I received your Grace’s of the 19th, 21st and 23rd, and will observe the directions in them all, particularly in what relates to the adjournment of the Parliament, using the utmost of my power and interest to prevent the carrying the Articles against my Lord Chancellor Porter to the Parliament of England; and hitherto have no reason to doubt but what I said in my last to your Grace upon that subject will be performed.

“ I hope I shall make the Sessions short, for all the Bills that have been transmitted I have got ready copied out before Mr. Stone arrived, so that what amendments there are, will be easily supplied by adding a new sheet.

“ I am informed by Mrs. Calvill (sic) that her father, Sir James Caldvill (who is a person here of remarkable merit) has had the promise of a Regiment (if any were raised here) before my recommendation of those in my former letter. He is a person very capable to raise one, and I should be unwilling my recommendation should take place to the prejudice of so meriting a person, and to whom his Majesty is already engaged.”

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695, Dec. 2, o.s., Queen, in Cadiz Bay.—. . . “I do enclose your Grace a copy of the result of a council of flag officers relating to the Turkey convoy, which I thought reasonable to call for my government in a matter of so great concern and consequence, in which I cannot but think we run great risks both in respect of the King’s ships as well as of the commerce; and if this trade would go and come in summer, when we are masters of those seas, it might be carried on without danger to either. . . .

“I do enclose your Grace a list of the ships which came with me, those Mr. Russell left, and those that have gone home out of these seas this last summer; and I am very sorry to tell your Grace the Fleet in general is sickly. It is supposed those ships that came out with me are infected by the raw, undisciplined Regiment we took in at Portsmouth; and the misfortune is that though diseases are introduced by the worst men, yet ’tis observable that when they are confirmed, they generally carry off the best.

“Your Grace sees we are very weak in number, and weaker still in quality; so that I must humbly beg I may have the King’s directions, or at least an intimation from your Grace what his Majesty does expect I shall do. . . . Nor truly can I depend we are secure from being insulted by them where we are, especially if the late difference should dispose this Court to an accommodation with France. . . .

“At my coming from Portsmouth there was, by my lord Romney’s direction to the officers of the Ordnance, 210 barrels of powder shipped for a present for the Dey and Government of Algier; and though I have no other order for its disposal, yet, having seen several advices from the Consul there, that a present of that kind is very earnestly expected by the new Dey from his Majesty, I shall presume to send it by Capt. Clarke in the Humber, who commands the ships going upon that service. . . .

“At my arrival here Capt. Toll, commandant of the Dutch ships, told me he had orders to seize and make prize of all Algerines, wheresoever their ships met them; as also to visit all Genoa’s ships for French goods. Mr. Russell can inform your Grace what has passed on this occasion. . . .

“I do likewise humbly pray your Grace will signify his Majesty’s pleasure whether I may, as I have any opportunity, make overtures of peace to the Emperor of Morocco, and whether I may negotiate the redemption of slaves at Sally or any other ports in his dominion. . . .

“Capt. Coates, of Col. Northcote’s Regiment, being lately dead, the Colonel has desired me to send the enclosed list to your Grace, and prays the commissions may be sent abroad for the supplying the vacancy.”

R. 30. Enclosures:—

“Present: Sir George Rooke, Admiral; David Mitchell, Esq., Vice-Admiral of the Blue; John Nevell, Esq., Rear-Admiral of the Blue; Capt. Bokenham.

“Resolved, that the standing convoy for the Turkey ships do consist of four men-of-war, two for Smyrna and two for Scanderoon; and that they be accompanied with a squadron of four or five men-of-war and two fire-ships as far as Cape Mattapan, or higher, as shall be found advisable from the circumstance of wind and weather, and intelligence which they may have of the station or motion of the enemies’ ships; and that the said squadron be ordered in their return to touch at Algiers, and cross over to Allicant, and so come down along the coast of Spain, unless they be advised the enemy has a stronger squadron on that coast.”

SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

1695, Dec. 3, Whitehall.—Trusts he has arrived at Cadiz. It is reported in France that they design setting out their fleet at Toulon early this spring. Dutch and English ships will be sent to strengthen him.

“In return to the affront [which] has been offered Mr. Schonenberg at the Court of Spain, who it seems has a character from the King as well as from the States of Holland, the Spanish Ambassador here has been forbid the Court, and told that no memorial will be received from him till satisfaction be given in the business of Mr. Schonenberg.

“The enclosed papers are copies of three letters from one White, brother to Albeville, to his correspondent in Holland. The thing seems very chimerical; but he is so earnest and particular in these and others he has writ on the same subject that I thought it worth informing you of, it being not difficult for you to know the truth of the fact; and if there were anything in it, 'twere to be wished the advantage<sup>o</sup> he proposes should not be disposed of, as he designs, to the enemies both of England and Spain.

[P.S.] “I have not heard one word of Nickson since you went.”

SHREWSBURY TO MR. BRODRICK.

1695, Dec. 3, Whitehall.—“I have received your letter of the 21st Nov., and shall take the best occasions I can find to make use of the account you give me to the advantage of the public, and your own justification.

“There is something appears very considerable in the postscript of your letter, concerning the 60,000 which you say the County of Cork would give for my Lord Clancarty's estate. Before I mention anything of it to the King, I desire to know whether it be meant over and above the incumbrances I understand are upon it to his sisters and mother, or whether that (sic) must be deducted. I have often heard the prejudice it would be to have that estate fall into Popish hand[s], and should willingly contribute to any just method to prevent it.”

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Dec. 4, Dublin Castle.—“Were it not the close of the Sessions, and that I had received your letter of the 23rd past, in what manner his Majesty would have the Sessions closed, I should not give you this constant trouble of our proceedings here.

“Mr. Stone arrived here last Friday, and by having the Bills already copied from the Rolls, in paper, before the return of the transmission, I am so forward in the money Bills, namely the Poll Bill, and that for an imposition upon Tobacco, &c., that tomorrow I hope to give the Royal assent to them both; and I have no reason to doubt but in few days after I shall be able to get the Bill of Additional Duty of Excise to be also ready for the Royal assent; though I must acquaint your Grace that some few creatures of my Lord of Ormond's (who always join with my Lord Chancellor's) moved to have the money Bills stopped till they had an account what was become of the other Bills sent over, and also of the Bill of Rights, delivered by both Houses to my Lord Deputy. But this made as little impression as Sir John Edgworth's motion some days before, that the House would be pleased to pay my Lord of Ormond's debts.

"My Lord, I doubt not but I shall still be able to prevent any agents here from interrupting his Majesty's affairs in the Parliament of England, but in the transaction of this matter I do observe the aversion to my Lord Chancellor Porter to be great. The King's servants and officers of the Army have been very active and zealous in preventing any meetings that might tend to that end; though I must acquaint your Grace, that my Lord Chancellor's party continue to have great and frequent meetings.

"There happened the other day a very extraordinary Petition to the House, viz., that his Majesty might be addressed to on behalf of an Irish Papist, who now stands outlawed. It was brought in by one Mr. Caughlan, the head of my Lord Chancellor's party, and spoke to by Sir Joseph Williamson and Sir John Meade, one a Privy Councillor, and the other the King's counsel at law; but the House rejected it.

"I account myself very happy that by your Grace's of the 23rd past, I find no marks of his Majesty's displeasure to me, from the heats that has [have] arose in the business of my Lord Chancellor. I do most humbly beg of his Majesty (and from your Grace's constant friendship towards me, I hope, I may expect it) that before any impression be made to my prejudice (who am in a station that may cause me many enemies) I may be heard either by myself or friends; for as there is nothing I profess or practice but what I hope tends to his Majesty's service, so their construction of my actions can never do me harm whilst your Grace does friendly offices in my behalf, and gives his Majesty a true representation thereof.

[P.S.] "I hope there will be care taken not [to?] revers[e] Sir Patrick Trant's outlawry, for here are many charges laid upon him by the Protestants."

Re. 21.

THO. BRODRICK TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Dec. 4, Dublin.—"I should not presume giving your Grace the trouble of this, but that when we thought all private matters would have given way to the dispatch of the money Bills, and those other excellent laws which his Majesty has been graciously pleased to transmit to us, a very unpleasing petition was brought into our House by Mr. Coghlan, and supported by most of my Lord Chancellor's party with great earnestness (for some left him). The petition was of one Gohogan, who (as I am informed) has a petition now lying before his Majesty. He sets forth that being in protection he was barbarously used and his wife killed by some of our Army, and therefore prayed the intercession of the House of Commons for his Majesty's leave to reverse his outlawry, in order to be restored to his forfeited estate.

"The case appeared thus. The officer who commanded the party, and I believe used him severely enough, alleges that he had certain intelligence of Gohogan's constant entertaining the Rapparees, and giving them notice from time to time of our men's marching; and that at the time when he fell upon him sixteen Rapparees were in his house. This was not denied, but 'twas said that he entertained them for fear, not out of any love. But we had reason to believe to the contrary from the information of a member who commanded a party of the militia quartered near Gohogan's, who assured us that they were continually alarmed from the village where Gohogan lived.

"The debate continued long with very great warmth, but at length we had the good fortune to put a negative on receiving the petition; it being plain that (supposing him forced out of our quarters, as was alleged) he was in no worse condition as to his real estate than he would have been had he stayed, for those who took protection on his Majesty's Declaration were restorable only to their personal estates. The mystery lay here: Gohogan was an instance given of the Lords Justices favouring the Irish; the first pretence for their putting him into possession of his estate, which he yet continues, was, that he pretended to be comprehended in the Limerick Articles; but this appearing notoriously otherways, he was now to be represented as an object of his Majesty's compassion in the opinion of the House of Commons, and consequently the Lords Justices' favour well placed. This I believe was the design, but few put so favourable a construction upon it, saying publicly that the mask is taken off, and the Irish more openly avowed by my Lord Chancellor than ever. A further delay in a cause long depending in Chancery between Sir Arthur Gore and my Lord Dillon in favour of the latter, confirms this opinion in very many; so that our feuds and animosities are likelier to increase than end.

"We yesterday sent the Bill for an additional duty on Tobacco, &c. to the Lords, and this day the Poll Bill, which was opposed by a very considerable man of my Lord Chancellor's party, and seconded by another of them, and a motion [was made?] for stopping it till his Excellency were addressed to know what was become of the Habeas Corpus Bill and the Bill of Rights. This I mention to your Grace because malice itself cannot accuse any of us of delaying the King's supplies. My Lord Athlone's Bill was this day read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed, and on occasion of it an Address voted, praying that his Majesty would please to declare the commencement of the war.

"The Lords have thrown out an Act against excessive gaming, for that racing is named in it, which the Northern men conceive to be a great discouragement to their breeding horses.

“The two money Bills, and such others as are ready, will I presume have the Royal Assent on Friday.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Dec. 7-17, Turin.—Has been informed by his R.H. of the design for attacking Pignerol, and that Prince Eugene would meet Prince Louis of Baden at Vienna, where measures would be taken with this object. Lord Lexington will report what is settled at Vienna. His R.H. has been reforming his Piedmontese regiments, and will not allow more than five French deserters to be retained in each company. This will affect not less than 2,000 men. Hopes it will be possible to prevent them from returning to France. A man at Final, named John Babbiste Grosso, a subject of the King of Spain—who rendered some service in the debarcation of about 300 Swiss, whom the writer caused to come from Catalogne to recruit Saconay's regiment—asks for a patent from the King to be consul on this coast.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95, Dec. 10, Dublin Castle.—“ Having last Saturday given the Royal assent to twelve of the 18 Bills re-transmitted and brought by Mr. Stone, and there appearing not the least unquiet temper in the House, I am in hopes that by the end of next week I may pass the other money Bill, together with all the rest of the Bills, and so end the Sessions by an adjournment, pursuant to his Majesty’s commands, to the 28th of March next.

“ There has happened in the House of Lords a commitment of the Bishop of Waterford for some passages in his protest against a Bill (thrown out, for the uniting of parishes), which the Lords conceived reflected upon the honour of the House. It was difficult for to prevail with him to submit to the pleasure of the House, but the Lords have been pleased to allow me so much credit as, bearing with his temper (and in respect to his coat), to admit him this day to his place again without going to the Bar or reprimanding him in his place.

“ Give me leave, my Lord, to add some few expressions of my own to your Grace upon the present conjuncture, in reference to the report we have here, that the majority of this House of Commons are truly disposed to support his Majesty and this interest.

“ I conceive things were never more promising in order to set the King upon a right bottom since his being upon the throne as [than] now ; and therefore I heartily wish (as I have ever done) that since the people have made choice of such Members whose principles suit with that interest which can only support his Majesty, we may lay aside all such practices as have hitherto been too much put in execution, I mean, the ill characters, and undermining one another, to the dishonour of ourselves, and prejudice to the public and the King’s affairs. This will be a part your Grace’s excellent temper is able to prevent ; and though I am a person of the lowest character of those that pretend to serve this interest, yet the satisfaction I shall receive by your accomplishing so great a thing will add to the great esteem I have for your Grace’s administration of affairs.

[P.S.] “ Oblige me by telling Mr. Russell these my poor apprehensions. I have frequently expressed the same to him before I came over, and to Mr. Wharton, when here. I hope your Grace remembers Brigadier Wolseley.”

THO. BRODRICK TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Dec. 10, Dublin.—“ I have the honour of your Grace’s of the 3rd, and do humbly presume to acquaint your Grace that out of the sixty thousand pounds offered for the Earl of Clancarty’s estate, all legal incumbrances are to be deducted, of which I humbly conceive there are none other than the mother’s dower, and what his Majesty shall be graciously pleased to allow the daughters.

“The mother is rightly entitled to dower, but then she is accountable to the King for the profits of the whole estate, which she received during the minority of the now Earl; nay, even [in] the time of the war she received full rent.

“The daughters have no legal demand, nor is the estate chargeable with any more or other sum than his Majesty shall please to allow. The mother’s portion was but fifteen hundred pounds, which is usually some guide in ascertaining the daughters’.

“Upon the whole matter I am humbly of opinion that with prudent and just management the estate will yield fifty thousand pounds over and above the mother’s dower, and very good portions for the daughters.

“The offer was made by the Protestants of that county with regard to their future security, more than to any advantage in a bargain. The dangerous consequence of that estate’s falling into Popish hands your Grace is sensible of. It has twice ruined Munster. The estate is very much worsted (sic), and will daily be more so by felling timber, which I fear turns very little to the King’s profit.”

Remarks on designs and preparations for the next campaign; the regiments of Comercy and Hanover being mentioned. The decision must come from Vienna. Hopes Lord Lexington is fully informed of the King’s intentions. News from Toulon that the French are pressing all sailors, as if they intended to make some great armament in good time. It is the common opinion that they will risk the passage of the ships now at Toulon into the Ocean before our Fleet can leave Cadiz. Trusts Sir George Rooke has orders to act in concert with him. 1695, Dec. 17-27, Turin.—Will join those who urge the attack on Pignerol, since the King approves of it. There is much talk of Prince Eugene being sent into Hungary, and of some one else being appointed commander of the Emperor’s troops here. Doubts if the Emperor has a man in his service fit for the post. Is glad the King is going to send a minister to Genoa. It is absolutely necessary to have an Englishman there; he should be empowered to deal with the question of commerce with this country, and to maintain the interests of our merchants. Thinks Sir James Montgomery may have himself circulated the report of his death. A Scotch gentleman declares positively that he has seen him. Will urge with moderation the dismissal of the English and Scotch Protestants, and the payment for the winter-quarters of the two Regiments.

1695, Dec. 21, Turin.—Sends a copy of the project sent by his Royal Highness to the Emperor by the hands of Prince Eugene. The Duke of Savoy prays the King to send him some “ bombardiers et canoniers.” His Royal Highness will dismiss the English who are found among his troops. Will send them to Flanders as soon as the weather permits. Hopes the Prince will act justly with regard to the payment for the winter-quarters of the two Regiments of the King’s troops. M. de Leganès has been here some days. M. le Conte Vernon arrived at the same time, returning from his voyage to Spain; it would have been better if he had never made it, as it has been of little benefit to the service of his master, and he reports everything that can alienate the Prince, not only the bad government of that State, and the little hope there is of his being paid the subsidies promised him by that Crown, but also the sentiments of that Court touching his conduct. He says that the Marquis de los Babbases told him that his Royal Highness keeps in his coffers the money given him, maintaining no more than 6,000 men, and these only militia. The reply to the Count's proposition that the government of the Milanese should be given to his Royal Highness was, that it might have been entertained directly after the battle of Stafarde, but they no longer had need of him. The Count states that there is a large French party in the Spanish Court, and urgent for peace. Demolition of Casal, &c.

Project for the siege of Pignerol, showing the number of troops, officers, gunners, horses, &c., required, including the following "Englishmen": 1 commander, 2 captains, 2 lieutenants, 24 "bombistes," 5 captains of "canonniers," and 80 "canonniers." The King of Great Britain and his Royal Highness together will furnish 15,000 infantry. The former is to be urged by the Emperor's Ambassador to give orders to the commander of his Fleet and that of Holland in the Mediterranean Sea, to debark part of the infantry on board his vessels at Final, or at any other place which shall be indicated to him, in order to join the Allies' troops before Pignerol.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Dec. 21, Turin.—Understands that the King wishes him to press for the payment of M. Boit, formerly British consul at Nisse. Is afraid his representations will not be attended to, as he is known to be a friend of M. Boit. Shrewsbury should speak with warmth to M. de la Tour on the subject. The ministers of his Royal Highness admit that M. Boit lent his money at a time of great necessity.

LETTER FROM PARIS.

[1695, Dec. 22–]1696, Jan. [1], Paris.—“Extrait d’une lettre écrite de Paris dans le commencement de Janvier 1696.

“Que l’on se tienne sur ses gardes en Angleterre, car la France trame une grande entreprise sur ce Royaume. La Flotte doit tenter à tout prix le passage du Détroit sur la fin de ce mois, et par le premier temps le Roy Jacques la doit monter avec quantité de troupes et aborder, veu ses diligences dont il se flatte plus que jamais ; et de tous les Seigneurs Anglois qui étoient avec luy en France la plupart est partie pour l’Angleterre, sous pretexte d’obeir au dernier Parlement ; mais le veritable sujet est de les fomenter davantage, et preparer toutes choses pour une heureuse reception. L’on a desarmé les dix vaisaux de Canada, et fait mander les mariniers à Toulon, où 66 vaisaux étoient déjà tout prêts. Enfin, les dispositions méritent que l’on s’y prepare aussi, et je vous prie de ménager ce que je vous dis, me l’ayant été secrètement communiqué, et que les deux Roys ont été pour cela en longue conference ensemble.”

SHREWSBURY TO LORD DEPUTY [CAPEL].

1695, Dec. 24, Whitehall.—“Having acquainted his Majesty with the contents of several of your Excellency’s letters which came many together the 21st and 22nd of this month, I find the King perfectly well satisfied with your Excellency’s behaviour in this whole Session, and not so displeased with those gentlemen you mention as to give any ground, that I can perceive, for what you apprehend. He is mighty desirous, if it were possible, that the differences concerning my Lord Chancellor might be reconciled, and thinks it would be an ill precedent to be obliged to remove a man upon the dislike of a party in the House of Commons, when what his enemies would charge him with appears to his Majesty of no great weight. Upon these considerations he commanded me to use my small interest to incline you to be assisting in it.” . . .

SHREWSBURY TO MR. BRODRICK.

[16]95, Dec. 24, Whitehall.—“I have received your letters of the 4th and the 10th. The design of Gohogan’s petition appears very odd, and the consequences well stopped in the House of Commons. I do not find but the King is extremely satisfied with the conclusion of the Sessions, and only wishes that the heats and animosities about my Lord Chancellor were not so great, or at least that they might be reconciled or moderated.

"I think his Majesty relishes very well what you propose about my Lord Clancarty's estate, and is abundantly convinced much more is offered than ever he shall make of it, in the method it is in. He told me he would speak to me again of it, and in the mean time bid me write something that might not discourage you. I tell you just the truth, which is what you shall always have from," &c.

LETTER FROM GENOA.

[1695, Dec. 27—]1696, Jan. 6, n.s., Genoa.—An English captain has arrived here from Thoulon. The French are diligently fitting their fleet, to leave for West France speedily, &c.

"The poor English seamen here, being above twenty in number, have been most inhumanly treated by the French, having been kept by them above two months on board their man-of-war whilst they were cruising, hardly allowing them any subsistence; and although, when the said ship was at Leghorne, the English consul made instance for their releasement, together with their commander, it was denied, notwithstanding the capitulations reciprocally agreed on. At their arrival at Thoulon, they were not permitted the least stay in the town to refresh themselves, &c."

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1695, Dec. 30; Queen, at Cadiz.—"I have received your Grace's letter of the 3rd instant, with some papers enclosed relating to wrecks on this coast, of which I have particularly informed myself, and herewith enclose your Grace a copy of the account; and in my poor opinion, whoever the undertakers are, the advantage of their work will not answer the expense of it; for as many of these wrecks as are to be come at, have been drained already, and those that lay in sand, especially if it be anything loose, must be buried in the ground as well as under water; for we have the experience of that in England, as the Windsor Castle, who was lost on the Goodwyn Sand—her whole fabric was in four days' time sucked in and buried; and the wreck from which the great treasure was taken in the West Indias lay upon rocks, where the water was generally still and very transparent, which it seldom or never is here."

Will be glad to see the promised ships arrive. "I hope the enemy cannot hurt us without this Court comes to an accommodation with them. . . . Nor am I at all apprehensive of these people without the assistance and joined force of the French; for God knows we have their miserable armada entirely at our mercy; I am sure I can burn them when I please with two long boats." . . .

R. 17 Jan. 95. Enclosure :—

[Report on Wrecks in Cadiz Bay.]

"In obedience to your desire I have made the best inquiry I can about what ships from the West Indies and other Spanish ships have been lost near this place, and what I have learned thereabout is as follows.

"In Cromwell's wars with Spain, in the destruction that General Blake made of the Spanish West India ships, he burnt two galleons, merchantmen, to the S.W. of this city; the one about a league and a half from the town called the Calderon . . . ; the other galleon called the Catalina lies about two leagues from the town, in a place called the Anegadas, in four-fathom water and sandy ground." . . .

Similar particulars as to other ships lost on several occasions. (They appear to have contained considerable riches, which were to be recovered.)

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

16[95], Dec. 31, Dublin Castle.—"I understand by Sir Francis Brewster that he has humbly offered to your Grace a petition, which you have been pleased to lay once before his Majesty, but had not then time to give any answer to it, and that my appearing in his behalf might be of some use to him. I am indeed obliged to comply with him in his request, for though my acquaintance with Sir Francis Brewster has only been since his Majesty's first intentions were to send me hither, yet the trust I have reposed in him by [of?] disposing the minds of men to an effectual success in Parliament in his Majesty's affairs has been so prudently and zealously performed by him, that I am obliged to serve him in what lies in my power; and therefore, if his Majesty will please to grant a reference to me upon his petition, I will endeavour to make such report thereupon as may answer his merits, and be consistent with his Majesty's service.

“ I cannot omit to add one thing more. This gentleman was of great use to me when heats arose in that personal matter that has made such a noise, and was the principal person I depended upon in giving me calculations that were the most likely to prove true upon the funds of money granted to his Majesty by the Parliament.”

SHREWSBURY to LORD DEPUTY [CAPEL].

1695-6, Jan. 2, London.—“I received yours of the 23rd Dec. with the enclosed papers relating to a dispute between your Excellency and my Lord Chancellor about admitting Mr. Neave and Mr. Ormesby, the one to be second Sergeant, the other to be of the King’s Counsel, as also a former letter from your Excellency upon the same subject. Upon the receipt of that first letter I endeavoured to discourse his Majesty, but found him then unwilling, having not received my Lord Chancellor’s letter, which he thought reasonable to see before he took any resolution. Since that time I have been indisposed with a fit of the gravel, so that till this evening I have had no opportunity of waiting upon his Majesty; but tonight he commanded me to assure you that he would maintain your Excellency in those rights that belong to your employment, being very well satisfied with your service in the station you are in; but his Majesty said he must take some farther time to consider of the particulars before he came to such a resolution as to give any direction positively in it. . . .

1695-6, Jan. 4-14, Turin.—Sends him a copy of a letter from Genoa, and another copy to Mr. Stanhope, to be forwarded to Sir George Rook. Has given orders to the writer of that letter to send a man express to Toulon, to learn more precisely what the French are doing. Does not believe they can despatch this fleet from Toulon without sailors from the west. Yesterday we had a long conference with the commissaries named by his Royal Highness for the establishment of commerce. One of them, the General of the Finances, is opposed to it. His Royal Highness thinks the French party is dominant in Spain, but does not seem to be annoyed thereat; and the Marquis de St. Thomas looks upon Spain as a mad patient, who must not be deserted. Has received from the Marquis copies of the Pope's brief in favour of peace, and the Prince's reply. Sends a copy of a letter from Paris. Trusts Admiral Rook has orders to follow up the French if they pass the Strait.

T[o] enlarge upon the intelligence, and the diversity we receive from several parts, and doubt whether the French are as strong as mentioned in my former letter; but if the French shall endeavour to pass with such a strength as he thinks superior to his, that he calls a council of war, and acts according to their opinion; and if (sic) in case they shall think it not advisable to engage the enemy, that then he endeavour to follow them, and to return home with the whole Fleet.

“That the King hoped the Fleet might be ready sooner than the beginning of March, but recommends to him to be ready as soon as may be, and that he will clean his ships with regard to the accounts he will receive of the French preparations.

“Sir Geo. Rooke to correspond with Lord Gallway. That he should be always upon the watch, unless his intelligence secures him that they will not come out.

“That he may visit the Genoese ships for French goods in the same manner as his Majesty has given orders to the Dutch to do.

“About Capt. Tolls he will hear by the next post.

“That against the next post he shall have power under the Great Seal to treat peace; and for redemption of slaves he has now a power sent him. Thus far the letter to Sir Geo. Rooke.

“In the letter that I writ by the<sup>d</sup> squadron that goes from Portsmouth, and that carries the instructions of the Dec. SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

1695-6, Jan. 6, London.—“I have received your letter of Dec. the 2nd, and at a Committee of the Council laid it before his Majesty, who commands me to tell you that he is much concerned to hear that you have resolved at this time to send away the Turkey Fleet, and to weaken your strength by detaching eight or nine men-of-war, four as convoy throughout the whole voyage, and the rest to accompany them to the Cape Mattapan; that if he did not conclude it were now too late, he would send you orders not to divide your force, or to recall any [it] might be yet in your power to stop; but he is still in hopes the intelligence you will have received of the preparations the French make at Toulon to endeavour to pass the Straits, may put a stop to what you intended when you writ your last letter.” If it be too hazardous to stop the enemy, he is to return home.

“His Majesty was in hopes the ships under your command would have been ready for service before the beginning of March.” Some Dutch and English ships are at Spithead, about to sail to Rooke.

“His Majesty does direct that you correspond with my Lord Gallway, his envoy at the Duke of Savoy’s Court, who will not only be able to give you good advices of what is doing in Provence, but may also propose schemes for the public service the next summer. His Majesty does likewise think fit that you visit and search Genoese ships for French goods, in the same manner as the Dutch do. ## SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

1695-6, Jan. 7, Whitehall.—“Yours of the 7-17, 14-24, 17-27 December, which came all together, were read to the King, and one enclosed, delivered to his Majesty, who commands me to tell you he continues still in the opinion that Pignerol is the best design can be formed, but agrees with your doubts, that you are hardly strong enough in foot for so great an attempt. His Majesty has it under his consideration to send some fit person to reside at Genoua, but has not yet nominated who it shall be.

“Sir George Rooke has directions to correspond with your Lordship, and I hope you will give accounts of whatever you think may be for the service. We begin to take it for granted that the French will attempt to pass the Straits; I hope we shall be in a condition to hinder them. ## CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95-6, Jan. 11, Dublin Castle.—“’Tis with infinite satisfaction I have received your Grace’s of the 24th of December, wherein you tell me that his Majesty is pleased with my behaviour this Sessions. In the same letter, and in another of the 2nd of January relating to the dispute between the Chancellor and myself, about his refusing to admit Mr. Neave to be the King’s Serjeant, and Mr. Ormsby of his Counsel, pursuant to the warrants I sent him, your Grace also tells me that his Majesty would maintain me in those rights that belong to my employment, but is mighty desirous, if it were possible, that the differences between us might be reconciled, and was concerned at this accident, concluding it must certainly aggravate this difference, whereas he did and does extremely wish it might be sincerely composed.

“It has ever been my resolution, and shall always be my practice, to do my duty in such ways and manner as shall be most agreeable to his Majesty, and nothing but a true regard to his interest and service shall ever at any time prevail with me to forbear the doing anything I think may be acceptable to him; and even then I shall only with all humility offer my thoughts to his Majesty, and submit them to his gracious pleasure.

“As for my Lord Chancellor, I have ever behaved myself with great civility towards him, and paid him all the respect due to his station, and in the heats and prosecutions against him in Parliament I never interposed to his prejudice. This is evident by the Commissioners of the Revenue and their collectors and clerks (many of them being of the House) all voted [voting] for him, which, had I showed any dislike to, they would not have done, receiving their salaries quarterly by the allowance or approbation of the Chief Governor. But my Lord Chancellor has not dealt with me after the same manner, for his friends upon all occasions have appeared against me, and those that had any dependence upon his office, or relation to himself, continually showed themselves in opposition to me, and were against my being so much as named in the Address; and for himself, after what I had done for his brother and those he recommended to me, to refuse to comply with my warrants in behalf of Mr. Neave and Mr. Ormsby, and to tell me openly he would represent the matter to the King, is certainly to endeavour, as much as in him lies, to lessen me in the esteem of the people here, and to render me unworthy of the great trust his Majesty has reposed in me.

“And now, my Lord, if I cannot profess so sincere a friendship to Sir Charles Porter as I find may be expected from me, I must humbly crave leave to say that 'tis not from any resentment I retain of his behaviour towards me, but purely in duty to the King, and with regard to the allegiance I ought [owe] him, without any other consideration whatever. For, by what I have observed of the Chancellor since my coming into this kingdom, and of his acting here, I have good reason to believe he is not so hearty as he should be to the present Government, and that he has given occasion enough to others to suspect him as one that without much difficulty might be reconciled to the late King's interest.

“Supposing, then, that his integrity to the King is not unquestionable, but that it remains in the balance, and doubtful which way it inclines, I appeal to your Grace, and desire you will well consider it, of what consequence it may be to his Majesty's and the Protestant interest in this kingdom, for me by an undecent compliance to debase the authority the King has put into my hands, which I am sure I shall ever make use of for his service only, and to exalt the power of the Chancellor, which 'tis more than probable he may employ for the preservation and support of the Jacobite and Popish interest, and for the covering of the corruptions of several of the officers and persons here, which I cannot discountenance with any success whilst he continues to keep the Seals.

[P.S.] “My Lord Abercorne goes for England this post. He is a fair conditioned gentleman, and has been of use to me this Sessions in the Lords' House.”

[16]95-6, Jan. 16, Dublin Castle.—“Your Grace's of the 7th instant came safe to me, together with a copy of your Grace's to my Lord Chancellor's (sic) by the King's commands to obey my warrant, which he accordingly did.

“My Lord, your friendship and support of me has never more appeared than by obtaining his Majesty's orders in this particular, where the sword and my honour was so much concerned.”

CAPTAIN SCOTT'S DISCOVERY.

[16]95[-6], Jan. 18.—“Captain John Scott's List of the persons whom he knew to be in France when he was there contains an account of—“Dukes 2, Earls and Lords 12, Knights 8, other persons of quality 23, Bishops 1, Ministers 3, Counsellors at Law, 2, ordinary gentlemen and other persons 24, Popish clergymen 5, gentlewomen 4, Lieut. Generals 1, Major Generals 2, Colonels 6, Lieut. Colonels 3, Majors 3, Captains, Lieutenants, and Ensigns, 33.

“The Captain’s narrative of what he knows since the 25th day of Sept. 1690.

“Page 1. Takes notice of Mrs. Billop and Mr. Johnston, a Benedictine, in Summersett House, who befriended him, and endeavoured to procure him passage beyond sea.

“Page 2. Says that one Mrs. Harris, in Southampton Street, who sells East India goods, has frequent cabals of the Jacobites at her house, in pretence of coming to buy goods.

“Page 4. Says that Mrs. Middlegast in St. James’ Street, next door to the Fox, befriended him in his imprisonment, and acquainted him that King James at his going off entrusted his seal with Sir Theophilus Oglethorp’s Lady, to be delivered to the Archbishop of Canterbury as a token of his resolution to preserve the Protestant Religion, and to desire him to use his interest in his absence; but the said Archbishop refusing the seal, Madam Oglethorp carried [it] over to King James in France privately.

“Page 5. That he went to France, and stayed at St. German’s seventeen days, where he saw the Earls of Dumfermlin, Wigton, [and] Dundee, Sir William Wallis, and the Duke of Gordon. That the Earl of Melfort gave him a letter by King James’s his (sic) order to the Commissar[y] of Lisle to enter him into subsistence. That he discoursed the Duke of Gordon in his way thither at Paris. That he saw at Lisle Capt. Twightly, commandant for the Scots and English there, who went with him to the Commissary, and got him entered into subsistence. That during his stay there Capt. Scot, brother to the Earl of Tarras, deserted thither out of O’Farrel’s Regiment. That David Lindsay, formerly secretary of the Earl of Melfort, came thither in his way from Paris to England, as did also Madam Sackville. That Capt. McAdam came thither from England, and that Capt. Summervail and Capt. Davidson deserted thither. That on the 11th of April, 1692, seventy Scots and English officers who were on subsistence at Lisle, were ordered by the French Court to march to Normandy, where they were to receive further orders, and received each man a month’s pay.

“Page 6. That when they arrived at Haver du Grace, they found M. G[en.] Buchan, M. G[en.] Cannon, and Col. Broun, with 50 or 60 officers from Scotland. That the said M. Generals and other great officers had been with King James at La Hogue. That M. G[en.] Buchan by his orders carried all the Scots back to Dunkirk, where they arrived May the 1st, 1692, leaving Lieut.-Col. Scott behind to receive King James’ orders, and come express with them to Dunkirk as soon as King James was embarked; the Scots officers being ready to sail with the first fair wind in two frigates, one commanded by Capt. Mesterton, an Irishman, and the other by a Frenchman. They had 500 saddles, 500 bridles, and 500 carbines, ready to embark, and about 100 Scots officers besides General officers, Colonels, Lieut.-Cols., and Majors, with the Earls of Dumfermling, Wigton, and Dundee, the Lord Dunkell, Sir Wm. Wallis, Sir Geo. Barclay, and Sir Geo. Hamilton. That on the news of the defeat of the French fleet all the Scots officers were removed to Bourbourg by the Governor of Dunkirk; and while they were there a letter arrived from King James, taking off the French King's subsistence, and reducing Cols. to half a crown per day, Lt.-Cols. to 25*d.*, Majors to 20*d.*, Captains, Lieuts., and Ensigns to 10*d.*

“Page 7. That the Lords and General officers returning to Paris and St. German's, it was ordered by a council of war that a company should be made up of the Scots officers and sent to Catalonia, at which many grumbled, but wanting money they complied; and being about 80 gentlemen, who had all been commission officers, they were reviewed by the King himself. Col. Broun was made their Captain, Lt.-Col. Gordon and Lt.-Col. Scott first and second Lieutenants, and Major James Buchan Ensign; and Lt.-Col. Scott stayed behind for 45 more, who were marching from Arras, so that officers and all they made up 120; King James having declared that he would subsist none below Majors, but only ten at St. German's; and so they marched for Catalonia in October, 1692.

“Ibid. He says that Lieut. Hickfirt, an Englishman, and Mr. McDonald, cousin to the Captain of the Clan Renold, and he himself being on their way from Bourbourg to Paris—that Lieut. Hickfirt told him that my Lord ——, the Duke of Powis's son, had a regiment of horse ready to join King James upon his landing, and that he himself was a Captain-Lieut. of that same Regiment.

“Ibid. He says that he conversed with one Mr. Thomson in the Scots' College at Paris in Sept. 1692, who told him that he was going for Scotland in a little time after, as accordingly he did.

“Page 8. He says that he heard of Lieut.-Col. Fountain's being at St. German's about Christmas, 1692, but did not tarry long there, and was only seen by a few; that he cannot give any account what his business was, but supposes that Sir William Wallis can.

“Ibid. That in January he saw one James Smith, a merchant in Aberdeen, at St. German's, and about that same time one Mr. Melvin arrived from the Earl of Perth to his brother, the Earl of Melfort. That the said Mr. Melvin told him that he came from Aberdeen in a ship belonging to his own brother-in-law. That he was set ashore in Zealand, and being afraid that the Scots' Conservator should have notice of him, he sent his letters forward to Paris, and hastened thither himself all that he could. That he stayed at the Scots' College in Paris till he was dispatched back again to Scotland.

“Page 9. He says that Mr. Bell, a minister, son to Provost Bell of Glasgow, came to St. German's about that same time in company with Baily Kilhegens. That Mr. Bell stayed about three months, and returned again to Scotland. That Baily Kilhegens pretended to come on the account of a ship loaden with herrings which was taken from him by the French, and in his discourse used to talk much of the Earl of Arran, and of his having been often in company with him. That about the end of December, 1692, Baily Kilhegens got his pass, and before he went Capt. Scot saw him in King James's bedchamber, and called thence into the King's closet, where he was private with him a considerable time, and was seen no more about Court, but went next day for Paris.

"Page 10. He says that there came so many over from Scotland that winter to St. German's, as Stenop's two brothers, the two Capt. Murrays, and Capt. Murray, son to the late Deputy Governor of the Castle of Edinburgh, Capt. Wallis, Lieut. Johnson, and divers others. That in the beginning of March, 1692, the King called a council of war at the Duke of Berwick's lodgings, where there sat the Duke of Barwick (sic), with M. G[en]. Buchan, M. G[en]. Cannon, and M. G[en]. Wachop. All the officers were ordered to appear before them, and told one by one that the King, being short of money, could keep them no longer in subsistence, but had reserved four months' subsistence for each of them to go where they pleased, and they should have passes, but that the King would be content that they should serve in the Army.

"Page 11. He adds that every one of the officers were [was] required to give in a memorial to the council of war, containing an account of themselves, and what they resolved to do, that the same might be showed to the King; which was accordingly done, and divers of them expressed their desire to return to Scotland. That about the latter end of March the King's answer came out upon every memorial, with orders to deliver 60 livres to each man, and those that desired it were allowed to go to Scotland; and it was proposed to them to go in the ship bound from Dunkirk to the Basse, but no ship could be had at that time, so that every one behaved to go the best way he could; and Mr. Davidson, the Earl of Dumfermlin's servant, and several others went off then.

"Ibid. That the Earl of Middleton arrived at St. German's about that time, and was carried by the Earl of Melfort in one of the King's coaches to the French King at Versailles, but his news and business was kept private.

"Page 12. That Capt. Stewart, son to a north country laird, chamberlain to D. [the Duke of] Gordon, procured a pass for Scotland, as did also Capt. Murray, brother to Stenop; but Capt. Scot was denied one, and entered on subsistence.

"Ibid. That in January, 1694, Mr. Kenneth McKenzie, the Earl of Seaforth's brother, came from Catalonia, and obtained money and a passport to go for Scotland, as did also Capt. Kenneth Orchart of Cromartie.

"Ibid. That Madam Sackfild came from England about the same time and brought a box with her to the Countess of Melfort, well packed and very heavy.

"Ibid. That in March or April, 1694, my Lord Griffin came over from England, and not long after that Sir James Mongomerie of Skelmorly.

"Ibid. That in the latter end of June or beginning of July there arrived from England one Thomas Robinson, a young man of his acquaintance, from the Lady Griffin, and being plundered and stripped by the Spaniards, and thereby rendered unfit to go abroad, he sent for Capt. Scot, and desired him to draw up a memorial for him, which was to be given to the King by the Lady Elizabeth Hackett, alias De Lavall, daughter to the Earl of Newburgh.

“Page 13. He gives some particulars of the said memorial, viz., that the Lady Griffin had furnished him, the said Robinson, lodging and diet, and was very helpful to him. That he had been prisoner at Dublin some time, and had afterwards seen Limerick, Athlone, &c., of whose condition and strength he gave some account. That he was kindly received by the Countess of Antrim, elder, in the north of Ireland, whence he went for Scotland, landed in the county of Argile, and arriving at Edinburgh came along with M. G[en.] Livingston’s dragoons, and lodging at the Lady Griffin’s in the Pall Mall, she procured him passage in a ship going for Flanders, charging him to acquaint the King that there were several persons at Paris or St. Germain’s who had his Majesty’s pension, but needed it not, because they had money enough from England for giving an account to the Court at Whitehall of everything they heard or saw at the Court of St. Germain’s, which made sport at Whitehall, and therefore entreated King James that search might be made after them.

“Page 14. He adds that the Lady Elizabeth Hackett took great care of the above mentioned Mr. Robinson, and procured money from the King to put him in good equipage. That Robinson remained at St. German’s above six weeks, and told him that he had gotten a pass and money from the Queen, and went for England about the 20th of August, having promised to take Capt. Scott along with him, but gave him the slip. He adds that Robinson speaks Dutch very well, passes for a Dutchman, and resides at the Lady Griffin’s.

“Ibid. He says that in the spring of that same year Father Marr, alias Forbes, Superior of the Scots Jesuits’ College at Doway, was very busy at the Court of St. Germain’s for some days, from whence he went to Paris, then to Doway, and thence, as ’twas reported, to Scotland.

“Ibid. He says that the Earl of Belcarras, coming from Germany to St. Germain’s, was well received by King James, and is thought resides there as Secretary for Scotland; the Earl of Melfort being laid aside a little before his coming, and the Earl of Middleton succeeding in his room; Mr. Carrell, the Queen’s Secretary, being made conjunct-secretary with the Earl of Middleton.

“Ibid. He adds that as he came one morning with the Earl of Belcarras and Lieut.-Col. Graham of Berchapel (?), the Earl, speaking of the Basse, for then it was surrendered again, said that upon some surprise he went thither with some gentlemen in a boat, and that during the time of their abode there, Stratton was very kind to them, and taking the Earl aside told him he was ready to receive his Lordship’s commands and would obey whatever he should bid him do.

“Page 15. He says that in the beginning of that summer it was reported at St. Germain’s that the Lord Preston and some others of the English nobility were secretly at Paris.

“Ibid. That it was also reported that Sir Theophilus Oglethorp was at St. Germain’s with the King incognito, seen by none but those with whom he was to meet, and went away secretly. That Irwin of Stapleton was at St. Germain’s the winter before, and returned to England again.

“That Sir George Barclay went for England in 1693, and returning again to St. Germain’s was made Captain of the King’s 2nd troop of Guards, for reward of his services.

“That Dr. Bruntfield went for England in 1693, and returned to St. Germain’s in the latter end of [the] summer, 1694, where Capt. Scott saw him.

“That Capt. Scott having obtained a passport, Sept. 4th, 1694, s.n., took his leave of the King, Queen, and his particular acquaintance, and set forward towards Brussels, taking Doway in his way, and heard in the Scots’ College there that Father Marre above mentioned was gone to Scotland.

“Page 18. He says that Mrs. Billop, formerly mentioned, did ask him in October, 1694, what was the reason of his coming over ; whether King James was so poor that he could not maintain him, and if he were to be restored by the French or the Protestants of England.

“Page 19. He says that Mrs. Billop brought him and Father Johnston together, and that the Father asked him abundance of pumping questions, appointed some other time of meeting, but broke appointments by coming at uncertain hours. That at the third visit he asked whether the Captain would see the Earl of Arran, who answered yes. Then the Father demanded whether he had any token for him, and upon his answering no, told him that then the Earl would not be seen by him.

“Page 20. He adds that Father Johnston keeps a correspondence with France, and that Mrs. Harris’s is the only Protestant family in England that knows where the Father is.

“Page 21. He says that Father Johnston upon his desire lent him three pound, and promised to speak to the Earl of Arran to write to the King’s friends that they should not be shy of him.

“Page 23. He says that he stayed three nights at Sir Wm. Drummond’s of Hauthorndon’s, who is accounted very loyal to King James.

“Page 24. He says that he acquainted Sir Wm. Wallis’s Lady at Edinburgh that her husband would willingly return to Scotland if he had money to pay his debts in France.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, Jan. 18-28, Turin.—Touching the preparation of a French fleet at Toulon, and the bad arrangements made for the winter-quartering of the Emperor’s troops, which diminish considerably. Mr. Broughton, Consul at Venice, has rendered useful services, at great expence.

“Il y a dans Londres un bon homme nommé Neurard, qui estoit auocat à Grenoble, et qui, après auoir beaucoup souffert en France, s’est sauué en Suisse, avec sa famille, ou ayant entendu parler du dessein de conduire des colonies en Irlande, croyant que c'estoit une affaire utile au service du Roy, il s'y employa avec zele, et avec tant d'affection qu'il y enuoya sa famille, ou elle soufre beaucoup. Parceque ce bon homme a depencé dans cette affaire tout ce qu'il auoit pu sauuer de France, il est luy mesme reduit à la mandicité dans Londres. Je crois, my Lord, que ce seroit une grande charité, et utile, de luy donner une pension en Irlande."

1695-6, Jan. 19, Kensington.—"King, Archbishop, Prince, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Privy Seal, Mr. Secretary, Lord Steward, Shrewsbury, Lord Godolphin, Admiral Russell.

"The addresses concerning the Refugees, Lord Cavan, and Mrs. Maxwell to be returned to my Lord Deputy for his opinion. The address about Dr. Lesley recommended to his Excellency to make him a Dean, or give him some other preferment in the Church.

"Sir Patrick Trant's petition was read. He cannot be bailed by law; no answer upon the petition.

"The Admiralty and Navy Board to come to my Office on Tuesday with the Lords of the Committee.

"Mr. Secretary moved some consideration should be had upon what should be done with Sir Geo. Rooke's squadron, whether sent for back or no. The King said he would fain hear from abroad before he resolves, but that it must not be long."

In Shrewsbury's hand.

THE NAVY.

1695-6, Jan. 19, Admiralty Office.—"A list of his Majesty's 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Rate Ships now in pay, designed for the Main Fleet; with an account of their complements of men, the numbers borne, and numbers mustered."

28 ships are named, with complements varying from 754 to 446. 1 p.

Other similar lists, dated 26 Jan., 2, 9, 16, and 23 Feb., 1, 8, and 15 March, 1695-6, 29 March, and 5 and 12 April, 1696. Only 6 ships are named in the last.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, Jan. 21-31, Turin.—Sends advices from Marseilles. The Envoy of the Prince of Baden leaves this morning to return to his master, at Vienna. His Royal Highness has assured the Envoy of his great attachment to the interests of the Allies, so as to counteract the rumours affecting his fidelity to them.

French. R. Feb. 7, 1595-6. Enclosure:—

Letter from Marseilles, 18 Jan. 96.—M. du Quène Guiton has arrived at Toulon with 1,000 or 1,200 sailors from the west; &c.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695-6, Jan. 26, Kensington.—“King, Lord Keeper, Archbishop, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Steward, Shrewsbury, Mr. Russell, Mr. Secretary.

“Sir George Rooke’s letter to the Admiralty of the 15th o.s. Dec. was read.

“The instructions to Sir Geo. Rooke were agreed.

“A letter ordered to be writ, that he should colour his coming away with the best pretences he can, in order to keep it secret from everybody.

“That his Majesty has stopped the squadron, Dutch and English, lying at Spithead, designed to reinforce him, till further order.

“That his Majesty has ordered Capt. Toll to come home with him.

“Having read the letter about the Scots ships, the King orders the Admiralty to take them.

“These instructions and letter to Sir Geo. Rooke to be immediately dispatched by the advice-boat; that a duplicate be sent by the Groyn Packet; the letter enclosed to a merchant, and Mr. Stanhope ordered to send it by express to Sir Geo. Rooke.

“The East India Company to satisfy and shew Mr. Russell their instructions, and then his Majesty will direct the Admiralty that the officers may obey them.”

In Shrewsbury’s hand.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95-6, Jan. 27, Dublin Castle.—“I have great reason to believe that there are some in this country (otherwise very true to this interest,) who are very busy in endeavouring to have Mr. Solicitor-General [Alan Brodrick] removed from the King’s service.

“This gives me much trouble, and obliges me to desire of your Grace that you will please to prevent any such attempt, he being a man worthy to be owned by those who truly espouse the interest of his Majesty; and whilst there are matters of the last moment yet depending in Parliament, and that the Government still groans under the weight of a heavy debt (besides that there is here no choice of able men), it’s not possible to carry on the King’s business with [without?] him; for, take away the two Mr. Brodericks and the Attorney-General Rochford, and I must needs fall into the hands of Mr. Sloane, Sir James Williamson, Mr. Caughlan (descended of an Irish family), and Sir Jo. Meade, who (though the King’s Counsel), when the assessors went the other day to take a list of his family to be polled (amounting to thirty in number), himself was the only Protestant there.

“If the persons before mentioned have any of them been faulty by reason of some sudden motions in the House of Commons, which afterwards begot heats, it was inadvertency and want of experience to foresee how little things in great assemblies often beget matters of mighty consequence, which in such places cannot be conducted as one would have them to be. But I will be bold to say that they neither intended the least disrespect to the King, nor interruption to his affairs; and therefore I most humbly pray your Grace that this gentleman may not be displaced from his Majesty's service."

Re. Feb. 6th.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, Jan. 27, o.s., Queen, at Cadiz.—Sends advices from Genova and other places of naval preparations at Tollonne, and copies of the councils of flag-officers held thereupon. "We think the Fleet in some danger of being insulted by the enemy. It's a very unhappy change, my Lord, in our affairs in these seas, that from seeking for and blocking up the enemy in their ports, we shall be exposed to the disgrace of suffering the blockade ourselves, or skulking from the enemy at sea." . . .

R. 11 March. Enclosures :—

1. Extracts from (1) a letter of Mr. Consul Herne, of Allicant, dated 21 Jan. 1695-6, n.s.; reporting his examination, before Capt. Wynn and Captain Loader, of one Thomas Drewitt, mate of the Carmarthen Galley, who came from Marseilles, whither he had been carried by a French privateer. (2) A letter from Mr. Consul Kirke, Genoua, 13 Jan. (3) A letter from Mr. Fowler, Genoua, 2-12 Jan. (4) An account which Capt. Leake had from Mr. John Penington, late commander of the Joseph, of London, burthen 250 tons, 32 guns, and 66 men, laden with fish for Livorne. This gives (inter alia) the report of John Merriton, sailor, taken in the Carmarthen Galley, of London, burthen 150 tons, 20 guns, and 45 men, Mr. John Jones, commander, who was killed.

2. Abstract of French letters taken in a ship called the Boon Jesus, of Marseilles, by the Canterbury, off Cape delle Melle, 5 Jan. 95-6, o.s. This mentions Spanish galleys off the coast of Majorca being insulted by a French privateer, and that privateers of Marseilles and Toulon "were putting the coasts of Spain in desolation." Four French men-of-war were cruising in the channel of Malta.

3. Copy of a resolution of a Council of Flag-officers, held on board the Queen in the bay of Cadiz, 19 Jan., not to put to sea, to meet the enemy, as they have only 30 line-of-battle ships, while the enemy's fleet at Tollonne consists of 60; but to lodge a brigantine at Gibraltar, to keep clean cruisers in the Straits' mouth, &c. With a list of 18 English and 12 Dutch ships in the bay of Cadiz.

4. Copy of a similar resolution, 23 Jan., in case the enemy appear before Cadiz, to remove the ships within Pointall Castles, &c.

There are also duplicates of these enclosures.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95-6, Jan. 31, Dublin Castle.—"After I had writ this enclosed, I received your Grace's of the 14th and 21st instant, and have accordingly given order to stop the two Regiments till further commands, taking care (in the mean time) that Michelburn's Regiment may be ready clothed, and ships fitting to transport them from Corke and Kingsaile (about which places both Regiments are now quartered), if it shall be his Majesty's pleasure to send for them.

"What relates to my Lord Cavan and the Widow Maxwell shall be observed, as likewise that concerning the French Ministers; and Dr. Lesly shall be under my care to provide for him when opportunity offers itself.

"I find by the newspapers that Monsieur de Neizmon is fitting fourteen ships to be out in March next, at Brest. If any intelligence comes to your Grace that may relate to Ireland, I humbly request of you to give me early notice thereof, for I am not without some apprehensions the number of priests that have of late flocked over has been great, and yet I cannot find out anything that is material."

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, Feb. 1-11, Turin.—Will persist in the proposal for attacking Pignerol, according to the King's orders, but is afraid that much is promised at Vienna while nothing is performed. The two regiments in Catalonia cannot come over here till our Fleet is at sea. The slowness at Vienna has hindered his R.H.'s preparations. The French are provisioning Pignerol and Fenestrelles, and they daily expect M. de Cattinat and eighteen general officers under him. Has had a letter from Sir George Rook, and writes to him regularly by the Spanish courier at Madrid, and direct to Cadiz by the merchants of Geneva (sic). It is said at Paris that M. de Chasteaurenaud has undertaken to pass the Strait with the Toulon fleet, contrary to the advice of certain vice-admirals. There is a strong report that if the squadron detained at Spithead by the contrary wind joins Sir George Rook before this fleet is at sea, it will be disarmed.

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, Feb. 10, o.s., Queen, at Cadiz.—The Groyne post has failed us these six weeks. “I cannot suppose but your Grace has received repeated accounts of the early and diligent preparations of the enemy in fitting their fleet at Tollonne, and of their readiness to proceed to sea; to which I shall only add that I have lately had some alarms of their actually being so, which I cannot give any credit to; but by the enclosed copy of a letter from the Duke of Alburquerque, your Grace will see this Court is already under some apprehensions for Barcellona, to which I returned the answer your Grace sees, and what I hope is agreeable to the King’s pleasure.”

It is necessary to be much superior to the enemy in strength “in those seas,” as they will be assisted by their galleys, and can easily retreat to their ports. Sends a list of the enemy’s fleet at Tollonne. His own ships are but half manned. “A man would be thought ridiculous to undertake to charge a well-formed battalion with a crowd of rabble, and I protest, my Lord, such mob is the generality of this Fleet manned with. I will venture my life cheerfully in the service upon any terms; and I do not doubt but your Grace reflects that, whenever this part of the Fleet miscarries, your own life and fortune will be exposed, and the liberty and religion of our country to boot.”

R. 23 March. Enclosures :—

1. Copy of a letter from the Duke of Alburquerque [to Rooke]; St. Mary Ports, 14 Feb. 1695-6, n.s. (in English). The King

[of Spain] has been informed by the Marquis of Gastanaga, Viceroy of Catalonia, that the French galleys were getting ready, and that their men-of-war were to put to sea at the beginning of February; that, besides their own ships, they had hired fifteen men-of-war, but it was not known whether these were Algerian, or of Tripoly, or Genouese; and that these forces were to pass the Straits, and, it was said, to bombard Barcelona, which he (the Marquis) did not believe.

2. Copy of Rooke's reply, 15 Feb. Had received similar information from several parts. The season of the year secures the coast of Catalonia. Is fitting out his Fleet, and expects reinforcements from his own King. Trusts his Catholic Majesty will give orders for equipping as many galleys as will be sufficient to confront those of the French.

3. "Vaisseaux de guerre qu'on pretend armer à Toulon, selon les avis du 8<sup>me</sup> Decembre, 1695." Names of 60 ships, with the number of guns in most of them.

SHREWSBURY to SIR G. ROOKE.

1695-6, Feb. 11, Whitehall.—Sends another copy of the King's instructions. Owing to the winds there has been no news from him since 27 Dec., by the Carlisle.

SIR G. ROOKE to [SHREWSBURY].

1695-6, Feb. 13, Queen, at Cadiz.—Sends a copy of a letter from Don Juan de Larrea, his Catholic Majesty's Secretary of State, with his answer; an extract of several intelligences; and another list of the French fleet, from Lord Gallway. A frigate is sent with these, and to give notice of the resolutions taken in case the enemy passes the Straits, as they are resolved to do; with orders to await orders from the King and the Admiralty. Desires a list of consuls in Mediterranean ports.

R. 29. Enclosures :—

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, Feb. 13, o.s., Queen, at Cadiz.—Sends copy of a letter from Mons. Sc[h]onenberge. The Alicant and Mallaga fleet is coming into this bay.

R. 29. Enclosures :—

1. Copy of a letter from Mons. Schonenberg to Admiral Rooke; Valverde, two leagues from Madrid, 14 Feb. [n.s.] 1696.

One need not take offence at this nation holding intelligence with the enemy, as its forces are small. Sent him particulars of the fleet at Toulon, but it may be doubted whether their strength is so great as is represented. They threaten to send a powerful army into Catalonia, which greatly alarms the Spaniards, who cannot make much resistance, as they are sending to inform Rooke, who can reproach them with their ingratitude to the King and the States. Hopes Rooke's fleet will soon be reinforced. The King takes all the care necessary for these things; the winds however have been contrary. The enemy are making great preparations in the Low Countries, and the Allies are not negligent; but everything is neglected here, and all the charge and care fall on the King and the States.

French.

2. Copy of a letter from Don Juan d[e] Larrea, Madrid, 14 Feb. 95-6, n.s., [to Rooke].—Naval preparations of the French, either to attack Barcelona, or to pass the Straits. The King [of Spain] commanded that Rooke be informed of them, so that he "may execute that which his Royal person expects."

3. Copy of Rooke's reply to the preceding, and to a previous letter of 27 Dec.; dated 20 Feb.—Is daily expecting a naval reinforcement from England and Holland. Hopes the King [of Spain] will fit out his galleys.

4. Extract from a letter of Lord Gallway [to Rooke], Turin, 17 Jan. 1695-6, n.s.—"Tis confirmed by all the advices I have received that a considerable number of seamen is marching from Rochefort and Brest towards Thoulon, some say 4, 5, or 6 thousand."

5. Extract from a letter of the same, 24 Jan.—French preparations at Toulon. "Some say they will go to Barcelona; others that they will attack you at Cadiz, being first joined with the other men-of-war from Brest; and some others say that they design to make a landing in England."

6. "Extract of a letter writ from Paris to my Lord Gallway, in the beginning of January.—Let England look to itself, for France is forgeing some great undertaking against that kingdom. The fleet is to attempt, cost what it will, passing the Straits on the latter end of this month; and King James is ready to embark on it with many troops for landing there; he makes all possible diligence, and flatters himself more than ever with a happy success. Of all the English Lords that were with him in France, the greatest part are gone over into England, under pretence to obey the last Parliament's orders; but the true subject (sic) is to foment more and more discontents, and prepare all things for a happy reception. The ten ships arrived from Canada are disarmed, and the seamen gone to Toulon, where 66 ships are fitted out already. In fine, all these dispositions require some preparations on the other side. Pray be discreet of what I tell you; it was secretly communicated to me, and more, that the two Kings have had a long conference together about it."

7. "Extract of a letter to Mr. Cha[rles] Russell, of Cadiz, dated at St. Germain's, the 29th of January, 1696, n.s.—Our Queen's falling desperate ill four days ago has put both these Courts to a great consternation. The King of France has been here twice a day as long as her sickness seemed dangerous, and sent one every hour to bring him news of her ; but, thank God, she is now past danger, her fever, which was very hot and violent, being over. By all that I can find and know in both Courts, we design an attempt upon England. Mons. de Chateranau commands the fleet from Toulon to Brest, and Tourville will only mount it there. The King of France gives no passports to anybody to go for England. We have (sic) very great preparations by sea and land."

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695-6, Feb. 16, Kensington.—“King, Archbishop, Prince, Lord Steward, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Godolphin, Lord Portland, Mr. Russell, Mr. Secretary, Shrewsbury.

“Lord Capell’s letter of the 1st Feb., concerning the King’s declaring the commencement of the war, being read, the King directs it to be enquired into, and takes more time to consider.

“Peterson’s petition being read, the King gives him half of his ship again, the other moiety being already granted to the Governor of Dartmouth.”

In Shrewsbury’s hand.

[CAPT.] M. SMYTH to [SHREWSBURY].

1695[-6], Feb. 19.— . . . “In my former letters I intimated that the design is this, that there is a resolution taken and formed, and by authority from France, to seize upon the King, and that at his diversion in shooting or hunting, and if possible to carry him off, they having in a readiness against the time a vessel to convey him to France ; and in case they cannot do so, then they are to gripe him.

“The method for this, and how, I have been very inquisitive to know, and have reasoned the matter, as first they have got a number of officers, all or most Roman Catholics, to the number of fifty, that are to undertake the seizure ; and they in order to it have bought up horses and furniture, &c. . . .

“They are further to have 25 footmen in ambuscade ; and upon the conclusion of this I am further told that then the mob will be stirred up in several parts of the City, and the gentlemen are to retreat to their several counties to rise, for all methods are concerted ; and upon this hurly-burly the French fleet will bring over the late King James.

“The persons particularly employed, as I have hitherto learned, are these : Sir George Barclay, who is made a Major-General, and to command as chief officer in this horrid design, and Major Holmes. These two lately came from France, and disburse money in order to it, and are principal actors. As for people in Town, I do learn that Capt. Charnock (who hath received a Lieut.-Colonel’s command), Capt. George Porter, Mr. Chambers (a Captain of a French privateer), Capt. Boyse, &c.” . . . Desires his Grace to recommend him to the King’s favour.

[AN INFORMATION by ———.]

1695-6, Feb. 24, London.—“Upon Friday, the 21st inst., I met with Capt. Leeds, who hath been several ways a great sufferer for King James’s interest. . . . [He] told me, that that very day he had been sent for by Major General Sackfield, who . . . told him that in a short time there would be occasion for honest men to show themselves. . . . I am assured by a knowing man of that party that there are 8,000 horsemen ready in and about London, and specially about the sea-coasts, ready (sic) to join the French in case they should land.”

SIR G. ROOKE to [SHREWSBURY].

1695-6, Feb. 24, Queen, at Cadiz.—At a council of flag-officers it was resolved to put the King’s orders in execution with the first opportunity of wind and weather. It will take eight or ten days to ship the naval stores. We pretend to be removing to Porte-Mahone. Seven ships are to be left on this station. Was troubled to learn the King’s displeasure at so large a detachment being sent to take care of the Turkey ships. Understood that the enemy had a squadron in the Levant. Mr. Gwynn, consul at Mallaga, being dead, Mr. Nicholas Hollway, of that factory, has applied for power to officiate there till the King’s pleasure be known. Has given it him. Is concerned at the great ships’ having to cross the ocean at this time of the year. Thinks this Levant [wind] should bring the enemy down, as likewise the Humber and the rest of our ships from Algiers.

[P.S.] “I hope the Lords of the Admiralty will order some cruisers in the Soundings to look out for and give us notice of the bearing and distance of the land.”

COUNCIL OF WAR.

1695-6, Feb. 26.—“At a Council of War held on board his Majesty’s ship the Victory in the Downs, this 26th Febr. 1695-6.

“Present: The Right Honble. Edward Russell, Admiral, Chief Commander and Captain General of his Majesty’s Navy and Fleet, President. The Right Honble. John Lord Berkeley, Admiral of the Blue. Matthew Aylmer, Esq., Vice-Admiral of the Blue. Geo. Byng, Esq. Vice-Admiral Vander Goes.

“Resolved, That the Fleet, with the first opportunity of wind and weather, sail and stand over to Callais, sending ships to look into Dunkirke and Bullen Bay. That upon the intelligence they bring it be referred to a Council of War which way to proceed with the Fleet.

“The rendezvous appointed, with hard easterly winds, is Rye Bay; and if with westerly winds, that the Fleet cannot fetch the Downs, then under the North Foreland is the place of rendezvous.”

[AN INFORMATION by ———.]

1695-6, Feb. 26.—“Capt. Henry Davis, who formerly was captain of an independent company under King James, and governor of a castle in Wales, which he surrendered by capitulation after King William's coming into England, did on Sunday, the 16th inst., engage Capt. Adrian Moor, who formerly served in the second Regiment of Guards, to be ready to go along with him to join King James or such as should rise for him. . . . Capt. Davis lodges in Gray's Inn, and Capt. Moor, from whom I have this relation, at the Bull-head ale-house in Long Acre, Mr. Hal's.

“I am very well assured that the persons under written design to join King James, or any body of men that shall appear in arms for him:—Major Morgan Price, Mr. Thomas Hescott, Mr. Thomas Shaw, Lieut. Kinderick, Mr. Butler and Mr. Cuny, Capt. Thomas Shirley, Mr. John Charleton and Lieut. John Wood, both now in the Messengers, [and] Mr. Lee, who keeps a strong-water shop in Long Acre, opposite to the Bull-head tavern, who said in my hearing that he could be content to set the Crown of England upon the Devil's he[ad], if he could but assist to pull down King William, and to take the Crown off from his head.”

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695-6, Feb. 29, Whitehall.—“Mr. Secretary having received a letter from Mr. Keck, English Consul at Rotterdam, a copy of which is here enclosed, which agrees with other advices we have received, that the design is to land part of the French troops in Scotland; and all this being confirmed by the confession of one of the prisoners, who informs that he was told that a landing was first intended with 3 or 4,000 men in Scotland, that they were to be conveyed by Du Bart, and commanded by the Duke of Berwick, and that when the King had drawn down his troops to oppose them, then the great descent was to be made: however unlikely this may be in some parts of it, his Majesty commands me to send you the copy I have before mentioned, and an extract of such other advices as I have received from Paris and Dunkirke, which, compared with what you may have seen and heard by other means, may help your information.

“If what Mr. Keck writes should prove true, and a detachment gone for Scotland, 'tis concluded they are landed, and consequently that 'tis too late to prevent that part, but his Majesty commands me to tell you, he leaves it to your discretion whether, if you have reason to credit such an information, you may not also detach such a squadron as may intercept Bart, and destroy their transport ships.

“I hope all this is writ very much in vain, and that you are now able to assure his Majesty that no such thing has or will happen upon this design.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695-6, March 1, Kensington.—“King, Prince, Archbishop, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Steward, Lord Godolphin, Lord Portland, Shrewsbury, Mr. Secretary.

“Sir George Rooke's letters and councils of war were read.

“Mr. Russell's letter to me read, and his also to the Admiralty.

“The Admiralty called in.

“The bomb-vessels and fireships ordered out with all expedition.

“The great ships out as soon as possible.

“If the weather obliges Mr. Russell to come back, that they send orders to him to leave such a force as may keep the enemy from going away, and hinder them from annoying the troops in their passage from Flanders hither.

“Bembo is ordered to Mr. Russell.

“N.B. Send an advice-boat to look into Brest what preparations they are making, and another to look along the coast if they are making preparations of transports any way upon our coast.”

In Shrewsbury's hand.

THE NAVY.

1695-6, March 1, Admiralty Office.—“The readiness of the bomb-vessels, according to the last account from the Navy Board.

“At Deptford: Carcass, Blast, Granada, Furnace, Serpent—graved, and may be ready in eight or ten days, but the beds, &c., not fitting the new mortars, makes it uncertain.

“At Woolwich: Comet—will be dispatched in four or five days in respect to their Office.”

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 3 [o.s.], Victory, off Graveling.—(The beginning and the end of this letter are printed by Coxe. The omitted passage in the middle is as follows.)

“These men-of-war I believe are Du Bart’s squadron, and that Mons. Nesmond’s ships are not joined. If any ships or men had been sent to Scotland (as your Grace seems to think by the report from the Hague and an Ostend privateer), I think one may depend upon it that the convoy would have been of Du Bart’s ships, they drawing a less draught of water than the French, and the people better acquainted; besides, the vessels here seem to me to be so numerous that I persuade myself we have them all fast, and not any of them gone, as suggested. If any ships had gone for Scotland, and at the time reported, as I have had the winds, they would have been landed several days since, and consequently you would have heard of them.”

Signed. R. 6 March.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to the COMMISSIONERS OF THE ADMIRALTY.

1695-6, March 3, the Victory, off Graveling.—“I have little to trouble you with. I have received your commands to send some small frigates to the Downs, as a guard to that place, as also to be ready upon any service you may have occasion to command them; which I will do the first snatch of fair weather. At present it blows hard northerly, which makes this a very unquiet place, besides a lee shore. You are pleased to direct my keeping ships to cruise off Calais, to prevent any of their ships going out. I hope you do not think me so remiss in my duty that I would omit doing it. I design to send the Bonadventure hired ship to Dartmouth with all the tenders that are bound to the westward for men, whose lieutenants lie at Plymouth and Dartmouth, and to return with them as soon as possible off Cape de Hague (sic) and the Wight. I design to order the Portland, Litchfeild, and Sapphire to cruise, calling in at St. Hellin’s every four days for orders, which you will please to direct as you shall judge necessary.

“I send you enclosed the result of the Captains<sup>a</sup> that I ordered in with Sir Clow. Shovell, after they had consulted with the Pilots; from which I conclude nothing can be attempted on the ships. The first fair weather I design to come over for Dover Road or the Downs, leaving Sir Clow. Shovell with a squadron of ships to tend on this place.

[P.S.] 4 March. . . . “If you do send any bomb-vessels hither, I am informed by my Lord Berkeley and Sir Clow. Shovell that Capt. Benbow best understands the management of them, and therefore desire you will send him with them.”

Copy. R. 6 March.

DUNKIRK.

1695-6, March 3, on board H.M. ship Windsor, between Dunkirke and Graveling.—“Copy of the Officers’ opinions that were sent in to view the ships at Dunkirke.

“We have viewed the ships in Flemish Road, and observe[d] nine sail had their yards and topmasts struck, some with their shrouds lashed to the mast; of which number we judge five carry from fifty to sixty guns or upwards. Two of the biggest of the five are Dutch built, the rest French. The other four are of forty guns or upward[s], one of them a fly-boat. They are placed to the eastward of Dunkirke pier-head. They have also in Flemish Road four frigates of about twenty guns, which lie near the pier-head, and get [got?] under sail upon the approach of our ships; with whom lie about ten half-galleys and other boats.

“Upon examining the Dutch pilots sent by Mr. Meesters, they declare that three days hence, when the tides are mended, if the wind be from the S. to the W.S.W., a fresh gale, they will venture to pilot our ships of fifteen to sixteen foot water (Flemish) through the Flemish Road, and out at the East Channel by Newport, provided we do not anchor; and they say they must not be contradicted by the captains or any officers in conducting the ship[s]; and if accidents happen to any ship’s masts, so as to bring them by the board, it will endanger losing the ship.

“We also examined the pilots that came from Newport; they declare themselves ignorant of the sands or channels about Dunkirke, and came only to take charge of such ships as shall sail to Ostend or Newport, in order to convoy the forces from thence.

“This being what we have observed and heard from the pilots, [we] do think it proper to acquaint the General [Russell] with the whole matter, in order to receive his further directions.”

COL. JAMES RICHARDS to [the ADMIRALTY BOARD].

1695-6, March 4.—“According to the orders you sent me last night from their Lordships of the Admiralty, I have this day done my utmost to get the bomb-ships away; but the absence of the commanders, that are gone up to indent for their provisions, the several wants of boatswains' and carpenters' stores, and the time it requires to get the men from the yards and ord[i]n[a]ry, has made it not possible to sail this day. I am assured all shall be completed this night, and on my part nothing shall hinder me sailing tomorrow's tide, and follow[ing] their Lordships' commands.

"I suppose, when I have got the ships manned at the Nore, there will be a convoy and directions where I am to find the Fleet. I must desire that all the commanders of these vessels may have the same orders they had last for the receiving and victualling the fireworkers and bombardiers I shall send on board them; as also that they enter one man for my boat's crew as they did last year, and that the Clerk of the Cheque allow them.

"Mr. Hardin says he cannot deliver me a ten-oared boat without a particular order; that I had last year I lost at St. Malloes. The wind is here N. and N. and b. E., and blows very fresh, so that, if it holds tomorrow, we can't get far.

"I send this bearer up to you for these last orders, and if their Lordships have any more commands for me, he is ordered to wait for them. I shall sail with all the bomb-vessels except the Terror, so that I go with seven old mortars, and five new."

THE ADMIRALTY [BOARD] to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 4, 9 at night, Admiralty Office.—Enclose a letter from Col. Richards. Of the twelve mortars put on board the vessels, seven were employed last year.

ORDERS by ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SIR CLOUDESLEY SHOVELL.

1695-6, March 5, the Victory, off Graveling.—"By the Right Honble. Edward Russell, Admiral, Chief Commander, and Captain General of his Majesty's Navy and Fleet, &c.

"You are hereby required (wind and weather permitting) to continue upon this station, at an anchor or cruising, as you shall judge most for the service, till further order; taking under your command the ships mentioned in the margin [31 names], and using your best endeavours to prevent any of the transport vessels getting out from Calais, as also the enemy's ships of war now lying near Dunkirke; and, as frequently as possible, to observe their motions and preparations, lest any of them should put to sea with some transport ships for the north parts of England or Scotland; and in case you find an opportunity to annoy the enemy by your fireships or bomb-vessels, you are to use your utmost endeavours to destroy them. Upon your examining into the condition of the ships left with you (as to men), if you find those may be spared that belong to the ships fitting from Chatham, you are to send them to the Nore to be delivered to their proper ships, for their more speedy dispatch for the sea. You are to transmit frequent accounts of your proceedings to the Secretary of State and Lords of the Admiralty. I herewith send you the opinion of the Pilots taken before yourself and several of the Commanders."

"To Sir Cloudesley Shovell, Kt., Vice-Admiral of the Red Squadron of his Majesty's Fleet."

Copy. Annexed:—

List of "Ships brought with me [Russell] from the coast of France." In the Downs, 21 ships (named). Ordered up the River, 11 ships (named).

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1695-6, March 6, Whitehall.—"I have received your letter of the 3rd and 4th, and am sorry there is [are] no hopes of success against the enemy's men-of-war. If the weather has not prevented, I suppose six of the bomb-vessels are with you, but I doubt the winds have been so strong these two last days that it has been impossible for them to sail. I have here enclosed sent you what advices we have from France, which are less exact than they use to be, because the letters from all the ports in France are stopped, and what I now send you is only what I can learn from Paris."

Copy.

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to the LORDS OF THE ADMIRALTY.

[16]95-6, March 6, the Victory, off Calais.—Sends [a copy of] the orders left with Sir Clow. Shovell, and a list of the ships that come with him (Russell) to the Downs. Will order the ships to the Nore, as directed. Has not yet reduced all the ships to their middle complement, as cruisers on the French coast may require their whole number, for it is a terrible coast to be on at this season of the year. Capt. Benbow arrived here on Wednesday last. Will leave him with Shovell. "He tells me all the mortars to these bomb-vessels are fixed not to traverse; if so, they will be of little use in a tide's way." Has asked leave to return. Is glad "the thought of landing at this time is laid aside." Bad weather yesterday, &c. Lord Berkeley has desired leave to go to London "upon the sale of his house." All the officers of the Fleet are signing "an Address and Association;" as soon as it is completed at the Nore and Blackstakes it shall be sent up to London. Fancies the enemy's troops are dispersing.

"Extract;" with a copy of the orders referred to.

CAPEL to the KING.

[1696, March 7, Dublin Castle.]—"May it please your Majesty to give me leave with all your good subjects to congratulate the happy discovery of the horrid and barbarous conspiracy that was carrying on against your most sacred life, the timely detecting whereof will, I hope, have this good effect, as to shew the world the true zeal your people have for the preservation of your Majesty's person, and be one means of distinguishing your faithful servants and subjects from such as pretend to be so, and yet at the same time are inclined to favour the design of those who continue these hellish plots against your Majesty and your kingdoms.

“I think it my duty with all humility upon this occasion to offer to your Majesty’s most serious consideration how far it may be consistent with the security of your person (upon which singly the welfare of all Christendom as well as that of your own Dominions depends) to continue in great employments and trusts persons who are esteemed dubious to your interest, and easy to be reconciled to the late King’s; the prospect whereof, and the belief of their readiness to support their designs, gives your enemies, in my poor opinion, no little encouragement to carry on these their devilish plots and conspiracies. But I trust in God they will be all blasted and disappointed, and that your Majesty will live to see your desire upon your enemies.”

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95-6, March 7, Dublin Castle.—“I have your Grace’s of the 25th of the last month, and bless God that our enemies are disappointed, and the person of the King so miraculously preserved by His immediate providence.

“There is not any appearance yet here that may cause more to be done than what the Justices by law may do; whenever there is, there shall be no pains nor resolution wanting to secure this kingdom to his Majesty’s obedience.

“I thought to give your Grace some poor reflections of my own upon this conjuncture of affairs, but having here enclosed sent your Grace a copy of my letter to the King, you will there find my zeal to this interest, and my weak opinion that till we leave trimming and trust none but who are faithful to this cause, that neither the person of the King is safe, nor is our country like to make any progress in the true interest thereof.”

R. 13. Enclosure; see preceding.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695-6, March 8, Kensington.—“King, Prince, Archbishop, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Steward, Lord Godolphin, Lord Chamberlain, Shrewsbury, Lord Portland, Mr. Secretary.

“The Parliament in Ireland to be adjourned to some time about the latter end of June.

“Sir Charles Hedges to be advised with how this agrees with other cases here.

“My Lord Keeper to be writ to, to suspend ex” [execution?] till he hears further.

“Send Blackwell’s bill drawn upon me to the Treasury.

“If the Envoyé of Portugal will send away the domestics, the King consents.

“Proposal from the Admiralty for fortifying Plymouth was read, and the King says himself will send some engineers down, and speak to them himself.

“Mr. Russell has his Majesty’s leave to return to town forthwith.

“Yachts and convoy ordered for the Venetian Ambassadors.”

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

[16]95-6, March 8, London.—“Your letter of the 6th having been laid this evening before his Majesty, at the Com[mittee] of Council, he does not only consent that you return hither, but desires it may be with all convenient speed. I conclude therefore it will not be long before we shall see you.”

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 9, o.s., Queen, at Cadiz.—Is staying for a fair wind, having about 70 English merchant ships, besides Dutch and others, in his company. About a month since the enemy were getting out to their rendezvous at the Isles of Eres [Hyères]. Having the start of them, hopes to get home without their being able to do any damage. “The Humber and the ships under the command of Capt. Clarke, after seeing the Turkey ships as high as Cape Mattapan, and doing his business at Alger, arrived here the 27th past.” Will have to leave certain ships behind for repairs, &c., with orders to follow.

R. Ap. 10th.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 10-20, Turin.—Announces the return of his R.H., who continues to suffer from a cold, but is no longer feverish. His journey had nothing mysterious about it. The arrivals of the Marquis de Leganes and Prince Eugene are expected, when some measures for the campaign can be taken. The Toulon fleet, which left the Isles of Yeres on the 13th inst., had returned, having found the wind contrary. It is apparent that the French have no other design than to pass the Strait, for, having embarked no troops or artillery, they cannot attempt anything against Catalonia. Advices from Paris begin to speak with less assurance of the success of King James’s enterprise.

French. R. 31 [March] 1696.

D. ABERCROMBIE to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 12 and 16, London.—“Being convinced, by a late account the Jacobites have received, that, notwithstanding their present disappointment, the design of invading either England or Scotland, or both at once, and sooner perhaps too than now we are aware of, is not for all that laid aside, and that my own and only brother the Jesuit is chiefly concerned in the whole matter, I do here offer, that (sic) if your Grace will be pleased to send me down to Scotland, . . . to deliver him into the hands of the Government. . . . I discovered him at his first coming over into England, in two different accounts to the Earl of Nottingham, though to no purpose. Had your Grace been at that time in your now station, undoubtedly all the mischief he has done since, both in England and Scotland, had been early prevented."

A paper and a letter. Seal.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95-6, March 13, Dublin Castle.— . . . "The Judges are now in their circuits; the Justices of the Peace are now of course executing the Disarming Act; both which happen very fortunately, and I have now returns from the several counties of the posture of the Militia; so that what I have already (sic) acquainted your Grace with (before this plot broke out) of the manner of my having disposed of the Army and garrisons, I doubt not but we shall be in a readiness should any attempt be made within the kingdom.

"The City of Dublin have made an address to his Majesty, which I send your Grace this post. They have been very unanimous in it, and there is an Association going on likewise, which they tell me will be very unanimous.

"I received your Grace's, the last post save one, of March the 3rd."

R. 27, 96.

ROB. YOUNG TO SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 14, the King's Bench Prison.—"As in conscience I am obliged, I gave his Majesty an account already of some dangerous persons who lies [lie] lurking about this prison, purely for safeguard. They have for the major part abandoned their houses in the City, and has [have] been so open enemies to his Majesty's peace and tranquillity that they have kept a weekly Jacobite Club at one Mr. Vain's in the Mint in Southwark, and at a place called the Hole in the Wall in London, and at one Mr. Shrimpton's at the Monument, in Blackman Street. My Lord, the Mint and the White Friars are the two only places where all roguery is hatched, and places likewise where nobody is questioned what they are nor from whence they come, because they are privileged places. In the Mint, the major part are all Jacobites, and likewise the White Friars, where, in their Clubs, and correspondence with great ones, whom as yet I dare not name, they have not only vilified this Government, but kept a close correspondence with France. My cousin Crafford, who went away with the late King James, has been here with advice from France several times, and from England to Ireland. He was here about three weeks ago, and was with Mr. Joseph Shuff, who dispersed his letters. . . .

“I formerly gave an account how that his Majesty was to be assassinated as he went to Ireland, and, after that failed, how that his Majesty’s house was to be burned, and, that failing to come to that head which they expected, how that his Majesty was to be shot at the delivery of a petition by Capt. John O’Byran, employed for that purpose; and many other discoveries I made, as will appear by my informations lodged in the custody of Mr. Aaron Smith, Mr. Harbord, and Secretary Trencher, who is since dead. Yet notwithstanding all I was overpowered by great persons, some of whom will now be found deeply engaged before all be done. Now, may it please your Grace, this plot in all appearance is quashed, but I say no; for his Majesty’s life is still in danger by poison, and that by a person now at Court, who waits the French King’s resolutions.” . . .

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 14-24, Turin.—We heard yesterday of the design (parti) of the French in England, which they proposed to support with 12,000 men, and by the presence of King James. God be praised for having preserved the King from the hands of these assassins. It is very sad to know that the King’s person is exposed to such great dangers, and that there are men so wicked as to conspire against his life; but in other respects this cannot but do good to affairs in general, and all Europe, watching for the embarkation at Calais, and being curious about the event, will show detestation of so execrable a design. His R. H.’s continued illness has greatly delayed the preparations for the campaign.

French. R. 31 [March] 1696.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1695-6, March 15, Kensington.—“King, Prince, Lord Privy Seal, Archbishop, Lord Godolphin, Lord Steward, Shrewsbury, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Portland, Mr. Russell, Mr. Secretary.

“Lord Deputy’s letter of the 2nd March being read, it is ordered to be considered again.

“Chaloner to be sent for once more to the Council, and [they will] endeavour to get what they can out of him, before his warrant be delivered out.

“The King resolves to keep a squadron to observe the Dunkirk squadron.

“I told them there is still an expectation that [if] the Toulon fleet, joining with those fitting out in the Ocean, should come into the Channel, [it will] be superior, and cover a landing, if they please, either from Brest or Callais.

“Mr. Russell is against any of the Fleet going to Spithead till they are strong enough to oppose the enemy’s fleet, and for making the rendezvous in the Downs.”

In Shrewsbury’s hand.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 17-27, Turin.—Has been informed of the particulars of the conspiracy against the King. Hopes the Fleet under Admiral Russell will retaliate on the enemy some portion of the evil they intended to do us. The enemy at Pignerol and Suse are much astonished at the ill success of King James's voyage, on which they had founded such great hopes that in several provinces they had made bonfires and other public rejoicings, as if England had already been conquered. The son of Lord Broadalbin (sic) has been here two days; he is very young, and says nothing. His tutor speaks like a man very zealous for the King's service. Knows however that he did not speak thus at Geneva at the beginning of this affair. Has presented the young man to their Royal Highnesses; he is to depart tomorrow, in order to continue his journey to Rome.

French. R. April 4, 1696.

CAPEL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]95[-6], March 18, Dublin Castle.—“I have your Grace's of the 10th instant, and have, by the advice of the Privy Council, appointed the 27th of June to be the day to which the Parliament should adjourn.

“I have had a Declaration signed by all the Council, proper for the Council only. It was brought in by my Lord Blessing[ton], who was zealous in it, and I send your Grace a copy of it here enclosed.

“We continue here all in quiet, and unless Mons. de Nezmon visits us, I hope we may continue so.”

Endorsed by Shrewsbury: R. 27, 1696, with a[n] Association from the Council.

[MONS.] HUNZIGER to LORD GALWAY.

1696, March 21-31, Basle.—“Le zele que j'ay tousiours eu pour le service de sa Majesté, et pour sa conseruation, m'oblige, Mylord, a sacrifier tous mes interets pour vous donner vn aduis tres important, qui regarde tant la vie de ce grand Prince, que l'interest de l'Europe.

“Je diray donc, Mylord, que le Roy Jaques estant a Calais avec vne troupe de Jesuites, j'appris d'un de ces derniers, du Couuent de St. Omer, Irlandois de nation, que les auteurs des conspirations ne se rebuttoient pas pour auoir esté decouuert par vn espece de miracle. J'eus le bonheur d'apprendre par ce mesme, la decouuerte de cet horrible attentat, a cause que le vaisseau qui va a la decouuerte, en apporta trois jours apres les nouuelles au Roy Jaques, qui fit cesser tous les preparatifs pour vne flotte de trois cent voiles qui estoient à Calais. Le Capitaine s'appelle Guillaume Gilles, qui fait voile du costé depuis Douvres jusques pres de l'Isle de Vight, et qui remet les pacquets dans vn village a vne lieue dans les terres, qu'un matelot de l'equipage m'a nommé Hedden [Iden?], aussi bien que d'autres tant de Calais que de Boulogne qui vont a la maison rouge sur les costes deça de la Rie [Rye]. Le mattelot m'adjoutta que les gardes des costes les laissent passer, si bien que les Protestans de Calais m'ont assuré qu'il passe deux fois la semaine des personnes masquées, qui viennent, ou vont en Angleterre; et qu'il y a six barques longues de Calais qui apportent vne si grande quantité de laines que sans ce comerce la ville seroit dans vne extreme disette. J'en ais veu arriver plus de quarante en neuf jours de temps que j'y fus du temps que le Roy Jaques y estoit, mais tous masqués ou déguisés. J'ay tenté de passer de Furnes a Nieuport des le comencement de ces preparatifs, mais il m'a esté impossible de reussir, si bien que dans vne chose ou il s'agit de la vie du plus grand prince du monde, mes amis m'ont obligés d'en donner aduis a vostre Grandeur."

Lord Galway will remember the benefits which he conferred on the writer at the recommendation of M. de Romagnac, and the letter which he wrote to the Duke de Schomberg in his behalf; and that he went to Vitthall [Whitehall] to procure a passport for him, as a captain, to Piedmont; but his friends would not allow him to serve any longer. "Cependant vne facheuse nouvelle de Calais m'obligea de prendre vne capitaine-lieutenance au regiment de Stoppa, pour retirer le bien de mon espouse, qu'un de ses freres pretendoit auoir en vertu de ledit touchant le bien des Refugiés; et mesme je fus obligé lannée passée dy faire venir ma famille." Asks for some employment, and wishes to know, through Lord Galway's secretary, whether he should present himself at Turin. Is going to Zurich, to his uncle "Monseigr. le Zunftmeister Greutter." Desires this to be kept secret, or his family, in France, would be lost.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]95-6, March 23, Dublin Castle.—"I have troubled your Grace ever[y] post since the breaking out of this horrid plot with a letter, lest his Majesty should be wanting in a constant information of the state of this kingdom. I cannot alter a tittle of what my former letters have made mention to your Grace, for we are all here in great peace and quiet, and all the ferment we have here is amongst the Protestants in their forwardness to shew who shall be most zealous in asserting his Majesty's right, and standing by his person."

R. 27, 1696.

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 23, o.s., Queen, at Cadiz.—"I am sorry to tell your Grace we have made more haste than good speed; for on the 13th inst. we sailed from this port with a fair wind, but that night it shifted, and took us short with thick, dirty weather, so that we were forced to keep sea for five days, in which time we sprung several masts, split many sails, and racked our great ships almost to pieces; but on Wednesday, the 18th, we had an opportunity of clear weather to get in again, and 'twas happy we made use of it; for since it has been very tempestuous, insomuch that several of the largest Dutch ships-of-war and divers English merchant-men broke their anchors in the bay, and were in great danger of being lost.

“We have advice of several wrecks appearing on the coast, and particularly of [that] three Dutch ships, one of them called the Saint Peter, being of 44 guns, are lost between this and Cape Trafalgar (sic); and, my Lord, had we kept the sea this storm, I do really believe the like misfortune had befallen most of our great ships, for they made very bad weather while we were out, though we had not much wind, nor near so great a sea as I have seen; yet the Royal William often rolled her middle tier, and sometimes her upper tier, of ports in the water, insomuch that they were apprehensive she would never right again; so that I am confirmed in my opinion that the exposing our great ships in the winter season will at one time or other be very fatal to us; and I do affirm to your Grace that this ruffle has wrought and worn them more than four summers’ service would have done.”

Cannot learn that the enemy are at sea. Has certain ships abroad on the look out for them. Encloses a copy of orders to Capt. Leake.

R. 29 April. Enclosures:—

1. Orders given by Sir George Rooke, Admiral, to Capt. Andrew Leake, of the Canterbury, left as commander-in-chief of H. M. ships in the Mediterranean, 7 March 1695-6.—Names of seven ships placed under his command. To annoy the King’s enemies, and secure the trade of his subjects. To take or destroy any ships belonging to the Emperor of Morocco or the French King, or their subjects. To keep a clean frigate in the Straits’ mouth, to look out for the French fleet, and on discovering them to make sail for England, &c. To fetch stores left at Port Mohon (sic). If ordered to send any ships up to Leghorn, one of them is to receive on board there Sir Thomas Deerham’s goods. “To wear a broad red pendant of distinction.” In case of his being incapacitated, Capt. John Baker is to command.

2. An account taken from several persons belonging to a Genouese ship, of particulars relating to the French fleet in the bay of Toulon, &c.; 26 Feb. 95-6.

3. A report taken from the officers of an Algerian ship, which had conveyed a Turkish Ambassador from Algier to Toulon, as to the French ships in Toulon Bay; 2 March 1695-6.

Endorsement of 2 and 3: A copy of Capt. Baker’s account from Toulonne.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1695-6, March 24–April 3, Turin.—The Marquis de Leganès left yesterday, after agreeing with his R.H. to prepare for the siege of Pignerol. Owing to the bad weather the French preparations have been relaxed. It appears that the discovery of the conspiracy will oblige them to change all their measures for this campaign. There was a report that the French fleet had quitted the Isles of Yeres. His R.H. is very ill; it is not true that he sent Count Vernon to Rome, as alleged.

French. R. April 11, 1696.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, March 28–April 7, Turin.—Sends a letter which may give some hints for the safety of the King's person, and for discovering the enemy's intelligences in England. Is not acquainted with "this officer," but will inquire about him. Does not remember having seen him at London; however, he seems to report the truth. Will send for him. His R.H. is better, but the Duchess is always ill. The French fleet certainly departed on the 22nd, but will meet with much bad weather before passing the Strait.

The son of M. de Tremblees is to present to Shrewsbury a letter from the Republic of Geneva (Genève); he wishes to enter the King's service.

French. R. April 14, 96.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1696, March 29, Kensington.—"King, Prince, Archbishop, Lord Keeper, Lord Steward, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Shrewsbury, Lord Portland, Mr. Secretary.

"Walsh to be executed.

"To send the declarations, especially the last, with the observation upon the clause for persons of a higher rank, and that he must take the course by law punctually to put them in execution.

"The French Prot[estants] of Cork to have the house they desire.

"A proclamation for the conspirators, several being not named.

"Chaloner to be examined at the Cabinet Council.

"Lord Deputy's letter about French; no resolution taken.

"Admiralty called in.

"It is not safe for the trade to go out till Sir Geo. Rooke arrives.

"Richards and Benbow to go with some bomb-ships to try to endamage the transport at Calais."

Aynsworth of Sou[th]wark, Ricsone, Jenings, Hall alias Cole, Gillebrand, Lord Yarmouth, the late Bishop of Norwich.

In Hunt's examination, 26 March 1696 (No. 25), the following passages occur:—"Lord C[1]ancarty told him that women came into the Tower, and in the evening carried him out in the coach; the warders examined the coach, but it was dark, and they did hide him.

"Parker told him he got up the chimney by a line that his wife brought him in the tail of her gown.

"Berk[enhea]d said Parker got out in women's clothes, and he believed the keeper was concerned in it."

In Capt. George Porter's information, 28 Feb. 1695-6 (No. 30):—"Sir George Berkley was sent from France to put this in execution against the King, about a month since he saw him.

"He had 800 [l. ?] paid to carry on the design by Mr. Caryl; he complained of the small sum. Mr. Rookwood was to command one party to attack the Guards, he was to attack them with another, Sir George Barkley (sic) to attack the [King's] coach, some Saturday, between Brentford and Hamersmith. There was another design to attack him [the King] near a little wood, not far from Mr. Lakin's (?) house. It did not succeed, because the King did not for the two last Saturdays go out. . . .

* Same as Capt. Nowell above ?

“Chambers, at Kensington, lodged over against the Guard-house, in order to give notice when the King went out.”

In La Rue's information, 29 Feb. (No. 33):—“Keys was in the list which Porter sent as the list of his men, and Keys was present, and was there when they were sorry the design had failed, and was one that took the orange and squeezed it, and said, ‘Confusion to the Prince of Orange,’ and spoke of the restoring the King, meaning King James.”

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1696, April 3, Whitehall.—“Yours of the 10-20 and 14-24 are come to my hands, and some others before, which have been all laid before his Majesty, but they requiring no particular answer, nor I receiving no directions from the King, either upon them or any other matter to be transmitted to your Lordship, I have neglected writing so frequently as I would, if the perpetual attendance I am forced to give to the enquiry into this horrid plot, besides that upon the Parliament, did not almost take up my whole time and thoughts.

“This villainous intention has not only miscarried, but I hope it has opened the eyes of many deluded though well affected persons in these kingdoms, for there appears everywhere, upon this occasion, a hearty affection and zeal for his Majesty's person and government, which I am confident may be improved to the securing of both.”

THE LORDS OF THE ADMIRALTY TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, April 15, Admiralty Office.—“Meeting with news at the House, that the French fleet was at the Straits’ mouth the 20th of March, and Sir George Rook at Cadiz the 19th, not expecting to sail under two or three days, and his Majesty having ordered the Fleet to Spithead, they must with this easterly wind leave the Dunkirk squadron behind them, besides several great ships at the Nore and Blackstakes. We have ventured to stop Sir Cloudesly Shovell till his Majesty’s further pleasure be known, because with the first westerly winds all the ships may go together to Spithead. When we wrote your Grace last for the Fleet to go to Spithead, we made no doubt but Sir George Rook was sufficiently before the French. We send you enclosed a copy of the orders we have sent to Sir Cloudesly Shovell for his continuing in the Downs with his Majesty’s ships and those of the States General.”

THE NAVY.

1696, April 29, Admiralty Office.—“The disposition of all his Majesty's ships of the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Rate, now in sea pay.”

Names of ships, and particulars of their service; with a list of ships left in the Mediterranean by Sir George Rooke.

2 pp.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1696, April 29, Kensington.—“King, Lord Keeper, Archbishop, Lord Privy Seal, Mr. Russell, Lord Chamberlain, Mr. Secretary, Lord Portland, Shrewsbury.

“The letter of the Admiralty to me of the 27th, and the copy of the instructions proposed to be sent Sir Geo. Rooke, were read.

“The squadron to protect the trade ordered to be sure to be stronger than Nesmond.

“Sir George Rooke to be ordered to stay for no merchants, but if any whole trade be ready, then he is to take that with him.

“That Sir George Rooke take with him what bomb-vessels he thinks may be useful.

“The Dunkirk squadron to be strengthened from the main Fleet, and some of the great ships of the main Fleet to be laid by to man some cruisers to protect the coast.

“Sir William Gore's letter read to the Admiralty. They cannot do it in the manner proposed, but they will give them a convoy.

“If the French squadron should stay in the Mediterranean, and not come from thence, the King declares his opinion, that a squadron should be sent to Cadix.

“That it should be considered whether the course of the victualling should be changed.

“If the Toulon squadron come to Brest, then the Admiralty are to consider in what manner to secure the Turkey ships.

“The Admiralty to consider of a squadron for the West Indias.

“For the next winter the King recommends we may be better provided than the last with a winter guard.”

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1696, April 30, Kensington.—“King, Lord Keeper, Archbishop, Lord Godolphin, Lord Privy Seals, Lord Chamberlain, Shrewsbury, Mr. Secretary.

“A copy of the letter from the Admiralty to be given the King.

“All the Reports from Ireland made.

“Mr. Robinson must attend the Board in Ireland, and to be accountable to it, let the practice formerly be what it will.

“That the dispute between the Ordn[ance?] in Ireland and England be shewed (?) and sent to his Majesty.

“Meester's business to be examined in the King's absence.

“The[n ?] print the same.

“Proposals for the Ma[r]ine Reg[iments] to be given Mr. Blaithwayt, because his Majesty will send over a regulation.

“Consuls' bills to be considered in the King's absence.

“Col. Lillingston's memorial and claims to be examined in the King's absence.

“Warrants for Fisher, La Rue, Harries, Porter, Henry Crimes; the warrants to be kept in my hands till further order from the King.

“That my lord Capell be writ to, to find out a forfeiture in Ireland for Mr. Prendergrass, to the value of 500[l.] per annum.

“Lowick and Rookwod's speeches read.

“The Sheriffs to forbear printing the speech for some time, but not to take notice they had such an order.

“A ship will be appointed for Guernzey.

“Bembo to have a flag, and command before Dunkirk.”

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, April 30, Queen, at Spittheade.—. . . “Mr. Russell seems to intimate as if his Majesty has been pleased to appoint me the command of the Fleet. If so, I must own to your Grace my suspicion of myself, both in respect to my capacity and experience, for so great a charge. And truly, my Lord, whenever Mr. Russell leaves that post, it will be my humble opinion, that it be executed by a commission, there being very few men in the world, besides himself, that are fitly qualified for so great a command.” A good reinforcement of men for the Fleet is absolutely necessary.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

1696, May 1, Kensington.—“King, Prince, Lord Keeper, Archbishop, Lord Steward, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Godolphin, Mr. Russel, Mr. Secretary, Shrewsbury.

“Paper for the Commissioners of Exchange of Prisoners read, and they directed to give an account in the King’s absence of the names and numbers of such as are reduced (?), and what evidence they have of it.

“My Lady Ailesbury’s petition to be granted.

“Mr. Secretary and I are to write to the foreign Ministers to restrain their bills of extraordinary [expenses], according to Orders of Council in King James’ and his Majesty’s time, of which copies be sent.

“That a messenger go with positive orders to Sir Geo. Rooke to sail.”

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 2, Queen, at Spittheade.—“I have received the Lords of the Admiralty’s orders to sail with the Fleet into the Soundings; and I am very sorry I cannot give your Grace and them an account we are in a readiness to put them in execution; for, my Lord, we have been five weeks from Cadiz, and after our arrival in the Downs the weather was such that we could not get a boat-load of water from the shore, nor did any of the Straits’ squadron receive any beer or other provisions aboard till yesterday; though, had the Fleet been permitted to stop here, instead of proceeding to the Downs, we had been in a readiness for the sea ere this; but, as it is, it will take up some time to put those ships into a condition to sail, which so soon as we can possibly effect, there shall not be a moment lost in our proceeding.”

Mr. Mitchell can give information as to men required in the Fleet. The ships from Cadiz are defective, and some of those in the Downs are much worse. Would rather serve with half the ships well manned than with double the number half-manned.

Re. 3rd.

CAPEL TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 3, Chapell Izod.—“Finding myself troubled this spring with the same indisposition I formerly laboured under, I retired out of Dublin to Chapell Izod, by advice of my physicians, for the advantage of a better air; and being told that a short recess from business would contribute to my speedier recovery, I resolved on making my Lord Blessinton and Colonel Woseley (sic) Justices during my sickness.

“This I was the more inclined to do, that such who may have designs to disturb the peace of the Government might not be encouraged to proceed in their practices, in hopes that upon my death the Government would for some time be vacant, till writs could be issued and returned from the several Counties for choosing a Justice, according to a statute of the 33rd Hen. 8 in this kingdom, until his Majesty's pleasure were known who should succeed me.

"Some difficulties have arisen about wording the Commission for Justices, which hath taken up some days' time; and it hath pleased God in the meanwhile that my feverish distemper hath entirely left me, and my strength so increases, that I hope in a few days not to need the assistance of any person in the Administration.

"Having seen letters out of the country that some have reported me dead, and probably have writ the same into England, I thought myself obliged to give your Grace this account."

Signed. R. 11th.

SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

1696, May 4, from Quakes, near Margate.—. . . "If you could have met the French Toulon fleet before they had got to Brest, your strength is so considerable, compared to theirs, who have suffered much in the storm, and are ill manned, that the success (I do not doubt) would have answered expectation; but impossibilities are not to be struggled with. It was unfortunate you were not prevented from coming further than Spitthead, when [where?] it was his Majesty's intention you should have stopped." . . .

SHREWSBURY TO LORD DEPUTY [CAPEL].

1696, May 4, from Quakes, near Margate.—"I am upon many accounts extreme sorry to hear of your Excellency's indisposition.

"His Majesty, taking into consideration that the Irish Parliament is adjourned to the end of next month, commands me to desire your Excellency to give your opinion what may be for his service to do in relation to them; in the first place, whether it is reasonable to believe they will be disposed to grant a farther supply, and be inclined to avoid such heats and disputes as would make their meeting not advisable. . . .

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 6, Queen, off the Isle of Wight.—Sends copies of some councils of war formerly omitted, and a line of battle. The latter is of great force, though not numerous, but most of the ships “are very little better in quality than half manned.” Will however do his best for his country.

Enclosures:—

1. “The Line of Battle: the English to lead with the larboard, and the Dutch with the starboard tacks aboard.”—The names of the ships, with the numbers of men and guns, are stated.

2. Copies of the resolutions of several Councils of flag-officers held on board the Queen, as follow.

Cadiz Bay, 30 Jan., o.s. : To send a squadron of English and Dutch ships to look for a squadron of five French ships in Lagos Bay.

20 Feb. : After considering sundry letters from the Duke of Shrewsbury, Mr. Fowler of Genova, &c., as the French fleet at Tholoone is superior by nearly one third in the number of guns, and by almost one half in the number of men, to proceed to England according to his Majesty’s order, &c.

22 Feb. : owing to the season of the year, and for the security of the great ships, to “strike down” some of their guns into their holds; and that the fleet of merchant ships in the Bay proceed home in company with the Fleet.

4 March : as to certain ships to be left behind.

12 March : to sail with the first opportunity, and to send a frigate along the Barbary shore as high as Cape de Hone, to discover the enemy.

At sea, 18 March : to send away disabled ships to Cadiz, in order to refit; the rest to keep the sea, &c.

Cadiz Bay, 25 March : on reading advices from Barcellona sent by Mr. Stanhope, Envoy Extraordinary at Madrid, that the enemy’s fleet, consisting of 60 sail, sailed from Tholoone on the 22nd, a letter from Capt. Loades of the Romney, and his Majesty’s orders of 27 Jan., to proceed to England, not being in sufficient force to oppose the enemy.

At sea, 3 April : on reading a paper from Capt. Pickard as to a [Dutch] convoy and five merchant ships taken by six French men-of-war on 31 March, n.s., to the N. of Cape Fenister, not to go in pursuit, in case they be joined by the French fleet from Tholoone, “and we not being certain but our circumstances at home may render the appearance and assistance of this Fleet necessary to the common safety.”

At Spithead, 1 May : on reading the Lords of the Admiralty’s letter and order of the 29th ult., to proceed into the Soundings, after the Straits ships are supplied with water and stores; and that the condition of the Fleet be represented to their Lordships.

2 May : that two ships be unmanned, and their men turned over to four other ships (named), and that two ships be left at Spithead, &c.; which reduces the English line of battle to 37 ships.

3 May: to proceed west 15 leagues from Ushant, "and if fair weather to stop sides as far as Torrbay," and in passing to send small frigates and brigantines to learn whether the Toulon fleet be got into Brest, &c.; and stating that the line of battle, being but 37 English and 20 Dutch, is reduced to a smaller number than the Toulon fleet, if they are joined with the squadron of Mons. Nesmond.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 8, Whitehall.—"I hope the wind changed at sea at least as soon as it did here with us, and that his Majesty's passage was more favourable than was expected.

"Sir George Rooke sailed from Spithead to St. Helen's on Monday the 4th, and from thence the next day, but though for some time after the wind continued fair, yet there was so little of it that the last account we have of him is that he was seen on the back of the Isle of Wight.

"I desire that you will acquaint his Majesty that Captain Porter has proceeded as far as it will go with those persons that would have inveigled him beyond seas. The story is long, and what Mr. Vernon, who is best acquainted with it, will write at large to my Lord Portland, if his Majesty has the curiosity to be informed of the particulars. All I shall say is, that Mr. Porter has in this dealt very sincerely, and given fresh proofs of his being to be depended on, and seems to intend deserving the King's consideration as much as a man can do that has been in his unfortunate circumstances.

"The Council have met today about sending orders into the country, pursuant to his Majesty's directions the last time they attended upon him, and likewise about the discharging prisoners. They have made a progress, but positively resolved on nothing till Monday, that they have appointed to meet again."

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 9, Britannia, off Dartmouth.—Sends intelligence of the Tollonne squadron's being come into these seas. If they have not got into Brest, we may light on them to a good advantage at Bell-Isle. Has no clean frigates for scouts.

R. 15. Enclosure :—

Information of Thomas Ford, pilot of the Monta Decarno, a Portuguese, bound for Rotterdam, as to meeting with a fleet of French men-of-war. Supposes they could not reach Brest, but are somewhere about Bell-Isle. Dated on board H.M. ship Oxford, off Portland, 9 May, 1696.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 12, Whitehall.—"Yours of the 8th brought the welcome news of his Majesty's safe arrival. The probable accounts we have received of the Toulon's (sic) fleet being come to Brest (the particulars of which I shall refer to Mr. Vernon), together with the discourses the Jacobites spread here among their own party, make us so far apprehend the continuance of their design of invading us, as to wish the Dutch ships appointed might be hastened with all expedition. If we should have news of the French putting to sea, and being joined by any ships of the ocean, we should hardly think ourselves strong enough without the addition of the Dutch ships not yet arrived, and should be forced to man out some of our own ships that lie still for want of men, which could be done by no other means than by putting some Regiments aboard, which I doubt would not be agreeable to his Majesty's inclination, and yet in such a conjuncture could not be avoided.

"I must observe on this occasion the misfortune we lie under, by reason of our correspondencies on the enemy's coast being interrupted or discovered. If any of the persons who may be so discovered can be exchanged or any ways saved by any methods Mr. Jurieu or others can propose, I hope his Majesty's goodness will incline him to do what may be for their preservation; and till something of the like nature can again be settled, we shall so much want intelligence at this critical time of the year, that I hope, if any comes to his Majesty's hands that may be of use here, he will please to direct that it may be communicated hither.

"One of the enclosed letters I received from Dublin in a letter subscribed Cavan, one is from my Lord Gallway, and the third from, Sir, your most faithful," &c.

SHREWSBURY TO LORD DEPUTY [CAPEL].

1696, May 12, Whitehall.—"I most sincerely rejoice at the good news your Excellency has sent us in yours of the 3rd, that your health is mending. . . .

"I conclude, when there is occasion, your Excellency's prudence will appoint such persons to be Justices as shall in all circumstances be most proper, and therefore have no objection to your nominating such for your own time, if it may be an ease to you, and an advantage to your health; but I apprehend the power in your commission does hardly extend so far as to appoint any to succeed after you, in case we should be so unhappy as to have you taken into another world. . . . People here who are the best able to judge, upon perusing your Lordship's commission and the Statute of Henry VIII., are of opinion there is nothing in the first that takes away the direction in the last, but that upon the death of a Chief Governor the Council must elect for the interim as that Statute appoints." . . .

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 12, Britannia, S. by E. 8 l. off the Lyzard.—Sends this by the Lyme, who came in last night from the Straits, and encloses a copy of the captain's account, which is blind and imperfect. It seems he saw the French fleet at a great distance, was scared out of his senses, and ran away from them as fast as he could. Concludes these southerly winds have brought them to Brest. Will proceed towards Ushant, to obtain information. Gives his ideas as to what the enemy may intend to do.

R. 15. Enclosure :—

Account by [Capt.] V. Bowles [name of ship not stated] of his instructions and proceedings for discovering the French fleet. . . . Was chased into Cadiz Bay, "where on the 16th [April] we had advice by an express from [the consul at] Gibraltar that the French fleet was at anchor to the eastward of that place, much about where the Lumley Castle was lost; and the four ships that chased us were seen off Terreef, cruising from side to side, while their fleet lay near Gibraltar, the Spaniard giving them free liberty to send their boats ashore and buy what they had occasion for; they giving the Spaniard the same liberty to pass with their boats or vessels when they pleased (as if allies); and that their scouts in the Straits' mouth give them all assurance of a free passage to and from Ceuta, without any molestation from them." Left Cadiz Bay a few days later, and was again chased by five French ships, one of which "hauled down her French colours, and hoisted an English jack and ensign."

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 12-22, Turin.—The enemy continue their march towards the plain, and will be this evening at Veillane. We are behind Turin, so as to avoid a combat. The Swiss officer who sent the advices has fallen ill at Arrau, which has prevented his coming here, as directed.

French. R. 29.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 15, Whitehall.—"Your letter of the 12th I received this morning, and the Lords of the Admiralty having attended the Justices at the same time, the proposal of sending a squadron to the West Indies was renewed, to which it seems to me they are not much inclined. The proposal you left with me was also read to them, but they think it necessary all ships that go to those seas should be sheathed, which makes the dispatch more tedious than you reckon. They complain those parts have been very fatal to the seamen, the want of which is one of our greatest difficulties; in short, they say, if such a squadron be ordered, it must be taken from the main Fleet; so that, till Sir George Rooke returns, no consideration can be had of it.

"Mr. Musgrave, being removed into Sir Thomas Littleton's place, has a pretention to the same additional salary of a hundred pounds a year, which the King granted to Sir Thomas about two years since, but has (as I am informed) been generally enjoyed by his predecessors in that employment. Mr. Vernon will send you a warrant for the King's hand in case his Majesty be pleased to allow it; at the same time a commission will also come to constitute Mr. Buscawen, Governor of St. Mawes, which his Majesty directed, but was neglected before his departure.

"I have a letter from Sir George Rooke of the 12th. He was then S. and by E. 8 leagues off the Lizard, endeavouring to gain the latitude of Ushant, and intending to send in vessels to look into Brest, or otherwise not to lose the first opportunity of gaining the best intelligence he could of the enemy.

"We have sat two days in Council examining the warrant his Majesty had signed for constituting the National Land Bank, in order to our signing the Bill; some few alterations have been thought necessary, but all is this night settled, and will be signed by us as soon as the Bill can be prepared."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 19, Whitehall.—"The enclosed letter from Mr. d'Hervart I received by the last post. What relates to increasing the pension to one of the Advoyers, his Majesty alone can judge what is proper, and will I suppose direct you to write accordingly to Mr. d'Hervart. But as to the complaint that his Majesty's Minister does not give them the same style that others do, I think it may not be improper that you know we can find no precedents in our books of any transactions with the Cantons, insomuch that I remember, when Mr. Cox came hither, we could not decide in whose province he was. I mention this because I believe there will be less difficulty in satisfying them upon this head, and in giving them the same style that is practised by the Emperor, France, and the other crowned heads.

"My Lord Monmouth moved yesterday in Council in favour of Sir William Booth, who, having absconded all this while, falls under his Majesty's directions not to be bailed nor set at liberty, if he should surrender himself; but my Lord Monmouth acquainting the Council that he offered now to come in, to take the Oaths, and sign the Association, and Mr. Secretary bearing witness for him that he had at first offered to surrender himself, if he might be admitted to bail, the Lords of the Council thought there was something particular in this gentleman's circumstances, and desired they might be laid before his Majesty.

"Letters of the 14th from Dublin left my Lord Deputy in so desperate a condition that we expect the next news will bring an account of his death.

"I have one from you of the 14th."

SIR G. ROOKE to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]96, May 19, Britannia, N.W. by W. 21 l. off Ushant.—
 "We got over upon this coast on the 14th, in the morning, and I immediately detached a squadron of ships and small vessels under the command of Capt. Beaumont in the Mountague, and sent them in for discovery at the Trade between Ushant and the Maine, who without any resistance stood fair into Camarett and Bertram Bays from side to side, and saw as much in Brest Sound as they could without passing their forts." Sends the account and a resolution of the council of flag-officers, to whom there appeared to be no certainty that the Tollonne fleet was got into Brest.

"I ordered Capt. Beaumont in again, to get some people either from the shore or out of fisher-boats, who might give us more certain intelligence; and at the same time I sent the Lark and Messenger spy-boat to make what discovery they could at Bell-Isle. Captain Beaumont on the 16th, at night, sent the brigantines, two twenty-oared boats, &c., into a place called the Mollino's (sic), between Ushant and St. Matthew's Point, where in the night they landed, surprised the guard, and took the people in their beds; and after plundering a poor town and church, they burned five or six small vessels, of which one was an English-built ketch, and brought away a priest and three or four of the principal inhabitants with them.

"Yesterday morning Capt. Beaumont returned and joined the Fleet, as did about the same time Capt. Edwards in the Seaverne, and Capt. Norris in the Content Prize, the latter having two nights before taken a French man-of-war of thirty guns, called the Fudriant, who sailed from Brest the 13th inst.; so that, the prisoners in the man-of-war and those taken from the shore concurring in their account . . . that the Tollonne fleet arrived at Brest the 15th instant, n.s., I called the flag-officers aboard again. . . . We shall take the first opportunity of proceeding according to my orders at Torbay."

Sends an account by Capt. Fitz Patricke of his having almost had a rencounter with Mons. Nesmonde. Some of the prisoners confess that their fleet came into port in a very ill condition. Some boast that they will have 90 ships-of-line at sea this summer; others suppose they will fit out only a strong squadron, which will probably attempt to intercept our Turkey fleet in their passage home, or the Spanish galleons in their return from the West Indias.

R. 22. Enclosures :—

1. Copy of the account of Capt. Beaumont and other officers, 14 May. Went within a mile of the rock going into Brest, and saw 22 sail, &c.

2. Copy of the resolution of a Council of flag-officers on the Britannia, off Ushant, 15 May: that it seemed uncertain whether the Toulon fleet had arrived; to send a small frigate and a spy-boat to look into Bell-Isle, &c.

3. Copy of Capt. Norris's account, which he took from the officers of the Fudryant, a French prize, taken 16 May. She had 28 guns and 150 men, and was bound to meet Mons. Nesmond, who has eight ships with him. The Toulon fleet arrived at Brest on the 5th, and were 47 men-of-war, besides four which had been forced back to Toulon by damage received at sea. "Mons. Amperail is said to be amongst these gentlemen."

4. Copy of the depositions of some Frenchmen who were taken from the Mollins, 18 May; that the Toulon fleet arrived in Brest about a fortnight ago, and consisted of about 60 sail, and 5 or 6 flags.

5. Copy of the depositions of Capt. Ferville [or Friville?], commander of the la Foudroyante, 19 May, o.s., as to French ships at Brest, Port Louis, Rochfort, Dunkirke, and Toulon. Mons. Nesmonde was sent cruising with seven sail, &c.

6. Copy of the resolution of a Council of flag-officers, 18 May, to make the best of their way to Torrbay.

7. Copy of a letter from Capt. Fitzpatrick, commander of the Burford, to the Admiral, 16 May, off the west end of the Seames; about his meeting with a French fleet, supposed to be Nesmond's squadron.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 22, Whitehall.—“This morning I received your letter of the 18-28, and laid it before the Lords at their meeting. The only objection to obeying his Majesty's commands immediately, and ordering the troops to encamp, and vessels to be prepared for embarking the ten battalions, was the wonderful scarcity of money, which puts a difficulty upon everything. However, at the next meeting the Lords will be attended by the Commissioners of Transport and others, and what can be done will not be omitted, to comply with his Majesty's directions.

“If a squadron could be spared, and might be sent in any time to the West Indies, it might secure Boston against the expedition mentioned in the letter from Commr. St. Loo, and the rest of the Plantations from any other design the French may have against them at this time. The Admiralty will be discoursed with again upon this occasion. The Commissioners of Trade have not yet met, for want of a convenient place, and the Committee of Plantations decline meddling with any matters which it is supposed will be put into the care of that Commission.

“Enclosed is a letter from Consul Cole at Algiers, by which it seems the Dey is disposed for the present to waive the searching English ships for passes, and the seizing those that want them. The Consul expects some directions, which must be left to his Majesty; but Mr. Baker, the late Consul, is of opinion that if Mr. Cole had directions to demand the suspension of that art[icle] of the Treaty that relates to passes during the war only, it would not be hard to get it continued afterwards.

“In Consul Cole’s letter to Mr. Baker he mentions five horses, which the Dey designed to present the King with, upon his being informed his Majesty delighted in good horses; he says they only wait for the opportunity of the first ship to bring them away.

“My Lady Oglethorp solicits extremely that Sir Theophilus might be excepted from the common rule his Majesty has set, that all who had absconded should be continued in custody (if taken) during the term the law prescribes. It is true he offered to surrender at first upon bail, and I cannot refuse her importunity to lay this before his Majesty.”

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, May 23, Britannia, off Dartmouth, going into Torbay.—“Since my last to your Grace of the 19th, Mr. Aylmer with three third-rates, and Sir Martin Beckman with the bomb-vessels, and Vice-Admiral Evertsen with twelve men-of-war, &c., joined the Fleet, the enclosed being a list of the Dutch squadron; so that we are now together upwards of eighty ships of line, a fine Fleet, and it’s pity but they should be made useful to the public service; but I have racked my thoughts, and can propose but one way of rendering them effectually so, and that is by laying the body of our Fleet in Camarett and Bertram Bays, and making a detachment to sustain the small frigates and bomb-vessels, and sending them into the Bay with orders to do what mischief they can. Thus, my Lord, blocking up the enemy's fleet in their principal port, insulting their coast, and burning their towns at the same time, must, in all humble opinion, expose them to the world, make them very uneasy at home, and give a reputation to his Majesty's arms. And this, my Lord, I believe may be done with the assistance of some small frigates, provided it be executed quickly; which I humbly offer to your Grace's consideration as my private thoughts, not knowing how it may be approved of at a council of war, though I must confess I do not see any great risk in the undertaking.

"I wrote to the Lords of the Admiralty to desire the Fleet may be victualled with fresh provisions two days in a week, otherwise many of our men, especially those returned from the Straits, will be lost for want of refreshments. I tell your Grace this, that in case you think it necessary you may please to induce their Excellencies the Lords Justices to exert their authority in the matter."

— [a Jesuit] to —

1696, [May 23.] June 2, Luxembourg.—"La verité est, que mon silence a été causé par l'inaction ou nous nous trouvons depuis long temps. On ne nous asseuroit de rien plus que d'une prompte campagne cette année-cy, unique moyen de faire des progress (sic), tres facile si l'on vouloit, et a quoy tout nous invite. Cependant, je voyois si peu d'apparence a l'execution, que je n'ay pas voulu chagriner, ni vous en vous disant mes sentiments, ni moy meme a vous les ecrire, aimant mieux que le temps vous en portat la nouvelle. Je remarque que les Princes se lassent a la fin de leur fortune et condition; et qu'apres avoir joué quelque temps leurs personages dans ce monde, soit par ennuy de sa vanité, ou pour quelque autre raison, ils rentrent en eux memes, se reduisant au veritable etre de l'home, qui aime naturellement le repos. Je ne puis vous dire d'avantage là dessus.

"Notre armée s'assemble a Bude, et on fait mine icy d'attaquer Temiswar, entreprise tres propre pour le mois de May passé. Notre armée est en verité belle, mais commandée de memes chefs que l'année passé, sujette aux memes inconvenients, plus pauvre, avec moins d'harmonie; et ce qui est le plus, nous avons a faire a un en [n]emy, a qui nous avons appris par nos fautes, les siennes. Il y a dans la place 15M. Janissaires; Cornaro l'a fortifié, et veut la défendre. Outre cela nous verrons dans peu le Gr. Turc paroistre en ces quartiers là, avec une formidable armée; il est en son pouvoir de luy donner tel mouvement qu'il voudra, et il n'est pas obligé de nous venir trouver; les places d'Hongrie, mal garnies et fortifiées, et dont le plus grand part gist dans ses vieilles ruines, luy donnant l'accès part (sic) tout. Si l'ennemy se vouloit prendre a une bataille, nous pourrions esperer quelque bon succes; mais aussy, si une seule fois nous eussions du pis, treize années de travaux et de victoires tomberoient a la fois. Adjustez a cela la pauvreté de nos finances, qui est si grand, qu'on ne peut donner le moure[m]ent aux desseins. Cependant il n'y a jamais en [eu?] plus grand luxe en ce pays-cy, ny plus d'argent parmy les sujets, qu'aujourdhy.

“Je vous en pourrois conter d'autres, mais cela suffit pour vous faire comprendre, qu'on est icy dans la disposition d'accepter de la France telle paix qu'elle nous voudra donner. Je ne puis pourtant m'empecher d'estre fâché a vos voisins, qui semble vouloir reprendre leurs vie[il]les maximes, et se sauver eux seuls du naufrage; mais notre fatalité veut, que nous soyons trompez plus d'une fois. J'ay déjà ouy murmurer quelque chose de cette paix, et on nous flatte icy que nous aurons aussy une petite part au gasteau, et c'est assez de nous leurer, et que faire? Nous avons l'ennemy dans l'Empire, sur nos terres; le danger et la jalousie entre les membres qui le composent s'acroist; et nous tombons, et tomberons éternellement, dans les memes fautes sur lesquelles l'ennemy triomphe.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 26, Whitehall.—“Having acquainted you in a former letter that Sir William Booth was ready to take the Oaths and sign the Association, if he might be admitted to so much favour with his Majesty as to be exempted from the rule to be set upon all absconders, the Council have been since informed by my Lord Monmouth that there was a mistake in that offer, so that I suppose there will now remain no cause to exempt him from the common fate of others in his circumstances.

“I am desired by Mr. Russell to put the King in mind that the business of the Admiralty suffers for want of attendance, and that he understood once his Majesty did consent another more healthy and able to attend should be in the room of Col. Austen, he receiving the pension, with which himself was well satisfied.

“My Lord Berkly speaks of the proposal you will find mentioned in our letter to his Majesty with all the assurance of success imaginable, and that he is confident all the English officers will concur in opinion with him. I confess I very much doubt whether they will. Hitherto I think at sea we have rather erred on the too cautious hand; therefore if it be undertaken I hope it will succeed, for the consequence one way or the other is too visible to be enlarged upon.”

SHREWSBURY TO SIR G. ROOKE.

1696, May 26, Whitehall.—Lord Berkely is just going down to the Fleet. “You[r] being recalled from the command of the Fleet, and another sent down in your room, might have the appearance to you, as if people werè dissatisfied with your conduct, which I assure you they are not; but his Majesty was pleased to direct, at his going away, that you should be at the head of the Fleet for the expedition you then went on, and that after that my Lord Berkeley should be sent down; he thinking it necessary you should attend upon the Admiralty Board, for reasons I can better explain when I see you.”

SIR G. ROOKE TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, May 27, Britannia, in Torbay.—“This morning a French ketch coming from the eastward, and seeing the Fleet in the Bay, came in to us, and surrendered himself and vessel, and begged that he might be permitted to settle either in Plymouth or Dartmouth, and received into his Majesty’s protection and government. I do enclose your Grace a copy of what the master, &c., says upon their examination, and do humbly offer my opinion that if they be encouraged, it may be a means to draw others over after them. I shall send them into Dartmouth, to remain there till your Grace shall signify their Excellencies the Lords Justices’ pleasure relating to them and their vessel.”

R. 29. Enclosure :—

“Deposition of John Saurin, native of Rochell, and master of the ketch Mary of Rochell.

“That he went about six months ago from Rochell to Calais loaded with salt, intending, after he had sold his cargo, to pass over into England, being one of the French new converts. He was stopped at Port Lewis for two months and a half, expecting for a convoy. That he left Calais seven days ago, and was going to Plymouth, but, seeing the English Fleet, came to surrender, and beg the Admiral’s protection, that he may continue without molestation his voyage to Plymouth, where he intends to settle and keep his vessel employed.

“He has wife and daughters still in France, who are to follow him in a short time; he has friends and relations both in England and Holland. He has four men with him, three of whom are Protestants, the other a Papist, who knew nothing of his design.

“He says ’tis generally given out in France their Fleet is disarming, and are not to go out this year; that some thousands of seamen deserted last year in Province, having not received their pay, as they had been promised. That they had pressed very hard this year for the fitting out of the Touloune fleet.

“That the misery in France increases every day. That our bombs in Calais did but little harm, most of them arriving short of the town; and the houses being unfurnished, about thirty houses only received some damage, none being set on fire.

“The foresaid Deposition is verbatim confirmed by James Urтин, pilot of the said ketch, who has his father pilot on board Rear-Admiral Vandergoes.”

MARSHAL DE CATINAT to [THE MARQUIS DE ST. THOMAS].

1696, [May 27-] June 6, Camp of Rivalte.—Sends a number of propositions to be submitted to his R.H. If they are not accepted, his Majesty is resolved to “exterminate” the country entirely.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, [May 28-] June 7, s.n., Gand.—“I received the honour of your Grace’s letter, which gives us directions about our extraordinaries, to which I shall readily obey, though I am upon a frontier post.

“His Majesty has reviewed his own Army here, which is in a better condition than it ever was, though very poor. The King will go in two days to see the States’ army which is commanded by the Prince of Nassaw, under the Elector; for the King alone can keep those two princes in order. We are all very big with expectations of a peace, and I am persuaded there are great endeavours used to come at one the nearest way. The Spanish and Imperial Ministers are very angry that anything should be done which is not communicated to them.

“I believe we shall have no action this way this summer; but the Landgrave of Hesse will be on the Meuse, and so make us superior.”

R. June 1st, o.s.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, May 29, Whitehall.—“I have received yours of the 31st of May and 4th of June, n.s. In the first you forgot to enclose the list of the Toulon fleet, which I should be glad to see.

“Mr. Vernon will particularly inform himself what can be done with relation to restoring the goods mentioned in Mr. Auverkirk’s letter, and give you an account of it, if not this, the next post.

“Upon reading to the Lords Justices that paragraph of your letter of the 4th that relates to his Majesty’s unwillingness that the letter should go to constitute the three Justices in Ireland, their Lordships have not sent it forward, thinking it in a great measure useless. My Lord Deputy has an unquestioned power, and has executed it, to nominate two Justices during his illness. This would only by the King's authority add one more, but would not remedy that which seems to be the most likely to breed confusion there, which is, the dispute by what authority the Governors are to be appointed in case of my Lord Capell's death; whether my Lord by the powers in his patent, or the Council by the Statute of Henry the Eighth. The Lords Justices here, apprehending this contention may arise, in case my Lord Deputy should die, did humbly desire his Majesty would empower them to appoint such persons as his Majesty should think proper to administer the Government there, till such time as it might be farther considered; and I hope something to this effect his Majesty will please to direct.

"Estimates are directed to be prepared for encamping the troops, and for embarking the ten Regiments; but neither of these services being to be complied with without ready money, the Treasury will be under difficulties to procure it; so that it seemed a question this morning among the Lords whether, if his Majesty knew the difficulties, he would think the service intended were answerable to them.

"Admiral Russell, in behalf of his brother, desires it may be laid before his Majesty whether he would please to grant him a warrant for leave to receive such presents as have or shall be made him by the Council and General Assembly of Barbados during the war, in regard the intercourse between that place and England is so much interrupted that, after a present is made, it's a year or more before he can receive it."

BERKELEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 3, Torrbay.—“ I herewith send your Grace the result of our council of war, by which you will find that it is not thought practicable to attempt the ships in Brest; indeed, we were some time before we could get the Dutch so much as to discourse of it; but after we had called down the Lord Macclesfield’s Frenchman, and otherways informed ourselves, we found that we could nowhere ride with our Fleet in Brest water out of gunshot, without which I never did think the attempt reasonable, unless it was necessary to make such a desperate attempt to save our country, which I hope will never be our condition; but if it is, I shall be very ready to go upon it, and so will, I believe, most of the officers of the Fleet. The Dutch talked of sending convoys abroad, and seeing their merchant-ships into the sea, but I was unwilling to enter into any other matters till I had orders from home.

“ I do not indeed see any great probability we have of doing service this year, unless we by chance meet with some of their ships in Camarett Bay, when we shall have a prospect of destroying them; or that we attack Belle Isle, which will require a considerable number of land forces.

“ Our Fleet here is in an ill condition as to men, and will every day grow worse; which if the French know, and come out the latter end of the summer, they will have an advantage over us. This Sir George Rooke acquainted the Admiralty with, who have returned me answer that they have no way of supplying us with men, but that I must apply myself to the Lords Justices for soldiers, which, I think, if the French do fit out, will be absolutely necessary, but that there is no haste of their coming on board, till we have farther intelligence of the enemy.”

R. 5th. Enclosure :—

Copy of the resolution adopted by the Council of War held on board the Britannia, in Torrbay, 3 June, 1696.

“ It was proposed to attack the French fleet in Brest water; and the question was put, considering how it is now fortified, whether it be reasonable to attempt it.

“ Resolved, that it is neither reasonable nor practicable, considering how many and great fortifications they have there for four or five mile in length, which would not only in probability disable many of our ships going in and blind us with their smoke, which would put us in all the confusion imaginable, but afterwards, if we should have the good fortune to destroy part of the enemy’s fleet, we could not with our Fleet lie anywhere out of gun nor bomb-shot from the enemy, and consequently in all probability should be disabled from getting out again. Besides, the tide in going in, being very rapid, if any of the ships lose masts or rudders, they would run on board of one another, and by that means render our design fruitless; or, if it should prove calm (as it often does when many guns are fired) when part of the ships got in, they would be forced to anchor upon very great disadvantage, and part our Fleet."

[LORD JUSTICE] SIR CHARLES PORTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 3, Dublin.—"I presume to give your Grace this trouble to acquaint you that on Saturday last, about seven at night, my Lord Deputy departed this life; and yesterday the Lords of the Council made choice of me to be Justice till his Majesty's pleasure be further signified, which is done pursuant to a power given them in such emergencies by the Statute of 33 of Henry the Eighth.

"... In many parts the Tories commit robberies, and in some places are about twenty or thirty in a company. The privateers also are very bold, and have landed at Scatterry, in the mouth of the Shanon, where they have killed two or three, and taken away some cattle, and so they have done in the north; and there are about fifteen privateers and two French men-of-war waiting nigh the North Channel for the return of the West India ships belonging to Leverpoole, White-Haven, and other ports that way; so that if some ships of force be not sent to secure those parts, there will be great damage done to the merchants of England. I have by this express given a particular account of it to the Lords of the Admiralty, and hope their Lordships will take effectual care to provide against this mischief."

R. 8.

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

1696, June 4-14, Gand.—"His Majesty has left us here under the care of the Prince of Vaudemont, whilst he is gone to command the other army in Braband. We are retrenched here, and the enemies are retrenched in Braband, and I see no appearance of any action. The projects for a peace are carried on with the greatest secrecy imaginable, and not communicated to any of the Ministers of the Allies. Some endeavours have been used to quiet the Conte de L'Aunitz, but Don Quiros makes a great noise, neither like a wise nor an honest man.

"The Court of France has demanded whether the Allies would gladly come to a cessation of arms, whilst the difficulties which retard the Peace may be adjusted; and the great necessity and danger in which the Duke of Savoye is now, seems to make that very necessary to us, but we go on a little irresolutely. What does most employ the King's thoughts is, whether he shall come to a cessation or not. I believe the greatest and only difficulty afterwards would be about Stratsbourg, unless something should happen which should alter the present situation of affairs.

"What I take the liberty to tell your Grace here is what is known to so few that I ought not to know it."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 5, Whitehall.—“I made no answer the last post to yours of May 28th relating to the memorial of the Flemish Merchants, because Mr. Vernon had directions, and was able to do it more fully.

“This morning I received another from you of June the 1st, and his Majesty’s commands therein mentioned shall be punctually observed.

“I desire you will lay before his Majesty a warrant, which Mr. Vernon will enclose to you, to put the lives of Mr. Hethrington and Mr. Jekyll in the office of Clerk of the Hanaper in Chancery; and acquaint his Majesty that this warrant is sent over at the request of my Lord Keeper. His Lordship desires also it may be laid before his Majesty as his opinion that, Mr. Justice Gregory being lately deceased, Baron Turton may be fit to be advanced to the King’s Bench, and that Serjeant Blenke succeed a Baron of the Exchequer in Turton’s place.

“The last letters from Ireland give some hopes of my Lord Capell’s recovery. If that should happen, I suppose he would renew his desire of coming to the Bath, which he cannot conveniently do, unless a power be lodged somewhere of appointing Justices in his absence, that in his present commission giving him authority only in case of indisposition, and does not mention absence.”

SIR G. ROOKE to SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 6, Berwicke St. Leonard’s, near Shaftsbury.—“I am obliged to your Grace for the favour of your letter of the 26th ult. by my Lord Berkeley, and do concur in your Grace’s thoughts that the time and manner of my being recalled from the command of the Fleet did need an explanation even to myself, for certainly no man was ever yet taken from the head of forty thousand men in the midst of a campaign without the commission of some notorious fault; and, my Lord, I must presume to say, I will justify my conduct to the nicest and severest scrutiny. However, I do sincerely assure your Grace this indignity has no other effect on me than to convince me, as I presume it will with good reason the rest of the world, that I am not fit for the execution of any military employment at sea; and therefore, if ever your Grace shall hear me mentioned for such, I do most humbly beg you’ll interpose your authority that it may not be offered to me; for I have solemnly resolved never to embark myself again in that service, though I am in all other respects devoted to the King’s service, with an entire resignation of myself to his Majesty’s pleasure.

“As soon as I am recovered of a violent cold, which I took coming from Torbay hither, I will pay my duty to your Grace in town.”

MEMORANDUM by Jo. COOPER.

1696, June 6-10.—“ On Saturday, the 6th of June, 1696, I met with Dr. Charles Lesly, who goes by the name of White, and in drinking a bottle of wine with him at the Castle Tavern in Pater-noster Row, amongst other discourse of the present Government, he did own himself to be the author of a book called ‘ An Answer to Dr. King’s Book,’ &c. . . . Anderton, the printer of it, was executed. . . . Mr. Hugh Hamilton, with whom the original copy was seized, . . . [and] who was found guilty of a high misdemeanour for its being in his custody, was now fled into France. . . . I told him there was another book put out against the Government not long after the former, styled ‘ The Anatomy of a Jacobite,’ which all his friends, and indeed strangers too, did guess to be his doing, . . . for that the account the book gives of Blencoe’s affair demonstrates it, . . . and his procuring a copy also of the Lord Sunderland’s letter. . . . I asked him of another pamphlet which went by the name of ‘ Mr. Anderton the printer’s and Mr. Ashton’s last Speech’; which he made no answer to. . . .

“ Sunday, 7th June.—At 7 o’clock in the evening we met at the Bull’s-head tavern, at the end of Tower-street, where I sent for a gentleman that the Doctor owed a hundred pounds to by bond, in which I was employed these four years past to recover it, and his coming to us prevented our discourse of anything but their business, save only about a dispute that was to be decided between one Keith, a Quaker, against William Penn and the rest of them, which was to be held at Turners’ Hall in Philpott-lane the 12th instant, wherein the Doctor was chosen moderator, but could not tell what to do in it, for that he was indeed Keith’s friend, who had right on his side, yet was afraid to disoblige Penn, who, notwithstanding his being a friend to the Jacobites, and more particularly to him, might, it may be, do him a prejudice if he appeared in it, and did not know but he might be there discovered by some person that might know him. I endeavoured to persuade of it (sic), but he seemed resolved on doing it. At parting I conveyed him over Tower-hill; in our way he told me he had a great desire to see the Lord Forbes, a prisoner in the Tower. I answered, if he came to me next day at 4 in the afternoon, I had interest enough to get it done without his being examined by anyone; so we parted.

“ Monday, 8th June.—The Doctor came to me at the time appointed, and having taken him to the Lord Forbes’s lodgings, being then in company with Col. Griffin and Mr. Barclay (now a prisoner there), his Lordship came from them to us to another room, and, having saluted the Doctor, was in a great extasy of joy to see him there and not a prisoner. . . . His Lordship asked how Sir Andrew Forster did, and what was become of him. The Doctor answered, very well, and in this town, and that he had had many escapes since the plot’s discovery. . . . His Lordship began Sir Andrew’s good health, afterwards King James’s, his soon coming to his own, his Queen’s, the Prince of Wales’, and the young Princesses’. They had several discourses about the Non-Jurant Bishops. . . . It being then near 10 a clock, which is the time of shutting up the Tower gates, we were forced to come away; but about an hour before we left his Lordship Mr. Barnett Howard gave his Lordship a visit, and the Doctor would not be seen by him. . . . We then parted, but made an appointment to meet at the Bull's-head tavern in Cheapside. . . .

“June 10th, 1696.—About 6 o'clock I met the Doctor at the place appointed. He had the parson with him that was at my house the day before. . . . His friend, who seems to be very violent, saying that he had heard something of Durans, one of the assassins, being taken at the head of some mob in the North, gave me an opportunity to ask if all that were in the Proclamation were not now taken. The Doctor said no, for that Sir George Barclay was not in their clutches yet. . . . Then there came in to us the Recorder of Londonderry, who is a good man to this Government, and we had no more discourse but what was of public things.”

ST. THOMAS to [CATINAT].

1696, June [6-]16, Turin.—Refers him to the former answer. BERKELEY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 8, Torbay.—“Last night I received your Grace's by express, and this morning called a council of war, the result of which I here enclose you. The Dutch seem very apprehensive of the Spanish flota, and for their security proposed sending a fleet of men-of-war with their outward-bound merchant ships, to see them as far as the channel of Malta, and then return and look for the flota. But this was not at all approved by us, as thinking it too soon to divide the fleet till we knew what the French were doing; besides, they might not be back from the Straits expedition before the arrival of the flota. It is certain that the safe coming home of the flota is of great consequence both to us and the Dutch, but they are not expected till October; so that there is time enough to think of it when we have further intelligence of the enemy, who they say now are disarming at Brest, which we only take to be refitting, till we hear they have sent some of their ships to lay up at Port Louis and Rochfort, or that they have discharged their seamen; for, till one of those is done, it is most certain that they can fit out their ships from Brest in a short time. I am sending Rear-Admiral Nevil with eleven men-of-war and two fire-ships into the Soundings, to secure our trade.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 9, Whitehall.—“There being nothing in your letter of the 4th that requires any answer, I shall only enclose a copy of a letter which I received by the last post from my Lord Meath, by which you will perceive there is some dissatisfaction at my Lord Chancellor's so soon procuring himself to be elected sole Justice. There are other accounts to the same effect, besides what you will receive from Mr. Vernon by direction of the Lords Justices. I hope his Majesty will not delay declaring his pleasure as to the person or persons he will put at the head of that Government, though they should be designed to continue but for a time, because to his Majesty's will all must readily submit; but till that be known many will remain unsatisfied.

“The want of current money in the kingdom begins to create disturbances in many places; and I doubt that evil is like rather to increase than diminish for some time, because hitherto people have been quieted with having their necessities represented, and with hopes of their being redressed; which I doubt will be very difficult to do in anything that may be to purpose, and I am sure will be impossible to the degree that is expected; so that I apprehend, when the poor understand that a remedy is not like to come suitable to their hopes, they will be very unruly. The Lords Justices have set apart tomorrow particularly to discourse with the Lords of the Treasury upon this subject, and if any expedient can be found useful, and practicable, it will be very happy.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] June 11-21, Gand.—“ I am sorry to find your Grace is the only person in the world of whom I must demand pardon. I am not at the post where your Grace did set me, but 'tis the King who ordered me to stay here on a more uneasy post, which allows me little time to attend your Grace's business.

“ The enclosed letter<sup>o</sup> comes from a Jesuit, who is so near the Emperor's person that he is thought to speak the sense of that Court, which would certainly be glad of a peace, though the Ministers of the Empire and of Spain cry out against the endeavours which are used. The Princes of Baden, of Wirtemberg and others have sent a kind of remonstrance to the E[lector] of Bavaria, to engage him as chief of the Circle of Suabe to oppose any treaty which does not restore Stratsbourg.

“ 'Tis now easy to see who gets or who loses by the war, by the inclinations or aversions which they discover to a peace. Mons. de Boufflers retired over the Sambre so soon as the King advanced towards him, as if he had orders to risk nothing, or as if he remembered the affair of Casteau, or St. Denis. We must be allowed here, my Lord, to desire a peace, since all our sinews of war are shrunk. I have paid here a good while longer than the bank or goldsmiths pay, and I do pay still every day, but how long I shall be able to do so God knows. When I do stop payment for one day only, I fear there is an end of our war, and of our peace also.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] June 14-24, Anvers.—“I am come hither by order, to make a little provision for a great many hungry folks. I must thank your Grace for the honour of a letter of the 9th. I am proud enough to be pleased when my services are agreeable to your Grace, but I am too modest to expect to be told so. I have long used myself to do my duty as well as I can, and shall always do so.

“Since the last which I had the honour to write to your Grace, I have seen a copy of the Mareschal de Catinat’s letter to the Marquis de St. Thomas, dated the 6th, and the said Marquis’s answer, dated the 7th. . . . [Substance stated.]

“Now my Lord [Galway?] sends word to the King, qu’il a bonne opinion de la fermeté de S.A.R., à moins qu’il y a quelque traité sous main; but the last clause of the Marquis de St. Thomas’s letter to the Mareschal, and the inaction in which Catinat has remained after his threats, though in a power to execute ’em, makes me fear the Duke of Savoye had too much tenderness for his subjects to see ’em utterly destroyed; and I can assure your Grace that the apprehensions of an accommodation in Savoye does [do] alarm us so much here, that I do wonder the King has not a personal engagement with his R.H., so as to act by consentment; for the King has not acquainted the Duke with what Dyckvelt is doing here, nor has the Duke informed the King what he is a-doing. ’Tis wonderful, my Lord, that so many princes have made war so long by concert, and cannot now agree to treat by concert for a general peace, in which no party will find his account well, because everyone is running with too much haste to look after it. Everybody exclaims against the States for treating, yet everybody would treat, I fear.

“England does not any ways fall under any consideration, but with relation to the King’s person. We have bore a great deal of the war, and shall scarce be mentioned in the Peace. I am told the French have consented to treat with William the 3rd, King of England, &c., and leave the consideration of a pension for King James, and the pretensions of the Prince of Wales, to be adjusted at leisure.

“ So much for the Peace ; as to our military exploits, the King, finding himself stronger than the Mareschal de Bou[f]fliers, made a motion towards him, and he retired with such unreasonable and unexpected precipitation over the Sambre, and two leagues further, that the King was mightily tempted to undertake something; though I know his plan at the beginning of the year was to risk nothing here, but to make as many feints as we could, to draw our enemies this way, that the P[rince] of Baden might undertake the siege of Phillipsbourg.

“ However, at present the King has a mind to invest Charleroy, or Dinant ; or to attempt the bombarding at least of Dunkirque, or forcing the lines in Flanders ; but Mons. [de] Boufflers is so posted as to hinder the two first, and Mons. de Villeroy is yet too strong in Flanders to suffer us to attempt the two last designs. 'Tis certain, my Lord, that his Majesty would lose no opportunity to act this summer, out of consideration of any treaty now on foot; but 'tis as certain that the situation of affairs in Savoye, the want of money here, the impatience of the States (though the Pentionaire is very firm), or something else that I know nothing of, have determined his Majesty in favour of a reasonable peace. If we have an ill peace, the States must bear all the reproaches; if we have no peace, we must not blame our King, for he does not obstruct it. When I take the liberty to speak positively to your Grace, it is upon good conviction.

[P.S.] “ I'm just now told that an express is gone by for the King from Savoye, but can yet know nothing of his news.

“ I cannot forbear to observe to your Grace that all the news of a peace which fills the world does come from the French. All the letters from France are full of the conditions which the French King offers; and the French Ministers in all the Courts of Europe, and all their emissaries, are very open and communicative upon that subject; whilst all the Ministers of the Allies are in great silence, and greater ignorance.

“ The King of Denmark sent one of his chief ministers, Mons. Du Plessis, to meet our King at the Hague, in order to enter into a nearer alliance with the King and the States; but the French made the Danes believe the general peace was so far advanced, that Mons. [Du] Plessis went to Aix la Chapelle, instead of coming to the King.”

BERKELEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 15, Torrby.— . . . “ I am, my Lord, but too sensible how very much it is necessary to my own particular reputation that the Fleet should attempt something this year upon my first arrival to the command of it, and no industry shall be wanting nor invention that I am capable of unthought to procure it, but without wings 'tis impossible to fly. I have orders to sail, but hardly any butter and cheese in the Fleet, without which we never went to sea. . . . As to men, we are very thin, and as to ships, reckoning those that are cruising, cleaning, and taken from us (of which latter there are but four Dutch and English), we are thirty less than was in Sir George Rooke's line of battle." . . .

June 16.—Encloses the result of a Council of War. Will sail on Friday. The master of a Swede from Rochel says the French were disarming.

R. 18. Enclosure:—

Copy of the opinion of a Council of War held on the Britannia, in Torrbay, 16 June, 1696, that it was impossible to lie in Bertram or Camerett Bay out of bomb-shot, &c.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 16, Whitehall.—“The foreign post not being arrived, I had not troubled you now, but that the Spanish merchants are very earnest to have their case represented to his Majesty, which they have done in the enclosed petition. It seems very severe upon them, and what may justly deserve a representation to the Court at Madrid, but in what manner must be submitted to his Majesty's directions.

“The scarcity of the coin and the general difficulty that is made in receiving money, which the Parliament intended should be current, continues still to make the poor of the country very uneasy. Any effectual remedy would tend to the encouragement of clipped moneys passing again, which hitherto has been endeavoured to be avoided. The Treasury have directed their under-officers in the Revenue to receive such as is punchable, but not such as is more clipped, nor sixpences. When another quarter of the Land Tax, and more especially the Window money, comes to be levied, I fear the people will very unwillingly part with their heavy money, and keep that which is clipped, and will not pass, since they have got the notion in their heads that the King has a recompense for changing all the little money, and that the Window Tax is intended for that purpose. One of the Excise-men had like to have been knocked on the head and his money taken from him at Halifax. There have likewise been tumults at Kendall, which I do not hear are yet appeased. There was one at Newcastle, which the magistrates have quieted for the present. We must expect the same accounts from other places, and unless the Mints which are designed to be set up in four or five several places, will serve to amuse the people, I know not what else can, and they will not be ready yet this month.”

[LORD JUSTICE] PORTER to SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 17, Dublin.—“I have by this packet writ to Mr. Secretary Vernon, to be laid before the Lords Justices, what my apprehensions are of the great loss will fall upon the English merchants for want of a guard to cruise at the mouth of our Northern Channel . . . The Lords of the Admiralty were pleased amongst other matters to let me know that the services elsewhere were so many that they could not at present spare any ships to be sent for this.

“But, according to the best of my understanding, this care for preservation of those ships is so absolutely necessary, and the consequences of the neglect must be attended with such vast clamours and discontents, that if there be a possibility of providing for it in any tolerable or probable manner, it ought to be heartily and vigorously endeavoured.” . . .

R. 23.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 19, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 8th and 11th. Sir William Booth has not his liberty, but absconds. I have signified to the Lords Justices his Majesty’s pleasure concerning one to be added to the Admiralty Board, and that they should propose one or more persons for his Majesty’s choice. I perceived they were then not ready to nominate, and therefore did not press it immediately, but shall take another opportunity again to remind them of his Majesty’s commands.

“My Lord Devonshire desires his Majesty may be informed that since the Act of Parliament passed about Needwood, it is necessary his Majesty’s grant to him of Ranger of that place should be renewed; in which I conclude there will be little difficulty, if it be, as I understand him, only renewing the same grant which he had some years since.

“Upon the death of Captain Haughton, one of the Exempts of the Yeomen of the Guard, I am desired by my Lord Manchester to send the enclosed case of Mr. Meres, as he thinks [it] very deserving of his Majesty’s favour. At the same time my Lord Cornwallis desires his Majesty may be put in mind of Mr. d’Avenant, of the House of Commons, who has served there in two Parliaments with great honesty and zeal, and whose pretensions would be entirely satisfied with the gift of this place. My Lord Manchester claims a promise from the King for this particular place to Mr. Meres; and my Lord Cornwallis does pretend to many general assurances for Mr. d’Avenant, which hitherto come to nothing, and therefore hopes his merit and patience will plead successfully for him now.”

CATINAT to [ST. THOMAS].

1696, June [19-]29, Camp of Rivalte.—His King has given him permission to explain the proposed advantages in writing; viz., the restoration of Pignerol, which formerly belonged to the House of Savoy, provided that its fortifications be rased; the marriage of the Duke of Burgundy to the Princess of Piedmont, when they come of age; &c.

SHREWSBURY to LORD JUSTICE PORTER.

1696, June 20, Whitehall.—“I had sooner acknowledged the favour of your Lordship’s of the 3rd, but having laid it before the Lords Justices here, I received no directions from them, they being desirous to know his Majesty’s pleasure, to whom they had writ before, foreseeing the condition of my Lord Capell’s health was such that he could not continue to govern that kingdom.

“I hope the adjourning and not proroguing of the Parliament is according to your opinion, and if the day be shorter than you think proper, that will be in his Majesty’s power to remedy when he shall have more leisure to consider the circumstances of the whole affair.

“It has been recommended to the Lords of the Admiralty to clear the coast of Ireland from that number of privateers which your letters, and all that write from thence, so justly complain of.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 23, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 15-25. For what relates to the Irish matters you will receive an answer from Mr. Vernon, who has the Lords Justices’ directions thereupon. When they came to propose persons for that Government, they were so little fond of the employment, and sat today so late (till past four in the afternoon) on that and other business, that I could not remind them of his Majesty’s commands to think of some fit person to be added to the Admiralty, but shall do it the first opportunity.

“I have here enclosed an extract of a letter from Mr. Methuen, by which I find he is not willing to quit his post in Portugal, to be employed in the Commission of Trade, at least, not till he sees how that Commission is relished the next session of Parliament; and then he seems to desire some things in relation to his son, which I know not whether his Majesty will think reasonable or of good example.

“I have likewise sent enclosed a copy of a letter from the Dey of Argiers to the King.”

Copy.

SHREWSBURY to LORD JUSTICE PORTER.

1696, June 23, Whitehall.—“Upon what your Lordship writ to Mr. Vernon and myself of the 17th, the Lords Justices have this morning discoursed the Admiralty, who assure them that two ships are actually sent to cruise in that very place, where you represent them as most necessary. I perceive the Admiralty is not satisfied that the ships put under the direction of the Chief Governor of Ireland have been disposed to the best uses for his Majesty’s service, and protecting the trade, but are rather employed as passage-boats for particular persons who go between these two countries, and lie the rest of the time in the port of Dublin. They say, if they were ordered to cruise, they would clear the sea, make the passage safe, and at the same time secure the merchants' ships. They are not of opinion that any privateers or other ships come into that Channel too strong for a fifth-rate frigate; and though any should, yet if those frigates be kept clean, they can fear nothing." . . .

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 23-July 3, Camp of Moncalier.—We have now more to fear from our friends than our enemies. The latter have offered to his R.H. Pignerol, rased to the ground, and the marriage of the Princess his daughter to the Duke of Burgundy. The first proposal is so agreeable to him that it will doubtless be accepted. We must do our utmost to ensure the loss by France of this entrance into Italy.

French. R. July 11th.

ST. THOMAS TO [CATINAT].

1696, [June 23-] July 3, Turin.—His R.H. is well disposed to accept the offers made to him, but must first inform his Allies, especially their Imperial and Catholic Majesties. Asks for passports for two couriers; the troops on either side not to cross the Po, &c.

Copy, French. Endorsed: June 28 [o.s. ?].

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

1696, [June 24-] July 4, s.n., Gand.—“I am now able to give your Grace a true account of the last dispatches from Savoye. . . . His R. Highness writes a long, respectful letter to the King, full of promises and assurances of constancy to continue firm to the common interests, but desires the return of his Majesty's squadrons into the Mediterranean, and the payment of his subsidies. He then tells the King that it was the opinion of his Allies and friends, that he should gain all the time he could from Mons. Catinat, as he had done, but that he would do nothing of which he would not inform his Majesty, as by duty and by inclination, &c. His R. H. does therefore send a copy of the Mareschal de Catinat's letter to the Marquis St. Thomas, and the answer to it, dated the 16th and 17th June.” [Contents stated.] “Next is my Lord Galloway's own letter to the King, full of fears and suspicions.” [Contents stated.]

“I dare not presume to make any remarks on these letters, but I can assure your Grace that the King is under great disquiet. I fear it is equally impossible to send money to his R. H. and to my Lord Galloway, for want of which the one will have a pretence to treat, and the other be under an impossibility of keeping his few troops together. In the mean time the King is trying here how to do something. He does not find it easy to pass the Sambre, and thinks of sending the Landgrave back to give a diversion on the Moselle, to open a way to P[rin]ce Louis of Baden to besiege Philipsbourg. However, all things are preparing at Namur, as if we were to besiege Dinant; and we are busy here, as if we would besiege Furnes or bombard Dunquirke.

"These are all the projects we have in sight, and Mons. Dopp is gone to persuade the Landgrave to go back as he came. The Circles of Suabe and Franconie have now resolved to choose the Conte de Nassaw Wilbrook (who serves here and is Lt.-Gen. of horse) General of their troops, and to put themselves under the protection of the King of England; that is, they would be paid by the King of England for their train-bands.

"The Prince of Vaudemont sent out all our horse from hence t'other day, in hopes to surprise a little flying camp of the enemy's, which lay near Aath, but they were too strong, and would not be surprised. What was very well done is, that at ten a clock at night the orders were given, and at eleven every officer and soldier was on horseback at his post, not one man wanting amongst 4,500.

"I find, my Lord, that as any appearance of peace breaks out, the States are blamed for precipitating the matter, by the Allies, and by the rabble; and when any stop seems put to those endeavours for a peace, then the world cries out against our King."

R. June 27.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 26, Whitehall.—"Since the receipt of yours of the 18th, which came to my hands yesterday, I have not had leisure to examine the Consuls' Bills, but shall very soon obey his Majesty's commands, and deliver my opinion upon them.

"I have acquainted my Lord Stamford with the King's commands that Major-General Trelawney should have the command of the Lieutenancy of the Town of Plimouth, according to the precedents of former Governors. My Lord denies the fact, but seems to acquiesce if it has been so heretofore. The case will not be hard to examine, for till the death of the Duke of Albemarle, the County of Devon was under him, and the Fort of Plimouth under my Lord Bath; so that the command of the Lieutenancy of the Town during that time ought, in my opinion, to govern this dispute. You shall have an account of this fact by the next.

"I find Sir George Rooke a good deal dissatisfied at his being recalled from the head of the Fleet, and thinks it looks like throwing upon him the fault of not intercepting the Toulon ships. I said what I could, and was true, to convince him nothing of that was the occasion; but I find he is desirous the King should be acquainted with his resentment, and perhaps something from his Majesty may give him ease.

"I have had a man with me who says he was sent by Nickson, alias Wall, to tell me too long a story to repeat here; but the sum is, that his ship was seized soon after she went from the Channel, and arrived at Nantes ; that he is labouring to get her discharged, and is not out of hopes to effect it soon, and then we shall hear of him again. He is certainly a rogue, but however I have given this fellow good words, and desired Sir George Rooke to do the same, and intimated, if Nickson could come-now, we have something of consequence to employ him in, which I take to be the only way to get him, and perhaps the ship, into our hands ; which if we do, by my consent, we will trust him no more with her.

“ My Lord Rochester desires his Majesty may be acquainted that my Lord Clarendon having the inheritance of the Ranger-ship of Whitch-wood Forest (I think it is called, but it is that near Cornbury), this late Act of Parliament directs him to make a deputy, with the King’s approbation ; that my Lord, having pitched upon my Lord Rochester for his deputy, if his Majesty be pleased to approve of him, desires you will signify so much to me.

“ My Lord Paget has writ to the Turkey Company that he conceives the affairs of the merchants in those parts may suffer by his Majesty’s not having writ to congratulate this new Emperor’s accession to the crown. The merchants are sensible it is not the usual custom that princes pay these compliments till they have received a letter from the prince lately come to the crown, to notify his accession. In the several changes that have lately been there, sometimes they have sent letters of notification, and then they have been answered ; other times they have not sent, and then no notice has been taken of them from hence. The merchants agree this has been hitherto the method, but that now they have got a young, vain prince, they humbly submit it to his Majesty whether he will not make this unusual step, for the advantage of his subjects concerned in that trade. I must acquaint you that I have as fresh, if not a fresher letter, from the Ambassador, who mentions nothing of it to me. If I can get the copy of his letter to them before the post goes, I will enclose it. What my Lord Paget says to me is, that he thinks himself useless where he is ; that if there were a prospect of peace that were anything probable, he would not decline staying to do his Majesty the best service he could ; but seeing nothing like that, he repeats his desire of being recalled.

“ The last accounts I have had from France say that the French careen several ships at Brest, and disarm very slowly, and that it looks as if they were watching our motions and resolutions, and by them to govern theirs, either to put out their fleet or not, about the end of summer. You know the misfortune we have had with our correspondents all over France ; and nothing yet being settled in their room, we are so wanting in intelligence we can confidently depend on, that any accounts of this nature would be very useful here ; and it seems to us as if the Dutch were convinced the enemy would have no great fleet abroad this year, by their having recalled eight of their biggest line of battleships.

“ I have this day received a letter by the Irish post, a copy of which I here enclose ; no names are affixed to it, and yet there seems to be something in it worth laying before his Majesty. I shall tomorrow read the original to the Lords Justices, they not sitting today, it being the Fast for his Majesty’s safety and success, which God grant.”

SHREWSBURY TO MR. HILL.

1696, June 26, Whitehall.—“ Whilst you are at the post which the King directs, there needs no excuse to me ; besides, one cannot but be sensible, if your negotiations at Ghent and Antwerp miscarry, your ministry at Brussels will do the King or yourself but little service. I am only mortified, that from these places your letters do not come so fresh nor so regular as from Brussels or the Camp. . . . I heartily wish the negotiations on foot may have a happy conclusion, sed timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. If these secret conferences give them an opportunity to break the Confederacy, or throw among them a reasonable distrust, they have done their business.”

CATINAT TO ST. THOMAS.

1696, [June 26.] July 6, Camp of la Volvère.—Agrees to the proposal relative to the troops, but insists on hostages being given on both sides. Will give passports to the couriers. There must be no hostilities on the part of the Vaudois during this cessation of arms.

Copy, French. Endorsed : July 8.

[LORD JUSTICE] PORTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 27, Dublin.—Has received his of the 20th. “ The Parliament met this morning. I appointed a Commission under the Great Seal to issue, constituting the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas Speaker of the House of Lords, passing by the Lord Chief Justice Pyne for several reasons which concern his Majesty’s service, which I shall not mention unless he thinks himself neglected, and shall complain ; but I do assure your Grace his behaviour towards me was not in the least any reason why I did so.

“ There was a design formed by some few to question the power of the Council to elect a Justice upon the death of a Chief

Governor, and to assert that [what] the Council meant by the Statute of Henry VIII. was the whole body of the Peers. I had notice of it, and of their several meetings, and though there is not the least colour for that opinion, yet I thought it necessary to take care to have as many Members of both Houses present as lived within reasonable distance; and accordingly there were about 22 Lords and 160 of the Commons, which appearance put an end to their project. And both Houses proceeded in such matters as related to privilege, &c., without any heats or reflections. And it being moved in both Houses, that they should congratulate my coming to the Government, it passed nemine contradicente; and accordingly first the Lords and then the Commons paid me their compliments.

“Upon this occasion it was easy as well as pleasant to every honest man to observe the inclinations of the generality to lay by all heats and animosities, and to come again to their former friendly way of living; and I am confident they are so far dissipated that they will not again in some years give any disturbance to his Majesty’s service or the public affairs of the kingdom.

“It is with great truth that I affirm to your Grace that there is no such distinction amongst the English Protestants as Whig and Tory. ’Tis true there are several sects of them, as in England, but till of late they always lived well with one another, and in his Majesty’s service they were all of a piece, and so I am confident will ever be; which in some measure may appear by what the Commons have done this day in the case of one of their Members (Col. Sanderson), who is the only person that refused to sign the Association, and for that cause they have expelled him.”

R. July 3rd.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, June 27-July 7, Camp of Moncalier.—Sends copies of the last letters between Catinat and St. Thomas. The separate treaty between his R.H. and the French may be regarded as concluded. Has sent a courier to inform the King. Shrewsbury rightly judged last year that the affair of Casal would have this sequel, for his R.H. has ever since been alienating himself more and more from the interests of the Confederates. Catinat replied to the last letter that it was necessary to make a truce and give hostages. We sent word to his R.H. that we could not consent to this, having no other orders from our masters than to make war against the French. The Prince however wishes to obtain Pignerol, and to repossess his states. God grant there may be no secret conditions. It is doubtful whether he will ever enjoy the advantages offered him. Has long foreseen this misfortune, and wishes the King had withdrawn him (the writer) from hence. Has been of little service here, as he was aware of his R.H.’s intentions, and was coldly looked on in consequence.

French. R. July 13.

ST. THOMAS TO CATINAT.

1696, [June 29-] July 9, Turin.—As his R.H. is in command of the Allies' troops, it will be sufficient if he give two hostages of his own. Names two officers. His R.H. will give orders to the Vaudois to remain within their boundaries.

PRINCE EUGENE to the DUKE OF SAVOY.

1696, [June 29-] July 9, Camp of Moncalier.—Excuses himself from giving hostages to the French, as requested by the Duke, as he has no power to do so ; but is willing to obey him in preventing the Imperial troops from crossing the Po till he receives other orders.

Copy, French.

THE DUKE OF SAVOY to PRINCE EUGENE.

[1696, June 29-July 9.]—Is satisfied with his undertaking in respect of the Imperial troops. Will receive two hostages from the French, and send them two of his own. If the Prince desires to depart with his troops, he will meet with no hindrance.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696, June 29-] July 9, s.n., Gand.— . . . “The King I find is very unwilling to let the Landgrave go back towards the Rhine, though the P. Louis de Bade desires it passionately, in order to besiege Phillipsbourg. The King is still very eager to do something this way. We have sent our great cannon, mortars, bombs, &c., down the canal of Bruges, to be ready to bombard Dunkerque. Our ingeners have been down to view the ground. The difficulties are, two redoubts, or outworks, which will keep us at so great a distance that our bombs will not reach the body of the place. The next is the want of fascines, which we must have in a very great quantity, both to cover our men and for a foundation of all the batteries. Another is the want of fresh water, of which there is none within two leagues of the place. Another difficulty is, that there are great numbers of privateers, frigates, and chaloupes in Dunkerque, which will be very troublesome, unless our Fleet, or part of it, were before the place. These things discourage others, not the King.

“We are not yet resolved, my Lord, whether the Duke of Savoye will abuse the French or his Allies : a very few days will inform us.

“We have had the beginning of a disorder here today amongst our English horse, because they would not take bread. What it will be in a little time I know not, when we shall have neither money nor bread to give 'em.”

R. 4th, o.s. 96.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, June 30, Whitehall.—“I have received yours of the 3rd July, s.n., and by the same post some letters from my Lord Gallway, in which I perceive he is much concerned at the circular letter [which] was writ to him, among the other foreign Ministers, obliging him to confine his extraordinaries within the Rules prescribed by an Order of Council. I have here enclosed an extract of that part of his letter, and if his Majesty shall please to direct you to send an answer to him upon it, I desire the favour that I may know what his Majesty's commands are.

“In the same letter I find he thinks it would be a very considerable diversion if 25 or 30 ships could be spared, and two or three battalions put on board them, and sent into the Straits.

“I desire his Majesty may be put in mind that in the County of Hereford there is at present no Custos Rotulorum; that I, who am Lieutenant, have no estate there, [and] am neither fit for nor desirous of it; that my Lord Coningsby, whose estate lies all in those parts, is very ambitious, and I question not but very able, to serve his Majesty in that station. I need add nothing of his zeal, in case there be no objection to his being put into that commission.”

BERKELEY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, July 2, Broad Sound.—“Yesterday we came in here. Monsieur Nesmond, with five ships, as prisoners inform us, came out into Bertram Bay from Brest the same morning, but upon our appearing went in again, as did about a hundred sail of merchant vessels, come from the Bay, bound to the eastward, who[m] I hope we shall intercept, there being now two frigates off of the Isle of Bass, and I have sent orders to Rear-Admiral Nevil and to Captain Foulks to sail thither to relieve them. I send your Grace the result of our council of war this morning. We hope by appearing in the Bay with the whole Fleet, to alarm the enemy so much as not only to make them raise their rear-band, but to march them to and again, which will much injure the country now the corn is upon the ground, for the horses must have forage; besides, it may hinder them from increasing their forces in Flanders. The prisoners we took last night inform us that all the ships (except the five with Nesmond) were in Brest river, laid up, but most of them careened, and with their yards across; upon which we thought once of sending a detachment of twenty ships to bombard, but upon the assurance the Dutch gave us that the French could in a mighty short time put their fleet to sea (having all their seamen here except the provine[i]als that are sent home), we did not think it advisable, having now but fifty-three ships with us, to make so large a detachment, and the Dutch would not agree to send a less, except we ourselves appeared in the Bay. As to our riding in Camarett Bay (besides that all that are acquainted with it know it is a dangerous place, and that if it should come to blow anything hard westerly we should certainly lose our store-ships of victualling and ordnance, it being a place the French themselves never venture to ride in but coming out or going in, whatever opinion those that were never at it may have), we did not think it proper for our Fleet to ride there to keep in five ships for three weeks or a month, which is as long as we should be able to stay for want of water and provision; for which and many other reasons we wholly gave up over the thoughts of it, which I hope your Grace will approve of."

R. 7th. Enclosures:—

1. Copy of the resolution of a Council of War on the Britannia, in Broad Sound, 2 July, 1696, to sail with the whole Fleet to Belle Isle; to send a detachment of ten ships to endeavour to bombard St. Martin's and D'Allone; and to send orders to Rear Admiral Nevill to cruise off the Isle of Bass "till our return."

2. "The account that Sampson Ballison hath given of privateers which were fitted out at St. Malo's, and now at sea, 1696;" viz., names, guns, and men of six ships "gone to the northward to intercept the English and Dutch Greenland ships," and of nine "gone a-cruising on the coast of Ireland."

[LORD JUSTICE] PORTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, July 2, Dublin.—"I was very glad to find by your Grace's letters of the 23rd past, which I had the honour to receive yesterday, that the Lords of the Admiralty have ordered two ships for that Northern station, which is so necessary to be provided for.

"I return your Grace my most humble thanks for the intimation you are pleased to give me of the exception the Lords of the Admiralty took to the misemploying the ships appointed for the guard of this Channel. I cannot answer how it has been of late, but since I have had the power over them I have employed none of them otherwise than in convoys and cruising; nor have I suffered either of them to stay in port more than two or three tides, but kept them out at sea for the safety of the Channel.

"The King being, as we hear, appointing other Justices, I take the liberty to acquaint your Lordship that when that is done, it is necessary a commission should issue to authorise them to continue and hold the Parliament; for although by reason the Act of Parliament gave me the same powers my Lord Capell had, and consequently I could continue the Parliament without any new commission, yet when any Justices are appointed by the King, they must have a new authority for that under the Great Seal."

R. 14.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, July 3, Whitehall.—“I have given my Lord Stamford a copy of an extract taken out of the Docket-book in the Signet Office, by which it appears that in 1684 the late Duke of Albemarle had a Commission for Lieutenant of the County of Devon, with an exception to the Town of Plimouth; and that my Lord of Bath in his patent was made Captain and Governor of the Town of Plimouth, as well as of the citadel. This seems a precedent full in favour of Major-General Trelawney; but my Lord Stamford is not yet satisfied, and desires further time to be informed, which could not be denied him, and in the mean time I will endeavour to learn how it was before this time. Whilst I am writing, Mr. Yard shews me, that in 1661 my Lord Bath was made Governor of the Town of Plimouth, and at that time George, Duke of Albemarle, was Lieutenant of the County of Devon. My Lord Stamford shall have the whole laid before him, and when I have his answer, you shall be acquainted with it.

“I find among the notes I took at the Cabinet Council the last winter, that the King did direct the Justices in his absence to consider of the Consuls' Bills, so that with the first opportunity they shall be laid before them, and his Majesty shall have an account of their opinion upon them.

“By the copy of my Lord Meath's letter to me, and by the representation Mr. Vernon will enclose, signed by three peers, you will see that the animosities in Ireland still continue, though the Parliament met and both Houses adjourned without any appearance of heat, but on the contrary made their compliment to my Lord Chancellor.”

CATINAT TO ST. THOMAS.

1696, July [4-]14, Camp of la Volvère.—Has heard from his King that he is disposed to show his R.H. still greater favour. For the assurance of neutrality in Italy the acquiescence of his R.H. will not alone be sufficient; the Allies, or at least the House of Austria, must assent to it by treaty, or by a declaration to the Pope and the Republic of Venice. If the said House will not assent, his R.H. is to join with the French in making war on the State of Milan.

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] July 5-15, Bruxelles.—“The Elector came hither to assist at the funerals of the Queen of Spain, and some other annual devotions; and I am hither on your Grace's errands. I find a constant and perpetual passage of the King's subjects through these towns into France from England, and from France into England. I have therefore once for all obtained leave from the Elector to put all those I shall find into custody, by applying myself in his Highness's name to the governor of any town where I can find 'em.

"We are now, my Lord, perfectly reconciled to the negotiations in the Savoye, which frightened us so much. His Royal Highness gained so much time by treating with Catinat that he seemed to have secured himself and his capital from being insulted; and then he broke off the treaty. All the letters from Paris speak positively of this, and speak of his R.H. with great indignation for cheating their King, as they call it. However, Mons. de Catinat is forced to retire, and we seem very much at ease since that danger is over. Mons. Dyckvelt's coming up to the army, as if we were to stay near the King, as formerly, made everybody believe his negotiations with Mons. Cagliere were ended; but his sudden return back to Hollande gives new occasion to think they are still at work, and that they may go on faster, since that ill success which our enemies have had in Savoye. 'Tis plain the French avoid even an occasion of any actions; Mons. Boufflers is entrenched behind the Sambre.

"I am going, my Lord, to show the King a very natural account of that part of his treasury which should come through my hands. Unless there are some reserves of which I have no knowledge, I must needs wish the peace were signed, for I do not see how it is possible to subsist our Army here till the end of the campaign.

"We begin here to believe that the Queen of Spain is with child. The scandal of this Court says the Elector cannot dissemble the chagrin which that news gives him. I am to thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 26th past, and will be careful to send my letters the nearest way."

SUNDERLAND to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, July 6, Altrop.—"Being desired to move the King that he would give leave to the late Bishop of Ely and to Sir The. Ogletope to go abroad, excepting to enemies' countries, his Majesty was pleased to let me know he did consent to it; which makes me beg the favour of you to receive his directions upon it, and to proceed as you shall be desired by the friends of those persons, who will apply to you."

R. 10th.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] July 6-16, Bruxelles.— . . . "This morning early we are informed that the Duke of Savoye has cheated his friends, not his enemies. He has accepted the conditions which France offered, which are indeed very advantageous. The King restores all his country, gives him money, restores Pignerol razed, with the dependances (sic); the Duke of Burgogne shall marry immediately the young Princess of Piedmont without any portion, &c., &c.

“His R.H. has accommodated himself, but has left his friends in great distresses. We know too well the consequences of this separation, not to be frighted now it is too late.”

R. 11. 96.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, July 7, Whitehall.—“We have been all this afternoon till now, that it is, past ten o'clock, upon a proposal that was lately made by the Commissioners of the Land Bank, a copy of which I have here enclosed. The giving so great a sum as 300,000*l.* for a premium, the difficulties of raising it upon any fund not appropriated, were arguments for not complying with it; but that which weighed most with everybody was the small assurance they could give of raising the whole sum, and the inconvenience it would be to the King's affairs to have a part only subscribed upon such unreasonable terms. Upon the whole matter, I speak it as my own single opinion, I doubt the money will not be raised here at all, and what the consequence of that will be, is not very pleasant to reflect on.

“It does appear by all the precedents that the Lieutenancy of the Town of Plimouth has gone along with the government of that Fort; but my Lord Stamford is so unwilling to part with it that I know not what to do. I have here enclosed what has been taken out of the Docket books upon this matter.”

SHREWSBURY to LORD JUSTICE PORTER.

1696, July 9, Whitehall.—“I have received the favour of your Lordship's of the 27th of June, and am glad to find so much good temper in the Parliament, and such unanimity in their zeal and loyalty to his Majesty. I hope the same good disposition will continue, whenever the King shall think it advisable that they sit to do business.

“Your Lordship, I suppose, will have heard that his Majesty has appointed the Earls of Montrath and Drogheda to be joined with your Lordship in the Government. The Commission and Instructions are preparing, and may probably be dispatched in two or three days.

“I doubt we have too much reason to apprehend that the Duke of Savoy is entering into a separate treaty with France, that King offering to marry the Duke of Burgundy to the Princess of Piedmont, to demolish Pignerol, and to restore all that has been taken during this war.”

Copy.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] July 9-19, Gemblours.—“I did myself the honour to write to your Grace last post from Bruxelles about the peace which the Duke of Savoye had made with France. Everything we see since then seems to confirm that news. The President de la Tour is expected here tomorrow, who has orders from his master to give the King an account of all that transaction. What seems most provoking for us is, that his R.H. seemed careful to manage the honour and interests of the Emperor and of the King of Spain in some manner, but never so much as mentioned our King, or the States. We hope here at least that the Spaniards and Imperialists will not accept the neutrality which is proposed beyond the mountains, for they, with the rest of the confederate troops, can make up near 25,000 men. We seem to give over all thoughts of doing anything here, and would fain have the P[rince] of Vaudemont go to bombard Dunkirque, though he thinks 'tis very difficult and hazardous.

“The King is more melancholy than I have ever seen him, and I fear the ill news which I bring him of the great necessities of his Army, and the little hopes I can see of subsisting it to the end of the campaign, have added to his chagrin. I am going down again to Flanders.”

R. 13. 96.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, July 10, Whitehall.—“Yours of the 4th by express arrived here on the 8th, and that of the 2nd by the post not till yesterday. The first brings news one has long apprehended, and must now be submitted to.

“The Lords of the Admiralty have desired that they may have leave to represent upon the complaint of taking away the boat from the Deputy-Governor of Portsmouth, and by the next post I suppose that will be ready to be sent over.

“I perceive his Majesty has been pleased to return no answer upon what I writ in mine of the 26th of June, at my Lord Rochester's desire; I take the thing to be of so small consequence that I am persuaded his Majesty will not refuse it.

“My Lady Dorchester and her daughter my Lady Catherine desire me to put the King in mind of his promise of some money for the young lady, upon which she writ a letter to his Majesty since his being in Flanders.

“The Merchants have been here this morning, and are ordered to attend the Council tomorrow; very loud in their complaints against the proceedings at Amsterdam, contrary to what the Pensioner's letter to you seemed to give good hopes of. It would be of great use if that matter might be better composed. In Mr. Secretary's absence out of town we have directed Mr. Vernon to speak to the Dutch Ambassador about it, and likewise to write to Lord Villiers. The Merchants press extremely that the notaries should be ordered, for some time at least, to protest no bills; how far the Council will think so brisk a resolution advisable I cannot tell, but we did not judge it proper for us to do it without taking their opinion.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, July 14, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 6th and the 9th, and conclude, as you do, that a separate Peace is agreed between France and Savoy. It comes at a very unlucky time for our affairs, not only abroad, but here, which want no such discouraging accidents. The Treasury have declared to us today they find it absolutely impossible to send any speedy and considerable supply for the Army, so that if any way could be found out to get credit for them abroad, for their support for some time, that seems to be the only expedient left, to preserve them from immediate ruin.

“My Lord Sunderland sent me a letter, in which he desired I would receive his Majesty’s pleasure concerning the late Bishop of Ely and Sir Theo. Oglethorpe, to whom he says his Majesty is disposed to grant licences to travel to any parts, enemies’ countries excepted; but my Lady Oglethorpe, who delivered the letter to me, said, she doubted whether Sir Theo. was now in that disposition; he had desired it at the beginning of the summer with an intention to make a campaign in the Emperor’s Army, but the year was now so far spent that she did not believe that could now be done; but I expect to hear further from her. However, if in the meantime his Majesty shall be pleased to declare his pleasure conditionally, there will be the less delay when they apply for passes.

“We talk here that the Duke of Savoy has power to propose a more advantageous peace to the Allies than has yet been offered, and that the general agreement is nearer than ever.

“I have so often put the Lords here in mind to offer some names to his Majesty for supplying the Admiralty Board, and they have so constantly declined, though not refused, to come to any resolution, that without his Majesty’s further direction I shall press them no more. Mr. Russell goes out of town the end of this week; Mr. Priestman continues extremely ill; Lord Mayor and Colonel Austen seldom or never can attend; so that the whole business will rest on the three remaining gentlemen.”

SHREWSBURY to SUNDERLAND.

1696, July 14, Whitehall.—“I received a letter from your Lordship of the 6th by the hands of my Lady Oglethorpe, but at the same time she told me she could not tell whether Sir Theo. would now make use of the licence your Lordship had obtained for him, because he had asked it at the beginning of the summer with a prospect to make a campaign in the Emperor’s army; but now the year was so far spent that she believed that could not be put in practice. When I hear from her again I shall obey your directions.

“I have no good news to send you, and I do not care to write bad. I am sorry to hear your Lordship does not design to visit London this summer, as I thought you intended about this time.”

SHREWSBURY to LORD JUSTICE PORTER.

1696, July 14, Whitehall.—“Yours of the 2nd came to my hands this morning, and I laid it before the Lords, who immediately directed a short commission to be prepared, authorising your Lordship and the two Lords appointed Justices to continue and hold the Parliament, and it will be dispatched to you with all possible expedition. I suppose, when the King resolves on the time that the Parliament is to sit to do business, a particular signification and instruction will be sent you for that purpose.”

Copy.

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1696, July 14, Whitehall.—“The ill news that has been long apprehended is at last confirmed by your Lordship’s of the 27th June. I believe the Duke of Savoy’s being too hasty to accept offers that have the appearance of advantage, will prove prejudicial to himself as well as his friends. A little more patience might have obtained that for him with honour and security which he must now take during his neighbour’s pleasure only.

“I conclude you receive his Majesty’s directions by Mr. Blaithwayt how to act in this circumstance. I shall therefore only add that I find the King does not think fit that the rules prescribed by Order of Council for confining the extraordinary of foreign ministers should in this present conjuncture reach your Lordship.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, July 14, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 4th, 9th, 15th, 16th, and 19th of July, n.s., to acknowledge, and am very sorry to find the negotiation in Piedmont has had so ill a conclusion; I wish that nearer at hand [it] may be more prosperous. I should imagine the Duke of Savoy, for his own credit, would have it in his power to offer to the Allies some proposals more advantageous than have yet come from France, and his desertion will probably make them more inclinable to accept them. If this conjecture of mine be true, I suppose it will be known when the President de la Tour has his audience of the King, and is to make the best excuse he can for his master.

“I cannot conceive that the bombarding only of Dunkirke should be of such consequence that any hazard should be run for it. If anything could be done by sea or land that would ruin the port, that would be a great ease and advantage to us and the Dutch; but if the town were in ashes, I cannot understand that the haven would be rendered incapable of receiving and protecting Du Bart and the privateers, who do us all the mischief there, and might still continue to do so.”

BERKELEY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, July 16, not far from Ushant.—“ I herewith send your Grace a copy of the result of our Council of War at Belle Isle; our transactions there I send to Mr. Vernon. We have taken two prizes since we came from thence, one with fish from Newfoundland, and the other a ship from the French they took laden with sugar from Nevis; and all our clean ships are now out of sight, unluckily, most of them after a privateer, for we now see four French men-of-war, which we suppose to be Nesmond, and they being all clean ships, none of ours will come near them. I shall endeavour to get some intelligence what the French are doing at Brest, and accordingly proceed, though I fear it will now be difficult, for these men-of-war in probability will give notice of us, and they will be upon their guard. Though 'tis a considerable time still to winter, yet I think it not too soon to put your Grace in mind that we want heavy ships, I mean first-rates. Our neighbours build great apace, and we have not built one first-rate since the war. The Sovereign is burnt, and the rest wear too fast, so that I think it will be absolutely necessary to have at least two set up this winter; and 'tis an expense so necessary, if I may presume to guess beforehand, there will not be a no to it in the House of Commons.”

R. 20. Enclosure :—

Copy of the resolution of a Council of War on the Britannia, off Belle Isle, 3 July, 1696—“ to stay here for five days longer, and then make the best of our way off of Ushant, and still to cover our squadron at the Isle of Ree; in the mean time to send some ships with all our tenders and long boats, and the soldiers, and endeavour to ruin the Isle of Groy.”

MR. HILL to SHREWSBURY.

[1696,] July 19-29, Gand.—. . . “ I do not find that the King has given over his design of bombarding Dunkerque, though every man I know does believe, as your Grace does, that the burning half the town will not equalate (sic) the expense and the hazard we must run. The squadron of Zelanders lie still off Ostende, and all our waggons, pioneers, and fascines are ready, but the P[rince] of Vaudemont, who was to have had the honour of that expedition, was not tempted enough to leave his post here, which Mons. de Villeroy might come and possess if he pleased twelve hours after. Now the King is coming himself to lie near Ath, in hopes to give room to the Prince to go on with that design, but I believe it will still be impossible. Perhaps the King is piqued to see himself superior, and yet to do nothing; perhaps he is persuaded the French will still come to terms, if we could be seen in a condition to act offensively; perhaps he is resolved to try everything whilst his Army is whole and entire, and then leave us so soon as it appears absolutely impossible to do anything.

“ In the mean time the arrears and necessities of our Army grow daily, and the enemies will know it, and grow more insolent. The desertion of the Duke of Savoye will certainly be followed by others, who want their subsidies. If the King of France, who offers already to restore Stratsbourg demolished, should satisfy the Imperial Ministers, as I believe he will, I am persuaded they will also make their peace. They complain already that our King has made the P[rince] Louis of Baden lose the campaign on the Rhine, by keeping the Landgrave on the Meuse to no purpose.

“I cannot yet learn whether the French will give us the same conditions which they offered before the defection of Savoye, but if they will, I must needs think God Almighty has forsaken us, if we do not accept 'em. I beg your Grace's pardon for this liberty, but I must wonder that a King of England should not accept any peace in the circumstances we are (which your Grace knows best), whilst there is not any one article which does regard the interest of our King or nation in dispute.

“It will be worth your Grace's reflection, that the young Princess of Piedmont, who is to be married to the heir of France, is heiress to the Crown of England after the D[uke] of Gloucester; and it would be worth your Grace's care to preserve your country from so dangerous a pretender. The D[uke] of Orleans, who has had a great share in making the peace of Savoye, has a daughter about 17 years old, who might perhaps help to cement our peace with France, and break all the measures which they have taken with the Court at St. Germain's. I beg pardon for these thoughts.”

BERKELEY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, July 20, off Ushant.—“Enclosed I send your Grace a copy of the result of our this day's Council of War, and the intelligence I have had of Monsieur Nesmond; and I send to Mr. Vernon the accounts of the bombing by Captain Meese and Sir Martin Beckman, who rejoined us on the 17th, in the morning, having luckily performed what they were sent for, and surprised a watchful enemy. The weather has been so bad these three days that we could not deal with the shore, but I have sent this morning to endeavour to get some prisoners off, and in the evening shall bear up for England. The bomb vessels are unserviceable till refitted, which may be done at Portsmouth, as soon as I have orders to send them thither.”

Enclosures:—

1. Copy of the resolution of a Council of War, on the Britannia, at sea, 20th July, 1696, to sail to Torbay and get fresh water, &c.
2. Copy of a statement by [Capt.] B. Beaumont that on 19th July he met the John Baptist of Lisbon, which reported having met Mons. Nesmonde with nine sail. Nesmonde was in a ship of 80 guns; there was one of 80 guns, one of 70 guns, one of 60; and the rest were about 40 or 50 guns, with one fire-ship. They were going to Cape St. Vincent to look for the Spanish West Indian fleet. Nesmonde had no flag. The 70-gun ship was English.

1696, July 21-31, Camp of Moncalier.— . . . Mr. Broughton, our Consul at Venice, wishes to be repaid the moneys he has advanced for the King's service. He also asks for the privilege of having a chaplain, which is very necessary for the edification of many English merchants, and even of foreign merchants who are Protestants, at Venice. This can only be done under the King's protection, until he shall please to send another minister (ambassador) thither. . . .

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, July 21, Whitehall.—“Having nothing worth your trouble, I did not write the last post, since when I have received yours of the 13-23, and conclude the Duke of Savoy's friendship lost. I wish Mr. Dickvelt may bring good news from Mr. Caliere, or that the motions you are making towards Flanders may be so successful as that in due time we may expect better.

“Enclosed is a copy of a letter from Nickson, alias Wall, to Mr. Meesters. His proposals are so extravagant that I should not have troubled you with them, but that this morning Sir George Rooke gave me the enclosed proposal from Philemon Coddan, who has been with Wall in this voyage, and was the person who brought the message from him I mentioned some time since. All this man seems to ask now is a commission, and Mr. Culliford, who knew him formerly in Ireland, having given a good character of his honesty and resolution, I find Sir George a good deal disposed to try if he can do them any mischief, since it is a practice the enemy use, and that he thinks it will not enable him to do hurt here, though he should be inclined. I send you Nickson's letter, not that I think any directions will be given in what he desires, but that his Majesty may have all before him that we know here, and give such commands thereupon as he judges most proper.

VISCOUNT VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1696, [July 22-]Aug. 3, n.s., Hague.—"I have given Mr. Vernon an account of what has been doing here towards redressing our merchants' complaint, in which I have done what I could in conformity to the orders I received; I hope I have effected what will relieve them. I send your Grace inclosed the draft of a proposition which the deputies of Amsterdam and Rotterdam approve of, and have promised to use their interest to get their respective cities to consent to. I do not at all doubt of the success of it, but it not being as yet a public act, I do not transmit it to Mr. Vernon to be communicated to the Lords Justices, though I take the liberty to send it particularly to your Grace; you will be pleased to judge what advantage can be made of it as it is. I shall press the finishing it as soon as possible, and give your Grace an account of it. My Lord Portland will have informed your Grace so particularly of what passes in Flanders that I dare not trouble you on that subject."

R. July 28, o.s.

PROJECT [by LORD VILLIERS].

[1696, July 22-Aug. 3.]—"Project to prevent the inconveniences which may arise from a sudden and rigorous execution of such English Bills of Exchange as have been protested.

"It is thought that no better expedient can be found than that, on this extraordinary occasion, and the scarcity there is yet of new money at London, as also for other weighty reasons, the Lords of the Justice of Amsterdam should endeavour to persuade the possessors of such protested bills to give to the drawers six weeks' time to pay them, and to take  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. at usance interest for that time; but withall that the indisputable right which is claimed in protested bills shall be preserved and remain good without any diminution in the aforesaid protested bills; to the end that in case of non-payment within the limited time, use may be made of the said right on all occasions as it shall be found lawful, and as is usual in matters of exchange; there being no appearance of its coming to that pass, for that the Bank will be from week to week provided with considerable sums of new money, and that before the time expired there will be money enough in the Bank to pay the aforesaid bills. The drawers therefore will be secured, as the possessors will be from the damage which otherwise they would have been subject to, upon the failure of some drawers, who could not get the money so soon."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, [July 27-] Aug. 6, s.n., Anvers.—“I should have done myself the honour to write to your Grace the last post upon the subject of my Lord Portland’s voyage if I had not been too long on the way betwixt our two armies. At present your Grace will be better informed of the occasions of his coming, but yet I would gladly take the liberty to say something in relation to it. The négociations at the Hague do still go on, I think, though Messrs. Dickvelt and Boreel are expected at the King’s army; the enemies are less forward since the defection of Savoye, and since they see the disorder we are in for want of money. The King has been very eager to attempt and do something; perhaps to frighten our enemies into better terms; perhaps to disturb their negociations at the Hague.

“When Lord Portland went from the Camp the King was again resolved to attempt the bombarding of Dunkerque; now that design is over again. The Landgrave is let to go back to the Rhine, when ’tis too late, I fear. I think it is impossible for us to do anything here this campaign, though I know the King is told, ’twere better do amiss than do nothing, by some ill folks. I think it is impossible for the King’s own army to subsist here till another campaign; the Hollanders will not lend us a stiver; and the King is going to pawn his jewels for about 300,000 florins, and Schuylenbourg will help us with a 100,000 more, which is altogether about 14 days’ subsistence, after which we must depend entirely upon Providence and my Lord Godolphin.

“The present debate at the Hague is about the fortifications and walls of Stratsbourg, in which the Circles of Suabe and Franconie have indeed some interests. The Emperor’s Council are inclinable to consent to the offers of France; yet the King is persuaded that the least wise and the most disaffected in England and Hollande are desirous of a peace; he is told that there is money enough in England to carry on the war; that malice and faction only hinder its circulation. Now I am glad my Lord Portland is in the way to be well informed by your Grace of what is fit to be done for the service of the King and the good of his kingdoms in a very critical time.

“There happened last week a great disorder in the Elector’s quarters. Some of his Bavarians insulted the Prince of Holsteyn’s quarters, who is General of the Spanish horse. The Spaniards entered all very warmly into the resentments of the Prince of Holsteyn; made it a common and a national quarrel; went so far as to threaten and resolve to leave the Elector's camp, and go to the P[rin]ce of Vaudemont in Flanders. By good luck the P[rin]ce of Vaudemont came at the same time to that army, and, instead of putting himself at the head of their discontents, did labour to calm all the heats. The Elector was easily persuaded to give large and ample satisfactions to the P[rin]ce of Holsteyn; so the Spaniards and Wallons seem contented with this act of justice, though they will always be angry at the partiality which they believe the Elector does show in favour of his own troops.

"The Electress is brought to bed of a daughter, and all the Spanish letters say the Queen is with child."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, July 28, Whitehall.—"I have received yours of the 30th of July and 2nd of Aug., n.s. I cannot remember ever to have writ that my Lord Stamford was convinced the practice was against him. I doubt it will be a difficult thing to do that; he seems so fond of the whole command, and so unsatisfied that after having passed a Great Seal for it, it should now be shared with him, that though all that has been laid before his Majesty has likewise been communicated to him, he is not satisfied to give up any part to Major-General Trelawny; but if upon the whole matter his Majesty will have it done, he must be pleased to sign a warrant to revoke that part of my Lord Stamford's grant, which must pass to the Great Seal, nothing less I conceive being sufficient to repeal my Lord Stamford's patent.

"I did this morning put the Lords Justices in mind to recommend to his Majesty a Commissioner of the Admiralty. They had then so much business that I did not press it, but shall take the next opportunity to do it.

"Mr. Blackwell, the Consul of Leghorne, having desired me to mention him to his Majesty to be employed as Sir Thomas Derham was, both Resident and Consul, I told him I thought that post was designed for Mr. Wolseley to be Envoy, as he had been at Bruxelles; but if the King should intend to send one with no other character than Resident, I suppose Mr. Wolsel[e]y would hardly accept it, and in that case this gentleman, I believe, would supply it with good credit, he having lived there with esteem, and well looked upon at the Great Duke's Court."

It is generally believed the last are designed for the Straits, and probably it is so, if they have no design at the end of the summer to attempt anything here. I hope we are in a condition not to apprehend that."

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, July 28-Aug. 7, Camp of Chivas.—We quitted Moncalier, and came here in two marches, to cover the Milanese, and to retire thither if necessary. The Emperor is sending M. de Mansfeld with proposals to his R.H., which should be sufficient to lead him back, if he be capable of consulting his true interests. The Prince has informed us that he had demanded from M. de Catinat a prolongation of the truce to the end of this month, and has sent us the Marshal's reply, which was evidently pre-arranged. We will take our measures accordingly. There is some appearance that he [the Prince] will march against us with the French before the end of the campaign.

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, July 31, Whitehall.—"I did not sooner acknowledge the favour of yours of the 19th because there is little in it that I can give any answer to, though there are some melancholy and I fear too reasonable reflections. What you speak of the young Princess in France, I doubt the Bill of Rights is a very great objection to, where it is declared that whosoever shall marry a Papist shall be for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the Crown of England or Ireland, and the subjects of these realms are absolved from their allegiance to a King so marrying.

"There is one Minshall, a Roman Catholic gentleman, who had a pass from me to go serve in the Emperor's army, but some of his relations have this morning acquainted me that his design is to fight a duel with one Mr. Curwent, who is of the same persuasion, and now a prisoner in Flanders. They wish something might be done to prevent this mischief." . . .

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1696. [July 31-] Aug. 10, n.s., Hague.—“I have received the honour of your Grace’s of the 28th inst. My Project is at an end, as Mr. Vernon will inform you, to which I will only add to your Grace that I am told that Amsterdam will look upon all bills as sufficiently protested that come back signed by two witnesses. I am glad therefore that the order was not prolonged which forbade notaries to sign protestations, since by the course taken here it would have had no effect; in one word, my Lord, it is impossible to bring these people to consent to anything by which their interest is not advanced.

“I wish I could give your Grace any satisfaction as to what you please to ask me concerning the general peace, but if I am able to make any probable guesses in it, it is only by being nearer the place where it is stock-jobbing. The little that I know of it is that Mons. Cagliere saw Mons. Dyckvelt near Ghent, before the King came over; from thence he was removed into this country, where he has conferred with Mons. Dyckvelt and Mons. Boreel almost every day, and in every little alehouse. Mons. Dyckvelt has been several times at the Army, to acquaint the King with this negociation, and is gone thither now I presume for his last resolution. So your Grace sees that the Peace of Savoy has not broke off the treaty,” [æc., as in Coxe].

Chasteaurenaud or Nesmond will cruise there, for two ships would be of the same service; neither in my opinion does our having a squadron in the Soundings secure our trade so much as ’tis thought; for though the Soundings be a pass, it is a pass of mighty extent, and the enemy have a great number of privateers, which our foul ships will never hurt.” . . .

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Aug. 4, Whitehall.—“We have had no letters from you since the last post, so that I have little to trouble you with, only my Lord Rochester has showed me a letter under Mr. Attorney’s hand, which states the matter of his acting as my Lord Clarendon’s deputy in such a manner that I presume his Majesty will make no difficulty to consent to it; and this being the season in which officers of Forests are most necessary, any delay is very inconvenient. My Lord Rochester will send you Mr. Attorney’s opinion.

“In the same Forest old Col. Legg has a walk, who being near a hundred years of age, and having always behaved himself very obligingly to his neighbours, though upon this late Act his Majesty in strictness might turn him out of it, yet it happening that Col. Mordant has a great desire to succeed him, and at the same time to satisfy him for his pretensions during his life, since it will be both a charity to the old man, and a favour to the young one, I hope his Majesty will consent to the change of the life.”

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Aug. 5-15, Gand.—“I just now receive the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 31st past, and am sorry I did not explain myself so far in regard to the Princess of Chartres as to say I was persuaded the King might have had her, of her mother’s first religion.

“I will observe your Lordship’s commands in relation to Mr. Minshall and Mr. Curwen. I did get Mr. Curwen put into the castle of Anvers, until by the King’s leave I let him out, upon a security of 5,000*l.* which he gave me, to represent himself to your Grace at London in four weeks. I will go tomorrow if possible to Anvers, where Mr. Curwen is, and prevent any accidents, if possible.

“Mr. Dyckvelt is returned from the Army towards the Hague, to renew his conferences, as we believe, with Mons. Cagliere. I am assured the Court of Spaign have left the care of their interests to our King, and will be content with what his Majesty does. I am also persuaded that the Imperialists desire a peace. The Hollanders talk of nothing but a vigorous continuation of the war, that they may not be loaded with the scandal of precipitating the peace, as they were after the Treaty of Nimegue. It is already given out there, that the English will be the occasion of making a bad peace. All the letters from France speak of great expectations of a general peace.

“Mons. de la Tour is still at the Army with the King, endeavouring to persuade the world that his master has not left the interests of his Allies; but I have seen a copy of his Royal Highness's letter to the Pope, dated the 6th of July, where he gives a fair account of a positive accommodation with France.

[P.S.] "The Guards are detached from the Army towards Loo, and [the] King will be going that way in 15 days. The Elector of Brandebourg and Duke of Zell will be invited thither, and we hope that will be [a] good excuse for his Majesty's going thither, &c., &c."

"Concluding the present designed for Abbé Scarlatti was intended to be equal to that given to the Envoyé from Florence, I have signified his Majesty's pleasure to my Lord Chamberlain accordingly, though that was something better than what was given to the Envoyé of Genoua.

"The Lords Justices have this day promised me that the next time they meet, they will come prepared to propose a Commissioner of the Admiralty. I shall not fail to remind them, and give you an account by the next post."

1696, Aug. 7, Whitehall.—"I have received yours of the 6th, s.n., and am very glad my Lord Portland is here, because he will have occasion to see so much of our condition that I do not question but he will give his Majesty a faithful account of it, and not be suspected of partiality of any kind. When his Majesty shall be informed what we are able to do, I hope he is so well instructed in the interests and inclinations of the Allies that he will take such resolutions as shall be most proper for the circumstances; and we, at least I, who see not far into these foreign mysteries, must submit, and endeavour to support whatever is determined in the best manner we can."

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

[16]96, Aug. 8.—"You have left us in the saddest condition that ever people were in—an army abroad, a fleet and army at home to maintain, and neither money, friends, nor credit to do it with.

"The King has sent directions that the squadron for protecting the Flota shall be increased to 24, 15 English and 9 Dutch, and to remain at Cadiz all winter; that, this squadron included, he expects the winter fleet shall consist of eighty line-of-battle ships, 50 English and 30 Dutch. For God[’s] sake send us some advice, or come and tell us how we shall do these great things.

“The Duke of Bedford has desired the Justices to approve two Deputy Lieutenants he would appoint for Cambridgeshire, Sir Paul Whitchott and Mr. Thomas Day. The Lords know nothing of either of them, but, not depending entirely upon the recommendation of his Grace’s servants, they desired me, when I writ to you, to enquire of their character.

[MONS.] TESSÉ to the MARQUIS DE ST. THOMAS.

1696, Aug. [8-] 18.—Declares, in reply to inquiries, that his King desires nothing else than the neutrality of Italy; and that if the King’s army, with his R.H. at the head, should be successful against the Milanese, the King will withdraw it whenever his R.H. shall please.

ST. THOMAS to the PRINCE-COUNT OF MANSFELD.

1696, Aug. [8-] 18, Turin.—His R.H. declares hereby that he seeks the neutrality of Italy; or at least he will be content with that of his states, so that none of the parties may pretend to have passage through them to attack one another. He will urge the Count de Tessé to obtain his King’s consent to this. He cannot prevent the Marshal de Catinat from crossing the Po or the Doire after the end of this month, but, in order to give time for the return of the couriers, he will not permit his troops to join with the French until 15th Sept.

Copy, French, “translated from Italian.” Endorsed: Aug. 21.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, Aug. 10-20, Anvers.—“I came hither to look after Mr. Minshall, as your Grace pleased to order. I found he had been here, and had seen Mr. Curwen, but it seems he was not so bloody-minded as he thought he was. I find he will not make use of the passport your Grace did give him, to go serve in Germany. He went hence to Borm, where some English and Irish monks are praying day and night for King James. From thence he is gone to Lere, where our nuns are doing the same thing. I shall watch him a little, and give your Grace account of it.

“Since the last which I had the honour to write to your Grace, Mons. Dickvelt is returned to the Hague, after a great many private conferences with the King. I am persuaded he will find the French agents there, who are still desirous enough to have a peace.

“The greatest intrigue here at present is about giving us a Queen. Great endeavours have been used for the Princess of Brandebourg, for whom Mons. Capell has been engaged; at least, great endeavours have been used to engage him. My Lord Portland, I'm told, was for the Princess of Hesse; and now the King of Denmark's agents are all at work for their Princess. Mons. de Pless is at the Hague, very eager to enter into a closer treaty of friendship with the King of England; and I am told the King his master would do almost anything to entail the Crown of England upon the issue of his daughter, or his brother. The King, I'm told, has referred him also to Mons. Dyckvelt, who will doubtless be very careful of the King's interests: but 'tis not reasonable to expect he should be very zealous for those interests of trade and commerce, and a mutual defence, which might regard the kingdoms of England and Denmark exclusively to all our neighbours.

"My Lord Villars is gone to the army, to make his court to the King, and to the Baron de Keppel, who needed not the absence of my Lord Portland to be the first minister here. I believe my Lord Villars would still be glad to serve a Queen, and I believe he will be intriguing for the Princess of Denmark. I take the liberty to tell your Grace everything almost which comes in my sight."

R. 26, 96.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Aug. 11, Whitehall.—"Yesterday and today have been so fully taken up with speaking with the Treasury, the Admiralty, and the Bank, in order to raise the money, and dispatch the Straits squadron, that I have had no opportunity to remind the Lords Justices of proposing one for the Admiralty, nor laying before them what his Majesty is pleased to direct, in relation to Major-General Trelawney. I shall endeavour to give you an account of the one and the other by the next post.

"Mr. Vernon will give you an account, by order of the Lords Justices, what their thoughts are, in order to engage the Bank to advance a sum of money. I heartily wish upon those terms they may be able to prevail.

"As to the Straits squadron, the necessary orders are given for the sending it out, according to his Majesty's directions, as soon as may be; but the scarcity of money affords so much difficulty in the victualling, and the want of stores at Cadiz makes it so necessary to consult the Navy Board, that I fear the squadron will not be dispatched with so much expedition or secrecy as might be expected, though everything will be done on our parts to promote the one and enjoin the other.

"I have here enclosed sent you a commission for Nickson's friend, which has been prepared by Sir Charles Hedges and approved by Sir George Rooke.

"I have so often troubled his Majesty with doubtful letters upon the subject of the money that I am ashamed to send another. Tomorrow we shall know the opinion of the Directors of the Bank, and if there be any news worth sending, it shall go by express."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Aug. 12-22, Gand.—“I have seen some letters from Piemont since I had the honour to write to your Grace, which do give new disquiets. 'Tis now believed that there is a farther treaty made between the French and his Royal Highness, by which they are to carry the war into the Millanese, at the expense of the French; that all the conquests which shall be made in the Millanese or the Montferrat shall be for the Duke of Savoye, who does in exchange give up Savoye to the King of France. 'Tis also said that it was resolved to offer so hard conditions to the Allies, that they might refuse to accept of a peace in order to have good opportunities to carry on this war in Italy. 'Tis added that the Venetians have discovered this secret treaty, who are also alarmed at it.

“On the other side the King of Spaign, though against the opinion of his Council, has refused to accept the neutrality in Italy, saying he left it to the King of England. So the Spaniards and Imperialists and my Lord Galloway are preparing to continue the war in the state of Milan, though I know not how. The enemies are preparing, I mean the Duke of Savoye and the Mareschal de Catinat, to carry on the war forward. The Mareschal resolved to begin the 21st instant, s.n., when the truce expired. This is yet so great a secret that I ought not to know it; but if it prove true, it will soon appear, and show a new scene to the world.”

R. 20, 1696.

SHREWSBURY to ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

1696, Aug. 13, Whitehall.—“We have reason to hope, from the answer the Directors of the Bank of England gave yesterday, that upon Saturday, when a general Court is to meet, they will agree to lend the King 200,000*l*.

“I have here enclosed<sup>o</sup> sent you a scheme of such ships as the Admiralty have drawn for the Straits squadron, the winter Fleet, and to be laid up; I should be glad to receive your opinion upon it. Mr. Papillion has discoursed with Sir George Rooke, and, as he tells me, does not make great difficulty to provide them with victuals; but it being likewise necessary that a suitable proportion of naval stores should go with them, or follow soon after, I doubt, when that is ordered to the Navy Board, as it must very soon, the secret is at an end, and possibly some objection may be raised there.

“The King, having designed Vice-Admiral Evertsen to go with the Dutch, has directed that a Vice-Admiral be sent from hence. Aylmer and Mitchell, the only two we have of that character, are both desirous, as I am informed, to be excused. I desire to know who you would think most proper, and would wish should have the command. The Admiralty I believe will incline to Nevill.”

MAT. PRIOR TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Aug. 14-24, Hag[ue].—“ I take my Lord Villiers’s being away for an excuse that I trouble your Grace with what is doing here, or rather with what I think is doing, for it is all feeling colours, and he knows most who guesses fairest.

“ Boreël and Dyckvelt were with Cailliere on Sunday last. On Monday there was a conference at the Pensioner’s, where were he, the Imperial Ministers, Don Quiros (who will be everywhere), and Dyckvelt, who pretended to be there but by accident. The business therefore of this meeting was that the Emperor and Spain should (it was hoped) pursue and continue the war in Italy, and that these Ministers would write again on this subject to their masters. This was only because Quiros was by, for that affair has already been written about, and could not be much advanced by their writing again.

“ The Pensioner then told them something of what was treating with Cailliere, and desired the Imperial Ministers to dispatch an express to Vienne, to know the Emperor’s ultimate resolution as to what regarded Straesbourg; which express the Ministers accordingly sent away on Tuesday. At its return we may probably see the point adjusted, which they say had stopped the negociation for some time past.

“ On Wednesday the Pensioner went out privately one way, and Boreël another. Dyckvelt followed them at night (though he was President of the States General this week), which is not very usual, unless he has urgent business. They met Cailliere between Leyden and Amsterdam, and went forward with him in a yacht (as I am told by one who watched them); the Pensioner is gone to Utrecht, and is expected back tonight. Our small German Ministers are very uneasy at these negociations, of (sic) which every one thinks himself or his master worthy to have had part.

“ Our States of Holland in the mean time have regulated their quota to the state of war on the same foot on which it was last year, that is, towards the fleet, to be 60 men-of-war and 20 fire-ships, and two millions to the extraordinaries of the land artillery, and the rest wants but the form, which it will have at their next meeting, when his Majesty will be here." . . .

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Aug. 15, Whitehall.—"Having according to his Majesty's directions pressed the Lords Justices again to propose some fit person to be added to the Commission of the Admiralty, they desire his Majesty may be acquainted that the season of the year is now so far advanced that it is their humble opinion it should remain as it now is till the King's return, at which time he will best judge who will be most proper for that station, or whether there be a necessity of any alteration, since towards the end of October Sir John Houblon will be out of his office of Mayor, and at liberty to attend the Board as formerly; Mr. Priestman it's probable will be recovered of his illness, and Mr. Russell returned to town.

"The Bank have agreed to remit immediately 50,000*l.* for the use of the Army, and have voted in a general Court that they will lend 150,000*l.* more, but I believe will expect some good words and promises from his Majesty in relation to their former losses in the service before they will be prevailed on actually to advance the latter sum. It is certain they have done a great service considering the time, and will very well deserve his Majesty's favourable consideration for it, which I hope will not be delayed, lest that might prove a discouragement to what they have so zealously resolved."

ADMIRAL RUSSELL to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Aug. 15, Chippenham.—Gives his opinion upon "the scheme" sent to him by the Admiralty and by Shrewsbury—as to ships for the Straits service, manning the ships in the River and at Portsmouth, flags of Vice-Admirals, &c. "Nevill will be diligent; he is but a poor man in execution. SHREWSBURY to BERKELEY.

1696, Aug. 18, Whitehall.—"I find the Lords Justices, upon discoursing with the Admiralty, are not inclined that the Fleet should yet come to Spithead. 1696, Aug. 18, Whitehall.—“We want now four posts from Holland, which makes me have very little to trouble you with. Mr. Vernon has the Lords Justices' directions to give you a full account of the dispute between my Lord Stamford and Major-Gen. Trelawny. I apprehend, if that be decided now, it will fall out to disoblige one or the other; if it were let remain as it is till the King's return, and that they were both in town, perhaps it might have an easier conclusion.

“With the opinion of the Admiralty we have pitched upon Sir Clou. Shovell to command the Fleet to the Straits, and think of sending Nevill besides. It happens that Aylmer and Mitchell, the only two Vice-Admirals his Majesty has in pay, have both been there a great while, and are not very inclinable to return so soon, if they might be excused.”

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Aug. 18-28, Breda.— . . . “The King is got thus far on his way from the army to Loo. Here his Majesty does find the Pentionaire, Mr. Dyckvelt, &c., all instruments or tools of peace, which everybody now does believe to be well advanced. I can assure your Grace that the King is now very willing to promote it. I do also believe the accounts which my Lord Portland does give of his journey to London have made his Majesty more ready to come to a conclusion. I fear the King will be tempted to stay at Loo so long as the season is so very favourable; and 'tis believed his Majesty will go to Cleves to visit the Electress of Brandebourg, where he will see the young Princess. I am going back to Bruxelles, to carry his Majesty's compliments to the Electress.”

SHREWSBURY TO SIR JAMES OGELVIE.

1696, Aug. 20, Whitehall.—“I acknowledged on the 15th the receipt of your letter, and acquainted you that the Lords of the Council had issued a warrant for the apprehending of Warburton.

He has been since taken up, but upon examination appears to be one who serves the Lady Montgomery as a cook, can neither write nor read, and utterly denies to have sent any letters to Scotland; and there being no evidence against him, upon which he could be proceeded against, their Lordships, seeing no cause for detaining him in custody, thought fit to discharge him; of which I would not omit giving you an account."

BERKELEY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Aug. 20, Torrbay.—“Having heard of a letter from Sir Cloudesly Shovel to your Grace, and seen your answer to him relating to the convoy now going out, makes me write this (lest your Grace and the other Lords Justices should think I have been asleep all this time), to let you know that 'tis above a month since I writ to the Admiralty about this very matter, who, I presumed, had acquainted your Excellencies with it; but not hearing of any resolution thereupon, I was confirmed in the opinion that our business here was to execute, not to advise, unless our opinions were asked. The convoys, English and Dutch, are going out, the wind being fair; so desiring your Grace to be mindful of my last request about coming from the Fleet, I will leave farther trouble to you at this present.”

SHREWSBURY to PORTLAND.

[16]96, Aug. 21, Whitehall.—“I am glad you got well to Margate, and hope you made use of the wind whilst it was fair, for it turned so soon that we are in pain about your passage.

“I have punctually obeyed your Lordship's commands in making your compliment to the Lords Justices. My thumb is very well, and Mr. Montagu quite awake; he got a good knock upon his head in the fall.

“I desire you will not forget to speak to the King about the two intercepted letters from France. I find the Ar[ch]-Bis[hop] stored with tools for that business, and well skilled in it; but neither he nor I having very fine fingers, he has promised to engage one whose fidelity he can be answerable for, and who is already adroit, and he will assist him with his skill.

“The Arch-Bis[hop] knows how to set up the engine for imitating hands, but thinks it so dangerous an art that, unless his Majesty command him, I perceive he is desirous it should be discovered to nobody, but die with him, being confident that he is now the only person alive that is perfectly master of that secret.

“Mr. Smith of the Bank has been with me about your subscription; when any are made I will be sure to give him notice.

“Our last letters speak mightily of peace. I hope you will stay to bring us some good news, and then I heartily wish you here again.

[P.S.] “Since the writing so far of my letter, Mr. Duncomb has been with me, and signified some concern upon what was said of him at my office. He expresses all imaginable readiness to serve the Government; that since his late great purchase he is not so able as he has been, but that he has and ever will lend the King all the ready money he has, and promote the same amongst his friends. This and much more he has said to me, which I forbear repeating, because I conclude Mr. Guy will write at large to your Lordship upon the same subject."

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Aug. 21, Whitehall.—“Yesterday your letters of the 3rd, 6th, 10th, and 13th, o.s. (sic), arrived together.

“I will endeavour to find out some person to propose for an exchange, as his Majesty is graciously pleased to direct, upon Mr. Jurieu’s application, for I think the case does deserve a very just compassion.

“I shall acquaint Col. Mordant with his Majesty’s favour. Your letter of the 10th, where you speak of Calliere’s negotiation, raised a curiosity which was not satisfied in your next of the 13th.

“My Lord Chamberlain tells me he has taken care that Abbé Scarlatti’s present shall be equal to that of the Envoyé of Florence, and that he has pressed the dispatch of it, but Sir Francis Child’s head is so turned upon the business of the Coin, that he hardly knows what he does or says.”

SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

1696, Aug. 21, Whitehall.—“Yours of the 21st and 28th of July, o.s., came to my hands yesterday together. I have very small hopes from any propositions the Emperor can make to his R.H., because I take the whole matter to have been long concerted with France, and I wish he does not join with them to destroy the Spanish territories in Italy.

“I have and will continue to endeavour to get Mr. Broughton some consideration for his expense; as to his chaplain, nothing can well be done till the King’s return, because his commission must be altered, which will be reasonable to do, if no other minister be employed to reside there.

“I give your Lordship many thanks for assuring me that I shall know what passes in your parts. You may believe I am not a little solicitous upon the account of the public; besides, my good wishes to yourself makes (sic) me glad to hear that you are safe.”

SHREWSBURY TO MR. HILL.

1696, Aug. 21, Whitehall.— . . . “If the Emperor be disposed to peace, and the King of Spain entrusts his concerns with our King, I hope his Majesty will not refuse one, when it shall be for his interest. I cannot think the condition of Holland is such, but that it will always be welcome to them, however they may brag, and nothing convinces me more that they wish it sure than their beginning so soon to cast the blame on us. I cannot much apprehend such an agreement between France and Savoy as you mention in yours of the 12th. It must certainly give such a jealousy to all the Princes and States in Italy that I believe the French would hardly risk the consequences; and to imagine it can be done with their consent is impossible, without concluding they are all run mad.

“The posture of affairs in our King’s reign has a great resemblance with that of Queen Elizabeth, some things excepted. She made great advantages from the several propositions of marriage she hearkened to, and found her interest in being coquette to many. I know not whether the same politic may not yet be good, and it may prove as useful to his Majesty to give hopes to many as to engage himself to one. But perhaps my own practice may help to convince [convict] me of partiality against matrimony.”

SHREWSBURY TO ADMIRAL RUSSELL.

[16]96, Aug. 22, Windsor.—“Concluding from the Admiralty you have an account what measures are taken as to the Straits squadron, I shall only acquaint you that by the last letters the King presses extremely the hastening out these ships, lest they arrive too late for the service designed. If that had only been to protect the Galleons or Flota, and not to have stayed all the winter, I imagine this might have been supplied with more expedition. Ships from the main Fleet possibly would have served, and the men needed not be paid off, which will take up much time.

“I ask you these questions, because the letters that arrived yesterday give great hopes of a Peace, in which case it will surely be ridiculous to send a squadron to winter and be worm-eaten at Cadiz. The same letters speak also of the King’s marriage. There are three rival ladies; the Princess of Bran[denburgh] is judged most likely, though the King of Denmark presses for his daughter, and the Landgrave of Hesse for his. But this wooing and the Peace is only to yourself, as I cannot help rejoicing at the thoughts, since we may hope once again to be merry, though it may not last long.”

BERKELEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, Aug. 23, Torr Bay.—“This is to return your Grace my thanks for the honour of yours of the 18th instant, but [I] think ’tis better that my own particular affairs should suffer for want of my being at London than that the King’s service should suffer for want of my presence here; though indeed it surprises us to hear that your Grace and the other Lords Justices should think it for the service that we should remain some longer time here, and that the Admiralty should draw so many ships from us, they having ordered ten away within three days, besides fireships, and leaving us but sixteen here. The Dutch Admiral was forced back here this morning, and sent me word just now by his secretary that according to a petition of the masters of the merchantmen he intends to sail tomorrow morning for Spithead. I hope that, the season of the year being considered, and the light moon now that may befriend us, we shall not be kept here long after him."

MR. HILL to SHREWSBURY.

1696, [Aug. 23-] Sept. 2, s.n., Bruxelles.—"I came hither to make a compliment from the King to the Electrice, but I found her Highness under such affliction for the death of the King her father that she keeps her bed and sees nobody. One great cause of her sorrow is, that the Elector does not leave the army to come and comfort her.

"The last letters from France say that King does keep his bed. He had a great boil on his shoulder, like what they call a plague-sore; it was lanced, and he found ease; he was blooded, and found himself better; though it is remembered that his Queen died of such an operation in the like distemper. The letters from Spain say that Queen is sick; some say it is the natural effects of her breeding; some say she was poisoned in an eel-pie; some say she ate too much, and surfeited.

"There is now no doubt made by anybody but that the general peace is laboured at the Hague. 'Tis believed a place will soon be named where the ministers of all the princes concerned may meet, and adjust their pretensions their own way. In the mean time the Imperialists and Spaniards have refused the neutrality in Italy; and the French prolonged the truce to the 1st instant, after a solemn declaration to forbear no longer. The Duke of Savoye has taken 15 d[ay]s more before he will join his troops to the French. His R.H. has ordered Mons. la Tour not to quit the King, and he is gone after him to Loo.

"The Courts of France and Rome will employ their interests, I'm told, to seat King James upon the throne of Poland. I know none but the Polanders who ought to be against it."

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Aug. 25, Whitehall.—"I forgot by the last post to tell you my thoughts of what you say of the Princess of Chartres. I can hardly imagine that the bigotry or hypocrisy of the French Court would ever suffer them to consent to such an article. For the King of France to ruin, force, torture, and murder millions of people in order to extirpate Protestantism, and at the end of this to encourage his own niece to embrace that religion, would be so foul a blot in [on] his character, that I doubt the necessities he is under of a peace are not so extreme pressing as to oblige him to submit to it; besides, I think he should rather choose to part with twenty towns than make such a step. I am glad to find by yours of the 18-28 that matters are changed, since I think it is for the better; and heartily wishing that may be concluded which is best for England, I am," &c.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Aug. 25, Whitehall.—“After I had writ my letters by the last post, I went in the evening out of town as far as Windsor, and being gone before the fifth packet arrived, which brought yours of the 18-28 from Breda, I could not then acknowledge the receipt of it. We are yet as much in the dark as before in relation to Cagliere’s negotiation, the extract of your letter to my Lord Lexington not having been communicated to us by Mr. Secretary [Vernon], who is at present out of town.

“I have proposed to the Lords the exchanging some person here for the prisoner Mr. Jurieu mentions. They have thought fit to propose Col. Mac Elligott. If it be expected one engaged in the late Plot should be given up, another must be offered, and we may find such against whom there is not sufficient evidence.

“Mons. d’Hervart writes word there are small hopes to engage the Cantons, either Catholic or Protestants, to engage in this quarrel, though the Duke of Savoy should join with the French in the conquest of the Milaneze and Montferrat, without considerable sums of money laid out amongst them. I hoped they would have thought themselves so concerned in that cause as not to have expected presents to influence them to the preservation of their own liberty and government, but it seems it is not so.

[P.S.] “Since I had writ so far I hear Col. Austen is dead. I believe the Lords will very unwillingly recommend any person when they expect his Majesty’s return so soon.”

ADMIRAL RUSSELL TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Aug. 25, Chippenham.—If the squadron designed for the south is only to protect the Flota, it may be despatched expeditiously. Suggests orders for Lord Barckly.

“I am extreme glad at the news your Grace sends me, for though the prints have been writing some time on that subject, I gave little credit to it. Sir James Forbes (?) came hither full of it, but desponding. Lord Edward said there was nothing of it. The noble knight had a letter last night from Lord Sonderland, which says I am to be honoured with his company the last day of this month, which is Monday next; he is so much a servant to him that he is undone to stay till the Lord arrives.”

M. PRIOR to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, [Aug. 25-]Sept. 4, Hag[ue].—"My Lord Villiers informs your Grace what passed yesterday at the Congress. Our small German Ministers are, I think, in their hearts angry at this overture, for they love subsidies better than treaties, and would prolong the war as long as we can pay for it. The Imperial Ministers, how great a mind soever they may have for a peace, are willing to seem to be courted to it.

"We have news these two last posts that the King of France has been very ill; the French post this morning confirms it. He has had a swelling in his neck, which is a kind of a pestilential sore, for which he has been blistered and scarified, and is not yet out of danger. We pray very heartily for his going off, and have a great mind to have our treaty signed by Louis the 15th.

"Since everybody is thinking of his own pretensions and interests in this conjuncture, I hope your Grace will pardon me troubling you even with mine. I have been six years here, and from the title of his Majesty's Secretary I seem to have a kind of right by prescription to be Secretary to the Embassy when it shall be named, which in all probability will be very suddenly. For this I must recommend myself to your Grace's goodness; and I hope to the obligations you have been pleased already to lay on me, your Grace will add this one more of naming me to his Majesty on this occasion, that I may go on with credit to receive your Grace's commands, and continue to own my happiness to your favour."

1696, Aug. 28, Whitehall.—"I have received your Lordship's letter of the 3-13, and being very sensible of the necessity you will be in for want of money to subsist his Majesty's troops under your command, I laid your letter before the Lords Justices, who thereupon did not only repeat their direction to Sir Joseph Herne not to part with any of the tallies put into his hand by Mons. de la Tour, unless by order from his Majesty, but they have writ to desire the King will get such a discharge from Pres. de la Tour to Sir Jos. Herne as he seems to expect, to save his own credit in refusing to pay those tallies, which were put into his hands ; and if that cannot be obtained, as I apprehend it will be difficult, then that the King should give directions that Sir Jos. Herne should be indemnified in such manner as shall be thought most convenient, and that some part of the money arising from those tallies should be forthwith returned for the subsistence of the troops under your Lordship's command.

"It is not above two or three days since I received a letter from you of an old date, the 20-30 July, mentioning some negotiation Mr. Boil was upon to recover the 4,000*l.* he has lent the Duke of Savoy. All the answer or advice one can give him in the present state of this business is, to part with no more money till he receives good assurance he shall be repaid."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, [Aug. 30-]Sept. 9, n.s., Bruges.—"I am honoured with your Grace's letter of the 21st, which gives me new occasion to be troublesome today. We have still great reason to fear the effects of a private treaty between France and Savoye ; and if the Spaniards have not accepted the neutrality in Italy, the Mareschal of Catinat will be actually besieging of Valence. Our hopes of a general peace goes [go] forward apace ; we hope the greatest difficulties are removed and the most fundamental articles agreed on. Stratsbourg is to be restored as the French found it, and the Empire at liberty to make what new fortifications they please. Luxembourg is to be surrendered to the Spaniards, or an equivalent, viz., Menin, Ipres, and Furnes. These three places are much better than Luxembourg in relation to England. Our King is to be acknowledged by the French, if the peace is concluded, but I fear they will make some difficulties to own him in the opening of the treaties. I wish it were possible to conclude without the intervention of a multitude of ministers and plenipotentiaries, who are already prepared to make themselves necessary. It will not be more difficult to make a peace with France than it will be to keep peace amongst our Allies.

"I perceive the Elector of Bavaria would gladly establish himself here as perpetual Governor of these ten Provinces, and the Spaniards begin to be jealous of him, I fear. His E. Highness has had a deal of complaisance this campaign for our King, and has made his court to him very regularly. The Spaniards are afraid that with the assistance of our King and the States of Holland the Elector should make himself master ; they are also afraid that with his own troops and those of his brother of Cologne, which will make 12 or 15 thousand men, he will be able to do so, and that England and Holland would be well contented he should do so. They do carry their jealousies farther, and fear the Elector may already have made some engagements with France to be left at liberty here, on conditions of renouncing his pretensions to the succession of Spain, or to some of his rights in the Palatinate. I do not say the Elector has done any such thing, but I'm sure the Spaniards are afraid of it. It is certain the Elector has a promise from the Emperor, and has it in writing, that he will endeavour to obtain for him from the Council of Spain the perpetual government of these Provinces; but the Elector does not much rely on that promise, and the Imperialists, as well as the Spaniards, are afraid the Elector will put himself in a posture of making it good himself.

“The whole House of Hanover are afraid the peace should be made before their Electorat is confirmed by the rest of the colleges, and by the consent of France; and every one of the Allies would retard the conclusion of the peace till his own pretensions are adjusted.

“I am in a great deal more haste, my Lord, for the sake of a great many honest gentlemen here, who begin to suffer. Our Army, under the Prince of Vaudemont, is still on the safer side of the canal, for the enemies are still superior to us. The Elector is safe where the King left him, for his army is superior.”

INFORMATION by SIR JOHN FENWICK.

[1696, Aug.]—“After King James returned to France from Ireland, there was a select number of his friends, entrusted by him to manage his affairs here, who held a constant correspondence with him and his then Secretary of State, by his command; who used all methods possible to advance his interest by engaging men in places of trust in the Government, Fleet, and Army, to his party, and by the accounts they gave from hence, to move the French King to attempt his restoration, but with little success; for till the year before the business of La Hogue, we knew only of my Lord Godolphin (concerned in this Government), who held a correspondence with him from the time he went over, in whom King James, as he had often expressed in his letters, had an entire confidence.

“This winter, my Lord Middleton came to town, who had often been desired to go over, believing it would be great service to King James to have him there in his business. He alleged he could do little service by going, unless he could engage and settle a correspondence here before he went (which he was endeavouring and hoped to effect in a little time) with some men in this Government, who had power in their hands, and were the only men capable to serve him; for his friends, being out of all employments, could make him little help. That he had entered into this affair with my Lord Shrewsbury and my Lord Godolphin already, and there were some others who he believed he should gain, and then he would go.

“Soon after Captain Floyd, a groom of the bed-chamber to King James, was sent over to him from my Lord Marleborough and Admiral Russell, with an assurance from them of their interest in the Fleet and Army, which they did not doubt but to secure to him, if he would grant them his pardon for what was passed. At his return, which was within a month, he acquainted me with some things King James had ordered him, and told me he had no difficulty in Mr. Russell's affair, but the answer to my Lord Marleborough was, that he was the greatest of criminals where he had the greatest obligations, but if he did him extraordinary service, he might hope for pardon; and a little after he did a considerable piece of service, of which we had an account by one sent on purpose by King James. Capt. Floyd went again for France, and came to King James at La Hogue, with an account of the Fleet, that we could not put out thirty sail before the latter end of May, which he carried from Mr. Russell.

“My Lord Middleton, having settled this correspondence, went over in March following. After he arrived, King James writ that upon the assurance he had brought of these men being engaged in his service, the French Ministers had espoused his interest, and he hoped now the French King would lend him such an assistance as he should see us in a short time. My Lord Middleton then pressed King James to put out the Declaration which they had drawn, and sent over before he went, but was not approved of, it being a general pardon for all should be done till his landing, which exposed his friends in the mean time to all severities. He had sent to us before to send him the heads for one we thought would be most acceptable to the people, in which there was [were] some exceptions, but my Lord Middleton prevailed for the other, pretending it was absolutely necessary to make it a general pardon, for a security to the great men for their lives and fortunes; that it would draw many people to his party, and strengthen their interest so much, as they did not doubt but with a little help from France to restore him soon.

“This Declaration being published, and finding no performance of the great promises made for it, and that these men were engaged with a Commonwealth's Party, we advised to take care of trusting them too much, and that we doubted they had procured that Declaration more for their own security, whenever he should be restored, than any service intended to him.

“Soon after this my Lord Shrewsbury, who had laid down his employment at the time he first treated with my Lord Middleton, came into his place again, which gave great apprehensions that what had passed during this time would be betrayed to this Government. We expressed our fears of it to King James, but was [were] answered not to be dissatisfied, for it was with his consent he came in; that he was more capable of doing him service, and took off all suspicion of the correspondence he held. A little after he came in, Capt. Floyd was sent thither to know what proposals King James might make to the French King, upon the assistance he might expect from them. The answer he had was, that they could do nothing till the King here was removed, which we understood to be [at] his next going into Flanders, and thought it too slight a ground to move the French King to take any measures upon for an attempt here.

“Upon this it was thought fit a considerable man should go over, to lay the danger before him of depending too much upon these men, whose Party were enemies to all kings, lest they might engage him in some undertaking [which] might prove his ruin. At his coming there he desired he might not see my Lord Middleton, his business being of that nature as was not fit for him to hear, because of his correspondence with this Party. King James told him he must see him, but he would give him an opportunity to discourse his business in private. When he returned, he acquainted us with this, and that he had fully discoursed him in all he was entrusted with; that he found he reposed an entire confidence in them; said they were the men [who] could do him the best service; that they were grown weary of this Government, and the promises he had made them of honours and employments would bind them to him; that he would try what they would do, whenever the French King had an opportunity to attempt his restoration, but desired we would still continue to advance his interest; and whenever he returned, he should know how to value those who had been always firm to him.

“From this time great endeavours were used by this party to remove my Lord Milford, and we supposed this man’s going was one great occasion, my Lord Middleton not being acquainted with his business. After he was out, we were ordered to write to Mr. Caryll, who gave us little encouragement anything would be soon done from thence, the French King’s fleet being gone to the Straits, a famine in his country, and a false calculation made of money, which had forced him to reduce his army; and ordered us to keep ourselves quiet, for he must take his measures from this Party for the time of his coming, on whom he must now depend.

“In spring last year one Crosby, a secretary under my Lord Middleton, came over, who had been several times sent to this Party before, and had engaged some men in the assassination, who [m] he asked at his coming if they received the commission for levying war and seizing the King, which commission they had desired as a security for themselves against King James for this undertaking. They told him it was not come; he affirmed he saw it signed by King James before he came away. The thing at that time was prevented, nor did that commission he mentioned ever come. These men believing they were imposed upon by Crosby, one of them resolved to go over to know the truth. Before he went he acquainted some of King James’s friends with it, who, detesting so base an action, told him it would be a great service to inform him what an infamy Crosby had thrown upon him, and that he ought to be severely punished, to prevent any such thing for the future. He affirmed to King James before Crosby what he had said; he reprov’d him, and told him he should be no more employed in his service.

“We had few letters after this, and those ordered us as before to keep ourselves quiet, and not meddle in anything, for measures were taken from other people. The last letter we had from King James himself, dated the 4th of Feb. last, their style, said the Toulon fleet would sail the 22nd, but what they would do next he could not tell; which was all material in it, and the only hopes we had something would be done when it arrived. This attempt of the assassination then broke out, with which we were all surprised, and found ourselves exposed without having the least notice given us so much as to take care of ourselves, and which we believed was measures taken to restore King James.

"All this time endeavours were used by our friends to make an interest in the Fleet, but found it to little purpose to engage private captains, for unless all their men were of their mind, which was impossible, they could do no service. Capt. Bottom and Capt. Carter had both promised to go in, that year as I remember my Lord Torrington commanded. The first was killed in the attempt, and the officer who commanded the land men on board him, mutinied, seeing his design. The other broke his word, and fought that day and was killed. The officers commanding in chief were therefore applied to, and that year the Fleet was commanded by commission, Sir Ralph Dellavall and Killegrew were both engaged to serve King James; their opinion was asked of Shovell; they said he was not a man to be spoke to, but they could master him as they pleased. The service they promised was to sail the Fleet out of the way, and let King James pass by, and declare for him when he was landed. I saw the account [which] was sent King James of it, and his answer, wherein he returned his thanks, with promise of rewards and employments when he was restored.

"As for the Army, King James depends upon my Lord Marleborough's interest, who can do what he pleases with most of those who served in King James's time. At their going into Ireland, Major-General Kirk, and Maine, and some other inferior officers had promised to go in, but none performed. Since that time there was no opportunity of making any application to them, those left here lying in the country, and being changed every year, and the main army always abroad, where the only service they could do was to desert to the French, who would not receive them because they would not trust them. It was therefore thought the best service to secure some of the garrisons here, of which there were four—Plymouth by my Lord Bath, Barwick by Billingsly, the deputy-governor, who was generally upon the place, Sheerness by Crawford, and Langor Fort by that governor, if it be the same was two years ago, whose name I have forgot. King James had an assurance of their service, that they would declare for him whenever he landed."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 1, Whitehall.—“I have your letters of the 31st Aug. and 4th Sept., n.s. I doubt the delay of the Straits squadron will be much greater than was expected, because, the ships being designed to winter at Cadiz, the Admiralty are forced to put out a new squadron, sheath some of the men-of-war, turn over the sailors, and pay them all, which takes up much time, and I doubt will not be perfected before the end of this month; whereas, if the squadron had only been ordered to cruise for the security of the flota, they might have been dispatched from the main Fleet in little more than a week's time.

“The discourse of a Peace is so general, and so much believed, that it is not to be wondered if there are pretensions raised upon that expectation already. I have received one from Mr. Prior, which seems to me very just; it is to be Secretary of the Embassy. His having been the King's Secretary so long at the Hague, and being by his own parts well qualified for the employment, makes me desire you will mention his name to his Majesty, and hope he will not be refused.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. PRIOR.

1696, Sept. 1, Whitehall.—“I have your letter of the 4th, n.s., and shall by this post desire Mr. Blathwayt to lay before his Majesty your pretension to be Secretary of the Embassy, in case of a Treaty of Peace; and shall add my opinion of the justice of your request, and hope the King upon this occasion will give a proof of his confidence and kindness to one who, having served him long and faithfully, is so well qualified for this employment.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Sept. 2-12, Gand.—“I should not trouble your Grace today, but to acknowledge the honour of a letter which your Grace was pleased to write me [on] the 25th, as to the proposal about Mademoiselle. One Madame de Meyererown, wife to the Danish Minister at Paris, came this last winter to Aix and to Bruxelles, and endeavoured to make the proposition. She was told the difficulties which would arise from the late Act of Parliament, which disinherited the issue of a Catholic Princess; for I told 'em to the D[uke] of Wirtenberg. She said the Court of France would see no difficulties, mais qu'elle donneroit Mademoiselle toute nue. The Duke understood this to be in relation to any impressions of her religion. But upon the reasons which your Grace observes, 'tis more probable the Council of France might not make any difficulties about the succession of a marriage which would be doubtful, or might think an Act of Parliament might be overruled. However, that affair is now no more, since France may have a peace as soon as they will. The only fear we have now is from the delay, which our enemies may improve, but the Allies cannot possibly.

“The Queen of Spain is dead, unseasonably for us, I fear, for I know that our King had settled, with a good deal of pains, a good correspondence and confidence with her Majesty and the Admirante, who was in her interests. ’Tis now to be feared the contrary party will predominate in all the counsels at Madrid. The French King does not yet appear abroad, and therefore he may be in a worse condition than we believe.

“There has been a battle in Hungary, of which we have not yet received the particulars. The Elector has had a courier, who says both Christians and Turks were retired. The Major General of Poland was killed, the Prince Charles of Vaudemont wounded, and the Rhingrave, with others; from whence it appears that both horse, foot, and drago[on]s were engaged.

“We were alarmed here by Mons. de Villeroy, who got together all his detachments, and marched towards Newport or Bruges. He had a provision of bombs and carcasses, and we were afraid for Bruges; but the Prince of Vaudemont has posted and retrenched himself so well, and has now got a detachment from the other army of ten battalions under the Duke of Wirtemberg, that we are under no apprehensions. If Bruges had been bombarded, my Lady Dorchester would have had her share of danger, and of honour.”

R. 8th, 1696.

SHREWSBURY to [the EARL OF PEMBROKE,] LORD PRIVY SEAL.

1696, Sept. 3, Whitehall.—“Recollecting that your Lordship expressed some curiosity to see the extract of Mr. Blaithwayt’s letter to my Lord Lexington, and Mr. Secretary having this day put it into my hands to lay before the Lords Justices, I give you this trouble to inform you that the contents are chiefly to acquaint the Emperor that the French have agreed the Treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen shall be the foundation for a general peace, and are likewise willing to restore Strasbourg in the same condition they took it, unless the Emperor shall choose such an equivalent as shall be offered; promising to restore Luxembourg, or an equivalent which Spain itself may propose, the choice to be left to the French. Upon these considerations his Majesty and the States judge it now time for the Allies to explain themselves in reference to the accepting the mediation of Sweden, and that their consent should now be signified to that Court, who are to be pressed to hasten ministers to the place of treaty, and that his Imperial Majesty would lose no time in dispatching his plenipotentiary also. The rest of the letter is to show that ’tis now time to close with the French, from the defection of Savoy, the condition of our own coin, the poverty of Holland, the weakness of Spain, and the inability of the Emperor to increase his expense during the war with the Turks.”

M. PRIOR to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Sept. 3-13, Loo.— . . . “We have no news here but what your Grace has from other parts. The account his Majesty had yesterday by an express from the Elector of Bavaria of the battle in Hungary is imperfect, though by that, compared with the letters some of our German Ministers have, the Imperialists marched without guides, and fought without conduct ; they have lost some of the Saxon cannon, and (I am afraid) retired before the Turks, though they would fain have it a drawn battle.

“The Queen of Spain is generally thought to have been poisoned.

“We are hunting all day, and at Verkeër at night ; nobody knows certainly when the King will go to Cleves, or if the D[uke] of Zell goes with him ; 'tis generally said he will go on Sunday.

“We wait the Emperor's answer to what my Lord Lexington and Mr. Heemskirk have proposed to him concerning the Peace, and then probably the place of treaty will be named.

“Your Grace will guess that I loiter here to make my bows, and solicit to be Secretary to the Embassy. I should be very conscious that I had writ on this subject with too much liberty to your Grace, but that your Grace's letter is a kind of general pardon for all my faults.

[P.S.] “Loo, 4-14 Sept.—This morning the King gave order for his going today to Dieren, from whence he goes tomorrow to Cleves, where he designs to lie one night.”

R. 8th.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 4, Whitehall.—“Mr. Secretary returning upon Wednesday from the country, your letter to my Lord Lexington was laid before the Lords Justices yesterday. It seems Mr. Secretary did not understand that his was the only copy, but concluded another had been sent to us, which was the reason we saw it no sooner.

“I have acquainted the Lords of the Admiralty that his Majesty would have Vice-Admiral Aylmer command the squadron that is to convoy him over, so that when any directions are sent with relation to the time it is expected those ships should go for Holland, care will be taken that Mr. Aylmer be in the way to go with them.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Sept. 6-16, Bruges.—“Since the last which I had the honour to write to your Grace we have letters from Spain which say the Queen is much better. The news of her death came from Paris. The letters from Paris say the King is still in bed. We have now a larger account of the late action in Hungary. The Elector of Saxe got up into a tree, and seeing the enemies came down with a resolution to attack them ; before that could be done, the Turks had made a kind of a barricade with their wagons, and entrenched their foot behind them. The Imperial horse charged the Turks at first with good success, but were pushed at last. Our foot attacked the retrenchments, but without any success. When the Elector saw he gained nothing, he would have retired, but Caprara, who had opposed the enterprise, thought it was absolutely necessary to continue the action till night, and then retire. They did so, and got off with the loss of some cannon, and some of the best officers, amongst whom was Hensler.

“The peace between France and Savoy is now proclaimed both at Paris and at Turin, and the Duc is at the head of the French armies. I believe his greatest fear is that the Spaniards and Imperialists should accept of a neutrality for Italy. We are now so well retrenched here that we are in no apprehension of any danger, but of starving.”

SHREWSBURY to PORTLAND.

[16]96, Sept. 8, London.—“Sir Jo[h]n Fen[wick’s] story is as wonderful to me as if he had accused me of coining; however, I shall always acknowledge the King’s great goodness and generosity in the manner he has received the information, and your Lordship’s friendship in not permitting so foul a thought of your humble servant to receive credit one moment in your breast. Were it true, I should deserve worse than can be designed me by this invention. It is near a month that I have been told something of this kind was intended, but the same innocence that made me then and now little solicitous upon this subject, makes me still continue unconcerned, because I have a grounded superstition that truth will prevail, and then I am sure I shall be found honest to my King and country.

“Two packets of letters have passed since you were here, and being now pretty expert in opening them, nothing has yet been found significant, they relating chiefly to trade.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 8, Whitehall.—“Yesterday and today I received yours of the 6th, 10th, and 14th Sept., n.s. I wish the directions his Majesty has given to the Fleet to go directly to Cadiz, together with the dilatoriness of their putting to sea, may not add to the danger which the Spanish flota is thought to be in. One great hope the merchants have flattered themselves with here is, that if they should be seized by Petit Renaud, yet they may be retaken by our squadron in their return to the French ports. But if Sir Cloudesly be ordered into Cadiz, I doubt going that little out of his way, added to the delay that is natural to all seamen touching at a port, will not only make any prospect of that kind impossible, but carry us so far into the winter season that little more is to be expected from the service of that squadron than convoying the merchant-ships to the Straits, in which it seems we are inconsiderably concerned.”

M. PRIOR to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Sept. 8-18, Loo.—“ I should be an abler Secretary, and much fitter for the employment to which your Grace recommends me, if I were able to express the sense I have of your favour to me. Mr. Blathwayt has promised to lay your Grace's letter of the 1st instant before his Majesty when it may be proper, and I am to acknowledge that from your Grace of the same date, and to keep it as one of the greatest honours of my life.

“ We are just come from our Cleves journey. Your Grace will give me leave to trouble you with my remarks; 'tis a privilege all travellers take, from Bishop Burnett to myself. The Elector received the King very respectfully at the river-side, and they two came back in one coach, the D[uke] of Zell and the Elec[tor]al Prince in another. These two last had doubtless very proper discourse, since one of them is seven year old, and the t'other is seventy-two. In the Electrice's apartment, after they had talked about an hour standing, the King, the Electrice, and the D[uke] of Zell went to ombre for five good hours; the King had an armed chair, the D[uke] of Zell an ordinary one, and she sat upon the bed.

“ The Electrice has a face not unlike our poor Queen, upon Queen Dowager's body. She loves to talk, and is civil to all the world. Few of the women are handsome, and all ill dressed, in old-fashioned, stiff-bodied gowns, too big for them, with their breasts and shoulders naked. The Princess is not ugly, but disagreeable; a tall miss at a boarding school, with a scraggy, lean neck; very pale, and a great lover, I fancy, of chalk and tobacco-pipes; nobody can tell if it will be a match or no, but as much as one could guess he does not much dislike her. She seems very good and humble, but God knows if that proceeds from her virtue or her ignorance.

“ The King supped and dined next day with the Electrice and Princess. The Elector had a table on his own side, where were as many of the best English as it would hold. There was a great deal of good meat and ill wine for everybody else, but they filled it in such mighty glasses, and it came about so fast, that people grew drunk before they had half dined.

“ Our two favourites have had a quarrel; in coming home Kappel (sic), being heated with wine and heedless, made his coachman drive before my Lord Portland, who was in one of the D[uke] of Zell's coaches; upon which Lord Portland said he would beat the coachman, who excusing himself upon his orders, my Lord Portland said whoever gave those orders was an impertinent puppy, or some such words. The ground of the quarrel began I believe at Cleves; my Lord Portland was most of the time with the Elector and the Ministers, and Mons. Keppel sat by the King, which was a distinction that I believe fretted the t'other's heart.

[P.S.] "Our Jew Suasso has letters of the 30th Aug. that the Queen of Spain was not dead, but in a way of recovery."

R. 19.

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1696, Sept. 11, Whitehall.—"I have not sooner answered your Lordship's of the 6th and 17th August, o.s., because I was willing to expect till I could give you some account you might depend upon, in relation to money, which it is evident you must be in great want of. . . . The Lords of the Treasury have just now assured us that by the next post ten thousand pounds shall be returned to your Lordship. . . . We will proceed to return further supplies as soon as it is possible."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 11, Whitehall.—"No letters have arrived from Holland since my last. . . . The Admiralty tell us they hope Sir Cloud[esley] Shovell's squadron will be ready in ten days. I perceive they are under some doubt lest the Dutch may be forced to stay for provisions. We have great curiosity to know the truth of the battle in Hungary."

Copy.

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Sept. 11, Whitehall.—"I have yours of the 9th and 12th to acknowledge, and am extremely startled at the difficulties you apprehend may be made of owning the King at the opening of the treaty. I always thought everything material would be adjusted in these private conferences between Mr. Dickvelt and Caigliere, and that the solemnity of a public treaty was rather form than anything else. If this be so, it seems to me the King of France his unwillingness to own the King at the first can have no reasonable ground, if he means to act fairly, and own him in the end; but if I am in mistake as to the first point, and that we are to enter upon a negotiation, as was at Nimeghen, not sufficiently prepared, it may last as long as that did, and conclude in the same manner, by every branch of the alliance falling off, one after another, which I doubt would be a most dangerous thing for us."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 15, Whitehall.—"I understand that Sir Joseph Hern will by this post dispatch credit to my Lord Gallway for ten thousand pounds. I hope the latter end of this week to make a step into the country for about eight days, that I may not fail to be back before the King's return."

“We want now two mails from Holland, so that I have nothing of yours to answer.”

M. PRIOR to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Sept. 15-25, Hag[ue].—“Before I left Loo I had the satisfaction of knowing that Mr. Blathwayt had laid before his Majesty what your Grace was pleased to write in my behalf, and that his Majesty had answered to it in my favour. I will trouble your Grace no more with my thanks on this occasion, but will strive for ever to express the sense I have of your goodness to me by a great obedience to your commands.

“We descant mightily upon what we hear the courier has brought from Vienne, that the Emperor names directly and only Aix-la-Chapelle as the place to treat, taking it for granted that the nomination is in himself alone; and that he asks the restoring the ten Imperial towns of Alsace, which were fairly given to the French by the Treaty of Munster. 'Tis strange enough, the haughtiness and impotence of the Empire; they have done nothing proportionably towards carrying on the war, yet would do all at the treating of a peace. I think the Dutch have a good mind to slight them if they durst. Mr. Dyckvelt is impatient for his Majesty's coming hither, and then, probably, we may see some step made in this great affair.

“I presume to send your Grace the heads of the Treaty, as perfect as I could patch them up.

“The difference between our favourites went no further; each of them were [was], I believe, glad to be forbid to show his resentment.

“My Lord Villiers's being one of the Plenipotentiaries is, I think, beyond doubt. We talk of my Lord Pembroke and Sir William Trumbull for the other two, but I know not on what grounds.”

R. 19.

SHREWSBURY to LORD PAGET.

[16]96, Sept. 18, Whitehall.—“I have received several letters from your Lordship, which I have not answered; the freshest is of the 10th July. In a former you were pleased to desire I would move his Majesty that you might be recalled, thinking the circumstances of affairs in Turkey such, that your continuance was of no particular service to the King. This was laid before his Majesty by Mr. Blathwayt, in Flanders, who was directed to return me word, that his Majesty at the present could give no answer, but would take it into his consideration. The discourse of this part of the world tends much to a general peace in Christendom, and most people are of opinion it is very likely to be concluded. In that case I imagine a treaty would be endeavoured to quiet affairs between the Germans and Turks, in which no doubt his Majesty would think your Lordship's presence of great use. This that I write is my own conjecture only, why his Majesty might defer for some time giving a decisive answer upon your return. In a few days he is expected in England, when I shall endeavour to inform myself better."

Copy.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 18, Whitehall.—“ Though the letters are not come, yet my Lord Carmarthen is arrived from the other side of the water, and says the King is expected on Tuesday next at the Hague. I wish this delay of the post be not the occasion that his Majesty wait for the convoy. If the post does not come before the Justices rise tomorrow morning, I intend to move them to give orders to the Admiralty, that the squadron may be got in a readiness to obey the first commands we shall receive.”

Copy.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Sept. 20-30, Bruges.—“ I am to thank your Grace for the letter of the 11th, which you were pleased to send me. I do believe that Messrs. Dyckvelt and Cagliere have continued their conferences and prepared all things, as much as they could, against the assembly of the Plenipotentiaries, but I fear no one Ally will be contented with what is done for him. I believe the late indisposition of the French King might hasten Mons. Cagliere, but since he is recovered, I have seen some letters from Paris which complained of Cagliere, qu'il a fait un pas de clerc, &c.; but though he is blamed for something which he has done, yet it is said the Court of France will ratify it.

“ The last letters from Spain of the 13th bring a dismal account of the danger in which the King of Spain was, from a tabardilla, or violent fever, which for three days made 'em despair of his life. His Majesty was administered, &c., but by the help of reliques and processions, and quinquina, he is past danger. The Ministers took this occasion to press the King to name his successor, and he did make and sign his testament in favour of one of the sons of the Dauphin, who must marry a daughter of the Emperor, and come live in Spain; in failure of which conditions, he substitutes the Elector of Bavaria's son. Perhaps the death of the King of Spain would scarcely occasion more intrigues than this declaration of his succession. I am tempted to believe that the French faction has frightened the poor King of Spain, during a sickness which perhaps was not dangerous, to name his successor, whilst the sickness of the Queen keeps her and her creatures from the King and his counsels. The letters from Madrid do also mark great intrigues and strugglings in that Court, where D'Oropeze is likely to be declared premier Minister.

“ All this new incident may incline the French to be more forward to conclude the peace, and the Spaniards also; but the Imperialists will be less ready. This may also change the face of things in Italy, where the French should not desire to put the Duke of Savoye in possession of a country which is ready to fall by inheritance to a son of France. Our Elector here will be greatly disappointed, who did expect to have his son first named in the entail, and I believe he will gladly enter now into any engagements which may secure to him the perpetual government of these ten provinces. I must needs believe that England can only find her account in a general peace, by which she will be at liberty to enter into all the disputes of her neighbours, so far as she finds convenient, and no farther.

“The King is still at Loo, and would gladly know, I believe, before he comes to you, whether he must positively prepare for peace or war. We are wearing out the campaign of all sides here, and every one wishes his enemy would retire first. All the letters from France speak as if the peace went forward, though slowly, and both the French and the Holland merchants expect a freedom of commerce very quickly. I must needs hope no such separate freedom of commerce will be opened, and shall take the liberty to speak of it at the Hague, so soon as I go thither.”

R. 26, 96.

COL. ROBT. LIVINGSTON TO SHREWSBURY.

1696, Sept. 20, New York.—“I did give my Lord Keeper and Lord Bellomont an account the 22nd of August [July?] last from Virginy, that I was informed Capt. Kid was come with a prize to this port. I arrived here the 2nd of August, and discoursed Capt. Kid fully concerning the cause of his coming hither; who told me that he, being so long detained in England, and coming out with so few hands, and many of them mutinous did pretend it might be too late to pass the Capes, and finding this prize in his way, did think it most for the owners' advantage to come to this place to spend some time, and to recruit the ship with provisions and men, and have his prize condemned, which I hear did yield (being laden with salt) between 8 and 900*l.*, and was sold to three merchants here in town.

“He tells me he has laid out her produce in buying provisions, and supplying the ship with sundry necessaries for the voyage. I did order him to make all possible despatch, which he accordingly did, and after he had stored the ship with a large quantity of provisions, and shipped for the voyage 150 men, 50 whereof are inhabitants of this Province, he sailed from Sandy Hook the beginning of September, and [I] hope will make a good voyage, there having been several privateers fitted out for that design from this part [port?] and adjacent Colonies last year, and particularly one Capt. Hoar, who has a commission from our Governor. Capt. Thew, who went two years ago, and is mentioned in the patent, was killed in an engagement with the Arabs. His company returned to Madagascar, and seized a merchant-ship belonging to the Gov[ernor] of Barbados (of whom we have the news last night that he is dead), and Col. Heathcote of this port, and is gone with her on that design of pirating in the Red Seas. So Capt. Kid, being now well supplied with stout hands, in all probability must make a great voyage, which I hope will in some measure compensate the great trouble your Grace has had in this matter.

“I am just now informed that Capt. Kid was constrained to make new conditions with his men, and to allow them the usual shares of privateers, and hath only reserved 40 shares for the ship; but this wants confirmation, Capt. Kid having not acquainted me therewith; however I find myself obliged to acquaint your Grace with what is come to my knowledge, and further that I hear he designs to make this place his port, and to be here in 18 months’ time. I am therefore of opinion it would not be amiss if your Grace and the rest of the owners do take care that orders be sent to the Governors here upon the Main and the West Indies, that if Capt. Kid or the Adventure Galley should come there, to take care the interest of the owners may be secured.

“I think it of moment further to advise your Grace that since the pirates in the Red Sea are so numerous, I am of opinion that Kid’s strength will not be sufficient to suppress them all; that it may be convenient for your Grace to procure a Commission for the seizing their persons and effects upon the land as well as upon the water, wherever they shall be found in the King’s dominions; believing that upon the news of Kid’s design against them, they will endeavour to fly into this and other Governments in America, to shelter themselves as usual, where they need not doubt of reception for their money, if orders be not sent to the respective Governors to the contrary. And if your Grace procures such a Commission, it will be needful that you send the authorities to all the Governments in America, otherwise their treasures will be exhausted; and if it be obtained, notice is to be given to all the Plantations by March or April next, being the time of their approaching this coast. I am told since my arrival that this spring 30 passed through this Government to Pensilvania, who came here in a ship from Madagascar, and had shared eight thousand pounds a-piece by pirating in the Red Seas. I shall with impatience long to hear your Grace’s answer.”

R. 26 Nov., 96.

COL. ROBT. LIVINGSTON to the EARL OF ROMNEY.

1696, Sept. 20, New York.—“As soon as I came within the Capes of Virginia, which was the 22nd of July last, I found the opportunity of a vessel bound home, by which I presumed to give your Lordship an account I had, that Captain Kidd was arrived at this place with a French prize. I arrived here the 2nd of August following, and discoursed Captain Kidd fully concerning the cause of his coming hither, who told me he came out of England so late, and with so few hands, and many of them mutinous did allege it might be too late to pass the Capes, and finding this prize, [he] did think it most for the owners’ advantage to come to this place to spend some time and recruit the ship with provisions and men, and have the prize condemned, most of which he had transacted before my arrival. I am informed the prize did yield between 8 or 900*l.*, being about 100 tons, loaden with salt, and was sold to Messieurs Monvielle Barbary and de Lancey, merchants here. He says he laid out her produce in buying provisions and supplying the ship with sundry necessaries for the voyage. I ordered him to make all possible dispatch, which he accordingly did; and after he had stored the ship with a large quantity of provisions, and shipped for the voyage 150 men, fifty whereof are inhabitants of this province, he sailed from Sandy Hook the beginning of September, and [I] hope will make a good voyage, there having been several privateers fitted out for that design from this port and adjacent Colonies last year, and particularly one Captain Hoar, with a commission from our Governor here. Captain Thew, one of them mentioned in the patent, who went two years ago, was killed in an engagement with the Arabs. His company returned to Madagascar, and seized a merchant-ship belonging to Barbadoes, and Colonel Heathcoate of this port, and is gone with her on that design of pirating in the Red Seas. So Captain Kidd, being now well supplied with stout hands, in all probability, must make a great voyage, which I hope will in some measure compensate the charge and trouble and charge (sic) your Lordship has had in this matter.

“I am just now informed that Captain Kidd is forced to make new conditions with his men, and to allow them the usual shares of privateers, and hath only reserved forty shares for the ship; but this wants confirmation, Captain Kidd having not acquainted me therewith; however, I find myself obliged to acquaint your Lordship with what is come to my knowledge, and further that I hear he designs to make this his port, and be here in 18 months’ time, that is to say, in March 1698. I am therefore of opinion it would not be amiss if your Lordship and the rest of the owners do take care that orders be sent to the Governors here upon the Main, and the West Indies, that if Captain Kidd or the Adventure Galley should come there, to take care the interest of the owners be secured.

“My Lord, I left a paper with your Lordship concerning to have it inserted in the King’s grant to seize the said pirates on the land as well as on the sea, but was hurried away before I could hear the result of it. I can assure your Lordship the pirates in the Red Sea are so numerous that I am of opinion Captain Kidd’s strength will not be sufficient to suppress them all; that it may be convenient for your Lordships (sic) to procure a commission for the seizing their persons and effects upon land, as well as upon the water, wherever they shall be found in the King’s dominions; believing that upon the news of Captain Kidd’s design against them they will endeavour to fly into this and other Governments in America, to shelter themselves as usual, where they need not doubt a reception for their money, if orders be not sent to the respective Governments to the contrary; and if your Lordship does obtain such a commission, it will be needful that you send the authority to all the Governments in America, otherwise their treasures will be exhausted; and if it be obtained, notice is to be given to all the Plantations by March or April next, being the time of their approaching this coast.

“May it please your Lordship, having met with the unexpected disappointment of the Governor and Council here suspending his Majesty’s commission granted me upon your Lordship’s intercession; it is without precedent in the Plantations that ever his Majesty's authority was thus contemned, and that only upon the score of my complaining at the Council Board against him for suspending an Act of Assembly for the payment of the debts of the Government. My sufferings being very great, as well as the opposition made to his Majesty's prerogative, is the reason I most humbly address to your Lordship, that your Lordship would be favourably pleased to appear at the Council Board in the maintaining his Majesty's prerogative over the Plantations, and for the preventing such practices for the future; and that, by your Lordship's interest and favour, I may be restored to my said offices, which were granted me upon the most solemn recommendations of your Lordship and the other great Officers of State in the kingdom; for which and for all your Lordship's other favours bestowed upon me, &c."

Copy, enclosed in Lord Romney's letter of Dec. 3.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696, Sept. 21.] Oct. 1, Bruges.—“I did myself the honour to write to your Grace yesterday, but I forgot to give you an account of the answer which the Emperor has sent to the proposition made by the Pentionaire in relation to the treaty for a general peace, which is to this effect: that his Imperial Majesty is content to enter into such a treaty upon the foundations of the Westphalian and Nimeguen peace, provided it be according to the explanation made at Nuremberg of the treaty of Westphalie. The Emperor desires the treaty may be held at Aix la Chapelle, and has named the Counts de Caunitz and Stratman for his plenipotentiaries. This will not do, my Lord; the French will not admit of that explanation of Nuremberg, nor will they treat at any place under the authority of the Empire or Spain; and at this way of proceeding the treaty will not be openen (sic) these six months.

“The King and the States have wrote to the Emperor, and I believe they have wrote in such terms as will press 'em (sic) to a quicker resolution. I am afraid, if I dare tell my fears to your Grace, that the Emperor has a mind to treat by himself, as Savoye has done, and that the Prince of Fundi is about it at Turin. I fear this the more since the new revolution in the Spanish Council, where the enemies of our King have seized on the King and his government, now come in the care of the House of Austria. The indignation to have the interests of the august family regulated at the Hague by Mr. Dyckvelt, the zeal of the holy religion, &c., &c., to [do ?] make it credible that the Imperial and Spanish Ministers will rather treat at Turin than the Hague. The first letters from Italy will give us more light. The Queen of Spain is still very ill, the King well enough; and as I am persuaded that the Queen never was with child, so I believe the King was not sick, but persuaded [pretended?] to be so.

“I believe the King expects the answer from Vienna to his last letter before he will go for England, and will therefore stay six or seven days longer at Loo.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 22, Whitehall.—“I have received your letter[s] of the 8th, 11th and 15th. I hope the squadron commanded by Sir Clou. Shovell will now be out in very few days. A proclamation for the sitting of the Parliament will be issued on Thursday next.

“Mr. Vernon will acquaint you what the Lords have done in relation to Sir George Rooke or Mr. Aylmer’s commanding the King’s convoy. The variation in those orders has given some difficulty.

“We have accounts from France that besides the squadrons already at sea, they are fitting out 16 men of war at Brest, and intend to have in a readiness all this winter about forty or fifty ships, which being so many more than they have yet had, gives some alarm here. When we have assurance that Monsr. de Chasteaurenaut is passed the Straits, one shall look upon their strength considerably weakened; but till then they have it in their power, by joining their several squadrons, to put out a very formidable fleet for the winter at very little notice. I desire this may be laid before his Majesty for his consideration, who may know more, and will be pleased to give such directions as he thinks fit.”

1696, Sept. 22, Whitehall.—“I am glad you think yourself in a probable way of succeeding in your pretention, and that the small assistance I have been able to give in it has afforded me an opportunity of showing you my esteem. I now most of all apprehend the negociation in itself may fail, but [it] depends on things above my knowledge as well as power to redress.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Sept. 22, Whitehall.—“I have received yours of the 6-16. I doubt the business in Hungary has been but bad, unless it contributes to humble the Germans, who by their pretensions in the general Peace seem to want it. By our last letters the conclusion of that matter looks more remote and difficult than before. If it cannot be, I wish so much discourse had never been of it. Yet I am confident the Parliament will do their part to maintain the war, and though we are poorer than we were, yet not in so desperate a condition as the disaffected Party would represent us.”

MESSAGES to and from SIR JOHN FENWICK.

1696, Sept. 22.—“Message directed by the Lords Justices to be carried to Sir John Fenwick.”

“That by the delay he hath given in sending his answer, and by the answer itself, the Lords Justices do not think themselves at liberty to put off his trial tomorrow, unless he do in the meantime more effectually comply with what his Majesty requires."

Same date.—"Sir John Fenwick's answer to the above-mentioned message."

"His Majesty not having ordered, as I conceive, that I should acquaint their Excellencies with what I have writ in that paper more than what is not explained in it, I am ready to acquaint their Excellencies with what is not explained, reserving what is contained in that paper and already [explained] to the King himself. And for anything else I know against the King, or his Government, I am ready to acquaint their Excellencies with it without any reserve (if they please to give me time to recollect myself) either to themselves, or to anybody they shall send to me, and what occurs to me at present I am ready to tell them when they think fit. "J. FENWICK."

Same date.—"Upon which answer their Excellencies immediately directed me [Vernon] to write to Sir John Fenwick to this effect:—

"That upon what he hath undertaken in this last paper their Excellencies have thought fit to put off his trial till Friday next, but he is not to expect upon any pretence whatsoever that the trial should be longer deferred unless he comply with that undertaking, and to that end he recollect himself by tomorrow at nine in the morning, at which time I am directed to come to him."

SIR JOHN FENWICK'S INFORMATION.

1696, Sept. 23.—"Where I told his Majesty there were some persons who held a correspondence with King James and his Secretary Melfort, they were the Earl of Ailesbury, my Lord Montgomery, my Lord Brudenall, Mr. Richard Morley, Peter Cook, and myself. We used to write to my Lord Melfort constantly. We generally met at my Lord Ailesbury's, sometimes at my Lord Montgomery's, and sometimes at my house. We agreed what should be writ, and for the most part everyone writ his own letters. The letters were generally put into Peter Cook's hands, and I believe he delivered them to Berkenhead, who had an allowance from King James of 100*l.* per annum for conveying the letters backward and forward.

"My Lord Ailesbury writ often to King James, and the Lord Montgomery held a correspondence with the Queen, and I have seen him read several of her letters.

"The Lord Melfort for the most part writ one letter to be communicated to us all.

"The subject of our letters was giving an account of all that passed, either in Parliament or about the Fleet or Army.

"The accounts of the Fleet my Lord Ailesbury had from Anselm, as he told us, saying he was out 50*l.* a year in getting those accounts, and he only desired to be reimbursed his charge.

“The accounts of the Army Peter Cooke brought. He brought me about a year ago a list of all the forces, whether at home or abroad, which he said he had from Commissary Crauford, and I sent it over to the King, enclosing it in a letter to Mrs. Fox, who writ me word it was the best account he had yet received.

“For my own part, I had no manner of correspondence with any in the Army. I formerly heard Brigadier Main swear he would go over to King James when he came into Ireland, but I don't know the reason why he did not.

“I met Lieutenant-General Talmache about a year before he was killed, as he was lighting out of a coach at St. James's Gate. He took me into the Court with him, and told me he hoped he and I should serve together again where we should serve, and he would be as honest as I was. He did not name King James, but I understood he meant him.

“When any letters came from France, my Lord Ailesbury used to go to Hogsden, and shew the letters as he said to the late Bishop of Norwich [William Lloyd]; but I never saw the Bishop except once, at his house, when I went with my Lord Ailesbury and Lord Montgomery to make him a visit.

“About four years ago I remember there was a letter from Melfort about borrowing 12,000*l.* for King James. We met at the Ship in Fish Street, Lord Ailesbury, Lord Montgomery, Lord Brudenall, and I, to consider it, but we could find no way to raise any part of it. I have heard my Lord Brudenall often say he had been out of pocket 6,000*l.* for King James. I don't know that my Lord Brudenall ever writ a letter, but used to say he would make his wife write.

“I never received but two letters from King James, and they contained only general encouragements, and of the King of France being able to assist him.

“Melfort, and Caryll, who succeeded him, used to write to the same effect; but I observed Caryll never encouraged us to do anything but to sit still and be quiet, and he hoped all would do well.

“The last letter I saw of King James was to my Lord Ailesbury of the 4th of February; all that I remember significant in it was that the Tholon Fleet would sail the 22nd, and what they would do next he could not tell.

“About Christmas was two years King James sent us instructions, which were considered at my house. There were present Lord Ailesbury, Lord Montgomery, Lord Brudenall, and I think Morly, but I am not sure. These instructions were to have an account of all Lord Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Justices of the Peace, and mayors of towns that we thought would be in his interest.

“We thought it a strange demand. We answered we would do what we could in it, but I don't know anything that was done.

“Archbishop Sandercroft being then dead, we all agreed to write to King James to make the Bishop of Norwich Archbishop.

“We had another meeting in Berkeley Street, at Andrew Newport's house, who was himself out of town and knew nothing of it; but he lent my Lord Ailesbury the use of his house, and he lay there while his family was out of town. At that meeting was Lord Ailesbury, Lord Montgomery, Mr. Morley, Peter Cook, and myself. We then sent Fountaine over with accounts of things as they then stood ; this was about three years ago. He carried over a paper of cant names, to write to us by. The Lord Ailesbury's names were Atkins and Squire ; Lord Montgomery was Mun only ; my name was Pheasant and James ; Morley was Jenkins, and Cook's name was Cole. King James's names were Harrison and the figure of 1, the Queen was called Mrs. Harrison and my mother. His journey cost us 60*l*.

"Fountain was desired to ask places for us. Lord Ailesbury was for having Sir Robert Howard's place, and Mr. Morley to be a Commissioner of the Treasury. Lord Montgomery proposed nothing for himself, but pressed me to ask the government of the Tower, which I said I would not ask for. We told Cook he should be the Queen's Secretary. I saw Fountaine when he came back, but I heard nothing of the granting of any places.

"I know nothing of Fountain's last going over.

"My Lord Ailesbury went for France about last Easter was two years ; he went to give an account of all affairs here to King James, and to see what hopes there was [were] of his being assisted from France. He told me at his coming back that he had been with the King of France in his closet, and was a good while with him. It was all along our opinion that King James could not be brought back with less than 30,000 men, and I believe my Lord Ailesbury acquainted the King of France with it ; he told me the King heard him, but I did not find he brought back any encouragement. This is the considerable man I meant in my paper, and the persons above-mentioned are the select number I mentioned in my paper, but had not named them.

"My Lord Ailesbury had a correspondence with the Duc d'Aumont, Governor of Bologne, who sent over one Savery, an Englishman, for intelligence. He came at that time when the mob pulled down the Marshal's houses in Holborn. Peter Cook brought him to me and we had a meeting at my Lord Montgomery's about sending him back. There met Lord Ailesbury, Lord Montgomery, Peter Cook, myself, and I think Morley. We gave him such accounts of affairs as they then occurred to us, and he took notes of them.

"My Lord Ailesbury hath writ to Abbé Renaudot, who was in Secretary Croisse's office, and hath received answers from him, which he interpreted to me, but I can't remember what they were.

"We had another meeting at my Lord's Montgomery's last winter was 12 month ; there were present Lord Ailesbury, Lord Montgomery, myself, and Mr. Nosworthy, who was then designing for France, but stayed some time after for a hearing he had before the Lords ; he desired to carry over accounts of the Fleet and Army, and we further furnished him with such as we could then give.

"I have heard there were other parties in King James his interest, but who met or what they did I know not, for we had no communication one with another. There was a distinction made between Compounders and not-Compounders, and so we had no conversation together.

“I don't know that any particular notice was given from France of the La Hogue business, nor any directions sent at that time. Sacvill, Oglethorp, Harp, and myself met at the Fountain in the Haymarket, but all that we considered of was, how to save ourselves from being taken up.

“Of this last preparation at Calais I had not the least notice, or suspicion of it. I neither saw the Duke of Berwick or Sir G. Barclay, or heard of their being come over, and don't know anyone they conversed with.

“I never was in any consultation with my Lord Griffin, and heard only accidentally of his intentions of going over. When he went I lay ill of a fever.

“This is what I can recollect at present; as anything more comes into my memory I shall readily acquaint the Lords Justices with it; and as to what I am indicted for, if their Excellencies require it, I'll give them as sincere an account as I can.”

In Vernon's hand.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1696, Sept. 27, Eyford.—“Being here in the country when I received yours of the 17th, I have little to trouble you with, only that I desire his Majesty may be acquainted that I have received a letter from my Lord Chancellor Porter of the 15th, in which he gives his opinion that if the Parliament meet in Ireland soon, they will give money, and be disposed to confirm the Art[icles] of Limerick. He proposes the latter end of this, or the beginning of next month, but that I suppose is sooner than is possible.

[P.S.] “I have sent my Lord Chanc[ellor's] letter to the Lords Justices, who I suppose will think it proper to be laid before the King.”

SHREWSBURY TO LORD CHANCELLOR PORTER.

1696, Sept. 27, Eyford.—“Being here in the country when I received the favour of your Lordship's of the 15th, I have returned it to London to be laid before the Lords Justices, and at the same time given his Majesty an account what your Lordship's opinion is concerning the meeting of the Parliament, and their disposition to grant a further supply, and to confirm the Articles of Limerick. I am apt to believe the last would induce the King more than anything to a Session, if he have been acquainted with it before he has taken his resolution and given his orders, but I doubt my letter will hardly come time enough for that, though it has met with no delay in my hands more than of one post, which was occasioned by my being out of town.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Sept. 29, Eyford.—"What you writ of the King of Spain's resolutions in his sickness is very surprising indeed, and makes me apprehend that the same power that could prevail with him at that time to make such a step, may engage him in other counsels as prejudicial to the public interest. I believe this story will not only alarm the Elector of Bau[aria], but almost every considerable branch of the Alliance.

"I hope the King will take care that the Dutch shall not open a trade with France during the war. Such a proceeding in Holland would do him a great deal of hurt here."

[MESSAGE FROM LADY FENWICK TO LORD AILESBUURY.]

[1696, Sept.]—"Lady Mary Fenwick says there hath lately been a fresh proposal to Sir John, that if he will stick to his paper he should have his life, and used many arguments to persuade Lord Ailesbury to second Sir John, for that he had it in his power to make what conditions he pleased for himself, and might do it with all the honour and safety in the world; that it was a piece of justice he owed to himself and his friend. And since Sir John had been so tender of him, and carried himself to the highest pitch of honour, she thought Lord Ailesbury was obliged to do this to save Sir John's life; and if he should refuse to do this, she should think it very hard, since it consisted with the nicest points of honour. She pressed it the more, because Sir John must give his answer before Thursday."

PORTLAND to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Oct. [2-]12, the Hague.—Has received his from Eyford of the 27th. Hopes he will return soon to London, as the King is about to depart. Has received from Mr. Vernon the "informations" of what Sir John Fenwick has declared, which touch only some known Jacobites, and make a strong charge against Lord Ailesbury. Expects to follow this letter almost immediately.

PORTLAND to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Oct. 13, Whytehall.—Regrets to learn from his letter of the day before yesterday that his illness is so serious, at a time when not only the public [interest] but his own suffers from his absence. Hopes that the remedies which have been sent will restore him, so that his presence may dissipate the rumours (discours) caused by his absence, and that the necessary measures may be taken. Cannot think it would be proper for the King to speak to Sir John Fenwick. Mr. Vernon is preparing a litter, the movement of which he will be able to bear the better than that of a coach (carosse).

French. Received at Eyford, 15 [Oct.], 96.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Oct. 15-25, Bruxelles.—“The campaign is now ended everywhere, and everybody is got into his winter quarters. I am where your Lordship did me the honour to post me, but praying for a west wind and some good occasions to go back to Anvers a little while. It looks as if the war were ended with the campaign. Mons. Bouflers passing by Mons told 'em frankly he thought they were returning under the domination of their old master. The readiness wherewith the French received the neutrality in Italy, so soon as the Imperialists and Spaniards were willing, and the passion with which the French King and his chiefest ministers do desire to make an end of so long and so expensive a war, does make most people here believe they are in earnest; and if the Allies would make as much haste as our enemies, I believe the peace might be signed this winter, supposing our Parliament does put his Majesty in a way to make another campaign.

“The French refugees are very busy everywhere to get themselves included in the treaty; they would fain make out that the Kings of England were garrands of the Edict of Nantes, which I cannot find to be true; and then they pretend our Kings were garrands of some other edicts and pacifications which did confirm the said Edict of Nantes. Such of 'em are most zealous who would not go home, I believe, if the door were opened.

“We have no signs of war here at Bruxelles; all is opera, comedy, French and Italian, balls and feasts; a little domestic dis[c]ord, whether Madame d'Arcos (lately Mademoiselle Popuelle) shall come to Court or not. She would come; the Elector would have it so; but the Electress will not bear it, and his Highness would not press it too far, for fear of too much scandal.”

R. at Eyford, 22, 1696.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Oct. 19-29, Bruxelles.—“The last letters from Spain brought news of the Queen's perfect recovery, and that her Majesty had resumed the care she had been used to take of the government, and that Mons. Doropeze was retired. Our Elector here was pleased to make me confidence of a letter which his Highness received by the same post, wherein he is told that the Imperial Minister at Madrid has given in a memorial there, declaring how the King of England and States of Holland, together with the Elector of Bavaria, were resolved to garrison all the places in the Spanish Netherlands when the peace should be made with their own troops, to the great danger of holy religion, and his Catholic Majesty's authority in the said provinces; which to prevent his Imperial Majesty offered 20,000 men of his troops for the security of the said provinces, &c. The Elector told me that he would send me the letter, to be shown to the King; but I believe his Highness may forget, and therefore your Grace may please to let his Majesty know thus much of it, unless the Conte de Bergyck, who wrote the said letter from Madrid, should be now at London, for he was on his departure from Madrid, and designed to come through England.

"I believe your Grace will be informed that Mons. Cagliere begins to put upon us at the Hague now. He says his meaning was to restore Luxembourg demolished, and not as we understood it, viz., in the condition it now is.

"I long to send your Grace a piece of pleasant news from hence. The gates of our city have been kept locked twice 24 hours in search of a certain Italian, who has done God knows what. The truth is, this fellow was a chymist, sent for by our Elector, and entertained here by him at very great expense, in order to make gold. He was lodged in the house of the fair Countess d'Arcos, who was to have a great share in the royal[ty]. Whilst they were in mighty expectation of his productions, the conjurer ran away, and carried with him a great deal more than ever he will make. I wish I had the rogue in Flanders; he might help me to make false money; at least he could rob me of nothing.

[P.S.] "Since I had closed my letter for your Grace, the Elector sent me the enclosed for his Majesty, which you will please to give him."

R. 31, 96.

MR. HILL to SHREWSBURY.

1696, [Oct. 22-]Nov. 1, s.n., Bruxelles.—"I find myself very sensibly affected with the ill news which we received the last post of the misfortune which happened to your Grace, though I hope it will have no worse consequences than the hindering your Grace from waiting on the King at his arrival, when I fear his Majesty might want your Grace's presence. I must continue to write to your Grace, as if I were sure you were at leisure to receive my letters. In my last I sent one to your Grace for the King from the Elector, which I hope came safe.

"I have been oft alarmed of late by the insolence of the English priests and Roman Catholics here, who are enemies to our country and Government, and to the person of the King. I have some people whom I send amongst 'em, and they assure me that they talk with great presumption, as if they expected some mighty revolution. I can learn nothing positive, but I fear there may be so much in it as to give the King and his Ministers great occasion to be very vigilant.

“Mons. Cagliere says positively that he can yield no more in the business of Luxembourg without orders from his master. I am told the Imperial Ministers at the Hague have power to accept any place for the general treaty on which France and the other Allies can agree; so that if France will yield to the restitution of Luxembourg in the condition it now is, the treaty may soon be opened, or else Cagliere ought to be sent home.

“I cannot but represent to your Lordship how odd it is to see the Duke of Savoy’s Ministers at the Hague, and here, after his Royal Highness had commanded our enemies at the siege of Valence; and his envoyé demanded public audience at St. Germain’s even of the young Princess. I would also remark to your Grace the address of that Prince, who, in winding up the neutrality in Italy, contrived to have the citadel of Pignerol demolished, and Villefrance and Montmellian restored immediately, though, by his late treaty with the French, these three places ought to remain in their hands until the general peace.

“The Elector’s chymist, of whom I spoke in my last, was found here in a cloister, to which he retired. He sent to discover himself, saying he had done no harm, that he had stolen nothing, that he only saved himself from a bondage which he would no longer endure. Since he is found, Madame d’Arcos has all her jewels; and I believe our Ministers wish the world would neither talk nor think of this adventure.

“I am writing as if I could not believe your Grace were indisposed, and indeed I would not believe it,” &c.

R. 31 Oct.

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1696, Oct. 24, Eyford.—“Being confined here in the country, upon account of an unlucky fall I have had a-hunting, I have sent your Lordship’s letter to be laid before the King and the Treasury, and am sure they will think it so necessary that you will be supplied, and those merchants reimbursed who have advanced money for supporting the troops, that they will do all that is possible to comply with your desires. I am sorry I cannot solicit this matter myself in person, but I have directed Mr. Vernon to do it from me, and to give your Lordship an account of his success.

“Some of the letters that come from France speak as if that Court had entertained some hopes, since the Neutrality, that a treaty might be carried on at Turin between the King of France and the Emperor, if not the King of Spain, and that the Pope and the Duke of Savoy did earnestly labour such a separate agreement. Though in all probability this may be given out to flatter and deceive their people, and that in truth there is no foundation for it, yet I thought it might not be improper to give you this hint, to be no otherwise made use of at present than for your own information, and, if you think it may deserve it, to observe and enquire by the best methods you can; for if such a project should be set on foot, it would be of the last importance that the King were acquainted with it."

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Oct. 24, Exford.—“You may believe I am very uneasy to be here at a time that 'tis so much my duty to wait upon the King, and attend the Parliament, but how long the same mortification will continue I am not yet able to judge. I have several of your letters to acknowledge; the last was of the 15-25, which I omitted, because there was no business required an answer, and that writing is a little uneasy to my breast. I do not at all doubt but the Parliament will do their best to enable the King either to make war or peace. I wish the French have as much mind to a general agreement as they pretend. If they have any hopes of tempting more of the Allies to fall off, they will perhaps think they do their business as well or better that way than any other. There are different opinions upon this subject, but I hope a speedy treaty, and a good conclusion, will decide this happily.”

[THOMAS, LORD] WHARTON to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Oct. 27, Whitehall.—“Since I came to town I have met with my Lord Sunderland, Lord Keeper [Somers], Lord Edward Russell, Mr. Montague, and Mr. Felton, who I presume were appointed to meet upon the subject your Grace imparted to me. Mr. Russell was not there, he appearing to be under a good deal of trouble upon the news he hath lately received of the death of his brother at Barbados. I perceive nobody there had ever any light into that matter, but the two first; and it being of that consequence, and so new to them, it was thought reasonable not to come then to any resolution by what steps to proceed in it; but the same gentlemen have appointed to meet again tomorrow in the evening to advise farther about it.

“I was this morning with Mr. Russell, with whom I had a good deal of discourse upon this subject, and have his commands to let your Grace know what the methods are that we could think would be the most proper to proceed in. That the King should (as soon as he can be prevailed with to believe that it will be no obstruction to his affairs) open this whole matter to the Council, with his sense of it, and the several steps that have been taken in making this discovery to him, and the directions he gave thereupon. That Mr. Russell may then have his leave, and those that are in the King's service may receive his directions, to lay this whole matter before the House of Commons, opening of it as a contrivance (by blasting and taking away the most faithful and useful of the King's servants) to do King James the most considerable piece of service. There is a good deal,” &c.

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1696, [Oct. 30-]Nov. 9, n.s., Hague.—“ I am always very glad of the honour of your Grace’s letters, but would dispense with them at any time rather than that your health should receive any prejudice by writing ; which I hope you have now so well as that the business in Parliament may no longer want you.

“ At the congress we have had Mons. Caliere’s answer to the point of the Reunions, that he will give the Mediator a list of what places France understands to be reunited, and mark to what Parliament every particular place belongs, with these words joined : Le Roy rend les Reunions comme cy dessus faites depuis le traité de Nimègue ; s’il se trouve d’autres unions qui soient effectivement telles, on en fera raison. The ministers of the Allies seem to approve this answer.

“ As to the point of Luxembourg, Caliere says he has had no answer, and talks as if he did not expect any, which seems as if France would insist upon it. There was no resolution taken in the congress about it, the Spanish minister being absent by some indisposition. All our German ministers (except those of the House of Austria) think this difficulty ought no more to be insisted upon than that of Straesbourg, which we have already accepted in the state as when France took it. I may tell your Grace that some here likewise think that the treaty should not break off for a difference of a wall or bastion more or less.

“ The Emperor’s minister has proposed Maestricht for the place of treaty, but it was not thought proper to take any resolution therein till the business of Luxembourg be declared.

“ Mons. Caliere has in discourse said something as if his master would not enter into treaty except it does begin before the new year. My Lord, this has an air of threatening, but I see by some letters from France that they will be in earnest for a peace, if his Majesty be enabled to carry on the war, so that if the Parliament continue as it has begun, there is reason to expect a good conclusion of everything."

WHARTON to [SHREWSBURY].

"What was agreed to (then) was to this effect: That it could by no means be thought advisable that these informations should be suffered to come before the House till the King had examined further into them; that Sir J[ohn] F[enwick] having offered and desired to explain what was in his first paper to the King himself, if the King should let it be brought to the House without hearing which way he would explain it, the House might look upon it that he referred it to them to take the farther examination and explanation of it to themselves; that the King should therefore be prevailed with on Monday next to send for Sir J. F., and to command the attendance of the Archbishop, Lord Keeper, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, the two Chief Justices, the Secretary, the Attorney, and Solicitor; and in their presence to let him know what opinion he hath of the papers he hath given in, and what it is he expects from him; which if the King doth with that spirit that he can do, it is not much doubted but he will think it his safest way to discover what he really knows, and not think to save himself by hearsays. That his examination be taken by the Secretary, which will be something more authentic to be laid before the House than those papers he hath given in. That the King may then (as was thought of before) lay this matter before the Council on Thursday, and give leave to Mr. Russell, and directions to others, to open it to the House on Friday, or the first opportunity. This afternoon," &c.

THE TRUCE IN ITALY.

[1696, Oct.]—Article made between the Emperor, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Savoy, subsequently to the Treaty of Vigevano, which was concluded on 7th October, touching the suspension of arms or neutrality in Italy.

Copy, French.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, Nov. 1-11, Gand.—"I was wonderfully transported today with the honour of your Grace's letter of the 24th past, because I was under pain and affliction enough, for fear of the ill effects and consequences of your late misfortune. I am also obliged to the public news, and the common correspondence of the world, which does interest itself in your Grace's health. I am now only afflicted that the King and his kingdom should want your Grace's presence at London in a time of so great importance to 'em both.

"I have still some letters from France, which speak of their preparations at Brest, and seem to believe the design is upon Ireland. I hope the zeal and vigour of the Parliament may cool their resolutions.

"We have news from Madrid of the 16-26 past, which say the King had relapsed, and had suffered by two or three fits of a tertian, but that he was perfectly well again. I make more vows for the perfect recovery of your Grace's health."

R. 6.

HEN. GUY<sup>o</sup> to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, Nov. 7, London.—"I received the honour of your Grace's of the 5th instant yesterday at 12 of the clock at noon, just at which time the House of Commons was entered upon that affair. But I was not ignorant some days ago of your concern in it, and therefore had beforehand done what your Grace mentioned in yours with those two gentlemen, and likewise with several others, the particulars of which are not so convenient for a letter, but shall be given you when your health will permit us the good fortune to wait on you here, which I earnestly hope will be very shortly.

"I doubt not but your Grace hath had from Mr. Vernon the circumstances of the whole business in the House, where it was impossible for any person to have had a greater vindication than was given to you, and I am sure others fared well for your sake; for I do from my heart believe that all were sensible of the villainy of the accusation, and the innocence of yourself, and do therefore hope that this whole matter will make as little impression on you as it did on them; for (give me leave to say it out of the sincerity of my soul to you) should you now give up the Seals, it would be half a victory to those who do not wish you well, and (with your pardon be it urged) would be some injury to the House, from whom you have so deserved a justification. This is the opinion (as well as mine) of some of that House, who I am sure do truly love you.

"Nor can I omit to acquaint your Grace with what relates to our friend, of whom I so often discoursed to you in the summer, and who hath now fully verified all I then assured you of him; for though the effect of this is so good, yet it is all owing to the method that was taken in the bringing this affair properly on, which was not only proposed, but vigorously prosecuted by him, and that with no ordinary labour, before it could be brought to a resolution and practice, in which I know his aim was to serve you principally. I inform you this much as a friend not only to him, but to truth, because I think it a duty as honestly incumbent to acquaint you with the kindness of a friend as with the malice of an enemy.

G. BRIDGES* to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Nov. 7, London.—Would have given his Grace an account of the right the House did him last night, but Mr. Vernon promised to do it by a special messenger. At the rising of the House Lord Tankerville, Lord Mounmouth, and others desired he would write to his Grace persuading him to hasten to town. His presence here is necessary at this time, but he should not take a journey before his health is established.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Nov. 9-19, Anvers.—“I am still under very great disquiet until I hear that your Grace is returned to Whitehall. I can only comfort myself by the liberty which I take to write to your Grace as if you were at ease and leisure to be importuned. I fear all the negotiations at the Hague with Mons. Cagliere have been at a stand since he declared the intention of his master was to restore Luxembourg only in the condition in which he found it. The Ministers of the Allies there spend a deal of time about words and phrases, and can as little agree with one another as with Cagliere almost. At last they have resolved to offer the enclosed paper to Cagliere, to be signed by him by way of declaration, by which your Grace may see with what preliminaries we shall be all contented. The last clause is ominous I fear, and supposes such a superiority in the French forces which we ought not to own, methinks.

“I hope the storm which did threaten us from Brest may be blown over, for I find our enemies more modest on a sudden, and some who designed to go for England have altered their resolutions. I am going to Bruxelles tomorrow to do all I can.”

R. 13, 96. Enclosure :—

“Le Roy de France accorde, pour preliminaire et fondement de la negociation pour la Paix generale, les deux Paix de Westphalie et de Nimmeque.

“Et sur un autre papier :

“La ville de Strasbourg, dans l’etat comme elle estoit du tems de l’occupation.

“La ville de Luxembourg dans l’etat present, et la ville de Dinant, pour l’Evêché de Liege, dans l’etat comme elle estoit, quand elle fut prise.

“Inserez icy les places et les conditions que Mr. Calliere a jusques icy nommées, et la liste des reunions qu’il a spécifiée, et apres, la clause suivante.

“Le Roy de France promet, pour preliminaire, de rendre les places et les reunions spécifiées cy dessus, prises et faites depuis le traite de Ninmegue ; et toutes celles qui, pendant la negociation de la Paix, se trouveront etre telles.”

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Nov. [10.]20, n.s., Hague.—“I hope by this time the House of Commons has done everybody right, and disposed of Sir John Fenwick as his new plot deserves, which I cannot treat seriously enough to make your Grace any compliment upon your getting rid of it. I renew my wishes once more that this may find you well at London. I think we have settled all the points of the preliminaries, except that of Luxembourg, and that too the French will now give in the preliminaries as it was when they took it, and offer, when we shall come to treat, to take a sum of money for the fortifications they have added to it. The Spanish Minister continuing still ill, no answer could be given on this subject. By the desire of Mons. Caliere, Mons. Dyckvelt has asked the congress for a passport for Messrs. Courtin and Harley, whom the King of France has named as his plenipotentiaries, but it was not yet thought time to grant it till the place of treaty is named. The Imperialists, as to the choice of the place, have declared that shall not defer the treaty. I should be very glad it were begun, that it may soon be ended.”

R. 13.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Nov. 14-24, Milan.—M. de Mausfeld will be here tomorrow, and M. de St. Thomas is to come with him. His R.H. has sent a courier to Vienna touching the ratification, &c. Some difficulty is made as to the passage of the King's troops through the Tyrol. Can find enough money to conduct them to Swabia and to Frankfort. Asks protection for his letters of exchange, lest three honest merchants who have trusted him should be ruined.

French. R. 7 Dec.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Nov. 16-26, Bruxelles.—“I do hope this letter will find your Grace at London. I dare not deny myself those hopes. We are now told here that the Spanish plenipotentiaries are named, as well as the French: for Spain, Don Quiros, who is already Minister at the Hague, and one Mons. de Pirlemont, who is of the Council of State here. I cannot be pleased with the choice of either of 'em. Don Quiros is a peevish, forward, fantastic Spaniard, who is full of old Spanish maxims, and will like nothing which comes short of the Pyrenean treaty. The other is a little poor-spirited Fleming, who will sacrifice the interests of all Europe to his own. However, I fear there will be no need of 'em yet, for Cagliari chicanes and draws back upon everything. He seemed content to own our King amongst the préliminaires; now he says he cannot.

“I did tell your Grace that the President de la Tour was here, and gave himself airs of ministry, which may be of ill consequence. I hoped your Grace would give me some directions about him. Our Elector is at present gone into the country a-hunting for a week.

[P.S.] “I do not trouble your Grace with the news which come from France daily of the preparations there, because they are so uncertain. Some say their designs upon England are over; some say the Mareschal de Boufflers is ready to embark his equipages at Dunkerque. I must own, my Lord, that I am in mortal apprehensions for his Majesty’s person.”

R. 21, 96.

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Nov. 17-27, Milan.—Is sorry to hear of his ill health. The French are not slow to spread a report of a separate treaty being negotiated at Turin, in order to create disunion between the Allies, and to console their own people. The report is not altogether without foundation. M. de Mansfeld has done his utmost to draw to Turin the negotiation of the general peace. He has been here two days, and is soon to return to Vienna. He inserted an article in the treaty of Vigevano tending to refer the said negotiation to the Duke of Savoy, but the Emperor ratified [that copy of] the treaty from which the writer had caused the article to be excluded; and he rejected the other [copy], in which this article remained, and which was sent to Vienna without the writer’s knowledge. The King of Spain has sent the two ratifications, &c.

PORTLAND to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Nov. 18-28, Kensington.—“Jay bien receu celle que vous mavez fait lhonneur de mescrire, que jay communiquee au Roy. Lon ne manque pas de prendre toutes les precautions pour la seureté de la personne du Roy que lon peut imaginer. C’est assurement pour lui que nous avons le plus a craindre, car pour une invasion, il ne nous paroist pas comment ils la pourront tenter. Toutes les troupes sont en marche pour estre en quartier le long des costes du midi, a fin destre a la main au besoin. Nous avons une bonne flotte a Spithead; et tous les avis de France disent que l’Esq<sup>e</sup> de Chateau Renaut desarme, et quil ne si (sic) fait dautre equipage que celle de Pontis.

“Je ne vous dis rien de ce qui se passe ici, dont vous estes assez informé d’ailleurs. Je nay pas aussi assez de presumption pour m’ingerer a vous donner des avis; vous avez asses (sic) damis plus capables de cela, et apres tout vous estes le meilleur juge vous mesme; mais si j’estois dans vostre place, et dans vostre circonstance, rien ne m’empecheroit de venir a Londres quant ma vie seroit en danger, de peur que par mon absence je ne souffrisse quelque prejudice en ce qui m’est plus cher que la vie mesme. Il faut de la vig[u]eur quelque fois pour soutenir la justice attaquée par la fausseté et linjustice. Pardonnez moy, Monsieur, la liberté que je prens den user avec tant de franchise ; il ni a rien qui puisse m'i porter que la sincerité des assurances que je vous ay données, et la passion dont je seray tousjours," &c.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, [Nov. 23-] Dec. 3, s.n., Bruxelles.—“ I dare not persuade myself that your Grace is still too little at ease to be disturbed, and therefore I continue to write to your Grace, out of duty and inclination.

“ The negotiations at the Hague seem to be at a stand. Cagliere expects his new instructions about owning our King in the préliminaires, and about the condition in which Luxembourg is to be restored ; and our folks expect new instructions from the King about the same two points. In the meantime the passports are refused to the two French plenipotentiaries, who were preparing to come from Paris, on pretence that the préliminaires are not adjusted, nor a place named for the treaty.

“ I have lately seen a letter from the Queen of Spain, wherein she desires a Princess, who is in her confidence, to propose one of the daughters of the Emperour to our King. I took the liberty to let this Princess know that I did verily believe such an alliance with the House of Austria would be very agreeable to the King my master, but that we have a law which excludes from the right of succession the issue of a Catholic Princess. This my advertisement is sent to the Queen of Spain, but if your Grace has any orders to give me, I shall follow 'em exactly.

“ Our Elector has been in the country this week and more, and is there still. I believe more time is spent at play than in the field ; and 'tis said the Elector with some of his friends have lost 18,000 pistoles at Bassette, in one night.

“ I have seen a letter from Paris, which says positively that the preparations at Brest go on for 17 frigates, and the transport of 3,000 men, but that the design is for the Indies.

“ I make many vows for your Grace's recovery and return to Court.”

R. 27 Nov.

The EARL OF MEATH to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]96, Nov. 24, Dublin.—“ This gentleman Col. Deane, being Knight of the Shire of the County of Dublin, is sent over agent by some Lords and Commons of Ireland, first to entreat your Grace that you will be pleased to let us know his Majesty's pleasure on the former papers ; and if the King shall think fit to examine the matters complained of against our Lord Chancellor, Col. Deane then has directions to proceed ; for we resolve, with his Majesty's and your Grace's permission, to use all lawful means to secure ourselves and our posterities from the dangers Sir Charles Porter brings on us, and indeed these nations. And we doubt not but this will appear infinitely for his Majesty's service, because the strength and power of the Irish now by Sir Charles Porter's means is greatly encouraging to the King's enemies at home and abroad, and our divisions and dangers here do daily increase, as Col. Deane will acquaint your Grace."

R. at Eyford, Dec. 11.

MR. HILL to SHREWSBURY.

[1696, Nov. 30.] Dec. 10, s.n., Bruxelles.—“I write pretty constantly to your Grace, because such letters as would be very importunate at Whitehall, may be less so in the country.

“On the 7th of this month Cagliere ought to have his answer from Paris concerning the acknowledging our King in préliminaires. On the 8th he ought to explain himself thereon with Mons. Dyckvelt. We shall therefore see in a very few days the treaty begun, or quite broke off.

“If the treaty should be broke, and Cagliere sent home, all our enemies will say that the private interests of our King hinder the peace of Europe. I have therefore told the Elector here very impudently, and his ministers, that our King was content to waive his own interests, and to begin the treaty, but that his Council at London desired his Majesty to consider that his people have no manner of pretensions in all this war, or at the treaty of peace, but to secure his Majesty upon the throne; and that therefore they do desire his Majesty not to enter into any treaty till that point is settled. I ventured to say this, because I had rather the odium should fall upon the King's Council than upon his person, if the peace of Europe should be quite interrupted upon his Majesty's account.

“I can yet see nothing certain concerning the preparations which the French are making by sea, but it's certain they are still very busy. They pretend to put their fleet out next spring, and to increase their armies also.”

R. 7, 96.

ADVICE [by LORD MONMOUTH] to SIR JOHN FENWICK.

1696, Nov.—“Now the Bill is like to pass the House of Commons, this is the most proper way to stop it in the House of Lords.

“First, a frank and generous confession, and his making out his paper in relation to those in the Government, and what he owned to the King, if he can abide by it; for this will not create him one enemy among those who are known Jacobites, but make others his friends, in hopes of falling into those places they enjoy.

“2ndly. This will remove the grounds on which the Bill was founded, which were his prevarications in his former Information, and his being concerned in Goodman's withdrawing; but it will make it evident he was no way concerned in it. If he depends upon confessions for his safety, the House of Lords is the most proper place for this, they being more regular in their proceedings than the Commons.

“3rdly. Let this Bill go which way it will, if he do this, the King will secure him, and be obliged.

“Mem. These proposals were offered to Sir John’s counsel and solicitor, as the properest persons to insinuate these measures to him for his safety; which they declined, saying they were concerned only in the management of his defence, and should put him upon no other measures.”

THO. BRODRICK to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Dec. 1, Dublin.—“My business in this kingdom obliging my return before your Grace’s coming to London, several gentlemen of this country thought it necessary that a person should be sent for England to receive from your Grace’s hands his Majesty’s answer to the Memorial which by your Grace’s direction I left with Mr. Vernon. They have pitched upon the bearer, Major Deane, who is a gentleman of very good interest in his country, and (however exasperated by very severe usage) of that temper as, in my humble opinion, renders him very fit for the thing.” . . .

MARLBOROUGH to SHREWSBURY.

[1696, Dec. 2,] Wednesday night.—“Although I have not troubled your Grace with my letters, I have not been wanting in inquiring constantly how you did. I did about a fortnight ago write a letter to acquaint you with what I had observed of some people, in hopes Mr. Arden would have called upon me as he promised, but I did not care to send it by the post, and so it was burnt. We had yesterday Sir Jo. Fenwick at the House, and I think it all went as you could wish. I do not send you the particulars, knowing you must have it more exactly from others; but on this occasion I should be wanting if I did not let you know that Lord Rochister has behaved himself on all this occasion like a friend; and in a conversation he had with me he expressed himself as a real servant of yours, and I think it would not be amiss if you took notice of it to him. If you think me capable of any commands, I shall endeavour to approve myself what I am, with much truth,

“Your Grace’s humble servant,

“MARLBOROUGH.”

1696, Dec. 3, Eyford.—“Yours of the 7-17 Nov. finds me still in this place. I have made some trials to get to London, but instead of being able to perform the journey, I have fallen into relapses that have deferred it, and at this time have no near prospect of being in a condition to remove; so that from this melancholy habitation I have nothing to trouble your Lordship with, unless it were the spleen and impatience of a sick man tied to his house at a time he has sufficient cause to wish himself abroad.'

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Dec. 3, Eyford.—“It is my ill luck to be still in this place, though I have made some attempts to get to London, but they have proved so unsuccessful as to defer rather than advance my journey.

“I have yours of the 3rd, n.s., and my Lord Portland has been acquainted with what you mention of the Queen of Spain’s enquiry, which is all I am able to do in so nice a matter, at this distance. If his Majesty has a mind any other step should be made, I suppose he will direct me to do it, or take some shorter method of letting you know his pleasure.

“Your letters have been extreme welcome to me ever since I have received them, and are not less so here, where I want no leisure, nor anything else but health and patience.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Dec. 3-13, Bruxelles.—“The last letters from the Hague bring us very good news. Cagliere has consented to acknowledge our King, and to express himself in such terms to the Mediator as may give satisfaction in that point. This I think is a very great step towards a peace; at least ’tis opening the door to a treaty. Perhaps this is owing to the vigorous votes of our Parliament, and I only wish that your Grace were there to help to animate their good designs in a very critical time, which will determine the state of our nation. One cannot but be very much afflicted for your Grace’s absence, and more for the cause of it.”

R. 10, 96.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696,] Dec. 7-17, Bruxelles.—“The negotiators at the Hague, viz., Messrs. Dyckvelt, Boreel, and Cagliere, are now agreed to declare to the Mediator, that the King of France will own the Prince of Orange to be King of Great Britain at the signing of the peace. This declaration is to be read by Messrs. Dyckvelt and Boreel to the Mediator, and Cagliere is to declare that he has orders from his master to make this declaration, which is to be done so soon as the préliminaires are adjusted. They now expect at the Hague the King's approbation hereof.

"One La Fond, a Frenchman, is taken at Rotterdam, as he was going for England. He was engaged in black designs against the King's person, which appear more probable, because the French continue to arm at Brest and at Dunkerque, and put on board all things proper for a descent. I long to hear that your Grace is got to Whitehall."

SHREWSBURY to MR. BRODRICK.

1696, Dec. 12, Eyford.—"I received the favour of yours of the 1st yesterday by Col. Deane, who took the pains to bring it hither. I intended to have had more discourse with him, after he had refreshed himself, but being in haste, he went away before I knew it. It is impossible for me, who have been so long out of town, and not seen the King since his return, to give any answer or advice, or make any step in this matter. I hope it will not be long before I shall get to London, and then I shall be able to judge better, and you shall hear from me again."

Copy. There is a similar letter to Lord Meath.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696], Dec. 14-24, Anvers.—"I am to thank your Grace for the honour of his (sic) letter of the 3rd Dec., by which I am very sorry to see that we must despair of having your Grace at Westminster, or at Kensington, this winter. I would not purchase the good and satisfaction of the nation at the expense of your Grace's health. I will continue to write to your Grace so long as you will give me leave, to keep our affairs here within your sight, as much as I can.

“The negotiations at the Hague do go forward now, but very slowly. I think our Allies do make more difficulties than our enemies at present. Mons. Cagliere was contented to leave the business of Lorraine quite out of the préliminaires, at the request of the Imperialists; now the same Imperialists demand to have the business of Lorraine put into the préliminaires, or at least to put into the préliminaires that the business of Lorraine shall be the first thing to be treated upon when the conferences do begin. Cagliere received this new demand of the Imperialists, so very contrary to what was settled at their request, with wonder, but has wrote to Court about it. I believe, but for this incident, that all the préliminaires would have been adjusted by this time. We have great reason to believe that the Conte de Kinski, first Minister to the Emperor, does what he can to obstruct the negotiations at the Hague, and some reasons to fear that he may be treating separately in some other place.

“In the meantime the French are making mighty preparations against the campaign, and if we do not agree, I verily believe they will come with very superior forces into the field, very early, and impose such a peace on us as they please. I may be allowed to be afraid of this, since the Parliament leaves our Army here in such great necessity, that it will scarce be of use. The last letters from France say that Mons. de Pointy’s squadron was ready to sail, but God knows whither.

“The King was pleased to be satisfied with the answer which I made, concerning the incapacity which is laid upon the issue of a Popish Queen, and has wrote to the Princess of Vaudemont to let the Queen of Spain know it, as from me, without taking notice that he was acquainted therewith.

“The Frenchman who was taken at Rotterdam, as he was going to England, has yet confessed nothing of moment. If the frost does continue, we may expect the French will visit us, in order to extend their contribution.”

R. 22, 96.

G. BRIDGES to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Dec. 19, London.—Lord [Monmouth] has employed persons to Lady Ma[ry] Fen[wick], to offer that if Sir John will go on in endeavouring to prove his hearsay paper, he will send him letters to make it good. She accepted the proposal, but Sir John rejected it, and said it would only make him go out of the world with more infamy. One of the persons [Monmouth] employed was one Smyth; the other was the Countess of Newport. The Lord Keeper can give an account of this. Shrewsbury’s presence would put a stop to these infamous practices. Refers to the proceedings of the Lords yesterday upon Sir John Fenwick. Sir Ed. Seymour has lent the King 10,000*l.*, and is security to the butchers and graziers of Wiltshire for 20,000*l.* worth of fat cattle to be delivered to the Victualling Office for the Fleet; “which makes some people judge the preparations at Brest grows [grow] as cold as the weather.”

R. at Eyton, 21. Ansd. same day.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1696, Dec. 23.] 1697, Jan. 2, s.n., Anvers.—“ I should not expect anything happy or prosperous in this new year, if I did not begin it well, by wishing all manner of prosperity to your Grace.

“ The negotiations at the Hague do still go forward, though very slowly, but the irresolutions of the Imperialists, and the folly of the Spanish Ambassador at the Hague (one Don Quiros, who talks, and acts, and thinks as Philip the II.'s ambassadors used to do) cause the greatest delays at present. Don Quiros made a long harangue last week, to exhort the Allies to continue the war, and declared the brave resolutions of the King his master to raise his proportion of 40,000 men, to be added to the forces which the Allies had on foot the last year. This Spaniard is like the famous madman at Athens, who fancied he had armies on foot and fleets at sea, &c.

“ They now talk of the Hague, and of Breda, for the place of treaty. Both our enemies and our Allies are in great expectation of the resolutions of Parliament; but as the good success thereof may determine our enemies to be willing to end the war, the same success will make our Allies willing to continue the war. I see the House of Commons are coming to such a capitulation as the French King ordered three years since. If it be found a good way of raising money, I wish the Parliament would settle it, as the French King did, to continue as long as the war.

“ We are still in pain for the preparations which are making at Brest, but I have seen a letter from Brest, which says the provisions for land-men are put on board by day and taken out at night, and that they are not really so great as is reported. However, the squadrons which you have now in the Channel are stronger than that which is now off of Brest under de Pointi: and instead of inquiring why the Thoulon squadron was not intercepted last year, one would venture to inquire why our fleet is not sent just now to attack de Pointi in the Rade de Bertaume.

“ I did send word to your Grace that I had powerfully solicited our Elector, not to grant his passports to Mons. de Bourepos, who was going in haste to Copenhaguen. I did prevail to stop him a whole month at Mons, though he had his passports from the Emperor and the States, and though the Elector's passport was actually signed. If I had received any orders about this matter I would have pushed it farther, even to carry his Excellence out of his way, with a party of drago[o]ns, until our treaty made with Denmarque were ratified. The treaty was signed at the Hague the beginning of December, and two months allowed for the ratification thereof, so that Bonrepos will still get to Copenhague[n] time enough to oppose the ratification.

“ I am ordered by his Majesty to prepare shipping and victuals at Ostende for the transportation of 15 battalions, to be sent to England so soon as ever there may be any occasion, and I am going upon that errand immediately. I hope to get everything ready, though I have not one penny sent for such a service, or indeed for the subsistence of the Army; but I believe there is no fear of an invasion at present in England, especially if the funds were settled for this year's service.

"All the letters from Madrid speak doubtfully of the King of Spain's health, and the many pretenders to his succession are desirous, some, others unwilling, to have this Alliance dissolved, and the Christian princes disarmed at that day of scrambling.

"The last letters from England bring the good news of your Grace's recovery, for which I thank God very heartily. I am also told that your Grace was pleased to allow my bills in such terms as would make me vain, if I were not persuaded that we ought to serve our King and country as we do God Almighty, and when we have done all, to say that we are unprofitable servants."

R. 29 Dec. 96.

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696, Dec. 26, Elyford.—"I have received yours of the 7th and 14th Dec., and wish all parties were perfectly well and fairly inclined to what they are treating about. I cannot see that delay will be for our advantage, and our plenipotentiaries being named gives great hopes, to us at least, in the country, that the treaty is in a good forwardness.

"If a frost alarms you in Flanders, lest the French should enlarge their contribution, I am very sensible you are at an end of those fears. The present constitution of my health gives me so severe warning of all such changes that I cannot help observing the weather. When it is dry, I am almost well; when it is moist, very much the contrary. How such a weather-glass of a body will hold out the remainder of this winter, God knows."

MAJOR-GEN. WM. STEUART to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96, Dec. 26, Dublin.—Landed here last night. "The ship that has the ammunition on board came out with me from Neston on Thursday night last, [but] being taken short with a westerly wind, has not been able to make a passage, but the yacht in which I came has done it with some difficulty. I believe she is returned to Neston, where I hope she is safe. About the middle of the next week I hope to settle matters so with the Lords Justices, as to be able to begin my journey to visit all the garrisons and forces that lie upon the south-west of this kingdom." . . .

BRIGADIER WM. WOLSELEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1696, Dec. 26, Dublin.— . . . "Since I came hither I find Major-General Stuart has orders to view all the garrisons in this kingdom. I was surprised when I heard it, because I look upon that to be my province (as Master of the Ordnance), and I was very well prepared to have given the King a particular account of 'em when I was at London, if his Majesty had been pleased to have laid his commands upon me. Your Grace may imagine I am under a great concern about it (my whole fortune depending upon his Majesty's favour), fearing that I have either done something that has displeased his Majesty, or that his Majesty does not think me capable of discharging my duty in that particular.

"I have enclosed a short state of all the garrisons. . . . Our stores of war run very low, there being but 2,000 barrels of powder and 4,000 small arms in the whole kingdom, and the Government here at every turn gives out his Majesty's arms and ammunition to the Militia, which I hope his Majesty will put a stop to. . . . Since the battle of the Boyne, there has [have] been more arms delivered out of his Majesty's Stores here to several Militia officers than there are men in the Militia, and yet they are daily petitioning for more still.

"We were in a very good condition in our stores of war here till the first intended descent upon France, but then the Board of Ordnance in England drew away 4,000 barrels of powder, and other stores (of all sorts) proportionable. . . . The stores here are not under their power, for the Master of the Ordnance in England has no more power over me than I have over him; and I hope his Majesty will very well consider of it before he order it otherways. . . .

"I am eldest Brigadier of horse in the Army, and I doubt not but his Majesty will upon the first promotion make me a Major-General. I am informed his Majesty intends to provide for Sir Jo. Hanmer (by reason of his age) some other way." . . .

THREE PAPERS by LADY MARY FENWICK, delivered at the Bar of the House of Lords.

[16]96, Dec. 22.—(1) [Sir John Fenwick] desires leave to clear himself of an aspersion the House has laid upon him. Will lay the truth of the matter before them on condition that what he says will not be used as evidence against anybody. Desires that Lord[s] P[ortland] and R[omney] may be asked concerning intelligence brought to the King of the correspondence held here with K[ing] J[ames] by great men in this Government. That the King may be entreated to lay before the House the informations that were given against Lord Ma[rlborough], for which he was removed from his places and sent to the Tower. That the D[uke] of N[orfolk] may be examined as to what Capt. S[mith] said to him about the correspondence between K[ing] J[ames] and the said great men, and whether his Grace did not acquaint the King with the same. That Capt. S[mith] may be examined, and give an account of the correspondence, and of some original letters of the D[uke] of S[hrewsbury]. That the letters that came to the King's hands from K[ing] J[ames], the Q[ueen], and others in France to Lord G[o]d[olphin] may be laid before the House, and that Lord[s] P[ortland] and R[omney] may be asked about it, &c.

(2) Points insisted on [by Sir John Fenwick], "intending to make good the truth of my account given to the King." Among others:—

"Had not Goodman made his escape, there were others that could give positive accounts."

"[I] insist, for ground of probability, the manner and time of Shrewsbury's laying down and Russell's laying down when the three Admirals came in, and the surprising and sudden coming in of Shrewsbury again, which then could not be voluntary; and what could constrain him, but the King's having some discovery of his dealings, by which means he was in his power?"

"[At] the beginning of this correspondence, one of the persons concerned was deprived of all his great places, and committed to the Tower, for a reason which must be upon evidence, and for such practices as he alleges, corresponding with France. He therefore desires the evidence against Ma[r]lborough at that time may be laid before the House."

(3) "The Bill [of Attainder] having passed the House of Commons, the only point in question is, what can most probably prevent its passing in this House of Lords."—This is a copy of the paper of advice [by Lord Monmouth], recommending Sir John to own and prove his confession to the King, for various reasons. It would be made clear that "he did not contribute to the removing of Goodman, for he depended upon his confession to save his life." See pp. 426, 429.

G. BRIDGES to SHREWSBURY.

1696, Dec. 29, London.—Mr. Vernon has given Bridges an account of Mr. Smith, who is the principal tool of Lord M[onmouth]. Was mistaken when he named the Countess of Newport, but the person was a woman of the same name, viz., Mrs. Mortimore, the confectioner's widow, who was once a witness for Lord Montague against Lord Bath. She was joined with Smith to make good Sir Jo[hn] Fen[wick's] information. Since this villainy has been detected by the D[uke] of Nor[folk], he[M]onmouth has almost gone mad, and his whole business has been to run into all public places to justify himself. On Sunday last he was shut up with the King for an hour and a half,<sup>o</sup> and from thence went to the Lord Chief Justice Holt's, where he threw out several reflections upon Shrewsbury and Mr. Russell. The Lord Chief Justice did not speak with him alone, and when he went from thence he said he was going to Newgate, presumably to make witnesses of some of the prisoners. He has also been with Mr. Secretary Trumball, as Mr. Vernon can inform Shrewsbury. By these preparations it may be judged what game he will play when the Lords meet next. In the end it will all fall upon his own head.

Complains of the usage he has met with from the Cabal in Dover Street, on account of his zeal for his Grace's service. Is looked upon as a spy. "The zeal of that party is so violent that they would rather all the world besides sunk, than a hair of one of them should fall to the ground. But the lady of that house is so linked with Mr. Buckley that she thinks nothing well but what he approves. Katie Smith is the great confidant, and you very well know what star it is that influences her, and whither all is carried that she can make herself worse off. What letters you write there to my Lady Shrewsbury, that happen to be left there, are all opened before they are sent to her, as she sends me word, and has desired me to take care no more are left there for her." Is sorry to hear of his Grace's relapse.

G. BRIDGES to SHREWSBURY.

1696-7, Jan. 5, London.—It is impossible to guess what Lord M[onmouth] means. Was sent for yesterday to Cardigan House, and desired by Lady Midd[leton?] to propose to Mr. Russell that Shrewsbury and he should intercede with the King not to pass the Bill against Sir John Fen[wick]. "The arguments that were used were, that it would appear generous after he was condemned on Shrewsbury's account, besides that he reported he was taken and condemned by my Lord Mid[dleton's] friends." Will give no answer till he has his Grace's directions.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696-7, Jan. 10-20, Gand.—"I have received the honour of your Grace's letter of the 26th past, and am very much afflicted at the alteration of your health together with the weather. If I had any faith in masses, I would set a 1,000 altars at work for your Grace's recovery.

“I am still ready to send your Lordship a gazette of what we are doing on this side. The negotiations at the Hague go on, and I believe all parties are now inclined to press to a conclusion, except the Imperial Ministers. The Count de Kinski, out of jealousy and rage against Mons. Dyckvelt, does delay everything. The préliminaires are settled in the way which is here enclosed. There will be some debating at the treaty in proper time, about the fortifications of Luxembourg and Stratsbourg, but I believe the greatest difficulty will be about Lorraine. The French offer it only as they did offer it at Nimegue, which was on such hard terms that the Duke of Lorraine would not accept it. The Emperor and indeed all the Allies are obliged to procure better terms if possible for the House of Lorraine, but the French are very positive, and say they'll rather continue the war than give up Lorraine otherwise. They would I believe give up Lorraine, purely and simply, on condition to keep Stratsbourg, but the Empire will not consent to that.

“The last debates have been about the place of treaty. The French say they are willing to treat anywhere, since they are content to treat. The Imperialists have excepted against the Hague and Utrecht, only out of spite. It was then agreed to offer the choice of Breda, Maestricht, and Nimegue to the French. Now Cagliere says he is content to leave the Hague to the ministers of the Allies, and that the French ministers will reside at Delft, and that the conferences should be at Ryswick. This proposition is wonderfully agreeable to all the ministers of the Allies, and to all who are desirous to advance the negotiation, for it will save near two months' time, almost all the ministers being already settled at the Hague.

“Now all endeavours are using to prevail with the Emperor to be content with this proposal, which is, I believe, agreeable to our King. I know one thing which should determine the Imperialists, methinks, to consent to put an end to this war, which is that the six upper Circles of the Empire are entered into a project of association for their own defence, which, if it does go on well, it (sic) will lessen the Emperor's authority very much. Notwithstanding all these endeavours for peace, our enemies prepare for the campaign as if they intended nothing but war.

“I fear Sir Clouseley Shouyel (sic) was mistaken in his intelligence, if he thought de Pointi sailed from Brest the 27th past, as the news from London says. The news we have from Paris is, that a squadron of eight ships went from Brest towards Rochfort the 27th Dec., which met a great storm, which carried four of 'em to sea, and the other four to perish on the coasts; that de Pointi himself put to sea the 6th instant, s.n., with 13 men-of-war and 30 transport ships, and 'tis believed he's gone to the West Indies. The French will make peace here, and yet make war in the Indies; better so, than land in England; and I am glad my labour at Ostende is not necessary.

“The Elector of Hanover is very ill; some think he's dead.

[P.S.] "I have got a sight of the treaty concluded with Denmarque, which that King has signed, before the arrival of Bonrepos; it is a defensive league only, but the King of Denmarque is to renounce to (sic) all commerce with France, and if we can take any Danish ships trading to France, they are good prize. The Danish King does also promise to suffer no French men-of-war, or capers, to come into his ports, unless for shelter in time of storms. For this the King and the States are to pay 300,000 crowns per annum to the King of Denmarque, which is what the French paid him. These articles are kept very secret; perhaps the Danes would get subsidies paid on both sides, &c., &c."

NEWSLETTER FROM PARIS.

1697, Jan. 10-20, Paris.—The negotiations for peace are expected to be successful, but great preparations are being made for another campaign. "Quelques resolutions favorables que prennent (sic) le Parlement d'Angl. pour fournir a son Roy les moyens qu'il demande, on est persuadé icy qu'il voit bien que l'affaire de la monnoye ne pourra pas estre redressée pendant la guerre, et que la levée des desniers pour la continuer devenant tres difficile, il se portera à la finir par une prompte paix." Remarks on the preliminaries, passports, &c.

"On a eu avis icy que l'esquadre du Sr. de Pointis est partie de la rade de Brest; on espere que sa navigation sera heureuse; mais quoyque cet armement aye donné des grandes inquietudes aux Anglois, et qu'il leur ait fait faire une grande depense, dans la crainte de quelque descente en Ecosse ou en Irlande, et [il?] n'y a point d'apparence qu'on ait voulu former un pareil dessein aux depens des particuliers qui ont contribué a cet armement, et il est plus probable que c'est pour une entreprise dont il pourroit revenir des avantages considerables aux interessés."

[WILLIAM SAVILE, MARQUIS OF] HALIFAX to SHREWSBURY.

[1696-7], Jan. 12, Lond[on].—Is sorry to hear he continues so ill. Is desired by the Lady Dowager to enclose “a paper of several things that are already transmitted to Mr. Ardin.” Extraordinary things have been done in Derbyshire, and may be prejudicial to the estate. She desires to know what directions his Grace will give, in order to maintain “that right.”

Ansd. 16th, 96-7.

G. BRIDGES to SHREWSBURY.

1696[-7], Jan. 12, London.—Was today in the House of Lords, where Capt. Smith’s papers were examined. These papers, which Lord Monmouth calls original letters, have been lodged at Sir William Trumbal’s office ever since the beginning of last summer. Some of them are letters from his Grace to Smith, letting him know when he might speak with him; the rest are copies of letters from Smith to his Grace, giving an account of the intended assassination. The greatest stress was laid upon his letter of 19th Oct. last, which seemed to give an account of some things which have been proved since, but that the design upon the King was to have been executed at Kinsington. It was said that his Grace was once at Kinsington looking about the windows, and the King asked him what he was doing; he replied that since he was informed the King was to be assassinated there, he was ascertaining if it were possible to scale the windows. The Lords sent a messenger to his Grace to know if he had kept any of Smith’s letters, and if they could be laid before the House on Friday next. Mr. Vernon was examined.

Smith when examined denied ever having spoken to any of the ladies that were witnesses against Lord Mo[nmouth], but owns to having been often with him. Hewett was examined, from whom Smith says he had all his intelligence, but alleged that he never gave him any but what he had from the post-boys, for which Smith sometimes gave him a crown. This is all Lord Monmouth has produced in his defence. Judgment on his Lordship is put off till tomorrow, to enable him to produce Simon Harcourt, Clerk of the Peace of Middlesex, who came to town tonight from Oxford. He is to be examined concerning the report that Lord M[onmouth] was named in Sir Jo[hn]

Fen[wick's] paper, and that the report came from my Lady M[ary] Fen[wick]. He is quite given up by the Court, from whence he expected his support. The King publicly said in his bedchamber that Monmouth had been with him an hour and a half in his closet, and talked all the time; when he had done, the King said "Very well, my Lord," and so left him. The King said he told this because he heard that Monmouth had given a large account of what had passed between them there, but if he told more than this it was a lie, as all was that he said of him in the House of Lords. The King sent a message to the House of Lords this morning, before Smith's papers were read, to acquaint them that Shrewsbury had told him all that had passed between his Grace and Smith.

[P.S.] The King passed Sir John Fen[wick's] Bill yesterday, and it is thought he will suffer the next week.

GODOLPHIN to SHREWSBURY.

[16]96-7, Jan. 16.—"I trouble your Grace with the enclosed copy of an Address or representation [to] the King, as it was drawn this morning by the Committee in order to be presented to the House of Lords for their approbation upon Monday, because I think it will be the shortest as well as the fullest account of the close of those examinations which have so long depended there in relation to my Lord Monmouth. This matter held us last night till it was so very late, that my Lord Keeper [Somers] had only time to acquaint the House that he had a letter of your Grace's to acquaint them with. They have agreed to go upon it Monday, which I hope will put as good a conclusion to that part of this troublesome matter as there seems to be for the present of the other.

"It would be endless to repeat to you all the idle and frivolous impertinencies as well as the strange and extravagant madneses and contradictions which we have heard upon this occasion. There were about twelve or thirteen dissenting Lords to the second vote recited in the enclosed paper, viz., Duke of Bolton, Duke of Newcastle, Earl of Oxford, Earl of Warwick, Earl of Stanford, Earl of Mecclesfield, Earl of Warrington, Earl of

---

Sandwich, Lord Delawarr, Lord Fitzwater, Lord Dursley, Lord Raby, Lord Herbert; and Lord Haversham would have been of the same mind, but was absent.

“My Lord Gr[eat] Chamberlain [Earl of Lindsey] having not taken occasion to say anything to me since my last to your Grace, I shall say no more to him till I hear whether you have any farther directions to give me in that matter.”

HEN. GUY to [SHREWSBURY].

1696[-7], Jan. 16, London.—“I have not troubled your Grace with my letters, both because I still heard how your health stood from my enquiry at your house, and likewise because you knew exactly from other hands how all things went in the House of Lords, where I was not capable of doing you much service, but what I could was faithfully employed for you.

“But the matter being now determined there, I cannot in duty forbear to congratulate your Grace, that your innocence is at last rescued from the malice of ill men, and I can assure you, that not only your friends, but all (who have the stamp of an honest character) do truly rejoice in it, as a right to common justice as well as to yourself.

“There are many particulars fit for your knowledge, which must be deferred till your indisposition will permit us the honour of seeing you here, which I hope may not be very long.” . . .

[COLONEL] GUS. HAMILTON to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]96[-7], Jan. 16, Athlone.— . . . “Being informed by my friends in London that Mr. Pendergrasse is like to get a grant of that estate that by your Grace’s recommendation the King was pleased to give me a custodium of about two years ago, with a promise of a further grant, occasions this. . . . Being remanded hither upon the apprehension of an invasion, before I had the opportunity of laying my case before the King, I must have recourse to your Grace, and represent to you that, before I had the honour of carrying the King’s commission, I was as early and as effectually in his service as any gentleman in Ireland, and more exposed in his service before Duke Shoneberg landed than in all the service of Ireland after, though I had the honour to command the Grenadeers at the storming of Athlone. . . . I was at a considerable trouble and charge in discovering concealments of that estate, and having inquiries to invest it in the King. I have likewise repaired the mansion-house, [and] built two mills and several houses upon waste lands, to encourage Protestant tenants.” . . .

WHARTON to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]96-7, Jan. 20, Whitehall.—“I gave your Grace so tedious and so long an account of the proceedings before our House the last time I writ, that I ought for that reason to give you now as little trouble as 'tis possible.

“There is very little can be told you, but to repeat the votes that have been agreed to this morning, which Mr. Vernon will send to you, and will at the same time, I suppose, let your Grace know that the House with all the readiness in the world came into the motion that was made for the first question; which being foreseen by the Marquess of Normanby (who is no very ill guesser at the temper of the House), he thought fit to go away before the end of the Report which my Lord Rochester made of Mr. Smith's papers, which were referred to a Committee the day before.

“'Tis not possible for me, or for anybody, to guess what the Lord [Monmouth] in the Tower designs to do next; the conjectures upon the matter are so extravagant that nobody can imagine what his warm head will aim at. He is certainly the first that ever endeavoured to make friends (which 'tis said he endeavoured to do) to be impeached by the House of Commons. I rather think he will be at last glad to be off of this matter, and that he will petition, and submit to the King and to the House, too soon (for himself I mean) rather than too late.

“The expectation that we may reasonably have now of warmer weather makes me hope that your Grace will recover apace, and that we shall quickly see you here.”

G. BRIDGES to SHREWSBURY.

1696[-7], Jan. 20, London.—Congratulates his Grace on the justice the House of Lords have done him. Some Lords would have stopped it if they could. Lord Monmouth has desired the Lord Keeper to use his interest with the King not to displace him. Saw the King at Kinsington yesterday, who asked after his Grace's health with much kindness and concern. Shrewsbury's enemies are greatly disappointed at Smith and Hewett being discharged. Saw Lady Shrewsbury in town today.

SUNDERLAND to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] Jan. 21.—“I believe you will be satisfied with what has passed in both Houses of Parliament relating to yourself, and I hope they will soon do as well for the public; but it is impossible to be alone and seek (sic) in the country without spleen; therefore, for God's sake, come to us as soon as you are able. Besides the advantage that I am confident it will be to your health, it will be a great satisfaction to your friends, and most particularly to,” &c.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Jan. 21-31, Bruxelles.—“Our weather is here very dry and very cold, and I am glad of it, because I have not so much apprehensions from all the force of our enemies, for any of our quarters, as I have for your Grace's health.

"The courier from Vienne, which was so long expected, is arrived at the Hague, but does not bring anything which can I think advance much the negotiations which are there. I have told your Grace that the Imperialists did at first demand the simple restitution of Lorraine, without any restriction. The French would not promise that, nor enter upon the treaty upon those terms. Then they desired that the business of Lorraine should not be any ways mentioned in the préliminaires, but left entire to the time of treaty; that was agreed to by everybody. Then the Imperialists changed their minds, and would again have the restitution of Lorraine put into the préliminaires. It was done so also, but in such terms as they do not like; and therefore by this courier they do now desire that if the business of Lorraine cannot be adjusted in such terms as they desire in the préliminaires, they are contented to pass forward, on condition the Allies will promise that the said affair shall be [the] first which shall be resolved on at the general treaty. There we now stand.

"This courier brings no consent about the place of treaty. All those who are inclinable to end this affair are very earnest to treat at the Hague, in hopes to save the hazards of this campaign, which will not be possible if they treat anywhere else. 'Tis very plain that the Imperialists do make all the delays which they can in a business which they have interest to dispatch, but such is our misery that we have Allies, who can neither make war nor peace.

"We have here the merriest Court on earth; balls and comedies every night, and nothing to do all day. We are in some apprehensions that our enemies will attempt something early, perhaps the siege of Namur; but let the King of England and the States look to it."

G. BRIDGES TO SHREWSBURY.

1696[-7], Jan. 25, London.—Received his Grace's of the 23rd, with one enclosed to Lady Shrewsbury. Is glad to hear that he can ride on horseback. Has been told by Sir Thomas Southwell of a new commission going for Ireland, including Lord Galloway and Lord Clifford, and that Sir Joseph Williamson or the writer has been named for the third, but that Williamson's being appointed plenipotentiary was an objection to him. Requests his Grace to write a line in his own behalf to the King or Mr. Keppell, the new Lord Albemarle, to secure the position, the latter being inclined to make Bridges some return for bringing in the Bill for his naturalisation. This post would be a great advantage to him, as it would give him an opportunity of settling his own affairs in Ireland, which are in disorder.

THE EARL OF ROCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1696-7, Jan. 26, Whitehall.—“I was extremely surprised that there could be so advantageous an account given to your Grace of the small share I had in serving you in the House of Lords, as to occasion so very obliging a return of it in your letter of the 23rd; but I am very sensible of that honour, and extremely pleased that I had the good fortune to do anything that hath been so kindly taken by you, to whom I have long had all inclinations of true service; and though I have not the vanity to think I have been at all useful to you, because you had so many friends, and so few and so little enemies, yet it is a very great satisfaction that it hath procured me the assurance of your friendship, which I will ever endeavour to preserve.”

SHREWSBURY TO MR. HILL.

1696-7, Jan. 30, Eyford.—“I have yours of the 10-20 and 21-31 of Jan. I doubt, if the Emperor’s Minister be so backward towards coming to a treaty of peace, it will prove like one restive coach-horse in a set—spoil the rest. There is no question but treating at the Hague would gain time, which, considering the season of the year, is very precious. If the campaign opens and action follows, all that has been thus long doing may be to be begun again, by the success of one day on either side.

“Though I am confident such hearty good wishes as yours must do one good, yet notwithstanding I am still in this dismal place. The physicians assure me that with patience I am out of all danger, but they require more time, which I perceive I must submit to.

“By some French letters I understand the late King James has prepared another Declaration, and also a letter to be presented to the Ministers of the Allies as soon as they meet at the treaty of peace. If either of these come to your hands before they are public here, you will oblige me in letting me see them by the first opportunity. When they are printed, it is probable they will be dispersed among the English Papists in Flanders.”

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Feb. [2-]12, n.s., Hague.—“By the enclosed your Grace will see the progress we have lately made in our negociation. I must add to it that the States have given a passport for the French Ambassadors to come to Delft, though the place of treaty is not yet agreed on, and have named Boreel, Dyckvelt, and Van Haren plenipotentiaries for the Peace; it is thought they will have no other character, if the treaty is at the Hague, to avoid some disputes which may happen in some of the assemblies whereof they are members. I hope this business will continue to advance as it has done for these two last weeks, that I may have often something to entertain your Grace with."

R. 5 [Feb.] 96.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696-7, Feb. 4-14, Anvers.—“If the Houses of Parliament and the just opinions of mankind could as easily restore your Grace's health, as they do vindicate your honour, we should all be much happier than we are; but I hope a warm spring and a good rest of youth still will bring your Grace to London, at least before the King comes away.

“The foundations of a peace do now appear above ground, as you will see by the enclosed paper. The Imperialists have not yet consented to treat at the Hague, but insensibly they will come into it. The States of Holland have so much to lose, and Old England so little to gain, by the continuance of the war; the Courts of Madrid and Vienne are so slow, for their own reasons; the conditions which France offers so reasonable in the ————<sup>o</sup> we are now in; all the advantages of the peace are so entirely for the good of Spain and the Empire; our enemies are so forward in their preparations this spring; we and our Allies so backward; our enemies are likely to be so superior everywhere this summer; that we are very ill advised if we do not endeavour to prevent the dangers of the campaign, which cannot be done unless the King and the States will sign the peace immediately, and bid the rest sign. This is a little brusque, my Lord, but 'tis a coup d'état which is necessary perhaps. I do not foresee that the peace will go on faster for our having a Mediator who has a slow minister at the Hague, and will make delays for many reasons.

“I am told that King James has printed a manifest at Paris, but though I am assured of it from one who saw it I cannot yet procure a copy of it. I send today an account which I received from France of a servant of the Duke of Berwyck, who is it seems coming from Paris to murder our Sovereign, &c. I do not believe all these designs which are reported perhaps, but we must do just as if we did. I am forced once more to go to Flanders this cruel weather. I carry with me my constant vows for your Grace's speedy recovery.”

[SHREWSBURY].

1696-7, Feb. 6.—Religious exhortations. Speaks of his “veneration” for the Duke. “In the end of October last I felt something, I know not what, moving me to pray with great earnestness for you, more than ordinary, for I assure your Grace I could not hinder myself from praying for you these eight years, more or less. I have felt it, since October, often so strong as to make me rise out of my bed in the night to pray for you, and this has held me ever since.” . . . .

HEN. GUY to [SHREWSBURY].

1696[-7], Feb. 6, London.—“I received the honour of your Grace’s of the 1st instant. As to the endeavours of that Lord to do you ill offices with your friends, it may not only be justly suspected, but indeed believed; after what the world sees he hath done to you, nothing can be thought improbable from him.

“But the Lord, our friend, hath directed me to acquaint your Grace, that you know what arts that Lord did use to give our friend ill impressions of you last summer, and that he was so plain with him in that point at that time, that he thinks he remained convinced that no such tricks would have any effect on him; for he never attempted it since, or if he had, he would have found it in vain, because he very well knew the man who offered at it, and because he will ever believe your friendship as firm to him as his shall certainly be to you.

“For myself, I thank God I never had that which may be called an acquaintance with him, and therefore neither did nor could hear any such thing from him; nor do I find it otherwise with the rest of your friends. I am extremely joyed that you begin to think of London, and do hope that though by your stay you will come with more sun to us, yet that you will come somewhat faster to us than he doth; I am sure you will be as welcome as he to all who love you.”

SHREWSBURY to the BISHOP OF SALISBURY.

1696-7, Feb. 10, Eyford.—Thanks for his letter of the 6th. Has had for the last four months leisure for serious reflection. Is coming to town, when he desires to converse with the Bishop. Wishes to know of a book on “the reasonableness of believing our revealed Religion.” Mr.<sup>s</sup> Vernon will send it down.

not all of a piece; some of the thoughts are fine, but not true, yet the whole is excellent. Grotius is so common that I think I need not name his book of the truth of the Christian Religion; but since a physician ought to regard the patient's taste as well as temper, I have sent one book to Mr. Vernon, that will I fancy come nearer a way that your Grace may be disposed to follow and approve of than any other. There are some things in it of which I do not quite approve, but I am afraid your Grace may be disposed to like it the better for those very particulars; yet the main is nobly treated and well pursued. I desired likewise Mr. Vernon to cause enquire for a French book of Mr. Le Clerc's de l'Incrédulité.

"We are all a-longing to see your Grace here; it will give a reviving to everything; but after all I wish you may not begin it too soon for your health. . . .

[P.S.] "The King has ordered a Chapter for giving E. Portland the Garter on Friday next."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1696-7, Feb. 15-25, Anvers.—"I humbly thank your Grace for the honour of a letter of the 30th past, which I received here, and for the good news of your recovery. If your physicians require patience, I hope your Grace will have it, for the nation has had a great deal, and had need of a good deal this winter, upon your Grace's account.

"I have seen, my Lord, an imperfect abstract of the late King's Manifest, which was shown at Paris to the public ministers, and was designed to be given in to the Mediator, at the treaty for a general peace. It begins with an apology, and that he cannot be silent at this conjuncture without prejudice to his honour and interests. It insinuates something of a proposition made to entail the Crown of England upon the Prince of Wales after the death of the present possessor, which the late King rejects as very contrary to his honour and conscience; yet I believe that proposition was is<sup>o</sup> what they would gladly have to be made. I hope to have a copy of the manifest this week, and to send it to your Grace; but I find it is so little approved, even at Paris, that the Court of St. Germain's does already disown it, and they are preparing another.

"The negotiations at the Hague go forward, but the whole House of Austria is restive, as your Grace does call it. They have indeed some reason, because the King of Spain's health is very uncertain, and they would be glad to have all the world in arms at his death. The Court of Vienna have not yet consented to treat at the Hague, and Count Kaunitz gave in a contra-declaration to the Mediator, after that Calliere had dictated the préliminaires, which is in effect a protestation against all that was then done. Now Count Kaunitz and Don Quiros have taken occasion to go to Bruxelles, as if there was nothing to be done at the Hague. The first comes to get the Elector of Bavaria's consent to the ninth Electorat, which the House of Lunebourg would gladly get settled before the peace. The other comes upon the pretence of receiving orders from the Elector, which he never designs to obey. In the mean time Mons. Dyckvelt and Calliere go on at the Hague; the States make all the haste they can possibly to come to a conclusion; and if they are blamed, as they were at Nimegue, for precipitating affairs, they will lay the fault on England.

"I have given a passport, my Lord, to the young Earl of Fingall, and to young Conte Taaff, nephew to the Lord Carlingford, who has married the fair Lady Emelie Plunket, that they may go to London, because they come not from France.

[P.S.] "The French plenipotentiaries were to come away from Paris last week. My Lord Athlone sent their passports to Mons; the Governor of that place sent 'em to Mons. Barbesieurs; at which the Secretary of State pour les affaires étrangers, and the plenipotentiaries themselves, were offended, and the dispute lasted two days. The Court of France is not contented with the young Duchess of Burgoine; so is froward and peevish.

"I just now receive advice from Ostende that a whole fleet of 20 merchantmen, coming from Ireland, were taken within sight of that place, by a squadron of 15 capers of Dunkerque."

HEN. GUY to [SHREWSBURY].

1696[-7], Feb. 16, London.—"The occasion of this is by the command of my Lady Sunderland, who hath ordered me to acquaint your Grace that the Secretary[ship] of Jamaica hath been possessed by one Mr. Harris, of Worcestershire, for about twenty years, and he hath acted there by a deputy all the time, and that he is now in an infirm condition; and that this office being in your Grace's gift as first Secretary of State, she entreats the favour of you that when it doth become vacant you would please to bestow it upon a friend of hers, one Mr. John Baber—he is not related to Sir John, though of the name—and that she shall always acknowledge the obligation if she may obtain from you the reversion for him. I do know so far of him, that he hath a very good character, both for understanding and integrity. I am extremely glad at the hopes we have here of seeing you in London by or before the latter end of this month.

"I wrote an answer to your last some days since."

R. 18. Ansd. 20.

There is another letter on this subject, dated 23 Feb.

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1697, [Feb. 23-] March 5, n.s., Hague.—"I should sooner have acknowledged the honour of your Grace's of the 30th of Jan. had our negociation produced anything worth troubling you with, or that related to England, which has now happened in the business of the passports, where it was thought that some difficulty might arise in regard of his Majesty's titles. To prevent it I have spoke to the Mediator to take care that his Majesty's titles receive no prejudice in the passports or any other act in the treaty. I told him that the French would never be suffered to make any distinction between his Majesty and the rest of the Allies, and that his Majesty would treat France in every point as France treated his Majesty.

"Upon this the Mediator has spoke to Mons. Callieres, who has consented to give the Ministers of his Majesty blank passes, as to the Ministers of the rest of the Allies. He likewise said he thought it reasonable that every packet-boat should have a pass for the vessel, her equipage, and for the letters she carries, merchandises and passengers excepted; but to this he would not consent without an order from his Court, which he would write for. By this agreement the packet (as a courier) may be stopped to see if she has not passengers and merchandises on board, but is not to be detained above an hour at most, nor led out of her way. The Mediator, in discourse with Mons. Callieres, mentioned a pass for my Lord Pembroke and Sir Jo. Williamson, but [it] was not found practicable, according to the article in the preliminaries about owning his Majesty, so that a good convoy is thought the best expedient in this affair.

"The Mediator has spoke to Mons. Callieres of the business of Lorrain, but as yet cannot get it upon better terms than France has already offered it. In speaking of this business, the Mediator assured Mons. Callieres that the Allies would never hearken to an equivalent for Straesbourg.

"The French except against the Emperor's bearing the title of Landgrave of Alsatia in his plein-pouvoirs, and say that his Imperial Majesty has never used it in any act since the Peace of Westphalia. This will be easily known, and easily adjusted by a declaration from the Mediator, that the taking a title by any prince shall not prejudice the pretension that any other can have to it.

"Our letters from Vienne say nothing yet of the Emperor's consent for the Hague, and those from Stockholm say that the mediation has been there required and accepted by that King. The French are expected in eight or ten days at Delft."

R. 6th, o.s.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [Feb. 26-] March 4, n.s., Bruxelles.—"I do send your Grace here enclosed the manifest, or Memoire, which comes from Paris, and which is so very weak, and violent at the same time, that it is not difficult to answer every line of it.

"I have had opportunity to ha[u]nt the Conte de Kaunitz and Conte de Quiros here a good deal these five days, for being ordered to assist the first about the admission of Bohemia into the Electoral College, we have been much together. I find these gentlemen still farther from any inclination to peace than I did imagine. The Imperialists will never consent to treat at the Hague, though the French commissioners are actually on the road thither. The Spaniard still talks of the treaty des Pyrenées, and that the Allies are engaged to procure that treaty for his Master. The one and the other do declare they do not acquiesce in Mr. Dyckvelt's préliminaires; that they hope good success from this campaign; and that they are sure their masters will continue the war alone, if England and Holland should leave them. In the mean time Don Quiros is afraid that Bar[c]elone and all the rest of Catalognia will be lost. He owns that his King and all Madrid desire a peace, yet he continues his aversion to it.

“We have here a perfect thaw, but so gentle and regular that I hope it will not alter your Grace's health.”

R. 6th, o. s., 1696-7.

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1696-7, Feb. 27, Eyford.—“I have yours of the 14th and 25th to acknowledge. I think the declaration Cagliariere has made is not only a very considerable step towards the peace, but an extreme advantageous one to his Majesty, that the world may know what relates to him will not obstruct the conclusion of the peace, if all other matters can be agreed.

“Though it be most probable there is little truth in what you are informed concerning the D[uke] of Berw[ick's] servant, yet I make no question but you take the best care to seize him in his passage, or to give us such notice as may enable us to do it here.

“In two or three days I shall try to remove towards London, for though my bleeding is not quite stopped, yet I find myself so much better since the warm weather, that I hope I shall be able to endure the journey.”

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1697, March [9-]19, n.s., Hague.—“I am to return your Grace my humblest thanks for the favour of yours of the 29th past from Eyford, and at the same time to express my joy for your safe arrival at London. I hope the air of that place will contribute to the confirmation of your health, as your presence will to the good of the King's affairs. I believe in a little time I shall be able to give your Grace some account of our advancing in the business here, the French Ambassadors being come to Delft, and we having some assurance that by the next letters we shall receive the Emperor's answer concerning the place” [of treaty].

R. 13, o.s., 1696-7.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, March 9-19, Rotterdam.—“I cannot but rejoice at the good news of your Grace's safe arrival at London, and I wish the change of air may not alter the present constitution of your health.

Your King and country must dispense with a good deal of your Grace's usual application to business, and must be content to husband the strength and forces of a person who is to serve 'em both for many years.

"I have been at the Hague, my Lord, not to look into the negotiations of the peace, but to endeavour to make some preparations for the campaign. Our Army is indeed in an ill condition, and would be in a worse, I fear, if the hopes of peace, or the fear of being suddenly disbanded, did not support some of our officers in their duty, and drive some others into it. We must observe that the King has put his Army to a good trial. I have not been able to do much at the Hague; something I have done. The chief of the Spanish and Imperial Ambassadors are not yet come back from Bruxelles, and 'tis very visible that they, and most of the other ministers, will endeavour to make the negotiations of peace last as long as the war has done. I see men hard at work to fit up the house at Ryswick, though no consent is yet come to treat there. However, the French are to be tonight at Delft, and I hope the peace will be made before any place be named for treaty, or before the parties concerned are consulted. I hope they they will be called only to sign. I do believe the Spaniards are treating for a neutrality in Catalogne, and I believe the Imperialists are treating a marriage between the King of the Romans and Mademoiselle.

"I am going back to my post at Anvers or Bruxelles."

R. 13, o.s.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, March 15-25, Anvers.—"I am just come from Flanders, and am very weary, but I must have the honour to write to your Grace.

"The Conte de la Tour, envoyé of Savoye, has been some time at Bruxelles, and is now here. I find he is to go to the place of congress, so soon as the treaty is begun, as plénipotentiaire from his Royal Highness. I find the little cunning body has used his endeavours to be as well as he can with our King, in hopes to meet no opposition from his Majesty or the States for including the peace of Savoye in the guaranty of the general peace.

"I find the little man has wrote to the King, and sent a letter to his Majesty from his Royal Highness. I find he wrote also more than once to the Pentionaire, but that he has received no answer. I find he had a design to go to London with his old character, if his Majesty had made any answer to the letters of his R. H., or if the Pentionaire had given him such an answer as he expected. I find he is now in pain how to behave himself at the treaty. He says his master has as much inclination as ever to be well with his Majesty, and would not willingly be forced to throw himself into the arms of France. Perhaps it is also the interest of our King not to force him to it; perhaps the Duke of Savoye is now capable of being a better ally than he was, since he has got all he could expect from France, and got his fetters off—I mean Pignerol and Casal. Perhaps his Majesty may think so, when his resentments are a little worn off. However, it is worth your Grace's consideration, whether the Duke of Savoye's minister shall be at the Hague amongst the Allies, or at Delft with the French ministers. This little man has said so much to me that I could not say less to your Grace, and I know he will be impatient to see what answer your Grace will make to me.

"I have long since taken the liberty to advise your Grace that great diligence was used to open the trade between France and Holland, even before the peace is made. I believe it will be hard to prevent the covetousness and impatience of the merchants, unless his Majesty will order his men-of-war to visit all ships laden with French goods, whether with passports or not.

"I am assured that Don Quiros has received fresh orders from Madrid, to require (sic) the Mediator at the Hague, and to make no difficulties to the advancing the negotiations.

"Amongst some chansons de Noël, as they call 'em, sent from Paris, I find this enclosed."* 1696-7, March 16, the Lodge in Hide Park.—"You may have reason to wonder that I date a letter from your own house, without having your Lordship's leave to be there, but I depended so much on your goodness to me, that having satisfied myself my Lady Orkney would make no use of it for the present for herself or family, and being of the greatest convenience imaginable in my present condition, I have ventured to come hither before I had your consent, for which I hope I shall have your Lordship's excuse.

SHREWSBURY TO MR. HILL.

1696-7, March 16, the Lodge in Hide Park.—"What you mention in yours of the 9th, n.s., from Rotterdam, makes me more than ever wish the peace may be speedily concluded. If all parties are striving for the best market, it is most reasonable his Majesty should look more watchfully about him. His affairs abroad did never so absolutely require his presence as in this conjuncture, and he is so sensible of it, that I presume he does not design to delay his journey the first moment the affairs in Parliament will permit him."

1697, March 23, Hide Park Lodge.—“I have laid your letter of the 15-25 before his Majesty, whose resentment for the Duke of Savoy’s past behaviour is not so over, as to allow his directing any formal answer to the Pre[sident] la Tour; but I perceive he thinks it so much the interest of Europe, by despair, not absolutely to throw the Duke of Savoy into the Fre[nch] hands, that his Majesty believes it will be necessary he should be included in the general peace, and allows you to say so as your own opinion, but not as by direction from him.

“The several interests and designs of the ministers at the Hague will draw so many different ways, that it were much to be wished his Majesty could soon be near the place, for if his presence cannot, nothing else will unite them.”

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1697, [March 23-] April 2, n.s., Hague.—“I have the favour of your Grace’s letter of the 16th March from Hide Park; it is impossible that anything would make me like that place more than the thought that it is any way convenient to you, and I shall like it for ever if it does contribute to your health.

“I thank your Grace most particularly for what you were pleased to say to my sister in the affair of Ireland. I depend upon your friendship in it, and I shall sincerely study to deserve it.

“I wish I could inform your Grace that our treaty advanced faster. The Imperialists continue to insist upon superfluous trifles, which proceed only from a false interpretation they make of some words in the preliminaries, but their way of cavilling shows that their real design is to defer the whole. The French, on the other side desire to save the expense of the campaign. If they would be a little more reasonable in the point of Lorraine, I should see no great obstacle that ought to hinder a speedy conclusion. It is very strange, this conduct of the House of Austria; whilst one branch of it seems, of all the Allies, the least willing to comply, the other tells us that except we send a squadron into the Mediterranean, nothing can save Catalogne but a neutrality.

“I send your Grace a new declaration we have from St. Germain’s; I doubt whether the Bishop of Salisbury will think it worth answering.”

R. Mar. 26, o.s.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [March 25-] April 4, n.s., Bruxelles.—“ I humbly thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 16th, though I have scarce time to do it. Our Elector sent an express last night to the King. I believe, amongst other things, that his Highness sends his despatches from Madrid, by which he was ordered to press our King for a squadron to secure the coasts of Catalonia; if that cannot be granted immediately, then his Highness is to let our King see the necessity of accepting a neutrality on that side; after which his Highness is to press the negotiations for the general peace, and to desire the King in the mean time to procure a cessation of arms, if possible.

“ The Court of Spain seems now in haste, that of Vienna is still resty (sic). The Imperialists demand new préliminaires before that they will consent to the place of treaty; but if the rest of the Allies can agree upon any terms with France, the Spaniards will now join with them, even against the Imperialists.

“ ’Tis certain, my Lord, that the King’s affairs here are in so nice a condition, that every day we run new dangers. We cannot keep our Army together much longer without money; and if any great disorder happens, as I fear it may, every day, I believe there’s an end of all hopes of peace.”

SHREWSBURY to VILLIERS.

1697, March 26, Hide Park.—“ I am extremely obliged to you for your kind wishes for my health, and to your house for the good air which contributes much towards it.

“ I do not like the news your Lordship sends about your apprehension of a neutrality agreed in Catalonia. It ought to make our King sensible, that other Princes will sometimes consider their interests before their engagements, though he is so scrupulous as to act otherwise.

“ I have not yet had leisure to read the late King’s second Memorial, which your Lordship has sent me, though I hear by those that have, it is esteemed not better than the first.

“ I have here enclosed sent your Lordship the description of an English officer, whose visits to one of the Fr[ench] plenipotentiaries has given some suspicion of his fidelity. If by the enclosed paper it could be discovered who the person is, it might be reasonable to enquire further into his character, and more narrowly observe his actions.

I am also assured that the Mediator has undertaken this matter, and I wish him good success.

“QUESTIONS PROPOSED by the LORDS' COMMISSIONERS to the ADMIRALTY.”*

1697, March 31, Wednesday.—“Ordered by the Lords' Committees appointed to consider the Answer of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, pursuant to the order of the House of the 27th of November last, that the said Commissioners do on Monday next, at eleven of the clock in the morning, in the Prince's Lodgings near the House of Peers, lay before their Lordships answers in writing to the questions following (viz.):—

“Why did you continue your orders from the 3rd to the 24th of March 95-6 to Sir George Rook for his sailing into the Downs, when, besides your conjectural knowledge (as some of your Board termed it), you received certain notice from the Duke of Shrewsbury, upon the said 24th of March, that the King had sent for the Fleet to return from Cadiz the 27th of January before, besides the directions given you by his Majesty at Kensington, March the 1st, for the lodging orders for Sir George Rook at Portsmouth and Plymouth?”

“What was the reason why you did not agree with the reasons given you by Sir George Rook, in his letter of the 23rd April, 1696, for his going into Spithead rather than coming into the Downs?”

“Why you ordered Sir George Rook to send one ship only into Spithead, and whether then any orders did lie at Portsmouth for Sir George, and what those orders were?”

“How the Fleet which was in the Downs when Sir George Rook came thither, came to be in such unreadiness, both as to men and provisions, as Sir George Rook complains of in divers letters, and particularly the 30th of April and 2nd of May, 1696?”

“What danger would it have been to the kingdom to have sent the Fleet in the Downs, April 11th, 1696, to Torbay or before Brest?”

“What did you in order to the intercepting the fleet of French merchant-men bound to St. Mallo's and Haver de Grace, &c., of which notice was given you by Sir George Rook's letter dated the 22nd April, 1696?”

“Math. Johnson,

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, April 1-11, Bruxelles.—“I had the honour to write to your Grace the last post, since when we have no letters from England. I find since then several marks by which the Spaniards show the great haste they are in either for a peace or a cessation of arms, or a neutrality in Catalognia. The last is what they will certainly obtain first, though I believe it is what they desire least. Our Elector has wrote again to his minister at the Hague, to press the Mediator as much as is possible about obtaining a cessation of arms. However, we have little hopes of success therein, for if the French are in earnest desirous of a peace (as we believe they are), and the Imperialists seeking all the delays they can, such a cessation would give more advantage to the Imperialists than the French do desire. Besides, the French are the most ready to take the field, and are pretty sure to live upon their enemies during the campaign, or upon those countries which they must restore. Moreover, we have made some movements here in Braband and Flanders which have awakened the enemies; they are now stirring, and the King's household is ordered to march towards Mons. In a very few days we shall see if there be any hopes of a cessation; if such a thing should be, I hope the King would not make any haste over.

"Our Elector is going today to Gand, to visit the posts and the canals, where his Highness is like to spend the summer.

"I must pray your Grace to consider whether the people of England does not amuse itself, when they think to get service from an army here which has seven months pay due to 'em."

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1697, April 2, Hide Park Lodge.—"I have yours of the 4th n.s., and am glad you think the Spaniards are now disposed to agree to reasonable terms of peace, even though the Imperialists should be in a contrary disposition. I could never imagine what should make them fond of a war they are so little capable to make any defence or figure in, and so averse to a peace, by which more is to be restored to them than to the rest of the Allies all together. I am confident his Majesty will make an effort to send a squadron to the Med[iterranean], rather than he will consent that a neutrality should be agreed in Catalonia. It would be very hard upon England and Holland that a cessation is to be made in all places but just where we are at the expense of supporting the war.

"All possible means are using here to get ready money to furnish the Army abroad, and I hope they will not by their impatience spoil all they have been fighting for these eight years.

"His Majesty commands me to send you the enclosed copy<sup>o</sup> of Mr. Stepney's letter to the Pensioner of Holland, which gives an account of the backwardness there appears in the Circle of Bavaria to comply with the treaty of Association concluded by the six Circles at Francfort in January last. His Majesty thinks this Association of so great concern to the public, that he would have you use your endeavours to dispose the Elector of Bavaria, 1697, April 11, Kensington.—“King, Archbishop, Prince, Lord Portland, Lord Keeper, Mr. Secretary, Lord Privy Seal, Shrewsbury, Mr. Russell.

PRIVY COUNCIL MINUTES.

“Present to Algiers to go with the first ships to the Straits, and the Admiralty to have notice.

“Consul Cole’s letter was read, praying to be paid for the sattie lost, and the bill of disbursements. Mr. Baker answering for the truth, I am ordered to allow Mr. Cole’s bill.

“Skinner bills allowed by order of his Majesty.

“Three hundred pounds to be allowed Mr. Broughton upon account, till his bill be further considered.

“Consul of Alicant’s bill to be allowed.

“The instructions to the Consuls about seamen cast away was filled up by his Majesty’s direction as it is now sent. Mr. Secretary to have a copy.

“The petition of the officers of the Marine was read, and no order upon it.

“If the town of Wexford under their corporation seal will empower any person to consent that judgment should be entered against them, then his Majesty will forbear entering it till such time as he has further considered what new charter to grant.

“And an intimation to the Justices in Ireland to take care that nothing grievous to the subject be inserted under the presence of their ancient privilege of fishing.

“Peter Cooke’s petition read, and he is to be reprieved for three weeks further.

“Mr. Russell gave his Majesty a paper, informing him the difficulties the Admiralty would lie under the next year from the Act of Parliament appointing so many cruisers, there being at this time so many employed of those rates on other services, that there do not remain enough at home to answer the service.

“Admiralty called in.

“I acquainted the King that the ships at Rochfort are working upon” (sic).

“His Majesty acquaints the Admiralty with a squadron intended for the Mediterranean.

“His Majesty desires a scheme to be laid before him before he goes, how the Fleet should act in these seas in case the French put out no main fleet this summer.

“The Admiralty are put in mind of the convoy for his Majesty’s voyage.

“His Majesty orders Capt. Addans’ (sic) ship to be brought up. I acquainted his Majesty and the Board with my suspicion that the taking this ship was by collusion.”

VILLIERS to SHREWSBURY.

1697, April [20-]30, n.s., Hague.—“It is with very great satisfaction that I understand by your Grace’s of the 26th past, that your health is better. I hope the air of the place where you are, and the season of the year advancing, may every day confirm it.

“Upon enquiry after the man whom your letter describes, I find the Pensioner had the like information with this circumstance, that the person has been with the French but once, which shows that there is care taken here to know what people frequent the French embassy, and upon this occasion I will have a very particular search made.

“The difficulties which the Imperial ministers made are now over, upon our promising to do our best to obtain that for them in the treaty which they insisted upon in the preliminaries; but we have new ones which we did not expect concerning the reunions made by the French since the treaty of Nimegue in the Catholic provinces. The Spaniard has given in a list of them, and we always understood that the French would give their answer, so that the Spaniard should know the contents of it before the entering upon the treaty; but they now refuse to give it in any other manner than some hours before the treaty be opened, and then only to the Mediator or Dutch plenipotentiaries. The reason they give that the Spaniard should not see it, is, lest they should make any objection so as to hinder the entering upon the treaty; but this a pure chicane, for they are assured that whatever their answer is, it would not have the effect they seem to fear.

“The King of Swede’s death does not interrupt Mons. Lilienroodt taking upon him the office of Mediator, and as such he is gone this afternoon to the French to try what accommodation may be made in the affair of these reunions. I fear we shall not come out of it with honour.

“I cannot give your Grace thanks enough for your kindness in relation to my own affairs. I have already found the good effects of your favour to me, and I always hope the continuance of it.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [April 22-]May 2, n.s., Anvers.—“I am to thank your Grace for the honour of two letters of the 23rd March and of the 2nd April, which I received here but yesterday.

“I have told Mons. de la Tour that your Grace had made me so favourable an answer to the letter which I wrote concerning his business at the Hague, that I believed he had reason to expect and hope for good success. I added, that I was so much persuaded that it was the interest of all Europe to keep his Royal Highness from falling entirely into the French hands, that I did not despair of seeing the King and his ministers of the same opinion at the Hague. I said no more to him; I perceived he was satisfied with this; but he hopes your Grace will make him some answer to the letters which he sent to the King and to your Grace, if they came safe.

"I received your Grace's orders about soliciting the Elector concerning the Association of the Six Circles, and I will go about it immediately. I am going this night to visit our camp by Bruxelles, and from thence I'll go to the Elector's camp to press his Highness, as far as I can, in a thing which is against his inclination and his own private interests.

"I do not doubt, my Lord, but all possible means are used for supporting our Army here, but I can assure your Grace that we are so far in arrear, and in debt, that both officer and soldier are put upon a dangerous trial. I fear our enemies will be more sensible of our necessities than our friends and Allies are; and though these last would not be persuaded to think it was time to treat, I fear the others will believe it is now time for them to continue the war. The King of Sweden is dead unseasonably. I hope the King will not bring any more battalions over hither, my Lord. I fear the Regency may have as much need of 'em in England as in Flanders.

[P.S.] "I sent Mons. de la Tour notice that his letters to the King and your Grace may be lost, and therefore he sends me the enclosed."

SHREWSBURY to VILLIERS.

1697, April 23, Hide Park.—"This morning I have your Lordship's of the 20-30, which I had not answered so soon, but to congratulate your being appointed one of the Lord Justices of Ireland, which his Majesty has just now commanded me to prepare a warrant for. The two joined with you are the Lords Winchester and Gallway.

"I have his Majesty's further directions to send you the enclosed paper, which is a state of a debt the King and the States General did engage to pay to the Prince of Danemarke upon an adjustment some years since made between the King of Danemarke and the Duke of Holstein, in consideration of some pretension the Prince quitted at that time, in order to facilitate the Treaty. This was negotiated between my Lord Nottingham and Mr. Dyckvelt, but though the States stand engaged to the King for the repayment of half this sum, yet the Prince of Danemarke would not resign his pretensions till his Majesty had engaged to his Highness for the whole. There may possibly be some occasion now to remind the States General of this engagement, but I have no orders to tell your Lordship to do so, but only that you put his Majesty in mind of it when he is on the place."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [April 26-] May 6, s.n., Gand.—“I came here to desire his Electoral Highness to consent, and to forward the good designs of the Association of the Six Circles, etc., as your Grace did direct me. I found his Highness very ready and very willing to promote so good a work, and he said so much to me about it-as if it was a thing which he desired passionately to see accomplished. I perceive only one difficulty which remains with his Highness, which is about the command of the troops which shall be raised and maintained by the Circles. He is content, he says, to see 'em commanded at present by Prince Lewis of Baden, because he is Prince of the Empire, and a Prince of extraordinary merit; but he is Lieutenant-General of the Emperor, and it will not be fit that the Emperor should name one of his own officers to command the associated armies of the Empire.

“I shall this day have a larger conference with some of the Elector's ministers about this matter; of which I shall give your Grace a full account. I must not omit that I told his Electoral Highness that the King has no manner of interest in this business, but only as it relates to the common good of the Empire and of Europe, &c., which has (sic) such an impression upon his Majesty that everything which contributes thereto is very agreeable to him, &c. To which his Highness answered, that he should endeavour to promote this design with so much more zeal, because it is agreeable to his Majesty.

“We are still camped here as we were, and the enemies begin to draw together. The Elector is yet in town here, having had a fever four days continually, which has weakened him a little, but at present it has quite left him.

“The last letters from the Hague make us believe the conferences will be opened in form tomorrow, or next day, at Ryswick. Mons. de Lillieroot does continue to act as Mediator. I believe there will be no interruption made by the death of the King of Sweden. Indeed, the Hollanders are properly the mediators; they act when the negotiators are as it were in committee, and Mons. Lillieroot resumes the chair to confirm what is agreed on. We have still some hopes here of a cessation of arms, which is the desire of the Spaniards.

“I sent to your Grace by last post a packet of letters from Mons. la Tour, of which I believe the originals were lost.”

ULYSSES BROWNE to SHREWSBURY.

[1697], April 28.—Has most likely been misrepresented to his Grace. Wrote with some heat to Colonel Talbot, but did not intend it for his Grace's perusal. Has had the birth and education of a gentleman. He has met with discouragement, but has had some encouragement from the Lord Keeper and [the Lord] Privy Seal. Cannot express the discouragement in writing, and so wishes to see his Grace. Is desired from Sir William [Trumbull]'s office to procure bail. The design is to cover the Earl of Monmouth's shame with the loss of the writer's reputation. If he had complied with the Earl, he would have had friends and encouragement, but now he has none, and his enemies are powerful.

On a slip of paper: “Several letters relating to the business of Brown and the Earl of Monmouth, in 1696-7.”

THE EARL OF MONMOUTH and ULYSSES BROWNE.

[1697, April 28.]—“The Information of Ulysses Browne, of the Inner Temple, gentleman.”

This relates to an assault on the Earl of Monmouth, on the road near Chealsey, as he was going to his country-house at Parsons Green, by Browne, his friend Col. Fitzgerald, and one Davis; to Browne's subsequent dealings with the Earl, and to a pretended design to carry off the Earl to France. The assailants first met at the house of Mons. Dubeau in St. Alban's Street, over against St. Alban's tavern. The guards of Chealsey interfered. The Earl afterwards said to Browne, "If it were such a man as Sir Stephen Fox, such a man I would rob with all my heart." The Earl's house in Arlington Street is mentioned; also Covent Garden, a new alley or street out of St. Martin's Lane into Castle Street, the Piazzas in Covent Garden, the outward gate, the neat-houses below Mill-bank, the outside of the town towards Marrow-bone, and Exeter Exchange corner.

Browne alludes to the supposed intention of Sir Peter Frazier to murder the Earl; also to the Countess of Monmouth, the Lord James Howard, Sir John Trant, Sir John Fenwick, the Marquis of Caermarthen, Mr. Kapell, the Earl of Ailsbury, the Lord Mongommery, the Lord Chief Justice Holt, "the Prince of Wales," her Royal Highness [Princess Ann], Col. Talbot, and others. Browne was apprehended by one Armstrong as a Proclamation-man.

7 pp., in Browne's hand, closely written, and endorsed: This information is fuller and more particular than my former. Also endorsed by Shrewsbury: R. Ap. 28, 97.

Also, the first draft of the same information (undated), with replies to objections by Lord Chief Justice Holt and Mr. Secretary Trumbull, and copies of Browne's letters to the Lord Chief Justice and to Sir William Trumbull, 10 March [1697], complaining of his imprisonment.

10 pp., in Browne's hand, closely written.

Also, many letters from Browne to Shrewsbury and others, in one of which he talks of settling in Flanders.

Also, several letters from Col. G. Talbot to Shrewsbury, relating to Browne.

G. BRIDGES to SHREWSBURY.

1697, April 29, London.—After he left the Duke this morning he met Sir Thomas Southwell, who said he would rather be a Commissioner of the Revenue in Ireland, as the Duke proposed, than Secretary. If the Duke will send a message for him, it will put his restless spirit at ease. Intends going to Avington on Monday with Lady Shrewsbury.

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1697, May [1-]11, s.n., at noon, Hague.—"We having no letters from England since our arrival here, there would be no occasion of troubling your Grace, were it not to give your Grace an account of the King's indisposition occasioned, I believe, by the great heats and crowd of business. His Majesty began to be out of order yesterday, and continues so at present, being somewhat feverish in the same manner as he was lately in England, which we hope may be without any further consequence. His Majesty has nevertheless for this reason put off his journey intended for this day to Zuylestein until Monday next.

“Your Grace will have an account of what passed at the Congress from our Plenipotentiaries.

[P.S.] “As there may be any alteration in the state of the King’s health your Grace may be assured of having immediate notice of it by express.”

“Since the writing of this his Majesty finds himself much better and the physicians are without any ill apprehensions, nor do they prescribe anything more to his Majesty than opening a vein when his business will give him leave.”

R. 4.

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

1697, May 1-11, Hague.—“I came hither to receive his Majesty’s orders; and am going back to Flanders. The King designed to go this day for Zulesteyn, and thence to Loo, but his Majesty was indisposed a little yesterday, did not sleep well this night, and has now put off his journey. I wish he may be well enough to go, as he designs, on Monday.

“The plenipotentiaries met on Thursday at Ryswyck in form. They visited the pleinpouvoirs of the French, of the Imperialists, Spaniards, and Hollanders. They made an act in form, by which it was declared, that no titles assumed by any prince should affect or prejudice another’s right. They adjourned till this day, and are now going to meet again. I could not perceive that the French made any difficulty, exception, or cavil, which might delay the negotiations one hour.

“We are told that the French will have three armies this year this way; one on the Meuse, another in Braband, the third in Flanders, under the Marshals de Villeroy, Catinat, and Bouff[1]ers.

“The King has told me that the ministers of Savoy shall be welcome here, and has given his orders about ’em to my Lord Pembroke and my Lord Villiers.”

SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

1697, May 3, Eyford.—“I was encouraged, by the discourse your Lordship and I had relating to Sir Tho. Southwell, to assure him I would make all the interest I could to get him made one of the Commissioners of the Revenue in Ireland, provided he would contentedly desist from his pretension of being Secretary. He has by my Lord Coningsby and Mr. Bridges assured me he shall be entirely satisfied, and would rather choose that employment than the other.” . . .

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, May [4-]14, Zuylestein, Tuesday.—“By my letter of Saturday last I acquainted your Grace with the state of the King’s health; since which time, after bleeding and other favourable evacuations, his Majesty has found a continual amendment, and setting out from the Hague yesterday, arrived here in the evening. His Majesty rid out this morning, eat his dinner very well, and is going abroad again this afternoon, so that, God be thanked, we judge his Majesty perfectly recovered. There is nothing of business offers."

R. 8.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, May 5, Eyford.—“I have received yours of the 27th April with the welcome news of his Majesty’s good passage and happy arrival in Holland. I was in hopes I might have had no occasion to give the King or yourself any trouble from this place, but it falls out that I cannot be silent without doing his Majesty a disservice, as well as breaking my own engagement.

“When my Lord Coningsby returned from Margate, I perceived he was extremely desirous that Sir Thomas Southwell should be Secretary to the Lords Jus[tices] of Ireland, and he pressed me so earnestly to speak about it that I could not avoid enquiring of my Lord Gallway how that matter stood, and found by him he had received such commands from his Majesty as made it not fit to press that pretension any further, but, at the same time, that the King was favourably disposed to gratify Sir Thomas Southwell in anything else in that kingdom which should be reasonable. My Lord Coningsby was possessed that Sir Thomas had a promise from my Lord Gallway, the prospect of which had hindered my Lord from soliciting his being a Commissioner of the Revenue in Ireland, which he hoped his Majesty was well inclined to grant him. Upon the whole matter I saw it was impossible Sir Thomas Southwell could be Secretary, and yet perceived the promise was so warmly insisted upon, and such dissatisfaction taken at the disappointment it had occasioned, that wishing to pacify all parties I did engage to use the small interest I had to endeavour that Sir Thomas might be one of the Commissioners of the Revenue in Ireland, upon condition he would quit his pretence to be Secretary. On these terms he has desisted, and considering how well qualified the gentleman is, how far my Lord Gallway and I am engaged (as I suppose he will acquaint his Majesty himself), and that nothing else could have hindered an unlucky division at the first setting out of these new Lords Justices, his Majesty will I hope be pleased to direct that he be now appointed a Commissioner there.

“I send you the enclosed extract of a letter from Mr. Hill, and desire it may be laid before his Majesty. It is an answer to what he commanded I should write, to press the Elector of Bavaria to forward the Association of the Six Circles.

“According to his Majesty’s command I have solicited my Lord Winchester to hasten his journey, and he has engaged to begin his journey the 18th of this month.”

I have yours of the 6th, n.s.; and by this post have given his Majesty an account of the Elector’s favourable answer concerning the Association of the Six Circles, though I doubt not but you will give him a more particular relation of it yourself, and of what you may have since learnt in discourse with the ministers of your Court.”

SHREWSBURY TO VILLIERS.

1697, May 8, Eyford.—“I am glad to hear the Treaty is opened without any appearance yet of affected difficulties or delays. I wish it may be happily concluded, and so soon, that you may see the end of it whilst you are spared out of Ireland.

“I thank your Lordship for the caution you give about the Prince’s debt. The person that spoke to me of it from the Prince did not mention it as if his Highness expected any present satisfaction, or thought himself at any time concerned to press the payment from the States, having his Majesty’s word for it, which he did singly depend upon, but he took himself to be obliged to put the King in mind of the engagement he was under, believing the conjuncture favourable for his Majesty to get the Dutch to put the part they have promised his Majesty to furnish in some way of payment, that the whole may not fall upon the King, as probably it will, without some care be taken before the Peace be concluded.

“I hope I am something better since I have got a little quiet here, but far from that state of health you so kindly wish me.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, May 8, Eyford.—“I have your letter of the 1-11, and cannot be free from all the apprehensions imaginable till the next letters arrive, which I hope will bring us the good news of his Majesty’s perfect health, and that so much misery and slavery is [are] not intended for Europe as in all probability the loss of him would occasion.

“If his Majesty’s health may make it proper for you to speak upon so trivial a subject as I am going to write, I desire he may be acquainted that, I suppose in the hurry of business at going away, he forgot to leave order with Mr. Lownds to pay 200*l.* as a piece of charity he was pleased to promise to a friend of Mr. Guy’s and mine. Their (sic) wants make the thing so pressing that I cannot avoid giving his Majesty this trouble in an unseasonable time, to beg he will give you orders to write to Mr. Lownds to pay the 200*l.* either to Mr. Guy or my order, and that one of us may have notice of it.

[P.S.] “I would rather the money were ordered to Mr. Guy, because my being out of town will occasion a week’s delay unnecessarily. The person for whom this money is solicited had an audience of his Majesty, and a promise of so much of his bounty.”

MR. HILL to SHREWSBURY.

1697, May 9-19, Anvers.—“I hope this will find your Grace deep in the country, where I hope nothing importunate or troublesome can find you. I now begin to fear that our campaign will go on faster in Flanders than the negotiations at Ryswyck. Our enemies have three armies this way. One is commanded by Bouflers, which assembles on the Sambre, and makes head to our Army, which is at present commanded by the Prince of Vaudemont, until the King comes up. Another is commanded by Mons. de Catinat, who observes the Elector in Flanders. The third is commanded by Mons. de Villeroy, who is at liberty to do what he will, either at Aath, Oudenarde, or Newport. He has at present actually invested Aath, but whether he will besiege or bombard that place only we know not; but I fear he may do as he will. The King’s horse were all marching towards Braband, but upon this motion of Mons. de Villeroy the Elector has stopped them, and they are gone back to Flanders. I am just going to Bruxelles, and to the Prince of Vaudemont’s camp. I hope your Grace will be well informed of all the steps which are made at Ryswyck. I will be sure to lose no occasion of telling your Grace what passes in the armies.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, May 17-27, Anvers.—“I am very much obliged to your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 5th, because it gives me assurances of your growing health, which I hope will be improved daily by good air, and quiet.

“We are here in the nicest situation imaginable. Everybody desires or wants a peace, and those who desire it least do so only because others desire it more. Yet spite, or folly, hinders those gentlemen at the Hague from doing anything to purpose. The Imperialists are now every day intrigued in ceremonies and pretensions, which delay what is more essential in the mean time. Aath is besieged, and our King could not forbear running that way, though there is little appearance of doing anything for the relief of the place, but by risking everything. The enemies are very strong, having all their forces within their reach. We are strong also, the King and the Elector being joined; but I do not perceive that the King or his generals are inclinable to play off the fortune of Europe at one throw. I believe they will rather expect the issue of some projects which are now on foot at the Hague, between the French and the Holland ministers, about a cessation of arms, which is treated very privately only betwixt them.

“I have told your Grace formerly that the Holland ministers are the true and real mediators at the Hague. The Swede has the character, and does act at Ryswyck, where the Imperialists and Spaniards, with the ministers of Lorrain and Cologne, did give in their pretensions to the Mediator the last day of the conferences. There is enough in those pretensions alone to employ the Mediator and the respective plenipotentiaries till Doomsday; but I hope a little good sense will cut and pare off great excrescences.

“The King is in perfect good health, as ever I have seen him.

“I might have told your Grace that one great difficulty at the Hague is about the character and treatment of ambassadors, which the Imperialists refuse to give to the ministers of the several Electors. The last insist that the practice at Munster and Nimegue was decisive in their favour; the Imperialists reply that what was done at Munster and at Nimegue was upon an order of the Emperor, in which was expressed pro hac vice, and will not treat the Electoral ministers as ambassadors now, unless they have another order pro hac vice.

“All the ministers were agreed with the Mediator that the guards by Reswyck should let pass none but those who came in coaches with six horses. The minister of Lorraine came, it seems, with two horses, and was excluded, till some minister with a better equipage come by, and took him up. I mention these things to show your Grace on what trifles the peace of the world is attending.”

HEN. GUY to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, May 18, London.—Received his letter of the 15th, and acquainted Lady Sunderland with its contents. She is greatly obliged by the kindness shown to her. “She entreats you to perfect the favour you have begun; for it is either in your own gift, or else in the King’s by your recommendation by patent; and that you would please to cause the warrant for him (with power to act by himself or his sufficient deputy, as it was to the last) to be signed. My Lady Pulteney says that she loves and wants guineas; yet she should not think that so good luck as to see you here in a condition that your friends might enjoy you again.

[P.S.] “The place is Secretary of Jamaica.”

1697, May 20-30, Camp at Iseringhen.—“In pursuance of your Grace’s letter of the 8th inst. I have moved his Majesty for directions, which I send by this post, to Mr. Lounds for the paying 200*l.* to your Grace’s order or Mr. Guy for especial service without account.

“We march tomorrow nearer the French, who press the town of Ath very close.

[P.S.] “My Lord Portland is gone to Brussels, being very ill of the gravel.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, May 22, Grafton.—“The place of Secretary in Jamaica being void by the death of Mr. Har[r]is, I desire to acquaint his Majesty with my humble request that he will please to bestow that employment on a gentleman whose name is Babor (though not related to Sir John), with licence to act by deputy, as Mr. Harris and others have formerly done. It is a person not known to me, but recommended by such as can well judge of his qualifications, and whom I should be very glad to oblige. I the rather hope his Majesty will not deny me the recommending to this place, because (as I am informed) it has seldom been refused to the Secretary of that province I have the honour to be in. The last possessor was a servant to Mr. Secretary Coventry."

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1697, [May 24-] June 3, n.s., Camp at Promelles near Genap.—“I most humbly acknowledge the receipt of your Grace’s letter of the 11th instant, which shows the great apprehension your Grace was then under for his Majesty’s person, from the attempt that was designed to relieve Ath; which having been since judged impracticable as well from the badness of the weather as the superiority of the French in numbers, who had besides posted themselves so very advantageously as not to be attacked without the greatest hazard to us, it has been thought fit to separate the armies again, that with the Elector of Bavaria being returned to Flanders, as [and?] we are come hither to prevent any further enterprise of the enemy on either side until by our reinforcements from England and Germany we may be in a condition of acting offensively.

“This being the state of the war, your Grace will be best informed of what concerns the Peace from the Hague, where matters go on but slowly.”

R. May 31, o.s.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [May 24-] June 3, s.n., Anvers.—“I am here chained to my Lord Ranelagh’s oar, which makes me less useful to your Grace’s service than if I were at the camp, because the letters come from thence later than from hence, and many things may happen there, after I have wrote from hence. However, I will show your Grace how I think we are seated now.

“The King at a general council of war, after some days’ irresolutions, resolved at last to leave Ath to itself. So his Majesty marched one way, towards the Sambre, and the Elector at the same time into Flanders. The enemies did take their measures accordingly, and the Mareschal de Boufflers marched towards Charleroy, to observe the King, as the Mareschal de Villeroy did go to face the Elector. Mons. de Catinat continues the siege at Ath, which holds out better than was expected. The attacks are not very vigorous, either because they would spare their men, or would give time to the negotiators. Their greatest fire has been upon some sluices, which keep the ditches full of water, and I do not yet find that they are ruined. By the best accounts which I could see, the enemies did outnumber us, when they and when we were all together; but the King has sent for some forces from the Rhine, to which he has some right, and they are to come this way, unless the King will have regard to the mighty solicitations of Prince Lewis, who has sent to require ’em. The Germans complain already that we shall hinder the said Prince from doing anything this campaign by taking away these troops from him. We are apt to believe he would do as little if he kept these troops.

“Tis sure the Imperialists do less than nothing at Ryswyck, where they drive all things backward. Most of the Allies have given in their pretensions, which would be just if Providence had been on our side for eight years past; but in the present situation of affairs they are ridiculous.

“I think it is not possible to make any kind of peace by such negotiations and such negotiators. Something irregular must be done, or the war must continue. I must needs say that it will be very difficult for us to continue it, for my Lord Ranelagh sends me very little succours; and we came so lean and hungry into the campaign that we must starve before the end of it.

“I do not find that the French have yet given passports to our packet-boats, as was once agreed on; nor have they done any the least act which may look like treating with England. I am sorry I cannot send your Grace a more pleasant landscape of our situation here, but I am used to draw as naturally as I can.”

R. 28 May.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [May 26-] June 5, s.n., Bruxelles.—“I can add nothing to the letter which I had the honour to write to your Grace last post. Our armies are all quiet in the same camps. Ath is not yet surrendered; the enemies have changed their attacks, and have destroyed the sluices, which kept the ditches full.

“The treaty of Ryswick goes on very slowly; I hope that at the Hague between the French and the Hollanders goes on faster. I told your Grace that the Imperialists and others had given in very large demands and pretensions. I now send your Grace a copy of the answer which the French have made to them.

“My Lord Portland is still here in town, but pretty well. He takes the waters for the gravel, but people who look for mysteries in every thing fancy 'tis spleen, chagrin, and mortification. My Lord Albermale (sic) is made General Major of the Horse, and his regiment is made a regiment of Fuziliers, and takes post of all the light horse. Mons. Dauverkerque is made General of the English horse here. I am going this moment to the Camp.”

R. June 3rd, o.s. Enclosure:—

[Answer of the French Commissioners.]

“Auant que de repondre aux propositions qui nous ont esté données tant par leurs Excellences Messieurs les Ambassadeurs de l'Empereur, que par ceux du Roy Catholique, nous sommes indispensablement obligéz de demander qu'ils ayent a declarer s'ilz veulent traiter sur le pied des articles regléz et accordéz le 10 Febr<sup>r</sup> dernier, et jnseréz dans le protocole de S. Ex. M<sup>r</sup> l'Ambassad<sup>r</sup> Ex<sup>re</sup> de Suede, en qualité de Mediateur, ou s'ilz veulent y renoncer.

“ Au premier cas nostre responce est, que leurs propositions ne sont pas receuables, et au second nous conuiendrons aisement que ces articles demeurent abrogéz et comme non aduenus, pour traiter tout de nouveau sur les matieres qui y sont contenues, comme s’jl n’en auoit jamais esté question.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697, May 27-] June 6, s.n., at the Camp.—“ I did myself the honour to write to your Grace from Bruxelles last night, but cannot forbear to do it again tonight, hoping I do only write to your Grace.

“ I think we are here in an ill condition to continue the war, and in none at all to make any peace. By what I have learnt tonight all things at the Hague are at a full stop, as well as at Ryswyck. I am morally certain that the French would have made a peace three months since, but I fear the King and the States have had so much complaisance for the Imperialists that it is now too late. I look upon Ath as taken; if the French will afterwards make any new proposals at the Hague, they may begin again; at present nothing is to be done.

“ I find the enemies have here, in their three armies, 209 battalions, by which they can equal our two armies with two of theirs, and have a third at liberty to act. We expect 12 battalions from the Rhine, and eight from England, with which, and some small detachments, we must make up a third army. But I fear the King of Denmark is marching into Holsteyn, which will oblige the Lunebourgers to go home; and I fear the Elector of Saxe is now actually treating with the French by the ministry of one Mons. Roses, whom he has sent to Copenhagen to meet Mons. Bourepos.

“ My Lord Portland was truly mortified, and went to Bruxelles in despair and anguish. The Prince of Vaudemont has been to make him a visit to comfort him, and they say he is also to be made General of the Horse.

“ The Imperialists have replied now to the answer of the French, viz., that they are content now to treat upon the préliminaires which were agreed on. Such poor men there never were!”

SOMERS to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]97, May 29.—About deferring the passing of the commission of lieutenantcy; the grant of the custody of Mr. Talbot; Mr. Beareroff’s application for the muster-master’s place vacant by the death of Mr. Harris; and Shrewsbury’s improvement in health.

“ Yesterday the Treasury made a representation to the Justices of the ill state of Mr. Palmes’s<sup>o</sup> office; that in the whole 26,000*l.* was wanting; and that his clerk Mr. Peters’s effects did not amount to above 17,000*l.*, and those they had got into their hands and had shut up the office. I do not see but the matter is inexcusable, but the transports of L[ord] Cham[berlain, Sunderland,] upon the occasion were above expression, and I doubt not it will admit of great occasion of triumphing over those who appeared so much concerned for continuing him in the office. . . .

“I discoursed with my Lord Orford upon what your Grace suggested as to the following the squadron under Mr. Chasteau Renaud with a detachment of our Fleet; and he seemed to wish it might be practicable by a possibility of furnishing a sufficient victualling for such an expedition. The King has ordered a squadron to be got ready for the Mediterranean with all expedition, which he says will be joined by a proportionable number of the Dutch; and the Admiralty have sent him a scheme of fourteen ships (nine of which will be of the number proposed for the line of battle), which they think proper for that service; but after all it will be difficult to get victuals in any time.

“The thoughts of peace begin to vanish with me, unless the coming down of the German troops put an immediate stand to the progress of the French, upon their taking Aeth.”

GI. [BURNET] BISHOP of SALISBURY to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697?] May 29, Salisbury.—“I return you the two papers put in the form in which you order it, with a new Introduction and those variations that seemed necessary. If any of those Memorials of K. James’s have been delivered to any of the Princes to whom they are addressed, so that they are now authentically his, then your Grace will see that I must alter the Introduction. . . . Be pleased to return it back to me either with your own Imprimatur as Secretary of State, or send it to my Lord Chancellor, that it may be licensed by their Excellencies, as your Grace thinks most convenient. . . . God preserve you and perfect you, so that you may be that for which I hope you were made, one of the patterns and wonders of the age. . . .

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1697, May 29, Grafton.—“I have your letters of the 9-19 and 17-27 of May. I wish the delays that are by some affected at Ryswick does [do] not give our enemies an opportunity to show so much of their strength, that they may come to be of an opinion it is better taking towns in war than giving them up by a treaty. It was ever earnestly wished by me that they might be taken when they seemed to be in the humour, but such an Alliance as ours is a difficult and unwieldy body to govern in order to peace as well as war. I was heartily glad to find by your last letter that no rash counsel would be taken to relieve this little place, which I cannot think of such importance as to make any alteration in the measures or inclinations of either side to an accommodation.

“I have found so much benefit by the warm weather that in a month I design to return to London.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, June 1-11, Hague.—“I am here by the King's orders to try to borrow a little money, a very little, God knows, for the relief of our present necessities in the camp. I am not yet sure that I shall succeed, but I am sure that if I have no success the negotiations at Ryswyck will go on the worse for us and our Allies. I find those gentlemen very busy there, though they advance little. The great difficulty was lately, and is still, whether all parties will stand to the préliminaires. The Imperialists are unwilling to come to that resolution; but the French have declared so positively in their last answer to the Imperialists, that they will admit or suffer no demand or proposition contrary [to] or beyond those préliminaires, that I believe they will find it necessary to yield, especially since all the Allies are inclined to acquiesce therein. But because this way of contestation between the Imperialists and French will either break off the treaty, or spend a deal of time in useless disputes, I think the Allies have now agreed to deliver in to the Mediator, every one, a paper of his last pretensions, or such demands as they must necessarily stand by. The Holland mediators will, I believe, file and pare these demands as much as they can, to make 'em reasonable and modest, and receivable by the French. If they are within the bounds of the préliminaires, and such things as our enemies are willing to grant, the Peace may soon be made, or sooner broke off.

“I cannot yet perceive any inclination in the French to come to the latter; but their superiority in the field, and their good success will certainly make 'em more positive. They keep us a little in awe in Brabant and Flanders, and we fear that Barcelone is now besieged, perhaps taken. The enemies have no great force on the Rhine, and they have no need of it, for the Imperial armies are not yet formed, nor the Prince of Baden yet in the field. We do believe that Prince has some extraordinary reason to be out of humour, and we are told that it is because the Imperial ministers do oppose his interests in Poland. They say there was great appearance of his being chosen King, until the Emperor's minister gave him a formal exclusion.

“I am sorry I can give your Grace no better a prospect of affairs here, which are also a little more confused by the resolutions which the King of Denmark has taken to go and demolish the forts which the Duke of Holsteyn had raised in his country. All the Princes who are in the great alliance have endeavoured to dissuade his Majesty of Denmark from that execution, but in vain; the death of the King of Swede, and the absence of the Lunebourg and Holsteyn troops, gives [give] that King too good an opportunity to do himself right.

“I must observe to your Grace that these gentlemen who are employed here about the Peace have so much the better of those who are employed in the field, that it is no wonder they make so little dispatch. Some of 'em seem very well pleased with their characters, and equipage, and representation, and appointments. Our own Excellencies at present fill the scene most, I think, and have the greatest cortege. One of 'em has a very good and proper equipage, which sits easy about him, and he seems to be at home. The same person seems well informed of what is doing, and does something himself; his house, his train, his table, and his behaviour is [are] all of a piece, and does [do] honour to his master and to himself.

“Another is a person of great honour and virtue, who supports his character as he ought, but seems loaded with it. He has a great train of volunteers, to whom he gives lessons of politics, of painting, or of mathematics. I believe his Excellency is a very good negotiator, but I believe he knows the disputes and pretensions of the Princes beyond the line, as well as of those who are now concerned at Ryswyck. Nothing can have so much the air and mind of a peacemaker, but I fear he may forget the days of conferences.

“The third seems most pleased with his character, which he no more puts off than his skin, and will wear it threadbare. His retinue and his equipage is [are] good, but, like clothes made in Long-lane, do not fit him, nor seem made for him. He has a wife, four secretaries, and six fiddlers; I know not which he will have most use of. I have not seen these Lords sit long enough to draw their pictures better.”

R. 9th.

SHREWSBURY TO MR. HILL.

1697, June 5, Grafton.—“Yours of the 6th from the Camp brings the most melancholy account of affairs that I have seen yet. I was always apprehensive our natural slowness in resolving, and the delays that are necessary before so many as compose the Alliance can be brought to determine, might defer the conclusion till the enemy would find it their advantage to change their peaceable inclinations. For my part I give over those hopes for the present, and turn my thoughts to the prosecuting the war, which I think we may be better able to do the next year than this, and if the King be well assured the Hollanders will not make a separate peace.* I hardly believe the French will consent to one with the Imperialists or the Spaniards, since all they are to receive is to be given to them; and what security can they give, that when they are in possession of those places, they will not renew the war? They will be in a better capacity to do it, and it will plainly be their interest not to permit the French to destroy us or the Dutch. I grant some expedients may be proposed to obviate my objection, but none that I can think on without putting more confidence in one another than they seem disposed to.

“I do not flatter myself so far as to think this experiment more eligible than a peace, which would be so sweet to all parties after this tedious war that I persuade myself it would not soon be broken; but we must be contented and make the best of what we can have.

“I have found myself so much better by the country air and retirement that towards the end of this month I hope to be in a condition to return to London.”

1697, June 9, Grafton.—“Upon the receipt of your letter of the 20-30 May, where you say that by that post you had sent his Majesty's directions to Mr. Lowndes to pay 200*l.* to Mr. Guy's or my order, I acquainted Mr. Guy therewith, and desired he would take care to receive the money, it being for a person he was equally concerned for with me; but Mr. Guy writes me word that Mr. Lowndes denies having received any such order, which mistake, wherever it lies, I hope you will be so kind as to rectify.

“Though I have ever thought myself so improper that I have very rarely presumed to recommend any divines, yet upon the death of the Dean of Yorke, having been applied to by Doctor Chetwood, who is the present Archdeacon of that place, and consequently has the better pretence to the promotion, I must do him the justice to desire his Majesty may be informed that, having lived near him these last seven years in Gloucestershire, I can of my own knowledge affirm that there is no person, whether clergy or layman, that in his discourses and actions has appeared more eminently zealous for his Majesty's cause and interest. I thought it necessary to give him this testimony lest what passed at the end of the late King's reign might still continue to do him a prejudice, which I think would not be reasonable, since there is a time that such misfortunes ought to be forgot; and besides, I know this was then pressed on him by my Lord Dartmouth in such a manner that it was very difficult to decline it. That he is a very ingenuous man and a good scholar everybody knows, and a very fine preacher.

“I am told Captain Tankard, Master of his Majesty's Fleet Hounds, is lately dead. If the King design to give that place to the man in England that is most fit for it, I would presume to offer Sir Charles Shuckborough, who is the only man in his Majesty's dominions that I believe has a pack of hounds that are truly bred of the old fleet northern kind, and understands the best how to make them hunt and run. He is extreme zealous in the interest of the Government, and solicited and brought up the Warwickshire Association, signed by many thousand hands, which was not expected from that country; but, having the repute of a Churchman and well affected, he has a great power among the loyal Church party there. I know he is very desirous to serve his Majesty in this station, and has sent to me, upon hearing of the other's death, to offer himself and his hounds to his Majesty's service.”

THE EARL OF ORFORD TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, June 10, London.—(Mostly printed by Coxe, but he omits the following passages.)

“As to what your Grace is pleased to say relating to Lord Normanby, I will venture to say not a Russell in England has ever spoke to Lord Chancellor in relation to the House (?), nor does in the least trouble their heads who becomes master of it. For my own part, was I to determine the difference by affection, I swear Lord Normanby should have it. ’Tis impossible he can use me worse than the Duke of Devonshire has done. Possibl[y] ’twill never be in my power to show him the sense I have of his behaviour, but if it does, I think I shall force nature to show a resentment for an injury done me some time past. Yesterday morning, before I received your Grace’s letter, I was to return a visit Lord Normanby designed me if I had been at home, but had not the luck to find him; which I am now very glad of, for when I see him, I will enter upon this subject, and I suppose may take the liberty to say you was pleased to write to me about it, and that what you said of me I will make good; by which I hope he will be at ease as to my concerning myself in favour of the Duke; and if there was occasion, which I know there is not, I would employ the little credit I have in the family to do the same, if it be with your inclination.

“I am glad to hear of your resolution of being in town shortly, where I believe you may be as free from company as in the country. I never saw the town so empty in my life. I confess my head, and heart, has [have] been long at Chippenham; and for the use I am of here I might be anywhere, but for form sake, till the Fleet be together, I don’t think of stirring, unless it be for six or eight days. If I can be of any use, ’tis upon that sheane (?) of the sea.”

“We are in great apprehensions of troubles in the north by the attempts of the King of Denmark against the Duke of Holstein; and we are assured of Barcelona’s being besieged by sea and land, which must either be followed by the loss of the town or a neutrality in Catalonia, as is most to be feared. The Lunebourg troops, consisting in 9,000 men, passed the Rhine on Thursday last and will be with us in few days, as those of Hesse, Munster, 1697, June 12, Grafton.—"I do with all duty return his Majesty my most humble thanks for the place he has been pleased to bestow on Mr. Baber at my recommendation. I have had some account that Mr. Cresset did think he could serve his Majesty more usefully, if his commission were enlarged to the Courts of Brandenburg and Saxe. I should not meddle in a matter that is not in my province, but relates to another office, but that having mentioned it in the winter, Mr. Secretary was then well disposed that Mr. Cresset should be gratified. How this may suit with Mr. Cresset's present engagements I know not, and therefore shall press it no farther than to give my opinion that Mr. Cresset does deserve encouragement.

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

1697, June 14-24, Anvers.—"I must thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 29th past, and I thank heaven for the good news which we do constantly receive of your Grace's recovery.

"I think there is nothing yet determined either for peace or war, but the ministers and instruments of both are constantly at work ; but methinks, since our enemies have a superiority in the field, they have so at Ryswyck also. I am persuaded that the Court of France are still desirous of a peace, but I believe the generals of the army would be glad to hinder it if they could. They have lately made a motion towards Anguien and Steinkerque, which obliged the King to march with all his army to Anderleck, to cover Bruxelles, and to be out of danger of being insulted himself.

“We have still hopes that the Hollanders will carry on their negotiations with the French at the Hague. I believe we shall have but little difficulty in what relates to England. The French seem content to promise in general terms never to assist any of our King’s enemies, but seem unwilling to renounce King James by name. However, they will remove him as far as Avignon. I wish he were there.

“I am now going to the Army, from whence I shall be able to give your Grace a better account of anything which happens.”

SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

1697, June 16, Grafton.—“I do not question but the Lords Justices at London will direct an answer to be returned to your Lordship and my Lord Winchester’s joint letter to me of the 5th. I am very glad you find things on all sides so well disposed that you have named a day for the Parliament’s meeting to do business; one difficult point is over, I think, when that resolution is taken.

“What your Lordship says in yours of the 1st, of my Lord Montrath’s and my Lord Drogheda’s zeal for promoting the public good, is so commendable, and the example would be of so great use, that as I do not doubt but they will receive a very particular consideration from your Lordship, so I think the King himself, if they continue the same temper, should encourage them, and others hereafter to take pattern by them, by some especial mark of his favour.”

SHREWSBURY TO WINCHESTER.

1697, June 16, Grafton.—“I conclude the Lords Justices at London will take care that your Lordship have an answer to yours and my Lord Gallway’s joint letter of the 5th, it having been laid before them to that end. This is only to acknowledge yours of the 1st, and to let you know I am very glad you find things so well disposed in Ireland as to encourage your meeting of a Parliament. I am confident it is very much for the interest of that country that there should be a Session before the winter, and much more easy for your Lordships to carry yourselves to the satisfaction of both parties, for this short time, than if it should be deferred six months longer.” . . .

SEC. BLATHWAYT TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, June 17-27, Camp near Bruxelles.—“I have received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 9th inst., and do assure your Grace that his Majesty’s pleasure was signified by me to Mr. Lownds for the payment of 200*l.* to Mr. Guy or his order, which is repeated to him by this post.

“His Majesty has taken notice of the good character your Grace has given Dr. Chetwood, which may stand him in stead at another time, but it has so happened that his Majesty has last week, upon the recommendation of the Archbishop and others, disposed of the Deanery of York to Dr. Gale, the Schoolmaster of St. Paul’s.

“His Majesty agrees entirely with your Grace that Sir Charles Shuckborow is the fittest man in England to succeed Captain Tankard, and in case of his death your Grace may assure Sir Charles of that employment.

“I have by this post sent Mr. Vernon the warrant for Mr. Baber’s being Secretary of Jamaica, in the same terms as that of his predecessor.”

R. 24.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] June 17-27, Bruxelles.—“I must humbly thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 5th instant, and I must still thank heaven for the new assurances of your Grace’s health.

“I did tell your Grace in the last which I had the honour to write to you that the King was come hither to cover this town, &c. I must now add that this march is perhaps one of the best and most seasonable which his Majesty ever made. The enemies, who are still superior to us, were coming directly upon Bruxelles, not with an intention to bombard it only this time; they would have taken it or ransomed it. The King came to the ground where his army now is but just in time. Mons. Dop, who is General of the Drago[on]s, came up to take the camp, and found 4,000 French horse in sight. This made him stop, and face about, till by good luck the Prince of Vaudemont camé himself, and made our men face again to the enemy, and march forward; upon which they found the enemies were retired. ’Tis well we had a Prince of Vaudemont, and ’tis well for us the enemies had not one.

“We have been hard at work since we are in this Camp, and have retrenched ourselves up to the eyes. We are also so posted as that we may march to the defence of any other place upon which our enemies may have any design, for they seem well resolved to make use of their superiority. They seem to threaten Namur, or Audenarde, or to break in upon the canal of Bruxelles, or to fortify themselves at Alost this winter, so as to cut off all communication between Braband and Flanders. ’Tis the Mareschal de Villeroy and the Duc de Bouflers who give us this employment here, whilst Mons. Catinat entertains the Elector; and we are not without some apprehensions that Catinat may be on a sudden so inforced by detachments from their other army that he may insult the Elector.

“This seems to be our present posture, and if we can defend ourselves everywhere we shall be happy and successful enough. For my part, I am not so much afraid of the strength and number of our enemies as of our own wants and necessities. We are in no other danger in the camp where we now are.

“I can give your Grace no good account of what is done at Ryswyck, but I am pretty sure nothing is done or will be done, or can be done, by the ways they are in there. The Spaniards have received new orders to advance and forward the peace as much as is possible; the Imperialists still hang back. I believe the French and Holland ministers do still labour at it. Our King seems very desirous they may go forward, and the States I believe are as willing. It is not, my Lord, to make any separate peace, but to adjust and accommodate the interests and pretensions of all the Allies as well as they can. I hope they will succeed, for it is not possible to make war here without money.

“The King sent to make a compliment to our Electress, and to tell her he would come [to] see her, if he should not be troublesome. She took him at his word, and his Majesty will be forced to come to see her Highness tomorrow.”

R. 24.

J[OHN] METHUEN, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to SIREWSBURY.

1697, June 22, Dublin.—“In hope this may find your Grace near London, I take leave to inform you of the state of matters here. The Parliament is adjourned till the 27th of July, and the country gentlemen are now pretty well satisfied to meet so soon, although at first they were a little discontented because of their harvest. Both Houses at their meeting, the 15th, gave us a great proof of their respect by forbearing at our desire to go on business about privilege, which was set and contrived on purpose to revive the parties.

“The greatest part of the Members of the House of Commons have been with me to give me assurance of their good intentions for the King’s service, and of their resolution of being advised in the methods of attaining it. I find a great number of them have some dependence on me, as Chancellor, and I am very much deceived if we do not succeed in what is expected, and if I am deceived, everybody of consideration have [has] conspired to deceive me. The parties seem much broken, and every gentleman treats for himself.

“We have the success we desire in the Council as to the Bills designed. That which is for confirming the Outlawries and Attainders pleases very much, because it seems to render private Acts or clauses for confirming particular grants unnecessary, from which they are very averse, but especially against my Lady Orkney’s. In the Bill for confirming the Articles of Lymerick, we have had great difficulty in the sixth article (sic), which takes away private people's suits. The difficulty grew from our best friends, but we have found a way to have it as my Lords Justices did desire, and as they think it will please the King; which was done as soon as ever they pleased to concern themselves, and own what they desired.

"The people in general seem reasonable, and will be convinced when they see the Government intend the King's service only, and not their own. My Lord Gallway's prudence and application to business, and the Marquis his good intention and easy humour please all people, and keep them very well together; which gives them an advantage no Government here hath yet had.

"We hope to finish the Bills here the next week, and shall send them over to England as soon as possible. Having seen what my Lords Justices have written, I do not trouble your Grace farther until I hear that you are in a condition to endure it."

R. July 1st. Ansd. July 10th.

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, June 23, Grafton.—"I have received a letter from Mr. Povey, desiring my recommendation to his Majesty that, upon the death of Mr. Cooling, he may now be received Clerk of the Council in ordinary, he being the eldest in extraordinary now attending the Board. I know nothing of the fact, but am sure that is what you can very punctually inform his Majesty of, and am very uneasy to be so often troublesome as I have lately been in meddling with places; but this seems so reasonable to me, and Mr. Povey's character so little to deserve any injustice or hardship should be done him, that if there be no other difficulty I am not acquainted with I conclude his request will not be denied.

"I must ask his Majesty's and your pardon for troubling you about Mr. Tankard's place, since I hear he is alive.

"About the middle of next week I shall remove towards London, where I shall be ready to receive any commands.

[P.S.] "I just now hear Mr. Tankard is dead."

SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOSEPH WILLIAMSON.

1697, June 23, Grafton.—"My Lord, I was extreme sorry the last winter, at my return to London, to find your Excellency so much indisposed, not only because that, together with my own ill health, prevented my having any opportunity to give you thanks for your particular kindness in the last Session, but chiefly because I apprehended it might be a great obstruction to the business you are now upon, which, being of such consequence to the welfare of England, would be much advanced by your Excellency's presence. I have no dependence on the French sincerity, any otherwise than I believe they think it to their interest to have a peace; and if that cannot be obtained no other way but by including his Majesty, I am confident they are sincere in their intention of swallowing that difficulty. How real they will be in their friendship afterwards I will not answer, but hope the nation will always be on its guard against any surprise. When it is not too great a trouble to hear how this matter proceeds, will be an obligation always acknowledged by, my Lord," &c.

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, June 26, Dublin Castle.—“I received the favour of your Grace’s of the 16th instant. . . . We have got with some difficulty the Bill passed the Council for confirming the Articles of Limerick, I believe to the King’s satisfaction; only we are to represent to the King the clause that a great many would have had to take away the Statute of Limitation, and so leave all suits open that cannot commence again, without taking away that Act. I hope by Wednesday next the Acts that we have to transmit to your Grace will be ready, and I hope you will get them dispatched in England, that the House of Commons may not want employment (after they have taken care of the money) whilst the Money Bills are transmitted to us again.

“Upon the advice I received from your Lordship I did what I could to have the Parliament as soon as possible, but for reasons that we sent you it could not possibly be sooner than it is, and I hope this Sessions will be for the public good.” . . .

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, June 28, Grafton.—“I have received yours of the 17-27 June, and hope Mr. Lownds will better observe your repeated order from his Majesty than he did the first.

“I am glad the King thinks Sir Charles Shuckborough so fit to succeed Mr. Tankard, who being now (as I am informed) dead, if his Majesty would please to dispatch what is necessary for the putting Sir Charles in that employment, he would save himself the importunity he will have from other pretenders. I will write to Mr. Vernon to send you over by this post a draft of such a warrant as is usual on this occasion.

“I shall be in town on Tuesday, the 6th of the next month.”

1697, [June 28-] July 8 Cockleberg.—“I have received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 12th past, and have represented to the King what your Grace has been pleased to propose in favour of Mr. Cressett, whom his Majesty shows himself inclined to gratify in those particulars as any occasion shall offer, whereof I will not fail to give him notice for his government.

“ I humbly beg the continuance of your Grace's protection to Mr. Povey, who stands next to succeed Mr. Colins in the place of Clerk of the Council. He has at present some competition, but I no ways doubt of his Majesty's justice and favour towards him.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] July 1-11, Bruxelles.—“I had not time to do myself the honour to write to your Grace last post, or to send the enclosed, which is the last act which I have seen from Ryswyck. I like this new method very well, and hope it will end in taking the treaty of Nimegue and signing it again, only adding some few things to make it take in what is happened since. We are indeed more intent at present upon the interview which has been here, between my Lord Portland and the Duc de Boufflers, in an open field, where they had a conference of an hour, which may end in something.

“The election of the Duke of Saxe to be King of Poland does surprise everybody, and alarm some. His business was well managed, and it costs him nothing but his religion. The Imperialists will be more fierce upon this success; the French, I hope, a little mortified; and the Allies might be the better for it.

“The King grows gallant (sic) and popular. He was yesterday round the town at Bruxelles to see all our ladies, and tonight he goes to the Opera.”

I have read your Grace's letter concerning Mr. Povey to the King, who does not seem to entertain the least scruple of his right and fitness to succeed Mr. Coling, and would have been now determined by your Grace's favourable recommendation of him to give order for his swearing, but that, a[s] I have before acquainted Mr. Vernon, his Majesty expects some mention at least to be made of the vacancy from the Lords Justices. ## MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] July 8-18, Bruxelles.—“I hope this letter may find your Grace at Whitehall, if your health does allow it; if not, I hope the Government will yet bear with your absence.

“We are here very easy and very quiet, expecting the project of a peace, which the French are to give in at Ryswyck; and expect more impatiently the success of my Lord Portland's second interview with M. Boufflers, which lasted three hours. We believe that, so soon as the Mareschal's courier can return from Versailles, they may have a third conference. In the mean time the Allies at the Hague are disquieted at these meetings, and have desired such a satisfaction from his Majesty's ministers there as they were not able to give 'em.

“The last letters from Paris makes us fear that Barcelone cannot hold out long, since the enemies were at last lodged on the contrescarpe, though with great loss.

“The French were very sure of the election of the Prince de Conti, upon the first news which came, and ordered all demonstrations of joy to be made. At present they are less secure thereof.

“The King has been at leisure here to make two or three visits to the Princess of Vaudemont and the young Duchess d'Aremberg, and did stay at a ball which was prepared at Bruxelles in the Princess's gardens till ten o'clock at night. Some people have fancied the King did see that young Duchess with some satisfaction; others believe my Lord Portland saw her with more concern. 'Tis believed my Lord Arbermarle (sic) is not less busy, who seems to have great attention for the Countess of Arcos, an acquaintance of our Elector.”

R. 15, 97. Ansd. 16.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] July 8-18, Bruxelles.—“I had the honour to write to your Grace two hours since. I have now been informed that my Lord Portland desired the first meeting with Mons. de Boufflers; that he then told him that our King his master was unwilling to bear the burden of being thought an enemy to the peace of mankind; that he did now declare that he was ready to come to a good and a just peace, so soon as it was proposed, and agreeable to his Allies, &c. M. de Boufflers made many compliments, and expressed great veneration for our King and sent an account of what my Lord Portland said to Versailles.

“At the second meeting, Mons. de Boufflers said he had order from his master to assure him that the King was well pleased with what had been told him; that he had great reason to be assured of the sincerity of the Prince of Orange; and that he was ready to enter into such terms of a peace as should be reasonable; that he expected as firm a friend in the Prince of Orange as he had found a resolute enemy; that orders should be given to the French ministers at Ryswyck to proceed upon this foundation, and not to oppose the personal interests of our King. This I am assured, my Lord, was the substance of these two famous interviews. I should not know so much, but your Grace perhaps knows more.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 9, London.—“When I came hither I found yours of the 8th. In a former letter I acquainted you with my thoughts relating to Mr. Povey’s pretention, supposing it to be as just as since my arrival here upon examination I find it. I conclude he will need no other friends than your relating only the state of the case to his Majesty; for though nobody will contest the King’s power of setting aside the eldest Clerk in Extraordinary and advancing a younger, or whom else soever he pleases, yet if it be practised without a cause it will be a great discouragement to all who shall hereafter serve in that station.

“In the last letter my Lord Gallway writ to me he thinks it necessary that the present Lord Carlingford should have an exception in the Bill that confirms the outlawries in Ireland, for that otherwise he would lose both his title and estate, and supposes this to be his Majesty’s intention. I conclude it to be so; however, if it be otherwise, upon your signifying his Majesty’s pleasure to the contrary, care shall be taken to stop it here.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1697, July 9, London.—“I have yours of the 1-11, and am glad to hear any method is taken to shorten the proceedings at Ryswick. We here grow very impatient to know our doom, whether we must rejoice at peace, or prepare for war. Our freshest news from Poland and Barcelona is very cheerful. I wish the last may continue. We are very inquisitive and ignorant of the occasion of the late interview between my Lord Portland and the Mareschal de Boufflers, and it is hoped the next letters may clear the mystery. For the present, people generally guess as they wish."

1697, July 9, London.—"I came very lately to town, where I received the favour of yours of the 26th of June. I am extreme glad you have determined the Parliament shall meet so soon, and the more because I perceive you have all good hopes and a reasonable prospect that it will succeed to the advantage of the public and your own private reputations. . . .

[P.S.] "We have set aside Monday on purpose to examine some Bills in Council, in order to their being transmitted to your Lordship, and I hope they will arrive before the Parliament meet."

1697, July 9, London.—"I am extreme glad to find by your Lordship's of the 22nd of June that you have so good an opinion of the success of the Parliament. You can give me no argument more convincing of it than that many of the members have some dependence on you, since I am sure that will be made use of with such zeal and discretion as will turn to the public good.

"Monday is the first day we could get set apart to consider some of those Bills that lie now before the Council, and we hope then to transmit them for the employment of the Parliament at their first meeting. One Bill for the good of landlords, distaining stock on their tenants' grounds, is already agreed to."

SHREWSBURY to LORD GALWAY.

1697, July 9, London.—"At my first arrival here I found your Lordship's of the 29th June, but deferred making an immediate answer to it till I had enquired and a little informed myself of the state of affairs. I understand Mr. Fox has not laid the project your Lordship sent him before the Lords Justices, so can give no account what their opinion will be when they see it.

"I am very certain any application that the Papists can make to alter or stop the Bills relating to the Articles of Gallway, &c., will have no effect here, nor I hope with his Majesty, since his Royal word will be made good to them, though not in such a sense as they would partially interpret it. If the Catholic Princes should be prevailed with to interpose, I believe there can hardly be time for their application to give any stop to it.

"I do not in the least doubt but it is his Majesty's intention my Lord Carlingford should be taken care of, and his title and estate preserved. I have acquainted Mr. Blaithwayt with what your Lordship proposes in order to it.

"Monday is set apart to dispatch in Council some of those Irish Bills which lie before them, and I hope they will come in time before the Parliament meets.

JO. METHUEN to SHREWSBURY.

1697, July 12, Dublin.—"I shall not increase your trouble by entering into the particulars which you will be informed of by my Lords Justices, and by the letter from the Council. I desire your Grace would look on the Bills now sent as the last things of that kind with which the Protestants will be satisfied and the Papists will be out of all fear of worse; and I hope it must now appear to his Majesty that the Protestants of Ireland are more moderate than they have been represented to him. And I must do that justice to those that are my Lord Capell's friends (as they are still called) to assure your Grace not only of their zeal and readiness to the King's service, which never ought to be doubted, but of their reasonableness and moderation to that degree that since they now think themselves secure of fair dealing from the Government, they do not seem to expect the least partiality in their favour, and are content to serve the King in that way only in which they can be most useful, leaving to the other party the honour of being most forward in proposing the methods of serving the King, and answering the expectations of the Government. . . .

“Those who were Sir Charles Porter’s friends seem to depend very much upon me, and have taken all the ways imaginable to assure me not only of their entire readiness in everything for the King’s service, but of their concurrence in everything that may establish a perfect quiet and union of the Protestant interest. . . .

“The Bill for confirming the Outlawries is very acceptable in itself, but much more so in hope that it may prevent the private Bills for confirming Grants, which the greatest part are very averse from, and it will be very happy if it may have that effect. So far is certain that it hath taken away the greatest occasion and pretence for them.

“The Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick was framed otherwise as to the sixth article, and upon debate of leaving some actions to be brought after the 10th of April, there was a division of the Council, nine against four, to have the clause which is enclosed, whereby the sixth article is confirmed in the place of that which now stands in the Bill. . . .

“In case the Speech be not settled, I hope your Grace will consider that it was calculated for an Irish Parliament. The point of the Militia I was doubtful in, but there is this consideration, that the Parliament will settle it absolutely depending upon the King. The mentioning of the adjournment came from me alone, and I think there is not the least doubt of its giving offence, and the matter of the Sole Right must be obviated by all possible ways, and is not yet enough secured.

“The principal matter of the scheme of raising the money is now under our consideration, but cannot be absolutely resolved on until some Members come to town, and I shall reserve myself to give your Grace an entire account of that matter together.

“There continues a very good correspondence between the Marquis and my Lord Gallway, and they have success accordingly. My Lord Marquis really exceeds my expectation, and applies himself to business more than I could have imagined. My Lord Gallway cannot do that, because I expected so very much from him that it is a great thing when I say the truth that I am not disappointed. He is certainly an extraordinary man in every respect; and the country are generally satisfied and pleased with everything they do.”

Mr. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, July 12-22, Bruxelles.—“It does me good to hear what a stock of health your Grace has brought up to town, for public and for private occasions.

“My Lord Portland and Mr. Boufflers had a third conference two days since, which lasted two hours and a half. I went with my Lord, who carried about 15 or 20 with him; Mr. Boufflers had near 300. We left our chiefs all alone; we mixed with all the French officers, who were very civil and discreet, and treated our King as we could desire. I sent your Grace an account of the two first conferences. The third was employed I believe about the personal interests of our King, the renunciation of King James and his adherents, and the restitution of Orange. Mons. Boufflers expected, I'm told, to have ended all those points at this last meeting, but they did not agree upon the terms; so we expect a fourth meeting. The King ordered a fair account of all these transactions to be given to his Allies, and they seem to be contented. However, all the plenipotentiaries at the Hague, the Mediator, and the French, all of 'em, are jealous that others should have the honour of the peace, which must nevertheless pass through their hands at Ryswyck. The French did give in their project there last Saturday. I have not seen it yet, but they say it is pretty reasonable. I'm told they have also given a day to the Allies to accept of it, which is to the 1st of September only.

“We are so quiet here, that I believe the King begins to think of leaving the Army; but I hope not.

“My Lord Albermarle (sic) was so eager to visit the Contesse d'Arcos here, that his Majesty thought good I believe to interrupt their commerce a little.”

R. 17, 97. Ansd. 20.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 13, Whitehall.—“We are not without impatience for the three posts which are now due, considering the important news of different kinds we may reasonably expect in the next letters. I shall take this occasion to put you in mind that his Majesty's directions were that my Lord Manchester should be going towards the end of the summer upon his Embassy. If that continue to be his pleasure, it may now be proper that I receive directions to prepare his instructions, and that his Lordship have notice to be putting himself in a readiness to begin his journey.

“Sir Robert Southwell mentioned to me with concern that since Col. Fletcher's commission was suspended by the Earl of Bellomont's, the Colonel might have notice of it by a letter from me, in such a manner as was proper for a gentleman who was not recalled for any fault committed, but because his Majesty thought it more for his service that his Government should be joined to New England; and in order to this brought me the copies of some letters my Lord Sunderland had formerly writ to Col. Dungan on the like occasion; but finding in those letters, which he desired should be a pattern for mine, that the King would take care of him and otherwise employ him for the future, I could not go so far without a particular direction from his Majesty.

“The Council have yesterday dispatched four Bills transmitted from Ireland, and they will be returned thither as soon as they can be put under the Great Seal; and I hope they may arrive in time to give the Parliament employment (with what others they have before them) at their first meeting on the 27th. There is one private Bill agreed by the parties; one to enable the subject to distrain corn and hay for rent; one to prevent Protestants intermarrying with Papists; and the last for suppressing all Friaries, Monasteries, Numeries, and other Popish Convents, and for banishing all Regulars of the Popish Clergy, all Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, &c., or any priests who exercise any jurisdiction. To this Bill a clause was added yesterday for vesting in his Majesty, his heirs, &c., all guilds, chantries, fraternities, or religious societies which still remain and are employed for supporting Popish superstition. The two last the Lords Justices in Ireland say the people there are very fond of; therefore they were the first dispatched here.

“I have just now the enclosed account from a person in Italy, whom I did more particularly employ whilst his Majesty’s fleet was in the Straits; I will give an account of it to Genoua, as he desires, and enquire of my Lord Gallway if he knows anything of such a person.”

Copy. Enclosure :—[Letter from M. Baal?]

June, 1697.—“Sir, At present I have only to acquaint you how I had the care, during my Lord Galway’s being at Turine, to be by him intrusted in some private concerns for the public good, in which I was not wanting in doing my part. The last was in being vigilant (by the means of a friend) on the proceedings of Count Bouzelli of Bergamo, who was to have assassinated our King by order of the French King, from whom he hath a yearly pension, and [is] protected by his ministers, in all these parts, in all his ill actions, by which he lives, and hath above 150 men at command, and is feared all over Italy; for nothing comes amiss to him, having killed many most treacherously, and some of good quality; for when he wants money, he gives notice to those whom he knows hath it, to send him such a sum; if denied, he is surely revenged on them. In fine, he is a fit instrument for the French King to act any villainy. He intended for England with the Venetian Embassadors, and [to] have taken his opportunity, but was hindered by the Venetians. I know not what care hath been taken of him since my Lord Galway is gone home, but he ought to be watched. The only place is Genoa, to have intelligence of him by means of the constant commerce with Bergamo; and besides, some of the Genoese nobility have men that constantly watch him, as [they] having not complied with him, he came once to Genoa with about 40 men of his gang to have killed a gentleman, but was discovered and put into prison, but by means of the French Resident got out, and was only banished.

“This Count Bouzelli of Bergamo is a tall man, big made, something inclinable to fat, black hair, and wears a great Spanish beard. It will be very convenient that a character be given of him to those who attend his Majesty, for it is not unlikely but in this great Congress of Treaty he may be there, to lay hold of the first opportunity to execute his design; and an eye ought to be had upon the French Plenipotentiaries' retinue, if such a person be not amongst them.

“All which I thought it my duty to impart to you, that ye might give an account of it to those ye thought most proper.”

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, July 13, Whitehall.—“The Council met yesterday to consider of the Irish Bills which lay before them, and approved of the four mentioned in the enclosed paper, which will be sent back to your Lordships so soon as they can be got under the Great Seal. But on this occasion the Lords of the Council desire it may be observed to your Lordships, that the sending so many Bills together under one seal occasions a great delay here, seeing but one hand can be employed at a time to engross them; whereas, if your Lordships please to let only two or three come under the same seal, though more may be transmitted together under different seals, the dispatch will be much quicker.”

“I heartily rejoice to hear you are in so fair a way of success in the Parliament of Ireland.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1697, July [15-]25, Cockelberg.—“Your Grace has been pleased to continue your favour to Mr. Povey so effectually by the honour I have received of your Grace's letter of the 9th instant, that by this post I signify his Majesty's pleasure to the Lords Justices in mine to Mr. Vernon for his being admitted Clerk in Ordinary, and for Mr. Vernon's son's succeeding in Extraordinary; so that now Mr. Povey, having had so far the support of your Grace's countenance, will have the further occasion of owning your protection as our President in his being sworn at Council according to the directions his Majesty has been pleased to give.

“The King is so favourably inclined to my Lord Carlingford in relation to all his concerns in Ireland, that I have acquainted the Lord Justices with his pleasure, as I do now your Grace, that there be an exception inserted in the Bill that is to pass for confirming the Outlawries in that kingdom in favour of my Lord Carlingford, to all the intents and purposes mentioned by your Grace.

“We are extremely afraid of a general revolt in Hungary by the Emperor’s hard usage of the Protestants there. We are no less impatient for good news from Catalonia.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] July 15-25, Bruxelles.—“I am infinitely obliged to your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 9th, and for so good an assurance of your health.

“We are still here in the same situation that we were, but the enemies seem ready to make such a motion as if they had a design upon Audenarde. We did expect that the Mareschal de Boufflers would have given my Lord Portland another occasion to see him yesterday or today, and I cannot but be sorry that he did not.

“The French did give in their project of peace last week, which is in a manner the peace of Nimegue. I suppose it is sent from the Hague to your Grace. We are not mentioned in it anyways, but room is left for us to come in. The Imperialists will do all they can to obstruct the signing it. The French would have prescribed a day within which it must be accepted or refused, which, as I told your Grace, is the 1st of September; but the Mediator prevailed with them not to put that into the project in writing, which would have been too hard; but they left it solemnly with the Mediator, and charged him with it.

“The Imperialists have [defeated] the new rebels in Hungary. The Prince of Conti’s party does yet hold out in Poland, but the Elector of Saxe has still a superiority. Some Holland ships, arrived at Amsterdam from Curassau, say that De Pointy had attacked Carthagene; that he had taken one fort, and plundered a fauxbourg; that he had attempted another fort, from whence he was repulsed with [the] loss of near 1,500 men. The last letters from Paris speak of the taking of Barcelona with great incertitude. The little amorous intrigues which I mentioned in my last are quite over, and I must beg your Grace to forget ’em.”

SHREWSBURY to PORTLAND.

1697, July 16, Whitehall.—Received his letters of the 5-15 and 8-18. . . .

“The French army’s being so much superior in number to those of the Allies in Flanders, if the enemy can be hindered from any further success, nothing better can be expected from the circumstances of this campaign, in which his Majesty’s conduct is confessed, by friends and enemies, both at home and abroad, to have equalled that of the greatest generals in any time. . . .

“We are a little puzzled what to think of the proceedings in Poland. The accounts we have from France are positive, and accompanied with many circumstances, of the election of the Prince of Conty, and that it was carried by a considerable majority. On the other side, the letters from Holland do not seem to treat that dispute as if it could end in anything favourable to that party, but continue to mention the Elector of Saxony’s election as undoubted; so that I hope the pretensions of the first are only set up that they may own their disappointment by degrees; and if that fails, and Pointi’s project also, as I begin now to hope it will, whatever the intention of the King of France was at the beginning of the summer, I do not despair but he may become sincerely disposed to a peace, which your Lordship knows I have long wished, and should be glad you might have the honour of concluding. Nothing can be done more popular in this nation, which is become but too fond of the case they propose to themselves by it; therefore it is high time his Majesty should be at a certainty what he may depend on, that in case no peace is to be had, the people may be no longer flattered with the hopes, but be prepared to carry on the war, as well as their circumstances will enable them.”

Refers to some provision to be made for Capt. Fisher.

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 16, Whitehall.—“I have received yours of the 5-15 July, and am ashamed I have been the occasion of giving his Majesty so unnecessary a trouble as to sign the warrant for Sir Charles Shuckborough, since at my arrival here I find Mr. Tankard is yet alive, though the contrary was positively affirmed by several of his friends and relations in the country. However, I will be answerable his Majesty has eternally obliged Sir Charles by his kind intention.

“The Lords Justices have directed Mr. Vernon to signify by this post the vacancy there is of one of the Clerks of the Council by the death of Mr. Cooling. I hope, when his Majesty shall declare who shall succeed in ordinary, he will do the same for the extraordinary.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1697, July 16, Whitehall.—“I have your two letters of the 8-18, and am glad the thoughts of our Court are so at ease as to give the suspicions you mention. I wish they would reserve a little of their gallantry for our ladies, who will be apt to think they deserve as well as strangers, and have many of them been lost to our interest, because love does not flourish in the Court, as it did in the late reigns; and a partiality to foreigners of the fair sex may be as unpopular as any other that ever has been complained of.

“I am glad my Lord Portland’s interview tends to the driving things to a conclusion. This sort of uncertainty is neither advantageous to his Majesty’s interest at home or abroad. If we flatter ourselves much longer with pleasing hopes of a peace, we shall begin to think we are no more able to make the war. I confess I have for some time, and do still heartily desire a peace, but, if that cannot be obtained, do not despair but that we are in a much better condition to support the war this year than we were the last. I imagine the King of France has been expecting the event of the several considerable designs he has on foot abroad. If he succeed ill in them, we may find him sincere in his intentions for a peace; if not, we must hope for no immediate agreement, but prepare to defend ourselves the best we can.”

SIR J. WILLIAMSON to SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, July 16-26, Hague.—“By my last, which was of the 13-23, I presumed to trouble your Excellency with an imperfect abstract of the Project given in by the French, having at the same time transmitted an entire copy of the Project itself to Mr. Secretary Trumbull, to be laid before your Excellencies. On Wednesday last the Med[iato]r acquainted us, the Ambassadors of England, at the Conference at Ryswicke, with all that had passed between him and the French relating to their giving in that Project; by which we found that on Saturday, when they first presented it to him, it had in it a rubric (as he called it) or a kind of note in the margin, that unless the Allies should think fit to accept of the terms there offered before the end of August, that from thenceforth the King of France would not hold himself obliged to make them good; which Declaration the Ambassadors demanded from the Med[iato]r, to be made by him at the same time he gave in their Project; but that with much arguing he had prevailed with them to forbear a proceeding so harsh, and to suppress for the present any such Declaration, and that he had hoped they would have wholly laid it aside, but that this morning they had again renewed to him the said demand, and had further added, as by express order of their master, that the King will not be prevailed with to make any the least alteration in the conditions therein proposed; to this he, the Med[iato]r, had made what representations he could, but that the Ambassadors persisted, and with much animosity (as he told us he had made his observation) peremptorily demanded his offices as Med[iato]r to make these two Declarations in their names to the Allies.

“On the other hand, it was in the same time observed that the Imperial Ambassadors were as high in their language upon the matter of the Project itself, and nothing less would content them but to have the whole rejected as unreasonable and unjust. And they had been trying privately how far such a motion from them would take place with the Allies. But not finding the least encouragement to so sudden and violent a proceeding, they let it fall, and for the present contented themselves, as the Spaniards also did on their part, to give the Med[iato]r as an answer for the French, that they were preparing their Remarks by way of answer to each Article of the Project, in which they would use all possible dispatch.

“With this account from the Allies the Med[iato]r returned to the French, and so ordered the matter with them, as that we heard no more for that day of their two Declarations; only they returned us an answer by the Med[iato]r, that it was well, and that they must repeat again that no time was to be lost in the finishing those Remarks. And thus that matter was left; since which we find several meetings have been held amongst the several Ministers of the Empire, as well among themselves severally as between them and the Emperor’s Ambassadors, to consider of the several parts of the French Project, as it concerns each of them respectively, the particular results of which are not yet known, nor is it thought that hitherto they have been able to come to any resolution in the thing. In the mean time an express has been despatched to Vienna by the Imperialists, though it does not look as if the French will have patience to wait his return, without expecting an answer to their Project, and in all likelihood will proceed to put in the two Declarations above mentioned, or at least that which relates to the term prefixed for receiving the conditions.

“The double election in Poland continues to be supported with equal obstinacy on both sides, though that of the Elector of Saxe seems much the more likely to prevail, especially if the provision of money, which is talked of, be made good, for that, and that only, as is judged, will at last carry it in that country.

[P.S.] “Since my letter closed, the Dutch Ambassadors acquaint us, that having had notice given them from the French Ambassadors that they, the French Ambassadors, had received from Court an answer to our Project, the Dutch had sent to take an hour tomorrow morning to go to Delft to receive it; so as by the next we may be able to give your Grace an account of what sort it is, and what we are to apply ourselves to.”

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, July 17, Whitehall.—“I acquainted your Lordships on the 13th of this month that the Lords of the Council had approved the four Bills that lay then before them. The alterations their Lordships thought fit to make are inconsiderable. . . .

"I received on the 15th your Lordships' letter of the 12th of July, with several other Bills, which were the same day put into the hands of Mr. Attorney General to be considered, and on Tuesday next the Council will meet to receive his report." . . .

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1697, July 17, Whitehall.—"The Bills that are now sent have been dispatched with all possible expedition, and I hope will come time enough to be laid before the Parliament at their first meeting. I take this opportunity to acknowledge your Lordship's of the 12th. . . . The last Bills transmitted hither are under examination, and shall be returned as soon as the forms will possibly admit:

"I find the Lords here are so jealous of the honour of his Majesty's word, that I believe they will incline to let the clause for declaring when the war began in Ireland, remain as it is now, without that alteration which many in Ireland wish."

SHREWSBURY to [METHUEN,] LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND.

1697, July 17, Whitehall.—"By this express some Bills are transmitted, which I hope will come time enough to be laid before the Parliament at their first meeting. The alterations are very inconsiderable, as your Lordship will see by the enclosed paper. I take this opportunity to acknowledge yours of the 12th and to assure you that the Bills which came at the same time with that letter were that very day put under the consideration of Mr. Attorney, and all possible dispatch which the forms will allow shall be used to return them to you again. I can say nothing to the particulars of the several Bills, having not yet heard them read, only what I find by your Lordship and the Lords Justices' letters. The Lords here are so careful to do nothing that may call in question the honour of his Majesty's word, that as yet they do not seem inclined to make the alteration in the clause for declaring the commencement of the war, which several of the Irish Protestants desire; but that matter having not yet been fully considered, I speak now only by guess. I extremely rejoice that you find such a concurrence in all parties to intend the public good. I do not question but it will be improved by your prudence, and that you will continue your endeavours, that the right understanding which is now so perfect between the two Lords Justices may be lasting."

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1697, July [19-]29, Cockleberg.—"I have the honour of your Grace's letters of the 13th and 16th inst. His Majesty has been pleased to declare his willingness that my Lord Manchester be immediately dispatched, provided money can be got for the occasion, which your Grace will best understand from the Lords of the Treasury.

"His Majesty, having found no fault with Colonel Fletcher during his government, is pleased to allow of those favourable words, of taking care of him and otherwise employing him, which are not unusual in letters of revocation.

"The King has received information from many hands of the villainy of Comte Boselli, and particularly from my Lord Lexington, who has taken care to have him watched by the Emperor's Envoyé or Commissary in Italy; with whom his Lordship has personally concerted that matter, with the allowance and by the direction of the Emperor.

"Your Grace has been abundantly favourable to Mr. Povey, concerning whom and Mr. Vernon's son his Majesty's pleasure was signified by me to the Lords Justices by the last post. The King will be very soon going to Loo, there being no likelihood of any further action this campaign."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] July 19-29, Anvers.—"The last Saturday my Lord Portland had a fourth meeting with the Mareschal de Boufflers, who gave him in writing an account of such satisfaction and security as the French King will give our master. He did not leave his paper with my Lord, but gave him time and leisure to transcribe it. I have reason to believe the King was entirely satisfied, and that these Generals will need meet no more. They parted like friends. The rest is to be done now at Ryswyck. The world is now convinced that the war is no longer upon our King's account, and though the Imperialists do what they can to discredit the Project of Peace, which the French gave in the 26th, yet I hope the King or the States will one way or other persuade 'em to give in to it, before the end of August. The French are resolved to live upon us till then, and will eat up as much of this poor country as they can.

"We have some news here that the old King of Bantam has defeated the Hollanders, and regained possession of his throne. I am come hither upon my Lord Ranelagh's occasions."

SHREWSBURY TO SIR J. WILLIAMSON.

1697, July 20, Whitehall.—“My Lord, I have your Excellency’s of the 23rd, with the enclosed heads of a project proposed by the French, and do agree that they are more reasonable than I expected. I shall impatiently wait the event, for things are now driven to so narrow a compass that a little time must certainly show how sincere the intentions are both of our friends and enemies to a peace. His Majesty’s affairs here require some certainty in that matter, especially if the war last, for people have pleased themselves so long with the hopes of ease by a peace that it will need some time to dispose them to such resolutions as will be necessary in that case, and I do not doubt but they will cheerfully take when they are convinced they cannot be avoided without ruin.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 20, Whitehall.—“The Council having sat all this afternoon upon the Irish Bills lately transmitted from Ireland, they could go through but one—that for confirming the Outlawries. I have here enclosed sent you a copy of the notes I took at the Council, which are some of the principal heads of the Bill. The Lords having made few amendments, only added a proviso, to preserve his Majesty’s power of pardoning the lives of such of these persons outlawed, or who shall hereafter be outlawed, as he may see cause; and likewise to the six provisoes recommended by the Council of Ireland, and of which Mr. Vernon has sent you a copy, they have joined the same for my Lord Baltimore and Mr. Feilding. It was moved that a Bill of Association like what passed here should be recommended to the Council, and I suppose that will be ordered on Thursday, when the Lords meet again to go through with the remaining Bills. I desire the enclosed may be delivered to his Majesty.”

SHREWSBURY TO MR. HILL.

1697, July 20, Whitehall.—“I have yours of the 22nd, and by the same post have seen the project the French have given in, by which I hope the peace is more likely than ever. What sort of engagement they will make not to assist King James, or what they have to ask for him, or his followers, does not appear in that paper, where nothing on that subject is mentioned; but presuming those matters are previously agreed elsewhere to his Majesty’s satisfaction, I look upon the peace as almost infallible; at least we shall soon see the event, and the enemy cannot much longer cover their deceit, if there be any at the bottom; but I wish, and I believe, that they are fond of peace, and then we need not question but they will be sincere to their own interest.”

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, July 20, Whitehall.—“ The Council have been taken up all this afternoon with the consideration of the Bills lately transmitted by your Lordships, and have gone through and agreed to that only which is for confirming the Outlawries ; the others will be considered on Thursday, and in the meantime this will be transcribed. The alterations made are very few ; they have inserted the six clauses proposed by your Lordships and the Council of Ireland, for the saving my Lord Carlingford, &c., and to those persons they have added my Lord Baltimore and Mr. Feilding, who, having both warrants for the reversal of their outlawries, would notwithstanding have fallen under the rigour of this law without such a proviso. They have also added a clause to preserve the King’s power of pardoning the lives of any persons offending against this Act.

“ It was proposed that it should be recommended to your Lordships that a Bill should be prepared for associating in the same manner, and under the same penalties, as is here in England ; but this being mentioned just at the rising of the Council this evening, when it was very late, and everybody sufficiently tired with attendance, I cannot positively say I had directions to signify it to your Lordships, but it met with so universal an agreement that I conclude I shall on Thursday.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1697, July 20, Dublin Castle.—“ J’ay receu ce matin les deus lettres que nous m’aués fait l’honneur de m’escire ; ie repondray incessamment à la derniere, pour uous tirer de la peine que uous peut donner l’auis de M. Balls. Ce Conte Bouselli est le plus mechant homme du monde, capable des plus mauuaises actions ; il en a commis beaucoup. Il est condané à estre pendu à Milan, bani de Uenise, de Genes, et ce me semble des estats du Grand Duc. Les Venitiens ont ordoné de l’assassiner. La derniere fois qu’il estoit a Uenise, il estoit chés l’Ambassadeur de France, ce qui obligea le petit Conseil à se seruir de cette uoie indirecte pour s’en deffaire. L’Ambassadeur decouurit cet ordre, et le fit sauuer la nuit. Sa retraite est dans les estats du Duc de Mantoue, dans un chateau assés fort. Il est fort craint dans toute l’Italie.

“ Quelques gens, aussy gens de bien que luy, ont offert de l’assassiner, mais ils demandent une somme considerable ; et quelques personnes assés considerables, combatus entre la peur et l’auarice, et peut estre n’ayant pas assés d’argent, ont voulu engager lo Roy à payer cet assassinat, pour lequel on demande, sy ie m’en souuiens, uint mille pistoles. Ils m’ont fait donner des auis en diferents temps ; i’ay auerti le Roy, my Lord Portland, et M. Blathwait, parce que c’estoit dans le temps que S.M. estoit à l’Armeé. On m’a tousiours dit qu’il auoit uoulu se metre dans l’équipage des Ambassadeurs de Uenise pour passer en Angleterre, et en suite qu’il auoit ordre de passer en France, pour se rendre de la en l’landres.

“I’ay tenu pendant un an des gens seurs à sa suite, un homme à Genes, et un autre à Ligourne, qui le connoissoient. I’ay engagé un homme qui a de grandes habitudes en Italie, qui est ordinairement à Milan, et quelques fois à Venise, pour estre tousiours instruit de ce que fait ce Conte. I’ay lié sa correspondance avec M. Blathwait, par ordre du Roy, parcequ’il est aupres de sa personne à l’Armée, ou il y a le plas à craindre d’un pareil homme; et pour uous dire ma pensée, ie crois, my Lord, que dans le fond il n’y a rien à craindre, et que celuy qui uous donne l’auis ueut se rendre necessaire, pour tirer quelque argent. Cependant, comme il ne faut rien negliger dans une affaire de cette consequence, ie me suis laissé tromper pendant que i’ay esté en Italie, et i’ay pris toutes les precautions que i’ay cru praticables. Cela a enflé mes bills d’extraordinaire dans les contes que i’ay rendus. Ie uous renuoye le memoire, ne sachant pas sy c’est un original ou une copie.

“I’oublois à uous dire, my Lord, que ne uoulant pas entrer dans le dessein d’assassiner le Conte, i’ay pourtant uolu sauoir les sentiments du Roy, qui aprouua le refus que i’en auois fait; et estant à Londres, ie luy fis uoir la lettre par laquelle on me faisoit la mesme proposition, et il m’ordona de declarer positiuement qu’il ne uouloit en aucune maniere auoir part à cette execution. Uoila, my Lord, ce que ie puis uous faire sauoir sur cette matiere.

“A l’esgard du projet pour le payement des troupes, que i’ay enuoyé à Mr. Foxe, ie crois que la Tresorerie s’en reserue entierement la connoissance, mais il seroit à propos que ces M[ess]rs. se donassent le temps de l’examiner, et de nous faire sauoir leur sentiment.

“Ie crois que les Papistes augmenteront bien leurs plaintes, lorsqu’ils sauront que l’on ueut chasser les moines de ce païs cy; et sy cela est possible, il faudra quelque proclamation ou autre piece publique, qui regle le nombre des prestres qui seront tolerés dans le Royaume. Cette piece est difficile à metre au iour. On croit que ce seroit une liberté de conscience, et qui excederoit beaucoup la toleration. Cependant, my Lord, nous penserons icy, et chercherons tous les expedients possibles pour cela, mais ie doute fort que nous puissions reussir; et apres les difficultés icy, ie crois, my Lord, qu’il y en aura aussy en Angleterre. Mais ie crois qu’il n’y a rien de meilleur pour nous, que d’auoir un nombre de prestres fixe, conus par le Gouuernement, et que le mesme Gouuernement entre dans le detail de leurs appointements. Ie soumetts le tout à uostre iugement.”

VILLIERS TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, July [20-]30, n.s., Hague.—“I have the honour of two from your Grace of the 13th and 16th. I do not doubt but that you are informed immediately from the Army, that [the] point relating to his Majesty is adjusted between the Mareschal de

Boufflers and my Lord Portland; and though King James is not to be named, yet the article is expressed in such terms that all the world will see that he is chiefly designed in it, and that the King of France is so strictly obliged not to encourage any cabal, or favour anything that may disturb his Majesty in the quiet possession of the Crown, that without an open violation of his word he never can be able to do us any mischief of this nature.

“Our business therefore is looked upon as done, and we have orders to concert such methods as may best conduce towards bringing the Germans to a speedy conclusion. My Lord, there will be so many difficulties found in effecting this, that I am afraid the peace will be retarded longer than we could wish; for it is certain that the Imperialists do not really design a peace, and must be constrained to accept it. His Majesty will be quickly at Loo, and his being so near us, I hope, will very much contribute to the dispatch of our affairs.”

R. 26. Ansd. 30 July.

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, July 20-30, Hague.—“My last was of the 16-26, since which I have received the honour of your Excellency’s of the same day, for which I return my most humble acknowledgments. The apostill I took leave to add in my last, as to the answer said to be come from the French Court to our Project, proved a mistake in him that gave that information to the Dutch Ambassadors, for upon their going to demand it from the French on Saturday morning, they were answered that it was not yet arrived, but that they expected it every day; so as we suppose it will not be long before we hear from them upon that matter, especially considering that, by what we are informed of the two last conferences between my Lord Portland and the Marshal de Boufflers, our main point with France is in a manner adjusted to the King’s satisfaction; so as that all the rest of our business, which consists in eight or ten Articles of that Project, of ordinary and common form, cannot have much difficulty in them. And thus it has pleased God, while we here are losing our time in formal meetings and conferences at Ryswicke, that the King, by a most wise and happy counsel taken in the Camp, has done our work to our hands; and happy it is that it was done there, for in all likelihood, according as we found the humours of the three French Ambassadors, and considering the nature of that point in question, it would scarce have ever been done here.

“This adjustment of our great point is not yet openly owned by us here, though we find it has taken wind, and is in the general discourse of the town as a thing done, or as good as done. So as your Grace, till you hear it further spoken of, will please to make your own use of it, though we have reason to believe your Excellencies may have had the knowledge of it by the time this comes to your Grace’s hand, directly from the King himself.

“The Spanish Ambassador, the Baron de Tillemont, has been with me this morning, and could tell me all the particulars of this matter, and that all was agreed between my Lord Portland and Mons. de Boufflers as to that article; and told it me with great satisfaction, as the only means to hasten this whole negotiation of the Peace, to which I find the Spaniards are resolved to concur with all imaginable diligence, and be ready to help (as soon as their own affair is finally settled) to bring the Emperor to the same reasonable temper. So as, by the blessing of God, things seem from henceforth to be in a fair way of settlement, and that in a short time.

“The greatest difficulty is foreseen on the part of the Emperor and Empire. That is, the first for particular respects will insist as to Lorraine, and the body of the Empire, for their own safety, seem resolved not to leave Strasbourg in the French hands. But when all’s done, the reason and interest of the whole must govern and determine all particular considerations. Only in the manner and circumstances of doing it a consideration of decency and good manners is to be used. And that seems to be the point now that we and the Ministers of this State are more particularly concerned to have in our eye.

“God Almighty continue to direct all for the best, and ever preserve your Grace in this happy state of health we are told, to our great joy, you now enjoy.”

R. 26. Ansd. 30.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [July 22-] Aug. 1, Bruxelles.—“I have just time to thank your Grace tonight for the honour of your letter of the 16th. The King would leave us after tomorrow, but the Elector is come hither from Flanders, and would fain command this army so soon as the King goes away; but his Majesty’s intention being to leave the command thereof to the Prince of Vaudemont, and of the army in Flanders to the Elector’s care, we are all puzzled how to satisfy ’em all.

“My Lord Portland has another compliment from Mr. Boufflers, and they are to meet again tomorrow.

“The peace does go forward as much as I can perceive. My Lord Albemarle is gone away already; he goes by the Hague, and so to Loo.

“The enemies have posted themselves so as to eat as much as they can of this country securely.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 23, Whitehall.—“Having had no letters from Flanders since my last, this only is to acquaint you that yesterday the Bills for confirming the Art[icles] of Limerick, and that for barring the Remainders and Reversions dependent or expectant on Estates Tail forfeited to his Majesty, passed the Council. These two, with the other for confirming the Outlawries mentioned in my last, are the three public Bills of the greatest moment that have come from thence, and will now be transmitted thither, as soon as they can be transcribed and put under the Great Seal. In these two last there were no alterations made worth his Majesty's knowledge. That for the confirmation of the Articles seems very full, and without exception, unless the Irish will find fault with the day determined for the commencement of the war, viz. the 10th of April, but all impartial people think that is the most reasonable, and it was so directed by his Majesty. A great many honest gentlemen in Ireland desired the clause marked A, instead of that marked B, but when they were told by the Lords Justices there, that would not sufficiently make good his Majesty's word, but leave so many doors open to suits for damages that it was in a manner doing nothing for the quieting people's minds, which was his Majesty's design, as well as it had been his promise, they in the Council who pressed it and were the majority, presently desisted, and submitted all to the King's pleasure, and accordingly sent over the Bill, and it is now passed here in the words of the clause B."

VILLIERS TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, [July 23-] Aug. 2, n.s., Hague.—“I have the honour of yours of the 20th past, and am glad to find that your Grace thinks the French Project so reasonable. I wish we could bring our Imperialists to the same belief of it. Tomorrow they intend to give in their remarks upon it. I do not expect, my Lord, that they should be anywise conclusive, but at last we shall be obliged to compel them to do that which they will not otherwise understand to be for their good. The King is expected at Breda tomorrow night; his Majesty has ordered me to wait upon him there; I hope it is to receive his further orders towards hastening our negotiation. The honour I have in bearing a part of it is very much augmented by your Grace's favour and good wishes to me in it, and I shall always serve with the greatest satisfaction whilst I have the continuance of your Grace's protection.”

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, [July 23-] Aug. 2, Hague.—“My last was of the 30th past, since which I have received the honour of your Excellency's of the same day. What I writ imperfectly to your Grace by the last ordinary of the success of my Lord Portland's conferences with Mons. de Boufflers is since that time become the common and open news of this place; and we ourselves, having been called upon by the Imperialists for an account of that report, have frankly owned to them, and so we have to all our Allies, that the great point of our business, the Article of not assisting King James, has been in a manner agreed with the French to his Majesty's satisfaction; that other points of the Peace may have been spoken of at those conferences, but that we know of none, not so much as any other of our own, that have been settled or agreed on. Nay, some that nearly concern us, as the restitution of Orange, &c., we are assured are not settled. This we are forced to speak the more largely and fully in, to take away the jealousy we find the Imperialists possessed with, as if the King had in effect consented with France as to the conditions of the Peace to be made with the Emperor and Empire.

“ We are now pressing forward, as on the one hand the French to adjust the remaining Articles of our own Project, so on the other hand the Imperialists and our other Allies to finish their Remarks by way of answer to the Project given them by France, which we are told was [were?] perfected yesterday morning by the several ministers of the Princes of the Empire, and would the last night be given in to the Imperial Embassy for their consideration and concurrence, so as that it might be transmitted by the Mediator to the French, at least tomorrow morning. This is what was thought fit last night, at a meeting held at the Pensioner’s between us and the Ambassadors of this State (where happened likewise to come in the two Spanish Ambassadors), to be pressed upon the Imperialists this morning by my Lord Pembroke and Mons. Dyckvelt, as in our joint names. And these diligences towards that Embassy are thought the more necessary, for that Mons. Heemskerke, the Minister of this State at Vienna, writes them word in his last despatches that absolutely the Court there is not for a peace at present; whereof the Pensioner some days since gave us notice, and therefore concluding that all our cares are to be turned that way.”

1697, [July 25-] Aug. 4, Breda.—“ The King having been always busy or in motion since the honour I have received of your Grace’s letter of the 20th past, I have not been yet able to lay before his Majesty your Grace’s notes concerning the Irish Bills, nor the several papers I have had from Mr. Vernon, upon which some directions may be expected by the next post. I did not fail to present to his Majesty your Grace’s letter of the same date.

“ The Czar is coming into Holland, and if he desire to see the Army, his Majesty will make another turn thither to gratify his curiosity. I am writing to Mr. Secretary to know from the Merchants what advantages in trade we may endeavour to obtain from the good nature of the Czar on this occasion, our neighbours enjoying much greater than we do in his dominions since our privileges have been taken from us, which happened upon the death of King Charles the First, which the Muscovites pretended to resent from the nation.”

1697, July 26, Whitehall.—“ I have acquainted the King with the information you sent me about Count Bouzelli, and have given directions for a further enquiry to be made concerning him. I desire likewise you will write to your correspondent at Genoua, to encourage the person who gave the said information still to have a watchful eye over the said Bouzelli, who I find is a man of a very ill character, and as he hears anything material and fit for his Majesty to know, to send hither an account of it."

I told him I could give no orders in such a matter as this, without his Majesty's particular directions, which if your Lordship at your leisure will please to take, and transmit to me, they shall be obeyed to the best of my capacity." . . . #### SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 27, Whitehall.—"I have yours of the 25th and 29th. This morning Mr. Povey was sworn Clerk of the Council in Ordinary, and Mr. Vernon's son in Extraordinary.

"I have enclosed sent you an extract of what my Lord Gallway writes about Comte Bouzelli, and I have endeavoured to have him observed by the person who gave the first account from Genoua.

"The Bill for confirming the Outlawries, and that for barring Remainders, was [were] this evening sent for Ireland. That for confirming the Art[icles] of Limerick had been likewise dispatched, but for the defect that was at last discovered, and of which you will have a full account from Mr. Vernon. Those who are the best acquainted with the Irish gentlemen's inclinations apprehend the ill consequence of this; for if the Bill be transmitted as it now is, it may possibly not so exactly agree with all that was promised under the Great Seal, as his Majesty's strict justice would incline him to wish. On the other side, if the addition be made according to the amendment in that instrument, it may prove very prejudicial to his Majesty's interest. Most people apprehended the Bill will be rejected, but if it should not, all concur that the estates of many notorious offenders will be covered, and nothing more certainly contribute to alter the good disposition of the gentlemen of Ireland, who without some such unlucky accident seem now perfectly well inclined to serve his Majesty and the public interest. But his Majesty will have a better account of this when the Lords Justices of Ireland shall give their reasons why this additional clause was omitted in the Bill, and no notice taken or reason given for it in the several letters they have writ."

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, July 27, Whitehall.—“ You will receive by this messenger the Bill for confirming the Outlawries, and that for barring the Remainders. The third public Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick is respited for the reason Mr. Vernon will give your Lordships more at large by command of the Lords Justices here.

“ I shall only add that by direction of the Council I am to recommend to your Lordships the case of my Lord of Lowth, whose petition I here enclose. It appears that though his father might die in rebellion during the late war, he has not yet been attainted, but that this present Lord, his son, has enjoyed his title and estate, as being justly comprehended within the Articles of Limerick. But by this Bill now transmitted there being a power left to attain all persons dead in rebellion, if any process of that kind should go out against the late Lord, within the time limited for such prosecutions, this present Lord would lose that honour and estate he was in possession of at the surrender of Limerick, which would be so great a hardship, and so manifest a breach of those Articles, that I am directed to recommend it to your Lordship's care that no such process be permitted to go out against the late Lord Lowth as may be prejudicial to his son's inheritance.

“ Upon Thursday the Council have appointed to take into consideration some of the other Bills now lying before them.”

Copy. Enclosure:—

Petition of Oliver, Lord Baron of Lowth, to the Lords Justices of England in Council. His father, Matthew, died unattainted (&c., as above). Prays to have a proviso in the Bill for confirming Attainders.

SHREWSBURY to [METHUEN,] LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND.

1697, July 27, Whitehall.—“ By this express you will receive the Bills for confirming the Outlawries and barring the Remainders. That for confirmation of the Articles of Limerick had likewise been transmitted at the same time, but that upon some notice given and a more strict enquiry, it is found that the words which his Majesty thought fit to add, upon the pretence made that they were omitted by mistake or surprise, are left out in this Bill you have sent over, and consequently all which his Majesty has promised under the Great Seal is not made good.

“ For your further understanding in this matter, I have enclosed a copy of this last clause of the warrant for ratifying the said Articles. We here are very sensible that this addition might be overlooked upon your apprehension that it would be much disliked by the gentlemen in Ireland, and possibly occasion the miscarriage of the whole Bill. But having heard nothing from the Lords Justices, your Lordship, nor the Council of Ireland, but that this Bill was entirely agreeable to the Articles passed under the Great Seal here, and finding so material a difference, the Lords Justices and Council here thought they could do no otherwise than respite their consent till they understood from Ireland what were the motives for omitting these words (and all such as are under their protections in the said counties), in which so many people are concerned.

“Mr. Vernon, by direction from us here, will write this more at large to the Lords Justices. I shall therefore only add, that I hope they will be very plain in their answer, and I do not question but whatever they shall represent as necessary for the King’s interest, and particularly for the success of the present Sessions, will very readily be agreed to here.

“This is a very busy day, and the messenger is just a-going, and I want time to say so much to the two Lords Justices separately, and I did not think it proper to be put in a letter I write to them jointly upon my Lord Lowth’s case; your Lordship will oblige me, to communicate this at your leisure to them.”

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, July 27, Dublin Castle.—“I received the favour of your Lordship’s of the 17th, and I am very glad that you have sent us some Bills from England, and do find that these Bills will be very acceptable to the people here. And we are extremely obliged to your Lordship for getting them dispatched so soon. As to what you mention of the Lords being very careful of maintaining the King’s honour, with submission I think it entirely preserved, that being the day the King gave in his proclamation for their laying down their arms; and a reason that made us name that day was because the House of Commons, in my Lord Capell’s time, desired it might be the 10th of April. . . .

“This day we opened the Parliament, but the House of Commons were but thin, there being but few Members come to town, by reason of a report that was industriously spread that we intended to adjourn them for a fortnight; but we took all the care we could to let everybody know that our intentions (sic) was that they should proceed immediately on business. . . .

[P.S.] “There is one Mr. Lowther dead at the Bath, that was a Commissioner in the Revenue here, which place I don’t doubt but a great many will put in for. Mr. Savage says that formerly the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a Commissioner of the Revenue, which is the reason that his salary is but 200*l.* per annum. I believe our old friend Sir H. Vane would accept of being a Commissioner of the Revenue. Whatever is done, I suppose the King won’t do it until the Parliament is over.”

SHREWSBURY to SIR J. WILLIAMSON.

1697, July 30, Whitehall.—“My Lord, I have four of your letters to acknowledge, the 26th and 30th July, and the 2nd and 6th August, all n.s. It is very comfortable to perceive that every letter gives better hopes of peace. It must ever be owned, to his Majesty's great glory, that he has contributed more to it, by own [one] seasonable step of his own, than would have been effected in many months by the ministers of all the Princes of Europe. Such a work as this cannot be accomplished without some difficulties; but these which remain seem to me so much more easy than those which are already overcome, that I cannot doubt but it will end to his Majesty's satisfaction, and the establishing him safe and glorious on these thrones.”

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, July 30, Whitehall.—“I have your letter of the 4th of August, n.s., from Breda. I shall give my Lord Manchester notice to prepare for his journey, having already understood the Treasury will be ready to supply him. I find it is very earnestly pressed by my Lord, and by Mr. Mountague in his behalf, that he should have an allowance for a Secretary of the Embassy, they looking upon it as a sort of diminution that he should be retrenched what my Lord Fauconberg formerly had upon the same occasion, and what is generally the custom in the like cases. I submit it to his Majesty whether he will not gratify my Lord; the expense will be but forty shillings a day for a small time, and perhaps such a person may be more necessary in Venice than in another place where they are not so exact in ceremonies.

“His Majesty having commanded me the last spring, when several grants were to be passed for lands in Ireland, to assure Col. Wolseley that nothing should be done to his prejudice, I have received the enclosed paper from him, by which it appears some of the lands he has in possession are already passed, and others are a-passing. He therefore desires me to remind his Majesty of his gracious promise, and to petition him that he may have a grant or long lease of such as are left.

“Major-Gen. Trelawney, having understood that the Lords Justices here do not think proper to proceed on the warrant his Majesty signed before his leaving England, for the putting the Militia of Plimouth under his command, expects from me (the warrant remaining in my office) that I should acquaint his Majesty that no proceeding has been upon it. It is a justice I cannot refuse the Major-General, though at the same time I am confident the Lords have very good reasons for their reply; and I myself am sensible that whenever that is adjusted, it will want his Majesty’s own power and authority, to which both will submit, and to anything less, neither.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1697, July 30, Whitehall.—“I have received yours of the 25th and 29th of July, and the 1st and 5th of August, n.s. The intrigues you mention in the first I shall easily forget, because I had difficulty to persuade myself they were sincere, but the town is full and fond of the news. This I assure you, I am ever careful what I repeat out of your letters, lest it might be guessed from whence I have it.

“After the compliments and assurances that have passed between the two Kings, I look upon the peace as infallible. If the King of France had not been sincere in his desire of one, he would never have permitted M. le Mareschal de Boufflers to have gone so far as the settling of articles, which it had been easy for him to have avoided; and if he, the King of England, and the States resolve to agree, one must say, the rest of the Allies must. I am glad you have succeeded in renewing the peace you were employed in; a breach there would be of the last ill consequence to both. I hope ere long the subject of that strife will be at an end. Having had a relapse of my disease, I dare not write long.”

JO. METHUEN TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, July 30, Dublin.—“Having seen what my Lords Justices have wrote to your Grace, I do not trouble you with anything of the Parliament, save that the party of my late Lord Chancellor, and in particular the gentleman your Grace saw in our company, show all the desire imaginable to revive the faction in the House, but we hope to prevent it. I have enclosed the scheme of the money, as it appears to me; what changes we may make before the time of using it, I will inform your Grace, begging that you will please to show it to my Lord Chancellor [Somers], if you think it proper, it being impossible for me to write another this night, and not daring to trust anyone to copy it.

“Upon the comparing the Bill for banishing the regular Clergy, I find we are quite undone by the clause added for vesting in the King the concealed lands of Guilds, Chantries, &c., since that clause concerns abundance of Protestants, and in the form it is penned will destroy the settlement of Ireland, by breaking into the Act of Settlement and Explanation; many of those concealed lands having been forfeited, seized, and sequestered, and granted by that Act in small parcels to adventurers and soldiers. There seems no remedy but to send over a new Bill without that clause, but I shall be able to give your Grace a better account next post. The Bill being so very acceptable, it is a very great disappointment.”

VILLIERS TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, [July 30.] Aug. 9, n.s., Hague.—“Whilst I was at Breda I found the King still in the mind that our negociation should be put to a conclusion. My Lord Portland’s journey to the Hague was for the same end. In his visits to the Imperialists and Spaniards, he gave them an account of what passed between him and the Mareschal de Boufflers, and told them that the King would have them come very soon to some determination in the whole affair; but he surprised the Imperialists in telling them that his Majesty was of opinion that it was for the interest of the King of Spain to take an equivalent for Luxembourg. As well the Imperialists as the other German Ministers are remonstrating to us the ill consequence of leaving Luxembourg in the French hands, but this is referred to his Majesty, who certainly knows the interest of these countries better than any man, and if he pleases to have an equivalent taken, it will avail but very little what our Germans can say to the contrary.”

R. 3rd, o.s. Ansd. the same day.

SHREWSBURY TO MANCHESTER.

1679, July 31, Whitehall.—“Having received an answer from Mr. Blaithwayt that his Majesty is desirous your Lordship should be dispatched as soon as the Treasury can supply you with money, and understanding from Mr. Mountagu that you will meet with no delay there, I thought myself obliged to give you this notice, and at the same time to acquaint you that by the last post I presumed to lay my reasons before his Majesty, why I thought your Lordship should be allowed a secretary of the embassy to attend you in this journey. If in anything else I can be useful, I desire you will command.

1697, July 31, Whitehall.—"I have received yours of the 25th, and am very sensible that the want of provisions has rendered ineffectual all the service one might otherwise expect from the Fleet this summer. The relief of Barcelona would have been an action of great advantage and reputation; and, considering how well they have defended themselves, might have been done in the manner you mention, if want of victuals had not made the detaching such a squadron for so long a time impracticable.

"I return you many thanks for [your] concern and good wishes for my health. I was in hopes it had been better confirmed than I now find it to be, having had lately a relapse into my former distemper."

1697, Aug. [2-]12, Loo.—“ I have the honour of your Grace’s of the 27th past, and once more return my humble thanks for your Grace’s favour to Mr. Povey.

“ His Majesty has seen what your Grace and my Lord Galway write of Bouzelli. His Majesty thinks all is done concerning him that is proper.

“ Mr. Vernon has given an account from the Lords Justices of the clause omitted in the Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick, and of the difficulty there is either way ; whereupon his Majesty has determined to respite the signification of his pleasure until their Excellencies receive information from the Lords Justices of Ireland of the cause of the omission.

“ Your Grace receives from the Hague an account of what passes there relating to the Peace, which is now in a very fair way of being agreed, and more apparently so since the declaration of his Majesty’s opinion concerning Luxembourg.

SHREWSBURY TO VILLIERS.

1697, Aug. 3, Whitehall.—“ I am glad to find by yours of the 9th which I have just received, that his Majesty resolves not to suffer this negociation to cool, which seems near a happy conclusion. I am not able to determine whether Luxembourg or the equivalent be best ; I do not so much as know what is proposed for the equivalent ; but I am certain the King is so good a judge what is most advantageous for that common cause of Europe, which he has so gloriously supported for many years, that since a deference is necessary to agree divided interests, it can nowhere so reasonably be paid as to him, who will I hope make use of it, to obtain a speedy conclusion, which is most earnestly wished by all his friends here.”

SHREWSBURY TO THE LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, Aug. 3, Whitehall.—“ I have received your Lordships’ letter of the 24th, and immediately enquired after the Bill you there recommend for the relief of Poor Prisoners, but find that it was rejected by the Council here on the 28th of November, 1695.

“ This afternoon has been spent in considering the rest of the Bills lying here. That for translating the Archiepiscopate See of Tuam to Gallway was agreed to some days since. The three private Bills of Stopford, Barry, and Barton are passed, but upon this occasion I am directed by the Lords Justices and Council to acquaint your Lordships that the ancient custom has ever been, that all such persons as have a desire to have private Bills passed in Ireland, should first petition the King in Council for leave to offer such a Bill, and his Majesty's consent has always been the foundation for that Bill; by which means time is given to all parties to apply, and not to be surprised by too hasty proceedings, which they do not doubt but your Lordships have at this time prevented by your care in transmitting no private Bills without first hearing all the parties concerned.

"The Bill for Tithes was under consideration, but some objection was made to it, as thinking it very severe to confirm a law made in the reign of Henry the Eighth for imprisoning the Quakers, which, though in force in England, has very rarely been put in practice, by reason of its severity. Their Lordships have it therefore under their thoughts to make some alterations, and it will be further debated the next Council day.

"The Bill for the relief of subjects against dormant Judgments has likewise been considered, but it appearing to be of a nature that has sometimes been endeavoured, but never could pass in a Parliament here, I am directed to acquaint your Lordships that the Lords Justices and Council do desire that this Bill may have a further consideration in Ireland, and that my Lord Chancellor with all the Judges do consult, and give their opinion upon it, it seeming to several of the Lords to be of a very dangerous consequence."

SHREWSBURY to SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, Aug. 3, Whitehall.—"Just as I am going to write I receive yours of the 8th, n.s., from Loo, which requires no answer. If when I see Mr. Vernon's letters there be any occasion, I shall add to this trouble. In the mean time I am desired by my Lord Manchester, that his request may be laid before his Majesty in behalf of Mr. Meeres, that he may succeed Mr. Davenant, now dead, who was lately admitted an Exempt in the Yeomen of the Guard. Mr. Meeres bought this employment, and was in possession of it at his Majesty's first coming to the Crown, and was then removed upon some unjust representation, as my Lord Manchester is now satisfied. The King will remember how much trouble the contest between these gentlemen gave him the last winter, and how far my Lord Manchester did then espouse the interest of Mr. Meeres, as did also my Lord Tankerville. There is now an opportunity of restoring this gentleman, if his Majesty be so disposed. Just now my Lord Tankerville has been with me to recommend the same business in his own, Sir Scroop How, and several other honest gentlemen's names."

D’ailleurs la lettre du Conseil uous expliquera plus au long les importantes raisons qui font souhaiter que cette clause ne soit pas ajoutée. J’y ajouteray seulement qu’il faut bien prendre garde que cette difficulté ne fasse pas perdre ce Bill, qui est de tres grande consequence pour ce Royaume ; car sy le jour du commencement de la guerre n’est pas fixé par un Acte du Parlement, rien n’est certain dans le Royaume. Sy l’additional article est compris dans l’Acte, beaucoup de terres confisqueés et mesme donneés par le Roy seront disputeés, et par consequent cet article sera contesté, et peut estre fera rejeter le Bill. Cependant, sy V. E.<sup>o</sup> croyent l’honneur du Roy en quelque maniere engagé dans la confirmation de cet additional article, on peut le faire ajouter au Bill : nous ferons ce que nous pourons pour faire passer l’Acte, qui ne trouueroit point de difficulté sans cet amendement.

“ Je dois encore ajouter, my Lord, sur le premier Bill, qu’il est de grande consequence de nous l’enuoyer sans la clause qui y a esté ajoutée, et qui ne passeroit pas icy. Sans cela, on croira dans ce Royaume que ce Bill a esté envoyé pour leur en donner l’esperance, et les engager à faire ce qu’on souhaite d’eus, et que la clause y a esté ajoutée afin de le faire perdre. Uous iugés bien, my Lord, que dans le train que sont nos affaires, une telle mefiance y feroit un fort grand tort. Je soumetts le tout à uostre prudence.”

for the interest of the Protestants here; and I believe the Parliament, if they do pass it with those additional words, it would go down very hardly. Tomorrow the House goes into a Committee to vote a Supply, and we will quicken them all we can, and do hope things will go well."

JO. METHUEN to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. 3, Dublin.—“I have the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 27th past, and your Grace will receive the answer of the Council, and my Lord[s] Justices’ own thoughts. The very truth is, that those words were overlooked in the first drawing of the Bill by my Lord Chief Justice Hely, and never insisted on by any one of those Lords in the Council that usually look very sharply for everything of that kind; but in the long debate about the penning of that Bill, I was forced to draw it all over again, and saw very well the omission, but being fully satisfied that it was of very evil consequence here, and believing likewise, by what I had observed in the House of Commons, that the words would be ill looked on in England, I was prepared to oppose them; but nobody giving me any occasion, I would not mention it in the letter from the Council.

“I believe the Bill will be much more acceptable without those words, and that there will be some inconvenience in putting them in; but coming from England, and being put in out of regard to the King’s honour, I am very confident the Bill will pass, although the words are inserted. In case the words of the letter of the Council should be thought a little too strong, I beg your Grace to excuse it to the Lords Justices, it being of absolute necessity in respect of four or five of the Council, who are continually catching hold of every occasion that may favour an interest different from what is thought the interest of the Protestants. If therefore your Grace please to endeavour that we may have the Bill without the words, if not, then with the words inserted, as soon as possible.

“The adding the clause of the Guilds and Chantries to the other Bill was very unfortunate, and besides, the delay hath taken off from our credit, and made it believed that there are ill agents in England; but if we can obtain the Bill as now sent, with speed, we shall regain our credit, and people will be generally pleased.

“We have been in great danger of relapsing into parties and factions as bad as ever, which keep us perpetually on our watch. It began by Mr. Savage heading a party to turn Mr. Solicitor Broderick out of the chair of the Committee of Elections before he came to town; to do which he made a very reflecting speech against Mr. Solicitor, which was not seconded, but we contrived to put Mr. Mouldsworth in the chair. Upon Mr. Solicitor’s coming to town all was in a flame, but by the good management of my Lords Justices, who interposed strongly with Mr. Savage, we thought the matter settled. But this day, upon the motion for a Supply, when the House was willing to go presently into a Committee to vote a Supply unanimously, then a party was made by the same persons to put Mr. Thomas Broderick out of the chair for money, which perfectly hindered the business, and made it be put off till tomorrow, when I am very confident it will be done nemine contradicente; but how we shall govern the matter of the chair I cannot so well tell. All parties do their utmost to persuade us that nothing of this either can or will hinder the King's business; on the contrary, they persuade me it may be managed the better; which although I am apt to believe, yet I see it so secure if things remain quiet, that I would not willingly hazard anything.

"In all these matters the truth is, that party which were my Lord Capell's friends are at present much more moderate, more governable, and more at the dispose of my Lords Justices, and certainly more entirely for the King's service; the others are the aggressors in everything. I hope this will be the last letter wherein I shall mention anything of this matter to your Grace, but my thoughts are so full of it that it was hard not to trouble your Grace a little, for which I beg your pardon. The zeal of the House of Commons appeared in refusing to admit Mr. Sanderson, who was expelled for not taking the Association, although he was chosen again, and there was much to be said for him."

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Aug. [3-]13, Hague.—(The first portion of this letter is printed by Coxe.)

"Mons. de Quiros, the first of the Spanish Embassy, is gone to Flanders, to argue (as is supposed) with the El[ecto]r of Baviere the point of the equivalent for Luxembourg, in which it is supposed the El[ecto]r had sent him peremptory orders to consent, and to which he himself in his own judgment was enough resolved; only the Spanish methods must be pursued—to be pressed to do what already they desire and are resolved on.

"We have this morning, at the desire of the C[ount] Terlemont, the other Ambassador of Spain, had a meeting with the Ambassadors of this State; in which that Ambassador stated the points in difference between Spain and France, together with the last answer or Remarks given in by him and his colleagues as to the French Project, in which there seems nothing but what will be without difficulty adjusted. He made his principal business to be to know of us and the Ambassadors of this State, clearly and plainly, whether we were resolved to make peace. The question appeared to be proposed by him with a very good and kind meaning; but the terms being as they were, could not have a direct answer made to them. It was therefore said for all answer (and he went away well satisfied with it) that, considering the present state of things, and the condition of the Allies, we continued in the opinion (that it seems had been often and often declared among these Ministers these eight or nine months) that it was very necessary for the Allies to make the Peace, without saying particularly what we would do. To which he replied that the King his master, on his side, would be of the same opinion, and that no fault should be in them to do it with all expedition."

“Being informed that the packet-boat which had on board the letters from hence of the 20th of the last month is taken, I here enclose a copy of the letter I troubled your Lordships with by that post.

“I thought to have sent your Lordships some account about the Bill of Tithes, but the Lords of the Council are yet come to no resolution concerning it.”

1697, Aug. 5, Whitehall.—“I have your Lordship’s of the 27th, and am glad the Bills you had then received arrived in time, and were likely to be agreeable to the gentlemen of Ireland, whose good disposition I hope will continue to the finishing what may be necessary for the good of the nation. I wish we had not met with great difficulties about the Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick. . . .

“What I mentioned of the Lords here being very careful in maintaining the King’s honour, had no relation to the 10th of April, a day which nobody here had any exceptions to, nor to anything else that was then observed in the Bill, but to that clause only which was proposed by some at Council, and was sent over by your Lordships for our consideration, to be inserted instead of another clause, if it were thought agreeable to his Majesty’s honour.

“Your Lordship will have understood that Mr. Lowther’s employment is disposed of by his Majesty for the replacing Mr. Carlton, who in most people’s opinion had hard measure before, in being removed. I should be very glad to serve the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but if I am not misinformed, the way he has begun to take will do him more prejudice than his friends can do him good. If he give occasion to mistrust that he is fomenting instead of allaying animosities, I hope your Lordship will use the authority you ought to have over him, and advise him better. . . . The last vote of the first day of the Session does not leave me without doubt that some ill humour is breeding, which, if not carefully prevented in time, may disturb and spoil the whole business."

1697, Aug. 5, Whitehall.—“I am very glad to find by your Lordship’s of the 28th that the first Bills were dispatched from hence in time, and to your satisfaction. Those for confirming the Attainders and barring Remainders will I believe be with you as soon as you could reasonably expect them. That for the Articles of Limerick had received the same dispatch, but for the difficulty which you will have been informed of in former letters, and upon which we are now expecting your answer. It is impossible that such a number of men should meet as compose a Parliament, but some, either by interest or inclination, will be disposed to disturb business; but when one reflects that what is asked is in order to their own safety and advantage, one cannot suspect there will be many of that mind, and I hope all things will end as happily as you expect, though the last resolution of the 27th July seems to lead to an enquiry that may occasion some heat.”

WINCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. 5, Dublin.—“I writ to your Lordship last post, and yesterday the House of Commons voted a supply, and have sent to us for the state of the Revenue and Debt, and the deficiencies of the last Aids, which we have given directions to be done today; and on Saturday they are to go into a Committee of the whole House, at which time I hope they will vote the quantum what they will give, which I will be sure to give your Grace an account of.

“Here had like to have happened an unlucky business at the beginning, which I was afraid might have set the two parties on foot again, which was (I suppose your Grace knows that Tom Broderick was in the Chair in the House for Money, and the Solicitor [Alan Brodrick] in that for the Committee of Elections) that Mr. Savage and his party were for removing them from both Chairs, and did remove Mr. Solicitor, and Mr. Savage did say something that was reflecting on Mr. Solicitor; so I was extremely concerned what might be the consequence of this, but with much ado I made them friends.

“But still there was another difficulty about Mr. Tom Broderick, who was in the Chair for the Money, and Mr. Savage’s friends had a great mind to put him in the Chair; but I prevailed with Mr. Savage on my account to be out of the House, and so proposed Mr. Solicitor, who was chose without a division; and now they promise to go on together in the King's business, and I will be very watchful to endeavour to keep them friends, if I can. Mr. Savage does promise me that he will make everything as easy as he can. If he does continue to do so to the end of the Sessions, I believe he will very well deserve your remembrance of him to be a Commissioner of the Revenue.

"Here are people that do endeavour to blow the coal, but I hope we shall get over it all. I hear that Mr. Annslow and some others has [have] a mind to propose to make a fund of the forfeited lands not already passed, and that he will mention particularly the grant that my Lord Portland has of my Lord Clenkarty's estate, and that they had some thoughts of asserting their right of making Bills, and not only heads of Bills, which would bring the Sole Right in question again; but I don't question but we shall prevent both these things."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697, July 26-] Aug. 5, s.n.,<sup>o</sup> Bruxelles.—“I must humbly thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 20th past, and tell you that the last Friday my Lord Portland had another meeting with the Mareschal de Boufflers. All things passed between ’em with the greatest marks of friendship and sincerity imaginable, and with great expressions of the esteem and confidence which the French King has for ours. All which they had transacted before was now confirmed ; and whereas my Lord Portland had said our King would refer himself entirely to the generosity and justice of the French King for the restitution of Orange (which had been debated in the former conferences), Mons. de Boufflers said his master was wonderfully pleased with that mark of the King’s confidence, and would give orders about that matter to our King’s entire satisfaction. And whereas my Lord Portland had recommended the interests of the Prince of Vaudemont to the King of France, as one for whom his Majesty had a particular friendship, &c., Mons. Boufflers did now answer that his master was pleased also with that act of our King’s, and would show how glad he was to do everything which might be agreeable to the King of England, whose friendship he would purchase at any rate. Besides these and other such articles, Mons. de Boufflers assured my Lord, that his master had given very positive orders to his Ministers at Delft to go on frankly and sincerely to a conclusion of the treaty.

“I have now seen, my Lord, the paper which my Lord Portland did copy at the precedent conference from the original which was showed him by the Mareschal de Boufflers. It is an article to be inserted in the treaty of peace verbatim, by which the King of France for himself and his heirs does swear not to molest the King of England (that is K[ing] W[illiam], who is to be named in former articles), in the possession of any of his dominions, nor to assist any of his enemies directly or indirectly, nor to foment or abet any party in England which would disturb the quiet of his government, &c. This article is all in general terms, but very full and comprehensive. Our King did spare the French King the shame to renounce King James by name ; but my Lord Portland told ’em the King of England and the nation did positively expect that they would remove King James farther off ; to which I think they have made some kind of promise.

“The Lord and the Mareschal parted at last like very good friends, whose masters were to be so also, and my Lord went away with the King to Breda, from whence he was to go to the Hague, after Mr. Boufflers had given him leave so to do, as having no more work for him. I hope, and I believe, the King will not let things cool. The Imperialists are still froward, but they must and will come to.

* This is out of order ; it should have been inserted at p. 508.

“The King and our Elector had a dangerous adventure just at his Majesty’s departure. The Elector had got it in his head to command this army here, so soon as the King left it. The King resolved to leave us to the command of the Prince of Vaudemont. That provoked the Elector, who grew mad with jealousy, as if the King had preferred his subaltern officer to him. He insisted to command the army which lay near the capital of a country of which he was Governor. The King was equally firm to give the command of his army to his own Generals, and not to the Governor of the Spanish Low Countries, &c. The Elector was angry three days, and came not near the King. I had the honour to go backward and forward very oft. At last the Elector came to take leave of the King, and after a little chiding, they parted very good friends. The Elector stays here a while, because of his sore eyes, and the Prince of Vaudemont comes to take the word of him; but the Elector is not to meddle with the detail of our army, but is to go back to Flanders, to command the army there.

“We and our enemies are all very still, up to our eyes in dust; and so soon as the Imperial couriers and the Spaniards can come back, I believe we may reckon the peace is made.”

1697, Aug. 5-15, Loo.—“Upon the representation made to the King by your Grace’s letter to me of the 30th past for a Secretary of the Embassy to be allowed to my Lord Manchester, his Majesty does agree to it, so that your Grace may be pleased to give the necessary orders therein.

“His Majesty has likewise considered what is mentioned by your Grace relating to Colonel Wolseley, and is pleased that your Grace do assure him of his Majesty’s granting his request with respect to the lands in his possession contained in the list I received, which are not already passed or passing to others.

“I shall not be able to signify his Majesty’s pleasure to your Grace in the business of Major-General Trelawney before the next post, but so much your Grace may be confident of, that his Majesty would be very glad of some determination before his return into England.”

R. 10.

SIR J. WILLIAMSON to SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Aug. 6-16, Hague.—“My last to your Excellency was of the 3-13, and till we hear that your last return of illness is gone off, I make much doubt whether I ought to trouble your Grace with the accounts of what passes here, especially considering that what by my station I am obliged to write to Mr. Secretary Trumbull will be laid before your Excellencies.

“We see plainly that now the Imperialists, finding that there will be a Peace, and that the principal parties seem agreed to hasten it all that’s possible, conclude it to no purpose longer to use any arts (as it is not unlikely but hitherto they have done) to delay it, and therefore have given into (sic) this way of personal conferences with the French at Ryswicke, which is what they peremptorily refused to agree to some weeks ago. And as to the points themselves in which they have any considerable interest to be difficult, we think they will all be reduced to that one of the equivalent for Luxembourg; for, as to that of Strasbourg, plain it is that they much rather wish an equivalent should be taken, though they dare not say so. And as to this of Luxembourg, the opposition of the Princes of the Empire continues very high, though we find daily that they are more tractable in it, and in a manner prepared, when they have done and said what they can, to yield to the necessity of the conjuncture.

“All that we have to say in it is, to convince them that whatever the King our master’s mind is in this, or indeed, in whatever else can come in question relating to the general and common interest of the Alliance, in what part soever of Europe the thing lies upon which the question arises, [it] cannot be suspected to be grounded upon any other consideration than what is best and most conducing to the preservation of the peace and liberties of Europe from the ambitious designs of the common enemy; and that in this point of Luxembourg especially, his Majesty, as head of this State, ought to be considered as most concerned, and consequently the most proper judge of the reasons for or against the equivalent in question. And these representations, with a little patience, will we hope qualify that mighty heat this matter at first raised in them.

“We are arguing with the French about the rest of our Articles, in which nothing appears of much difficulty, only as to that of Hudson’s Bay business (which at the bottom is a brangle [brawl] of private interest of trading companies) we are left without the necessary informations of fact, much more without clear and full proofs of what is said as to the original right, upon which all will turn. And as to the late King James’s Queen’s jointure, which the French stick hard upon, to be made good to her, it is a point of that delicacy that we are not willing hitherto to entertain it as any matter of our present business. If she have by law a right, she [is] to enjoy it; if not, we are not here empowered to stipulate any for her. And so we endeavour fairly to stave it off from being received as any part of what we are here to negotiate. However, it seems to be of use, if Mr. Secretary can do it without noise or observation, to get an account of all that matter, how it stands—what settlements were to be made by the marriage articles, if any? what of any kind have been made on her? and how far, according as the Law now stands, those that have been made will take place? &c. A private knowledge of this, if we could get it in time, might be of good help to us, to stave off this point, which, as we think, cannot so much as be treated on openly by us, without inconveniencies that will follow.”

R. 10. Ansd. 18.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Aug. 6-16, Hague.—“ I have received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 30th July, but with great sorrow to find that we must still be in pain for your Grace’s health. I am ordered down hither to negotiate some money for our army, but I am very glad to find the negotiations of peace so far advanced that I do now believe it cannot fail. The King does all he can to press it forward; and since the Pentionaire is made first Ambassador and plenipotentiaire for the States, it does go faster. The present difficulty is about accepting or refusing an equivalent for Luxembourg. Our King has declared himself in favour of the equivalent, which is to be a barrier towards Flanders, though his Majesty has a very good part of his patrimonial estate in the pays de Luxembourg. The Imperial and Spanish ministers make all the opposition which they can, and the ministers of the three ecclesiastical Electors cry out murder. They say they are abandoned by the League, and are put under the yoke of France, if Luxembourg is left to the French. The Imperial ministers have thought fit to have a conference and an interview with the French; and this day they met at Ryswyck. I wish these gentlemen may find their account in negotiating with the French themselves, since they mistrust their friends, but I fear the French will not yield much more than they have proffered.

“ The Czar of Moscovie is expected very quickly here or at Amsterdam. He would gladly see our King at Loo, but the King seems to be afraid of him there.

“ I might have told your Grace that our King does press to conclude the peace upon the restitution of Luxembourg, so soon as an equivalent for it is adjusted; by which means Luxembourg is to be restored to Spain, unless the French and Spaniards do think fit to make a bargain for the same place, which they may do when the peace is signed.

“ I believe our Elector at Bruxelles was so jealous of the attention which my Lord Albemarle had for his mistress, that his Highness saw her with more indifference than was usual. She and her friends endeavoured to persuade the world that her design was only to captivate a person who was so near our King that she might thereby do service to the Elector.”

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, Aug. 7, Whitehall.—“ I have received your Lordships’ letter of the 31st July, and laid it before the Lords Justices, who very well approve of your having left it to the House of Commons to prepare the heads of the Bill for an Association, as being in their opinion the best method, especially seeing the Commons so unanimously, and with so much zeal and affection to his Majesty’s person and Government, agreed to a vote for that purpose. As to the direction your Lordships desire about adjourning or proroguing the Parliament, the Lords Justices think the former most convenient, because it can at any time be changed to a prorogation, whereas a prorogation cannot be altered; and therefore they direct your Lordships to make an adjournment, when you think fit to end this Session. But in the meanwhile, if you please to acquaint the Lords Justices [in London] with the reasons that induce you to look upon a prorogation to be more for his Majesty's service, they will consider of them, and, if they see cause, change the present opinion they affect of this Bill; but they think it will be less liable to exception, if it be not in the same words, but otherwise expressed. Such a Bill transmitted hither will be returned again with little loss of time."

SHREWSBURY to [METHUEN], Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

1697, Aug. 7, Whitehall.—“I have received your Lordship's of the 30th July, with the enclosed state of the money to be expected, and have communicated it to my Lord Chancellor, my Lord Chamberlain, and some other of the Lords Justices, who extremely approve thereof. I have understood from other hands that the person you mention in your last is more disposed to revive factions than he promised he would be, when we spoke to him. I writ to the Marquis the last post on that subject, thinking it could do no harm, though I doubt it will produce little good.

“I am much concerned that the Bill for banishing the Regular Clergy is spoiled by the clause added here. I am confident the person who proposed it in Council was far from having that design, but I perceive the consequence was not thoroughly understood, neither by him, nor by us who admitted it. The opinion of the Lords Justices here is, that in case the Bill miscarry on that account, another be immediately transmitted hither, omitting that clause to the same, [and they] will send your Lordships directions accordingly.

1697, Aug. 10, Dublin Castle.—“ Nous vous rendons conte de ce qui s'est passé aujourdhuy dans la Chambre des Comunes; i'aiouteray seulement que cette somme n'est donnéé que pour payer les debtes, et que sy nous la sauons bien menager, ie crois que nous pourons payer le tout. L'on n'a pas encore parlé des fortifications, ny des barraques; ie crois qu'ils doneront pour les barraques, mais ie ne leur trouue aucune inclination pour les fortifications. L'on ne songe plus à l'apropriation; ie crois que c'est à cause que nous n'auons iamais parlé contre cette condition; ie ne crois pas qu'on la propose. Le uote a passé dans la Comité sans aucune oposition; nous n'auons menagé ny gagné personne, et n'auons employé aucun des partis. Chacun se uante que sy nous auions rendu le conducteur, nous aurions cinquante mille liures de plus. Je n'en crois rien, mais quand cela seroit, je crois qu'il est plus du seruice du Roy d'auoir cent cinquante mille pieces par un uote unanime de toute la Maison, que d'en auoir dauantage par la majorité, après un long debat, qui rend un autre parti entierement oposé en tout au seruice du Roy. ## SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Aug. [10-]20, Hague.—“ Since mine of the 16th I have the honour of your Excellency's of the 3rd, and should be sorry in that unlucky return of your illness, under which we are told your Grace yet continues, that I should be any occasion of increasing the trouble writing must needs give you; and therefore, till your Grace find something to command me, please not to trouble yourself with answering any of my letters.

“ The term set by the French at their first giving in their Project, and which they have taken several occasions since to repeat to the Allies, drawing so near, they, especially the Imperialists, seem to affect a mighty diligence in pursuing the new method agreed on, of personal conferences with the French at Ryswicke; upon occasion of which a great discontent is discovered among the ministers of the several Princes of Germany here, whom it seems the Imperialists will not suffer to intervene as parties in this negociation, but insist that it belongs to the Emperor's prerogative and dignity to transact the whole matter for them.

"This domestic matter, added to the grief they are under in the business of the equivalent for Luxembourg, puts them into very ill humour. One of them, viz., the Elector of Brandenburg, has another dissatisfaction, which is, that hitherto the French have refused to give a power to their Ambassadors to treat a peace distinctly and particularly with him, which is a point he mightily presses; and to which it is answered that in the powers given to treat with the Emperor and Empire, &c., as their powers already received and allowed by the Assembly do run, he the Elector of Brandenburg is included, as being a principal member of the Empire. This does not at all satisfy his Ambassadors here, to a degree that they have very warmly pressed us, and the Ambassadors of this State, as a matter we are severally bound to by our treaties with their master, to procure them such a power, or otherwise not to proceed further in our treaties. We on our part answer that there is not in our treaty any such obligation, only not to treat without their consent, which we say we had. And as to the States, they make answer, that they have expressly told the French the obligation they are under to procure them, the Brandenburgers, a power to treat, and that they can receive no other answer from the French, but they understand this to be abundantly complied with by the general power already furnished for treating with the whole Empire. And thus the thing now stands, but with infinite discontent to the Brandenburgers, who threaten no less than to enter a solemn protestation against what shall be done.

"I do not see much more worth your Grace's trouble at present; and indeed, if there were, the pain I am in (as I write this) from a fit of the gout that has seized me, would scarce give me leave to say it."

1697, Aug. 12, Whitehall.—"I did not omit to lay before the King your Lordship's desire to have a Secretary of the Embassy to go with you to Venice, and by the last post I received an answer from Mr. Blathwayt, that his Majesty has been pleased to agree to it, and I have accordingly given directions for Mr. Stanion's privy seal to be prepared, whom I understand from Mr. Mountague your Lordship has pitched upon for this employment. I pray your Lordship's excuse that I do not write this in my own hand, which the return of my illness makes uneasy to me."

SHREWSBURY to the LORDS JUSTICES OF IRELAND.

1697, Aug. 12, Whitehall.—“ This evening the Bill for the better payment of Tithes has been agreed to in Council with these following alterations. That part of it which confirms the Statute of the 27th of Henry the 8th is left out, as being thought too severe, and for that reason seldom of late put in execution here in England. That clause also which confirms the Statute of the 33rd of Henry 8th is likewise omitted, Mr. Attorney General having informed the Council that that Bill was now in force in Ireland, and it would therefore be of no use to confirm it by a new Act. That which now remains in the Act to be transmitted is the confirmation of an Act of the 2nd of Edward the 6th, to which the Lords had once an intention to have added the Bill lately made here for recovery of small Tithes, but upon examination found some things which they knew not how rightly to apply to Ireland, and therefore apprehended some mistake in the addition might lose the Bill, for which reason they chose rather to pass it in the manner it will now be sent.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. [12-]22, Loo.—“ Having not the honour of any commands from your Grace by this post, I have only to acquaint your Grace that as the King has declared his pleasure that a Secretary of the Embassy be appointed to attend my Lord Manchester, so Mr. Stannion is the person his Majesty does approve of for that employment; which I would not delay signifying to your Grace, being informed by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer [Charles Montagu] of his being the person proposed by your Grace to his Majesty.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Aug. 12-22, Loo.—“ I was forced to come hither upon some of my Lord Ranelagh's business, and I am going back in haste, but I have just time to send my humble duty to your Grace. The King is in good health, hunting and shooting, as happy as the day is long. His Majesty seems more earnest now, and more pressing, to have an end of the negotiations at Ryswyck, in proportion as the time of his return to London does advance. His Majesty seems only to apprehend that the French should fall back a little upon the taking of Barcelona, and the good success of Ponti, who has certainly ransomed and plundered Carthage so much at his leisure, that after having loaded all the silver and merchandises there, he carried away a hundred brass guns, and having got clear of Neville, as the French say, is expected every day at home with all his booty. If the French do not fall back, I believe the ministers of the King and of the States will sign by the 1st of September, and the rest must follow.

“The King is very much alone here, which seems to make one great part of his satisfaction. All the foreign ministers were desired to stay at the Hague, unless they had any pressing business with his Majesty. I only find an envoy here from the Elector of Saxe, who has sent to advise the King of his election to the Crown of Poland. I am going back tonight to the Hague, and thence to Bruxelles as fast I can.”

SHREWSBURY TO SEC. BLATHWAYT.

1697, Aug. 13, Whitehall.—“Having had the misfortune to fall into a relapse of my former distemper, which continues so violently upon me that I am advised both by friends and physicians to leave the town and return to the country, where I received so much benefit in the beginning of the summer, I must desire the favour of you that his Majesty may be acquainted with my circumstances, and may be assured that it is the most sensible part of my affliction, that being in a post where attendance is so necessary, I am thus forced to neglect his service.

“You will by this post receive from Mr. Vernon the copy of the Lords Justices’ and Council of Ireland’s letter upon the Bill for confirming the Art[icles] of Limerick. It is not hard to guess how the Protestant and English interest there wish his Majesty should decide the matter; I shall therefore not take up your time in enlarging on what you will find in that letter, but only add that my Lord Winchester, my Lord Gallway, and my Lord Chancellor have all three in several letters pressed very earnestly the speedy dispatch of the Bill, which they think very necessary for the quieting of Ireland, because a day is therein fixed for the commencement of the war.

[P.S.] “The Lords of the Council having judged Mr. Nelson’s fault occasioned by imprudence and not malice, and having a consideration of his past sufferings, and that he made his folly no secret to yourself nor my Lord Villiers, though too late, they yesterday ordered his discharge, with a severe reprimand.”

SHREWSBURY TO WINCHESTER.

1697, Aug. 14, London.—“I have received your Lordship’s of the 3rd and the 5th, and being obliged to return into the country upon the same unfortunate occasion that carried me there the last time, I am just now stepping into the coach, and have only time to acquaint you that the Lords here, thinking it very improper to determine so nice a point as the adding or not adding that clause in the Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick, many of them being unacquainted in what manner the words in dispute came to be a part of those Articles, they did last night send the letter from your Lordships and the Council of Ireland to be laid before his Majesty, who, being informed of the difficulty as soon as it was discovered here, does expect to see your Lordships' thoughts upon it before he will determine anything in the matter. As soon as his Majesty's answer is received, everybody is so convinced of the necessity of dispatch, that you may be certain the Bill will be immediately transmitted to you in the manner his Majesty shall direct.

"I am extreme glad to hear Mr. Savage has been so reasonable. If he will be advised by your Lordship to show moderation, there is no question but everybody will join to recommend his service to the King; to my small power I shall be very ready. If some indiscreet heats cannot be prevented, it is much less indecent that they should proceed from persons not immediately in his Majesty's service."

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1697, Aug. 14, London.—"I am extreme sorry it is my misfortune to be forced to leave this place at a time that my duty obliges me to a more constant correspondence with your Lordship than my absence in the country will well permit, but my distemper is returned upon me with such violence that I am forced to retire, and try if the same course and air, that did me good in the beginning of the summer, will set me up against winter.

"Yesterday I received your Lordship's of the 3rd and 5th, with a postscript dated the 7th, and, being now just going into the coach, have time only to tell you that the Bill for banishing Regulars will certainly be sent from hence in three or four days. You may depend upon it, it will be returned to you in the time I mention, and in the manner you desire. Everybody was unanimous in agreeing to the Bill before, but it seems it was spoiled with the thoughts of making it too good. That for confirming the Art[icles] of Lim[erick] cannot possibly receive the same dispatch; it is judged too tender a point to determine without his Majesty's direction, who best knows in what manner he was prevailed with to add the words now in dispute, and consequently how far he thinks the honour of his word concerned.

"The Lords Justices here acquainted his Majesty with the difficulty, at the same time that your Lordships were writ to about it, and have received his Majesty's answer that he could come to no resolution till he had seen your Lordships' reasons; by which it is so plain that he does not expect the question should be decided by any but himself, [that] all that the Lords here could do was to send over to him yesterday a copy of the letter from the Council of Ireland, and press the dispatch of his Majesty's answer ; and as soon as that is received here, the Bill will be sent to you without any delay, in the manner his Majesty shall order, everybody being satisfied of the necessity of this Bill, and of its being dispatched as soon as possible.

“Your affairs in the Parliament appear to be in so fair a way that I hope there is little question but they will succeed to your desire. If some few troublesome interested spirits can be governed, the generality (sic) mean and will act well.

“The Admiralty have been acquainted with the privateers that infest your coast, and I hope will take care to prevent it for the future ; it would have been very ridiculous to have had the Bill for confirming the Attainders carried to St. Germain's.”

SHREWSBURY to [METHUEN,] Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

1697, Aug. 14, Whitehall.—“The Lords here, having acquainted his Majesty with the difficulties that arose upon the Bill for confirming the Art[icles] of Lim[erick], have received for answer, that he expects to see what will be represented by the Lords Justices of Ireland, before he will come to any resolution ; so that it is at present not properly in our powers to determine how far his Majesty will expect that the last clause may be made good ; but what has been writ by the Lords Justices of Ireland and Council, by this night's post, will be laid before the King, and his commands, as soon as received here, will be immediately executed and transmitted to you.

“The Bill for banishing Regulars is now under Mr. Attorney-General's [Sir Thomas Trevor] inspection, and will be considered at Council on Tuesday ; and so little objection can be made to it, if it be of the same nature with the former, before it was altered by us, that orders having been given to have it ready engrossed, I hope it may be sent away that evening ; but your Lordship may depend upon it, that there will be no delay nor obstruction to the hastening that Bill, which everybody seemed to like.

“I am glad to hear by your Lordship's, and by other letters of a fresher date, that matters are likely to succeed so happily, and that some things which might reasonably have given a rise for heats are smoothed over. My Lord Gallway very generously acknowledges the principal share of this good service to your Lordship's great industry and prudence, which you will believe I am extreme glad is confessed due to one I have so particular an esteem for. I cannot but be rejoiced to hear that our old friends behave themselves with such moderation, zeal, and goodwill, which I never suspected they would want.

“Being obliged by a very violent relapse to return to the place where I last saw you, I write this just as I am going, and with the haste that may be expected from a man that knows not how long his journey may be ; but whilst I am upon this earth, I shall be, with a real kindness and respect,” &c.

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. 15, Dublin.—“I received the favour of your Grace’s of the 5th this morning, and hope you have received our answer concerning the additional Article of Limerick. They were mighty fond of the Bill for confirming the Outlawries, and when it was given them, they said it was the best Bill they had given them since the Act of Settlement; and they read it immediately, and seemed so fond on it that they appointed it a second reading in two or three days; and at the third reading some were against the Bill, and a great many to put off the third reading for two or three days, but it was carried for the reading that day by 33. A great many that were for putting off the third reading for two days say they did it not as being against the Bill, but only that they might have time to look over the Bill to see whether there was ground for the objections that was [were] made against the Bill, it not having been committed at the second reading, as it used to be.

“The Bill is now with the House of Lords, and there it was read as soon as it came up, and a second reading was moved for Monday, but it was carried not to be until Thursday; and a great many of the Bishops and my Lord Draughhedaugh were possessed with a notion that the Princes[s] was mightily against this Bill, and that this Bill would confirm my Lady Ortney’s grant, and that a great many Protestants would suffer by this Bill. But the Commons are making heads of a Bill to take care of the last matter (though of all the instances I have heard mentioned, I don’t think any of them are prejudiced by this Bill); and as to the first mistake, we will set the Bishops right against Thursday.

“Your Lordship sees how uncertain these gentlemen of the House of Commons are, so that I shall not depend on anything until it is done, and fear the Sessions will not be so easy as was hoped; yet as to the main matter, which is the Supply, I hope they will go a great way on Tuesday, which day is appointed to go on with the heads of the Poll Bill, which was begun yesterday, and the giving of 2s. a head was agreed on, and they seemed in their discourses to be resolved to give it for two years. And for finishing the Supply voted, we have all the assurances imaginable, which now I confess I cannot give entire credit to it until it is done.

“As to what your Lordship mentions of the last vote of the first day, what you seem to apprehend from that is I suppose the Bill of Habeas Corpus being stirred again. It was not in the list that they sent to us to enquire what was become of several Bills. I have been afraid of its being mentioned, but as yet it has not, but I had an item given me tonight that Mr. Molsworthe had some thoughts of mentioning it; so I have acquainted my Lord Chancellor with it, who will speak with him tomorrow morning.

“My Lord, as to what you are so kind as to write about Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer [Philip Savage], I take [it] as one of the greatest marks of your friendship that you was so kind as to promise me; and in a former letter I have given your Grace an account how at the beginning of the Sessions he had a mind to have shown that he had a good interest, and to have carried matters by a majority of his own friends, besides the feud between him and the Brodericks, but as he begun that, by my persuasion he cemented that matter again; and I said to him but last night all that I could think how I should resent it if he did not keep his word with me in promoting the King's business, and in quieting all disputes or heats that might happen as much as in him lay, to which he has given me all the repeated assurances imaginable, and I hope he will keep his word, but I will answer for nobody in this country; but if he keeps his word to the end of the Sessions, I hope you will continue your good intentions towards him, as you shall judge he will deserve; for though Mr. Carleton is I think very justly put into Mr. Lowther's room, I hear there is like to be another vacancy in Mr. Eveling's room. I am sorry I can give your Grace no better account of affairs here at present, but hope that all will do well yet.

[P.S.] "I am extremely concerned to hear that you have any return of your spitting of blood, and hope it has left you before now, and that you will have no return of it any more."

1697, Aug. 17, Dublin Castle.—"Je suis tres sensiblement touché du mauvais estat de uostre santé. . . . Grace do use all those methods and remedies that are judged most conducing to your recovery, which all your Grace's servants and the public have the greatest reason to wish for.

1697, Aug. 19, Dublin Castle.—"Je suis sensiblement touché du mauuais estat de uostre santé. . . . Quelque necessaire que uous soyés dans les affaires, il faut uous en priuer pendant un plus long temps. Il vaut mieus que le public soufre pendant une année entiere, que de uous exposer à des rechutes qui enfin deuiendroient dangereuses.

"Nous uous auons rendu conte des opositions que le Bill qui confirme les attainders a trouué dans la Maison des Comunes, et depuis dans celle des Seigneurs, parceque les Euesques se sont imaginés que ce Bill n'auoit esté enuoyé que pour confirmer le don que le Roy a fait à my Lady Orkney. Ce Bill a esté lû aujourdhuy pour la seconde fois dans la Maison des Seigneurs, apres auoir passé dans celle des Comunes. Il sera lû demain pour la derniere fois, apres auoir esté examiné en Comité de toute la Maison; et malgré les bonnes intentions de quelques uns, ie crois qu'il passera sans diuision, mais ce ne sera pas sans harangues.

"Nous uous enuoyons l'Adresse, que nous receumes hyer. I'ay examiné aujourdhuy les heads du Bill suplemental, qui nous furent présentés hyer par le Speaker; il est entierement pour le Colonel Hear, qui a trouué moyen de faire son affaire une affaire generale. Nous le porterons demain au Conseil, et tacherons le metre en forme, qui le rende utile au maintien des droits de les sujets Protestants.

"Les Comunes ont fait un assés grand progrès ce matin dans l'establissement d'une poll tax, qu'ils ueulent donner pour deus ans; tout git à present à combien cette taxe sera estiméé.

"Nous uous remercions, my Lord, de la protection que uous aués donnéé au Bill que nous uous auons renuoyé pour le banissement des moines.

"Nous attendrons avec patience les ordres du Roy sur la confirmation des Articles de Limerick. Depuis ce que i'ay ueu le debat de eeluy qui confirme les attainders, ie ne me fie plus à mon jugement. Peutestre que l'additional Article le facilitera, au lieu de luy nuire. Nous le recevrons tel que le Roy le iugera de son service, et ie suis persuadé qu'il passera.

"I'aprehende seulement la trop haute estimation de la poll tax, et après cela peu d'inclination à fortifier Limerick.

"Nous auons à present une fregate de vint quatre pieces de canon, qui ua bien à la voile ; qui n'aura d'autre occupation que celle d'escorter nos paquets ; ainsy i'espere que nous n'en perdrons plus."

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. 19, Dublin.—"I received the favour of your Grace's of the 14th, and am most extremely concerned at the relapse you have. . . . I am glad your Grace is satisfied with Mr. Savage's behaviour; he does very well now, and forwards the King's business. . . .

"Yesterday we had an Address from the House of Commons, with heads of a Bill for saving the estates, rights, titles, and possessions of Protestants from being prejudiced by an Act intituled, an Act for confirming several Outlawries, &c., which after we have modelled a little here at the Council, we shall send it into England. The Lords read today the Bill for confirming the Outlawries, &c., the second time, and the Bill is committed, and they go upon it again tomorrow. They passed today the Bill to prevent Protestants intermarrying with Papists. The House of Commons went a great way today in the Poll Bill, and I hope another sitting will finish it ; and I hope things will go well yet, notwithstanding the well wishers to the contrary."

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1697, Aug. 21, Eyford.—"Yours of the 10th I have received. Your joint letter of the same date having been laid before the Lords Justices, I shall not pretend to answer that from this place. I think your Lordship much in the right, to prefer an unanimous consent for the promoting the public business, before a little more money, carried with a bare majority. I was ever of opinion that his Majesty having the good fortune, that his interest and the people's exactly agree and are the same, it was not for his service to foment parties ; for since he has nothing to ask but what it is for the common good, an assembly of uninterested moderate men will never oppose his demands, and nothing but the heats and animosities of a faction, whose violence will often carry them against their reason, can ever disturb his business.

"I doubt his Majesty may be dissatisfied if the fortifications are not provided for. I make no question but you will do what is possible to get that command complied with, and then, if it cannot be done, patience is the only remedy.

"I was out of town before my Lord Folliot brought your Lordship's letter, but I have recommended his case to the Lords Justices, and hope he will not fail of success and dispatch."

1697, Aug. 21, Eyford.—“I owe you my thanks for yours of the 6-16 and 12-22. I cannot but be in pain till I hear what the truth of this news of Pointy is; I mean, what he has got, and then, whether that, with the success at Barcelona, will make any considerable change in the King of France’s inclination to a peace. This hour that I am writing is very near that which the French have fixed as their last, and beyond which they looked upon themselves no longer obliged to stand to the proposals they have made. If that time be not prolonged, nor the matter concluded, we shall soon see whether they will be glad to lay hold on a pretence to break. I am apt to think, if we could adjust our difficulties, and be ready to close at this term they have set, it would have been too shameful for them so plainly to recant. A little time will clear all doubts.”

MR. HILL to SHREWSBURY.

1697, [Aug. 23-]Sept. 2, s.n., Bruxelles.—“’Tis with infinite sorrow that I have received the ill news of your Grace’s relapse, and the necessity which carries you back to the country, but I must be glad to think there are remedies in the air, and that your Grace can have health for the pains of fetching it.

“I cannot tell your Grace so well what was done at Ryswyck two days since, as you will be told from the Hague; but I send you the enclosed decree of the Holy Inquisition, by which your Grace may see how the King is treated by his most Catholic Allies, and what he may expect from such a bigoted nation.

“I think I have told your Grace, this summer, that my Lord Portland was sick with chagrin, [and] was ready to retire quite from his Majesty’s service, and presence, to make more room for a younger officer. The same disquiet and the same resolutions are in his Lordship still. He has been held by the King, who cannot think to part with him, and is yet held, as it were, by force; but whether he will be held after the peace is signed, I cannot tell. This is yet, I believe, a very great secret, my Lord, and I say it only to your Grace.”

1697, Aug. 24, London.—Sends two letters from a gentleman employed by him. Mentions Mr. Robins, a counsellor-at-law, one Chalenor, and Lord Peterbrow.

R. 26. Enclosures:—

1. Copy of a letter from ——— to [Colt?], dated Aug. 22, '97.—“Sir, About the beginning of July last I had some talk with Mrs. Scott, relating to the intended escape of Sir John Fenwick, and she told me that my Lord S[underland?] was with him some time before he left London, and that he had a private pass under my Lord’s own hand.

“About the beginning of August I was with Mr. Gibbs, who justified all that Mrs. Scott had said, adding that my Lord S——— was with him two hours, and that he gave Sir John Fenwick a pass as aforesaid.

“August the 20th I was at Dover with Capt. Robarts, where he told me that my Lady Midilton desired him to procure a vessel for the transporting of one Capt. Alexander and a friend of his for France, but he afterward understood that by Capt. Alexander was meant Capt. Waw, and that his friend was Sir John Fenwick.

“My Lady Middleton farther told him that my Lady S[underland?] had dined with her the day before, and that my Lord S——— should be at her house on the 2nd of June, on which day she desired him to come there for farther directions. He went as appointed on the 2nd of June to Cardigan House in Lincoln’s Inn Fields, where he saw my Lord S———, Sir John Fenwick, and Capt. Waw. He also said that my Lord S——— spoke to him there, and that he knew him very well. Robert[s] sometime afterward was taken up for farthering the escape of Sir John Fenwick, and brought to be examined before my Lord S[hrewsbury?] and his dog Vernon (as he called him), but Sh[rewsbury] appeared very uneasy because Vernon was by, and to every question that was asked about Sir John Fenwick, Robarts answered several times, ‘You know, my Lord, that I know nothing of the matter.’ In a day or two after Robarts sent his daughter to know the reason of his confinement, and my Lord Sh——— told her that her father was not so civil as he should have been in his language, intimating (as he thought) that he had been too plain in saying that his Lordship knew that he knew nothing of the matter. This to the best of my memory is the exact truth of what was told to “Your most obedient servant.

[P.S.] “Pray, Sir, be careful of exposing this, for I am told by Capt. Lewin that a great man gave him notice that a person was employed by the Government to betray their party, and that he heard that the said Lewin had been several times in town to confer with him; so he sent this to caution him from engaging himself farther, for his name was already given up to the Lords Justices.”

“Sir, Since I saw you last I was at Dover, where it was proposed to me how the Castle and town should be delivered to his Majesty’s enemies, and a scheme is given me how it shall be done, and by whom.

“Several others have told me that a great number of men, horses, and arms are ready to assist King James; (viz.) some have engaged a number of butchers, other[s] gardeners; one assures me from Norfolk that 4,000 are ready, and will be active at the least notice.

“Men of note do desire me to carry over and lay these matters before King James; they desire me to assure him how resolved they are to endeavour his re-establishment, and they expect me to bring directions what method they shall take farther, they having already procured a vessel that will transport me to France; therefore I desire you will be pleased to let me know what more I shall do.”

VILLIERS TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, [Aug. 24-] Sept. 3, n.s., Hague.—“I have the honour of a letter from your Grace of the 18th August from Eyford, but am heartily sorry for the occasion of your going thither. I hope you will quickly let me know you have found the benefit you expect from it, which I can assure you is the best news I can hear from England.

“I thought I might have sent your Grace word that the business was concluded, but the unreasonableness of the French has put an ill delay to it. The Spaniards, Dutch, and we were ready last Saturday to sign, if the French would have given a convenient time to the Imperialists to come in, but this they have refused, and gave in a new Project last Sunday, with the equivalent for Straesbourg, which I send enclosed.

“The step that his Majesty has thought most proper to make on this occasion is to declare against the equivalent, as well to show his dislike to the proceeding of the French, as to let the world know that he will not leave his Allies except he is forced to it by their own wilfulness. It is a good deal their fault to have brought things to this pass, and what the King does now is more for his own reputation than that they deserve it.

“I am told that there is no danger in making this seeming resistance, for if the French persist in their keeping of Straesbourg, our friends here will have power enough to persuade us to comply; so that I hope there is no greater hazard in this business than the loss of some time, and that I may yet tell you before winter with how much truth and respect I am,” &c.

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, [Aug. 24-]Sept. 3, Hague.—“At the same time that I found myself obliged, by an unlucky fit of the gout, to ask your Excellency’s pardon for the omission of my duty, at least for some posts, your Grace has had the goodness to honour me with your letter from Eyford of the 18th past, which I had little reason to expect your Grace should give yourself the trouble of in the tender condition your health is in.

“As to the state of the General Peace, that part which remains unsettled, which is what relates to the Emperor, Empire, and Lorraine, can have no very clear account given of it, so different appear the parties to be in what they severally aim at. All insist still to have Luxembourg given up by the French, and no equivalent hearkened to. But this seems otherwise resolved on by those parties that have more interest to judge in it.

“As to Strasbourg, how strong soever were the inclinations of the PP. of the Empire to have it restored, and how cold soever were the desires of the Emperor as to its restitution, there seems an end put to all that matter by the expiring of the term within which France had limited the acceptance of their offer. And accordingly the French Ambassadors, the very next day after the term expired, to wit, on Sunday, the 1st Sept., delivered in a solemn Declaration, in the name of the King their master (a copy of which I here enclose), by which your Grace will see (what we had all along foretold the Imperialists and the Allies would be the consequence) that, the term fixed being expired without the Allies declaring their acceptance of the conditions, the King declares himself absolved from his offer, and accordingly that for the future he will not be obliged to render Strasbourg at all, but an equivalent, &c. And thus he leaves them, only adding, as a mark of his desire of the Peace, that in consideration of his keeping Strasbourg, he will be content to give the Spaniards up Barcelonne.

“In this condition the negotiation stands, and a further delay of twenty days, that is, to the 20th Sept., is granted by the French, to finish the Peace on this foot.”

SHREWSBURY TO SIR HENRY COLT.

1697, Aug. 28, Grafton.—“Your caution in not exposing what related to me without my consent I am sensible was meant kindly, and therefore I am obliged to you for it; but, God be thanked, I am so perfectly innocent in this and all other matters where my fidelity to the Government can be charged, that I make it my most earnest request that this or any other information which may come to your hands may be laid immediately before the Lords Justices, without losing so much time as is necessary to give me notice before of it, for I desire to conceal no action of this nature from their examination and knowledge.

“I do not return you the two papers, because I understand they are copies only, but once again entreat you not to omit laying before the Lords Justices at their first meeting the letter of the 22nd of August.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [Aug. 29-] Sept. 8, s.n., Bruxelles.—“I am to thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 21st past, and I am very glad to hear that your bleeding has so much diminished.

“In my last I did myself the honour to tell your Grace what we were doing here. Ever since all things at Ryswick are at a stand; the ministers do meet only at the instance of the Mediator, but do nothing. The Spaniards complain of the complaisance which we have had for the Imperialists, and say it will be the same thing again the 20th instant. I find my Lord Portland has sent a letter and a compliment to the Mareschal de Boutlers, and I expect his Lordship here tomorrow, in order to have another meeting with the said Mareschal, by which means perhaps all the wheels at Ryswick may be set at work again. In the mean time the French make war as hard as they can. The Mareschal de Choiseul is marched directly towards the Prince Lewis of Bade, and we are a little in pain for our friends. In Flanders the Mareschal de Catinat had gathered all his force, and designed to march all night by the moonshine, and to fall upon the Elector at daybreak. The Mareschal de Villeroy was come with 2,000 choice horse and about 6,000 foot, to be at the sport. The Elector had advice just in time to get into the retrinchments of Bruges, where we hope he is safe.

“We are very much in pain for the Imperial affairs in Hungary. The Turks are come over the Save; they are marching to Transilvania and the upper Hungary too, and will meet little resistance in either place. The Emperor’s army is weak and ill provided. I wish they do not find reason to repent of their obstinacy at Ryswick the 31st past; and I wish we may not be forced to repent of our generosity and our complaisance for them for ever.

“Pointy is got home with six ships and ten millions; he came into Brest the 29th past. The Prince of Conti is gone from Paris, to embark at Dunkerque the 5th instant, and some advices say he is sailed with Du Bart, for Dantzic. The Elector of Saxe is strengthening his party all this while in Polande, and in all appearance that controversy will not be decided but by the sword.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [Aug. 30.] Sept. 9, s.n., Bruxelles.—“I had the honour to write to your Grace yesterday. Since then, I have seen my Lord Portland, who is come to meet the Mareschal de Boufflers again. I believe his Lordship will complain of the conduct of the French ministers at the Hague; for it was agreed between the Mareschal and my Lord that if England, Spain, and Holland should accept the conditions offered and sign the peace, a certain term should be allowed to the Imperialists and the rest of our Allies to come in, upon condition that if they did not come in within the time appointed, the peace should still remain to those who had signed. Now it seems at (sic) the 31st of August the French ministers at Ryswyck would allow no such time to our Allies, who were not ready to sign, for want of orders. It was for that reason that the King would not suffer his ministers to sign, because the French had broke their word with him, in not allowing to his Allies what they had promised. It seems also that the French ministers have done and said several things at Ryswyck which make people believe they do not in earnest desire a conclusion of the peace. My Lord Portland will either obtain orders to the French ministers to renew the treaty, or will see that they have a mind to break off. This is all I can tell your Grace at present.”

SHREWSBURY TO GALWAY.

1697, Aug. 30, Grafton.—“I was much surprised to understand, by your Lordship's of the 17th and 19th, that a suspicion has been raised that the Bill of Outlawries was modelled with a covert design of confirming my Lady Orkney's grant. I could never hear a reasonable ground for such an imagination; it is possible there may be more weight in the other objection they are providing against, by the Bill the Commons have addressed to your Lordships to transmit hither, and to recommend to his Majesty; and it is but just that the right of every particular unoffending Protestant should be secured, when the chief end of the Act was to promote the Protestant interest.

“I wish some Bill that would effectually encourage the linen manufacture were in such forwardness that it might be perfected this Session. It would be of great advantage to England as well as Ireland, and unless something be now done to show the Parliament here that the Irish will turn their industry to what may divert them from the woollen trade, that is what the English are so jealous of, the next Session the Irish will certainly receive a mortification on that subject, what was done at the end of the last being intended as a fair warning to them.

“I am extreme glad that you are in so fair a way of overcoming all the material difficulties of the Session. Upon this occasion I must acquaint you that soon after the meeting of the Parliament, I took the liberty to acquaint my Lord Winchester with what I had understood of Mr. Savage's behaviour, and how different it was from what he had promised, and that I thought his Lordship was indispensably obliged to advise him better, and, if he found him incorrigible, to withdraw his countenance from him, that he might not make use of that support to do mischief.

“ My Lord in his answer confessed Mr. Sa[vage] had run into some heats at the opening of the Session, from a desire to show that he and his party were both able and willing themselves to do the King's business, but upon his expostulating with him, he had promised for the future to act with all moderation, and as much as he could to prevent reviving animosities, but to endeavour an unanimous concurrence for the dispatch of the public business; and he hoped, in case he acted this part, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would deserve his Majesty's countenance, and particularly to be one of the Commissioners of the Revenue, which those in his employment usually had been.

“ I answered in general terms, that no question could be made but if his carriage during this Session were agreeable to his Lordship's advice, that after the conclusion of it, the King would have a just regard to his recommendation, and that I should assist in the manner he would command me. Every letter since has been filled with encomiums of this gentleman's services, which though I have not seemed to doubt, because I thought it not convenient to discourage or exasperate him, yet by the accounts I have received from others, I have but too much reason to suspect my Lord Win[chester's] partiality upon this occasion. However, by these preludes, it is plain the King will be attacked for some mark of favour to Mr. Savage, and I shall be pressed to promote his pretention, which would certainly be most reasonable if people were satisfied he has acted as is alleged; but on the contrary, if he has done all the underhand mischiefs he can, and only not appeared because it was evident it could have no effect, it would be so discouraging to others who have served well, to see this man distinguished by his Majesty's countenance, that I am sure I will have no share in promoting it.” . . .

SIREWSBURY to WINCHESTER.

1697, Aug. 30, Grafton.—“ I have received your Lordship's of the 15th and 19th, and am much surpris'd it could be imagin'd that the Bill for confirming Outlawries, &c., was so modelled as to strengthen my Lady Orkney's grant. When I saw her in London, I did not find she had that opinion of it, nor can I conceive what ground there is for the pretence. As to the other part, which they are taking care of, by the heads they have prepared and have addressed to your Lordships upon, it seems reasonable, in case any innocent Protestant would have been prejudic'd without such a provision, which I am not able to judge of.

“ I hope Mr. Savage will manage himself so prudently, with the help of your Lordship’s assistance, throughout the Sessions, that the account you will be able impartially to give of him will effectually recommend him to his Majesty’s favour, in which I shall give assistance as you shall then direct me. I thank your Lordship for your concern about my health, which, though my bleeding be stopped, is in a posture I do not much like. My shortness of breath is so troublesome when I should rest, that I pass the nights very uncomfortably, and gives me cause to suspect my lungs are faulty.”

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. 31, Dublin.—“ I received the favour of your Lordship’s of the 21st. . . . We are preparing a Bill for confirming the Outlawries, &c. (with another title), to comply with what the Lords would have left out, which is, that inquisitions should go out in any future rebellion, and they would have a saving clause for Protestants; and we intend to insert the substance of what the Commons desire in their supplemental Bill. There is a Committee of Council sitting this evening upon it, and will finish it, and tomorrow at Council we will have it read and order it to be engrossed; so shall transmit it into England by the end of the week.

“ Here was a very unlucky thing started, and which the House were very warm upon; which was, that a clause might be inserted in the Poll Bill, that the money should continue to go as it did during the continuance of the Poll; which I thought was a thing that the King would never allow of, as a thing that touched his prerogative, but it could be got off no way but by their making an Address to us that we would lay before the King their desire to have the coin continued, current as it is now, during the continuance of the Poll tax; and they have ordered a Committee to draw up such an Address, and tomorrow they go on to make a valuation of the Poll, which I have all the reason in the world to believe that it will be computed pretty moderately, which I shall think so if they compute it at 100,000*l.* for the two years (which time they have already agreed to give it for); and if they will give us the additional duties for two years, and a penny more on Tobacco, I shall think the funds for the 100,000*l.* very good. There are several that do compute very wide and would make this Poll to amount to the whole sum, and a great many are out of the way with their computations; but I hope the medium will be, as I tell your Grace, 100,000*l.* This Mr. Savage does assure me most of his friends will come into this (sic), so on Thursday I hope to give you a good account of this matter.

“ Mr. Savage is I dare say very hearty in this matter, but there is such an animosity between him and the Brodericks that they can never be right together; and last night at Council there was a little warm words passed, which I was very sorry for, and I did take more upon me than else I would to blame Mr. Savage ; it was about one Gargrave ; I fear I mistake the name, but it is one that my Lord Chancellor Porter maintained, and Brigadier Ousley has a custodium of the man's estate ; and some other little words because the Act of confirming the Outlawries was not committed in the House of Commons, as if it was done and pressed hottly [hotly] by some people. I did correct Mr. Chancellor in the Council, and he owned his indiscretion, and begs (sic) pardon at the Council, and said he did not mean any reflecting words ; and was with me today to beg pardon for offending me, both as in the station I am in, and in particular I being so kind to him ; and begged of me to believe that he does mean everything for the good (sic), and will do everything towards it, and will promote this of the money, and has got a great many that will come in with him to the computation we think reasonable ; and if it proves so tomorrow, and that the money matter goes on, I hope those little private peakes won't be minded. I hope this will find you on the mending hand.

[P.S.] “The Committee I hear has gone through the Bill, and have agreed, all that died in rebellion before the 3rd of October, 91, are to be enquired after, and all that are or went into France without the King's leave are attainted, and all the other clauses for future enquiries are left out, and a general saving for all Protestants.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Aug. 31, Dublin Castle.—“J'ay receu une lettre que uous m'aués fait l'honneur de m'escire du 21. de ce mois. Je suis bien aise, my Lord, que uous aprouuies nostre sentiment sur les premieres propositions du Parlement. Une telle assembleé ne peut pas estre pendant toute une seance dans un mesme temperament.

“Nous auons trouué beaucoup de dificultés sur le Bill confirmant les attainders ; nous uous en auons rendu conte. Nous traueillons à en faire un autre, pour le mesme sujet, dans lequel nous metons toutes les clauses pour lesquels les deus Maisons ont tesmoigné quelque inclination ; nous rejetons aussy toutes celles qui ne leur ont pas agréé. Avec tous ces soins ie ne sais sy ce Bill reussira ; trois ou quatre partis diferens se ioignent contre ce Bill.

“Celuy qui confirme les Articles de Limerick uient d'arriuer, sans l'additional clause. Nous ne pouons rien iuger de son succès ; cependant nous le garderons iusques à ce que les Bills pour l'argent soyent finis ; nous esperons que ce sera demain. Uous aurés sçeu que l'on auoit proposé d'ajouter une clause, pour engager le Roy à maintenir la monoye comme elle est, par laquelle, en cas de rabais, le Roy seroit obligé de receuoir l'argent sur le pied qu'il est à present. Après un long debat, recomencé trois fois, cette proposition est tombeé, mais nous n'auons pas pu empecher celle de nous presenter une Adresse à ce sujet. Je ne crois pas que ce soit un grand mal, et il me semble que des sujets peuuent tous iours représenter à leur Souuerain ce qu'ils croyent conuenir à leur estat present; cependant nous ferons ce que nous pourons pour faire tomber demain cette proposition.

“L'Adresse doit estre raporteé du Comité à la Maison, qui a aporté tous les retardements possibles, afin d'auoir le temps de preparer des heads pour des Bills que les Comunes souhaitent, dont il y en a de fort bons, et ce me semble pas un qui puisse deplaire en Angleterre.

“Aprés cela, ie tacheray à auoir dequoy bastir des casernes, et fortifier Limerick. Les casernes plaisent extremement; les fortifications de Limerick ne choquent pas; mais rien ne peut plaire avec la proposition de donner de l'argent. Nous auons affaire à des gens mesians, qui ne nous conoissent guere; avec le temps nous establirons mieus nostre reputation, et une plus grande confiance.

“Je suis bien aise d'apprendre, que uostre santé est meilleure.”

SEC. BLATHWAYT to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 2-12, Soestdike.—“I have the honour of two letters from your Grace of the 21st and 25th past. What your Grace writes of M[ajor]-G[en.] Trelawnie's warrant satisfies his Majesty so far as to respite any further proceedings upon it until his return into England.

“Your Grace will judge the Czar to be very capricious in that after he had desired to dine with the King and accepted the invitation for the next day, he should excuse himself immediately after his Majesty was gone from Utrecht, upon the great crowd of people there had been at the interview, which he feared would be no less the next day.

“My Lord Portland is gone to have another conference with the Maréchal de Boufflers at the Army.”

R. 9th.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Sept. 2-12, Bruxelles.—“I waited yesterday on my Lord Portland, to meet the Mareschal de Boufflers, between this town and his camp, at a place called Tubise. They were four hours together. My Lord complained that the French ministers at Ryswyck did not do as we expected they should do, after the assurances which the Mareschal had given my Lord of the sincere intentions his master had to end the war; that they made such difficulties about signing the peace at the end of August, as if they endeavoured to hinder it till the time was expired which was prefixed, that so they might be at liberty to fall off from the first plan, and impose new terms upon the Allies; that the English, Spaniards, and Hollanders, being ready to sign, and engaging to induce the Imperialists to sign also in a very little time, or else to leave them to themselves, were astonished to see that they were not allowed to sign upon those conditions; that upon the 1st of September the French ministers gave a new project, very different from the first, and upon a new foundation, different from the préliminaires upon which the Allies consented to treat, viz., the restitution of Stratsbourg; that this new project does very unreasonably tie the restitution of Barcelona to the cession of Stratsbourg, and does ridiculously allow but twenty days for Spain to induce the Empire to consent to the accepting of an equivalent for Stratsbourg, and to adjust all the other difficulties.

“I believe the Mareschal was convinced that such a conduct as this was not agreeable to the professions which he had made to my Lord of his master’s sincerity to end the war, and seemed very sensible that he had been made use of to persuade us into what his master never intended. My Lord did afterwards let him know that England and Holland could not abandon themselves and their Allies, nor submit to a peace, but upon the préliminaires first agreed on, and tried to bring the Mareschal into some engagements to procure new orders from his Court to enter again upon the first negotiation, and to allow more time. I fancy the Mareschal came coldly into this, and seemed unwilling to be employed any more, leaving all to the conduct of the ministry. I am persuaded that the French did all desire an end of the war, at the beginning of the year, but the success of this campaign, and the proofs they have of their superiority everywhere, have altered their inclinations.

“The Allies are now very much in disorder at the Hague. The Emperor and the Empire are for renewing their alliances and continuing the war; the Spaniards are for ending the war upon any terms. England and Holland seem uncertain; ’tis neither safe nor honourable to abandon their Allies, and be hectorred or tricked into a peace; neither do they seem resolved to break off quite. The French emissaries at Ryswyck give out that they will allow some more time beyond the 20th of September, but give no hopes of the restitution of Stratsbourg, though the equivalent which they now offer was refused by the Imperialists and the Empire. My Lord Portland goes back to the Hague tomorrow, and so to Loo, to give an account of his journey. Some bold folks would have the Allies set a day to the French ministers either to return to negotiate upon the préliminaires first agreed on, or else to be gone home. This would be glorious, if the French should submit to that, or if the Allies were in condition to carry on the war with vigour.”

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 4.—“Today the House of Commons were in a Committee of the whole House on Ways and Means, and came to the inclosed resolutions, and on Tuesday we hope they will continue the Additional Excise for four years longer, which would then determine at the same time with the duties already given, for the former term is not out until Christmas, '98.

"The estimation of the Poll was very unanimously voted, and I don't question but our funds for the 150,000*l.* will be effectual. We have transmitted a Bill, intituled an Act to hinder the reversal of several Outlawries and Attainders, and to prevent the return of the subjects of this kingdom who have gone into the dominions of the French King in Europe; which Bill, when it returns, I believe will meet with little or no opposition, and I begin now to hope again that this Sessions will end very well. Mr. Savage in these money matters has behaved himself very well. There are some Bishops in the House of Lords that are very troublesome, and would fain have thrown out the Bill of Attainders, &c.; but my Lord Chancellor will give a more perfect account of that matter, being himself in the House."

1697, Sept. 7.—"This day the House of Commons in a Committee of the whole House did resolve that the additional Excise, which terminates at Christmas, 1698, shall be continued from that time until Christmas, 1702, which is the time I told your Lordship in my last I hoped we should get it for; all the other additional duties being to determine at the same time. They did resolve that the several duties voted by them since that of the Poll should be applied to the raising the remaining 50,000*l.*, and then towards building the Barracks 25,000*l.*, and then 21,000*l.* as an equivalent for the Quit-rents, which his Majesty has been addressed to remit, and 6,600 to the heirs of Sir Audley Mervin, formerly Speaker of the House of Commons, of which sum 600*l.* to Mr. Warberton, formerly Clerk of that House; and they have resolved that in case the funds falls [fall] short, that they shall be made good by Parliament. But by the best information I can get from those concerned in the Revenue and others, I am assured that in all probability the funds will answer what they are given for. The Report of the resolutions of this date will be made tomorrow, in which there is, I believe, no doubt of their agreeing, since in the Committee they were so very unanimous. So, my Lord, as to the matter of money, things are like to conclude well, which had not been so long a-doing but for the difficulties of making the parties agree, which in this we had success, and I hope the Sessions will end well, especially considering how many anvils has [have] been at work. When the Money Bills go over, we intend to adjourn the House for some time until they return. I hope your Grace will find benefit by the country.

1697, Sept. 9, Dublin Castle.—“Je vous suis tres obligé de la confiance avec laquelle vous me faites l’honneur de m’écrire; vostre longue lettre est une marque de vostre amitié. . . .

“Selon vos ordres ie vous rendray conte de la conduite de Mr. Sauvage. Il s’est passé et il se passe tous les iours beaucoup de choses dont on l’acuse avec beaucoup d’aparence; cependant, comme ce ne sont que des conjectures, ie n’apuiray pas sur ces bruits, de peur de luy faire iniustice.

“Mais voicy ce que ie sais certainement: dans le comencement du Parlement il fit des assembleés pour engager les principaus du parti à attaquer les Brodricks, qui n’estoient pas encore reuenus de la campagne; i’en fus averti; ie l’enuoyay chercher, et luy parlay en amy; il me promit de ne rien faire de uiolent, ny doffensant, contre eus, mais qu’il ne pouroit s’empêcher de doner sa voix pour faire oster le Soliciteur General de la chaire du Comité des Elections. Ie luy repondis que la liberté deuoit estre entiere dans les Parlements, mais ie luy fis voir qu’il ne pouuoit rendre un plus grand seruice à sa patrie, qu’en employant son credit à l’union, afin de trauailler tous ensemble au bien public. Ie crus l’auoir persuadé; cependant le landemain il fit une harangue iniurieuse contre le Soliciteur General; on fit M. Molsworth chairman en sa place. Les Brodric[k]s arriuerent deus iours après, et trouuerent le mesme parti resolu à oster la chaire du Comité pour l’argent à Thom[as] Brodric[k], et le parti oposé resolu de le soutenir, sy bien que les deus partis estoient prests à se diuiser pour essayer leurs forces des l’ouuerture du Parlement.

“C’estoit un mechant comencement. Nous entreprimes de les acomoder; nous trouuames les Brodric[k]s des gens assés difficiles, mais qui parloient franchement, et qui escoutaient. Enfin le Soliciteur nous promit de ne reprendre pas la chaire du Comité des Elections, pourueu que M. Sauvage luy demandat pardon deuant nous, et que son frere gardat la chaire du Comité pour l’argent. Nous obligeames M. Sauvage à demander pardon, et il nous promit qu'on ne parleroit pas d'oster Brodrick[k] de la chaire du Comité. Le mesme soir il nous dit qu'il estoit resolu d'ataquer Thom[as] Brodrick[k] le landemain, et qu'absolument il falloit qu'il quitat la chaire.

“Ce procedé me surprit; ie ne fus pas tout à fait maistre de moy, et ie crois que mon emportement ne fut pas inutile. Cependant, n'esperant pas de le ramener, nous persuadames les Brodrick[k]s de tout ceder plustost que de diuiser la Parlement; mais my Lord Chancelier trouua moyen d'acomoder l'affaire, en faisant en sorte que Thom[as] Brodrick quiteroit la chaire, mais que son frere la prendroit. Cet expedient assoupit les diuisions.

“Il y a eu depuis une aparante intelligence entre le Chancelier de l'Exchequer et les deus freres, qui a fait perdre entierement le credit que le Chancelier auoit dans son parti, qui s'est troué mal content d'auoir esté engagé par luy dans le dessein de pousser les Brodrick[k]s, et d'auoir esté abandoné. Les Brodrick[k]s aussy se sont troués avec fort peu de credit dans cette Session, car desque tous ceus qui composoyent ces deus partis n'ont troué personne qui les soutint, l'animosité a cessé, et en mesme temps la dependance des chefs; et à present dans toutes les diuisions les plus eschaufés dans les partis se trouent confondus, pour et contre sans aucune distinction, quoyque M. Sauuage (sic) n'ait pas perdu une ocasion de remettre ces partis sur pied. Il a tousiours voté contre ce que nous souhaitions, hors dans les uotes de l'argent, ou tout a esté d'une voix, mais publiquement contre le Bill pour confirmer les Attainders.

“Ie crois, my Lord, qu'une marque de faueur aussy esclatante que celle d'ajouter à tant d'autres emplois celeuy (sic) de Commissaire du Reuenue, feroit tort aus affaires du Roy, et diminueroit nostre credit, et le metroit luy mesme hors d'estat de rendre aucun seruice. Le Roy fera beaucoup pour luy s'il luy acorde la pension de quatre cents pieces que i'ay demandeés à S. M., pour l'en faire iouir iusques à ce qu'il soit entierement payé de ce qu'il pretend luy estre du comme Clark of de (sic) Crown. Outre cela, my Lord, ie crois qu'il faut euter de donner les places de Commissaires du Reuenue comme des recompenses, ou pour gratifier des personnes recomandés. Il n'y en a desia que trop de cette espece, qui, peu capables, ou negligents, ne sont employés et maintenus dans l'employ qu'en faueur des recomandations.

“Il faut chercher des personnes capables de bien remplir un poste sy important. Uous saués, my Lord, que le bon succès des affaires depend du bon menagement du reuenue. Sy uous uoulés, my Lord, mander à M. Winchester que uous ne pouués recomander personne sans une comune sollicitation de la part du Gouvernement, ie me charge de n'y pas consentir; i'ay d'assés bonnes raisons pour m'y oposer. Mi<sup>d</sup> Winchester en est la dupe; il luy a tousiours donné les Bills à porter dans la Maison des Comunes; entre autres, celuy qui confirme les Articles de Limerick. Ie ne m'y suis pas oposé, et i'en suis faché, car il l'a porté avec une negligence qui a offensé toute la Maison. Ce Bill sera lu demain pour la seconde fois ; ie crois qu'il sera committed pour estre examiné ; ie n'en suis pas fâché, afin d'auoir le temps de desabuser ceus, à qui on a persuadé que ce Bill peut leur faire tort, à cause des leases qu'ils tiennent des Papistes, qui pourront estre exclus des Articles.

“ Nous auons receu aujourdhy un memoire que M. Uernon nous a enuoyé par ordre de leurs Excellences, sur la manufacture des toiles. Les heads du Bill en faueur de cette manufacture seront lus dans la maison Lundi, tresiesme de ce mois ; nous uerons s'ils sont conformes à ce memoire, et y ajouterons dans le Conseil ce qu'il y manquera.

“ Uous m'aués fait l'honneur de m'escire ouuertement, et m'aués ordonné de uous mander nettement ma penseé ; ie uous obeis punctuellement.

“ Ie suis fort fâché, my Lord, de la mauuaise opinion que uous aués de uostre propre santé.” . . .

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 9, Dublin.—“ I received the favour of your Lordship's of the 30th, and by the accounts I have given your Grace, you will find we have transmitted the Bill for confirming the Outlawries under another title, and when it returns now I believe will meet with no opposition. . . .

“ Yesterday the House of Commons agreed to the resolutions that was [were] made on Tuesday, and on Saturday the heads of all the Money Bills will be offered to the House by Mr. Solicitor, so in the afternoon I suppose they will be brought to us. I do assure you as to Mr. Savage I will give you a very impartial account, and tell you exactly in what he has done well, and how in some things I would have had him done better, for he is as bad a Whig in Ireland as my Lord Wharton is.

“ The Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick is to be read a second time tomorrow, and then will be committed, and there is a very pretty notion broached now as if some here had represented to the King that they would not pass this Bill with the additional words, and therefore, to show the King how careful they are of his honour, and how ready they would be to pass it with the additional words, that they would through [throw] out this Bill, or else make an Address to this effect ; but I believe they won't be able to do either of these things, but that the Bill will pass ; and Mr. Savage says that he will do his utmost to have the Bill pass, and to prevent this Address, or anything of that kind ; and Sir J. Meed is out of town, and one Mr. Brice, that was Steward here for my Lord Normanby, and was a very troublesome fellow, is dead. So I don't doubt but we shall have a good conclusion, notwithstanding the rubs we have had.”

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Sept. [10-]20, 6 at night, Ryswicke.—“Though I have forborne, out of respect to your Excellency’s health, to give you of late any trouble of this kind, yet having, by the blessing of God, finally adjusted all our points, we are here this afternoon to sign the Treaty. It’s now writing fair over, and I hope in a postscript to be able [to] tell your Grace that it is actually signed. God make it happy to the King and kingdom, and restore your Grace to your perfect health, to enjoy long your part of the blessing.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] Sept. 12-22, Bruxelles.—“We are here all overcome with joy: a peace with France, and a victory over the Turks in Hungary, of both which your Grace will have better accounts from Holland. For my part, I can scarcely yet believe we have a peace, which we have deserved so little. ’Tis certain our enemy was in a condition to carry on the war with great superiority everywhere, and I can see no political reasons which could move him to such a peace as we have now, by which France gives up more to Spain and the Empire than ever was given up by any treaty of peace that I know of. We must seek for the true reasons hereof in the age or devotion of the King of France, in his inclinations, or in those of Madam Maintenon. But a peace we have, and the Lord of peace be thanked. I think I must go to Loo and receive the King’s orders about the disposition of his Army, and where it must winter; I hope, in England. The Elector and the Prince of Vaudemont design to go visit the King at Loo; who are better company than the Czar would be.

“I long to hear that your Grace has found the same balsam in the country air which you did in the beginning of the summer.

[P.S.] “I must tell your Grace that the Spaniards do disown the decree of the Inquisition, which I sent your Grace, and say it was supposed (sic) at Paris.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 14, Dublin Castle.—Asks him to burn his letter of the 9th, after reading it. “Sy par malheur elle estoit ueue, et qu’on en sent (sic) quelque chose, cela me brouilleroit infalliblement avec une personne avec laquelle ie neus conseruer une grande liaison.

“Le Bill qui confirme les Articles de Limeric[k] a passé ce matin dans la Chambre des Comunes, et a esté porté dans celle des Seigneurs, ou ie crois qu’il passera, mais ce ne sera pas sans quelque contradiction. Nous aurons demain les heads des Bills pour l’argent; ceus du Bill pour la manufacture de toiles seront prêts demain, aussy bien que du Bill en faueur des estrangers Protestants. Après cela nous irons au Parlement pour passer ceus qui sont prêts ; et puis ajournerons le Parlement pour un quinsaine de iours, en attendant qu'on nous renuoye les Bills d'Angleterre. Il n'est bon de tenir cette compagnie ensemble sans affaires, outre que la plus part des membres des Communes sont impatiens d'estre esloignés de leurs affaires domestiques, et de depenser icy leur argent. Je prie Dieu, my Lord, qu'il uous rende une santé parfaite."

PORTLAND TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Sept. 14-24, Loo.—(This letter is printed by Coxe, in two portions, at pp. 171 and 373.)

French. R. 2nd Oct. 97.

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 16, Dublin Castle.—“Les heads du Bill pour l'encouragement de la manufacture des toiles, et les heads du Bill pour la naturalisation des Protestants estrangers, sont aprouvés, le premier dans la Maison, et l'autre dans le Comité de toute la Maison des Comunes. M. May en rend un conte plus particulier à M. Uernon, qui uous l'enuoira aparament.

“Le Soliciteur General nous remit hyer les heads des deus Bills pour l'argent.

“Les Seigneurs se doiuent assembler demain matin en Comité, pour preparer les heads d'un Bill de Rights. Je crois qu'il faut auoir patience, les obseruer, et gagner du temps. Je suis d'opinion que cela n'aura pas de suite.

“Nous esperons que le Bill qui confirme les Articles de Limerick passera dans la Maison des Seigneurs dans le comencement de la semaine prochaine. Apres cela, nous irons doner le consentement aus Bills qui ont passé dans les deus Maisons ; et en mesme temps nous aiournerons le Parlement pour quinze iours ou trois semaines, en attendant le retour des Bills que nous enuoirons dans cinq ou sis iours, et preuiendrons les nouueautés ausquelles l'inutilité engage ceus qui composent cette assembleé.

“Nous enuoirons avec les Bills pour l'argent sept ou huit autres Bills, et un pareil nombre quelques iours après, avec le Bill pour la manufacture des toiles. Je peus me tromper, mais ie crois que dans ce grand nombre de Bills il n'y en aura que trois ou quatre qui pourront trouuer quelque exception dans le Conseil d'Angleterre, dont deus pourront estre aisement amendés, et deus autres remis pour une autre ocasion.

“Je crois qu'on uous aura enuoyé, my Lord, les raisons qui nous font pencher pour la prorogation du Parlement. Je suis pourtant d'auis de comencer par un ajournement iusques au mois de Decembre, et le proroger alors iusques au mois d'Auril ; et ie serois d'auis de rassembler ce Parlement dans ce temps la, sy celuy d'Angleterre n'est plus ensemble. C'est une matiere qui merite une plus particuliere consideration. Sy l'on prend le parti d'ajourner ce Parlement iusques au mois de Decembre, le Roy aura le temps d'examiner soigneusement cette affaire, auant que de doner ses ordres. Je prie Dieu, my Lord, que uous soyés en estat de nous les enuoyer. . . .

[P.S.] "La mauuaise santé de nostre Chancellier ne luy permet pas, my Lord, d'auoir l'honneur de uous escrire aujourd'hui."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Sept. 16-26, Loo.—"I was ordered to come hither, and I am come, but I scarcely yet can tell why. I do suppose it is to receive his Majesty's orders about the disposition of our troops, now the peace is made. We have yet no ratification of the treaty from any of the parties, and therefore nothing done yet towards the execution thereof; but our King and the States General have signed an act of guaranty, as it were, that the ratifications shall come from Madrid, London, and the seven provinces as soon as is possible; and if the King of France is satisfied with that security, as we hope he will be, we shall immediately enjoy the benefit of the peace, by a cessation of all acts of hostility here, by a retreat of the French armies, and an evacuation of the places which are to be restored to Spain. In the mean time our Elector sent to the French Generals to tell 'em the peace was signed, and to know what orders they had received. Mons. de Villeroy said he had no advice thereof from his master, nor any orders; but since he was assured that the peace was signed, he would commit no act of war, or make any movement until farther orders from Court, of which he would give his Highness notice.

"I know not yet what will be done with all our troops, but I know what I will do. I will labour very hard to get a great many folks sent every man to his own home. I do foresee a good deal of opposition, but I do not despair of success. The Prince of Vaudemont will be here tomorrow, and the Elector in two or three days more. We are impatient to see what effect the news of the peace had in London.

"The affairs in Poland seem now to go all in favour of the Elector of Saxe."

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Sept. 20-30, Loo.—"I humbly thank your Grace for the honour of your letter of the 8th, which I received here. I am infinitely sorry that the physicians have banished your Grace from London, but we must be content to sacrifice your Grace's nearer influence to your own security.

"I was sent for to this place in haste, in order to receive his Majesty's directions about the disposal of our foreign troops, which are now grown useless, I hope, since the peace is made; but we owe these troops so much money and are so unable to pay 'em at present, and the King so averse to the discharging any of 'em until they are cleared, that I fear we must keep 'em all winter.

"I did lately tell your Grace something about the two favourite Lords here, which is still a secret. I now find it is resolved that my Lord Portland shall go over to London very quickly, and thence to Paris as Ambassador from the King. This is an honourable kind of banishment; in the mean time the King gives him the Lord Clinkarty's estate. This is yet not talked of here. The peace is now published by the French in their camp, and Mons. Precontal, Lieut.-General, is come to Bruxelles to assure the Elector thereof, and that the French armies were going to retire. I am just going to the Hague."

1697, Sept. 22, Grafton.—"My Lord, I sincerely congratulate the part your Excellency has had in bringing to a conclusion a Peace which does so universally rejoice, and will I hope conduce to his Majesty's happiness and safety, as it does now to his glory. I have nothing to add but my thanks for the trouble you have given yourself in corresponding with me during this negociation."

WINCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 23.—"I have had nothing to trouble your Grace with since my last, but what we gave you an account of in our joint letter. I think we have a great deal of reason to be very well satisfied with the House of Commons, but the House of Lords have been troublesome enough, especially the Bishops; but to be plain, I must own I think it is plain, my Lord Drogheda by his behaviour is the spring and at the bottom of it all; and the Bishops that carry on everything with great heat are the Bishops of Derry, Killalla, and Limerick and Killallow, that my Lord Capell made the worst of them all; and for the temporal Lords, they are most of them new converts, unless those that my Lord Drogheda has an entire command of.

"The message we received from the House of Lords, and our answer, we gave you an account on. My Lord Drogheda made that motion, and has promised that, since we did not think fit to send the reasons they desired to have, he would take care that the refusal of it should be no prejudice to us. I fear the motion was made with no very good design. Today our answer is given, and the Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick are [is] ordered to be read; so before I seal this I shall be able to give you an account of both these matters. My Lord Abbercorne is a great manager against everything, and entirely directed by my Lord Drogheda.

“Our answer today was agreed to be satisfactory, and my Lord Drogheda, according to his promise to me, did the very first of all, after the message was delivered, made [make] a speech in which he declared our answer to be satisfactory, and it met with no opposition. The Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick is passed today, but with great difficulty, it being carried but by one voice in the House, but then there was [were] six proxies for the Bill, and four against it, so it was carried by three. We intend to pass the Bills that are passed both Houses before they adjourn, which we intend to send to them to do in a few days.

“I hope the greatest difficulties of this Sessions is [are] over. I shall be very glad to hear that your Grace continues to recover, but we want five mails today, so we are strangers as to what passes on the t’other side of the water. Your Lordship will have an account of all the Bills we have sent with the Money Bills by this express in our letter from the Council Chamber.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Sept. 24, Dublin Castle.—“Nous auons enfin passé le Bill qui confirme les Articles de Limerick, dans la Chambre des Seigneurs, d’une seule uois de ceus qui estoient presents, et de deus par les procurations, trois en tout. Uous ne sauriés croire, my Lord, l’acharnement des seise oposans. Ie uous doneray un plus grand esclarcissement de leur conduite, car ie crois à propos que uous conoissiés à qui nous auons à faire. Nous aiournerons le Parlement dans deus ou trois iours iusques au 20 Octobre. Les Bills ne pouront estre de retour auant ce temps la. Nous allons tout à l’heure au Conseil, pour les metre en estat de partir cette nuit; ie doute qu’ils puissent partir plus tost que demain au soir.

“Le gentilhomme dont ie me suis donné l’honneur de uous rendre conte et de sa conduite, nous aporta hyer matin un message de la part des Comunes, en acompagnant Iames Hamilton Tullimore, qui nous presenta les heads du Bill pour l’encouragement de la manufacture des toiles. Le message portoit que la Chambre des Comunes nous prioit d’ajouter à ce Bill ce que nous iugerions à propos pour le rendre plus parfait, selon les memoires qui nous ont esté enuoyés d’Angleterre; et dans le raport qu’il en fit dans la Maison, il y ajouta, pourueu que ces aditions ne comprissent pas la leueé d’aucun argent. Uous comprenés aisement, my Lord, que cette adition est une reserue du solo Right. Heureusement M. le M. de Winchester a lû ce matin les uotes d’hyer, en manuscrit. I’estois dans son cabinet; il m’a demandé sy ie me souuenois que M. Sauage nous eut dit ces mots, sachant bien que non; nous en auons compris aussy tost la consequence. Nous les auons fait oster des uotes imprimés, et auons appris que non seulement il ne nous l’auoit pas dit, mais qu’il n’en auoit pas eu l’ordre de la Maison. Uous pouués iuger, my Lord, de ses bonnes intentions. . . .

[P.S.] “ Il y a dis iours que nous n'auons point de nouuelles. Je ne souhaite pas celle de la paix plus ardamment que celle du restablissement de uostre santé.

“ Mi[lor]d Winchester a parlé à ce soir à M. Saugage du raport qu'il a fait à la Maison des Comunes. Il a nié le fait. Je luy ay fait dire d'aller demain uoir sy cela est dans le liure, et de le faire rayer, comme faus, puisqu'il nie d'auoir fait ce raport.

“ Nous auons acheué de metre seise Bills en estat, que nous ferons partir cette nuit. Nous en auons presque encore autant à enuoyer.”

SHREWSBURY to WINCHESTER.

1697, Sept. 25, Grafton.—“ I am ashamed to confess myself so much in arrear as to acknowledge your Lordship's of the 31st August, 4th, 7th, and 9th of Sept., together, but as on the one hand I am able to do no service at this distance, so on the other my health continues so much the same, that is (to speak the truth), so ill, that I am willing to be more idle than I am sensible I ought, though if I could be useful in anything to your Lordship I am sure that consideration would have the preference before all other. I doubt, whenever the uniting of parties is tried, whether in Ireland or elsewhere, it will be found a very difficult task; however, they have so far agreed, as that I find you are well satisfied with the provision they have made for the public. I am more than ordinarily concerned for the success of this Sessions, because your interest as well as that of the public is concerned in it.”

1697, Sept. 25, Grafton.—“ I have four letters to acknowledge from your Lordship of the 31st Aug., 7th, 9th and 19th [16th?] Sept. That of the 9th shall be disposed of as your Lordship desires, and I look upon myself very particularly obliged to you, both for the instruction I received by it, and for the freedom with which it is writ. I shall endeavour to make it a guide to my proceedings and take a special care that no prejudice may come to you by it. I am extreme glad, that though you have met with some difficulties you could not foresee, but such as are common to the course of a Session of Parliament, yet, upon the whole, matters have gone well, and the public business is in a way of being effectually provided for.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697, [Sept. 28-] Oct. 8, s.n., Hague.—“ I am here yet, to have the honour to write once more to your Grace from this place. The wind has been so cross that the ratification of the Peace is not yet come back from London hither, and will not come I fear in the time which was promised, which was three weeks. It is therefore provided that the King shall ratify it provisionally here, and sign it with the signet, which will be delivered to the French, until that under the Great Seal comes. The Germans are very angry at us for signing the peace without 'em, but are preparing to sign themselves. They are surely in the wrong to dishonour and complain of a peace as they do, which is surely a very good peace for us and our King, in relation to his personal interests, and a good peace for the Empire and Spain, to whom France restores more good places than ever were restored by any treaty of peace. It has been computed that the French give back now, what did yield 'em near 20 millions of French crowns yearly.

“Our Ambassadors here have little more to do now. My good Lord Pembroke is at leisure to study hard all morning, and to do nothing all afternoon. Sir Joseph and Lady Katherine can chide and quarrel all the day long. My Lord Villiers does what is to be done, and his Lady has enough to do to visit all the French Ambassadors' ladies, and to receive their visits. His Lordship is in haste to be gone for Ireland, for fear my Lord Galloway should leave nothing there to do.

“Our Ambassadors and the French have agreed now that the twelve days after which all privateering should cease shall be reckoned from the signing of the treaty, not from the day of its ratification; by which means we are now [at] liberty in the Channel already.

“The King is still at Loo, and the Elector of Bavaria with the Prince of Vaudemont and the Prince of Holsteyn Gottorp are with him; he lives and hunts like an honest country gentleman, who does not think of coming to town. My Lord Portland is expected here in a day or two, in his way to London.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. HILL.

1697, Oct. 6, Grafton.—“Since I have writ to you I have had six letters from you of the 9th, 12th, 22nd, 26th, 30th September, and of the 8th October, all new style. Our plenipotentiaries have done what pleases me so well, that I am contented they are now at leisure to follow their own inclinations. I suppose the Germans will not be so unreasonably elevated with their late success as to desire to continue the war with France alone, and therefore conclude they have or will soon come into the Peace. They are fond of the false glory of having been the last that have accepted, when it is, in my mind, an honourable thing to be the first that is ready to give peace to Europe, when it is agreed upon reputable terms. I am apt to believe the Emperor is glad that the French will no longer give the choice of Strasbourg or the equivalent, but will yield the last only; else it is owing to them, who obstructed the first signing, that the good grace of that part of the treaty is less than it was at first offered.

“I hear my Lord Portland, soon after his arrival here, is designed for France to make the compliment, but to stay there a very short time.

“I do not yet understand that anything is agreed concerning King James removing farther from Paris. His remaining so near will surely be very undecent, when our King has an ambassador there, both with respect to himself and the King of France; and it will be extreme inconvenient to the quiet of his Majesty’s affairs to have him in a place where such easy recourse may be had to him.

“The nation in general is much pleased and satisfied with the Peace, but there are some who will like nothing, who will be ready to find any fault they can. The uncertainty of this (which I am sensible might not properly be inserted in the public Treaty), and the Art[icle] about Hudson’s Bay, are the only two objections I have yet heard mentioned.”

MANCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Oct. 7-17, Rotterdam.—“I could not omit any longer from returning your Grace my thanks for your kind expressions and good wishes to me in my journey, though at present I have nothing to acquaint your Grace, but that we arrived on Wednesday last at this place, and had a very fortunate passage, the wind being fair but stormy, [so] that we had liked [like] not to have made the coast. Lord Portland is now at the Hague, but Capt. Saunderson sails this day for the Brill, in order to take him on board for England. I intend tomorrow for the Hague, and, as soon as I can, wait on his Majesty at Loo, where I shall give your Grace an account of my proceedings, which I hope may be such as will meet with approbation.”

R. 21. Ansd. 23.

JO. METHUEN TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Oct. 8, Dublin.—. . . “Sir Francis Brewster, in his return to England, being willing to wait on your Grace, and knowing your opinion of him, I could not resist the temptation of begging that you will inquire of him the circumstances of our affairs here. He hath been present in all the debates of the House of Commons, and is well informed of what hath passed in all other places. . . .

“We met with great and most unreasonable difficulties, formed not only against us but against all we have been doing, but have gained all the principal points we aimed at, and I hope gotten such credit with the country gentlemen and those that wish well to the Protestant interest here that, in case we can keep our credit entire in England, we shall overcome all opposition, and establish the true English interest here, and render his Majesty’s governing this kingdom very quiet and easy, and make the holding Parliaments more practicable. There will be to be feared some struggle in the remaining part of this Session, by reason that many of our friends are gone, and probably the opposite faction will be more vigilant; and there seems to be a new occasion of troubling our affairs and uniting a great party, by the expectation raised here with great industry, that if the King's affairs do not meet with all the success desired under this Government, his Majesty will resolve, if he hath not already resolved, to place here a great person of this country, from whose Administration they hope better things.

“I ought to inform your Grace that, notwithstanding all the care I have taken, yet our late difficulties being most in the House of Lords, and the party that opposed our business so near equal as to come within one or two of every question, the share of management as Speaker hath made the success of things more attributed to myself, so as all those who are displeased and disappointed seem resolved and agreed to make me the object of their resentment. I cannot forbear to trouble your Grace with one instance of the difficulty I am under. The Bill for confirmation of the Articles of Lymerick seemed absolutely necessary for the settlement of the country, for the King's honour, and likewise for his Majesty's particular satisfaction that people here were willing to do whatsoever he should please to desire in the matter. To this end it was necessary to frame the Bill so as to be as acceptable as was possible to the English Protestant interest, preserving still the King's honour, and the quiet of the country from suits.

“Having done this in the best manner I could, and for that purpose left out those additional words, which were what shocked the Protestants most, and yet were still in the King's power to make good as much as if they were included, it was necessary for me, to get this Bill to pass in the House of Commons, to engage personally above a hundred members, and to represent to them the necessity of passing the Bill, because the King did believe it absolutely necessary for his own honour, the quiet of the kingdom, and to prevent complaints of his Allies. This prevailed with them, and upon this foot it was openly declared that the Protestants sacrificed their resentments and wrongs to the King's honour, and voted unanimously for the Bill. In the House of Lords, on the contrary, all the objections against the Bill were, that it was not favourable enough to the Papists, and therefore I was forced there to justify the Bill in that respect, and shew that it was consistent with the King's honour and the utmost extent of the Articles. By this means the passing the Bill appears to them all to have been my care, and the consequence is, that all the Papists and their friends, all those who are willing the Papists should be pressed for other ends and advantages than the interest of the Protestants, all those that are for breaking the present Government in hope to have another, do me the honour to think me the greatest obstacle to their intentions, and I believe will treat me accordingly, and, pursuant to their morals, by all ways imaginable endeavour to do me a prejudice. I believe there was no necessity to have mentioned this matter to your Grace, and that you would not have been much surprised to have found the same thing without hearing it from me.

“There remains nothing but to inform your Grace that the gentleman [Mr. Savage] whom I have been forced to mention to you oftentimes is engaged deeply with the party that oppose this present Government, and makes use of the credit he is in with my Lord Marquis [of Winchester] upon other accounts to render himself considerable amongst those who would prejudice my Lord in everything. Sir Francis will explain his conduct to your Grace, but there are two matters, one in the Bill for Protestants Strangers, which he opposed, declaring himself under apprehensions of being governed here by the French and Dutch making Parliaments; the other in the Bill for the linen manufacture, where, having the honour of a message from the House with the Bill to acquaint my Lords Justices that they might make use of any part of a paper sent from England that might be proper to be added to the Bill, in his report to the House of that message, he added these words—‘provided that none of those clauses or matters did anyways relate to raising any money’; which, being entered on the Journals, had been printed if we had not presently prevented it, and yet remain in the Journals, so as we are at a great loss how to get it rectified without stirring most unseasonably the question of the sole right, but at the next meeting one way or other we must do it.

“Our scheme of the money exceeds our expectation. I believe with good management we may pay all the debt necessary to be paid with the arrears of all kinds and the Poll Bill, so as to keep all the additional duties, which will be worth forty thousand pounds a year, as an addition to the Revenue, whereby the number of our troops here may be increased, which seems likely to be very grateful to his Majesty upon this occasion of the Peace, and yet any great growing debt may be prevented; and, what is the most considerable matter, Parliament will be better managed when the necessities of affairs do not let them see so much is expected from them.”

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1697, Oct. 20, Eyford.—“ I received yours of the 8th by Sir Francis Brewster, and since that I have yours of the 9th. I had but little discourse with Sir Francis. He found me in this little house, and would not stay, I believe, for fear of incommoding the family, though I told him I had good convenience to lodge him. He understood I should be in town before the King arrived, and deferred great part of what he had to say till I should see him there.

“ In the small time I had to talk with him I found your affairs had been in great disorder, and that he thought it a wonder that you had gone through them so successfully as you had done, considering the little assistance you had received from those in his Majesty’s employments. He complained of the Bish[ops] in general, which can be remedied by time only, promoting such as are good, and supplying the vacancies that may fall with more caution than hitherto hath been done. He likewise complained of the Judges, and said that, Pyne and Coot excepted, all the rest deserved to be displaced. He mentioned the Commissioners of the Revenue with as little esteem, alleging the affection of some, and the ignorance of all, would make a very considerable change necessary, to have the Revenue managed to that advantage it might easily be. But above all his resentment appeared most against Mr. Savage, as the leader and promoter of all the opposition and uneasiness you have or may meet with in this Sessions.

“ In short, he says that almost all in the places of trust and importance are uneasy under the present Administration of the Government in Ireland, and wishing for a Lord Lieutenant, under whom they promise themselves happier days; but what surprised me most is, that he assures me many of consideration are become disaffected even to his Majesty’s Government, and that there is such a thing as a Protestant party of Jacobites in Ireland, in which there are too many employed by the King. He concluded with giving his opinion, that nothing but a very considerable change of hands could set the Irish affairs in a good posture.

“ I have repeated the heads of what he said to me, and if this be the case, his advice is certainly right, but I hope it is not so bad as he represents it, and that a less alteration may be sufficient. I took an opportunity to tell Sir Francis how well satisfied your Lordship and my Lord Chancellor were with his carriage, and I believe it will be reasonable to do something for him, and particularly in the Revenue, where his genius seems to lead him, though I doubt whether he will be able to make that improvement your Lordship mentions. He is a man of many projects, and great fancy, but very often people of that kind cannot bring all to perfection upon trial which they have imagined in speculation. I say not this to derogate from Sir Francis, for whom I have an esteem, and think he would fill one place in the Commission of Revenue extremely well, especially if others were joined to him of good judgment, though less fancy. I have long been of opinion that the Commission of the Revenue should be mended, and that the King suffered extremely by the ignorance and non-attendance of the Commissioners. What Mr. Hill is designed for, or how he would like such an employment, I cannot tell, but I am very apt to believe, by the knowledge I have of him, which is only from his letters; that he could make himself fit for anything, and everybody gives a good account of his integrity.

“I design to be in town about the time the King returns, though I do not expect that I shall be able to stay long. If your Lordship pleases then to favour me with your commands, I will execute them to the best of my skill; but there is this difficulty which your Lordship, my Lord Chancellor of Ireland, myself, and everybody here that seconds your opinion will lie under, in case any great alteration be to be made, and that my Lord Winchester cannot be persuaded to join in the representation of it to his Majesty. If it be done without his knowledge, he will take it as a great slight; if it be with his knowledge, and without his approbation, it will create such a division as will be extremely uneasy to you, and prejudicial to his Majesty’s affairs. But if he can be prevailed with to concur, everything will be easy; but whether that be practicable I submit, but thought this hint necessary for your further consideration.

“I must take the liberty to entreat you to shew this letter to my Lord Chancellor. I dare not write him such another by this post, for fear of straining my breast too much.”

SHREWSBURY to [METHUEN,] Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

1697, Oct. 20, Eyford.—“I had your Lordship’s of the 8th by Sir Francis Brewster. Mr. Vernon has constantly given me the accounts you have sent of your proceedings, in which I have been so much troubled at nothing as to see that you so over fatigue yourself that it is become prejudicial to your health. . . .

“I had a very little time to discourse with Sir Francis Brewster, he being in haste to be gone; the rest is deferred till I return to London, which will be before the King’s return. I have given my Lord Gallway so long a trouble upon this subject that I have really not strength to repeat it, and therefore must take the liberty, both with you and him, to refer you to that letter.

“I am very sensible of the difficulties you have lain under, and that it is impossible so very considerable a share in the management should fall on you, but that as great a part of their resentment will do so too, who have been disappointed hitherto in their schemes of opposing. I am very confident they are not without hopes of better success in the remaining part of the Sessions, though I believe the same care and prudence will still have the same effect. If they will but see their own interest, and not let faction and passion blind them, it is all the King and his friends can desire. Nothing is more surprising to me than to see a House of Parliament in Ireland make difficulty on a Bill because it is not favourable enough to Papists; and that Bish[ops] should appear in the head of this opposition is wonderful to the last degree, and might carry one to suspicions that I hope are as unreasonable as their proceedings.

“The two instances you have given of Mr. Sav[age’s] behaviour are such that methinks it should not be difficult to convince my Lord Winchester of his intentions, and yet in every letter to me he is partly commending and partly excusing him; and the conclusion is, that he would have him have some further mark of his Majesty’s favour, which his carriage, as represented by others, does very little deserve.

“I am extreme glad to find by Sir Francis Brewster that Mr. Molsworth has behaved himself so well. He is a man of such integrity that I am rejoiced to find there will be so good a foundation to press the King upon his account. Pray, when you see him, do me the favour to tell him how glad I am that those in the Administration are pleased with him, and he with them.”

[EDWARD VILLIERS], EARL OF JERSEY, to SHREWSBURY.

1697, [Oct. 22-] Nov. 1, n.s., Hague.—“At last the Imperialists with the Catholic Princes have signed the Peace; they did it the 30th past. One or two of the Protestants did the same; the others who have refused to sign have till the ratification to come in, which is six weeks. The reason of this separation is that the French would not sign unless an article was added to the treaty, that the Catholic religion should remain as it now is in all the reunions they give back. It appears but too plainly that our Catholic Allies, especially the Elector Palatine, have been at the bottom of all this matter. The French particularly declared that if the Elector of Brandebourg does not sign within the time prescribed, he shall not have the advantage of his article in our treaty. In the present posture of affairs there is little doubt but that the Elector will sign. I know not otherwise how far his Majesty would think himself obliged to maintain an article in his own treaty.

“This manner of proceeding is a little rough, and is warning enough for us not to rely too much on the peace we have now made. I do not know if I may expect to find your Grace at London at the King’s arrival. I should be glad to find that your health would permit it.”

I am extremely of your opinion as to the matter of parties. We find the want of your Lordship, for we have yet no Bills returned, and so on Wednesday last we sent to the two Houses to adjourn until Tuesday the 26th; and if the Bills don’t come then we must send to them to adjourn for a few days longer.

“I am sorry to hear by letters that they have added to the Association Bill a clause from my Lord Antrim and some other Papists, to save them from any hurt [by?] the Bill for confirming the Articles of Limerick, for I fear it will endanger the Bill, and wish it had been added to any other Bill of less consequence; for I should not be a little troubled to have a Bill with that title thrown out, which I am apprehensive enough on.

“My Lord Romney having passed his Bill in England, my Lord Coningsby has writ very earnestly for his, which lay here ready for putting the Seal to, which is done, and transmitted, with one for Mr. Keightly. These Bills I question much the success of them; but I know that they will occasion great heats in the Parliament.”

I desired to know of his Majesty if he had any further instructions than what I received of your Grace. It is not likely we shall find better usage in the Empire in any affair where religion is concerned. It was more the opiniâtreté of the Imperialists than any cunning of the French that brought us to a separate peace, and I think the French have not obliged any party sufficiently to make it give in to their interest if the Allies consider their own preservation. I am entirely of your Grace's opinion that ours depends upon the posture we shall put ourselves into, and I hope the Parliament will have the same sentiments. I am going tomorrow for Aùsbourgh, where I understand the Prince of Baden is, who doth not intend to go for Vienna, not being well pleased with some proceedings there. The Count de Frise is come from disbanded [disbanding] those troops he commanded on the Rhine that were in his Majesty's service ; he talks as if he should be in England very soon.

"This town doth not express any satisfaction in relation to the Peace, and it may be they might have hoped for better terms, but considering how little they have contributed towards the war, they have more than they deserve. I should be very glad to receive your Grace's commands, which shall be always observed."

MR. HILL TO [SHREWSBURY].

1697, Nov. 5-15, Hague.—“I have not found leisure of late to write to your Grace, though I never wanted a good resolution to it. I think I told you, my Lord, that several of the Protestant Princes of the Empire have not yet signed the peace, because the French, restoring several places to the Empire, where they had destroyed the Protestant religion and established the Popish, do now restore the said places on condition only that the Protestant churches shall never be rebuilt, nor the Popish disturbed. The execution thereof is very easy, because these places are restored to the Emperor, or to the Elector Palatine, who did certainly extort themselves that severe condition from the French. However, the frontier Princes have already signed, and the others must follow. The States here go on with the reform of several of their troops, and the King is sending his home to England; but I do not find that the King of France reforms so fast.

“The French Ambassadors here have been to see the King in private once, and in public oft. The King received 'em very well the first time, but with such an awe upon 'em, and such an ascendant, that du Harlay, who undertook to make a long compliment, was out, and stopped in the middle of his harangue. I think there passed little besides compliments between 'em, but the King told them that his destiny more than his inclination had made him an enemy to his most Christian Majesty; and as he had endeavoured during the war to deserve his esteem, so he would endeavour during the peace to deserve his friendship. The Conte de Tallard, Lieutenant-General, is named to come Ambassador from Paris to London. He is a man of quality, but I believe my Lord Portland will not think him equal to himself.

“The Prince and the Princess of Vaudemont are here still, and the King lives with them in more freedom than he ever did with anybody, I believe. Yesterday he gave the ball at the Princess's lodgings, and tonight he went with her to the comedy.

“I am ordered now to send all the forces home as fast as can be; and the French regiments which were on the Rhine are coming down, and are to be sent to Ireland, to recruit the three French battalions which are going thither.

“I long to hear that your Grace is in a condition to meet the King at London, which will be, I believe, three days after the first easterly wind.”

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Nov. [12-]22, Hague.—“Finding, to my great joy, that your Grace’s health hath encouraged you to return to London, I may presume I hope for the future to address the poor accounts of business here, which I used to send Mr. Vernon, directly under your Grace’s name. They will, for anything I yet see, be such for some time as will oblige your Grace to no further trouble than to receive them, and pardon the faults I may commit that write them.

“I find the King is pleased that I should continue some further time here; which yet his Majesty was pleased to add should not be long; and I humbly hope, when his own service and that of the public, relating to the Peace now made, will suffer it, I shall have your Grace’s favour to have that time shortened as much as may be, for in the condition of my health and infirmities I am not fit to be far from home.

“The matter of Religion, as invaded by that new clause in the Treaty with the Empire, of which my last to Mr. Vernon gave the present state, continues as then it was; only the German Protestant Ministers, especially those of Brandenburg, have much pressed us, his Majesty’s Ambassadors, and those of this State (notwithstanding the absolute refusal given to the Mediator, who went in our name), to make one attempt more upon the French Ambassadors in our own persons, to try if there could be any temperament or moderation obtained with relation to that unlucky clause. We declared ourselves most willing to do that, or anything further that might be of use to the common cause, but we much doubted (after so peremptory, so abrupt a refusal on the part of the French, to hear anything further upon that point) how we could, without exposing ourselves to a further affront, and which, it might be, would engage us in new heats, repeat the same proposition in our own persons. We thought all was done that in this state of things could be done, and that an entry made with the Mediator of all that had passed in this business, was as much as well could be done here, and ought to serve us (all of us) in discharge of our duties to our several masters.

“This seemed to conclude everybody’s reasoning at that time. But then remained to say what these poor Protestant Princes of Germany, that hitherto have refused to sign, should do, and how to govern themselves as to the concurring, or not, in the ratifying at Ratisbone. This is a question that strangers cannot so properly opine in. Though they of the Empire presse[d] much to know what would be in this point most to the satisfaction of his Majesty and this State, nobody pretended to answer directly; yet by the bye the Pensioner (who appears a very prudent and worthy person) let fall some words that might a little discover the mind of this side the water, to wit—that the only thing that remained for them, the Protestant Princes, to do (as things now stand) is, to ratify with a reservation, to be entered in the public acts of the Diet at Ratisbone, as to that clause, and the consequences it might otherwise have with respect to the fundamental Constitutions of the Empire, settled in matters of Religion by the Treaties of Munster, &c. And thus, for anything a man can yet see, that unlucky matter is like to go.

“The King is still detained here by the unsettledness of the wind and weather. He parted hence on Wednesday with full resolution of embarking that evening; but neither were the great ships yet got down, nor the wind such as to suffer him to go aboard, so as he was forced to return at night. The next morning his Majesty was up at two a clock, reckoning upon a wind pretty fair, but presently it veered, and he was forced to go to bed at four. It has continued ever since so uncertain, and the weather at sea (as we are told) so very untoward, that it is not thought advisable for his Majesty to go on board. But so soon as any likelihood appears of a passage, everything continues in a readiness for the King to embark.”

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 13.—“I was extreme glad to hear your Grace was so well recovered as to come to London again, and hope by your being at Kensington that you will continue to mend every day. As to the mistake that was made in the word thousand being left out of the Bill for granting the additional Duties to the King, I believe the Bill will not meet with any obstruction because of it. Today the House were to have been in a Committee about that Bill, but the Bill for confirming the Outlawries being likewise appointed, they had not time to do both, but have compared the Bill for confirming the Outlawries, and ordered it to be engrossed. The mistake that was made in that Bill we have given your Grace an account on, and my Lord Chancellor and the King’s Council are of opinion that very few if any will be the better for the mistake. The House of Commons would not enquire how this mistake came to be made, but don’t doubt they say but that we will do it since this Bill was begun in the Council, which I intend to do, and by what I am informed the Clerk of the Council will be found very faulty. We hope to receive some more Bills from you very soon, being very desirous to see a good conclusion of this Sessions of Parliament.

[P.S.] “I desire, if it is not already dispatched, that you will send us the Bill for confirming the Act of Settlement, it being earnestly desired and expected here; if the King does not think fit to grant the clause of reliefs, that your Grace will send us the Bill without it.”

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 13, Dublin Castle.— . . . “Nous uous rendons conte de ce qui se passe dans le Parlement. Je peus ajouter que la Maison des Comunes est dans la meilleure situation que nous la pouons souhaiter. Le Conseil d'Angleterre a attribué des irregularités au dessein de donner atteinte a Poini[n]gs' Law; ie ne crois pas qu'on y ait pensé dans cette ocasion, quoyqu'il soit uray que cette loy leur pese; mais pendant cette session ils n'ont iamais eu dessein de rien tenter, mais seulement d'en faire sentir les ambarras. Sy dans leurs notes imprimés mal à propos, il y a quelque chose qui semble contraire à cette loy, ce ne peut estre que par ignorance, car ils n'ont iamais insisté.

“Mais, my Lord, toutes les fautes essentielles, qui ont donné ocasion aux ambarras que nous auons rencontré, sont uenues du Conseil, et en uerité ce seroit la premiere reforme que ie uoudrois faire. Il est composé d'un trop grand nombre de personnes, et trop peu apliquées aus affaires. Je soubçone mesme le député du Clerc du Conseil de peu de fidelité, et de mauuaises pratiques; cependant ie n'en parle pas positiuement, car ie n'en suis pas seur. J'espere que mardi nous escrirons plus positiuement.”

SIR J. WILLIAMSON to SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Nov. [16-]26, Hague.— “So long as I find the condition of your Grace's health such as will suffer you to be in business, I take leave humbly to offer your Grace the short accompts of what I write more at large to Mr. Secretary Trumbull, of what passes of business here.

“The great difficulty that now most presses is, what the Protestant Princes of the Empire, whose ministers have refused to sign the Treaty, shall do as to the concurring, or not, in the ratifying at Ratisbone. Not to join in the ratification were to make an open breach with the Roman Catholic Princes and States, and, besides the dissolving of our alliances with them, would be capable of drawing on consequences of a dangerous nature, and which the world does not seem prepared for at this time. On the other side, to concur simply and absolutely to the ratifying of that new, unexpected clause, so unfairly foisted into the Project after it had been agreed, without some note or reflexion made upon it, seems of dangerous consequence in the example; the preservation of religion, and all that relates to it, in the state the Treaties of Westphalia put it, being the great basis and foundation of the peace and quiet not only of the Empire, but consequently of all this part of Europe. This is the danger on each hand, and how to find a mean is the difficulty.

“We that are strangers to the Empire, I mean his Majesty's Ministers and those of this State, have been tender not easily to give any advice in this business, being of a nice and delicate nature; only it was intimated in discourse that to refuse ratifying would be to throw things into such a desperate condition, that no man could say what might be the consequences, and that therefore prudence would that they should join in the ratification, but so as to interpose some reasonable proper reservation; that this, howsoever it were, for so much, a varying from the fundamental rule set in matters of religion by the Treaties of Westphalia, yet, for the sake of peace, had been submitted to, but still so as not to be drawn into example for the future, nor to be extended in the execution further than strictly as to the words and intendment of that case, &c.

“This was what we thought this case, and the circumstances of things, would now bear; and so it was the opinion they should this day, which is their post, write to their several masters. And thus this matter stands, of which it will not be long before we must see the end, the term for ratifying coming on now in little more than a fortnight. And in order to it, we find most of the ministers of the German Princes have left this place, and are gone to their respective courts, to assist in the deliberations to be had upon this critical point.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 18, Dublin Castle.—“Nous auons l'honneur de uous escrire aujourd'hui coniointement. L'article qui est pour les Commissaires du Reuenu nous a donné occasion de parler de ceus qui pouroient pretendre à cet employ. M[y Lor]d Winchester a nommé Mr. Sauvage, avec qui il s'est racomodé. Le luy ay dit posituiement que ie m'y oserois; ie luy ay dit les raisons pourquoy. Il a tombé d'accord que nous ne deuions pas le proposer. L'espere qu'il ne uous en pressera plus, mais ie n'en repons pas. Ie ne sais pas ce qu'on l'engagera à faire lorsqu'il sera en Angleterre, ou il pretend aller cet hyuer. Ie crois que Mr. Sauvage luy fera au moins prendre des mesures pour s'oposer de mesme à S<sup>r</sup> Francis Bruster.

“D'ailleurs nostre conduite est un peu delicate sur ces Commissaires du Reuenu. Uous trouués bon, my Lord, que ie uous parle librement; ie tacheray à ne pas abuser de uostre bonté, mais permetés moy de n'auoir iamais rien de reserué pour uous. Les Commissaires de la Tresorerie sont, comme uous saués, fort ialous de tout ce qui peut auoir raport aus finances. Il s'ufit que nous nous soyons adressés à uous pour les rendre fort difficiles sur ce changement, à moins que uous n'ayés la bonté, my Lord, de menager cette affaire, pour les engager dans ce que uous croirés utile aus interests du Roy. Nous n'oserions presque nous adresser à eus, parceque nous les croyons unis avec les Commissaires qui sont desia establis icy, et qui ne souhaitent aucun changement. Sy nous suiuiions ce chemin la, ceuscy en seroient auertis, avec assurance que nous n'aurions pas de succes. Celuy que nous uoudrions oster outre Mr. Iuelin est Mr. Robertes, qui passe la moitié de l'anneé en Angleterre, d'ou il raporte des instructions et des mesures pour former un parti icy, et entretient l'intelligence entre ceus de ce parti, qui sont en Angleterre, et ceus qui sont icy.

“I’ay beaucoup balancé sy ie mettrois l’article qui concerne les Commissaires du Reuenu dans la lettre que nous uous escriuons. Enfin i’ay cru qu’il falloit engager my Lord Winchester, contant bien, my Lord, qu’en uous representant mes difficultés, uous auriés la bonté de ne rien dire sur cet article, sy uous le trouués plus à propos; et nous en escrirons aus Commissaires de la Tresorerie, sy uous le croyés necessaire, et que uous ayés la bonté de me faire sauoir uostre sentiment.

“I’ay peur que le Roy trouue que la Chambre des Comunes a esté trop loing [long ?] dans l’affaire de Sr James Jefferies. Sy cet homme auoit esté capable de conseil, nous l’aurions examiné, et decidé cette affaire, pendant que le Parlement estoit ajourné; mais il aprehendoit nostre decision, et esperoit trouuer des amis dans le Parlement. Cela luy a fait diferer nostre examen d’un iour à autre, iusques à ce que le Parlement estant rassemblé, nous n’en auons plus esté les maistres. Il ne conuient pas au seruice du Roy de le metre ou laisser dans aucun employ dans ce Royaume, mais bien d’auoir pitié de sa famille, et luy donner la pension que ie propose. Sans cela le Roy en sera bien importuné, et uous aussy, my Lord.

“La nouuelle de la resolution que le Roy a prise d’enuoyer icy les regiments françois, m’attire quelque ialousie. Les officiers qui ont peur d’estre cassés, ceus qui me trouuent trop exact, ceus qui souhaitent un autre Gouuernement, et tous ceus qui aiment les factions, se seruent de cette ocasion pour ex[c]iter tout le monde contre moy. Il faut auoir un peu de patience, et une bonne conduite. L’espere que ie rameneray le peu de gens qui se sont laissés emouuoir. Sy my Lord Chancellier ua en Angleterre, comme ie n’en doute pas, il uous donera, my Lord, une plus exacte connoissance de toutes choses.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

[1697,] Nov. 18-28, Anvers.—“I am glad the King is got home to his people, and that your Grace is come to the King. His Majesty is got out of an ill war very gloriously, and he is now going, I suppose, to settle his reign upon such methods as may make him more glorious in peace. The Conte d’Auvergne came to the Hague to wait upon the King, and made him a compliment in such terms as were not usual. He said the King of France bid him assure the King of England, qu’il n’aura pas un seruiteur ni un ami plus fidele que lui; and these words he repeated before Mons. du Harlay. I know, my Lord, that the King has of late been pressed, by all those who dare press him on that subject, to marry; and I know his Majesty shows no great aversion to it now. I believe, my Lord, the kingdom of England has more interest in his marriage than anybody else, and therefore some regard ought to be shown to it, in the choice of that Princess, and to the late Act of Settlement in relation to the succession.

"The King has a mind, I think, to have his troops home so soon as he can, and the Spanish ministers here are in more haste to be rid of us. The French are now beginning to evacuate the Spanish places, and are beginning with Courtray.

"My first concern this winter is for your Grace's health: the next is for the good temper of the Parliament this Sessions."

R. 21, 97. Ansd. 4th Dec.

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, Nov. [19-]29, Hague.—"As we had foretold, so it happened, to the Ambassadors of this State, in the instances they repeated in our names to the French, as to the clause about religion in the Treaty with the Empire—a great many good-words, assuring that the King their master had no intentions to meddle with our religion; that we were at entire liberty to do whatever we thought fit for the preservation and advancement of it; that this particular was not worth the trouble we gave ourselves about it, but a few places established by their master, and which therefore it was but natural and just for him to preserve; but for the rest, and the maintaining the Peace of Munster unshaken, the King their master was of all others the farthest from intending or suffering any atteint[e] to be given to it; and much more to this purpose, but still sticking to their conclusion, that nothing could be changed in what was already done. And of this having given us an accompt yesterday at the Congress, the ministers of our Protestant Allies remained satisfied, seeming to have no further expectations for their masters but to ratify at Ratisbone with some sort of reservation, which (poor people) they are far from adjusting what it can be. But this is the utmost of what they seem to think of, as things stand; and of this, no doubt, as well the French as the Imperialists have come to have the knowledge (for we have observed that nothing can be kept a secret amongst us Allies). And that in all likelihood is the reason why all of a sudden as well the C[ount] de Caunitz as Mons. de Harlay, who had both given out they were here till further orders, are leaving this place, the former this day, and the other tomorrow; their two masters finding that the non-signing of the Protestants, which they had at first been, no doubt, alarmed at, is like to go off without farther consequences, or at least not such as they at first apprehended.

[P.S.] "The French Ambassadors tell us their letters of this day assure them the (sic) express orders are sent for the evacuation of the places which are to be given to Spain; and that the M. de Harcour is named to go Ambassador to Spain."

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 20.—“I hear your Lordship has taken a house at Kensington, where I wish you may find the air agree with you as well as it did in the country. My Lord Gallway and I have writ a joint letter to you in relation to some things that we think necessary to be done here. The Bill for hindering the reversal of the Outlawries passed very unanimously in both Houses; and the additional Duties being likewise passed, and being necessary that Bill should be speedily passed for his Majesty's service, we went yesterday to the House, and the Royal assent was given to those two Bills, and two more, which are in the enclosed list.

“The House of Commons showed how much they were pleased with the Bill for hindering the reversal of several Outlawries, by a great hum they gave when the Royal assent was given to that Bill. We received a transmis (sic) yesterday of six Bills, and do find by Mr. Vernon's letter that we are to expect no more Bills but the Bill for small Debts; so as soon as we receive that, we shall put an end to this Sessions.”

“Lords Justices of Ire[land's] of the 9th Nov. read, with the clause sent with it. The Council to be called tomorrow in the afternoon, and Mr. Attorney to bring some Bill that will bear no debate, to which this clause may be added.

“The letters from Rochfort of the 15th Nov., and of the 11th from Brest, ordered not not (sic) to be sent to the Admiralty.

“The letter about the fire-works was given to my Lord Romney.

“The letters about Goodyer were mentioned.

“Damertot to go to France, if he will go thither.

“The instructions from the Admiralty about preventing the wool to be considered next Sunday, at which time the Treas[ur]y and Mr. Attorney will be ready with their report.

“The complaint about Sir William Beeston to the Commissioners of Trade.

“Betts and Forester to be pardoned.

“The representation of the Turkey Company was read; the first article not to be inserted, the others may. Sir Jam. Rushout to go with two or three men-of-war strength, and unto the Dardanells.

“The proclamation about the Scots trading to the prejudice of the Treaty with Spain. Mr. Secretary and I are ordered to speak with the two Scotch Secretaries for [th] with.

“The Admiralty called in, and directed to prepare a small squadron to call at Argiers, Tripoly, Tunis, &c. They say it may be ready by spring.”

In Shrewsbury's hand.

SIR. J. WILLIAMSON to SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, [Nov. 23-] Dec. 3, Hague.—“My last, which was of the 29th past, gave your Grace an account in what state the point of religion, as it relates to the clause of the 4th Art. of the Treaty with the Empire, then stood, and how it was like finally to be left by the Protestant ministers here. Since when the letters of the 26th past from Ratisbone tell those gentlemen that the Popish Princes there had driven the Protestant Deputies so very hard, as to their declaring whether they meant to sign, or not, that they had refused to give them a delay of three days, which was till the arrival of the ordinary post, by which it seems they were expecting final orders from their respective masters as to that matter.

“This having been refused them, with a severe declaration from those of the Roman communion that in case they did not declare the very next day, they should be concluded and absolutely shut out from ratifying at all, it was concluded among the Protestant ministers rather to sign with a kind of reservation, or entry to be made in the register or protocol (as they call it) of the Diet, such as has been before mentioned; and that accordingly the next day, which was to be the 27th past, they would begin to ratify. So as that matter may be taken to be at end, and that the Treaty with the Emperor and Empire will be ratified purely and simply by all parties within the time limited. And that being done, what remains for the present to perfect this great work of the Peace, is to have the evacuation and restitution of places duly and readily executed, which is what must be next taken care of.

“The professions on the part of France are great and solemn, and more especially by Mons. de Harlay, now at his leaving this place. God grant the effects follow, especially considering some appearances observed in their conduct now of late, towards Luxembourg side, of which I send Mr. Secretary a short extract. And after all, France will or will not do this, or indeed anything else which they promise, as things shall happen to fall out, that is, as they find their neighbours in a posture to bear or to resent wrongs; which I hope will be sufficient, if seriously considered, to direct the House of Commons in the great point likely to come before them this Sessions, as to the force to be kept on foot for the maintaining and preserving the Peace now made.”

R. Nov. 28, o.s. Ansd. 4th Dec.

SHREWSBURY to WINCHESTER.

1697, Nov. 25, Whitehall.—“I am ashamed I have so many of your Lordship's to acknowledge together, but the great hurry of business that has been since I came to town, and the very ill state of my health, are the reasons that I have not been so punctual in my correspondence as either my duty or inclination would oblige me to.

“I hope before this arrives you will have got over most of the difficulties of this Session of Parliament, and that you will be ready to put an end to it, in the manner you shall think most advisable. The King thinks they have sat very long, and begins to wish they might conclude, as I hope they will, in good temper. It would be for the King’s service that your Lordship, my Lord Gallway, and my Lord Chancellor would consult and agree what will be proper to offer to his Majesty to make the Administration of that country more united in his Majesty’s interest, and more capable of pursuing it.

“I am sorry that the circumstances of my health are so very bad that I cannot propose to myself being in the least useful in promoting what your Lordships shall represent. I am going into the country in two or three days, with so melancholy a prospect of my own condition, that the best I can hope is to linger on, a useless, uneasy life, which would not be worth preserving if one knew how to part with it without pain or reproach.

[P.S.] “It was not possible to do anything for the Bill for confirming the Act of Settlement. When I came to town, I found most people declare they did not understand how far it would extend, and in short nobody liked it.”

SHREWSBURY to GALWAY.

1697, Nov. 25, Whitehall.—“When I came to town I had very little hopes of being able to continue long, but having found myself even worse than I expected, I have not been able to correspond so regularly with your Lordship as I ought, and have wished to do, and am at last forced to ask leave to return to the country, which is the only air my indisposition will allow me to breathe in; so that I can be esteemed nothing but a corpse, half buried already, and expecting the consummation of that entire ceremony. It will not therefore become my circumstances to meddle much in politics, but my good wishes to the public, and particularly to your Lordship, makes [make] me hope you will lay some representation before his Majesty in order to amend what is amiss in the present Administration of that kingdom, which all agree much wants it. I have by this post told my Lord Winchester that I hope you and my Lord Chancellor and he will agree upon something of this nature.”

SHREWSBURY to [METHUEN,] Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

1697, Nov. 25, Whitehall.—“I am so sensible that the vexation of business is not a proper remedy for ill health, that I took the first opportunity to move his Majesty that your Lordship might have leave to come for some time into England, which the King has granted, and shall very soon be sent you in form, if it be necessary, as I am told it will.

“I am confident it will be for the King’s service that somebody should be here (and nobody is so proper as yourself) to represent what is fit to be done, to mend some parts of the Administration there, which everybody agrees do want it notoriously. I am sorry my bad health will send me out of the way of being useful to your Lordship or the public, but my distemper increases so fast upon me that I am just going into the country, the only air I can live or breathe in. Whether so useless and comfortless a life as I have the prospect of were worth the preserving, would be a great question with me, if I knew how to end it without pain or reproach.”

SIR J. WILLIAMSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, [Nov. 26-]Dec. 6, Hague.—“According to what I told your Grace in mine of the 3rd was to be expected, the letters that are this day arrived from Ratisbone bring an account that the Peace with France had been at last unanimously ratified, as well by the Protestants as Papists, to be immediately dispatched away to Vienna for the Emperor’s confirmation. Only, in the first place, before they came to ratify, all the Assembly, having had the report made of what had passed in the negotiation here, and of several particular passages which may have related to their liberties and privileges towards the Emperor, and the prerogatives he pretends to in these occasions, made a resolution, that nothing that had passed here in the Assembly at Ryswicke as to the modus tractandi, &c. should be of prejudice to the just rights of the several States of the Empire, nor ever drawn into precedent for the future; and in this resolution, it seems, all the States unanimously agreed, as being a common interest.

“Another resolution also had been made by the body of the Protestant States, to wit, that the clause in the 4th Article should not prejudice them in the rights they had by virtue of the Treaties of Westphalia, nor be drawn at any time into example to their prejudice for the future, &c.; or something to that effect. And with this entry made in the register of the Diet, the Peace stands unanimously ratified, and sent to the Emperor for his consent and confirmation; from whence it is not doubted but it will be despatched hither with all speed, in order to be exchanged, in regard the evacuation and surrender of places depends upon it, and is at a stand till that be done.”

GALWAY TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 27, Dublin Castle.—“Oltre la lettre que nous uous escriuons ensemble, ie ne puis m’empêcher de uous rendre un conte plus particulier de ce qui se uient de passer dans la Maison des Seigneurs, ou les Euesques, my Lord Drogheda, et tous les Seigneurs temporels qui ont esté dans le parti du Roy Jaques, l'ont emporté sur les Archeuesques et les autres Seigneurs temporels, pour rejeter le Bill d'Association. Sy la clause en faueur de my Lord Antrim y estoit demeuree, ie crois que le Bill auroit trouué dans la Maison des Comunes l'obstacle qu'il a rencontré dans celle des Seigneurs. Rien n'estoit capable de le faire passer dans cette Chambre, dans laquelle, les oposans se sont assemblés dans le dessein de s'oposer a tout ce qui leur seroit présenté faorable aus Protestants, et contre les Papistes.

“Ils estoient sy animés contre ce Bill, qu'ils nont pas eu honte de faire entrer my Lord Ross dans la Maison, qui, faisant profession publique d'estre Jacobite, n'auoit iamais uoulu prendre les serments, et n'auoit iamais paru dans la Chambre. Ils l'ont engagé à prendre les serments, à paroître dans la Maison, et à donner sa uois avec eus contre ce Bill. M[y Lor]d Drogheda s'estoit muni de la procuration du Duc d'Ormonde, et ne s'en uouloit pas seruir, trouuant la majorité sufisante. On l'a obligé à declarer les sentiments du Duc, et il l'a rengé parmi les non-contents.

“Quelques membres de la Maison des Communes ayant grande enuie d'engager les Seigneurs à passer ce Bill, prirent ocasion d'un escrit du Colonel John Brown, présenté au Roy Jaques, pour la destruction des Protestants, qu'ils enuoyerent auanthyer matin dans la Chambre haute ; ce qui engagea quelques conferences, et enfin un Comité des deus Chambres. Cela nous a obligé à presser la determination de ce Bill, afin de faire cesser ce Comité, qui ne s'est assemblé qu'une fois. Les suites en pouuoient estre dangereuses. Il estoit à craindre, qu'on n'y proposat les heads d'un autre Bill, au mesme effect, mais en euitant les clauses qui ont serui de pretexte à l'opposition des mal intentionés. Uous conoitrés ceus qui conoissent ce qu'ils doiuent au Roy, et qui sont tousiours prêts à luy doner des marques de leur reconnoissance, et qui l'ont tesmoigné dans cette ocasion par la protestation qui sera faite, et que nous uous enuoirons.

“Nous auons receu une lettre du Conseil, qui nous temoigne le peu de satisfaction que l'on a receu en Angleterre du Bill que nous auons enuoyé sur la manufacture des toiles. Il semble par lettres des particuliers, quon soubçone que le dessein de ceus qui l'ont préparé a esté de le rendre inutile. Ie uous assure, my Lord, que s'il n'est pas bien conceu, ce n'est que par ignorance. Les Comunes nous en ont présenté les heads, en nous priant d'y faire tels changements, retranchements, ou additions, que nous iugerions à propos, dans le Conseil, parceque leur peu de conoissance les empechoit de le metre dans l'estat qu'ils le souhaitoient. Nous auons trouué le Conseil aussy ignorant que les Comunes. Nous auons eu assés de capacité pour y uoir quelques deffauts, mais pas assés pour les corriger, et nous l'auons enuoyé en Angleterre, en auertissant qu'il le falloit changer, sans sauoir coment. Cependant un François tres habile dans cette manufacture m'est uenu trouuer; il ne conoissoit point du tout le país; ie l'ay enuoyé reconoitre tout le Royaume. I'espere qu'a son retour il sera en estat de nous donner de bons auis, et alors nous trauaillerons à un autre Bill, ce que nous ne pouuons faire dans cette Session, dont la continuation pouroit estre dangereuse. Il est temps de la finir ; cependant il y a lieu de craindre que le Parlement d'Angleterre ne procede avec chaleur contre le comerce de ce Royaume, suposant qu'on n'y pense qu'à augmenter le comerce des laines. Je ne sais, my Lord, à qui nous pourons escrire, pour destromper le public, et sy nos lettres pouront auoir quelque effect.

“ Je suis ueritablement touché, my Lord, d'apprendre que uostre santé continue à estre tres mauuaise.” . . .

R. at Eyford, Dec. 6th.

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 27.—“ We having given your Grace an account of all the steps that the Bill for the preservation of the King's person has had, I won't repeat it, only tell you that I am very sorry for it. My Lord Drogheda has bestirred himself mightily against this Bill, and my Lord Drogheda had the Duke of Ormond's proxy, which he gave against the Bill. All the Bishops but three Archbishops were against the Bill. The House of Commons, I believe, will be much dissatisfied with what the Lords has [have] done, but [I] hope there will happen no difference between them.

“ I am very sorry to hear by Mr. Vernon that you don't find the town agree so well with you as the country did.”

R. at Eyford, Dec. 6th.

JO. METHUEN to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Nov. 27, Dublin.—“ The condition I hear your Grace is in by the return of your spitting blood makes me hope this will not find you in town. . . .

“ We find we were not mistaken when we thought a party would attempt to disturb the happy conclusion of this Session, but having been so very successful to persuade all the country gentlemen to come up, and to have a fuller house than at any time before, we have been able to prevent anything in the House of Commons ; on the contrary, when they were early in a morning in a little heat for some Bills not coming from England, and put off the Poll Bill to this day, my Lords Justices sent a message to desire them to hasten such Bills as were before them, in order to put an end to this meeting of Parliament. The Commons received the message very kindly, read all the Bills before them, and especially the Poll Bill, every day since, so as to send it up this day to the Lords, where it could not be read by reason of the great debate about the Bill for the preserving the King's person and Government, that Bill coming over to us in a different manner than it went from hence, principally in giving a power to all the justices at the sessions to tender both the oaths to any person, and making the refusal to incur the penalty of premunire, although it left the power altogether in the Government whether that penalty should be prosecuted, and a power in the King to pardon and totally discharge all the penalties under his signet or seal manual.

“Presently all the Papists took the alarm; all the ladies of that religion solicited personally every member of the two Houses. The High Church party, being likewise offended at the clause in the Bill in favour of the Quakers, did their utmost, and made some opposition to the Bill in the House of Commons; but being passed there, of sixty odd members that opposed it in the House of Commons the greatest part came over, and were now very much for the Bill.

“But the Lords began immediately to form their party, and notwithstanding the Bill was in other respects the best Bill that they could desire, the[y] singled out the two clauses, one against the Papists, the other in favour of the Quakers, and in a Committee of the whole House were strong enough to carry the Question, that those two clauses should not stand part of the Bill. Upon the report, they were very willing to mend the Bill by leaving out the clauses, pretending thereby to shew that they approved the other parts of the Bill. But besides that such a course would have hazarded a breach of Poyning’s Law, it would most certainly have produced great heats between the two Houses; therefore I had myself credit enough to get leave to speak to that matter, and to prevail with all the House, instead of going on with that debate, to read the Bill the third time, believing likewise that many would vote for amending who would not vote for rejecting the whole Bill. But notwithstanding, all the party being fixed and resolved, while a great man now returned to England was here in town, and his proxy left for that purpose with a person very proper to head that party, and my Lords the Bishops being persuaded that this Bill was sent contrary to the King’s mind by the Ministers of England, who were not like to continue in the King’s confidence and favour, they united with the Irish new converted Lords, pardoned and restored by the King’s mercy, procured my Lord Ross, who would never take the Oaths, but was an open Jacobite, to come that morning and take the Oaths, to be assistant to my Lords the Bishops in this debate, and the Bill was rejected by eighteen against fourteen. I send Mr. Vernon a list of the names, by which your Grace will see the difference of the persons to be much more considerable than of the numbers.

“We hope to make haste with the Poll Bill, if the Lords will give us leave, and use our utmost power to prevent heats from the Commons against [it], which is the remaining difficulty, and is a great one.”

R. at Eyford, De. 6th.

SIR J. WILLIAMSON to SHREWSBURY.

[16]97, [Nov. 30-]Dec. 10, Hague.—“I have received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 23rd past, enclosing the case of Major General Erle’s hostage detained in Dunkerke, and another of the Capt. Densiter (?), and have already been at Delfe to recommend the matter to the French Ambassadors, who not being then at home, I have put it into their Secretary's hands, to be laid before them when they write their letters by this post, with my desire that they will please to add an article this day in their dispatch to Court, that effectual orders may be given that the hostage, whose case is judged and cleared, be not longer detained on a pretence that does not at all concern the Major General; of which I doubt not but a good account will be given.

"I am sorry to find your Grace's indisposition of health such as to oblige you to leave the town, by which (besides many other much more weighty inconveniences to the public) I shall lose the advantage of paying your Grace the humble respects I owe you, in the way of my station in the King's service, in which I will however hope for the continuance of your Grace's good opinion and protection."

WINCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1697, Dec. 2.—"I have received yours of the 25th past. . . . According as your Lordship thought, everything is so disposed as to prorogue the Parliament tomorrow, which we intend to do, to Tuesday, the 10th of May. In our joint letter we have given your Grace the reason why we did not send the Butter Cask Bill, being very willing to obey your orders in putting an end to this Sessions; and though it is a Bill that will please, it will do as well in another Sessions, and the King will receive in the mean time no prejudice for the want of the word thousand in the additional Duty Bill, which is supplied by a clause in this Act, which we will keep until next Sessions.

"My Lord Gallway and I did write to your Grace of some things together, which will be absolutely necessary to be done, and shall write more particular.

"Here has [have] been strange reports spread here very industriously (by whom my Lord Chancellor, who goes for England soon, will acquaint you), that as to this Government, that would be soon changed, and that these Bills that were sent over, were Bills that had your Grace's and my Lord Chancellor's approbation, but that the King did not approve of them, and that now the peace was concluded, your Lordship and my Lord Chancellor would no longer continue in affairs, but people of other principles. . . .

"The House of Commons resented so much the throwing out that Bill for the preservation of the King's person, that they intended to impeach my Lord Kerry, but acquainted us first with it; so we prevailed with them not to do it, thinking it much better they should part without heat.

"We did not think of saying anything to the Parliament at parting with them, only to assert the point that Bills that are prepared by the Council do not cease by a prorogation, which was a doctrine broached by my Lord Chancellor Porter to serve his own turn then ; and not having time to send to England, and to have an answer, I hope what we say won't be disliked in England. As soon as we have prorogued the Parliament, and that we receive any intimation of the things my Lord Gallway and I mentioned to your Grace, we shall then write more particularly to you, and shall be sure of writing and entrusting everything with my Lord Chancellor."

MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Dec. 10-20, Venice.—“The last I gave your Grace the trouble [of] was Nov. 30th, from Ausbourg, having had no opportunity till now I came to Venice, which was on the 14th inst. I have found some difficulty in getting such a house as would be honourable and convenient, having to treat with nobles, and though I came up to their price, which is very extravagant, yet they are long in coming to a resolution, so that I fear it will be ten days before I can go to it. In the meantime I am at the Consul[’s], who is very serviceable to me, and hath at last delivered his commission in the form he hath long contested for. I suppose they was [were] willing to make that step before my arrival.

“I have discoursed the merchants here in relation to the trade, and am informing myself concerning the usage of our seamen, and shall take particular care to follow my instructions. As soon as I am got to my house, I intend to notify my arrival to the Republic, and shall not delay demanding audience as soon as possible I can be ready; I cannot as yet judge when, by reason [of] the holidays coming, and here hath been a particular Jubilee granted to this town, which hath retarded my affairs.

“The French Consul brought me a compliment from the French Ambassador, which I also returned, but think it not proper to proceed any further till I am settled, and have given notice to the Republic, and then shall act as it is usual upon these occasions, unless your Grace shall think fit to send me other directions. I understand the Spanish Ambassador hath enquired whether I am come, but my being incognito at present, he hath not as yet taken any notice. I have received the news of his Majesty being safe landed, and [his] entry through the City. Here is nothing worth giving your Grace an account of, nor do I believe much passes here of consequence. I mentioned in my last from this place, that as soon as I was at my own house, I would notify my arrival to the Republic, which now is in such a readiness that I hope in a few days to do it, so that till then I cannot judge how they will receive me, though it is generally said they will do all they can to return the civilities their Ambassadors received in England, which they both [Lorenzo Soranzo and Girolamo Venier] have very much owned. Soranzo is still under banishment by reason he would not go to Vienna, and hath nothing to do at present in the Government, yet they will permit him once to wait on me.

“The nobles of my acquaintance avoid me, and their law is so rigorous that they will hardly converse with any that comes to me. I wish I may find them ready in agreeing to such things I shall desire in relation to our trade, which our merchants are of opinion will be also for their good as well as their own.

“The Senate have lately made a severe decree, under pain of fine and banishment, in case any of the nobles shall solicit one another for votes in the choice of any employment whatsoever, it being come to that degree that several of no sort of merit was [were] preferred by that means, which in time might prove fatal to their government. ## MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

[1697, Dec. 31.] 1697-8, Jan. 10, Venice.—“I cannot yet acquaint your Grace that I have made much progress with the College about the manner of my reception, though it will not now be long. I find they profess to do all the honours that is [are] possible, or ever hath [have] been done to any King, but the way they transact here is slow, it being first to be moved to the Doge and College, and afterwards, before they can give any answer, it must be debated in the Pregadi, how trivial soever the matter is. I understand underhand, that though they intend to offer to treat me three days, where I desire, yet they would be glad I would refuse it, as Lord Faulconbridge did, when he was here. The reason is partly the expense, and also not knowing well the method, it having been so long since any Ambassador Extraordinary was here, few or none being sent from other parts but England but to reside, and in that case they have not that character. I think to follow the precedent of Lord Faulconbridge and save my right, so that it will not be any prejudice to the character the King hath honoured me with, and make it as an obligation I do them, which will be also much easier to me; which I would not consider, if it was a point essential.

“I am informed that they design to name one for Resident in England, which, when I have my audience, I shall know the certainty of. If so, I cannot tell if his Majesty will not have one also here, at least for a little time; it may be serviceable and convenient for our commerce. I take the liberty to mention to your Grace that Mr. Stanian, now Secretary of the Embassy, who will be accustomed to their methods and ways, might be proper and useful. I submit this as in all other things to what your Grace shall think best.”

ABRAHAM STANYAN to SHREWSBURY.

1697, Dec. 31, o.s., Venice.—“In my last I acquainted your Grace with my Lord Ambassador’s having privately notified his arrival here to the College, but being since informed that they don’t think it civil to take any notice of him till he pleases to be public, he intends to inform them of it publicly tomorrow, and at the same time desire they would send a Secretary (as is usual) to him, to settle the manner of his reception, lest any mark of respect which has been formerly shown to the King of England's or any other King's ambassadors extraordinary should be omitted, for want of being regulated beforehand, which this State is apt enough to take any advantage of doing. My Lord is still preparing for his public entry, which he hopes to be ready for in fifteen days more, and when he is, he is resolved to lose no time in doing it.

“ We are told that this Republic designs very shortly to name a Resident for England, which if they do, it's presumed his Majesty will think fit to send one here, at least for some time, there having been none (as your Grace knows) since his accession to the Crown. Therefore, when they have named one, I shall presume to beg the honour of your Grace's protection and favour in recommending me to the King for that employment as soon as it is proper to stir in it, which I humbly suppose cannot be till this State has first named one, whereof I shall not fail to give your Grace due notice; however, I thought it would not be amiss to mention it now, that your Grace might have time to consider of it. There are reasons to incline his Majesty to do it, which I shall urge when they are fit to be used to him. My Lord Manchester has likewise promised me to hint it to your Grace this post, intending to join with me in my request when matters are ripe, so that I am in hopes by your Grace's countenance and assistance it may succeed. In the meantime I humbly beg pardon for presuming to trouble your Grace with my concerns.”

SIR LAMBERT BLACKWELL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697-8, Jan. [1-]11, Genoa. —The Doge and Senators have ordered four of their chief nobles to wait on him, named Grimaldi, Brinoli, Salurro, and Mari. “The French and Spanish Residents do live very great at this Court, which occasions an expense of equipage far beyond my expectations.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697-8, Jan. 2, s.v., Bruxelles.—“I do not think I can begin the new year well, but by wishing and praying that it may be happy and prosperous to your Grace; full of health and quiet, or full of honour and business. I would beg leave only to send your Grace sometimes a kind of a gazette, to show what we are doing here.

“The French have been a little slow in the execution of the Treaty, and the evacuation of the places, but I believe they will surrender all now, as fast as the season will permit. We are already in possession of Courtray, Aath, Charleroy, and Mons, and we are positively assured that we shall be let into Luxembourg the 14-24 of this month. The King and the Elector were agreed, at Loo, to put 25 Holland battalions into those places; but just as they were to go in, some of our ministers made the Elector jealous, and persuaded him to send to Madrid, where it was consulted whether it was fit to let so many foreign and heretic troops into the Spanish places. It was answered immediately, by good luck, that they should be let in by all means, and that the Elector should thank our King and the States for the care they take for the preservation of these places, by putting garrisons into 'em at their own expense. At the same time the Council at Madrid would not accept of 6,000 men, which our Elector offered of his troops; and to give his Highness more occasion of distrust, they ordered three regiments of the Elector Palatine's troops to be put into Luxembourg. We shall never want incidents now to make the Court of Spain (at least the Queen) jealous that our Elector would maintain his possession here, and to make the Elector believe that the Council of Madrid would gladly remove him hence, now the Peace is made.

"We are told from Madrid that the King, or the Queen at least, are taking new measures to govern with more vigour. The King seems to have declared himself in favour of the Amirante, and is resolved to have a guard of 2,000 horse and 5,000 men, to be lodged round Madrid.

"The Elector of Cologne is here, with his brother, not being able to bear the affront which was put upon him at Liege, by disbanding all his troops, with so much haste and ill humour.

"We do not hear that the French have made any great reform yet, though they have withdrawn a great many of their troops from Lorrain and the other frontiers which they have restored, into their own countries.

"I wish the eagerness with which almost all our Army were condemned at Westminster, may not give our enemies occasion to keep their troops more ready. I know not indeed, my Lord, what reasons may guide those counsels at London, but that sudden and unexpected vote did amaze and astonish all the friends of our King, and his Government, and sunk the actions as I may say of the nation near 50 per cent. The later votes have set us a little at ease.

"The Imperialists do still make some difficulties about the exchange of the ratifications of the peace; tho [they] would send the original ratification which was made at Ratisbonne to the Emperor, and a copy only of it to the French; but the French insist to have the very original, and the Imperialists are too stubborn or too silly to make two originals. They make more difficulty about entering into the guaranty of the peace, as if they ought to be courted into it for the sake of their neighbours, and had no need of it themselves.

"Your Grace will have heard of the sudden and violent turn which has happened in the Court of Brandebourg. The chief minister there was Mons. Dankleman, who had brothers or sons enough to fill a great many employments. They are all disgraced and displaced on a sudden, the chief of 'em under a close confinement ; and everything that is odious is charged upon him, even to have used charms and drogues [drugs] to create a disgust between the Elector and the Electress. I fear his real crimes are, that he was entirely in the interests of England and Holland ; and I fear some other Courts will imitate the politics of Berlin. I should not dare to write so long a letter to your Grace if you were not so far from London."

The French Ambassador hath acted very civilly, and hath now been to make me a private visit, which I intend in the same manner to return. He is that Mr. de la Haye who was formerly at Constantinople with his father, that was Ambassador, and afterwards he had the same character. He lives here very private, and is esteemed a man of good parts, though having married a Venetian of mean condition, and formerly his mistress, hath much lessened it. I believe his allowance from France must be very small, else he would not be suffered to make so little a figure as he doth. I have just now received a compliment from the Spanish [Ambassador], with a desire to wait on me. I believe he was willing to see the steps the French made, he having been here this thirteen years.

“I have met with some disappointments in relation to my gondoles, which I make new. I could make no other answer but that, having fixed the day with the College, I could not alter it unless they did let me understand from them it was their desire. He is one of them, and I suppose I shall be obliged to put it off. It is not to be imagined the little policies they have for the benefit of their town, having been delayed in all my preparations as much as was possible with several messages, how it would be more for my honour to defer it till Lent, only in hopes of keeping all the strangers here some time longer. They have been under some fear lest I should not refuse their offer of being lodged and treated as formerly usual, and would have had me declared [declare] my intentions before, as Lord Faulconbridge did, but I thought it time enough after they had made the offer to let them know my mind. Accordingly they did proceed, and I have dispensed with it with this reason, that the Republic having been long engaged in a war, I was unwilling to put them to such an expense, which hath not a little obliged them.

“ The Spanish Ambassador, who is the Duke de Moles, a Neapolitan, hath been to make me a visit, which I have also returned. He is not in the least of the humour of a Spaniard, and hath done all the obliging things that was [were] possible. I understand this Republic did not well know how to act in relation to the King of Poland, but I believe the difficulty will be soon over, by reason the Pope hath now owned him, and a Nuntio is named to that purpose to go to Poland. General Steinaw is come from the Morea, and is disgusted, so hath asked leave to quit their service; it is uncertain whether it will be granted, by reason the Venetians will find it difficult to have another of such experience by the next campaign.

[P.S.] “ I have now received their answer, and they have considered better of it, and the day stands fixed for Tuesday next.”

MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1698, Jan. [21-]31, Venice.—“The weather hath continued so very bad, that I was obliged to put off making my entry, as last Tuesday, for whenever there are great winds, being to be received out of Venice at an Island, there is no going, but I hope nothing will prevent it next Monday. I shall soon see what the Republic will do in relation to our merchants.

“The news of the last post that the King was sending a squadron of seventeen men-of-war to the Mediterranean, will have very good effect all over Italy, as well as this place, and it is what will make his Majesty have justice done whenever it is demanded.

“I understand the Duke of St. Alban’s is gone to make a compliment on the marriage of the Duke of Burgundy. I cannot tell if his Majesty hath thoughts of doing the same to the Duke of Savoy. If so, at my return I might have that honour, with less expense than sending one from England, unless he is to reside there. I take the liberty only to mention this to your Grace, and shall submit myself wholly to whatever you shall think most proper and convenient.”

SIR LAMBERT BLACKWELL to SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, [Jan. 23-]Feb. 2, Genoa.—“The four cavaglieers appointed by the Senate, accompanied with above 200 of the nobility, came to receive me. We all walked to the palace, as is usual here in such cases, vast numbers of litters and chairs following. The streets from my house to the palace were lined with spectators; all the windows and balconies filled with ladies. Before the palace the soldiers were drawn up, and I was saluted by the officers, also the Swiss guards, who marched with their halbards. When I came to the Great Hall of audience, the Doge upon his throne under a canopy of state and 24 Senators all in their formalities rose up, uncovered, and met me about four paces, then returned to their seats, and an armchair within the throne opposite to the Duke was placed for me. We sat down and covered together. Their Secretary stood on my left hand, to whom (after a short compliment to the Throne) I delivered his Majesty’s credential letter; he carried it to the Doge, who read the direction, viewed the outside of it with demonstrations of great respect and returned it to the Secretary, who took his place on my left hand, standing and uncovered. Then I made my speech to them in Italian (having found that Sir John Finch and other envoys formerly did it in same language), to which the Duke (or Doge) answered in name of the Republic with such declarations of obedience to his Majesty and esteem for the King’s subjects as are impossible to be so well expressed in English. After that I returned some few compliments in reply to his florid expressions, and rose up, as did the Doge and Senators, being all uncovered; they accompanied me without the rails of the Throne to the middle of the Great Hall. There we parted, they walked back to the Throne, and I towards the door, where I turned about and received the Doge and Senators' last salutes. The nobility then accompanying me through several rooms downstairs, I stopped at the bottom (as is usual) whilst they all passed by, and severally made their compliments to me. Then the four cavaglieers deputed by the Republic (who stood behind me whilst the ceremonies were passing) and Master of the Ceremonies waited on me to my litter, which being followed by a number of others and chairs, I returned home (with acclamations from the mob). The gentlemen of the nation and French Protestants who accompanied me I invited to supper, and we were entertained with drums, trumpets, and all sorts of music till after midnight. I shall be now employed for four or five days in receiving visits from the nobility, and then I will put in a memorial to redress such grievances as his Majesty's subjects have suffered, copy whereof shall send your Grace."

MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1698, [Jan. 28-] Feb. 7, n.s., Venice.—“ [By] my last of Jan. 31st I acquainted your Grace that by reason of the ill weather my entry was put off till the 3rd, this style, which day I was received at St. Spirito by Mr. Venier, accompanied with fifty Senators. The next I was to have had my audience, but it rained so very fast, that it was deferred till the day after. I have sent your Grace the compliment I made them, and also their answer, which I was at the College this day to receive. At my first audience the Doge answered me in general terms, as from himself, with great respect and honour for the King, and I believe they are very desirous of his Majesty's friendship.

“ I shall soon now lay before them those matters relating to our trade, and what I have further in my instructions, and in a month shall think of leaving this place. The manner of my reception Mr. Stanyan will trouble your Grace with, and I have been careful to insist on all points of ceremonies as ever had been done to any Ambassador, which they was [were] ready to agree to. I should think myself very happy if I should have your Grace's approbation of my proceedings in this place, having ever been desirous of your good opinion.”

R. 14 Feb.

SIR LAMBERT BLACKWELL to SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, [Jan. 30-] Feb. 9, Genoa.—“ I presumed last post to give your Grace the particulars of my public audience, and then mentioned my design of entering upon business (many being the laments which this Factory have laid before me). The Senate having appointed their Secretary to wait on me, we had two hours' conference, which he desired might be drawn up into a memorial. I have therefore put together the most material points, and shall present them tomorrow, copy whereof do inclose for your Grace's perusal, and after the Senate's reply shall be able to guess how far they are inclined to do his Majesty's subjects justice, and accordingly beg your Lordship's commands how far I ought to proceed.

"French letters from Tripoly say those Corsaires were arming all their privateers to the number of twenty, and seven of them from 24 to 50 guns, which makes Consul Loddington apprehensive of a breach with us. This French Envoy hath not yet been to visit me, but all other public ministers, also the grandees of Spain, and a great number of this nobility have performed that respect, but being omitted by the French envoy gives room for these people to discourse and wonder why all the places in Flanders are not yet surrendered."

R. 27th.

JO. METHUEN TO SHREWSBURY.

1698, Feb. 3, Dublin.—"I have been unwilling to disturb you with the particulars of our affairs during our struggle, but our Session being over, I hope you will pardon my giving you a short account of our success.

"The last Session our endeavour was to put an end to all party and faction, hoping to have everybody united for the King's service, and that was indeed in great measure then done; but before this Session there was a party formed against the King's affairs or any other settlement by Parliament, very considerable for the number, but more from the heads and the gentlemen engaged in it upon that account. This party was carried on with great industry, and did not only oppose in the matters of the Army and the Bill for preservation of the King's person (as I hear hath been pretended), but in all points, as whether a Supply, the quantum of that Supply, the manner of raising it, endeavouring to lay it on the grants, then on the quit-rents, &c., by setting on foot a Habeas corpus Bill, votes against quartering the Army in private houses, and at last a vote to increase the pay of the Army, and everything that might break the Session. In this condition there was no remedy but to unite those who were well affected to the King's service, and would zealously carry it on, by all the assurances of the King's good intentions to the country, and of his approbation of their service. This I mention so particularly, to shew your Grace how necessary it is his Majesty should distinguish between those who served with zeal in so nice an occasion, and those who opposed his service earnestly to the last hour.

"We have, however, been able to hinder the greatest attempts of the party, and to conclude our Session by passing many good laws for the country, as well as three Bills very advantageous to the Crown, not only for the Supply, but by the first settling a land tax of £120,000, by four six months' payments in two years, by fixing a sum certain on every county, and on every barony or hundred in each county. We have made a land tax, certain, equal, easy to be raised in the country, and easy for the form to pass in Parliament; so that this tax being capable of being doubled, and made payable by quarterly payments (the whole two years now being not above eighteen pence in the pound), the the Crown will on all great occasions be readily and certainly supplied by this method. I am sure there is no need to mention to your Grace how long such a method hath been endeavoured in England without the wished success.

“By the Bill for the additional Duties we shall make such accommodation for the Army as to render them very easy to the country.

“Your Grace was advised how many difficulties attended the Bill for laying the duty on the woollen manufacture; but the House not proceeding effectually in their own method, I was so bold to adventure and so fortunate to find an expedient to get the Bill we framed received in the House and passed, and brought up by the Speaker, and presented to the throne for the Royal Assent, by which means the Sole Right is much more removed from all controversy than by my Lord Capell’s expedient, which was a Bill to continue a duty of Excise granted the Session before for one year longer, and was in the very numerical words agreed by themselves, all but the day of commencement of the duty.

“It is too long to lay before you now the state of the Revenue, but it is such that, with the money now given, the King will bear the whole charge of the Government, and subsist his Army very well (if it doth not exceed 12,000 men) for three years, without being in debt above one hundred thousand pounds at the end of the three years, which a Parliament will most readily supply, the rather because it will be a debt then due, and not money advanced, as it now was. This consideration is of great moment in regard of what follows.

“Although we have avoided a breach this Session, yet by the debates and attempts in both Houses, by the knowledge of persons and designs I have gotten in this troublesome management, it is plain that people are in such temper here that there is much more to be feared than hoped. The Commons are possessed with a desire of imitating an English Parliament, and not only treat of England as upon an equal foot, but treat the Crown in the same manner, as appears by their pretences to the Sole Right, Habeas Corpus Bill, votes against the Army, and above all by their uneasiness under Poyning’s Law; and although the several parties differ amongst themselves, yet they agree in desiring to be independent of England, and believing themselves so in right.

“The House of Lords carry all these points higher than the Commons, and beside pretend to an entire judicature and an intolerable use of their privilege. They, under that colour, put the Bishop of Derry in possession of the lands in question, and had done the same for my Lady Roscommon, if we had not gotten the privilege of some of the Commons opposed, and engaged the two Houses in conferences that could never have an end. The Lords were hardly persuaded to forbear taking notice of what was done by the Lords in England, and passing extraordinary votes to assert their own jurisdiction, and have made at last an Address to have some old Acts of Parliament printed, which they conceive favour their independence, and is chiefly aimed at a pretended Act of Parliament made in the latter end of H. 6th, when the Duke of York was here and about to dethrone the King.

“Of the several parties the most formidable are the Scots in the North, and the English joined in interest with them; they are very numerous, strongly united, and opposed everything in the Parliament that the King desired, or was for the settlement of Ireland and hindering a breach with England; and indeed they seem to have views not proper to mention in a letter. In this condition it seems hardly possible to manage a Parliament where the King should be in any necessity of them, most of the King’s servants being really of the adverse party; Mr. Savage alone having done more prejudice to the King’s service than any ten men of the contrary party, being trusted by the Government, and then either betraying everything by giving it up or by opposing it.

“I believe this condition of affairs will necessitate my going to England after our business is over here, but I do not yet know whether the King will order me. There is yet a more nice matter between my Lord Marquis and my Lord Gallway, more unfit to write, and which if continued will quickly ruin this Government. My Lord Marquis is gotten in other hands, and all this Session hath preserved an entire open friendship with Mr. Savage and some that have opposed our affairs, and thereby given courage to the party and much discouraged our friends. The consequence of this makes some different proceedings between the conduct of my Lords Justices, which, it may be, will wear away, and my Lord Marquis come to himself, but, if not, will be fatal to him here. This, with many other considerations, make[s] me think the King will think of some change, and if your Grace will please to remember what I had the honour to speak to you of, you may be assured it may be with the entire satisfaction of my Lord Gallway, and, as I believe, to the great advantage of England and this kingdom.”

Ansd. March first, 1697.

MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1698, Feb. 4-14, Venice.—“I have been taken up this last week in the usual visits of ceremony of the Spanish and French Ambassadors. The Recivitor of Malta, who is in the nature of Envoy here, hath not been with me. I understand the Grand Maitre has directed him to act in this case as the Pope’s Nuntio, who never can visit any public minister from England, as your Grace knows; besides, he says the King has never notified his accession to the Crown to them. The true reason I rather believe is their zeal for their religion at St. German’s. I intend on Monday next to go to the College, where, as soon as I have their answer, I shall not fail to acquaint your Grace.

“The last post from Flanders brought no letters from England, which I believe was occasioned by contrary winds. The news we have from Messina is that the 7th Dec. my Lord Pagett received orders from the Grand Vizier to repair to Adrianople. The cause of this invitation is supposed to arise from the Grand Sig[nor’s] inclination to a peace, the country being reduced to great poverty. I am in hopes of receiving, before I leave this place, some directions from your Grace, which I shall punctually observe.”

R. 24th.

SIR L. BLACKWELL to SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, Feb. [5-]15, Genoa.—Has delivered his memorial to the Senate. They seem inclined to comply. 150 ladies waited on his wife, and double that number of gentlemen on him. The French Envoy came last. Would gladly get forward to Florence, but must wait till the Great Duke returns thither; he is now at Pisa.

R. 1 March.

ABRAHAM STANYAN to SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, Feb. 11, o.s., Venice.—“Last post I gave your Grace an account of my Lord Ambassador’s public entry and first audience here, and now I am to acquaint you of a second which his Lordship had on Tuesday, the 8th inst., wherein by a long memorial, which he left with the Doge, he represented to him the remaining points of his instructions, to which they returned an answer last night in general terms only to every head, as your Grace will perceive by their answer, of which my Lord Ambassador will send you a copy, as well as of his memorial. However, they give his Excellency reason to hope for a more particular one, as soon as the matters can be enquired into; if they should not, he intends to go to the College in [a] few days to put them in mind of it again. They profess themselves to be full of zeal and esteem for his Majesty, but we shall be able to judge better of their sincerity when we have their further answer. However, their treasures are so much exhausted by this long war they are engaged in, that I may venture to prophesy they will hardly be brought to make such reparations as we demand; if they are, it is wholly to be attributed to the news of an English squadron’s coming into the Mediterranean, of which they are mighty solicitous to know the occasion.

“My Lord Ambassador designs in a few days to visit the Dogeresse in ceremony, after the example of the French and Spanish Ambassadors. It was neither necessary nor usual till they made it so, but since they have begun it, my Lord cannot omit it without affronting the Doge.

“Yesterday my Lord received two letters from the Prince and Princess of Denmark to the Doge, which ought to have been delivered at the first audience, with the credentials, but their Royal Highnesses, it seems, did not think of it till very lately. However, my Lord Ambassador will take an opportunity of presenting them, though he is sufficiently puzzled for an excuse.

“My Lord begins now to look homewards, and will certainly leave this place in a month’s time, unless he receive orders to the contrary from your Grace. The Republic has not yet named a resident for England, though it’s commonly said Sig<sup>te</sup> Vignoli will be the man, he having been formerly there in the same quality. When they have named one, I will presume to request your Grace’s favour in procuring the same employment for me here, as I took the liberty of hinting to you in one of my former letters.”

R. 1 March.

MANCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, Feb. 11-21, Venice.—“I understand by the honour of yours of January 15 that your Grace has received several of mine, the last being the 3rd, n.s. I have now laid before the College all matters contained in my instructions, except the case of Mr. Rider, which I should not have omitted had it not been more for his service, it being of a long standing, and the methods they have proceeded in not very justifiable nor regular, besides so many in the like condition, the Republic could not possibly [possibly] have granted it without doing the same to others; but a more private way is proposed, which he is more likely to succeed in, which Mr. Stanian hath acquainted him with. I send your Grace a copy of what I said, and also of the memorials that I delivered at the same time, since which I have received no answer, though I am in hopes of having one more particular, this being, as your Grace will see, very general.

“I shall have occasion in few days of going to present the letters from the Prince and Princess of Denmark, which by some mistake was not given me when I took my leave, and are but now come to my hands, and shall then take notice in such a manner that they may see I do still expect some further resolutions, though I fear nothing is to be done here but by time; and as it would be a great advantage to our trade these things were granted, and also to this State if they would consider their own interest, so I cannot but think a Resident, which I took the liberty to mention to your Grace in my former letters, might be very convenient, there being already a discourse that the Republic doth intend one for England. I must desire your Grace will let Mr. Secretary Vernon acquaint the King with my proceedings, since I find your health will not yet permit you to come to town. I shall soon see what I shall be able to do, and then shall take my leave and return by France to England.”

Copy. R. 1 March.

SIR L. BLACKWELL TO SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, Feb. [12-]22, Genoa.—“I have yet received no answer from the Senate to my memorial. . . . Their Secretary was with me to desire I would countenance a request they design making his Majesty, viz., that this Republic may be included in the general peace; from whence I argue they know themselves guilty; and, indeed, their supplying France with corn during the late war (with many other particulars in favour of the French) they are jealous to be called to an account for, though some of them, as Mr. Consul Kirke informs me, have had confidence to say that England is too far off, and that any excuse in answer to our demands have (sic) been formerly accepted. . . . My aim is only at the King's honour and nation's advantage, who have been long imposed upon by the Italian policy; for, by what I find, this Factory have not had any one act of justice done them by this Government for many years, whereas whatever the French demand, though contrary to the constitution of their laws, they have immediately granted."

Endorsed: 12-22 Feb. . . . R. 6 March.

THE EARL OF MANCHESTER'S SPEECH TO THE SENATE OF VENICE.

[1697-8, Feb.]—"Copy of my Speech to the Colledge.

"Most Serene Prince,—The great honour and respect their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Denmark have for this most Serene Republic, and their desires of corresponding particularly to the civilities they received from it, bring me this day to the Colledge, to present to your Serenity these letters from their Royal Highnesses, which though by some mistake are but lately come to my hands, yet your Serenity may be assured they did never intend to omit the first opportunity of declaring their good will and affection to this Serene Republic.

"I take also this occasion to acquaint your Serenity, that the answer which was sent me by one of your Secretaries to the memorial I lately delivered to you confirms me more in the opinion that this Serene Republic is desirous of continuing a good correspondence with the King my master, since I perceive by it that the matters contained therein are referred to the consideration of the proper magistrates, to whom, I doubt not, they will appear so reasonable, that I persuade myself I shall have such satisfaction in every particular before I take my leave that nothing will be able to disunite or alienate the King my master from the interest of this most Serene Republic."

MANCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, Feb. 18-28, Venice.—"In my last [of] Feb. 21, n.s., I acquainted your Grace that I had received letters from the Prince and Princess of Denmark to the Republic, since when I have presented them, making the best excuse I could, especially being to imagine what they contained, no copy of them being sent to me. I was also under some difficulty how to behave myself, by reason I had no directions from your office. I send your Grace a copy of what I said on this occasion, where you will find I took notice of their answer to my memorial, lest they might have believed that general words would be sufficient, which is often their custom when they are unwilling to grant what is desired. I am since satisfied they do intend me one more particular. I have asked nothing but what will be to the advantage of this State, as well as our trade, though it may not be the interest of a few private persons and inferior courts. These things have been endeavoured above this twenty years without success, and if I have that good fortune it is wholly on the account that they are very desirous of his Majesty's friendship.

"I hope by the next post I shall be able to let your Grace know the time I intend to take my leave, being willing to see some issue of these matters, if I can. I have thoughts of returning by Turin, which is much the nearest, yet shall only pass through it, unless I receive some directions from your Grace; otherwise I do not know well how to avoid waiting on the Duke, and that may not be proper. I hope at my return to find your Grace perfectly recovered."

R. 6 March.

MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, [Feb. 25-] March 7, n.s., Venice.—"I send your Grace the answer I received from the Senate to the letters of the Prince and Princess, where also they give me hopes as if they would grant what I have desired of them. In case I hear not soon from them, I shall once more press them, and then shall take my leave, which I believe will be about ten days. I have received a letter from Mr. Secretary Vernon, where I find the King would not have me make any long stay here, which I shall obey, being very willing to leave this place, though the weather has been so extreme bad, with much snow, that I fear I shall find it ill passing the Alps to Lyons."

R. 20th.

SIR L. BLACKWELL to SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, [Feb. 26-] March 8, Genoa.—Has had no answer from the Republic. They hope to tire his patience, "as they formerly did Mr. Bernard Greenville and Sir Thomas Deerham." Represented to the Secretary that the request of Mons. St. Olon, when Envoy here from the French Court, for the release of slaves, was granted immediately; and referred to a letter from the Senate to the King, full of doubtful arguments against Mr. Consul Kirke's pretensions. It is plain that the Bank of St. George had the advantage of the sum pretended by the Consul.

R. 28th.

THE VIZIER of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE to KING WILLIAM III.

[1698, Feb.,] Adrianople.—Has received the King's letters by his Ambassador, Lord Paget, announcing that his mediation had been accepted by Cæsar (the Emperor) and his allies. The States General, by their Resident, the Lord de Collier, have assented to the mediation. The Emperor does not however show himself disposed to conclude peace. The writer's exalted master, on the other hand, is willing to do so, and proposals to be submitted to the Emperor have been delivered to the King's Ambassador.

Translation. R. 6 March, 1697-8.

MANCHESTER TO SHREWSBURY.

1698, March 4-14, Venice.—“According to what I mentioned to your Grace in my last I have acquainted the College that I should be obliged to take my leave the next week, and that I was desirous I might have their answer to those matters I had proposed to them; [to] which they returned that they should always be ready to give me audience, and that also they would do their endeavour to satisfy me in those particulars, so that in very few days I expect to hear from them.

“I understand that the Venetian Ambassador at Paris has given the Republic this account, that my Lord Portland in his two audience[s] with the French King did propose the removal of the late King [James II.] and the disbanding the Irish in his service, and had pressed him in it, but that the French King had denied it, and would not agree to any such proposal.

“The preparations of the French makes [make] great discourse here and all over Italy, and as it occasions conjectures of several sorts, so by some it is believed the design is against Geneva, and that he intends to assist the Duke of Savoy in the taking of it, which may be probable by reason it is a place the French have long had thoughts of, besides the great zeal he shows in extirpating the Protestants.

“My Lord Pagett having had several audiences of the Grand Vizier at Adri[a]nople, the account we have here, that it is in relation to a peace, which the Republic would be glad of, makes them more willing to show any favour to the English, as I have perceived in several matters relating to our merchants, since they are in hopes of having it by the means of the King. I presume to trouble your Grace with what passes here, though I am sensible what I can write will be of little use, and very imperfect.

[P.S.] “We want three posts from England.”

R. 26th.

SIR L. BLACKWELL TO SHREWSBURY.

1697-8, March [5-]15, Genoa.—“The Senate . . . summoned the Consiglio Grande, and after several meetings they resolved to comply only with that particular in my memorial about releasing slaves, having freed two of his Majesty's subjects from their galleys, where one of them had served two, and the other three years, not for any crime committed, but, being heretics, and owing five pounds sterling 'twixt them both, were condemned to the galleys without any limit, and might have remained during their lives had not this favourable opportunity offered for their release-ment. I have put them passengers on board an English ship bound for London.

“The Consiglio Grande ordered their Secretary to be with me to excuse non-compliance with the other articles in my memorial, and he brought many trifling arguments, which I prayed him to put in writing, as he hath promised me this day, so per next post your Grace shall not only have a copy of them, but of my answer likewise. And then I will depart for Florence, presuming your Grace will send me his Majesty’s further commands about these affairs, it being morally impossible to have any justice done here but what is forced from them; and the reason is plain, for all the government being trading men, and linked together by marriages, there is not any dispute but some of the Council are the parties concerned, who by their relations and friends make such opposition as either to tire the patience of strangers or condemn them, though never so contrary to reason; [so] that when they comply not with the French or Spaniard, the first threaten bombing, and the latter seizing the Genouese effects, which occasions the redress of their grievances. An instance of this very lately happened, when they gave a sentence in favour of the Milanese for about 20,000 [ducats], which had been depending some years before, and could not by fair means be brought to any conclusion. These people are now very apprehensive that the Duke of Savoy will make a new demand of Savona, and some say the arming of Tollon is for that purpose.”

R. 28th March.

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1697-8, March 9-19, Bruxelles.—“I have not done myself the honour to write to your Grace a good while, being ashamed of my idle and useless ministry here, which does not give me so much as an occasion to be troublesome to you. However, I will now, as in duty bound, give your Grace an account of what we are and what we are not doing here.

“So soon as ever the Peace was signed, we thought of nothing but enjoying the ease and quiet and security of it. We dismounted the few Spanish troops which were left, and now all our cavalry begs a-foot. With the help of the Holland battalions and of the Elector’s troops, we put garrisons into the frontier towns which the French have restored; but there is neither artillery, nor ammunition, nor any provisions put as yet into any of those places. The States of Holland sent Mr. Dyckvelt hither to press the Elector and these ministers to provide for the security of these towns, and he has been labouring and chiding a month or two, but is never the better. If the Hollanders will furnish the frontiers, they may; the Spaniards never will. I am persuaded the French did consent the more easily to surrender these places, knowing they might take ’em again whenever they please.

“I cannot but observe how our neighbours of the paÿs de Liege behaved themselves. So soon as ever the peace was proclaimed the States met and resolved to reform their troops. The Prince, I mean the Elector of Cologne, said it was impossible to secure the country without some forces, &c. They said they would keep none, and broke them all immediately to a 1,000 men, which were in the garrisons, even without paying the officers their arrears. Even the wise States of Holland, out of an old principle of frugality, made a very great reform, before the French had evacuated Luxembourg, and Mons, and Dinant. They have kept but one regiment of drago[o]ns on horseback, and not above 3,000 horse in all. The spirit of reforming went so far that all the great towns of Brabant and Flanders have actually pulled up and sold all their palisades, their barriers, &c.

“The French are now making their reform, which they have, methinks, promoted or retarded according as the news came of the King of Spain’s health, which is, I believe, at present the great spring which moves all the French designs. I believe that was the occasion of the sea preparations which the French began lately, and which they do continue yet. One could not well believe otherwise, so long as the greatest preparations were made at Marseilles and Tholon, but at present I am assured that all hands are at work at Dunkerque to fit out there as many ships as they can ; there are also a great many troops on that frontier, as if they had some design to make use of ’em.

“What is certain is, that the French King has this day more men and more ships ready, and more money in his exchequer, than all the Princes who were lately allied against him. That alliance is disbanded, and no new one made ; nor no measures taken yet for a good guarantee of the peace. The States of Holland have indeed made a new treaty with Suede, into which both parties desire the King of England may enter. The Imperialists also are now beginning to hearken to some proposals of entering into a general guarantee.

“In the mean time the French ministers are busy in all the Courts of Europe. They have sent the ablest man they have to Madrid, where the greatest game is to [be] played, and where the ill health of the King gives great expectations to all those who pretend to share in the succession. The Queen of Spain, who has [a] great share in the government, is very eager to get into a nearer friendship with England, and would fain help our King to a wife. She offered first one of the Emperor’s daughters, and afterwards some of her Lutheran cousins, but his Majesty would not be tempted.

“My Lord Portland has had great success at Paris as to the beauty and magnificence of his equipage and his train, and the splendour of his entry and public audience. His person also and his ways have been very taking, both with the King, the Court, and the town, so that he has received great honours and great distinctions. His Excellency was not so happy in his first negotiation there, which was an attempt to remove King James a little farther. I fear my Lord entered a little brusky on that matter, and had the mortification of a denial. I fear his Excellency will find wonderful caresses, and obtain nothing which is material. If he does not find the same kind reception at his return to London, or if he finds another more caressed than himself, I fear he will not be able to bear the Court.

“Our Elector’s envoyé is at last gone hence for London, and will be sorry not to find your Grace there, who are so much the ornament of our Court that strangers miss you mightily. This envoyé is much in the confidence of his master, is a man of parts and cunning, but loves himself, his ease, and his pleasures above all things.

“The Prince of Vaudemont, who was General of our armies here, and next to the Elector in the Government here, who had a very great estate left him by his father, and has spent above four millions of this country money at Bruxelles, is now going to Milan, but cannot raise money enough to pay his debts here, and to defray the charges of his journey.

“Several of our English, who were driven out by the late Act of Parliament, are stragglng in all the towns of this country, and I believe they are already very weary of their travels. My Lord Ailesbury, Sir G. Maxwell, and Peter Cook are here, and Mr. Abell. If it were not for a coffee-house and my Lady Dona, who is left here by her husband, I believe they would hang themselves all four.

“I must now make an humble request to your Grace. I have been here above six years, and have not stirred from my post. I have sent the last English regiment and the last sick or stragglng soldier home, and I beg leave to come home myself; which favour I do now desire of your Grace, and of my Lord Ranelagh. I must hasten my journey, I fear, since the resolution of the Select Committee, the 25th past, to postpone all our foreign debts, will make it impossible for me to stay here any longer. I am I fear under an indispensable necessity of coming to London.”

MANCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

[16]98, March 11-21, Venice.—“It is to no end, I find, to expect any longer the answer of the Republic to the matters I have proposed to them, for were their promises sincere, they might have long before this come to some resolution, after the many instances I have made to them. This morning I sent to desire audience of congé for tomorrow, which they have agreed to, though I believe it was what they did not expect, though I had acquainted them fourteen days before that I should be obliged about this time to take my leave. In case they do intend to be more particular, they will have yet an opportunity in their answer to what I shall say, which must be first debated in the Senate. The next being Holy week, I could not have had audience, which made me resolve not to delay any longer. I cannot tell but they reserve these matters for their Resident, it being thought they will soon name one; the certainty of which cannot be yet known. I shall proceed in making my visits to the Ministers, and, as soon as my brother is a little able, having been dangerously ill of a high fever, leave this place. We want five posts from England, which makes me impatient to know if your Grace has any further commands.”

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1698, [March 24-] April 3, s.n., Bruxelles.—“I was very glad to hear that your Grace was at Windsor, and I hope your health will permit you to come to London, or that his Majesty will return to Windsor. The last letters from Madrid give a terrible account of the affairs there. The King is grown very weak, both in body and mind. The Queen has strengthened her party with the Conte d’Oropesa; but while she was at her devotions, her enemies got an order signed by the King to send away the new regiment of guards. She got the order soon altered, though not revoked, and the regiment had orders to halt at Toledo.

“The French seem by their preparations everywhere to expect the hour of the dissolution of that monarchy, and they are ready to seize on all the branches of it. They do actually besiege the monarchy, both by sea and by land, and all the rest of Europe seems to look on with wonderful indifference. We have more troops here upon our frontiers than we have had all the war, and the French had (sic) yet reformed very little. For my part, I expect to hear the news of the King of Spain’s death from the Mareschal de Boufflers at the head of an army coming to take possession. In the mean time the Parliament of England is busy about trifles, when it might be making preparations for securing Mexique and Peru.

“I did in my last letter humbly beg your Grace’s leave to come kiss your hands at London. I have a very great load of accounts upon me. I have little to do here now, and I would gladly give an account of what I have been doing six years.”

WINCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1698, March 25, Dublin Castle.—“I was in hopes to have heard that your Grace had returned with the King from Windsor, and am concerned that you had any return of spitting of blood, and hope you will hear (sic) no more of it, but am afraid that fox-hunting is a little too violent for you. Mr. Rooper has returned me Bonne, which I told your Grace on when I had the honour to wait on you at Grafton, but she is stifled, so quite spoiled for running, but I intend to breed on her, and if you please to command any of the whelps, I will be sure to take care and send them safe to you.

“Mr. Secretary Vernon has writ to us that my Lord Jersey expected his third part of the salary here, upon which we made all the inquiry we could, and by all the precedents we could find, when there was [were] but two on the place, the whole entertainment of a Lord Lieutenant went to them, and the third had no part of it until he came here to be sworn, all which precedents we have transmitted to Mr. Secretary Vernon. As for what is past, my Lord Gallway and I have expended the whole to this time, the time of the sitting of the Parliament being very expensive.

“If the King’s affairs requires [require] my Lord Jersey’s stay longer in England, his Majesty will have a great many ways of gratifying my Lord Jersey; and since we shall have all the business and expense on us, I am in hopes it will be so much to his Majesty’s satisfaction that he will, by your Grace’s mediation, let us enjoy the same that others has [have] done before us on like occasions.” . . .

MR. HILL to [SHREWSBURY].

1698, [June 26-] July 6, s.n., Bruxelles.—“It is purely out of respect and modesty that I do not trouble your Grace in your retreat, and because we do nothing here which deserves your attention.

“Our Elector is gone this day to visit Charleroy, Namur, and Luxembourg, having already been at Courtray, Aath, and Mons, soon after that they were restored by the French; but his Highness will not find one barrel of powder in any of those places which are lately surrendered. 'Tis certain the Spaniards are not able to put any provisions into any of their places, and therefore the States of Holland were willing to advance the funds necessary for that service; but though Mr. Dyckvelt has been here these eight months upon this business, he has not yet been able to finish his negotiation; so that if the King of Spain had died when we were afraid of it, or if he should die yet, there is neither powder, nor bullet, nor cannon, nor musket in any of our places. On the other side, the French are crowded on all the Spanish frontiers, as if they were going to take possession. They have reformed and broke the worst of their troops, but have filled up and recruited the rest.

“I went as far as Valenciennes to meet my Lord Portland, and accompanied him as far as Dunkerque. We found all their places and all their troops in wonderful order. I was witness to such honours and such distinctions showed to my Lord as never were done to any Ambassador, and it's certain that his Lordship was more caressed by the King of France and all the Court than was ever any minister of any Prince. We must not attribute all that to the stark love and kindness of the French King, but I believe a great deal of it is owing to the designs they have upon the succession of the Spanish monarchy, which does at present, I believe, employ all the French politics, and determine all that King's thoughts. We are persuaded here that the King of Spain has recovered a great deal of health at Toledo; but the French do certainly reckon that he cannot live long, and they act everywhere upon that principle. They are preparing a great camp at Compeigne (sic), to have an army ready upon occasion. In the mean time the Conte de Harcour gains ground, they say, at Madrid. The Spaniards are told that if they give themselves to a son of France, he will be able to sustain their choice, and hold the monarchy united, which no other pretender can do; and this is what all the Spaniards listen to.

“The Queen alone has supported the German interest at Madrid, but the French endeavour to gain her also; at the same time they endeavour to ruin her credit. Her Majesty has lost her best servant in the Admirante, whom the King ordered to remain behind him at Toledo, which was not more surprising and disagreeable to the Admirante than to the Queen herself; and this is the more remarkable, because it is the first time the King has done anything so contrary to the inclinations of the Queen.

“Now 'tis wonderful, my Lord, that in this critical situation, when France is so ready to seize on the whole Spanish monarchy, all the rest of the world is looking on, and expecting the fatal hour, without entering into any manner of counsels, or taking any measures for anything. The Imperialists, who are the most concerned, seem so very indifferent, or so very secure; and they are really so very impotent, that I could wish our King would play a sure game, and enter into such measures as may be reasonable with the French themselves, and set a son of France upon the Spanish throne, upon the best terms we can. 'Tis almost treason perhaps to say so, my Lord, but it is impossible to do better, I fear.

“The galleons are safely arrived at Cadiz, except one which perished by the way; and the Dutch East India Company have ten more ships arrived, which bring a great deal more money to Holland than the galleons bring to Spain. We have a great many silly people fled hither by virtue of the late Act, for having been in France; but I am really ashamed that the world should see what weak and senseless folks can give jealousy and disturbance to the Government in England.

“I did lately send two chests of wine to London for your Grace, which are of a white Burgundy called Vin de Mulseau, which were reckoned the best wines of the last year, and the most in fashion. I wish they may come safe, and I pray excuse the liberty which I took.”

“ We have had very great difficulties by the great opposition that has been made in the House of Commons, but the matter of the Supply seems now to be in a very good way, and [we] hope matters may now go pretty well.

“ And now the greatest apprehension we have at present is a complaint that the B[ishop] of Derry intends to bring into the House of Lords of his not being put into possession according to their order, and am apprehensive lest they may do something to assert their own right in opposition to the order that was made by the House of Lords in England, on the petition of the Society of the Governor and Assistants [of] London of the New Plantation in Ulster against the Bishop of Derry; to prevent which I have done and will continue to do all I can, but believe it hardly possible; and as I hear he will bring in his complaint tomorrow or Saturday.

To which I have only to add that the Directors with whom I discoursed seemed very much to slight those pretensions for the reasons contained in their answer, but however let fall that if a very small sum might extinguish all demands, they might be persuaded to give three or four hundred pounds st[erling] to purchase their quiet; which sum I told them was almost equal to nothing, and no ways like to satisfy the persons concerned. I wish I were so happy as to have been able to give your Grace a better account of this matter, wherein I have done my best endeavours.

THE HEIRS OF SIR WILLIAM COURTIN v. THE DUTCH EAST INDIA COMPANY.

[1698, Nov.]—“Answer and Information delivered by the Directors of the Dutch East India Company to Mons. Heinsius, Pensioner of Holland, upon certain Memorials given in by Mr. Blathwayt, his Majesty's Secretary, relating to the difference still depending between the heirs of Sir William Courtin and the Dutch East India Company, whereby the former desire to be indemnified from their great losses by a reasonable composition.

“It plainly appears that the present difference having had its rise in the year 1643, the pretensions have been since annulled by two solemn Treaties of Peace, and consequently there can be no room for any further pretention whatsoever. In the first of the said Treaties, concluded at Breda in 1667, Article the 3rd, it is expressly agreed that all offences, injuries, damages, and losses sustained by either party before or during that war, upon what account soever, should be forgotten and wholly set aside.

“In the 4th Article of the same Treaty, it is further stipulated that all ships with their tackle, goods, and merchandise that during the war, or any time before, have [had] been taken by either party or their subjects, should remain to the possessor, without any compensation or restitution, and that such possessor was, without molestation or exception of place and time, to remain in quiet possession of the same for ever.

“Further, by the 5th Article, it is also agreed, that all demands and pretensions of what nature soever, and particularly those excepted by the Treaty of 1662 (supposed to relate to no other than the matters now in dispute), which might be made for any effects or goods taken during the war or before inclusive from the Treaty of 1662, should be annulled and be of no force, and never brought in question again.

“Likewise, in the 8th Article, it is particularly agreed that if, after the above-mentioned annulling of pretensions, there should happen any act of hostility under pretext or colour of Letters of Marque or Commissions of Reprisal, that all persons acting therein should be deemed disturbers and violators of the public peace and be punished accordingly, besides their being obliged to full restitution of the goods, with reparation for the damage sustained.

“All which is confirmed by the 7th Article of the Treaty in 1674.

“Nevertheless, by virtue of the Letters of Reprisal granted unto Sir Edmond Turner and George Carew in 1665, by King Charles the 2nd of blessed memory, for recovering their losses and damages sustained by the seizing of the two ships called the Bonne Esperance and Henry Bonadventure, estimated at the sum of 151,612 pounds sterling, which heretofore had been compounded for and satisfied by the payment of 85,000 guilders, they brought their complaints in July, 1677, before the King in Council; where being dismissed, they presently after, by virtue of their said Letters of Reprisal, set out one ship, and soon after three more, to plunder the subjects of the States General, which they effected by seizing and taking one of their vessels; whereof complaints being made, the said ship was not only restored to the former owners, but likewise, upon the request of the ‘States’ Ambassador, Mons. van Beuningen, that the said Letters of Reprisal might be repealed, his Majesty in Council was pleased immediately to order the repeal and revocation of the said Letters under the Great Seal of England, in conformity to the Treaties of 1664 and 1674, as may appear by the copy of the said order in Council hereunto annexed.

“In answer whereto it is alleged that, though by the Treaties and otherwise it appears the said Letters of Reprisal are revoked and annulled, yet there being a clause inserted in the said Letters of Reprisal whereby his Majesty declares they shall be irrevocable and not annulled although a Peace might ensue until such time as these pretensions were fully satisfied, it is not in his Majesty’s power to annul the same.

“As to the King’s power, the Dutch East India Company do not pretend to be judges thereof, but supposes (sic) that if his Majesty had not such power no solid treaty could ever be made with him. And the said Company do further prove the unreasonableness of this pretention by a very remarkable assertion in their own favour, for that at the negotiation of the Peace at Breda in 1667, it being much insisted on by the States General that reparation and restitution should be made for ships taken from the Dutch before the declaration of war, the inequality of damages being then on the Dutch side to the full value of these two ships, it was thereupon agreed that both sides should forget and annul what was past; upon which foundation the Treaty was concluded.

“Moreover, the aforesaid Treaty of 1674 is approved of by the Parliament, as the Dutch East India Company can make appear, being in possession of the vouchers relating thereunto; and though endeavours have been used in print to show that the Parliament was no ways to be acknowledged as concerned in Treaties, nevertheless the King concluding this Treaty with consent of the Parliament makes it positively a national debt.

“From all which it plainly appears that this pretention does no ways concern the Dutch East India Company further than to show the unreasonableness of it; and therefore they cannot think of coming to any manner of composition for the same.”

[16]99, March 11.— . . . “ One morning I had a message from a gentleman, that he had something of great importance to inform me of, and desired I would appoint an hour when he might wait upon me. I sent him word that he might come at four a clock in the afternoon, which he did, and this gentleman proved to be Mr. Smyth, which now everybody knows by his Memoirs; and his business was to set forth his great services to the Government, and complaining of the ill return that had been made him, and that he could bear it no longer. I asked him how he came to apply himself to me, for that he was an absolute stranger to me. He said he knew I loved the King and his Government, and would be sorry anything should happen that would obstruct his affairs; and if the King did nothing for him, he should be obliged to petition the House of Commons, and said he had a copy of his petition, and desired me to show it to my Lord Portland, which I told him I would do, and I did.

“ My Lord Portland's answer was that he was such a great rogue, he would have nothing to do with him. I then showed it to my Lord Chancellor and Mr. Secretary Vernon; they were both of opinion that this was only a threatening to induce me to get him some money, and when he had got it he would be yet more troublesome.

“ Two days after he sent me word that he had something to tell me that would not not (sic) displease me, but then I had heard so much of him that I did not care for his company, and made him no answer. A [on] Thursday last he writ me another letter, and in it a petition which he desired me to deliver. I sent him word that he might put it in much better hands, and this morning he writ me a sort of angry letter, so that I suppose I may have the honour to be in his next Memoirs, which he is now going to print. If I did not think you had some leisure hours I would not trouble you with all this stuff.

“ If we go on with our project of sending into France for wine, which I think is a very good one, you shall certainly have what share you please, but if there be no better there than the French Ambassador hath here, where I am going to dine, it will be scarce worth our while. If there be anything [in] the world, little or great, wherein I can serve you, you may command me.”

CONFERENCE between the EARL OF PETERBOROUGH and MR. SECRETARY VERNON.

[16]99, Aug. 16.—Vernon met Lord Peterborough this morning at Mr. Clement's house near Chelsea. The Earl said he had heard in a discourse at a coffee-house that Vernon had always acted civilly towards him. He was desirous to speak with Vernon, who had obligations both to the Duke of Shrewsbury and the Earl of Sunderland. He informed Vernon that there was a villainous profligate fellow, Ulysses Brown, who tried to “put things upon” him (Vernon), but he did not believe them. Brown had stated to Peterborough that some plotters were carrying on designs against the Government, and that he (Brown) could put questions to them which they could not withstand. Accordingly some of them were examined by Sir William Trumball; being asked about designs against the King's life, they answered that they knew nothing of it; but when asked what they knew of any contrivance against any of the Privy Council, they were confounded and could not answer. Brown afterwards told him that they were some of the men who had robbed him. The night before he (Peterborough) went to the Tower, Brown came to offer him his service, proposing some ways to help him to defeat his enemies. At another time he recommended himself by the way of pimping, mentioning one Mrs. Farmer. This gave Peterborough his first suspicions that Brown was a rogue.

The Earl knew soon after what Brown had charged him with, and that he had been examined before the Archbishop, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Pembroke. Vernon suggested that he heard it from Trumball, which he denied, saying that though Trumball ought to be his friend, he was so timorous and poor spirited a creature that he durst not show friendship to any one under a cloud. He insinuated that his informations came from Brown himself, and shewed Vernon a collection of Brown's letters and papers to the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Pembroke. He read Brown's letters of 29th July, remarking how long Brown had corresponded with Shrewsbury.

Vernon told him that notice was taken of Brown, because Peterborough was engaged, as it was thought, to ruin other people's reputations. "He was only a defensive weapon taken up against those that used offensive arms." When the occasion seemed to be over, Vernon did what he could to send him out of the kingdom, and gave him money several times for that only purpose, but he stayed here. In writing to Shrewsbury Brown took a liberty which nobody can prevent, but the Duke sent Vernon all his letters; he had neither answers nor the least encouragement, as may appear by the letters themselves. Peterborough denied that he had given Brown money, either at their first meeting or upon receiving the papers, which he had by a second hand. Vernon concluded that Clement had negotiated this matter, who appears to have been concerned in these affairs ever since his Lordship was questioned in the House of Lords, and has seen Brown pretty often in a coffee-house.

Then followed long discourse "about the management of Smith and his papers, and the instructions given to Sir John Fenwick, with the depositions of the Duchess of Norfolk and Mrs. Lawson"; and his Lordship would have Vernon believe that he was misunderstood in that matter. He maintained that he did Shrewsbury no unkindness in relation to Smith; that he had kept his papers only to speak to the Duke about them; that he had often told the same to the Lord Chancellor; that the naming of Smith in relation to Fenwick proceeded from the Duchess of Norfolk, who first mentioned Smith to him; that he had refused to have anything to do with Smith ever since he came out of the Tower; that the printing of his book was unexpected, and he never advised it, &c. He said he would be a fair enemy, and only do what he gave previous notice of. Vernon told him he had some obscure idea of what Lord Sunderland designed for him; whereupon he laughed, and said Vernon talked like a courtier.

The conference lasted three hours. Vernon said he would mention what had passed between them only to the King and Shrewsbury.

CONFERENCE between the EARL OF PETERBOROUGH and MR. SECRETARY VERNON.

1699, Aug. 16.—“ Lord Peterborough, in his discourse at Mr. Clement’s, said a great deal of the esteem he always had for the Duke of Shrewsbury and the desires he had to live well with him, but he always found a coldness from the Duke even while both of them were carrying on the business of the Revolution. That notwithstanding the many advances he made to the Duke, and the confidences he had placed in him, the Duke never trusted him but with one secret only, which he had drawn from him by shewing he was apprised of it before; that was when he went to him and made his compliment upon his last taking the Seals. L[or]d Pet[erborough] outstayed the company, and fell into discourse with the Duke about the reasons of his coming into employment again, which Lord Peterborough said was a great surprise to many people, and to himself in particular. The Duke answered that if he could furnish him with a good reason for his coming in he would oblige him, for he knew of none; whereupon L[or]d Pet[erborough] replied that he having been let into the secret of some messages, letters, and discourses that had passed between the Duke, Sir James Montgomery, and others, he comprehended the reason of his taking an employment, and on that account excused him and no other; the Duke then laying his hands upon L[or]d Pet[erborough]’s arms, saying, There is nothing so strange but it may come to pass; one would hardly have expected that Sir James Montgomery should be able to make a Secretary to K[ing] William. But this he said he had never told the King of, and he had too much honour ever to make any public use of it.

“ He added that he had not the same esteem for Lord Orford, and should own it anywhere, for those he had reason to be dissatisfied with should find he did not fear them, but was ready to answer them in any place, even with his sword in his hand.

“ He ran into a discourse against the Duchess of Norfolk, calling her several times bitch and prostitute. That the remembrance of her old amours with the Duke made her interest herself in his behalf, and show her malice against him, but there was no likelihood he would have put much trust in her, since about that time she made an offer of herself to him to be a spy, and to betray her father. When he reproached her with being capable of so much baseness, she said she hated the Court at St. Germain’s, and particularly the Queen, and she would not hazard Drayton for their sakes. She thought my Lord very much changed from his Revolution principles if he would not embrace such an opportunity; she might have it in her power to be very serviceable. She saw the Lord Marleborough and Lord Godolphin coming every week or oftener to her father’s house when any cloud hung over the Government, and when it was fair weather again they would stay away two or three months. She did not pretend to serve the Government for nothing, but her father having a pension of 1,000[L.] per annum, she expected that should be paid to her and my Lord, and she would share it. This he said he acquainted the King with, but one might be sure he could not trust such a woman with any secrets of his own, and nothing was more improbable than that he should rail at the King before her.

“He talked as if he had been informed of many contrivances to ensnare and ruin him; that he was forced to be upon his guard, and for these three years he had not gone anywhere or spoke with anybody without noting it down in his table book.

“I told him I was sorry he created himself so much uneasiness. I was sure it was in his own power to make himself and others more at quiet if he would take but half the pains to show a peaceable temper that he does to show a restless one. I did not know anyone that would disturb him, but would rather serve him if they could. Then he ran out into his being ill used, and he would show he was not a man to put it up; he would live well with people or ill without them, as they behaved themselves towards him, but he must see the change made and the effects of it. He had been turned out disgracefully, and expected an amends to be made him, but he did not mean it by being restored to any of his employments, for he declared he would accept of none; and for anything else, it was not a time to explain it, but he would have me consider what he had said, and if I had a mind to speak with him hereafter, he would give me an opportunity for it, and make me a frank answer to any questions I would ask him.

“He talked likewise of my Lord Sunderland, how ungrateful the party had been to him after the services he had done them. That he understood they took a pretence to suspect him on his account, whereas he took great pains to restrain him from following his own resentments. That my Lord Sunderland had told him he must and would be his enemy while he and the party were at variance, which he said he could not take ill from him, but commended his frankness, considering whom he had to deal with. I told him the Duke of Shrewsbury had always showed himself of a mild reconcilable temper; he might judge of him by his late behaviour towards his brother in procuring him his office in the Ordnance. He said that was no mark of any good disposition towards him, for his brother was one that would cut his throat if they would have him, and he had not come near him these two years.

“At the beginning of this discourse he talked of his little friend my Lord Wharton, and his lesser friend my Lord Stamford, and in general that all the Whigs had treated him ill; and he asked how much they had bettered themselves by falling out with their friends, and by removing Lord Sunderland.”

*In Shrewsbury's hand, and endorsed by him:—*What was further discoursed between the Earl of Peterborough and Mr. Secretary Vernon, August 16, 1699.

JERSEY TO [SHREWSBURY].

1699, Oct. [6-]16, n.s., Hague.—“I have had an opportunity at Loo to mention to his Majesty what your Grace was pleased to command me. I find you must be troubled with the Staff, and it is very much wished that your health may permit you to stay in England. I am here to make an end of the Treaty, which I believe will be done in two or three days. The Emperor will not come into it, but has three months allowed him to give his positive answer. This is the manner in which the Court of Vienna always treats.

“His Majesty will be here tomorrow night, and I believe will be ready to embark the Saturday following, if the wind is fair.

[P.S.] “Since I wrote my letter I have the honour of yours from Grafton. I shall acquaint the King with the state of your health, in order to prepare him for what you shall think proper to propose to him when you see him. I find the King expects to meet you at his arrival at London ; if your Grace thinks my lodge as convenient as any other place, you know it is entirely at your service ; I have written this post to have the keys delivered to any of your servants. I am very sorry of the occasion that obliges me to make you this offer, for no man living is more truly concerned at your illness.”

SIR J[OHN] STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99, Nov. 25, London.—"On Thursday I delivered Mr. Gardiner a warrant for your Grace to sign, for his being sworn Serjeant-at-Arms; and by this packet I have sent Mr. Presgrave's claim, who entered the caveat against the disposal of the place. Also warrants, as you directed, for swearing Mr. Edling in the room of Mr. Sands Chapman, and for appointing the servants who are to wait when the King travels. The two warrants for furniture for the Horse Guards my Lord Albemarle told me yesterday the King had commanded.

"Since I came to town I have delivered your Grace's orders to Sir Christopher Wrenn to prepare a plan for your lodgings at Hampton Court, for your approbation; and to contrive it so, that there may be rooms for servants over your lodgings; and have also directed him to bring me the particulars of what must be inserted in a warrant to him for fitting up the lodgings over the Queen's guard-chamber and great stairs.

"The Archbishop of Cantorbury has desired me to recommend Dr. Trimmell, who is chaplain to my Lord Sunderland, as a proper person to come into the vacant Chaplainship, in the room of the Bishop of Oxford. As soon as I receive your Grace's approbation I will send his warrant to be signed."

ULYSSES BROWN to SHREWSBURY.

1699, Nov. 28, Sunday.—Encloses a copy of a letter he wrote to the Lord Chancellor on Monday last, so that his Grace can judge his "present unhappy condition." He regrets having to remind his Grace that he has slighted the menaces of [Monmouth], and rejected the large promises of preferment and 400*l.* a year as a pension from the Government he made him. Does not understand the mysteries of politics or religion, for "the end of those two is one and the same." Begs his Grace to use his interest with the King or Lord Chancellor for him; his case is very desperate, if he must feel his enemies, and yet not be allowed to write or speak to his friends.

Enclosure:—A letter from Brown to the Lord Chancellor requesting an interview, &c., and his Lordship's support.

Sir J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99, Dec. 5, Lond[on].—"I received the honour of your Grace's letter of the 27th past, and as to the warrant for furniture for the Horse Guards, have according to your orders taken notice in the book of entries, that 'twas by the King's special command. I have now sent enclosed Dr. Trimmell's warrant to be sworn of the Chaplains, and a letter (as is usual) appointing him his month of waiting. A warrant to the Surveyor, to fit up the lodgings over the Queen's guard-chamber at Hampton Court, as the King directed. A warrant to provide a gold George for his Majesty, pursuant to a letter from the Master of the Robes, which is enclosed. One for providing quilts for the Yeomen of the Guard at Hampton Court, as is usual; and another for necessaries for the officers of the Bedchamber and their servants, which has been allowed them in all the King's houses. Also one to Mr. Mariott, to give an account of his Wardrobe, the former that was sent him having been lost; but I have given him notice to lose no time in preparing.

"The alterations in your Grace's lodgings at Kensington were begun, but have been some time at a stand, because the Treasury have given the Surveyor orders not to proceed in that, or anything else, till the estimate he has given in of the charge be first approved. He is in the mean time gone down to Hampton Court to view the old lodgings, and to consider of a plan for the new.

"Mr. Gardiner, when he was in town, desired me to inform your Grace what method was to be taken to entitle him to the salary of Serjeant-at-Arms from the death of his predecessor. The salary of his employment being payable in the Exchequer, he must of course pass a patent for it; and when I know your Grace's pleasure, from what time you would have it begin, I will accordingly prepare the warrant to the Attorney General, though I suppose it may be timely done when you come to town, he being already sworn into the place. I have sent to Mr. Presgrave to discourse with him about his order of Council, but he has not yet come near me.

"Mons. Overkirke desired me to present his service to your Grace, and to know whether you found any benefit by his balsam, or would have more of it. I was glad of the opportunity, for my own satisfaction, to enquire after your Grace's health, nobody having a more real concern for it."

THE ENGLISH MERCHANTS at LEGHORN to MESSRS. ROBERT BALLE, EDWARD GOULD, ROBERT WESTERN, and SAMUEL SHEPARD, JUN., MECHANT[S] in LONDON.

1699, Dec. [11-]21, Livorno.—Sir L. Blackwell's remonstrances to the Great Duke on their behalf have not had the desired effect. Have drawn up a statement of their case, which they enclose, in hope of the King's protection. The French and Dutch are using methods for their own security.

2. Case of the English merchants trading to and residing at Livorne, stating that in 1593 the Great Duke of Florence made Legorne a free port, and published an act inviting strangers to settle there, by which many privileges were granted, and Article 5 of which exempted them from "all taxes then laid or to be laid by his Highness, or successors." Besides this new imposition, the English merchants are forced to pay lazzaretto duties for their goods at Legorne, whereas the French pay none. Although there is no sickness in England, English vessels are obliged to lie long in port before they can "prattick."

At an audience last night the Great Duke, being informed that the Duke's health had been impaired since his return to London, said, "' Pray write his Grace that this country air and two months at Naples will infallibly cure him.' . . . My house hath a convenient apartment to receive your Grace. . . . I am sure the Great Duke would be glad to send a galley for Mars[eilles], to conduct your Grace to Legorne."

The allowance established is according to the difference of people's quality, of which I have enclosed a copy, and desire to know your Grace's pleasure whether you will allow it according to hers, who is an Earl's daughter, or her husband's. SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99, Dec. 19, Lond[on].—"On Sunday, Mr. Neale, the Groom Porter, died, and yesterday his son brought me the enclosed copy of his patent for the reversion, attested in the Signet Office. Soon after Sir John Garard, who is called in the patent John Garard, Esquire, came to demand the same thing, by virtue of the same patent. Mr. Neale pretends that Garard, who is his uncle, was only named in trust for him, but has no declaration of trust to produce. On the other hand Garard denies the trust, but says the reversion was obtained for his use. I have quieted them both for the present by acquainting them I would send your Grace the copy of the patent to judge of, and assured them the place would not be disposed till both their claims were heard. I will, against your Grace comes to town, make what enquiry I can about their titles, and also show your Grace a long case which I find in a book of Precedents, proving that the disposal of the Groom Porter's place is solely in the Lord Chamberlain, and not in the King.

"Yesterday I received the honour of your Grace's of the 16th, and have taken care to excuse to Col. Godfrey his business not yet done, and your not writing to him upon your Grace's coming to town soon. Your bedchamber and closet at Kensington will be ready this week, and the eating-room the next, if we can oblige the men to work in the holidays. The remark which your Grace takes notice of in the margin of the paper, about not providing locks and keys, &c., was set down by your order, and the day after, the King having told (as I remember) the Housekeeper at Hampton Court that he would not allow it, I gave notice thereof to the locksmith, as from his Majesty.

"The papers I now trouble your Grace to sign are a list of the Lent preachers, which the Archbishop prepared, as is usual, and the Lord Chamberlain returns to him with a letter at the bottom, desiring him to give them notice to attend. Also Mr. Barkham's warrant to be sworn in Mr. Grave's (sic) place. Mr. Williams, Yeoman of the Robes, upon the Master of the Robes' letter which is enclosed. A warrant to the Groom Porter for tables, &c., for play at Kensington, which are already provided, and, since he is dead, if your Grace pleases, may be antedated a week. Two warrants for allowances, as is usual, for a singing boy, who Dr. Blow certifies is dismissed. I hope this is the last trouble I need give your Grace in the country."

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99, Dec. 21, Lond[on].—"According to your Grace's orders, which I received yesterday, I enquired the King's pleasure about the allowance for Mr. Chambers['] christening plate, which he pleased to order according to his Lady's quality, and accordingly I have filled up the warrant.

"I can't understand what the Duchess of Ormond could mean concerning the place of Yeoman Copier of the King's pictures; nor have I heard of any place relating to the pictures vacant. I suppose therefore her Grace was at least misinformed.

"I have enclosed a warrant which the King ordered for Hampton Court; the latter part on't for the room in Whitehall was to save tapestry that lay doubled over the doors and chimney, and in danger of being spoilt. Yesterday the King ordered me to go with Lord Albemarle to see the cases in the Queen's apartment at Kensington opened, and removed to his lower lodgings. We found nothing in them but China ware, and two cabinets. His Majesty, 'tis said, will go to Hampton Court Tuesday next for the whole week, and on new year's day will go out of mourning.

“My brother and my sister return your Grace their humble thanks for your favour in continuing them in their lodgings; which I have great reason to acknowledge too.”

Rd. and answd. 23.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1699[-1700], Jan. 5, Whitehall.—“I forbore sending your Grace the enclosed papers to Hampton Court, in hopes of waiting on you with them at Kensington last night, but was very much concerned to receive your Grace’s letter with an account of your relapsing.

“All things will be ready for the entertainment of the Savoy Ambassador on Monday; the enclosed warrants are to the Green Cloth, to prepare for it, though I have given them early notice of it already. One to the Surveyor, to repair what is wanting in the house, and a list of the King’s servants who are to attend. I have presumed to name Mr. Erle to wait as Gentleman Usher, because ’tis his turn in course. Mr. Godfrey is the eldest Quarter-waiter who has never yet waited, and the rest are put down by the consent of the respective societies, who have agreed to divide the fees. I have also sent three warrants for swearing in the three Trumpets, as you were pleased to order, and the warrant for the Chapel closet.

“Sir Charles Cotterell is gone to Court today to inform the King about the ceremonial of introducing Ambassadors to their audience by Earls. He says Venice has been allowed that privilege time out of mind. Savoy had it from King Charles the 2nd at the request of the Queen-mother, to make a compliment to the then Duchess of Savoy, her near relation. Holland was never allowed it till since this Revolution; but now they all three enjoy the privileges of crowned heads. I am in great hopes to have a better account of your Grace’s health.

[P.S.] “I desire to know who[m] your Grace has appointed to wait tomorrow as Groom Porter.”

SAME to SAME.

[16]99 [-1700], Jan. 6, London.—“I received the honour of your Grace’s letter last night, and this morning my Lord Albemarle sent for me from the King, to know who was appointed to officiate as Groom Porter tonight. I told him I had directions from your Grace to take care of it, but, the time being short, knew nobody that could be provided to execute it but Mr. Neale, and therefore intended to offer it to him, in case he would declare his officiating should be without consequence to the Lord Chamberlain’s right. My Lord told me the King had said the same thing, and did approve of it with that caution. About noon I met Mr. Neale, who told me he was just come from Hampton Court, and accepted of it upon those terms. The expedient your Grace mentions of laying aside Mr. Neale’s patent, and granting him a new one, is certainly very practicable, and I believe he would be glad on't, but I have not ventured to propose it without further orders, and hope your Grace's health will allow you to come to town before there be any further pressing business for a Groom Porter.

"But if I may presume to offer my opinion, I fear Mr. Neale so unqualified for the place, that I doubt the King's service will suffer by his carelessness in providing the King's houses, and his own fortune too, in not knowing how to manage play. And therefore, as I believe your Grace is inclined to consider him out of compassion and charity, I believe 'twere better both for the King's service and Mr. Neale's interest that your Grace named a fit person into the place, who should make him a reasonable allowance out of it; but this I offer with submission, and, when I receive your further orders in it, will take care to observe them punctually."

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Jan. 11, London.—"Mr. Arden brought me your Grace's letter, and tomorrow he and I are to state the case of the right to the Groom Porter's place, in order to his consulting the Attorney General upon it, and are to examine a paper I have got of the last New Year's gifts my Lord Dorsett paid, who is the latest president [precedent], for my Lord Sunderland laid down before Christmas. Mr. Lowman and Mr. Brienne having now ended their bargain about the Housekeeper's place at Kensington, and the money paid, I have sent your Grace the warrant to swear Mr. Lowman and his wife into it. Also one for standards for the troops of Guards, upon the Duke of Ormond's letter, which is enclosed. Two warrants for the payment of messengers, for service performed by order of the House of Lords, certified by the Black Rod.

"Mr. London, the gardener, brought me word that the King has removed a gardener from Hampton Court to Richmond, and ordered he should be lodged in the old house, for which I have sent a warrant. Also two petitions, one from Mr. Squire, an ancient man, one of the Esquires of the Body, [and] another from a waterman, desiring leave to surrender their places; and a list of the Lent preachers printed, as is usual.

"The ceremony of receiving the Savoy Ambassador is now over. He was received before his entry at Greenwich by the Earl of Grantham; Lord Raby carried the compliment to the house where he was entertained; and the Earl of Anglesey brought him to his audience at Kensington this evening.

"All good men have an interest in your Grace's health, and therefore heartily wish it, and desire to enquire after it.

[P.S.] "I mistook Mr. Squire for an Esquire of the Body, his place being Sewer of the Chamber."

Ansd. 13.

SAME to SAME.

[16]99[-1700], Jan. 16, Whitehall.—"I have sent by this post a warrant for the Attorney General to prepare a patent for Mr.

Gardiner, but have left a blank for the time when his salary is to commence, till I know your Grace's pleasure. I remember your Grace told me the rest of the Serjeants who did the duty, petition to be allowed the salary during the vacancy, but I suppose they will think it reasonable Mr. Gardiner should be allowed it from Michaelmas Day, which begins a quarter, and is only about a month before he was sworn in. I have also sent the waterman's warrant; one for payment of 150*l.* to Sir Godfrey Kneller for the three pictures he drew for Lord Albemarle; one for paying Mr. Lisney for lodging some of the King's servants last winter in Kensington town, with the Gentlemen Ushers' certificate inclosed; two for liveries for the drum-major and drummers, and for the corn-cutter; which are allowed upon the establishment of the Great Wardrobe; and one for rooms to be fitted up at Hampton Court, for Mr. Secretary Vernon and the Gentlemen Ushers, the Surveyor being now desirous to begin to work there, and having prayed that many lodgings should not be included in the same warrant.

"I have, by going often through the old buildings at Hampton Court, considered how most of those who are to attend on the King, and those who [m] the King gave me orders about, might be provided, but can think of no way how to lay it before your Grace at this distance for your approbation, in order to the preparing more warrants.

"I have also this day given Mr. Arden a blank warrant for swearing in a Groom Porter, to send your Grace as he desired, with counsel's opinion about the right of disposing of it, of all which I suppose he will inform you by this post.

"I have prepared no warrant for swearing in a Sewer of the Chamber in Mr. Squire's place till I enquire into the character of the man he recommends, and shall for the future forbear troubling your Grace with petitions of that nature; only presume to send one now from Mr. Hammond, a Groom of the Great Chamber, who was deputy to Mr. Bryan, and by reason of a great number of children I am told is a great object of charity.

"The ill state of your Grace's health makes people begin to wish you would try what effect change of air might have, which no other consideration could incline them to."

Ans. 20.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Jan. 18, Whitehall.—"Yesterday the King commanded me to write to your Grace to make your remarks upon the paper he formerly gave you concerning the family, and that I should bring him a copy of those regulations you approved of, that he may order them in the Treasury. I have therefore now sent enclosed the original paper I received from your Grace, with the remarks in the margin you then ordered, and withall humbly offer my opinion as to three or four offices set down to determine. That as to the Cupbearers, Carvers, and Sewers, I conceive it were fit that two of each society continue, because the King may upon some occasions dine in state. Also half of the Sewers of the Chamber, because Embassadors may expect to be attended on by them at their entertainments, as hitherto has been done. In the office of the Removing Wardrobe, that one Groom and one Page remain, since there is more business in that than any other Wardrobe. Also the Apothecary for the Household, because the servants may have occasion to make use of him, especially when the King goes beyond sea; without his Majesty will oblige his own Apothecaries to supply his servants, which I believe they may very well afford. The continuance of these few offices will be no great charge.

“The King has also ordered that my Lord Ossulston’s house, which was hired for entertaining Embassadors, the lease being now expired, should be put off, of which I have sent him notice, and will take care that the goods be secured in the Removing Wardrobe.

“Dr. Cumber, Dean of Durrham, being dead, the Archbishop of Canterbury recommends Dr. Campion to be Chaplain in his room, and says my Lord Chancellor joins with him in it, he having been formerly his tutor.

“I have enclosed sent three warrants, one for the Rat-killer’s livery for the year 99; one for payment of his bill for destroying vermin at Kensington and the Parliament Houses, with the certificates of the service done; and one for paying Mr. Chace rent for the house in Whitehall where the Lord Chamberlain’s office is kept; though I have never been allowed but two rooms, Mr. Cooling’s daughter having always kept possession of the rest.

“The Chapel at Hampton Court being now near finished, I have enclosed the Bishop of London’s account of necessaries for it, to know how far you will please to allow of them.”

Ansd. 20.

SIR L. BLACKWELL to SHREWSBURY.

1699-1700, [Jan. 23-]Feb. 2, Florence.—Has received his letter of the 22nd, and will write to the Great Duke. Sends two chests of new wines by H.M. ship Hampshire, Capt. Leake.

Ansd. 19.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Jan. 25.—“I was very much overjoyed to receive your Grace’s of the 20th, which brought the good news of your being better in health. His Majesty’s command to me was, that when I received back your remarks concerning the regulations of the family, I should make him an extract only of such as were to be ordered in the Treasury, which he would then give directions in; as soon as ’tis done I will return your Grace a copy.

“Mr. Gardiner’s warrant was made during good behaviour, by mistake of the clerk, which is now mended; there has been but one for life since my time, by the King's special command, and yet could hardly pass the Treasury, but without the King's order they run always during pleasure. I have filled up his warrant to commence from Michaelmas, because 'tis usual to allow the benefit of the whole quarter.

"I humbly thank your Grace for the trust you repose in me as to the appointing lodgings at Hampton Court, which I shall endeavour to do with all the care possible, but will not venture to give any possession without your approbation. The King has ordered Lord Rochfort should have ground rooms because of his lameness, and that Dr. Ratcliff should have two chambers. I believe the three rooms in the old building at first intended for Lord Cutts may be proper for him, for neither [the] Lord Privy Seal [Viscount Lonsdale] nor Lord Romney seem to like them, and for Ratcliff the two rooms over the King's gallery, which I think your Grace proposed once for the Duke of Ormond, for I'm informed my Lord Jerzey intends to quit those where he is at present, which may accommodate his Grace much better. Last week Lord Romney enquired of me in whose disposal the Housekeeper of Newmarkett was, which I then thought was in the Lord Chamberlain, because I found in Mr. Cooling's book the place of Wardrobe-Keeper joined to it; since that, Mrs. Walker died, who was Housekeeper, and yesterday my Lord sent me word he had writ to your Grace to beg the place for Mrs. Mathews, and desired I would acquaint your Grace that the right of disposal was in the Lord Chamberlain; but upon further enquiry today I am informed that Mrs. Walker's, formerly Mrs. Elliot's, patent was only as Housekeeper, which when alone is always in the nomination of the King; and my Lord Radnor showed me today a late warrant, signed by the King and counter-signed by the Lords of the Treasury, to constitute Mr. Walker, her husband, Housekeeper only, with the salary of 200*l.* a year. As soon as I can, I will send your Grace a more perfect account of it.

"I have now sent to be signed Dr. Campion's warrant and letter, one for two marble tables by the King's order, one for a silver trumpet, with the Duke of Ormond's letter, as is usual. Mr. Stone's warrant to succeed Mr. Hammond. Mr. Stone is certified to be a substantial, well affected apothecary at Kensington. Also a list of the servants who are to eat at the Gentlemen Ushers' table, which they have desired may be hung up in their room as formerly, to prevent disorder.

"I have also sent one for Mr. Tozar to be Groom of the Robes, with Lord Albemarle's letter, which was brought a fortnight ago with Mr. Williams', but I sent it then back as a mistake, because I found Tozar sworn into the same place upon the books before my time; but my Lord has now informed me that though Tozar was sworn in the room of Fremain, that Fremain still has the place, and continues upon the Green-cloth books, where he is paid, and therefore, to set all right, desires Fremain's name may be restored in the books of this office, and Tozar sworn anew into Williams' place. I could not think of any expedient less confused to remedy the irregularity they have committed, and have therefore sent it as they desire.

"If your Grace be convinced the air of the south of France is necessary to your cure, which most now fear it is, I believe none will make any reflections upon it, but those few who are glad of the occasion of such a journey; and as the world is generally persuaded they don't themselves believe the scandal they would willingly raise, I think there is little danger of their being able to make impressions upon others. I wish for their sakes, as well as ours, your Grace may have no occasion for such a voyage, or that you may find speedy success in it."

Ansd. 27.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Jan. 30.—"I have endeavoured to inform myself about the right of disposal of the Housekeeper's place at Newmarkett. The books of the office take no notice of Mrs. Walker till Lord Dorsett's time, where she is named Housekeeper and Wardrobe-keeper; but I am now convinced 'tis set down false; for Mr. Walker has sent me the Gentleman Usher's certificate who swore her into the place, bearing the same date with the entry in the books, where she is certified to be sworn only Housekeeper; and I have now before me an attested copy of King Charles' patent, constituting her Housekeeper only; which inclines me to believe a story Mr. Walker tells, that Mr. Cooling said to him he would oppose his wife's changing the patent for his life, unless he would pass it under both names, that the place might come hereafter in the disposal of the Lord Chamberlain.

"I never intended disturbing my Lord Montagu's possession of his kitchen without his consent, though I believe his Lordship is under a mistake, when he informed your Grace the King gave it him, for I lent it to him myself upon his promise that if the King should have any occasion for it he would deliver it up; and last week the Board of Green-cloth having desired that room, and the rest of the offices there, to lay up the goods they were to remove out of the Ambassador's house, and being told also that Lord Montagu made no other use on't but to keep coals, I sent to his servant to know whether it might be spared for the King's service.

"I won't fail to do Mr. Rowly all the service I can, and have directed his warrant to be stamped, that he may be sworn in tomorrow, and enter upon his office. I believe 'twill be better, at least for some time, not to pass patent for it, because his warrant will entitle him to receive the allowances in the offices where 'tis paid, and I'm told there are caveats entered by Sir John Garratt at the Signet and Privy Seal to prevent the passing any patent.

"I delivered to the King a copy of the regulations which ought to pass the Treasury, and have now enclosed another to your Grace, with Sir Tho. Millington's warrant to be sworn second Physician."

Ansd. Feb. 3d.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Feb. 1.—“In my last I acquainted your Grace that Mr. Rowly and I were of opinion ’twere better to put off passing patent for some time, because I was informed caveats were entered in some offices to stop it, which would bring on a lawsuit; but now, upon further thoughts, he desires it may go on, because if Sir John Garard and Mr. Neale think fit to bring their actions, they may do it upon his receiving the profits of the place, and believes it will help his cause, having the King’s authority to back it. I have therefore now sent the warrant to the Attorney-General to be signed, which Mr. Rowly may after make use of as he thinks advisable; and with it I have sent a warrant for necessaries for Hampton Court Chapel, but have omitted such things out of the Bishop of London’s list as were not absolutely necessary, which I have marked in the margin.”

Ansd. 3d.

SAME to SAME.

[16]99[-1700], Feb. 8.—“I received the honour of your Grace’s of the 3rd with the enclosed warrants, since which Mr. Neale and his counsel brought the petition I have now sent, which I endeavoured to satisfy them was needless, since you had made over all your right and title to Mr. Rowly, who was upon the place, and the person I thought they should now apply to, and withall assured them your Grace would not refuse them liberty to prove their title; but they still pressed me to send it to have an answer from yourself, which they pretended they did out of respect, before they would proceed to a trial. Today they came again to put me in mind of sending it, and said they hoped your Grace would make some order upon the petition, particularly as to that part of the prayer wherein Mr. Neale desires to be sworn into the place. I told them they could expect no written order in the case, nor any answer, but what Mr. Rowly was ready to give in your name; that the right of disposing appeared to be in the Lord Chamberlain; that you had accordingly made over all your right to Mr. Rowly, which they had free leave to question when and where they pleased. I have been particular in relating our discourse, as trifling as it was, because they seem to lay great stress upon the answer they shall receive to their petition, though I am not subtle enough to find what use they can make of it.”

Ansd. 10.

ROCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1699[-1700], Feb. 9.—“Your Grace’s commands of all natures would be always very agreeable to me, if at least I can serve you in them. This particular of letting your Grace into Cornbury as a tenant must needs seem so reasonable to you, that I am very much concerned there should be any difficulties in it, of which, howsoever, I am going to make you the judge. For this year and half past the park hath been turned almost into a farm, not let, but part of it ploughed ; a good deal of the wood cut and carried off, that more may be ploughed; part already laid down with cinquefoil, which was only for a pattern some years ago, to see how that husbandry would suit with the ground ; and by that we have been encouraged to go on with greater quantities ; another part of the park turned to grazing, and every part to the best advantage ; and it hath turned to above 300*l.* profit for one year, and gives hopes of increasing considerably. The incumbrances that lie upon that estate, and in some measure upon myself, that am engaged in the management of it, have made it necessary to seek out all manner of improvements upon it ; and how this can be accommodated with the pleasure your Grace would propose to have of the park in your living there, I confess I cannot see.

[P.S.] “I am ashamed to tell your Grace that the very insignificant and unprofitable entertainments in the House of P. have kept us so late all this week that it hath hindered me from giving you this account something sooner.”

R. and ansd. 12.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Feb. 13, Whitehall.—“According to your orders, I delivered your Grace’s letter to my Lord Oxford, and have sent a warrant for Wilks to be sworn waterman, there being no objection against it, if you are pleased to grant it. As to Mr. Akeroyd’s petition, I don’t know what he means by being of the private music, till I see him. If he means instrumental music, there is at present no vacancy, and as I remember, at Hampton Court, your Grace told me you intended the first for Sir William Forrester’s servant.

“I sent for Mr. Neale today, and read him that part of your letter, wherein you give him free consent to make the best of his title ; to which he made no other return, but that he was very thankful.

“The servants who attended on the King last year into Holland having desired warrants for their riding charges, according to the Establishment, I have enclosed some of them to be signed ; also one for the Savoy Ambassador’s present, who intends to return home soon.

“My brother and sister, being gone for Ireland, desired me to return your Grace their most humble thanks for the favour of your lodgings at the Cock-pitt, which I have also reason to acknowledge.”

Ans. 17.

ROCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1699[-1700], Feb. 17.—“To show your Grace that I am as willing as you can be to endeavour the overcoming the difficulties I apprehended in your proposal of coming to live at Cornbury, I shall send order this post to one Acteon Kew, who is entrusted in the management of the Park, to be ready to attend your commands, and to give your Grace an account of the present management of that ground. He is but a plain man, but I think he is honest, and I believe will not tell you a lie. . . . I will say nothing at present to what you mention of advantages of wood out of the Forest, that being a thing quite by itself." . . .

Ansd. March 1st.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Feb. 20, Whitehall.—“ I acquainted your Grace at Hampton Court that I had received a petition from the Widow Lacy, with an order of reference from the Council to your Grace, whereby the widow demands payment of a rentcharge of 3s. 4d. a day from the patentees of Mr. Killegrew's company of Players, who united after with Sir William Davenant's; and as I found they were both concerned in the debt, I sent to them both to give in their answers to the petition, which I have now received; and the petitioner being very pressing to have them laid before your Grace, I have sent them and all the other papers I had relating to the business, except the original Indenture, which being too large to send, I have taken out that clause upon the meaning of which the dispute turns. The words are, that she is to be paid before any dividend shall be made between the actors. The patentees think themselves not obliged by it till they are in a condition to make a dividend, which they pretend they have not been for some years past.

“ I have also sent some warrants for riding charges for last year. I received last night the honour of your Grace's letter.

Ansd. 24.

SAME to SAME.

[16]99[-1700], Feb. 24, Whitehall.—“ Mr. Secretary Vernon told me he had writ to your Grace to order him a warrant for silver boxes for ratifications of treaties, which I have now sent, and with it some more warrants for riding charges, and one for shutting up Mr. Smith's entrance for the convenience of Mons. Overkirk at Hampton Court, and opening another for him, and for repairing Lord Rochford's lodgings, which the King has ordered.

“ The King gives a charity on Maundy Thursday to 49 poor men, whereof the Lord Chamberlain recommends two. I desire therefore to know who[m] your Grace would have named. I am to acquaint your Grace, too, that the Lord Mayor every year makes a present to the Lord Chamberlain of cloth for a suit of clothes, and that there is now left at the office six yards of black cloth.

[P.S.] “ The enclosed letters were left at the office.”

Rd. and ansd. 26.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], Feb. 27, Whitehall.—“I received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 24th last night, and have, as well as I could, drawn up the state of the Widow Lacy’s case (a copy whereof is enclosed), and sent it to the Attorney General for his opinion, and with it a warrant for Beak to be sworn messenger ; one, according custom, for providing necessaries which the King gives the poor on Maundy Thursday ; and several warrants for riding charges.”

Ansd. March 2d. Enclosure :—

The Widow Lacy’s case.

“The patentees of the old Company of Players acting in Drury Lane have, by Indenture with the Widow Lacy, covenanted to pay her 3s. 4d. a day for every day they should act, during her natural life, before any dividend should be made between the said actors.

“Q<sup>r</sup>. Whether by those words the patentees are obliged to pay the Widow Lacy her annuity, though they receive no clear profits for their acting, nor are in a condition to make a dividend.”

ROCHESTER to SHREWSBURY.

1699[-1700], March 7.—“It will be a difficult matter for me to set a price for the letting the house at Cornbury, since your Grace is pleased to say that you think it would be a pretty hard bargain to pay eight score pounds a year for that part of the Park that you propose to take along with the house, which I suppose Act. Kew could demonstrate it had made last year, and in all probability was to make more this ; but I hope I shall show my duty to your Grace as much by leaving it to yourself to say what your own price shall be.

“The furniture, such as it is, which indeed is very bad for your Grace, shall be left at your service, except the linen and pewter, which would quickly be worn out. There may be several other particulars necessary to be adjusted, which, since you are pleased to offer it, I should wish may be determined here by such person as you shall be pleased to send to me ; in which I hope I shall not be difficult nor unreasonable. The library you will allow to be locked up, for books may easily be lost or mislaid.

“And now, my Lord, I must acquaint your Grace what nobody in the country knows yet, and I desire may not ; that I have finished the bargain with my brother that I have been some time about, and so the house and Park and all belonging to it is in my hands. It is not the less at your service, and if I shall find it reasonable for me to part with it, I shall ever be desirous to make an offer of it to your Grace rather than any other body.”*

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY]. See Stanbury

[16]99[-1700], March 7, Whitehall.—“Yesterday the King commanded me to draw out a new Establishment for the servants under the Lord Chamberlain for him to sign, with the alterations he formerly ordered, and send it first to your Grace for your approbation, which I will endeavour to have ready next week.

“If your Grace intends to meet the King at Newmarkett the beginning of April, I desire to know in time whether you intend to be in your own lodgings or at my Lord Godolphin’s as formerly. You have a house joining to the Court that has offices, and room enough, but is an old lath and plaster building, and very cold; but if your Grace please to send down a bed, I will take care to have some rooms furnished, and the house put in tolerable repair.

“Mr. Rowly desired to have a warrant drawn upon him, that he might have an opportunity to act in his employment; for which reason I have now sent one for things demanded by the Signet Office and Privy Seal; also three for riding charges into Holland; one for new covers for two swords of State; one for repaying a Page of the Removing Wardrobe money he laid out for three years past in repairing the King’s travelling bed and furniture abroad; one for the necessary woman’s yearly allowance out of the Great Wardrobe. Also a petition of one Hack, who desires to be sworn in the place of Hydrographer, which I think is only titular, without any salary.

[P.S.] “The time drawing near, I take leave to remind your Grace of naming the Maundy men.”

Ans’d. 9th.

SAME to SAME.

[16]99[-1700], March 14, Whitehall.—“I received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 9th instant with the warrants signed, and have now sent the Attorney General’s opinion in the Widow Lacy’s case, upon which I expect your Grace’s further orders. A warrant for two Faulkeners’ liveries, as the Duke of St. Alban’s desired. One for a collar of S.S. for a Serjeant-at-Arms, with his certificate that he lost his former collar in the fire at Whitehall, which also others have assured me. One for a ring to Countess Dona, which the King has ordered, she being his relation. Two for riding charges. Also a letter as is usual to the Lord Almoner, recommending two Maundy men; but I have left a blank for their names till I can find fit persons.

“Since I received your Grace’s commands I have made what enquiry I could about rooms in Whitehall, to save the King the charge of house-rent, for an office for the Lord Chamberlain; but not finding any I asked Sir Christopher Wrenn whether it was not good husbandry to build such an office out of the rubbish here; who tells me that if your Grace pleases to give him a warrant, he will run up a slight building for that purpose this summer, of two rooms for an office, and two rooms over them for a lodging for the Secretary, for less than 200*l.*; for which I have now sent a warrant, if your Grace approve of it.

"I am glad your Grace's health is established well enough to hunt, and hope the warm weather coming on may invite you to meet the King at Hampton Court, where he intends to reside upon his return from Newmarket, the furniture that was ordered for his apartment being all sent down this week."

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

[16]99[-1700], March 18, Whitehall.—"I have been under difficulties to prepare an Establishment for the servants above stairs, as the King commanded, which is the reason I have not sent it sooner. His Majesty's directions were, that, being soon to sign an Establishment for the servants below stairs, he would have me prepare one for those above, according to the former regulations, to be sent to your Grace for your opinion, and then drawn fair for him to sign, and to take care that no person should be paid in two offices. Upon consideration, I found it uneasy to observe the King's orders, because the servants of the Chamber are paid part in the Treasury of the Chamber, where of right they ought to be, part in the Cofferer's office, some in the Exchequer, besides the livery money, which is now entirely to be sunk; and therefore did not know how to comprehend them under any one Establishment, besides that the Treasury Chamber pays several, as Faulkners, Huntsmen, &c., who are not directly under the cognisance of the Lord Chamberlain; but finding the King pressing to have it dispatched, I have sent your Grace a copy of the Establishment of the Treasury Chamber, with a paper of my observations upon it, part of the Establishment of the Cofferer's, which relates to the servants above stairs, with observations, and a paper of those who are paid in the Exchequer, that when I receive your Grace's pleasure upon them I may be able to draw out a new Establishment for the Treasury Chamber, and propose some regulations for the others.

"Your Grace will find that I have been more inclined to retrenching than raising salaries; which I did, because I understand by some of the Lords of the Treasury, the King finds his Civil List so in debt that he believes no other expedient will clear it.

"I understand also the King expects your Grace's opinion about the regulating of the Faulkners and Huntsmen, as well as the other servants.

"I had the honour yesterday of your Grace's of the 16th, and will take care to prepare an order about Mrs. Lacy."

Rd. and ansd. 21.

SAME to SAME.

[16]99[-1700], March 21, Whitehall.—"I have enclosed sent the order for Mrs. Lacy's rentcharge; two warrants for a child of the Chapel dismissed, with Dr. Blow's certificate; three warrants appointing the lodgings at Hampton Court, that were fitted up for the Archbishop of Cantorbury, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord President; one to repair the left side of the old Court there, for the officers within named, which names are yet only for form, till the rooms are fitted up, and the lodgings marked out by your order; also one for liveries, as is usual, for the William and Mary yacht.

“Dr. Briggs brought to the office a printed book of his in Latin, called Ophthalmographia, with a written dedication to your Grace, and a paper of his case, all which he desired might be transmitted. I thought the book too cumbersome to send by post, and therefore only enclosed his case.

“Mr. Vanbrook, who formerly waited on your Grace from the Treasury, came to me, as from them, to desire the places of of Clerks of the Cheque to the Messengers might be filled up; and when I told him the reason of its (sic) delay was because Poyke, one of those who was dismissed, had petitioned your Grace that a stop might be put to it till he might have an opportunity of clearing himself before the King in Council, he thereupon brought an attested copy of Poyk’s petition to the King to show that by that he did not offer to purge himself, but only to recriminate; which he desired might be sent to know your pleasure.

“When I was last week at Hampton Court, Mr. Montagu showed me a large low room near his kitchen, under the Council Chamber, which he desires your Grace will give him leave to fit up at his own charge for an eating room. His servants formerly made use of it, and I don’t find that any who desire lodgings would content themselves with such indifferent rooms.”

Ansd. 25.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, April 2.—“I had answered your Grace’s of the 25th of March sooner, but that I have been at Hampton Court. The reason why I drew up the report of Mrs. Lacy’s case by way of an order was, because I found ’twas done so before by Lord Mulgrave and Lord Dorsett when they were Lord Chamberlains, and lately by the White Staff officers when ’twas referred to them; and in the minute of Council upon the present petition, ’tis only said Referred to the Lord Chamberlain, which I understood to be the determining of the case; but if your Grace pleases to send back the order, I will draw it up in the form of a report to the Council, upon their reference.

“I have sent a warrant for mending and cleaning some furniture for Hampton Court, and for supplying the remainder of a former warrant for Newmarkett, which lies now ready. One for the King’s picture on horseback, by his order. A warrant to fit up rooms over the gate at Hampton Court for the Gentlemen Ushers; the rooms formerly marked for the Daily Waiters and the Scotch Secretary being ordered by the King for Dr. Ratcliff. One for appointing Lord Jerzey’s lodgings, which my Lord Albemarle told me was by the King’s directions. One for the usual liveries for the Fowlkeeper in St. James's Park; and one for riding charges for a bedgoer last year, which I think is the last of that sort.

"I was informed my Lord Privy Seal had no mind to be lodged in the new buildings at Hampton Court, because they were too high; and therefore I thought the properest place would be in the old Court, which is now repairing. There have been no lodgings appointed since your Grace went into the country but what the King has done, which, as I remember, are only to Lord Selkirk, Dr. Ratcliff, Lord Rochford, and some to Lord Jerzey. I have made a note of the rest who lay claim, to lay before you, with the plan, at your return.

"Being informed that the new Establishment of the Green-cloth lay in the Treasury to be signed, I enquired how the servants above stairs who are paid both there and in the Treasury Chamber are regulated, and am informed they are all struck off there, which determines in what office they are to be paid; but whether they are to be considered for it in the Treasury Chamber, or quite to lose it, I can't yet hear."

Ansd. 8th.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, April 11, Whitehall.—"I had the honour of your Grace's letter of the 8th yesterday. As to Mrs. Lacy's business, I believe it may be deferred till your Grace comes to Hampton Court, without any prejudice to her, since, if it be determined in her favour, she will be entitled to all arrears.

"I was informed, as I writ your Grace word, that my Lord Privy Seal desired to be in the old buildings, and therefore proposed to get ready for him part of Lady Clayton's, which I think are the best, and need least repair, but I am very much put to it to get her out. If my Lord should choose rather to be in the new, I suppose the rooms which Lord Jerzey had at first would please him, which are ready; but I hope your Grace will be at Hampton Court to order it, before my Lord Privy Seal will have occasion for lodgings.

"I have now sent a warrant for Dr. Ratcliff's lodgings; three, for the Gentlemen of the Bedchamber, for the Captain of the Guard in waiting, and for the Master of the Robes; two for paying bills to messengers that were sent last year with orders to the ships that transported the King, with their bills enclosed; one for necessaries for the officers of the Footguards at Kensington, with the Major's note signed.

"I will endeavour as soon as I can to know the King's pleasure concerning Mr. Rows being made Fowlkeeper. I have also sent to Mr. Nash, according to your order, to be informed of the person he desires should succeed him.

"By the death of the Dean of Lincoln there is a vacancy among the Chaplains, for which the Archbishop of Canterbury desired me to recommend the first Prebend of that diocese (as I remember, his name is Dr. Ilton), if your Grace be not pre-engaged.

[P.S.] "The Parliament is up today, but I don't yet hear whether the King goes to Newmarket or Hampton Court."
Ansd. 13.

JO. METHUEN to SHREWSBURY.

1700, May 10, London.—"I perceived, my Lord, by the King this morning that he depends on your Grace's going to Ireland; and that all things may be disposed for that end, he commanded me to stay here, without doing anything in relation to my going, until your Grace should be able to return, which the King hoped would be in a few days.

"As I hope no continuance of your indisposition will make any change in your intentions, so I cannot but apprehend your return to Hampton Court; and I heartily wish your Grace would resolve to let us prepare all the papers for your going in your absence, since I dare assure you Mr. Secretary and I could do it entirely to your satisfaction; and I would certainly wait on you where you are, but that I fear to disturb and hinder the recovery of your health I so much desire.

"His Majesty commanded me likewise this night to use all possible endeavours to prevail with my Lord Galloway to stay in Ireland, as what will make your Grace easy there."

MARLBOROUGH to [SHREWSBURY].

[1700,] May 11.—"I was in hopes to have had the happiness a Thursday of seeing you, for I have so much the spleen that it would have been a great ease to your humble servant to have had one quarter of an hour's talk. The King's coldness to me continues, so that I should have been glad to have had your friendly advice; for to have friends and acquaintances unreasonably jealous, and the King at the same time angry, is what I know not how to bear; nor do I know how to behave myself.

"I am told that, if your health will give you leave, you are to be Lieutenant of Ireland, and Groom of the Stool, which I do with all my heart wish you, and the King and Kingdom, joy of. I shall go again the middle of this week to St. Alban's, where I will stay for ten days, and hope by that time you may be come back to Hampton Court."

R. and ansd. 13, 1700.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, May 11, Whitehall.—"I now send your Grace a warrant for Mr. Bland to be sworn Page of the Robes, with the Master of the Robes' letter; one for Mr. Latton to be sworn Master of the Beagles; one for a waterman whom Mr. Latton recommended; and a warrant for Mr. Vernon to be Surgeon in extraordinary, as Mr. Secretary desired. Mr. Compton, Gentleman Usher of the Privy Chamber, informed me today that your Grace had given him leave to part with his employment, provided he recommended a proper person to it, and desires me to acquaint you that the person he would surrender to is one Captain Wallis, at present one of the Grooms of the Privy Chamber, who has served in the Army and has a good character ; but he desires leave to quit his place of Groom to his brother, who is an officer in the Army.

“ I am credibly informed your Grace is to go Lord Lieutenant into Ireland, and as I am desirous of being always in your service, I humbly recommend myself to wait on you there, where I hope I might better serve you, because my acquaintance and interest lies [lie] most in that country. I beg your Grace will pardon my request if it be improper.”

Rd. and ansd. 13.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, May 14, Whitehall.—“ I forgot in my last to answer the complaint of my Lord Lexington’s having five rooms at Hampton Court. His lodgings consist of a sky-light passage room, a bed-chamber, and large closet, towards the little Court, which lie within one another, so that they could not be parted ; and my Lord was so little of the opinion of those gentlemen who complained, that he told me had no place to lodge a servant.

“ For want of other speedy conveyance I have sent by post Col. Culpepper’s sympathetic powder, with the direction how to take it, which I hope before this time your Grace will have no occasion for.

“ I have stayed till now in town to go through the Establishments with Mr. Hill, and today return to Hampton Court to receive your Grace’s commands.

[P.S.] “ I am now informed that Mr. Shore, the Serjeant Trumpet, died yesterday suddenly ; which is in your Grace’s disposal.”

Rd. and ansd. 16.

SAME to SAME.

1700, May 15, Hampton Court.—“ This morning my Lord Albemarle desired me to recommend in his name the bearer Mr. Shore, who is one of his Trumpets, to succeed his father as Serjeant Trumpet, if your Grace be not pre-engaged ; and withall desired me to acquaint you that the reason why he does not write himself is purely out of respect, because he would not press too much in such a matter, where perhaps your Grace may be already pre-engaged.”

Rd. and ansd. 16.

SAME to SAME.

1700, May 15, Hampton Court.—“ I could not forbear troubling your Grace so soon to acknowledge the satisfaction I had yesterday to find you were pleased to receive so favourably the offer of my service, and to return my humble thanks for it. I was afraid it might be thought too forward, but I had this to say in my excuse, that no consideration of profit moved me to it, but only the pleasure I proposed in serving you. I am heartily sorry your want of health should endanger that country's missing so great a good intended them, and which to my knowledge they have a long time wished for as the greatest mark of the King's favour.

"In my former letter I sent your Grace the characters of the two Wallis[es]; they are both of them, as well as I can inform myself, men of substance and good reputation, and therefore [I] have now upon your orders enclosed their warrants.

"I informed your Grace that the sympathetic powder I sent was Col. Culpepper's, but it seems he had none ready made, and my wife's mother sent me that, which was a present given her by Sir Tho. Higgins, who brought it with him from Venice."

Rd. and ansd. 18.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, May 17.—"As soon as I had received the honour of your Grace's letter by Mr. Shore, I sent the enclosed to London, and acquainted my Lord Albemarle that you had complied with his desire about Mr. Shore, for which I now send the warrant.

"I will take care to find out lodgings for my Lord Manchester as soon as the new buildings over the Queen's Guardroom are finished, which is all that is undisposed. I long mightily to hear of the success of the sympathetic powder."

GALWAY to SHREWSBURY.

"Car ie ne puis me persuader, que ceus qui m'ont fait comprendre dans le uote, pour exclure les estrangiers des conseils, soyent contents de me voir icy à la teste de l'Armeé, et ne trouuent les moyens de faire passer dans la premiere Session quelque chose de plus facheus pour moy, et peutestre pour beaucoup d'autres, et plus desagreable pour le Roy. Recommends Mr. May to be Shrewsbury's first Secretary, and an English gentlemen, brother of Sir John Bucknall, to be steward of his household. Understands that Shrewsbury's steward is too aged to follow him hither. Bucknall has served the writer in that capacity for three years.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, May 21, London.—“ I have been in the greatest concern in the world since the last account of your Grace's health, but have still some hopes your vitriol may have its effect, though it take more time. Though your Grace seems very unconcerned about your health, I am persuaded there are very few in England who don't think themselves nearly concerned in it. I long for a post to bring better news.”

Ansd. 25.

SAME to SAME.

1700, May 28, Hampton Court.—“ Yesterday I received your Grace's letter of the 25th as I was returning to Hampton Court, with Mrs. Lacy's petition enclosed. She complained to me before that the Players refused to obey the warrant; upon which I sent to Mr. Rich, who manages that playhouse, who told me they submitted to the order, but as there were two patents concerned in that house, they desired a short time might be allowed them till they could settle among themselves upon whom the charge was to light; which I could not make Mrs. Lacy understand, and was the occasion I suppose of her petition; but I have this day writ to Mr. Rich to press the payment, and that they might after settle their accompts among themselves.

“ The King I am informed goes to Windsor on Friday, only for one night. There is now standing in his great bedchamber the cloth embroidered bed, with tapestry hangings.

“ About ten days ago one told me he had two boxes directed to your Grace from my Lord Bellom[on]t, which I directed him to send to my house, and that as soon as I saw any of your servants they should be delivered to them, and last week, when I went to town, I found them there. As I remember upon one is writ ‘ A white beaver skin,’ and upon the other ‘ A dozen bottles of Barbados waters.’ I have since seen Mr. Gardiner, and desired he would take the care of them.

“ I showed the King the alterations Mr. Hill and I made in the Establishments. Those in the Treasury Chamber were for the most part agreeable to the first paper. The King changed some of them, and I have now brought them back fair written to be signed.

“ I now send your Grace a warrant for the stationer's bill for the Office. The weather begins to grow warmer, which I hope will help your Grace's recovery.”

Ansd June first.

THE DUKE OF BOLTON TO SHREWSBURY.

1700, May 30, Hackwood.—“ I had the honour of your Grace’s of 25th. . . . As to what you are pleased to complain on as a distrust, . . . I do confess that, after what you was pleased to say to me, I was struck with admiration when the news, on the Wednesday after I had the honour to see you, was told me that your going for Ireland was determined. . . . But this false report, as you call it, was told to me by my Lord Sunderland (who I did then suppose was agreed on to break it to me), and others that my Lord Albemarle had told it to, did tell me of it. . . . I did think that, after what you had been so kind to say to me (that next to the usage I had from his Majesty) that you had not used me with that friendship that I did hope. . . . Nobody in England made a doubt of it.

“ As to what you are pleased to say that this report might hinder my prosecuting my pretensions, [it] is certainly so, for I never thought of it afterwards, and did take my resolution of retiring for good and all into the country, which I have done, and did acquaint his Majesty with my intentions, when I had the honour to take my leave on him. And from the usage I have received, after having been twelve years in his service, after my coming over with him, during all which time I have served him with zeal and integrity, and with some good success, which, to be plain, makes me believe that though my Lord Nottingham is removed, that I am so unfortunate that the only thing that remains of him is the impressions that he made in the King of me, to my disadvantage.

“ I am going westward on Monday, and shall not return for six weeks, so hope your coming into this country won’t be till then, that I may then receive the honour you intend me. I am very sorry that your ill health occasions your absenting from Hampton Court.”

R. and ansd. June 3d.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, June 1, London.—“ Dr. Briggs, who formerly petitioned your Grace to come in Physician in Ordinary, and I think is in good esteem, desired me to send the enclosed remedy to cure your spitting blood, with his direction how to take it, which he says he has often given with success. I venture to send it because I believe ’tis at least very innocent.

“ I send your Grace a warrant for furniture for the King’s yacht, by his order. One for demanding five pieces of tapestry formerly lent to Madam Mazareen, which the man who has them in keeping says he will deliver upon such an order. Two for riding wages into Holland for a Robegoer, and two Grooms of the Chamber, who forgot to demand them with the rest.

“ Mr. Squire, one of the Sewers of the Chamber, to whom your Grace gave leave last winter to part with his place, has now brought the man, with a certificate of his qualification. I have therefore sent a warrant for him with the certificate.

“ Mr. Barry, one of the Quarter Waiters, brought one Mons. Farcy to me with the enclosed from my Lord Galway, desiring your Grace’s leave to surrender his place to him. He says my Lord has writ to your Grace about it.

“ Upon my coming to town, I find Mr. Neale dead of a fever, which frees Mr. Rowly from further trouble, Sir John Garrott’s patent being for Neal’s life. I long mightily to hear of your Grace’s recovery.”

Rd. and ansd. 3d.

SOMERS to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, June 4.—“ I have been several times writing to your Grace upon the subject Mr. Montague mentioned to me by your order, and which you after took notice of in a letter to him, which you allowed him to communicate to me. But whenever I went about it I found I should say too much or too little, and therefore I resolved to reserve my thoughts of that affair till I had the honour to see your Grace. That is a happiness I shall be much overjoyed at, when a meeting may be without the danger of drawing your Grace into a suspicion of Caballing, but when that time will come I do not foresee. For though I neither do nor ever will meddle with public affairs, nor have the least resentment imaginable against any persons who may be imagined to have been most active in getting me displaced, yet I find it is very hard to convince men that it is so. Time I hope will do it; and as I have had patience to go through with the persecution of the last session, so I will prepare myself as well as I can for what is yet to come. I am sensibly concerned at the continuance of your Grace’s ill health, which I think is a public misfortune. I hope you will yet allow me the honour of being amongst the number of those who are really and faithfully your servants.”

Ansd. 8th.

JO. METHUEN to SHREWSBURY.

1700, June 6, London.—“ Your Grace’s letter came hither in my absence, as likewise the enclosed from my Lord Gallway, who is now in the same affliction with me, to understand your Grace hath parted with all thoughts of going to Ireland. I am now commanded by the King to go immediately, which I do somewhat unwillingly, and would have declined it on the foresight of the difficulties I shall find there, and the probability of another Government, under which I cannot hope to live as I should have done.” . . .

Rd. 12. Ansd. 14.

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, June 13, Whitehall.—“ I could not answer your Grace’s of the 3rd so soon as I ought, by reason of my going very often between this and Hampton Court. There has [have] been but two field beds out of use since my time, and both of them Mr. Vice-Chamberlain has put up in his lodgings. The cast bed in the Yacht Captain Sanderson keeps to set up when he carries persons of quality, to save the King's bed, and being not six foot high, I believe it can't be of any service.

"I now send your Grace the following warrants:—One for a purse for the Lord Privy Seal, which is yearly allowed. One for a messenger's escutcheon for him who was last sworn in. One for the allowance to the Keeper of the Orchard gate of Whitehall, which I suppose is hereafter to determine. Mr. Farey's warrant to be Quarter Waiter. One for a jewel of 1,000*l.* to the Emperor's Envoy, who is recalled. One for the Black Rod's allowance for his attendance on the House of Peers. For the Clockmaker's bill for looking after the clocks, which I suppose hereafter is also to cease.

"Dr. Wiggan, one of the Chaplains, being dead, the Archbishop of Cantorbury recommends Mr. Moss, the lecturer of St. James' church, in case your Grace be not otherwise provided.

"The certificate of the gentleman who comes in Mr. Squire's room was forgot in making up the last packet; 'tis under the hands of three or four Justices of the Peace of his county, which I will be sure to lay up with other papers.

"Since your Grace gets strength by the weather, I hope by this time it has also stopped your spitting blood, and that the long good season which we are to expect will perfectly confirm it."

SIR J. STANLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1700, June 15, Whitehall.—"Yesterday morning Dr. Staggins, master of the Instrumental Music, died, which I don't doubt your Grace will have earlier notice of, from solicitors for his place.

"I have now sent a warrant for covering two damask chairs in the King's closet at Kensington that are worn out.

"There were some goods provided by Mr. Neale before his death for my Lord Albemarle's lodgings at Kensington, which are not within the Groom Porter's contract, and are certified to have been brought in by the then deputy housekeeper. Mr. Neal's deputy therefore desires to have a warrant for providing them, which should have been sooner, and that the warrant may be antedated."

SOMERS to [SHREWSBURY].

[1701,] Aug. 24, Lond[on].—"Within some few days after I had received the honour of your Grace's letter of the 17th of June, one Mr. Hiccocks, a Worcestershire man and a considerable trader in London, brought a son of his, who had then left the University, to see me. His chief design was to get me to send a letter by him, which might give him a pretence of waiting upon your Grace at Geneva, whither he said he was directly going in his way to Italy; his design being to enter upon his travels by studying the antiquities to be found in that country, to which learning his head was turned. I was ready to lay hold of the opportunity, and wrote by him somewhat more freely than I should have thought fit to have done by the post.

“Yesterday Mr. Hiccocks came to see me again in great desolation, telling me that some gentlemen whom his son met with in Holland, led him from his first designs, and had carried him through most towns in Germany, and that by the last post he had news that he lay at the point of death at Auspurg. He likewise said he doubted your (sic) letter might not be come to your hands. This caused me to determine of giving you the trouble of these lines, that you might not think me capable of letting your favour remain so long unacknowledged, or of such a delay in giving my humble thanks for the kind concern you were pleased to express for me. I also let my Lord Halifax and my Lord Orford know how very obligingly you interested yourself for them.

“I am sorry your health is in such a state as to make it necessary for you to continue in a warmer climate. If you had not such an unhappy reason for your absence, I should commend your wisdom in choosing, and bless your good fortune, which had given you liberty to choose to live remote from such a country as ours. I know not what fortune this letter is to run, and therefore I shall say no more than that my best wishes attend you.”

Ansd. Sept. 14, 1701.

1703, April [7-]18.—“Extract of my Memorial to the Emperor.

“Vostra Maestà Cesarea si compiacerà di ricordarsi, che il sottoscritto Ministro di sua Maestà Britannica aveva l'onore di notificare à vostra Maestà Cesarea, in una sua udienda delli nuove del decorso Gennaro, l'intentione della Regina di far passare una Flotta, unitamente colli Signori Stati Generali, nel Mare Mediterraneo, la quale si dovessi trovare dalla parte di Napoli verso la fine del mese di Maggio, per secondare durante due mesi intieri li disegni della vostra Augustissima Casa sopra quel Regno. Nel medesimo tempo il sudetto Ministro-supplicava instantissimamente la vostra Sacra Maestà di fare il suo possibile per profittare di questa generosa disposizione dei suoi Colligati, con mettere la sua armata in Italia in un stato d'agire offensivamente nel Milanese, e di potere altresì somministrare un staccamento per Napoli; in mancanza di che le Potenze Marittime non farebbero che una spesa inutile, à gran pregiudicio dei loro affari altrove, e della reputatione delle loro armi; e dopo un sconcerto di questa importanza non si troverebbero più in stato di fare un altro sforzo simile per l'interessi dell' Augustissima Casa.

“In seguito di queste rimostranze piacque à vostra Maestà Cesarea di comunicare li 16 del Febraro passato per il suo Presidente di Guerra alli sudetti due Ministri il stato delle truppe che vostra Maestà pretendeva havere in Italia per l'imminente campagna; il qual stato parve à prima vista magnifico sopra il foglio, mà doppo l'essersi ben' esaminato, vi è luogo di dubitare che esso non corrisponderà nullamente all'operationi che si érano meditate; poiche si è differito si longo tempo à distribuire il denaro per la rimonta, che la cavalleria non potrebbe esser completa per il tempo prefisso; e che l'infanteria sarebbe si debole per mancanza di reclute (la miglior parte delle quali cosi bene che degli aiduchi resta distratta ò impegnata contro Baviera, ò aspettando l'essito di questa diversione), che vi sarà poco fondamento à fare per una guerra offensiva in Lombardia, e tanto meno soprà un staccamento per Napoli, nella stagione propria in cui la Flotta potrebbe esser di qualche utilità.

“Non ostante queste apparenze contrarie, e le difficoltà innumerabili che si rincontrano facendo passare si lontano una Flotta Reale, nella quale consiste, e la sicurezza, e la gloria delle Potenze Maritime; sua Maestà Britannica persiste nella sua grande resolutione di prestare la mano a vostra Maestà Cesarea di maniera tale ch'ella medesima haveva desiderata; di che, il sotto scritto Ministro di sua Maestà Britannica dà di nuovo parte per il presente memoriale alla Sacra Maestà vostra; e si come la Flotta stà pronta a partir ai primi giorni, egli crede esser del suo obbligo il più essenziale di supplicare humilissimamente vostra Maestà Cesarea di riguardare questo ufficio colla sua più matura riflessione, e di pigliare le sue giuste misure di sorte che li Colligati non habbino motivo di rimproverarsi d'haver fatto un passo si avanzato in visto di tutto il mondo, senza poter tirare il frutto che si dovrebbe prometttersene. Vostra Maestà Imp<sup>le</sup> colla sua più alta prudenza giudicherà quali potrebbero essere le conseguenze d'una disgratia si fatale; e per prevenire ch'ella non arrivi, ella non mancherà d'impiegare le sue più risolte cure tanto nel combinare l'interessi politici, quanto nel concettare le operationi Militari avanti che il Principe Eugenio se ne ritorni in Italia, à fine che tutte le parti che devono fare girare questa gran machina per fare avanzare li disegni formati sopra Napoli e Sicilia siano pronti, e regolati per prendere è (sic) moti giusti verso il tempo che la Flotta potrebbe comparire nelle loro vicinanze, per fare il colpo con un successo che non possi già mai mancare; poiche un debole tentativo che si facci sopra i due Regni, oltre li altri inconvenienti di sopra mentionati, non servirebbero che per sacrificare li più fedeli, e appassionati adherenti alla vostra Augustissima Casa, e per affermare per sempre l'usurpatione fattavi dai vostri nemici.”

G[EORGE] STEPNEY to SHIREWSBURY.

1703, May [1-]12, Vienna.—“I am extremely sensible of the honour you do me in your letter of the 14th past, by allowing me to pay you my duty in this way, which I should have done sooner if I had known it might be acceptable. I shall not trouble your Grace with ordinary occurrences, which the prints which [will] sufficiently relate.

“The letters we had from Lisbon of the 20th of March, n.s., made us hope Count Wallestein would be the next messenger we should have with the Treaty cut and dried, but last night the Emperor had notice by letters from him of the 5th April, n.s., that upon the news of Kehl and Schärding the K[ing] of Port[ugal] was grown more difficult, and had started new pretensions, which Chancellor Methwyn and M. Schonenberg could not comply with. However, we believe those obstacles will be surmounted sooner than a point I am ordered to solicit—‘that the A[rch] D[uke] be sent towards Sp[ain] and Port[ugal]’—which the K[ing] of Port[ugal] lays down as a fundamental, though it cannot reasonably be expected this Court should take those resolutions before we have gained one foot of ground in Spain. Besides, the K[ing] of the Rom[ans] has yet no son, and our women doubt if the Q[ueen] will ever bear more. Add to this, that Italy is the first view, for want whereof the Partition was rejected, for the sake whereof our present alliance was concluded; and our partiality that way is so great that I dare answer with my life we shall never bring these people seriously to think of Spain before we are masters of Nap[les] and Sic[ily].

“To second those designs, 20 Engl[ish] men-of-war and 12 Dutch will be in y[ou]r seas within these six weeks, and might have been sooner if the Dutch had been as early with their preparations as they promised. Your Grace, by the present posture of the Imp[eria]l army in Lombardy, will judge if the Emperor be likely to second our Fleet with a detachment proportionable to the great undertaking. However, we seem resolved to make the attempt, and I hear Sir Cloudesly [Shovel] will have the command. 1,800 foot from Hungary and 1,200 Croates will be embarked on the coast of Istria to attack the Calf of the Leg somewhere about Pescara and Malfredonia, to be sustained by a body of horse from Prince Eugene’s army, and I believe he himself will direct this operation, while C[oun]t Staremberg keeps upon the defensive. At the same time our main Fleet may make a flourish before Naples, Gaeta, &c., to try how y[ou]r neighbourhood stands affected. If those people are really for this family, as is reported, they will have an opportunity fair enough to shake off their yoke; but if they are satisfied to continue as they are, no force in the world can compel them to a change. This is the scheme which in confidence I tell your Grace beforehand, that you may judge hereafter how far we are from the mark, or see with satisfaction another revolution almost as wonderful as that wherein your Grace had so eminent a share.

“We hope the D[uke] of Sav[oy] will still show France the same slippery trick he did the Allies towards the end of [the] last war. Count Avers[perg], I believe, will be sent to conclude with him, the same who was envoy in England. If that project succeeds, it may serve to set (sic) us something as to what we suffer by the defection of Bavaria.

“All our attempts on that Prince, both by fair and foul means, have been awk[w]ard and ineffectual. The Marq[uis] of Baden put us in a fright, by his letters of the 2nd inst., as if Villars had forced his way into the Black-forest, and could not fail to join Bavaria; but by our letters of the 4th we do not find the junction was then made, though I do not see what can hinder it, or save the Empire, unless the D[uke] of Ma[r]lborough approves the Project that has been recommended from hence, and turns his force towards Treves and Thionville, which countries are quite drained to supply the Army on the Upper Rhine.

“Bonn was invested on the 30th past; the trenches were opened on the 3rd inst. Two attacks are formed on the town (—≡— on the corners towards the Rhine,  $\square$ ), and a third on a fort over against it, by which Lt.-Gen. Fagel begins, and Coehern promises to take it in four days; after which it is not expected the town should hold out ten days more, for the artillery brought against it is most terrible.

“We have nothing new in our last letters from London, except that the Earl of Winchelsea and Lord Paget arrived safe on the 12th April, o.s., while their convoy was engaged with a French squadron; how they got off we have not yet heard.

“Here we begin to believe the Pope cannot hold out long. It will be lucky if our Fleet be in the neighbourhood about the time of a vacancy; otherwise an union between the Spanish and French factions will be much too hard for the little interest the Emperor has now at Rome.

“P.S. As I was about to close my other paper, I have received from your Grace the honour of a second letter of the 28th past, wherein you are pleased to recommend to me Count Mattei’s pretension, in such an obliging manner that engages me to serve him to the best of my power, though pensions are very hard to be obtained here, I mean the payments of them, for as to grants and promises, we are very lavish of them. As a new argument in his behalf I intend to suggest that his knowledge and interest on that coast may be of use to us in the design above-mentioned; and it may really be so for aught I know, though that notion would hardly have come into my head but from a desire I have to serve him upon other accounts. This day se’nnight I shall acquaint your Grace how I succeed.

“The scandalous poetry I receive from London will be laid before your Grace by Mr. Montagu, who I believe will soon be weary of earthquakes, vails, antiquities, and architecture, if I know anything of his constitution.”

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, May [8-]19, Vienna.—“By last post I sent you all the news we had then, both what actually was, and what was likely to come to pass. Those hopes still continue, both as to Nap[les] and Sav[oy], but your Grace will easily judge of what importance it is that those designs should not be made public till the bomb is ready to burst.

“I have lodged Count Mattei’s first petition with Count Caunitz, whose business it is to appoint all public ministers; and have given a copy thereof to Count Buccelini, the Chancellor of the Court, whose care it is to make distributions and payments of such sort of pensions. Between them I do not much question but the thing may be done, and the rather since his second memorial, which I have this minute received with the honour of your letter of the 5th instant, shows us a means of doing him good without multiplying expense to the Emperor, who is not much in a condition of making largesses at this time.

“The Germans are mistaken in the news they tell you of Portugal, and particularly if they make me the author of it. It is true all our letters of the 20-9th (sic) of March from Lisbon, and all our other correspondencies from England and Holland, gave such hopes of that matter being ripe for a conclusion, that we hourly expected either Count Wall[estein] or his secretary with the work signed. But yesterday I received notice from Mr. Secretary [Sir C. Hedges] that all that business is in the dark still, as the person always is who has had the management of it. He was returned to England without the advice of Count Wall[estein] and Schönenergh, and contrary to the opinion and desire of the K[ing] of P[ortugal] and his chief Ministers, and the reasons he alleges for his so doing are mean and trivial. A man of less appearance of gravity and sense might have made a better hand of that whole affair; and still I hope it may be retrieved, for the points on which he broke off and departed abruptly, are not very material.

“The fort Bourgogne over against Bonn was taken in the night between the 9th and 10th inst.; I think there were found in it but an hundred men, who were put to the sword, except three or four. The rest of the garrison made their escape [a]cross the Rhine, and got into Bonn before the attack.

“The news we have from the Swartz-Wald is very confused, nor can we yet say positively where the French are, if they be joined with Bavaria or not, or what they intend to do next.

“The E[arl] of Huntingdon arrived here last night, and I hear intends for Turkey. My private letters tell me my Lady Lexington is dead, after having long held out a painful distemper of a cancer in her breast.”

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, June [12-]23, Vienna.—“Your Grace’s letter of the 2nd inst. came in so late that I could not acknowledge it by that post, and now I am likewise to return my dutiful thanks for your letter of the 9th that came in today.

“We have no news of Count Aversperg since he left us, but we hope the best; the K[ing] of Portugal may be a good example for him. The print will give your Grace a tolerable account of that matter; at least, the articles are not very different. I am hard at work to bring the main art[icle] of the A[rch]duke to bear, but I am to struggle with a very perverse people, who will not understand or pursue their right interest. By next post I may be able to tell your Grace how far I have succeeded in my solicitations. Naples serves us as an amusement, and we bite at a shadow, and so may lose the substance.

“Your Grace will see by the extract of a memorial I presented above two months ago, I had the honour to be of your opinion that a feeble endeavour would spoil all; and now we may add, if we begin at the wrong end and fail there, it may ruin our game even in Spain, and make that enterprise difficult, if not impracticable, which, as things now are, appears very likely to succeed.

“I have no news of the Fleet designed for the Mediterranean. Sir George Rooke is near Ussbant, yet our fleet of merchantmen from Portugal has been violently attacked by five French men-of-war (the Dutch convoy was equal in number, but not in force); and we cannot tell what is become of our Treaty maker, C[ount] Wallestein, who was with that fleet.

“The Duke of Cereresi’s barbarity, and the virtue of Maratti’s daughter, will be as great an instance of Roman History as Lucretia and the Marquise d’Obizzi; such examples are very extraordinary in their kind.

“The couple your Grace enquires after is not less curious. The lady was daughter to one Heidechamp, a sort of Cheffins to the late El[ecto]r of Brandenb[urg]; that is valet, pimp, and what not? In recompence for these services the Elector let him grow as rich as he could per fas et nefas, and he did not neglect the means, but left a plentiful fortune to his children, and a large share to the daughter, who married one of the family of Heyden, well known in the country of Cleves, who soon left her a widow; and not long after Ferdinando made his appearance at Berlin, and what with his voice (for he had then a very good one) and the graceful behaviour he had on the stage, the lady took an odd fancy to the capon, and run out her fortune (which was above 100,000 dollars) to maintain him in his extravagance and play, and ever since they have lived together like man and wife; a story proper for romance; and I believe they have little else to subsist on at present but the merits of her being brought over to the Church. I have known both these thirteen years in their different scenes. She does not want for wit, but the party she chose was too evident a proof her judgment was not as it ought to be.

“The apprehensions your Grace was in at the writing of your last letter, what would become of the Imperial army in Italy, will be pretty well over by Vendosme’s idle attempt and Albergotti’s defeat. I can scarce credit the fact that the French are suffered in Ancona, otherwise I should raise a great clamour against the Pope because of his partiality. The truth is, he is willing to act the part of him whose Vicegerent he would pass for, who is observed to be always on the strongest side. Perhaps our Fleet may bring him over to ours.

“The German paper will give Count Mattei more satisfaction than a letter from me in Italian. It is an extract of an order the Emp[ero]r signs this evening for adding 200 florins to his yearly pension. I am sorry I could screw it up no higher: it is as much as ever I could do in this time of general distress.”

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, June [19-]30, Vienna.—“ I received this afternoon your Grace’s letter of the 16th, and have sent forward a roll I received from Mr. Broughton, by Count Hadtsfeldt, who returns by post to Dusseldorp, and from thence will give it a cart for the Hague. The post would not undertake it, but I hope the way I have sent it is more safe and expeditious.

“ Our letters from England of the 4th give no certain news of the Dutch being arrived. All their measures have been very slow, and we have no notice of Antwerp or Huy being yet attacked.

“ The Secretaries [the Earl of Nottingham and Sir Charles Hedges] call constantly upon me that I take care Buccari be fortified and provisions ready; and were it not for those warnings, I should scarce believe there was any such thing intended as a fleet in those parts, for the season is far spent. Perhaps this paper may be of use to Sir Cloudesly. I leave it to your Grace’s disposal, who will be at hand to send it to him, for I have not the happiness to be known to him. At least it may afford your Grace some small entertainment, and then I have one end I propose by it.

“ Two days ago our Ministers met and examined our Portugal affairs. Their report will be made on the 3rd or 4th of next month, and perhaps by that time I may tell your Grace how I have succeeded in the article of the A[rch] D[uke]; appearances are better than I thought.”

SIR L. BLACKWELL TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, [June 22-] July 3, Florence.—“ Most humble thanks are due for the honour of your Grace’s 30 ultimo, being glad those cases by Marquis Guadagni’s ship were at last delivered.

“ I do not yet hear that Sir Clously Shovell is departed, but my Lord Nottingham under the 21 May writes me (by the Queen’s order) that her Majesty had ordered Sir Clously with a squadron of men-of-war for the Mediterranean, but mentions not how many ships, or whether they will come so high as this coast.

“ Mons. D’Ayroll (secretary to Mr. Stanhope) writes me, under the 8 ult., from the Hague, that a courier was arrived there from England with news that the Treaty with Portugal was signed, but I have no letter this week from Mr. Warre, so must attend the confirmation, though I think ’tis not to be doubted.

“ Letters from Tollon of the 25 ult. say another squadron of frigates were arrived from Port Lewis, being eight men-of-war under command of Mons. de la Viletta, who had taken four prizes in his passage; that now they can make a fleet of near forty sail; our prisoners were kept at bread and water, but the Dutch were better treated, and the mariners permitted to return for Holland by land with passes, and six livres each. The letters add that the Emperor's Ambassador had the City for his prison, and was much respected.

"No news this week from the Sevenses. The Aragonese and Catalans have demanded that their privileges be confirmed, and are ripe for a rebellion.

"I have advice from Schaffouse in Swiſerland that General Stirum was so reinforced as not to value Marshal Villars, and that there were some misunderstandings 'twixt him and the Duke of Bavaria. At Legorne is arrived a great Venetian in 44 days from London, and a small English ship from Tituan.

"The Great Duke is designed to pass 15 days in Campagna, at a villa of Abbate Gondi's, called St. Cresce, twelve miles off, where they have discovered new devotions, &c."

SOMERS to [SHREWSBURY].

1703, June 25.—"The things sent in the Leghorn ship have been safely delivered. My Lord Carbury has his alphabet, and is so well pleased with it that he says he is endeavouring to have it put into English. The prints you chose are very fine, and I shall not be a little proud of a room where I am setting them up. I am to return a thousand thanks for your being so good to remember I once mentioned a desire of being master of a good picture. It is with pleasure I observe the Duke of Shrewsbury to be so perfect a virtuoso as appears by the account given of the picture you have in your thoughts. That was a quality I think you did once a little despise.

"I am sure we all repine at the unhappy occasion you have had to complete your knowledge in things of that sort while you have been so long absent from England, where you might have done a great deal of good, if your health would have allowed your being there. I am truly glad to hear your bleeding is stopped without the help of astringent remedies. I think this is the first time it has done so, and look on it as a most hopeful indication that time and patience has [have] brought about in your case (as in many others of the same nature) what no medicines could do. I am willing to presage that the same good disposition and balsamic quality in your blood, which has effected this, will secure you against a relapse.

"I have still an appetite to a good picture, and, whatever you please to say, I can confidently rely upon your taste and judgment, but I ought to think a great while of parting with so much money. I think as well of Guido as of any master. The doubt I have of that particular picture is if [it] be not too large for my little house, as you are pleased to describe it. Whatever picture you may think fit to pitch upon, on the first intimation the money shall be certainly paid to your order here, or in what other manner you appoint, with all thankfulness. I should be out of countenance in putting your Grace to any trouble on an occasion so little necessary; but I persuade myself the considering a picture may be a kind of diversion.

“We entertain ourselves at present with the expectation of a new friendship with the Duke of Savoy. His constancy does not make it impossible. In the present circumstances such an alliance would be of great importance. We hear the Germans have done great things in Italy, considering their numbers. Prince Lewis of Baden is in a condition to face the Marshal Villars in Germany, and the Duke of Burgundy is not in a condition to attempt the siege of Landau. Coehorn has forced the lines in Flanders, and we expect great things to follow since my Lord Duke of Marlborough is superior in strength to Villeroy. These good appearances ought to put us in good humour.

“We are very quiet at present, as we use to be at this time of the year. The Parliament of Scotland has not acted according to expectation. Presbytery and the Revolution principles have the ascendant there at present, and there is reason to apprehend things may be carried too far, though it be pretended to be done only in order to force England to think of coming to a Union with them in good earnest. It is said the intention of having a Parliament in Ireland in August, under the new Lord Lieutenant [Duke of Ormond], is changed, and that it will not be held before the spring. Perhaps what has passed in Scotland may be the reason of this new resolution. I wish with all my heart Sir Cl. Shovell may go strong enough for the Mediterranean, as I do that he had been gone two months sooner. Your Grace will permit me to wish very fervently that you may hear no more of your bleeding, for then we shall certainly hear of your moving this way as soon as the heats are over.”

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, [June 26-] July 7, Vienna.—“I have the honour of your letter of the 23rd past. We suppose Count Wallestein is either at Toulon or Marseilles.

“I must beg leave to refer your Grace to the enclosed papers, will [which] will tell you the fatal history of Tyroll, and the means that are using here to hinder, if possible, that ill from spreading further. Prince Eugene exerts himself very well hitherto in his new office, and is not ill seconded by the new President of the Chamber, who has lately remitted 300,000 florins to the army in Lombardy, and is sending within a day or two 100,000 florins to Prince Louis.

“The newspapers from England say the Dutch squadron was arrived at Spithead on the 7th June, o.s., yet Mr. Secretary [Sir C. Hedges], in his letters to me of the 11th, says positively, ‘the Dutch squadron that is to join Sir Cloudesly is not yet come, though ours has waited for them so long.’ Your Grace’s reflexions on the danger of our Fleet in the Mediterranean are very judicious; I wish it well, and am no further concerned.

[P.S.] “The treaty with Portugal will be ratified and dispatched to Holland by a courier in a day or two. The A[rch]-duke goes to Lisbon, but we are not yet agreed which way.”

Ansd. 21 [July], 1703.

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, July [3-]14, Vienna.—“I received this morning the honour of your letter of the 30th past. Your Grace has been already acquainted with the dispatch I found for your draft of Whitehall, and I hope by next post Mr. Stanhope will give me notice of his having received it.

“The method used with Zaccadore’s valet, as well as the Marquis del Vasto’s slave, as [are] instances (like many more we have of that nature) that tortures are not always the right means of coming to truth.

“Yesterday I dispatched a courier to the Hague with the Emperor’s ratification of the Portugal Treaty; the 24th article concerning the A[rch]d[uke’s] going to Portugal, as well as the rest. I could not obtain a declaration I solicited as to the time and way, to be dispatched by the same courier, but am working on a memorial to be given in this evening, wherein I demand those points may be settled as the Queen proposed, viz. : that he be in Holland by the middle of August, so as to get to Lisbon by the beginning of September, the proper season for taking the field in that country. Some people are still for his going by Italy and trying our fortune in Naples en passant, without considering the fate of Tyrol, which proves we are more likely to lose what we have than make new conquests. But I must try if it be possible to remove these fond notions, and convince our Ministers that the way by Holland is the plain and natural road, unless they would expose the hopes of their family to an accident in the Mediterranean, like what Count Wall[estein] met with in the Ocean; besides, it is no jesting matter to pass the Straits at that time of year.

“The papers which accompany this will inform your Grace how sore a burthen the Dutch lie under. I wish they may be able to resist such shocks by sea and land. Mr. Obdam was too hasty both with his person and courier; sure there must be some loadstone that attracts towards Breda, for your Grace will remember a brigade of our friends made the best of their way thither after the battle of Landen, without looking behind them.

“I can say nothing of the D[uke] of Ma[r]lb[orough]’s motions; and you see the Prince of Baden is not so likely to attack the French as the present posture of our affairs seems to require.

“Mr. Secretary Hedges puts in a P.S. to his letter of the 15-26th June: ‘The Dutch ships are joined Sir Cl. Shovell, and my next may give you an account of their being sailed, if the wind prove favourable.’ I wish it may, but our delays may occasion the like reflections on us as used to be made on those who are observed to come to church only at the end of the mass, Qui tardè venit, diu noluit.”

[P.S.] “The Earl of Huntington talks of removing towards Venice some time next week.”

“MR. STEPNEY’S MEMORIAL to the EMPEROR.”

1703, July [3-]14, Vienna.—“Augustissimo Cesare,—Come hà piacciuto alla Sacra Cesarea Maestà vostra di ratificare il Trattato con Portogallo, il sottoscritto Inviato si trova obligato per ordine di sua Maestà la Regina della Gran Bretagna di rappresentare humilissamente alla Sacra Cesarea Maestà vostra la necessità che vi è di pensare senza perdita di tempo all’essecuzione del detto Trattato, e particolarmente per quello concerne l’Articolo 24<sup>o</sup>, il quale n’è la base, ed il fondamento.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, July [10-]21, Vienna.—“I received this morning your Grace’s letter of the 7th inst., and am to acquaint you, for your own private information, that I dispatched a courier yesterday for England with the Emperor’s answer to my late memorial. He promises the A[rch]duke shall be jogging from hence by the end of August, whereas I solicited for his being in Holland, to be embarked by the middle of the said month, in order to proceed to Portugal by the shortest and surest way, without ascertaining what way. I have orders to insist on Holland, and have represented the danger of the other way, as you see by that part of my memorial; but as long as these people have the least hopes of commissions towards Naples or Sicily, their view will be turned that way preferably to any other.

“Sir Lamb[er]t gives me the same advice your Grace had from him, of eight ships more being got into the Mediterranean.

I am apt to believe the number yet greater, from the newspaper I receive from the office ; surely there must be more than mere chance in so many of these odd accidents. By my last letters of the 25th past, o.s., Mr. Secretary tells me Sir Cloudesly was then detained at St. Helene's by contrary winds. After this rate, it would be well if those winds continued for a month or two longer, for I entirely am of your Grace's opinion that the enemy will be too powerful for us in the Mediterranean ; and by several observations I have made of our proceedings in England, I have had my reasons to doubt if we were really resolved to send a fleet into those seas.

"However, I expect here Capt. Halley tomorrow or next day, who is to give me better information of all these matters than I have had hitherto. I hear he left the Hague on the 7th inst., n.s. He is the same person who inspected the Emperor's ports at Istria about six months ago, and is now returning thither to see how far his directions have been followed for the better security and victualling any squadron that may be sent thither. I will not believe all this is an illusion. When I am convinced that our Fleet is sailed, and that anything is intended, I shall write to Count Lamberg as I promised, which I forbear during the uncertain state we are in, for I would not willingly lead him or any man else into an error by false informations. In the meantime your Grace will take an opportunity of letting him know the reason why he has not heard from me in so long a time.

"The last letter I had from C[oun]t Avers[perg] was from Bern of the 26th past. He hoped to be at his journey's end by the 30th. He travels in zigzag, like the children of Israel. Mr. Hill is named to second him at Turin, by which one would imagine the thing was sure.

"Duke Schomberg is appointed to command in Portugal. This Court would have preferred the Prince of Darmstadt (who is cousin-german to the Empress) ; but I am labouring to secure the supreme command to the Duke, who ought not to submit to any but the K[ing] of Port[ugal], the A[rch]d[uke], or the General the K[ing] of Port[ugal] shall appoint in his own country. The thing is highly reasonable, yet I shall have a struggle before I bring it about.

"The prints will give your Grace the best accounts of the late actions in Flanders ; I mean the loss the Dutch sustained in forcing the lines on the 27th of June, and General Schlangerberg's relation of the conflict at Eckeren on the 30th, which is of reputation to the Allies, but has cost the Dutch 2,000 of their best troops, among killed, wounded, and deserters. All those forces who were engaged are to be sent into garrison, being disabled for doing any further service this summer. I think I hinted to your Grace in my last how hard it lights upon the Dutch, and fear they will not hold out many such trials. My last letters from the Duke of Ma[r]lborough's camp are of the 5th inst. The right of the army was then at Tielen, and the left at Kastel. The French were retired within their lines between Lier and Antwerp. A council of war was to be held in two or three days at Bergopzoom, where the Duke intended to propose to the Dutch Deputies and Generals the attacking the lines, though the whole French army be behind. If the Dutch will venture it, and the Allies succeed, not only Antwerp but all the Spanish provinces may be ours at a blow. We have 100 battalions, and the French but 80.

“The Margraf of Baden still fronts the Maréchal de Villars, but is not likely to come to any action.

“I have nothing more to add but the satisfaction I have to find your Grace has been pleased to accept the little service I could do Count Mattei, and I beg your Grace to honour me with your further commands.”

SIR L. BLACKWELL to SHREWSBURY.

1703, July [13-]24, Florence.—“Per the honour of your Grace’s 21 current, am sorry to understand my last was not got to hand, which enclosed the Bern Gazette and other newspapers, wherein were some particulars from London and the Hague fresher than anything yet come to hand by way of Venice. I hope the miscarriage of my letters will not make your Grace conclude that I am wanting in my duty, for such advices as come to my knowledge have been, and shall be, every post most punctually communicated; and when your Grace receives not letters from me the fault shall be either in the postmaster’s negligence here, or costj, which I have often complained of, but to no purpose.

“I am still without letters from London via Venice, but by way of Bern have this day received the enclosed Gazette, &c.; and the article from Maestrich sufficiently contradicts what the French so positively affirmed, for though Marshal Boufflers had at first the advantage over Gen. Opdam (being much superior in force), yet Gen. Coehorn appearing routed the French, and I hope tomorrow’s letters from Vienna will give the confirmation.

“Letters from Madrid own that they had discovered that the K[ing] of Portugal firmed the League the 15 May, and that the K[ing] of France had ordered his Minister at Lisbon to make instance for a positive and immediate declaration on one side or the other.

“At Genua is arrived Capt. Prasca from Lisbon with 1,450 chests of sugar and 400,000 dollars in contantj; he touched at Cadiz, Mallaga, Allicant, and Barcellona, and says that at every place the people talk of a change, being all ripe for it, alleging that their grandees are despised, their trade lost, and the country in great misery, &c.

“The Count Toulouse was not arrived at Tollon 16 current, and I am positively assured that they cannot man their ships, twenty being the outside of what they have ready. The two gentlemen dispatched by this Court for Legorn are still there, and I believe may wait long enough if [they] expect the Count Toulouse's appearing there.

"At Legorn is arrived an English ship in 27 days from Bristol. The Captain says that Sir Clously Shovell was (at his departure) ready to sail, and that Admiral Alemond was arrived from Holland."

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, July [17-]28, Vienna.—"I have the honour of your letter of the 14th inst. Our Fleet is at last sailed, and the list your Grace finds of it is what I picked out of the Haerlam Gazette, which is sometimes my best author. There ought to have been two more; and upon notice her Majesty has had, that the French are very strong in those seas, eight more are ordered to be got ready on our side; but the Dutch can furnish for their proportion no more than thirteen in all.

"Our armies do nothing in Flanders, and I fear will not this summer. The forces are so near equal that we cannot attack the enemy in their lines; so the design on Antwerp is looked upon as quite defeated.

"Mr. Stanhope is recalled, and placed in the Custom-house, and young Sir Phil[ip] Meadows succeeds him at the Hague.

"Signor Guarini is a very good natured gentleman; I have known him for such these many years.

"Yesterday a secretary arrived from Count Lamberg, but I have not yet learnt what he brought from Rome; your Grace will know that best, and I suppose will have seen patents prepared for setting the Sicilians in a tumult. The author of the Description is gone with some hundreds of those prints. I have been desired to recommend him to Sir Cloudesly, which I have done; but I cannot think those matters ripe enough. Prince Eugene told me this morning he thought to be going towards Italy in a fortnight.

"A newspaper and a print will be sent your Grace with this letter by Mr. Broughton.

"I have been busy in cyphering and uncyphering all this day. Our fat friend at Turin has given me that work; his business goes on pretty well, and I fancy will succeed, after as many blunders and indiscretions as might have ruined any other man's negotiation.

[P.S.] "I cannot forbear sending a lampoon as it comes to me."

1703, [July 24-] Aug. 4, Vienna.—“This morning I received the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 20th past.

“I cannot think the King of Portugal will be better than his word, and declare war before the A[rch]d[uke] with the Fleet and subsidies be arrived.

“I was in hopes we should hear no more of Sir Cloudesly till he got into your neighbourhood, but it seems he was drove back again to Torbay on the 5-16th past. However, we are assured he put again to sea the day following, and must be satisfied with what Heaven pleases. The two ships which were omitted in the list I sent your Grace are the

“The Dutch fleet is likewise here enclosed. Besides these 40 ships of the line (and the eight more the Queen intends to send after them), there are six light frigates, one brigantine, six fire-ships, seven bomb-vessels, and three hospitals.

“I cannot tell what judgment to make of the affairs of Tirol. The enclosed papers will tell your Grace all we know of them; a little time must decide one way or another.

“I did not think your Ambassador could find it in his heart to be so angry. Count Martinitz would have been a man to make this Pope weep to some purpose.

“We are told here Naples and Sicily are ready to catch so soon as the Fleet arrives, but I scarce think those countries so ripe for a revolution as these people imagine.

“Our armies in Flanders are still unactive. The Countess of Salisbury is got to the Hague at last, and after so long absence seems impatient to be in England, and will take the packet boat rather than wait for the convoy.”

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

[1703, July 28-Aug. 8.]—“This morning I received your Grace’s letter of the 25th past, and am surprised to hear nothing of Sir Cloudesly, for I would have ventured a large wager that our last letters would have brought some tidings of the Fleet.

“I have not seen Count Caunitz since the Italian letters came in, and so know no more of the V——— affair. Perhaps the sending Mr. Vernon that way (if there be any truth in that report) may have been occasioned by what either your Grace or I may have writ into England on that subject. I still doubt the bottom is now sound, and have reason to mistrust all such projects after the infamous banter that the D[uke] of S[avoy] has put upon us. I never had any opinion of his honesty nor sincerity since the trick he played towards the close of [the] last war, but nothing can be more impudent and well as knavish than his laying down his own conditions, which were complied with in every part, and the minister he desired was sent only to sign with him (for all was agreed before he left us), and after all he starts aside without any reason for so doing. I have given notice to Mr. Hill that [he] may return as he came, and this may serve as a warning for the Court of Vienna not to be so credulous another time, and for the Ambassador not to be so confident in his reports, which were not prudent, whether the things had been so or not.

“Vassallo and Guissardi are fellows played of[f] like fire-ships; they are not chose for their prudence in management, but for their audacious manner of undertaking, and I objected against them when I heard the D[uke] of Moles and Prince of Lichtenstein intended to employ them. There are in the world vessels of dishonour as well as others, and the work they go upon is hanging-matter, which is not everybody's business. In that case we cannot pick and choose, and, as I look upon our attempts, those men are more proper for them than wiser people would be.

“As to the Baroness of Heyden, requiescat in pace, for a monastery and death are the last follies she or anybody else can be guilty of; and when I saw her last at Berlin, I foretold (without being a conjurer) that the scene of her life would end there, otherwise it had not been of a piece with the rest.

“I do not like this shifting the Declaration of departure from one day to another. Since the trick of Savoy, I grow to be of Coleman's opinion, that there is no faith in man, and it will be an ease to me to see the new King clear of this place. By last post I had leave to attend him in Holland, and then to pass to England. I propose to be back again by new year, and I presume your Grace will scarce be here sooner. If it should so happen, I beg you would be pleased to command my house, which the Ambassador will tell your Grace is a very convenient one, and I shall leave some servants here, and Mr. Whitworth likewise, who will [be] proud to attend your Grace. You will be pleased to direct your commands for me under cover to him, for I believe I may have left this place before I can receive an answer to this letter.”

Endorsed: Aug. 8, rd. 17.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Aug. [7-]18, Vienna.—“Your Grace's packet of the 28th past got not hither till the day after our post for the Hague and England was gone, so the packets to be forwarded lay here three days. But I received this morning the honour of your letter of the 4th inst., and that to Mr. de Fay went forward this evening.

“I have writ to C[ount] Lamberg, but not so much to his satisfaction as I could have wished. The Emperor grows more dilatory every day, and it is hard for any of his ministers to fix him in any sort of business. This irresolution is no ordinary mortification to our two new Presidents, and when you have assured the Ambassador how it fares with those who bear the sword and the purse, he ought to hear with less concern the seeming indifference Count Caunitz finds in the Emperor as to his proposal. I find I jumped right in my opinion by last post, that the negociation ought to be nursed where it was first brought to light, and by the same person; and no endeavours shall be wanting on my side towards bringing it about, if we could but persuade the Emperor to explain himself.

“In the other point of the Fleet I hope I have given him more satisfaction, having sent him a perfect list of it, and assurances that it has not appeared on our coast since the 21-9th July. Mr. Secretary has told Mr. J. (?) Hoffman in writing that those ships ‘shall stay as long as they can with convenience, and as the service requires, latter end of English September’; those are his words.

“I leave your Grace to tell him C[ount] Avers[perg] hopes to be here with his work done by the end of this month, but I scarce think we shall feel the effect before November.

“Our Dutch Deputies and Generals have made nothing on’t; our armies are marching towards the Meuse, for Huy or Limbourg, which is but mean game, after the hopes they had raised in us. Prince Louis is likewise unactive.

“The States have promised their fleets and forces shall be ready to sail for Portugal by the 12th of September; but I fear I shall not get the A[rch]d[uke] from Vienna before that time.

“I scribble this as hard as I can, and, if it be incoherent, am to beg your Grace’s excuse.”

Ansd. 8 Sept.

SIR L. BLACKWELL TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, Aug. [10-]21, Florence.—“This morning I received your Grace’s of the 18 current, with the enclosed for Sir Clously Shovell, which shall be forwarded by same conveyance where the Emperor’s messenger embarks, presuming a frigate will be sent into Legorn on purpose; otherwise I know not how he can with any security get to the Fleet. I heartily wish the design succeeds, but the person employed appears to be none of the wisest, though Count Guizzard is now joined him at Legorn, from Rome, and may govern the other. I have let them both know that spies are employed to discover their business, and that they cannot be too secret, but it seems the first has already told an English Captain that he has letters for Sir Clously. Many good designs are ruined by such sort of people, and I think the Germans are too forward in publishing their treaty with Savoy, &c.

“I was in hopes the Tirroll passage would have been free, but some advices in town say the Elector of Bavaria is returned into that county, upon notice that Duke de Vandome was advanced to meet him, [so] that we are very apprehensive of those affairs. I have letters from Count Staremberg to the 14 current, who says that old Prince Vaudemont was so intrenched that he could not advantageously attack him, so no action in Lombardy; and for four or five days past we have had such great rains, which must make them very uneasy in the field.

“The 17 current a Flushing privateer called the Flying Fame brought into Legorn two French prizes, one a great barque from Cons[tantinople], bound for Marse[i]lles, and the other an empty French ship bound from Mars[eilles] for Turkey, with a stock of ready money, which the captain carried away in his boat, being near the land when he first discovered the privateer.

“Same evening came into Legorne a French man-of-war from Mars[eilles] (with three merchant ships under her convoy bound for the Levant), who, in sight of the port, met a Genovese ship called the City of Genua, of 700 tons, coming from Smyrna, which he seized on pretence that she had English and Dutch effects aboard, and designs sending her to Tollon; she is computed worth near 400,000 [ducats].*

“The 16 current the Great Prince and Princess went to their country palace at Prattolino, where they design passing six weeks, having for their diversion a very fine Opera in music.

“The letters from Bern are not come forward this week, concluded to be stopped by the bad weather; so I have nothing fresh from either England or Holland to advise your Grace.

“From Genua I have in confidence from a very knowing person, that their Envoy at Madrid wrote to the Republic last post as followeth, viz. :—

“‘Qui le cose sono in grandissima confusione, et ad ogni momento si attende, che siano investite da più luoghi le Frontiere da Portaghesi, con sodisfatione della piu parte de’ Spagnuoli, chi apertamente si dichiarano contro il Governo Francese; anzi essendosi tenuto consiglio sopra un corriere, qui spedito dal Re X<sup>mo</sup>, con esibizione di 20<sup>mi</sup>. combattenti, fù spedito con la negatua, protestandosi, che da loro si difenderanno; ma questi sono sonniferi, perche è la minor cosa alla quale pensino, e solo si fundano che il Portaghesi è vicino, et il Francese è lontano, e prima che questi si mova, quello con gli aderenti del partito Austriaco aurranno tutto occupato, e vogliono in ogni modo l’ Arciduca in trono.’

“My friend adds that the Genovese envoy at Madrid is ‘di genio Francese, è partialissimo de’ Gallispani, per ciò si può dar credito alla sua confessione, benche contro genio dal cuore.’

“I return my humble thanks for the catalogue of books and list of ships. I will make your Grace’s compliment to the Great Duke; and am at (my friend) Mr. Hen. Guy’s desire to give your Grace his most humble service.

“Fresh letters from Tollon say the Count Tolouze would soon go to sea with thirty sail of ships, but this I suppose will depend upon what he hears of Sir Clously. The two gentlemen are still at Legorne.

“I am in a day or two to have a conference with the Secretary of State about Plowman’s business, and then I will demand audience of the Great Duke, to know his Highness’s resolution upon that matter, and the partialities practised at Legorn, which are unsufferable; but the scene ought soon to change.”

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, Aug. [14.]25, Vienna.—“I have the honour of your letter of the 11th inst., and received advice this day from Avers[perg] that he was to sign the 11th or 12th. I am sorry I hear no more of the affair with you. M. Hoffman writes from London that the E[arl] of Nottingham had given him some sort of hopes, which is a sign the Ambassador there gives in to those notions. I wish the Emperor were more attentive towards them, but hitherto we can get no answer, nor so much as an opportunity to explain the matter so as to have it duly examined.

“Upon what your Grace mentioned to me in one of your former letters of C[ount] Lamberg’s being likely to be recalled, I have sounded Count Caunitz if any such thing was in agitation, or any clergyman likely to relieve him. About six months ago people talked of Card[inal] Lamberg, but we hear no more of it, and I believe there are so [no] such thoughts. I went further by enquiring of C[ount] Caunitz if C[ount] Lamberg might not expect to be one of the ambassadors at a peace, especially since Italy was to have so great a share in it, and nobody knew the interest of the country better. He did not doubt but it would be so when that time came.

“Prince Louis is recovered, and has sent back Count Sigi[s]mond Lamberg, brother to the Ambassador, with his project how he intends to attack the French, whereof we expect the success daily.

“On the 23rd the Emperor declared the A[rch]d[uke] should go by Holland. I believe he will part on the 10th of next month, and be declared K[ing] two days before.

“The other paper will give your Grace the news of a revolution in Turkey. The last article may be kept secret from Don Livio, if he has not received it by some other hand.

“Mr. Broughton will forward to your Grace a journal of the commotions at Constantinople, which I beg may be communicated to Mr. Montague and Grugain, because of the acquaintance they have in those countries.

“We have nothing of moment either from England or the Netherlands.”

COUNT AVERSPERG TO STEPNEY.

1703, Aug. [14.]25.—“En reponse de vôtre lettre du 4<sup>e</sup> courant, je vous dirai en peu de mots que le Traité est rompu, une terreur panique a saisis le Duc de Savoye, et je n’ai jamais vu un homme qui a tellement perdu la tramontane tout d'un coup comme lui. Je vous prie d'écrire cet avis où cela conviendra, et comme j'espère de vous voir bientôt, je vous en dirai alors les particularités."

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, [Aug. 21.-]Sept. 1, Vienna.—"I return your Grace humble thanks for your letter of the 18th and for the Roman lampoon.

"I wish Count Lamberg had not been so confident and open with the treaty being concluded with Savoy; I had this evening notice from Av[ersperg] that He had not signed the 18th past. Proteus plays fast and loose with him. Mr. Hill was got to the Hague on the 21st, but I had stopt his proceeding further till we saw clearer into the matter; and I'm glad I did so, for the Duke would not have received him, and I wonder upon [what] grounds they were so hasty in naming him.

"Neither Count Caunitz nor I can prevail with the Emperor to explain himself as to the Venetian overture; I believe he has at bottom no opinion of the thing, or thinks his Ambassador did not rightly understand it, or he is carrying it on by some other hand, without Count Caunitz being privy to it. The good man loves to play underhand sometimes, and is nothing less than what people take him for, no Prince in Europe being less in the hands of his ministers. At present I know not one that has any power over him, and by turns he takes pleasure in mortifying every one of them. This I shall explain to your Grace one day when I have the honour of serving you here; I wish I knew about what time that might be, and I would contrive my matters accordingly. Mr. Secretary in his last letters gave me hopes his next would bring me leave to attend the A[rch]d[uke] to the water-side, and then to make a visit of six weeks to my friends in England, but I do not so absolutely depend upon those promises as to think them infallible. By this day sennight I shall know my destiny, and till then am very indifferent.

"I send your Grace a more perfect list than any of my former; it is what I received from one of the Admiralty.

"I was in hopes today's post from Italy would have brought news of their being within the Straits.

"Rear-Admiral Dilks has had a lucky hit on the coast of Normandy. Consul Broughton will send your Grace the print with the particulars."

[CAV.] CORIOLANO MONTEMAGNI TO SIR [L.] BLACKWELL.

1703, [Aug. 21.-]Sept. 1, Secretary's Office [Florence].—Replies to the latter's representations touching the regulations made as to the arrival and departure of the English, Dutch, and French ships at Leghorn; and touching the affair of Plowman, Rigby, and Shepheard.

Italian, 4 pp.

SIR L. BLACKWELL to CAV. MONTEMAGNI.

1703, [Aug. 28-]Sept. 8, Florence.—Expected a satisfactory reply from the Grand Duke to his last two memorials presented in the Queen's name, but the reply received persists in attempting to justify what has been done to the prejudice of her subjects. Discusses at great length the third Article of Neutrality, which has been broken by the Grand Duke's ministers. Certain French captains, although they were not ready to leave the port [of Leghorn], have been allowed to prevent the departure of several English and Dutch vessels which were ready to sail, to the prejudice of English navigation. As to the embarkation of mariners being the Queen's subjects, during the last war many mariners were embarked from time to time without hindrance. For example, more than ninety mariners were embarked at one time on an English merchant ship named the Barkley Castle, and more than forty at another time on the Charles. The same thing was permitted to the French, for when the English took three French men-of-war near Messina, and the chief of the English squadron sent to Leghorn all the mariners forming their crews, numbering many hundreds of men, the Consul Gibercourt sent them immediately to France without the least difficulty. Also during the last war a vessel named "la Velocité" (Swift?) was built, manned, and armed at Leghorn by order of the Admiralty of England. The demand now made, therefore, is not an innovation. The Queen will not be satisfied unless the Grand Duke punishes the ministers who have been the cause of these differences.

As to the affair of Messrs. Rigby, Shephard, and Plowman, if the Queen's just demands are not complied with, she will be obliged to take effective measures.

CAV. CORIOLANO MONTEMAGNI to SIR L. BLACKWELL

1703, Sept. [4-]15.—Replies to his letter of the 8th touching English and French ships in the port of Leghorn. The Grand Duke is bound to observe neutrality, and the Governor of Leghorn has used cannon indifferently, and only against vessels which do not observe the conventions. The same facilities will be accorded to the English nation as to other nations for the embarkation of their mariners. Does not understand how Messrs. Rigby and Shephard can be concerned in Plowman's affair.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Sept. [4-]15, Vienna.—"Yesterday the King of Spain went to Marien Zell; he will be back again here on the 17th, and his departure for Holland seems fixed for the 19th.

"The Pr[ince] of Baden got admission into Ausbourg on the 5th, and on the 7th obliged the Bavarians to abandon a fort they had, which guarded a bridge over the Lech, so that he is now master of that river likewise, and on the 8th had let loose some hundreds of Hussars, who are making wild work in the country of Bavaria.

“The Gr[and] Sig[no]r Mustafa is deposed and his brother Achmett set up in his stead. The Gr[and] Visir, who was formerly Reis Effendi, with several other chief officers of the Port[e], have been forced to fly, to secure themselves. One who was formerly Nissangi Pasha, whose name is likewise Achmett, is set up as Grand Visir.

“Mr. Oberg, who has been ten years here envoy from the House of Lunenburg, has taken his audiences of congé, and sets out for Hannover in two or three days.

“Our letters of the 1st instant from Rome and Leghorne bring no manner of news of the Fleet.

“Count Harrach, the Grand Maître, has declared in the Antechamber the Emperor’s pleasure that Count Gallash should succeed Count Wratislau as envoy to her Majesty.

[The foregoing is in a secretary’s hand on a separate leaf; the rest is in Stepney’s own hand.]

“This day’s post brought me no letter from your Grace, and when I enquired the other day if Count Caunitz had any new matter from Count Lamberg relating to the overtures, he assured me he had none. Before I leave this Court I will sound where that matter strikes, for ’tis pity it should miscarry for want of looking after. I may tell your Grace, for your own information, that the Turks, when they deposed their Gr[and] Sig[no]r, declared they would have war with the Christians, and I have reason to believe it will break out first towards the Morea. If so, the Republic will stand in greater need of an alliance with the Emperor than the Allies with them.

“I give your Grace the trouble of a long transcript of our ceremony here, it being a matter of consequence, and containing some particulars, which are not altogether unworthy your Grace’s curiosity.

“The new King’s road is not yet regulated, which puts me to uncertainties as to mine.

[P.S.] “Our letters from the Hague of the 4th say my Lord Duke [Marlborough] was resolved to attack the French lines near Leewe, though the States had given but an half kind of consent. I had no letters this day from Aversp[erg], so know not whether he has hit or missed.”

R. 26. Ansd. Oct. 6.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Sept. [11-]22, Vienna.—“I received this morning the honour of your letter of the 8th inst., and to my great uneasiness perceive my packet to your Grace of the 11th past has miscarried. I have writ to Mr. Broughton to know if he received any from me of that date, for I enclosed to him (as usually). But as near as I can remember, both he and Sir Lambert complained to me that, the post arriving late, the postmasters would not give out and forward the letters the same night, whence I suspect the Venetian Government had time to gut the Consul's packet, and take out a long letter I writ your Grace in answer to the overtures you were pleased to make me in yours of the 28th of July; and from thence I fear the Venetian State may have had cognisance of Sigr. Morosini's first proposal, and have ordered him to be more cautious; from whence may proceed that reservedness which your Grace says you have observed of late in C[ount] Lamberg.

"In that letter I remember I told your Grace C[ount] Caunitz[']s opinion and mine that C[ount] Berka was not a proper person to treat that matter at Venice; that our Ambassador here was suspected, on his (sic) account of his family, to be too much addicted to the French interest to be trusted with that negociation, and therefore the most natural way of carrying on was by Count Lamberg, where the first overture was made. I kept no copy of my letter, but I remember very well I expatiated upon that subject, and answered as distinctly as I could to every point of your Grace's letter; and still to prove that my letter must have been intercepted, I must assure your Grace I have not failed writing to you by every post, from the time your Grace first allowed me the honour to hold a correspondence with you. Their Government is nothing but trick from the beginning to the end, and I hope they will open this letter as well as my former, and be convinced under my own hand what a mean opinion I have of their honour and honesty. I suppose their curiosity proceeds from the approach of our Fleet, and they, imagining your Grace must certainly have the best light of what is designed, were willing to come at that knowledge by a base and indirect practice. I shall owe them a grudge as long as I live.

"But not to torment myself or abuse your Grace's patience in a matter that cannot now be retrieved, I must acquaint your Grace that when I had one stop yesterday in my travelling calèche, going to Ebersdorf to take my leave of the Emperor, I received English packets from both Secr[etaries] of the 26th and 27th, whereby I am ordered to stay here, to promote the negociations with S[avoy] and Venice. The former is still kept up by letters I received this morning from C[ount] Av[ersperg], but the Emperor himself has no opinion of the latter, as far as I could perceive by his discourse yesterday. However, he has promised to send instructions and powers to C[ount] Lamb[erg], which can do no harm, though they should have no effect. I had the honour of a letter from him by a staffette [courier] he sent hither on the 8th inst.; wherein I perceive he keeps that matter just alive, though the scent is but very cold. I suppose the sending his staffette was on account of S<sup>ta</sup> Croce's father, who was in trouble upon his son's fighting a duel. If your people were but acquainted with Fleet Street for one week, those accidents would not seem so wonderful to them.

"By next post I intend to write to Count Lamberg, for by that time I shall know if the Emperor and his ministers will concern themselves or not.

“The new King left us on the 19th, which I believe is sooner than your Grace imagined. I beg leave to refer you to the enclosed papers.”

Ansd. Oct. 6th.

SIR L. BLACKWELL to CAV. MONTEMAGNI.

1703, Sept. [11-]22, Florence.—Replies to his letter of the 8th. The English vessels entered the port of Leghorn in December and at the beginning of January, while the French vessels of war did not enter till the 28th Feb. The former, according to the third Article of the Neutrality, had the right to leave the port before the latter, and the ministers of his R.H. in preventing them from using this privilege have violated the article. As to the embarkation of mariners, it is contrary to custom for the consuls to ask permission of one another, as the English and Dutch have lately been compelled to do from the French consul at Leghorn. When Plowman was first imprisoned the Grand Duke's ministers seized 49 bales of merchandise belonging to Messrs. Rigby and Shepherd, and these have never been restored to them. The Queen cannot therefore be satisfied with mere arguments.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Sept. [18-]29, Vienna.—“I received this morning the honour of your letter of the 15th instant.

“The enclosed paper in French will tell your Grace how miserably our affairs are disposed in Hungary. The rebels are really 30,000 strong.

“In Turkey, inquisition is making after all those who had any share in the Treaty of Carlowitz. The late Gr[and] Vizier and Mauro Cordato (who were plenipotentiaries) are scampered; but one cause of the Mufti's disgrace was for dispensing with the law in allowing them to alienate such cities and provinces to the Christians; which are ill symptoms towards a rupture.

“Your Grace has judged right that I should not stir from hence. I had leave, and was prepared, but just when I was going to have my congé of the Emperor, I received fresh orders and parchment relating to the business of S[avoy], which however I believe will come to nothing, for the Duke will not yet come to, and the States General are resty, and not so willing to concur as her Majesty is.

“The truth is, they are already upon the full stretch, and though there is no appearance at present of my succeeding in what I am command[ed] to negotiate instead of Mr. Hill, I am likely to be tied here by the leg all winter, and hope to serve your Grace in your return, if you take this place in your way, as I trust you will.

“Abbé Scarlati I knew to be a mere charlatan in politics, and I have the vanity to think I may have a little contributed towards bringing him to his end, if the withdrawing the pension he had from the Emperor was any cause of it; for I proposed it to Count Caunitz several times, knowing that he did the Emperor more harm than service. No matter if his soul were in the old Nun's machine; by his breath one would have sworn his body had been there some years.

"I cannot believe the Fleet was on the coast of Algiers; their rendezvous was to be at Altea or Almeria Bay, on the Spanish coast.

"No mention has been made of Savona in any conditions for Savoy.

"I hear nothing more about the overtures between the two Ambassadors with you. However, I spoke to the Emperor the other day, and pressed him (by orders from England) to send full powers to C[ount] Lamb[erg]. He promised he would, but C[ount] Caunitz has been out of town ever since.

"I have desired Consul Broughton to make strict enquiry at the post for my letter of the 11th past. What I writ of the same date to Sir Lamb[er]t went right, and was sent to the post at the same time."

SIR CLOUDESLEY SHOVELL to the GRAND DUKE [OF TUSCANY].

1703, Sept. 26, o.s., from on board her Majesty of Great Britain's ship the Triumph, in Leghorne Road.—"Finding that Sir Lambert Blackwell, the Queen of Great Britain my Royal mistress's Minister at your most Serene Highness's Court, has not been able to obtain from your Highness anything more than delaying answers to her Majesty's just demands, her Majesty has been also pleased to command my acquainting your Highness that she expects immediate satisfaction and restitution be made to Mr. Plowman, and all other of her Majesty's subjects interested with him, for the goods that were violently taken from them in your Highness's dominions, and by the direction of some of your Highness's ministers, and reparation for all damages they have suffered by the arbitrary proceedings against them.

"I have further to remonstrate to your Highness the violent proceedings of the Governor of Leghorne against her Majesty's loyal subjects and Allies, contrary to the Law of Nations, and against all friendship and justice to be expected from a Prince in amity with us.

"First, several of her Majesty's subjects that had been made prisoners by the French, and others which were by accident left at the free port of Leghorne, have been by the Governor of that city refused and hindered from going aboard the ships of her Majesty's subjects or Allies, insomuch that several have been forced for want of bread to take into the enemies' service, and are lost to her Majesty's kingdoms. This authority of disposing her Majesty's subjects the Governor never had from her Majesty, nor, I hope, from your Highness. The French, our enemies, use her Majesty's subjects with more humanity, giving them leave either to return home, or giving them subsistence; but neither hath been given ever by the Governor of Leghorne.

“ Also, when ships of the English and Dutch nation have been ready to sail from Leghorne, and gave notice of their readiness, the Governor has detained them, alleging that a French ship must first sail which has not been in condition to depart; and signals have been made of seeing ships in the offin[g], in order to keep the ships of the Allies in port, when no ships have appeared. There are several other instances of the Governor [’s] notorious partiality to the French, and his ill usage of the English and Dutch.

“ Therefore I am commanded by her Majesty to require the Governor being removed from Leghorne, and that immediate reparation of all damages be made to Mr. Plowman and her Majesty’s subjects for the injuries done them; and also that it be signified to myself or Sir Lambert Blackwell, her Majesty’s Envoy at your Highness’s Court, that for the future her Majesty’s subjects shall meet with none of the treatments above expressed; and that free embarkation without reserve be granted to all her Majesty’s subjects in any of the ships of her subjects or Allies, for otherwise all her Majesty’s subjects that are put or left ashore in your Highness’s dominions are lost to her Majesty’s kingdoms.

“ I am further directed to acquaint your Highness that if these abuses be not redressed, some extraordinary measures will be taken in order to exact justice to be done to her Majesty’s subjects and Allies; and if immediate satisfaction be not made to these her Majesty’s just demands, upon further demanding it, will be added the charges of this Fleet, and any other charges her Majesty shall be at in exacting justice to be done to her Majesty’s honour and her injured subjects.”

THE GRAND DUKE OF TUSCANY to SIR C. SHOVELL, Admiral of the British Fleet.

1703, [Sept. 27-] Oct. 8, Florence.—Has received his letter. As to Plowman’s affair, has committed it to his Minister at London, who will justify his proceedings. Relies on the Queen’s justice and clemency, now confirmed to him in the Queen’s own words by the Marquis Rinuccini, his late Envoy extraordinary. Has instructed Francesco Terriesi, who was for a long time his Resident in England, to give information to Sir Cloudesley of what is being done in this matter, and to reply to the other points of the letter.

SIR C. SHOVELL to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Sept. 29, o.s., Triumph, in Leghorne Road.—“ I am honoured with two of your Grace’s letters. By the first you were pleased to send me the state of Sicilie, and the other was delivered me today by the Count Mateiz. I must humbly inform your Grace that it was the middle of July before we left England, and with much difficulty the Dutch were enticed to come so far up as Leghorne, where we could not get till the 19th inst. Their instructions bind them to be at home in their ports in Holland the 20th of Nov., o.s., and mine direct me not to remain longer within the Straits than some time in this month.

“I am of opinion that a Fleet in these parts would very much influence the kingdoms of Naples and Sicilie in favour of the Emperor, provided there be disciplined troops sufficient to mix with the people of the country to shew 'em how to keep their ground when an enemy approach, and learn 'em to stand when they see men killed. I have seen the experience of militia and mob, of which there is little difference, for neither of 'em will stand against disciplined troops, so that if we had been here two months sooner, and had the good fortune to reduce the Island of Sicilie to the Emperor's interest, 'tis plain to me, that as soon as ever we departed from them, without leaving any veteran troops, the French, with very little addition to their marines, might with their galleys have easily regained the whole Island.

“The contrary winds we met with after our coming into the Straits made our passage so long that we were obliged to look for water at Altea, a town in the kingdom of Valencia; and I cannot but observe to your Grace the singular affection the people declared to the House of Austria, and their odium to the French and the Duke of Anjou. The inhabitants of the place were extremely glad to see our Fleet there; the chief magistrates and clergy and several gentlemen of the country came aboard of me, and with expressions of joy and civility told us we were welcome to those parts. I promised them that if the country people gave us no disturbance, we would keep an exact discipline, and pay for what we had. They all promised we should have no disturbance, and that if the Governor should fire at us, they would send me his head. They seem to be unanimous for the House of Austria, and declared they don't believe that there are 100 men in the whole kingdom of Valencia that are for the Duke of Anjou's being their King.

“We are now ready to be gone, and wait only for the wind.”
Signed.

FRANCESCO TERRIESI, Proveditor Generale [at Leghorn], to SIR CLOUDESLEY SHOVELL.

[1703, Oct. 1?—“Since your Excellency wish[es] that I give you in writing what I promised to your Excellency by word of mouth from the Great Duke, my master, I let to (sic) your Excellency know that in the future free embarkation without reserve shall be granted in the port of Legorne, or any other port belonging to his most Serene Highness, to all her Majesty's subjects or Allies, provided they do not be privateers originally armed in his Highness's ports; and that the ships of her Majesty's subjects or Allies be permitted to depart from the port of Legorne or any other port belonging to his most Serene Highness within four and twenty hours after the[y] have given notice to the Governor of Legorne or the port where they are; and that no ships of your enemies be permitted to sail in four and twenty hours after the departure of the ships of her Majesty's subjects; provided also that both these articles be mutual with the French and Spaniards. And in case that both the nations that are in war should require in the same time, that that is come first in the port shall be preferred to the other, according to the third Article of Neutrality.

SIR CLOUDESLEY SHOVELL TO SIR L. BLACKWELL.

1703, Oct. 2-13, Triumph, in Legorne Road.—"The wind is now fair and I must be gone, and therefore have in a letter which I now send you, and which I pray you will deliver, renewed my instances to the Great Duke for immediate reparation and restitution to (sic) the injuries her Majesty's subjects have suffered in his Highness's dominions; and I desire you will again inform his Highness, that if her Majesty's just demands, which I have made to his Highness, are not effectually and immediately complied with, his Highness must expect that to the reparation now demanded will be added the charges of this Fleet, or any other charges her Majesty shall be at in exacting it. I have likewise sent you a letter in answer to that from the Proveditor Generale."

SIR C. SHOVELL TO THE GRAND DUKE.

1703, Oct. 2-13, H.M.S. Triumph, in Legorn's Road.—"I have received your most Serene Highness's letter of the 8th inst., n.s., by the hands of Sigre. Proveditor General Te[r]riesi, from which I am to acquaint your Highness that I find no effectual answer to the just demands I have made in the name of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, my Royal mistress. (Repeats them.) . . .

"Sigre. Proveditore General Te[r]riesi having agreed, and given me in writing under his hand, that a free embarkation shall for the future be granted without reserve to all the subjects of her Majesty, my mistress, in the ships of her Majesty's subjects or Allies, and that all ships or vessels of her Majesty's subjects or Allies for the future shall be granted to depart from Leghorne, or any other of your most Serene Highness's roads or ports, in four and twenty hours after notice given to the Governor of any of the aforesaid places, and that no ships or vessels of the enemies shall be suffered to sail after them within four and twenty hours after their departure, I am obliged to require that these Articles be immediately confirmed by your most Serene Highness to myself or Sir Lambert Blackwell, her Majesty of Great Britain my Royal mistress['s] Envoy at your most Serene Highness's Court.

“And if the demands mentioned in this or in my letter of the 26th ult. to your most Serene Highness be not immediately and effectually complied with, I am commanded by the Queen of Great Britain, my Royal mistress, to assure your most Serene Highness that the charges of this Fleet, or any other that shall be sent this way to force a compliance, will be added to the demands already made.”

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, Oct. [2-]13, Vienna.—“I am honoured with a letter from your Grace of the 21st September. The other post (we expected it this evening from Italy) is not yet arrived, but two days ago Count Berka sent a stafette from Venice with the good news that the Fleet was before Leghorne on the 19-30 past. What course they will steer next is what passes my understanding, and I wish this Court knew what use to make of the Fleet now they have it.

“Your Grace will have heard in what manner the D[uke] of Savoy has cut his fingers by paring his apple too finely. If he had gone roundly and honestly to work, and signed with us, our generals in Italy by intelligence with him might easily have secured his people; but he would neither trust Stahremberg nor his own generals, nor has he yet explained to the Emperor what he would be at; so he is entre l'enclume et le marteau, and after all his refined politics is likely to be the dupe of the matter, and pitied by nobody. It would be no great matter if the V[eretians?] were served after the same manner. They will be playing so long about the candle that 'tis probable they likewise may be burnt at last with all their wise appearances. I hear no more of the overtures, nor of the letter I had writ to your Grace on the 11th August on that subject, though strict enquiry is making at Venice to retrieve my packet to Broughton.”

Rd. No. 1st. Ansd. 3rd.

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, Oct. [9-]20, Vienna.—“On the 6th the Elector of Bavaria broke up with his army from before Augsburgh, and is since marched to Ulm, having left General Arco with the Bavarian forces and some French battalions near Dachau to cover his country from the incursions of the Imperialists, who have had good success in several little rencontres. General Styrum has now rallied his forces, and provided himself with a new train of artillery. Some days ago he sent Lt. Gen. Schuylenburgh with 4,000 Saxons towards Riedlingen, and [it] is to be wished this detachment may not fall into the Elector's hands.

"That against next year the dispositions everywhere may not be so deficient as the preparations for this campaign have been, Prince Eugene has procured orders to be given throughout the hereditary countries for furnishing 20,000 or 22,000 recruits to be in a readiness by the middle of February, and Lower Austria has raised the best part of their quota of 2,500 men, which are to be distributed among the four Imperial regiment[s] of foot now in Hungary, viz., Heister, Nehem, Thierheim, and the Grand Maître. 7 or 800 are already gone down the Danube to enter immediately into service towards suppressing the rebels.

"On the 14th Schlick's dragoons and the regiment of cuirassiers now belonging to Count La Tour came down in boats, and, after a day's refreshment in the suburbs of this city, were again embarked on the 16th, and will be on the 17th at Presburg. Count Schlick followed on the 18th to take upon him the command of all the forces gathering in Hungary. General Kyba was killed in the first onset he made on the 3,000 rebels near Segedin, otherwise very few of them would have escaped. General Forgatch has beat another party near Neytra.

[The foregoing is in a secretary's hand ; the rest is in Stepney's own hand.]

"This morning I received a packet from Sir Lamb[er]t of the 11th inst. by Count Lamberg's express from Leghorn, and could not but be concerned to find so honest a man as Sir Cloudesly sent so far to no purpose. It seems our fleets and armies are destined to take the air this summer, and nothing else. Your Grace will easily guess what a damp this news gives here and everywhere to those who wish well to the Austrian family. If the D[uke] of Savoy can save himself any other way than by being our Ally, he is a madman if he joins with us; and what temptation can the Venetians have after our Fleet's coming and disappearing in an instant? We shall certainly have a warm Parliament, who will inspect all these matters."

Ans'd. No. 10.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Oct. [16-]27, Vienna.—"I am to acknowledge the honour of your Grace's letter of the 6th, and likewise of the 13th, whereof the last came in this morning.

"I write by this post to C[ount] Lamberg in answer to a letter he writ me on the 8th of last month, whereby (as appears by the extract) he tells me a post was detained at Venice, and that happens to be the very post when my packet to your Grace of the 11th of August was either lost, or intercepted by that Government; which last I believe most likely. I tell the

Ambassador how unluckily that happened, for it is better he should know it from me than from your Grace, since he does not deserve to have any excuse made him if he is capable to imagine that your Grace could have failed in any part of the confidence he reposed in you.

“I was a little out of countenance at the first news we had of Sir Cloudesly’s quick return, but upon second thoughts I think it is very happy that he did not attempt anything towards N[aples] and S[icily], which would have proved a feu de paille, and we should have lost some friends which may do us more service next spring, when the Emperor will have a good army in Italy, and Prince Eugene at the head of it; besides, the diversion of Savoy will prove a very favourable circumstance, and we may then expect more success than I could imagine from the design on N[aples], according to the best informations I had of it.

“I now take the treaty with Savoy to be concluded, though it is not yet come hither. I suppose the Count has sent it about by Switzerland, for a safe conveyance.

“Of the overtures with V[enice] I have no opinion. I send your Grace a copy of what I have writ the Secretary this evening on that subject, which your Grace may explain to C[ount] Lamberg, if he comes to a right meaning, and again discourses with your Grace on that topic.

“The D[uke] of Ma[r]lb[orough] is at Dusseldorp with a letter du cachet to the K[ing] of Spain from her Majesty, and is to make the compliment. The King arrived there on the 16th. I believe he is now at Hounslerdike, for I do not hear either our ships are come for him, or that the Dutch are ready; though I was ordered to solicit he should be in Holland by August.”

[STEPNEY] to SECRETARY [HEDGES].

1703, Oct. [16-]27, Vienna.—“Now the conclusion with Savoy is no longer a mystery, I again sounded the Venetian Ambassador last night, if he thought the Republic might not follow the example by coming into the Alliance. I desired him to reflect, if H.R.H. were oppressed, the dominion of France would be continued from Dauphiné, through Savoy, Piedmont, and Milan, to the frontier of the Venetian State; or, on the other hand, if the scale of the war in Italy should change in favour of the Allies, as we had reason to hope it would by the acception of the Duke of Savoy to the League, it was now high time for the Venetians to speak, if ever they expected any share in the Duchy.

“The Ambassador argued the point with me in a familiar and friendly way, after I had assured him what I suggested was merely from myself, being neither by order from her Majesty nor at the desire of this Court; and he gave me the like assurances, that what he was about to tell me was his own private opinion, since it could not be presumed he could have received any instruction from the Senate on a subject which had never been proposed to him.

“After this preamble, he told me several difficulties he foresaw to obstruct his Republic from coming to an agreement with this Court; as first, the fear they have lest the French might revenge it upon them by exciting the Port[e], where they have great credit, to break with their State, and attack them in the Morea; whereas they are not in a condition to carry on a new war, having been exhausted by the two last, whereof one lasted 25 years and the other 15. Secondly, that they could not enter into hostility against France, without fitting out at least 30 ships of war for the security of their trade and islands; which would lie at stake, considering the French are all the year round in a condition to insult them by sea, whereas the English and Dutch Fleet[s] only peep into the Mediterranean at certain seasons, as it were by accident, and soon disappeared after the same manner. He particularly mentioned the island Corfu, where in case of war with France (he said) the Republic could not keep less than 3 or 4,000 men in garrison, that island being now become the head of their State, as it was the heart formerly, when they were masters of Candia. Thirdly, that they had no desire of enlarging their territory, being satisfied with the boundaries they had already. Fourthly, that the miserable state of the Imperial army, whereof they had been eye-witnesses in their neighbouring provinces, was no encouragement for them to covet such allies, who had neither money nor provisions, and consequently must needs prove very burdensome to their best friends. And fifthly, without weighing either the advantage or inconvenience of this alliance, he represented to me that it was not consistent with their honour and conscience to violate the treaty of amity they had with France without just reason or provocation, which had not been given to them hitherto. For whatever encroachments the French may have made at Dizenzano or other parts of their State, the Germans have treated them much worse, and with such an air of haughtiness as did not in the least agree with the methods which ought to have been observed towards gaining the friendship of their Government.

“He then proceeded to enumerate to me several causes of discontent which the Republic had received of late from this Court: That notwithstanding the Venetians by their share in the late war had diverted no less than 100,000 Turks from acting offensively against the Emperor in Hungary, yet when peace came to be made at Carlowitz, the Imperialists signed without them, and would not allow their Ambassador so much as seven days to send a courier to the Senate for their final determination in points which however were of no ordinary consequence. For this reason they ought to be cautious not to enter into a war, since they know not how to get out of it, or in what manner they may be left in the lurch. That immediately after the Peace was concluded, the Imperialists on their frontier took violent possession of Zuonigrad, a castle on a rock in Morlachia, which was known to belong of right to the Venetians; and notwithstanding his predecessor, Procuratore Loredano, had sufficiently made out their title to the said castle at a conference with Count Buccellini and others, yet no redress has been obtained. To conclude, he gave an instance of the little regard this Court had for the friendship of their Republic, in that they continued Count Berka as Ambassador at Venice, whose violent and irregular behaviour had rendered him extremely odious, and might have proved fatal to him if their Government had not prevented some accidents, which people in despair might have been guilty of, and not respected his character.

“I told the Ambassador the first of his complaints was an old grudge, which ought to be forgotten, and that the two last circumstances were such as might easily be redressed, when the Republic shall have shown the least tendency towards stricter ties with this Court. But he insists they ought to be first complied with as ordinary acts of justice and civility, since their State deserves to be treated with candour, whether they are allies or not, and should be prepared by good usage to draw nearer. I then tried him a little farther, and supposed the Emperor might shortly depute some of his ministers to sound him, in which case I did not question but he would represent to the Senate not only fairly, but favourably, what they might propose. With this he seemed to close very heartily, by promising to relate to the best advantage whatever they should think fit to suggest to him, though he had sufficiently discovered to me his private opinion how little probability there was of the Republic’s changing their maxims for the reasons above mentioned.

“I shall make it my business to enquire against next post if any progress has been made at Rome, and if any full-powers have been sent to Count Lamberg to treat there with Sig<sup>r</sup> Morosini, as the Emperor promised me there should, when I had last audience of him at Ebersdorf on the 21st past.”

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1703, [Oct. 23.] Nov. 3, Vienna.—“In my last I acquainted you that the Margraf of Baden had left Lieutenant General Bibra to command in Augsburg with a large garrison, consisting for the most part of the troops belonging to the Circles, viz., 2 battalions of Reischach, 2 of Bibra, and 2 of Tuchs, 1 of Grenadiers, and the remains of the regiment of Bareith, with 200 horse and 550 who were dismounted; and was broke up with the rest of his army from before Augsburg on the 18th. He has since marched by Gennach, Wiedegetting, and Eggthal (where the Saxons joined him on the 21st) to Reicholdsried on the Iller between Kempten and Memmingen, where he camped on the 24th, and was preparing to advance on the 26th directly towards the French, commanded by the Elector and the Marshal de Villars, who are said to entrench themselves at Opfingen, two hours beyond Memmingen. Upon the Prince of Baden’s motion towards the Inler (sic), General Arco likewise removed from Dachau (near Munich) towards the Lech, and was camped with 7,000 Bavarians at Liechtenberg, between Augsburg and Landsperg. In a short time we shall see where all these marches will end.

“General Schlick had on the 18th passed the River Waag, over the bridge at Schinta, and will be this day at Neuhausel, where he is to continue his march towards Lewenz, which place ’tis thought the Rebels will abandon at his approach.

“This morning Count Tarin arrived here as envoy from the Duke of Savoy; he has brought with him the Treaty and all that belongs to it, and tell[s] me H.R.H. has writ directly to the Queen and the States General, giving them notice of his being ready to come into the Alliance.

[The rest is in Stepney’s own hand.]

“I have received this day the honour of your Grace’s letter of the 20th past. The accident mine of the 29 Sept. met with might be the effect of weather, and the carelessness of the postmasters in not allowing better mails; but I am convinced there was foul play with my packet of the 11th Aug., which has never been heard of. I hope my last of this day sevensnight may have better fortune.

“Mr. Worstley-Montague (sic) and Mr. Mackay of Dover arrived here this morning, and will shortly wait upon your Grace.

“The Emperor was taken ill at noon of a vomiting and looseness, and went to bed. In a day or two I believe he will shake off his indisposition. By our last letters from the Hague of the 23rd past, Sir George Rook was not then arrived on this side, and I fear it will be the middle if not the end of this month before our Allies are ready with their ships, to transport the K[ing] of Spain; which your Grace will imagine is not very pleasing here, after the violence wherewith I was ordered to solicit his being sent away from hence.

“He gave the D[uke] of Ma[r]borough a sword from the Emperor, valued at 30,000 florins, and took it from his own side to make it more agreeable.”

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1703, Dec. [11-]22, Hague.—“ Since I left Vienna I have received the honour of three letters from your Grace of the 27th Oct. and of the 3rd and 10th Nov., and having an opportunity of returning my humble acknowledgements by a courier going to Vienna, I would not omit it before I embarked, which I hope to do tomorrow morning, the weather being now tolerably fair, and Sir George having allowed a convoy of 50 guns for three yachts which are to carry General Churchill with the other officers, Count Wratislaw with Count Maffei from Savoy, and me, with some private passengers. If we are not snapped, we are likely to get the start of the King of Spain by a week, for it will be still so long before the transports can be got off and repaired of the damage they suffered by the late storm. Consul Broughton will transmit to your Grace a paper, which will tell you what we have sustained on our own coast and on this. But we are to expect more ill news still, and have not the least notice of Vice-Admiral Callemberg with eight Dutch men-of-war, and 120 transports with their 4,000 men for Portugal, since the 19th of last month that they turned out from the Texel. By these accidents in the beginning of our great enterprise your Grace will have but an indifferent opinion of it; we certainly have begun very awkwardly, and our enemies will have had too much time to prepare against our designs, and thereby may render them very difficult, if not impracticable. However, the good will of the Parliament may help through.

“ I found it was necessary to come hither in person, to press both here and in England the dispatch of ministers and money for Savoy, in which I have succeeded, and hope Mr. Hill and Mr. Vander Meer will have got that length with their hands full before your Grace can receive this letter.

“ I can assure your Grace by very good authority that there will be a fleet early next year in your parts, which I hope will atone for past faults, and make those who laugh at us pay the fiddlers. Of this I shall be able to tell your Grace more at ym return from England, which I believe may be in less than six weeks. In the mean time I beg the continuance of your Grace's protection.”

The PORT OF LEGHORN.

[1703.]—Paper headed: "Plusieurs Exemples de ce qui arriva à Livorne aux Anglois, et à leurs Alliés, dans la derniere guerre."

This refers to a neutral vessel seized by Mr. Cole, commander of a convoy, to see if she were French, the arrest thereupon by the Governor of captains of men-of-war who were ashore and other subjects of her Majesty, and his threat to bombard all English vessels in the port. Also to two French prises taken by the privateer Panther, and allowed to be sequestered by the French consul at Leghorn. Also to a French barque chased by Spanish galleys, which were bombarded by the Governor, &c.

G. STEPNEY [and his Secretary] to SHREWSBURY.

1704, March 8, Vienna.—"On the 2nd inst. a courier arrived here from Breslau with advice that Prince James and his youngest brother Prince Constantine has [have] been surprised on the road between that place and Olaw by a party of horse, who forced them out of their coach, and carried them towards Saxony; for it is supposed the King of Poland has thus violently seized on their persons because the eldest was one of the most dangerous and intriguing pretenders to the throne of Poland, which the Cardinal and his faction have declared vacant on the 16th February in their convention at Warsaw. The Emperor appears very sensible at the violation of his territory and the rape of his brother-in-law, and has desired the Polish Envoy to represent the ill consequences thereof to the King, who [he] expects should immediately release the Princes at his instances.

"Little parties of the Hungarian malcontents continue to infest our frontiers on the River Leyta, and set fire to some villages or farms [farms?] almost every night, but always retire on the approach of any Imperialists. General Tramp with the Danish forces, who have for some time been employed to guard the frontiers of Upper Austria, is making this way to reinforce General Heister, since her Majesty and the States General thought fit to interpose their good offices towards appeasing these troubles, and the Emperor has accepted of their friendly offer. Mr. Bruyninx set out on the 4th for Presburg, and Mr. Stepney, being arrived here from England on the 6th inst., is now buising [busy] in taking his audiences of the Imperial family, and preparing to follow the Dutch Envoy to Hungary; for, as far as cau be seen from Count Bercheny's letters, there is some hopes of quenching this flame, whereof Mr. Stepney will himself be able to give you a fuller account by next post.

[The rest is in Stepney's own hand.]

"I hope your Grace will excuse me if I cannot yet enter, as I ought, into a correspondence so much to my advantage as what your Grace has been pleased to vouchsafe to me. My audiences and attendance at Court ever since I arrived here, and the earnestness they are in to hurry me away within two or three days to Hungary, occasions this distraction. I have a commission from her Majesty to mediate with the Malcontents, and have begun my correspondence with Bercheny in the manner your Grace finds here inclosed. He seems fair and plausible enough hitherto; if he be sincere or not, I am not yet able to judge.

"I have by me several letters I lately received from your Grace, but cannot look them out to tell you the dates at present. The last I think was of the 19th of January, wherein your Grace is pleased to mention Don Livio, whom I have gratified by obtaining an answer from her Majesty to some letters he let fly, and which our Ministers thought it would be too great condescension to acknowledge, which nicety I always represented to be too great, especially towards a poor honest creature, whom I take to be the only friend we have in those parts, and who ought to be distinguished for his good uncle's sake, though his personal merit be not extraordinary. He has an agent here, Abbé Borromeio, who about two years ago recommended to me a letter from the Prince to the Queen, and I have put him into an ecstasy this morning by giving him the satisfaction of transmitting this evening to his master a billet-doux or lettre du cachet directed à Mon Cousin Le Prince Livio Odescalchi: so I hope to hear by this piece of service I am recommended to Cupid's good graces.

"I suppose your Queen of Poland is as outrageous as a b—— who has lost her p——ys. The Empress was most violent with me this evening upon the same subject. But I cannot agree with her to think the King of Poland so much in the wrong in offering a disagreeable circumstance or disobliging the Emperor by violating his territory, if thereby he might hope to preserve his Crown and dignity. I passed by the same spot of ground the day after the fact, and considering the weather must own they had very hard fortune to ride post in silk stockings. To heal the matter here, the King of Poland offers the Emperor to give into his hands the Prince James, provided he will undertake to keep him out of intrigues till the disturbances of Poland are blown over. It would have been well for him if the Red Cap had been served after the same manner.

"I have not heard from your Grace whether you received a long story from me relating to Venetian affairs a little before I went my journey towards England. If that paper came to your hands I do not suspect any of my letters to have miscarried, except the old one, which is never to be retrieved."

CAV. CORIOLANO MONTEMAGNI to SIR L. BLACKWELL.

1704, April [11-]22.—Has shown to the Grand Duke Blackwell's letter of remonstrance touching Plowman's affair. His Highness is sending Count Roberto Zeffirini as Ambassador Extraordinary to the Queen, to explain his proceedings.

SIR L. BLACKWELL to the FACTORY OF ENGLISH MERCHANTS at LEGHORN.

1704, April [19-]30, Florence.—“I am commanded by her Majesty to intimate to you that you should (to avoid any future inconveniencies) with all speed you can get in your debts due to you, or your principals, within the Great Duke's territories, and dispose of and withdraw your effects. I have sent my secretaries on purpose with this intimation, and have ordered them to tell you the reason which hath induced her Majesty to come to this resolution. If I can any way be serviceable to you, let me know it.”

Addressed to Messrs. Gi[1]bert Serle, Tho. Dorman, Chr. Hanbury, Geo. Lambe, Fra. Wyatt, Cha. Hudson, Chr. Crowe, Fra. Arundell, Tho. Balle, Edwd. Nelthorpe, John Horsey, Sam. Lambert, Tho. Chamberlaine, Geo. Collins, Sir Geo. Davies, Bart., and Mr. James Annison.

2. Replies of the English Merchants at Leghorn to Blackwell's messengers, that they were greatly obliged for his intimation, &c. Several of them said they must have patience; some, that “they reckoned themselves as safe at Legorne as at Whitehall”; “that they did not believe any of the Factory would stir”; that they “wondered that the Factory should be exposed for such a man as Plowman”; that “'twas as easy for them to fly as to remove their effects,” &c.

ABBATE CATELAIN to SIR L. BLACKWELL.

1704, [April 27-] May 8, Legorne.—“John Horsey this morning was talking with some Italians before Sigre. Guadagni's door, about the last news come from England, and he was saying:—

“That Mr. Gould presented the Merchants' Memorial to her Majesty the Queen, which was graciously received by her, notwithstanding that the Secretary of State, Lord Nottingham, there present, attempted several times to accept it from his hands, who refused it to him, and the Queen adverting upon that, with her own hand received it.

“That her Majesty had committed it to the Cabinet for to be there examined.

“That by the consult (sic) of the Lords was revoked everything proposed to his Highness from Sigre. Ammiraglio Shovell, and retracted all that he did here in Legorne, though he had from you some orders of Lord Nottingham, which orders were extorted against the right and will of her Majesty.

“That it is now known that all the storm in Plowman's affair had the motion from you, and under the management of one secretary of my Lord Nottingham the thing was grown so high as 'twas at present.

“That all the troubles were ready to be finished by the Merchants underwritten in the Memorial, 300 in number, by the claims of the Yarmouth Merchants and Clothmakers, that made a recourse to the Queen, and by the interposition of the Elector Palatine, who has sent some letters to the Queen about this affair in behalf of his Highness.

“That you have ruined yourself in sending here Mr. Majou to intimate the letter of my Lord Nottingham, and that now 'tis discovered very well you was the chief instrument concerned in this matter, and in a very short time we shall see something about you.

“And lastly, not only from Sr. Horsey but from all the town it is said that the Great Duke refused to you his audience, and that [he] is extremely angry about this affair.”

THE GRAND DUKE OF TUSCANY to FRANCESCO TERRIESI, “Proveditore della Dogana di Livorno.”

1704, [April 29.-] May 10, Florence.—Has seen his letter of the 7th [April 26], written at the instance of the English merchants at Leghorn. He may assure them that those of them who wish to depart with their capitals are at full liberty to do so, and those who wish to remain will find the same security there as in the past.

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1704, May 3, Vienna.—“This morning I received the honour of your letter of the 19th past, and think I may now venture to say that our mediation begins to operate, and since the Malcontents have been so easily drove out of their nest in the Island of Schütt, I hope they will not decline the offer we have recommended for an armistice. We have no letters from Portugal since those which brought news of the King's arrival there.

“This evening I have writ to C[ount] Lamberg, giving him notice that a fleet will soon be in the Mediterranean. Those assurances I shall give the Emperor himself tomorrow, by orders I received yesterday. But what benefit can he expect from a fleet, now his army has but one foot on the Po? and that but a weak one?

“Your Constable and Spanish Ambassador must be very nice if they will not converse with Mad<sup>e</sup> Richelieu because my Lord Dursley gave her a cast. How could she refuse that offer made her by a youth who has the face of an Adonis and club of an Hercules, as Dr. Garth elegantly expresses it. I can assure those that are concerned, she never set foot in Vienna (if that be a blemish), for Prince Eugene, her cousin-german, prevailed with the Venetian Ambassador to have her stopped upon the frontier; so the poor lady is like to be in a sad case, since no being is allowed her anywhere.

“ Prince Alexander is as far from the Crown as his brethren ; after all, he that now wears it is like to keep it.

“ The E[arl] of Rumney is dying of the smallpox.

“ Mr. Blathwayt has lost his employment of Secretary-at-War almost as sillily as Mr. Poultney did his in the Ordnance. It was first only talked of as a jest, and Mr. Bl. in all companies spread it about as such so industriously that it is at last verified, and Mr. St. John’s succeeds him.

“ The Duke of Ma[r]lb[orough] got to the Hague on the 22nd past. It is yet uncertain whether he makes the campaign on the Rhine, the Moselle, or the Meuse. There is scope enough left him.”

The ENGLISH FACTORY at LEGHORN.

[1704, May?]—“ An humble apology to the Queen, on behalf of the Merchants Petitioners, and Trustees for the Factory at Legorn, for printing their Case.”

The late King was misled by false accusations into a belief of several wrongs done by the Gr[and] Duke of Tuscany to [William] Plowman and his adherents. This was effected by a deceitful petition, and also by a scandalous libel, entitled “ The Case of Sir Alexander Rigby and Company.” His Highness is innocent of the charges made against him therein, as will appear in the papers printed herewith, and in our answer before your Majesty’s Commissioners, Sir John Cooke and John Pollexfen, Esq., &c.

Plowman wrote a letter from Cyprus to Jack Crookshanks, Rigby’s book-keeper, touching prizes taken by him off that island, and which were never registered in the Court of Admiralty, &c. The late King’s mortal enemies were entertained in Rigby, Shepheard, and Plowman’s house at Legorn. Plowman corresponded with the late Queen [of James II.], at St. Germain’s, and her pretended son there. “ She made him her envoy to carry the child’s picture to her brother the Duke of Modena from the said Court of St. Germain’s.” At Legorn he entertained the Lord Perthe, Governor of the pretended Prince of Wales ; and also one Montgomery, and Girardin, an Irishman in the French King’s service, commander of your Majesty’s ship called the Happy Return, taken in the last war ; which men were concerned in the horrid design to assassinate the bravest Prince in the world [William III.], &c.

Capt. John Brome, late commander of Plowman's ship the Philip and Mary, formerly cruised without commission in the ship America, and took several vessels, &c. The Admiralty Register is referred to. Before the Commissioners of Appeal at Westminster Plowman swore that he was not worth 200*l.*, though he lived high and splendidly.

Legorn may be called the Port of England. The trade therewith brings in a profit to your Exchequer of about 300,000*l.* yearly. There is no occasion to use any extremities at all, as the merchants there do not question his Highness's protection of them. Cosmus III. of Tuscany desires the continuance of your Majesty's friendship. "The sovereignty of the sea is and hath ever been the undoubted right of the Crown of England, and always reckoned a part, and the greatest part, of that Empire."

The loyal Factory at Legorn have their sole dependence on your protection, and employ their estates in purchasing English manufactures, "viz., woollen [goods], mineries of lead, tin, fishery, shipping, eatable provisions, &c.; and even the two East India Companies are considerably enriched by the trade of the said Factory, in the consumption of their goods, as pepper, calicoes, &c."

[SHREWSBURY] to SOMERS.

1704, July 5, Rome.—"By this last post I have received the favour of a letter from your Lordship. Those you mention to have writ in June was twelvemonth and about last Christmas—the first I received and answered; the other I am certain never came to my hands, I having long expected some answer about the picture and the price the gentleman asked, and, having received none, concluded you were grown indifferent in the matter. That gentleman is now dead, and his pictures exposed to sale, but at so high a rate that, money being scarce here, as yet none of them are sold.

"The most valuable are a Last Supper of Albano, valued at 1,200 crowns—so dear I should not advise the buying it; the two women of Guido, formerly mentioned when I sent you the measure of the picture, now valued at 800 crowns; a picture of our Lady, our Saviour, and several other figures of Rubens, a very large piece, at 800 crowns. This is one of the best of that author, but less fit for England, because, without knowing why, they have crowded in a friar, an improper person and little thought on in our Lady's time. There are two pictures of Poussine, one a satyr, valued at 500 crowns, the other of the Holy Family, a less piece, at 400 crowns; but these are less pleasant. There are two large landships (sic) of Claud Lorene—I know none finer anywhere—both 800 crowns; two large landships of Poussine, at 400 crowns, and two lesser, with figures of Carlo Maratti, at the same price.

“These are the choice of what pictures are to be sold in that house, upon which the prices will I suppose be abated considerably, and I should be glad soon to receive your commands in case anything here might please you.

“Having said thus much on virtuosoship, I shall now thank you for the favour of this last letter.”

JAMES WHELLY TO SHREWSBURY.

1704, [July 24-] Aug. 4, Liv[orn]o.—“I humbly beg your Grace will excuse my continual troubling you about my affairs, which is to acquaint you of a perfidious design some of our merchants has [have] acted against me. . . . Your Grace may remember when our merchants courted the Great Duke for his protection in the affair of Plowman, which his Highness gave them in print, and to ingratiate the more to obtain it, some of them went to the Proveditore, and told him I was the greatest enemy the Great Duke had; adding that when Sir Cloudsly Shovell was here, I gave him spiteful informations against him and the Governor, and their partiality for the French made him so violent in his demands that there was nothing done but I kept a journal of, which I formed according to my passions to make embroils. . . . I am told the Great Duke has the same notion of me. . . . Mr. Leary departs tomorrow night for Genoua.” . . .

[SIR L. BLACKWELL] TO THE COUNT DE LAMBERG.

1704, [July 25-] Aug. 5, Florence.—A matter has occurred at Leghorn which affects the rights of the Queen's subjects, but the Great Duke refuses to interfere, as it concerns the Church. Sends a copy for his examination.

Copy, Italian. Enclosing:—

A paper relating to the abduction of N., the niece, aged 16, of Mr. Gilbert Serle, an Englishman dwelling in Leghorn, from his own house, by the priest Belisario Benvenuti, dwelling in the church of S. Giulia, Leghorn, and to her being placed in the convent of S. Florenzo, Pisa, under pretence that she wished to become a Roman Catholic. Mr. Serle is related to Lord Chandois, English Ambassador to the Ottoman Porte. The punishment of the priest and the release of the young lady are demanded. The Nuncio will not act, because his authority is insufficient, &c.

CAV. MONTEMAGNI to SIR L. BLACKWELL.

Copy, Italian.

[SHREWSBURY] to MARLBOROUGH.

1704, Oct. [14.-] 25, s.n., Rome.—“I did not receive the honour of your Grace's of the 30th Sept. till two days ago, and am so persuaded that you are convinced I wish you happiness and good success in all you undertake, that I will not misspend your time in the repetition of such unnecessary expressions, but come more immediately to the point you are pleased to command my poor opinion, viz., what disposition the Ven[etian]s may have to enter into the great Alliance.

“I must in the first place protest my incapacity to judge of such a matter, conversing so little here with anybody that I may say, whilst I have been in Italy, to [I] have lived in more solitude than I could have done at Grafton. However, having seen some advances made by their Ambassador here to begin a treaty with the Emperor, and observed [the] steps they have made in other courts, it has long been my opinion that their design is to have treaties on foot with all parties, but conclude with none, at least till they see one side so superior that they may hope to gain without running any hazard of losing; and of this I am more convinced since I have seen certain letters intercepted from C[ardinal] Janson to the D[uke] and P[rior] Vendôme, and one from the G[rand] P[rior] to his brother, [by which it is plain now their Ambassador here was endeavouring a treaty with the Pope to clear Italy of all foreign troops]; which letters I conclude have been communicated to your Grace, and demonstrate the fair hopes the Ven[etians give] to all parties.

“Though this be my judgment, and that I doubt no success will attend any negotiation with them, yet it being a thing of such consequence if they could be prevailed with to join in the Alliance, that (sic) I think no opportunity should be neglected to come to a true knowledge of their mind, which can best be done by the Queen's Ministers, since I am sure they will much more readily treat with her Majesty, whom they know able and willing to perform what she engages, than with the Court of Vienna, which has a reputation directly contrary. But before any such trial be made, I should think it absolutely requisite that some succour be sent to the D[uke] of S[avoy], for [till his affairs be in a better posture it will be small encouragement for any in Italy to declare for the League]° whilst the French have such a superiority as they have at present in Italy, it will be in vain to hope that any of the powers of this side the Alps should declare for the League.

“Your Grace will best judge in what place and manner it will be fitting to begin to sound these gentlemen.† Venice itself, I doubt, is not very proper, from the difficulty of conversing with the nobles, and more because the Emperor has resolved to send back thither the Count Berka for his Ambassador, the man in the world I am told the Ven[etian]s have the greatest objection and dislike to; for though I know that they will depend only upon her Majesty and the States for any subsidies they might expect during the war, yet, being persuaded nothing would incline them so readily to engage as the prospect of some enlargement of their territory towards Lombardy, [I think?] that can never be promised them but from the Emperor united with the K[ing] of Sp[ain]; so that it will always be necessary that a minister of the Emperor should assist at the treaty, or at least before it be concluded.

“The Ven[etians] being esteemed generally well affected to the Emperor’s cause, I should hope it would not be hard to find a minister of theirs in some court of the Confederates, as London, Vienna, or elsewhere, and well-wisher to this treaty; and such a one I should think fit first to propose it to. About eighteen months since the Emperor’s Ambassador was of opinion that Moro[sini], the Ven[etian] Ambassador here, was of that genius, and had several discourses with him. [I talked with him but once, and]° I then told Comte Lamberg I much doubted [his tongue and his heart were very different]° the other’s sincerity, thinking it impossible that one who had so entirely the confidence of the Pope and his Ministers, as this Ambassador had, could be so much a German as he then seemed. Since that, my suspicion has appeared just, and the intercepted letters before mentioned have put it so out of question that I am sure he will never be a proper man to open such a negotiation to.”

THE QUEEN’S REPLY TO COUNT ZEFFERINI.

1704, Oct. 25, Whitehall.—The proceedings of the Duke of Tuscany against William Plowman were irregular, and the damages adjudged by the Queen were assessed with the utmost consideration for the Duke. Plowman had a perfect right to cruise against the French, with whom this nation was at war, and to capture their vessels. He was arrested by the Duke in the territory of another Prince. The Duke, if injured by him, should have complained to the Queen, and not have sat in judgment on him, acting the part of both accuser and judge, and condemning him to pay a large sum of money. The Queen expects that his Highness will pay the said damages without delay. (Signed:)

G. STEPNEY to SHREWSBURY.

1704, Nov. [4-]15, Vienna.—“I am to return your Grace my dutiful thanks for your letters of the 20th of September and 18th of October.

“When my Lord Cardigan, his brother, and their governor appear here, they shall be served with all the attention imaginable. Mr. Radcliff (who lately pass[ed] by here) says they intend to see the Carnival at Venice.

“I was surprised to find the malicious story which your Grace mentions to have run about in England. I never heard anything of that kind but from the mention you make of it, nor can I imagine from what grounds such an improbable tale should come. I am morally assured it could not be from your letter which I forwarded to Mr. Secretary, for that bore a quite contrary sense, and men must have lost their understanding, as well as all principles, before they could put so wrong an interpretation on what was so well meant. This shall always be my opinion, if I am ever asked the question.

“Your Grace may have heard that Mr. Hill has persuaded some great men in England that this conjuncture may be favourable towards bringing the Venetians into an alliance with us, and he has got his ends by it, for he has procured credentials for himself to that State, though as far as I can judge of their inclinations and interests, they are now as distant from those measures as they were in November last, when I had the honour to relate to your Grace some discourses I had here with Sigr. Delphino on that subject; and so I told Mr. Secretary Harley (when I was at Landau), who then asked my opinion on that affair. The usage the poor Duke of Savoy has met, as well as the D[uke] of Modena, are but mean encouragement to enter into the like engagements.

“The enclosed will give your Grace the true history of my sleeveless errand.

“The Electrice of Bavaria has at last capitulated, and if any forces can be picked up in that country for Italy, there may be hopes still of retrieving that game.”

[G. STEPNEY] to ———.

1704, Nov. [4-]15, Vienna.—“You will excuse me for having been a very irregular correspondent of late, having been obliged to run about for these two months, and it is not but within these three days that Mr. Bruyninx and I are come back from our troublesome congress at Schemnitz, where our best endeavours have been ineffectual. We found here most of the Court and even of the Ministers prepossessed with an opinion that the fault lay entirely on the side of the Malcontents, who are said to have obstinately insisted on four exorbitant demands.

“1st. The annulling their last act of settlement made at the Diet of Presburgh, anno 1687, whereby the Crown of Hungary was declared hereditary to the House of Austria, and that they might be left at liberty to proceed to a new election. 2<sup>d</sup>. That Rakoczi should be suffered to be Prince of Transilvania, independent of this Emperor. 3<sup>o</sup>. That the present Palatine Prince Esterhasi should be deposed, and that important office conferred on Count Bereseni; and 4ly: That the Malcontents should be maintained in the enjoyment of such lands and estates whereof they are at present in possession. That Rakoczi had publicly declared neither the Emperor nor [the] King of the Romans had any right of sovereignty over him; and that some mention had been made of the Duke of Berry for King of Hungary.

“ ’Tis possible some or all of these extravagant stories may have reached you, having been very current here, and for that reason I think I am obliged to tell you fairly all I know of the matter.

“ As near as I can trace these reports, they were first brought hither by Count Veterani with the capitulation of Caschau. In his way to Vienna he called upon Rakoczi at Eisenbach, and dined with him. There happened to be at table two emissaries from France and Bavaria. I cannot tell what impertinent discourses these people might have held, or what a loose the Prince might have given himself on that occasion to render the entertainment more agreeable; but I can honestly assure you the Malcontents were so far from laying these maxims down as the foundation of their treaty in any formal proposal, that their two chiefs Rakoczi and Bereseni never ventured in their most private discourses with Mr. Bruyninx and me to run into any of these extravagancies.

“ That you may understand where our matter sticks, I must acquaint you that our meeting at Schemnitz was barely designed for settling the preliminaries towards a truce of three months, during which term it was hoped a solid peace might either be concluded, or at least put in a fair way. In order to this armistice the Emperor made some overtures to the Malcontents by the Archbishop of Colocza, on the 28th August; to which Rakoczi returned an answer on the 2nd of September, which in my poor opinion was as reasonable and moderate as could be expected, nor could I conceive otherwise than that the Emperor would have entirely closed with what had been offered; and upon those assurances I posted very cheerfully in all diligence from Landau to Schemnitz, supposing there remained little more for me to do there than to be an eye-witness to their agreement. I got thither on the 27th in the evening, but found myself very much mistaken, for two days before the Imperialists had given in a new project of an armistice, instead of a reply to the conditions above mentioned. It would be too long to entertain you with the terms of that project, but I may venture to say the Hungarians were so exasperated at the first sight of them, that the same evening (the 25th October) orders were dispatched to their troops everywhere to make themselves ready for a march, for that Rakoczi and the other chiefs of the confederacy, from this first step, concluded the Imperialists were not yet disposed to act sincerely with them.

“ Mr. Bruyninx (before he gave in this paper) used all the arguments he could with Baron Seilern to continue in the old track, or at least to abate part of his new demands. The Archbishop of Colocza did the same, but all to no purpose, for Baron Seilern declared his instructions were positive, and he could make no alterations.

“On the 28th Mr. Bruyninx and I went over to Eisenbach, to try if we could dispose Prince Rakoezi to prolong the cessation of arms till the 15th November, in which time we might send a courier to Vienna in hopes of obtaining for the Imperialists more favourable instructions; but so much stiffness on one side made the Hungarians as obstinate on the other; so the Prince flatly refused any further term, alleging the six weeks he had already allowed had been idly spent in cavils and subtleties, and he saw little likelihood that the Court of Vienna would change their maxims in fifteen days more. He likewise refused to return any other answer to the Emperor’s project than a sort of declaration that it was unsincere, unreasonable, and impracticable, insisting still that a reply ought to be made to his former proposals. This the Imperial Commission still declined, and so our impertinent embassy broke up; Baron Seilern, Count Lamberg, and Count Cohari set out from Schemnitz on the 5th inst., by the way of Gran, and Mr. Bruyninx and I the day following, by the way of Presburgh.

“We left the Archbishop of Colocza still at Schemnitz to keep up some sort of a negotiation, for I do not yet despair of composing these differences if the business were put into right hands and a more proper method, on which points Mr. Bruyninx and I are now labouring at this Court.

“I believe Rakoezi besieged Neuhäusell on the 7th with an army of 16,000 men. He will not want for cannon and ammunition, having found sufficient stores in Caschau. He has received from France a good number of ingeniers and other officers, and told me Monsr. Desalleurs (my old acquaintance at Berlin) was on the road from Belgrade, and expected to be with him by the 14th inst.”

In the hand of Stepney’s clerk, on foolscap paper, not signed or addressed.

[G. STEPNEY] to SECRETARY HEDGES.

1704, Nov. [8-]19, Vienna.—“By last post I was honoured with your letter of the 20th October, wherein you are pleased to inform me of a league which the Pope and the French King are contriving for securing the peace of Italy, and that they are trying to engage the Republic of Venice in the same measures. To prevent which (you say) Mr. Hill will be instructed from her Majesty and the States General, with a latitude to go over to Venice as he sees occasion; and you signify to me her Majesty’s pleasure that I move the Emperor to employ his partisans at Rome to stifle that intrigue, and likewise that he would interpose his offices with the Venetian State to hinder them from entering into the league aforesaid, and if it be possible to bring them into the Grand Alliance.

“ Since my return from Hungary the Emperor has been indisposed, and yesterday he voided two small stones, which accident has hindered him from giving any audiences of late. But the first time I have the honour to be admitted to him, I shall not fail to acquaint him with the generous concern her Majesty continues to show for his interest everywhere, particularly in this new instance of her attention towards Italy.

“ Till I can speak with authority from the Emperor or his Ministers, I beg leave to acquaint you with some particulars I have learned from other persons concerning these intercepted letters, which I suppose to be the same packet that Lieut.-Col. St. Amour took from a Venetian courier between Verona and Milan (whereof I made mention to Mr. Secretary Harley on the 6th of Sept.), wherein a letter is said to have been found from Cardinal Janson, informing the Prior Vendôme that he was just come from audience of the Pope, who seemed perfectly well disposed to enter into a confederacy with the French King for the defence and peace of Italy; that he intended to declare himself in [a] few days, and would endeavour to dispose the Republic of Venice to join with the Courts of France and Rome in the good design.

“ I have been told the original of this letter was first lodged with his Imperial Majesty, who forwarded it to Rome, thereby to convince the Pope of his too great partiality, and to reproach him at the same time. That the Pope seemed grievously offended and scandalised at these reports, and have [had ?] declared to some of the Emperor’s partisans at Rome that he was so far from making such promises to Cardinal Janson that no conversation like this had ever passed between them. The Cardinal too (when examined on that point) protested, if there was any such letter, it must have been counterfeited, for that he never writ any such thing.

“ The Venetian Ambassador here has affirmed to a friend of mine (who accidentally discoursed with him on this subject) that this is the true ground of the story; and since my return from Hungary, he has repeated to me the declaration I have frequently had from him formerly, that the Republic persists in their resolution not to deviate one step from the neutrality the[y] proposed to themselves towards the beginning of this war, nor will depart from it, unless one or other party should oblige them, by enormous acts of violence, to take more desperate measures. He has further assured me, upon his word of honour, that within these few days he had declared one [once] more, both to the Emperor and his Ministers, that the Senate was still firm and true to this principle.

“ Four days ago he received an express from the Senate, with usual complaints (as I suppose) of the Germans being too troublesome guests in the territory of Brescia. It cannot be expected they should be otherwise till they are better supplied with money and magazines, the want whereof makes them an heavy burden to the Republic. However, the treatment they have received of late from the French is not much better. As I discover anything more of their intentions or inclinations, you shall be duly informed.”

[CHARLES MONTAGU, LORD] HALIFAX TO SHREWSBURY.

1704, Nov. 10.—“ I have now with me a young man who is very full of acknowledgments for the great favour and civility you showed him at Rome. . . . I am very glad you are grown so great a virtuoso ; I shall have much more pleasure in that sort of conversation than in the field sports you admired when you went from hence, and I should be much obliged to you if I might have some advantage from your skill while you continue at Rome. Mr. Montague has bought me some pictures, but I yet want a great many to furnish my room, and I would take it for a very great favour if, before you leave Rome, you would buy some for me. I can give you no instructions so good as your own fancy. I would wish they should be pleasant subjects, and that is all the rule I would prescribe ; and I affect to have them large, as most proper for furniture. . . . Mr. Shephard has wrote to Mr. Arundell to furnish you with any money you shall demand on my account. . . . I am overjoyed to hear with so much certainty that you are returning to us.” . . .

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1704, Nov. [11-]22, Vienna.—“ By last post Mr. Whitworth received your Grace’s letter of the 5th October, for which he desires me to return his dutiful thanks. He leaves me in two or three days, and I believe may meet the Czar on the borders of Poland, for He (sic) has already made himself master of all Courland.

“ Notwithstanding the impertinent report of your Grace’s concerning yourself in politics, I must not forbear troubling you with my stories of Venice, and desiring your opinion thereupon, for perhaps, by your familiarity with Sigr. Morosini as well as Count Lamberg, your Grace may set me right in notions which I may not rightly understand, having never yet been on the other side of the Alps, and having very few correspondents there at present.

“ On the 24th past, o.s., the Queen opened the Parliament by a very gracious speech, and the two Houses have answered with very dutiful addresses ; but the eloquence of the Upper House far exceeds the other, as is usual. Your Grace will observe they have taken no notice of Sir G. Rooke’s victory, for my Lord Ma[r]lb[orough]’s friends thought that and Bleinheim ought not to be mentioned on a day. I believe his Grace is now at Berlin, soliciting troops for Savoy ; but H.R.H. may be in as bad a case as the El[ecto]r of Bavaria before those succours can arrive.

[P.S.] “ Your Grace will be pleased to excuse the errors you find in these transcripts ; the post will be gone before I can read them over.”

Ansd. Dec. 6th.

[G. STEPNEY] TO SECRETARY HEDGES.

1704, Nov. [11-]22, Vienna.—“ By last post I had the honour to transmit to you some informations and reflections upon the affairs of Venice, in answer to the instructions I received from you of the 20th past. I have since had an audience of the Emperor upon that subject, and two long discourses with the Venetian Ambassador, the substance whereof I shall now relate to you.

“But [I] must begin by acquainting you that Mr. Bruyninx received by last post a resolution from the States General of the 10th inst., giving him notice that the Pope was endeavouring to persuade the Venetians to put a garrison of their troops into Mantua, which would be of great prejudice to his Imperial Majesty and his Allies, since thereby the French might by [be] at liberty of drawing out their garrison from Mantua and employing it somewhere else against the Confederates; for which reason the States General have ordered Mr. Bruyninx to represent this to the Venetian Ambassador here, desiring him to employ his good offices towards preventing the Republic from consenting to the Pope’s proposal, and making a step which would discover too great partiality for France. Mr. Vrybergue is ordered to make application to Sigr. Mocenigo in London to the same effect.

“I must likewise inform you that on the 20th inst. the Venetian Ambassador received another courier from the Senate, who declared they will no longer endure either the French or the Imperialists in their territory; that their State has on several occasions given great instances of their regard to the Emperor, particularly by favouring his troops in their retreat from Figarolo, and supplying them in their passage with provisions, when they were in the greatest necessity; that upon requisition from the Emperor they had once more allowed them to enter into their dominion, upon assurances given that they should barely pass through it into the Mantuan or Cremonese, which they might easily have done, being at that time superior in force to the French; whereas it is now near two months that the Imperialists seem to have taken up their rest there, and are not at all disposed to march either backwards or forwards, to the great mortification and detriment of the province of Brescia, the people whereof, being reputed to be the most sturdy and resolute subjects under the Venetian dominion, begin to grow mutinous upon the disorders that are daily committed amongst them, and have already solicited the Senate either to find proper expedients towards protecting them by fair means from these insolencies, or to leave them to revenge the injuries they suffer, by using their arms for their natural defence against either party, offering to raise and maintain at their own expense 10,000 men for that service.

“That the Grand Prior Vendôme had assured the Senate he had orders to withdraw all the French forces out of their State 24 hours after the Germans have retired; but in case of their refusal he pretends to have the same right of subsisting there as the Imperialists have; and in order to prevent the Germans from breaking into the Duchy of Mantua, he has already demanded of the Republic Monte Chiari, Castagnedolo, Calcinato, and Lonato, four places proper to form his postirung; which proposal the Venetian[s] have absolutely rejected, and sent a courier likewise to their Ambassador at Paris, who is to declare there, that the Republic will by no means allow quarters in their country to either party, but seems disposed to take resolute measures against either side which shall give them the greatest offence.

“Last night the Venetian Ambassador had audience of the Emperor, and acquainted him with these resolutions, insisting particularly on the offer made by the Grand Prior, and remonstrating of what prejudice it would be to the Republic if the Imperialists did not show as good a disposition to remove out of their territory as the French have done.

“The Ambassador tells me the Emperor assured him once more, that orders have been given to Count Linange (and shall be repeated) to press forward ; with which promises the Ambassador dispatches one of his courier[s] this evening, and within five or six days more he will send away the other, with positive information to the Senate what they are to depend on, according as he perceives these resolutions have been duly executed ; in which case he declares to me, upon his honour, that the Republic will never think of taking any measures contrary to the Emperor’s interest. But on the other hand (he says) he will not answer for any extremities they may run into, if they find themselves tempted to despair by ill usage, for rather than they will allow winter quarters to the prejudice of their subjects, and to the discredit of their Republic, he believes they may resolve on a sudden to take a share in this war, by joining with that side which seems to have the most regard for them. He added that in this conjuncture he thought their friendship was not to be neglected, since their decision on either side might soon turn the scale in favour of that party for whom they should think fit to declare, the Venetians being at present in a condition to act with 40,000 men and 30 men-of-war, if they were obliged to exert themselves.

“You will be pleased to observe that the discourses I have now related from the Venetian Ambassador are warmer than those he held with me formerly, which change I impute to some more positive orders, which may have been brought to him by this second courier. However, he softened all, by declaring once more to me that if the Republic was left entirely to their own free will, and those maxims which seemed most natural to them, he really believed they would choose still to continue in the state of a perfect neutrality, since they neither want or desire any subsidies in money from any potentate whatsoever, nor have any thoughts of enlarging their dominions ; though (he confesses) the French King has frequently, by their Ambassador at Paris, made large offers to them of this last kind.

“I was admitted to audience of the Emperor immediately after the Ambassador came out, and represented to his Imperial Majesty of what consequence it was to his interest in Italy to prevent both the Pope and the Venetians from doing anything to his prejudice at least, if they are not yet disposed to declare themselves in his favour. He promised me to use his best endeavours by his partisans at Rome and Venice, and would order his Ministers to inform me what has been done and is now a-doing to that purpose. This is all I could learn from the Emperor himself, for it is his usual method to return none but general answers, and I must try what further discoveries I can make of his intentions by my enquiries among his Ministers. The difficulty will be to know with whom the secret is lodged, since the Emperor changes hands frequently, and sometimes makes use of very extraordinary means and persons for carrying on his designs.

“Of this we have a fresh example in the person of Abbate Cini, a man of obscure birth in the Mark of Ancona, who, however, under the regency of the late Pope Innocent the 12th, found means to insinuate himself into the Court of Rome, so as to obtain the distinction and dignity of a Monsignore; but having allowed himself too great a liberty in a pamphlet he writ against the Church and Government, he was committed, by an order from that Pope, to the Castle of St. Angelo, whence he was delivered by the present Pope Albani, but was never restored to the degree of prelacy, of which he was divested for the reason above mentioned. By this disgrace he was discouraged from pretending to any further church preferment, and from residing any longer at Rome; so he resolved to try his fortune at Vienna, where I suppose he had heard many persons of less virtue and merit than himself had found ways of being introduced to pensions and employments. Here he loitered some years without making any figure or appearance. At last, by some intrigue (which none of our Ministers will own to have been immediately concerned in), he got to be send [sent] to Venice, whence he has held private correspondence with the Emperor for these then [three?] months, and within six weeks has produced a credential under the Emperor’s own hand with the title of Envoy Extraordinary to the Republic. This underhand dealing has given some mortification to Count Berka, the Emperor’s ordinary Ambassador at Venice (who is at present here), and to several of his powerful relations. Most of our Ministers, too, seem sensible that such a slight ought not to have been put to a gentleman of his quality and distinction; nor are the Venetians much edified by the Emperor’s having nominated an Abbot to transact with them in the nature of a public minister, or at bottom perhaps they are not willing to receive one with the second order of Envoy, after having been used to send and receive no other characters than that of Ambassador. However, not to declare this to be the true difficulty of their not admitting Sigr. Cini to audience of the Senate, they have found out an odd expedient to hinder his being introduced among them—by demanding in what habit he pretends to appear? Which question and circumstance perplexes him not a little, for the Nonce [Nuncio] at Venice will not allow him to assume the long robe, which is the badge of a prelate, and the Senate will not admit him with a short cloak, the ordinary dress of an abbot, since the Emperor in his credential distinguishes him by the style of Monsignore. This nicety I believe will hinder our equivocal minister from exercising his function, and I have been told the Emperor himself, being sensible of his error, in having offered to make use of such a man, would gladly retrieve it, by letting him drop, if he could handsomely."

THE QUEEN to SIR L. BLACKWELL.

1704, Nov. 24.—Letters of recall.

ANNE R.

"Trusty and well beloved, we greet you well. Having thought it convenient to recall you from our service in the Court of the Great Duke of Tuscany, and from that to the Republic of Genoua, we herewith send you our letters of revocation to them both, which you are to deliver respectively, accompanying those to the Great [Duke] with such expressions of our esteem and affection for his Highness's person and friendship, and those to the said Republic, with such expressions of our regard for their friendship and interest, as you shall judge proper; after which you shall make all convenient speed to return into our presence, assuring yourself of our favour and gracious acceptance of the services you have rendered us in those Courts. And so we bid you farewell. Given at our Court at St. James's, the 24th day of November, 1704, in the third year of our reign.

"By her Majesty's command. C. HEDGES."

Copy. Addressed: To our trusty and well beloved Sir Lambert Blackwell, Knight, our Envoy Extraordinary to the Great Duke of Tuscany.

SIR L. BLACKWELL'S RECALL.

1704-5, [Jan. 21-24] Feb. 1-3.—Memorial of what passed when Sir Lambert Blackwell, the Queen's Envoy Extraordinary to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, went to take leave of his Highness.

The Envoy had informed Cav. Montemagni, first Secretary of State to the Duke, of his intentions. The Duke sent his equipage and a gentleman of his chamber to bring the Envoy to the palace, where he was entertained for three days. Lord Wargrave<sup>o</sup> and many English gentlemen accompanied the Envoy to the Court, between the ranks of Swiss Guards. On the first day a magnificent dinner was served under the direction of Sir ——— Dereham, an English Baronet, appointed by the Grand Duke Ecuyer de Salle. Then follows an account of the ceremonies observed at this dinner. The healths of the Queen and Prince George of Denmark were drunk. In the evening the Envoy had audience of the Grand Duke, with further ceremonies. A similar dinner was given on the second day, and in the evening the Envoy was conducted to the public theatre, where a fine musical opera was given. There was another dinner and final audience on the third day, and then the Envoy was conducted back to his own house, being accompanied by the said Earl [of Wargrave], his entertainer, and others.

At the end is a list of the persons who dined with the Envoy, including the Earl of Wargrave, Mr. Farmer, Mr. Doran, and Mr. Water, Englishmen, and many Italians.

G. STEPNEY TO SHREWSBURY.

1705, [March 24-] April 4, Vienna.—“I have this moment received the honour of your Grace's letter of the 21st past. We hear nothing further of our negotiation with Hungary, but by the enclosed account your Grace will see the Malcontents triumph on one side of the Danube, and the Imperialists on the other; but if our Ministers understood their master's interest as they ought, they would be sensible he suffers on both sides.

“I trouble your Grace with a transcript of what I have writ to Mr. Secretary about Sigr. Spada. The quæres were made me by the Polish Envoy. I do not conceive what interest his master may have in that business, nor can I judge what design the Court of Rome may have on foot at present; but I have enquired of Mr. Secretary if it be yet her Majesty's pleasure that I oppose any longer Sigr. Spada's coming hither, either with the character of extraordinary or of ordinary Nuncio; that at least I may know what part I am to act.

“The easterly winds keep back our packets from England, whereof four are now wanting.

“The Emperor assures the Envoy from the D[uke] of Savoy, that Prince Eugene shall part the 7th inst.; but I know he cannot be ready so soon, and I believe it will be Easter first. He will stick here as long as he can. Mr. Whitworth got near Muscov on the 27th of February, made his entry there the 28th, and had a private audience of the Czar on the 1st of March, who went away the same evening to visit his fleet at Veronitz, and was to be back again at Muscov within a month, when he intended to begin his march towards Riga, which place he means to besiege with 60,000 men. I believe Mr. Whitworth must accompany him in that expedition. Hitherto he seems pretty well satisfied with his reception. He was attended at his entry by 300 gentlemen and eleven coaches with six horses. The Czar professes the greatest friendship imaginable for her Majesty and for the English nation.”

“PARTICULAR RELATION about SIGNOR SPADA” [by G. STEPNEY].

1705, [March 24-] April 4, Vienna.—“Towards the end of the year 1701, the Pope had a fancy of sending extraordinary Nuntios to Vienna, France, and Spain, with exhortations to peace.

“Upon early notice I had from Rome of this design, I writ a warm letter to Count Caunitz, representing that it would be very prejudicial to the Confederacy if such a minister were admitted, whose coming would only occasion unseasonable jealousies, and draw on a peace before it were consistent with the interest of the Allies.

“The Emperor was very well satisfied with my letter, and ordered his Ambassador at Rome to put a copy thereof into the Pope’s hand, as a sufficient excuse why that extraordinary mission could not be allowed of.

“His late Majesty likewise, approving the step I had made, sent me repeated orders to hinder that minister’s coming hither at any rate; and Mr. Bruyninx had instructions to the same purpose.

“However, the Pope kept to his first resolution, and dispatched Signor Spada this way, but his Imperial Majesty being as resolute not to receive him here, he was obliged to stop short at Passau, where he continued privately in a convent for above a twelvemonth, soliciting for access to this Court, but in vain. Therefore (upon Signor Pignatelli’s being made Archbishop of Naples, and Cardinal) he was ordered as Nuncio into Poland, and has resided there ever since, yet from time to time has made private enquiries if it were yet seasonable for him to make his appearance at this Court; and that the sending of him might not seem to be merely out of a design for making peace, the Pope had once thought of calling away our present Nuncio Davia, and appointing Signor Spada to reside here in the quality of his ordinary Nuncio.

“I have reason to think this project is revived of late, and the question has been asked me, whether I was still averse to this prelate’s coming hither. My answer was, that I had no particular objection against his person (for he is said to be a man of a fair character, and not too partial and adherent to the French interest), but that the opposition I made formerly proceeded entirely from the informations I had of his errand when he left at Rome, and upon that suspicion I might yet endeavour to keep him at a distance, if I perceived his instructions were still the same; whereas otherwise his person and station were both indifferent to me.

“The next question was, if her Majesty were willing and desirous that a good intelligence might be restored between this Court and that of Rome, which for those [these?] two or three years has been interrupted by several disagreeable accidents. To which I answered that it ought to be the Emperor’s peculiar care to manage the Court of Rome at all times, and that it would be agreeable to her Majesty if the number of his friends increased everywhere; particularly, that the Pope having given many instances of his partiality to France, it was high time (and to be wished) that, towards settling the Balance of Europe, he would at last show some acts of kindness to the Austrian family, which stood much in need of them; and the Pope might have frequent occasions of favouring their interests, both by assisting their armies at present, and by confirming hereafter their right to the kingdom of Naples, &c.”

MARLBOROUGH to SHREWSBURY.

1705, Aug. 24, camp at Corbais.—“I was flattering myself with hopes of the long expected happiness of seeing your Grace in these parts, when I received the honour of your letter of the 10th instant, with an account of your being laid up with a fit of the gout. I assure you I take great share in whatever you suffer, and am the more concerned at your present illness, because it deprives me of the sole satisfaction I had proposed to myself for the rest of the campaign; for which loss, however, I should think myself sufficiently recompensed if for a transient fit you should get rid of your old distemper.

“Our army is in a manner laid up too by a disease for which I see no cure; otherwise there is great reason to believe we might now have made a considerable progress in the enemies' country, in order to which I had at the camp at Meldert with great difficulty got together a provision of about ten days' bread; and having marched four days together through several defiles and part of the Bois de Soignies, the Army came the 18th instant into a spacious plain, with only the Ysche between us and the enemy. About noon we were formed in order of battle, and having visited the posts with Mons. d'Auverquere, we resolved the attack, thinking there was no more to do but to order the troops to advance, when the Deputies of the States, having consulted their other Generals, would not give their consent; so that I was with great regret obliged to quit the enterprize, which promised all imaginable success, and to march back with the melancholy prospect of being able to do nothing more this campaign, whereof so much still remains behind, than make the seige of Leeuwe, and demolish the lines.

“This disappointment, at a time when our expectations are so little answered elsewhere, makes me very uneasy; and since all my remaining consolation is in your good company, I hope, as soon as you have your health, nothing will hinder you from hastening this way.” Signed.

[P.S., in his own hand.] “This last disappointment vexes me so much that I am dead with the headache, which I hope will prevail with you to pardon my making use of Mr. Cardonel's hand.”

SHREWSBURY to [SIR JOHN TALBOT].

1705, Sept. [10-]21, s.n., Augsbourg.—“I believe you will be surprised with what I am about to tell you, that yesterday morning I was married to an Italian widow lady I knew at Rome. Her being without fortune and a foreigner will make my choice censured by everybody, but I am persuaded she will approve herself so good a wife and so good a Protestant that I shall not have just cause to repent what I have done." . . .

SHREWSBURY TO SIR JOHN TALBOT.

1705, [Sept. 27-] Oct. 8, s.n., Augsbourg.—“Yesterday I had the favour of yours of the 7th Sept., and three days before Mr. Frankland sent me, from Vienna, two of your letters of a very old date, viz. the 22nd of June and 6th July; and since you are so kind to enquire about my health, I shall acquaint you that it is about a month since my bleeding stopped; but I have a bad cough which has followed me ever since I came first to Venice, which was what I writ Mons. Delafage word, I feared would hardly ever leave me; and if I repeated the same to you, I should say no more than I believe. However, I intend tomorrow or next day to remove forwards to Francfort. . . .

“This I am confident will make me a very prudent wife, and I think I may answer for her that she is a good Protestant, having resolved on that change some months before I ever mentioned my design of marrying, but upon my lending her a Bible in the vulgar tongue, where she was infinitely surprised to find so little of her old religion.”

JOHN WILLIAM [ELECTOR PALATINE] TO SHREWSBURY.

1705, Nov. [19-] 20, Dusseldorf.—Compliments. Regrets that he was unable to see him in passing.

French; signed. Endorsed by S.: Elec. Palatine to me.

BENJAMIN FURLY TO [SHREWSBURY].

1706, Dec. [14-] 25, n.s., Rotterdam.—“My Lord,—Give me leave, I beseech you, to lay before you three things that are with me of very great concernment, and in all probability will be brought before that august assembly where your Lordship justly makes so great a figure.

“First, the oppression under which the manufactures, linens, &c., of these Provinces do lie (beyond the linens of Germany), which pay at their entrance into England at least 33½ per cent. customs, and some much more; whereas all the manufactures and corn coming out of England hither do not pay 5 per cent. custom inwards here. By which means the province of Overysel (whose chiefest subsistence is by the art of weaving) is so impoverished, that they have earnestly pressed for an imposition upon English manufactures; and other Provinces for the like upon English corn, the great quantities of which being imported here, brings (sic) down the prices of their corn, so that their tenants cannot pay their rents, nor the landlords their taxes, and so the Provinces not bring in their quota to the General Tax.

“ But some, wiser than other some, thought it more advisable to steer another course, and to find a way to get relief in England, by finding a medium by which they might be in a great measure eased, and her Majesty’s revenues not at all, or very little, diminished.

“ And one of the members of the States General, honouring me with a visit, opened this case to me, and communicated to me a memorial he had conceived, to be given to my Lord Duke [Marlborough], desiring me to examine it, and if I found anything amiss in it to redress it; if too short, to add to it my considerations, and to put it into English; intending to have given it over in that language; but that was over-ruled, and it was finally delivered in French.

“ He further desired that I would recommend the equity of it to all lovers of both nations, that heartily desire the continuance and increase of the good harmony (so terrible to the common enemy and so salutair for Europe) betwixt the two nations.

“ My Lord Duke, as I have been informed by members of the State that were present, declared himself so satisfied in the justice and equity of the case, that he promised to join his endeavours with those of Monsr. de Vrybergens to obtain relief for them.

“ The case, my Lord, is this. About 70 years ago, when your Act for Poundage was first given to K[ing] Ch[arles] I., these Provinces made and transported into England only fine Hollands, which were rated (justly enough) in the Book of Rates, one with another, at 5 shillings the English ell, and paying 5s. in the pound, the custom inwards was 3 pence an ell.

“ This was fair and just enough at that time; but since that time these Provinces having fallen into the manufacture of a coarser sort of linen, that is not worth, one with another, half-a-crown the English ell, do actually pay to the Crown double what the Parliament intended to give.

“ On the contrary, 70 years ago, in Germany, they made mostly coarse linens, more fit for package than wear, which one with another was valued (as right was) at a low rate.

“ But since the prohibition of the French linen, they have, by the Refugiez about Hambrough, introduced the making of French lockrams, dowglasses, &c., by which the German linens are now one with another of a higher value than in the Book of Rates, of which vast quantities are imported into England at a very low customs, inferior to the real value, by which they can undersell the low priced linens that are imported hence into England.

“ The occasion England has had from time to time since the Revolution to raise their Book of Rates, by the lump, has brought the 3 pence an ell to 10 pence halfpenny an ell, by which meaus these Provinces pay so excessive much more than the Germans, which ruins the trade of this country.

“The remedy proposed is so fair, so equitable, and so easy to be understood that I cannot believe but that it will pass. And that is this.

“That the merchant (who best knows the value of his own goods) shall value his goods as he thinks fit, on this penalty, that if the officer pleases he may accept them at that price for his own account, only laying down 5 per cent. more to the merchant.

“By this means her Majesty shall receive more than the Book of Rates requires, for linen that is worth more than 5 shillings an ell.

“And the German linens must needs pay much more than now they do, because it's not to be thought that merchants, after they have run the hazard of the sea in order to get money, will at last, by an undervaluing of their goods, run the hazard of selling their goods to the officers to loss.

“It's hoped, seeing these Provinces shall on this wise yet pay 16 $\frac{2}{3}$  per cent. for their linens and other manufactures, while those of England do not pay full 5 per cent., that this will find no difficulty among those that rejoice in the good harmony hitherto conserved so well; as also that her Majesty's revenues will be little or nothing impaired thereby.

“And that if (upon trial) it should, that the Parliament will have the same goodness as to supply the defect of that fund some other way, as they have oft done in the last reign.

“If this pass, it will lay such a foundation of confidence betwixt these nations, that it will silence all the insinuations of the partisans of France, by which many not ill minded men are caught: that England is the only rival we have in point of trade that can do us any considerable harm; that therefore we must have a care how we are by them drawn to carry on this war too long, to the too much weakening of France, whom we may have occasion for to balance the power of England, from whom we have nothing to expect, when they have served their turns of us, but that they will oppress us in our trade. Witness their loading our manufactures, as they have done, that we cannot trade against the Germans, &c.

“This is the only tool they have to make use of; which by this means being wrestled out of their hands, they have nothing else to say; their mouths will be perfectly stopped, and be at a loss to find new matter of jealousy.

“But if this should not pass, it will not be in the power of the most moderate and discreet friends of both nations, and consequently of Europe, to stop the retaliation. I dread the consequence, for it cannot but produce those impositions upon all English manufactures and corn, as will be tantamount to a prohibition.

“And then we shall have nothing to trade in, from England, but lead and tin, and some few other commodities, of no great value, and tobacco and sugar from our Plantations; and the last they will not want, because they can be supplied cheaper from their own Colony of Suriname.

“What effect this will have upon England, upon the poor of England, upon the rich and landed men of England, upon the merchants, owners of ships, and seamen of England, I leave your Grace, and all reasonable patriots, to judge.

“Especially adding this consideration, that if it once be passed, it will be a great doubt whether ever it will be repealed; for they that have hitherto hindered, because without their consent it cannot be done (sic).

“If once passed, they cannot procure the repeal, except all seven of the Provinces consent. Of this we have had now 35 years’ experience, so that it is, my Lord, not the vision of a disturbed brain, mislead by fear, for private interest.

“In the year 1671, when that noble patriot Mons<sup>r</sup>. De Wit brought a proposition into the States General, in the name of the States Provincial, for the prohibition of all French wine, brandy, and manufactures, the Inland Provinces, watching their opportunity, would not consent to it, but upon condition that the Trading Provinces should, at their request, consent to an imposition of 25 per cent. upon the importation of all foreign butter, beef, and pork.

“Which being consented to on all hands, two distinct Acts were passed the same day. When the Peace came, and the trade was set open again with France, the Trading Provinces, Holland and Zealand, expected a repeal of that imposition of 25 per cent., which was prejudicial to them, but they would never consent; and so our trade to England and Ireland has remained, notwithstanding all our endeavours, by our Ambassadors and Envoys, under that oppression to this day, which we now hope to see taken off.

“All Europe is certainly now convinced that if England and Holland continue united, they need not care what France would be at, but may set him laws. But experience will show, if ever you jar (which I hope not to live to see), you will both become a prey to that wolf.

“I have nothing more to say upon that theme. The next is that which my son (secretary to Lord Peterborow) advises me from Milan (which I received not till yesterday, and ought to have had a month ago), that the Emperor takes possession of the Duchy and assumes the title of Duke of Milan; which so alarms the Powers of Italy, and especially the wary State of Venice, that they are on the point of declaring against us. And ’tis here reported that that’s the errand of their Ambassadors that are lying here for a fair wind into England.

“He says the eyes of all the Italian Powers are upon her Majesty, whom [who] they hope will take as much care of the peace and rest of Italy as of Europe; and that if her Majesty and this State (who surely may now if ever) speak not with authority, the Germans, by plundering Italy, will go near to hazard the losing the advantages the Allies have there gained, as their rambling through Arragon to plunder has hazarded all in Spain. Upon which subject I presume to send your Lordship a letter come forth here, in English, French, and Dutch.

“The next thing I have to beg your Grace’s favourable assistance in, is on behalf of the poor afflicted oppressed Protestants of France, whether in the nation, or fled into other nations.

“For them, I think, in justice ought to be demanded, first, the discharge of all those that have for many years been groaning under their oppressions in the galleys, sighing in prisons and monasteries, deprived of their estates, because they could not conform to a religion which their consciences abhorred; the restoring them to their estates, and former privileges.

“Secondly, the restoring that Fundamental Law of France, sworn to [by] their Kings, viz., the Edict of Nantes; and the building of all those churches they have contrary to law demolished, and the liberty of exercise therein. This is but justice, and might be justly insisted on.

“But if, for fear of offending his Holy Father the Pope, and disobliging the Church, he dares not do it, but rather shall resolve to hazard all, and resist as long as he can than yield to that; and the Allies (I mean the Protestant Allies) should not think fit to continue the war so long, upon that account: then I desire that they at least procure that liberty for all the French Protestants under their power, and for any that are fled into other parts, if they will, to return, and take possession of their estates, [and] stay there to administer them, without being disturbed by the Clergy for non-conforming to their worship; to sell their estates, and retire whither they please; or to retire with their persons, and leave the administration of their estates to the care of whom they please.

“Which liberty Protestants of all nations, even English, Dutch, and Germans, do enjoy at present, though in the state of war; and therefore the squeamish stomach of the Clergy cannot have anything against it.

“I the more humbly beg your Lordship’s intercession with her Majesty in this point, because the politicians here, I find, do not think it their interest (as they declare) to make the return of the Refugees easy into France, though they seek to cover themselves with two other reasons: 1, That it is a domestic affair, and that it will be difficult to make laws for his family; 2, That it’s no part of the Grand Alliance, and that therefore their Allies (the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy) may protest against it. Of the last I am pretty well assured, by letters from my son, and by Colonel Pepper, lately come thence express, that he and Prince Eugene are so warm at pursuing the common enemy, that they themselves are for helping the Camisards to recover their liberties.

“And as for the Emperor, au pis aller, if he should be so disingenious (sic), considering what the Protestants have done for him and his family, I know no great matter they should lose by his sitting still, for he has hitherto done little more for the common cause, or indeed for himself.

“As to the pretence of its being a domestic affair, and therefore not so proper for foreign powers to concern themselves with, it is not so domestic as the affair of Religion in the Empire, which the French King would regulate in the 4th article of the Ryswyk Treaty, contrary to the Peace of Munster, that was become a fundamental law of the Empire in the affair of Religion, which has been so prejudicial to the Protestant interest, and given such great disturbances and occasions of complaint to the Diet at Ratisbon.

“And of all men this suits worse in a Dutchman’s mouth, since they have so manfully declared themselves to the Emperor, as they have done, in the affair of the Election of the Bishop of Paderborn to the Bishopric of Munster; not darkly intimating that it will be more honour to the Emperor to observe his oath in maintaining the right of Election than to violate it, and that if he should, they will maintain it.

“Is the law for freedom of Elections in the Empire less domestic than the law for the liberty of the Protestants, by virtue of the Edict of Nantes, in France?

“Or is it less lawful to contend with the common enemy for the liberty of our brethren than it is to contend with our Ally for the observance of a law that concerns not our Religion? But it will be said we do it not but as a thing that concerns the interest of the State; and against that there is no arguing. But to show that the State is in no danger of suffering by obtaining (at least) such a liberty of enjoying and disposing of their estates as they see fit; for if that be obtained, it’s not to be believed that many, if any, will return to inhabit in France, but only to receive and settle their affairs, and return to live and spend their income in those places where they have the free exercise of their Religion, free from those intolerable taxes of France, and that arbitrary power that disposes of men’s lives, liberties, and estates by will and pleasure.

“I cannot well, having the pen in my hand, omit to say something, though out of my sphere, to the proceedings of the Scotch Parliament and People (with equal zeal) against one another about the Incorporating Union.

“No man has been more desirous of the most strict union of these two nations than myself, as being a security to Europe, by shutting the door upon all attempts of France, for sowing of jealousies, and effecting a rupture betwixt them.

“But when the spirit of the nation shows itself against that manner of Union, it seems to me to be of very ill consequence for the representatives or trustees of the people to run so directly counter to the so earnestly declared sentiments of their principals, and indeed masters, as to reject all manner of clauses that notoriously tend to the advantage of the nation; as, for example, the insisting upon the repeal of the Test, that the inhabitants and members of the Church of Scotland may be as well qualified to bear offices as the inhabitants and members of the Church of England, even in Scotland. They seem to me to act more like pensioners of England than a Parliament of Scotland, and to run no small risiu [risk ?] of their lives, if, by any way or means, the other party should prevail.

“So that I should rather see such a Federal Union as betwixt the 7 Provinces, who do each keep their own sovereignty, laws, rights, and customs, which, in my mind, does as well preserve the Union against all attempts of France to disunite us, as this.

“Whereas this Incorporating Union seems to lay such seeds of dissension, animosity, and heartburning, that in unmortified men that are not masters of their passions must needs produce the quite contrary of an union of spirits and interests.

“And I pray God it breaks not out into tumults and war, and makes them not seek another King than that of England, if her Majesty (whom God long preserve) should soon die. And then France will have his will with a witness.

“But suppose it should come to a war betwixt the next King of England and Scotland, and that Scotland should be conquered, will not England be in danger so to be also? Conquest makes Kings thirst after more; witness the present French King. But I have already trespassed too much upon your Grace’s patience, and so must break off.

[P.S.] “My Lord,—My son would take it as a great honour if he might have the liberty to write, upon occasion, to your Lordship, to inform your Grace of passages in those parts.”

SHREWSBURY to MR. B. FURLY.

1706, Dec. 27, o.s., Heathrop, near Chipping Norton, in Oxfordshire.—“It was yesterday only that I received the favour of your letter of the 25th, n.s., and should be very ready to follow your advice in those things wherein you think the public concerned, but I am here in the country, where I design to remain at least this winter, out of the way of doing either good or harm. What you say about the linen duty is very reasonable, but I question whether it will be easy to alter it; first, because people having lent money upon the Customs as they now stand, a Parliament is tender in changing their security; besides, we have too many in this nation, though very unjustly, cry out on the Dutch, that they having [have ?] trade with France, the advantage of returns, [and ?] great part of our money spent in their country; in short, they reckon up many advantages, and will conclude the Dutch grow rich by this war. This, though it be known by all impartial people for a most gross mistake, yet will serve to hinder many from consenting to accept the expedient proposed; at least, I tell you my fears, though not my wishes.

“As soon as I heard P[rince] Eugene had taken possession of the Duchy of Milan in the Emperor’s name, I apprehended it would have the consequences you fear. I make no doubt that our Court represents this at Vienna, but I am out of the world, and neither know nor enquire.

“The poor Protestants in Languedoc, when they made so brave an effort for their own liberty, received so little assistance from the Allies, that I doubt it is too sure a sign that such care will not be taken of their interest at the Peace as were to be wished.

“Several letters from Scotland say the aversion to the Union is not such as it appears, but as in every county and borough there are men of different opinions, so it is easy to procure addresses for and against anything; and they pretend the majority and those of best substance are not against it, though the most clamorous are. If this fact be so, the Union may be advantageous to both kingdoms; but [I] must agree with you, if it be otherwise, that it is of dangerous example that a Parliament should presume to make such an alteration in a government as is now doing in Scotland, contrary to the inclination and general cry of the people.

“I give your son many thanks for the offer he makes of writing to me, which I should very willingly accept, but I suppose both you and he know upon what terms my Lord Pet[erborough] and I have been for some years; so that if his ill will to me still continues, it might be prejudicial to your son, making my Lord suspect that I encouraged this correspondence with a malicious design against him, though it be very contrary to my temper to do a thing of that nature; and it is well known that I industriously avoid discoursing of what relates to his concerns, being desirous neither to join with those who asperse or flatter him further than that upon all occasions I have and will confess it is my opinion he wishes England and the common cause very well. These things considered I doubt whether it will be proper for your son, in the station he is, to correspond with me, but am certain he ought not to do it without acquainting my Lord P——. I give you my thoughts with this sincerity, because I profess myself your friend.”

[THE DUKE OF] BUCKINGHAM to [SHREWSBURY].

1707, Nov. 29.— . . . “I will take the liberty to mind you of our last discourse at our very last parting, when you offered the pains and care of any mediation between parties, if ever there appeared as much opportunity as we both thought there was reason for such a moderation. Now I must own believing so public a good likelier to proceed from the zeal and industry of the two most moderate men on both sides, than from either the justice or the wisdom of so good a work, not to mention the very necessity of it to prevent the public ruin, which I am sure you foresee much better than I. I know one objection to this is obvious, that the union between the Court and some others, so lately resettled, will make those others slight any new friends. But first, that is supposing they would not be helped even by enemies for public good (which is unexcusable); and then besides, it would be imagining that the present union can continue between those who have all the power and others who desire and expect it; which I conclude with everybody else to be absolutely impossible." . . .

BUCKINGHAM to [SHREWSBURY].

[1707,] Dec.—“I was very glad of receiving your favour so soon, and especially for finding in it no more complaints of your late indisposition, which therefore I hope is gone. I am sure the obscurity you mention can be only be (sic) my fault, though committed by over-caution, because of the post; and now to clear it in plain words, it was taken for granted universally here, at the beginning of the Session, that the Court and some Low Churchmen were fallen out, which was confirmed by none of the latter having taken the least notice of the Speech, according to the accustomed compliments, and their putting the House some time afterward upon a day for considering the State of the Nation, in relation to so many mismanagements both as to the Navy and Trade. But after the suitable expectation of such a debate, it ended without the least reflection on anybody, much less of the Ministry, unless from Lord Haversham alone. There can be little doubt of what was presently surmised without doors concerning the reconciliation or rather resettlement of the former union, of the small lasting of which I gave you my opinion, and accordingly wished a firmer reconciliation between those of both H[igh] Church and L[ow] Church who desired only the public good, as we did. And truly, if it were not too good a thing to be hoped for, yesterday's debate appeared like a beginning of it, by many good orders and addresses directed in the House upon the speeches of several, without any opposition between some who are not wont of late to agree so well.

“I have now erred too much on the other hand, being tedious in speaking plainly with one who may safely and will (I hope) use me as freely.”

[SHREWSBURY to BUCKINGHAM.]

[1707, Dec. 8.]—“My misunderstanding your letter proceeded in part from the caution you mentioned, but more from ignorance of what is transacted above. I have a great neighbour I see once or twice in a winter; he talks with some freedom with me, and I with him; otherwise I have little correspondence with any who give me any light into public affairs, and as little curiosity to know them; so your Grace will believe I am ill enough instructed. I am very inclined to think the re-union you mention will not be extreme lasting, and that nothing is more desirable for the good of the public than that men of moderation should be employed. Some of that character are already in places of the greatest importance, and it were well if there were more. I am sure I wish it, and should readily contribute to it if I knew how, but confess I cannot see which way a man so retired as I can be useful in bringing it about without changing the whole course of my life, with which I am at present so perfectly well contented that I should be very unwilling to do it. I speak with great plainness and sincerity in this particular."

GI. [BURNET] BISHOP OF SALISBURY to [SHREWSBURY].

1707-8, Feb. 18.—“I ought to ask you many pardons for a high presumption I am guilty of in putting so great a trouble on your Grace as D. Goodwin brings with him. My design in so bold a proposition was that he should read these volumes to you; for I should be extreme sorry to put your Grace's eye to the least stretch on any performance of mine. . . . As you go through, if you have patience and leisure for that any time between [now] and next winter, I make it my humble suit to you to desire D. Goodwin to take memorandums of such things as you judge are wrong told, or were better suppressed; and if I might be so bold as to beg you to supply anything that is wanting, D. Goodwin will write whatsoever your Grace will be pleased to dictate to him. . . . A work of this nature is of such importance that it ought either to be quite suppressed, or reviewed with all possible care and caution.”

RO. HARLEY to [SHREWSBURY].

1708, July 27.—“I have been fourteen days in town, and am returning again into Herefordshire, having left my horses when I came up at Oxford. I intend to be at Stow-on-the-Wolds on Friday next, and first either wait upon your Grace or not as you think fit, or I will come to any third place, where I may have the honour of kissing your hands, for half-an-hour. I have contrived my journey thus: I intend on Saturday morning to go from Stow to Tewkesbury only, so that I can have time on Saturday to come to any place your Grace shall appoint; but if your Grace, who is the best judge, thinks it not proper I should see you, be pleased to signify your pleasure either way in two lines, to be left at the King's Arms in Stow, and I will obey your commands either way, and give your Grace the best accounts I can in writing.”

THE COINAGE.

[ .]°—1. Paper by Sir Joseph Child.

Has taken time to consider his answer to their Lordships' [the Privy Council's] command, for his opinion as to what may reform the current coin of this kingdom, reduce it to a certainty, and prevent clipping, counterfeiting, and exporting. The causes usually assigned to this complex disease are: (1) the payment of his Majesty's Army in Flanders; (2) the French taking so much of our East and West India commodities, a great part of which before the war our neighbour nations used to buy of us, whereby the balance of our trade with foreigners was more equally supported.

Does not believe that these are the chief causes of the badness of our money, or of the high rates of gold and silver. These are as dear in other countries as in England. The loss of the said commodities has been counterbalanced by the vast exports of corn, malt, butter, cheese, woollen goods, &c., occasioned by the war. The apparent abundance of clipt and counterfeit money is due to the old and new bankers hoarding up the weighty money. The excessive rates are caused by the large sums paid to soldiers, viz., Swiss, Scots, Irish, Danes, Swedes, Savoyers, and remote Germans of all sorts.

A common remedy proposed is to raise the value of our English money, so that an unclipt crown shall be made current for 6s. 3*d.* or 6s. 6*d.*, and other species proportionably. But the standard, about 60s. to 12 ounces Troy, has continued much the same for 100 years past; though it is true that in former reigns there was a gradual advance from 20s. to 60s.

It is alleged that all the unclipt silver will be melted down for the sake of the 14*d.* or 15*d.* which may thus be obtained, the rate being now 6s. 6*d.* per ounce; but this is not an argument for raising the value, as the price of silver would rise at once. There would then be much more melting than now. The Directors of the Banks have so much honour, or too many eyes upon them, to cull out and melt down or export the heavy money; whereas, if there be a new coin, there will be a rise of gold and silver, as they always go together; and many thousands in the nation, merchants, shopkeepers, and others, who know the trick as well as the goldsmiths or refiners (which has been practised in London for above 40 years), will cull out the heavy pieces to melt down, sell, or transport, which they call correcting the errors of the press or mint, and such errors there will always inevitably be.

The proposed raising of our coin would cut off for ever a quarter of every nobleman's and gentleman's estate settled by lease, annuities, &c. It is said that this will not hurt landowners, as they are forced to take clipt money from their tenants; but the heavier pieces of our new coin will soon be gone, and ill men by washing and otherwise will lessen the weight of our lighter pieces. It is true that tenants would have 7½*d.* instead of 6*d.*

* These three and the following undated papers are all in Vol. 24.

per pound for their butter, but landlords for 6*d.* of rent would have only 4½*d.* or 4¾*d.* A similar method was tried in Portugal, to prevent exportation, yet no such effect followed, but only the abatement of rents; though the noblemen there have been refreshed by the neutrality of that Crown, and their trade in wines has been increased by the prohibition of French wines.

Recommends that nothing be done at present. This is but a temporary rise, occasioned by the war. Peace will restore gold and silver to the rates they have held for two or three ages, viz. silver between 5*s.* 2*d.* and 5*s.* 4*d.*, and gold about 4*l.*, per ounce. Clipt money is less troublesome to country commerce than it was twelve months ago. People are reconciled, with the help of Bank bills, to receive and pay guineas at 30*s.*; and if the King would accept them in his Exchequer at 28*s.* 6*d.* or 29*s.* the business of the nation would go on without inconvenience; but if he accepts them above 29*s.* they will rise in common use to 31*s.*

No title or signature. Endorsed: Sir Joseph Child, about the Coin.

2. A paper in French on the English silver coinage, with some recommendations. 5½ pp.

3. A proposal for loans to be made to the King, at the Exchequer, of old hammered moneys, being clipt, or which cannot pass in ordinary payments, before 4 Nov. 1696, at the rate of 5*s.* 8*d.* per ounce; for the re-coinage of such moneys, &c. 2 pp.

[J. NELSON to SHREWSBURY.]

[ . ]—"In obedience unto your Lordship's commands upon what you proposed concerning a revenue, I shall offer these my following calculations, as a foundation whereon you may encourage those Lords who shall join with you in procuring his Majesty's assistance for the reduction of Canada, and a grant or patent of said countries unto those who shall contribute or be in disburse for the undertaking; besides, the trade in general will answer the design of the Merchants or Subscribers. Your Lordships may appropriate, or have settled apart upon yourselves, heirs, &c., such a good and reasonable revenue as may be thought proportionable unto your present labour and pains in forming the design, and for your future protection in the defence of the same, which, as it may be raised without grievance, will nevertheless be very considerable, viz., as—

“First, from the beaver, to be paid for each full grown skin in season, to say 12 d. per skin, and so proportionable for all others either small or out of season, will be for at least 200,000 skins per annum	£10,000
Five per centum on all other peltries or furs will amount to at least	4,000
Impost upon all sorts of wines and liquors, at the same which is now paid, will be near	3,000
The Excise for retailing of liquors	1,000
The quit-rents upon lands will be something, but not much.

“There may be also some small duty upon all other goods, as has been practised in New England and New Yorke, as 2 per cent., on which may arise a considerable sum, &c.

“Divers other things may be found out, as the permissions for trade upon the Lakes, with divers unknown nations, who seldom or never come down to Monreall, of which thing alone the Earl of Frontenac does raise annually £3,000.

“The trade of Tadousac River, which is wholly appropriated unto the Company, has ever been valued at about £5,000 per annum.”

J. NELSON TO SHREWSBURY.

[ . ]—“Inasmuch that through your Grace’s indisposition I have hitherto been deprived of that access which otherwise I might have hoped for, and happily might have been of use, for a full discourse and information upon those heads which I preferred unto you of the 24th instant, and whereas Mr. Vernon hath desired my enlargement thereon in writing, I make bold to offer these my following thoughts unto your Grace’s consideration. But before I proceed, I must pray leave to give some account of myself as a necessary introduction unto what I have to say, &c.; as first, that for the space of 26 years I have been continually conversant with the French in the countries of Nova Scotia, L’Accadie, and Canada, for which reason I was in the year ’91 made choice of by the Governor and Council in N[ew] Engl[an]d to settle and establish one Colonel Tyng in the command of P[ort] Royal, a place that then had been newly subjected unto the Crown of England; in which enterprise I had the misfortune to be taken by a French man-of-war, who, from the acquaintance and knowledge they had of me, did, to prevent the informations they thought me capable of giving unto the Court of England, about their countries and affairs in the Northern parts of America, see cause to make an exception unto my release, whereby I have actually suffered near four years and a half’s imprisonment; in which space of time I have continually endeavoured to discover what I thought might be of use unto our interest, and accordingly have sometimes found opportunities, both in Canada and in France, to give such informations as, if due notice had been taken, would have been of good effect, as by some instances I could well make appear, were it not to avoid too much prolixity, &c. The improvement I would make hereon serves only that your Grace may be satisfied whom I am, that so you may be the better confirmed in the truth of my informations, in which as I seek not my particular advance or interest, so I trust the readier belief may be given unto what I shall here expose, &c.

“Now, having thus premised concerning myself, I shall humbly offer and lay before your Grace my thoughts, first about the affairs of France, in relation to the provinces of Guienne, where I have been most conversant.

“ It is now about a twelvemonth since that, being induced from the discontents and complaints of a great number of persons who are distinguished both by quality and place, I say by reason of the unheard-of oppressions which they were under, divers of them did often discover themselves unto me; amongst which number in a more particular manner I was applied unto by the Secretary unto the King’s Lieutenant of the Province, &c., who by order from the Court was appointed to assist me in the dispatches they permitted me to make unto themselves, which was ordered to be only in the French language; whereby, after some small course of time, and by divers services he rendered unto me (wherein had he been discovered it would have cost him his life), I entered into friendship and confidence with him, so that from his proposals I offered his services unto the Court of England, &c.; whereon I received an answer from hence (by a person who for some reasons I now forbear to name), wherein I was ordered to encourage him with a present of 10 or 12 Lewis’s, in the name of my Lord of Portland. I accordingly did disburse something more upon him, and withall giving him assurance of the good acceptation in England unto what we proposed; whereon we sent our letter in cipher, in which was amply set down what was then material, as may appear if referred unto; and though, for want of a reply, our projections have been laid aside, yet upon my departure I left him constantly disposed, if duly encouraged, to enterprise and maintain such correspondence as he may be capable of, wherein I presume him as sufficient as most in the realm, &c.; but, as I have already noted, these things cannot be so fully explained as per discourse, if it could be admitted.

“ I must now further crave your Grace’s patience in respect of what relates unto our Northern Plantations in America, wherein as I have by my long experience a more particular knowledge, so am the bolder to lay before you that, as things are now circumstanced, unless we timely prevent the designs and enterprises of the enemy in those parts, we shall in a short space run the hazard of the total loss and subversion of those flourishing Colonies of New Engl[an]d, Road Island, Conecticut, N[ew] Yorke, Virginia, &c., and that for these following reasons, which I shall bring under these heads. The first is, from the methods which the French have for some years and do yet practice both in regard of their own and our Indians, as also towards their own people; secondly, in respect of ourselves, for want of taking such measures as might oppose the enemy’s progress with the natives; and thirdly, from our confusions in matter of government in divers or most of those Colonies, and more especially from the disunion amongst them, which is caused by so great a number of governments, &c.

“ I shall begin with the first, relating to the French, wherein your Grace may please to take notice that the great and only advantage which the enemy hath in those parts does consist chiefly in the nature of their settlement, which, contrary unto our Plantations, who depend upon the improvement of lands or our trade per sea, &c., theirs of Canada has its subsistence from the trade of furs and peltry with the Indians, so that consequently their whole study and contrivance is to maintain their interest and reputation with them, which has been much augmented by that late foolish and unhappy expedition from N[ew] Engl[an]d by Sir W[illia]m Phips, as also for want of due care of settlement in the countries of Nova Scotia, after the taking of Port Royal, wherein, by fatal experience we may lay it down as a maxim that those who are masters of the Indians will consequently prevail in all places where they are neglected, as we have too much done. The French are so sensible of this, that they leave nothing unimproved in this regard, as first, by seasonable presents; secondly, by choosing some amongst them of the most eminent, to whom is given the King's pay as to a Lieutenant, Ensign, &c.; thirdly, by rewards upon all exploits done, either upon us or our Indians, giving a certain sum per head for as many scalps as shall be brought them; fourthly, by encouraging the youth of the country in accompanying the Indians in all their expeditions, whereby not only they become acquainted with the woods, rivers, [and] passages, but of themselves may equal the natives in supporting all the incident fatigues of such enterprises, which they perform by advancing, upon any exploits, the most forward and deserving, unto some office amongst the regular troops, or otherwise by procuring from France some mark of honour, as a letter from the Minister, with some small pension. I have known one of this nature, which did create such an emulation, that if the Earl of Frontenac had not restrained their forwardness, for fear of leaving the country naked, the whole body of their youth would perpetually have been out in parties, &c.

“But fifthly, the greatest and most effectual means that they have taken for the confirming of their Indians, and for the subverting or corrupting of ours, is that for some years, ever since the war, they have from time to time transported into France some of the most eminent and enterprising Indians, not only of their own but of ours, when they have happened to take them prisoners, thereby to amaze and dazzle them with the greatness and splendour of the French Court and Army; where the King hath so thought it worth his countenancing as to send them into Flanders, where the armies have been expressly mustered before them, to show their greatness; at the same time they are not wanting to insinuate unto them our weakness, poverty, and incapacity of protecting them, which they readily believe, not having any other notion or idea of our nation, force, and strength than what they see from our poor settlements about them, from which they cannot expect sufficient support; so that even those of our New York Indians, who have at all times been at perpetual enmity and war with theirs, and consequently with them, are now either turned to their side, or else stand doubtful what to do; and for the fuller completing of their designs herein, there are actually at this instant now at Versailles six ‘sagamoës’ or chiefs, sent from Canada, Hudson's Bay, and Nova Scotia, to solicit such help and assistance against us as, if due and timely care be not taken to oppose them, will prove fatal; and when we come to see the consequence by the disturbance and desolations of our Southern Colonies, which, when our Indians shall be wholly affrightened or gained to their sides, will at all times be easy for them to effect, by reason of their situation upon the lakes and rivers on the back-side of all our Colonies from New Engl[an]d to Carolina, I then say that these things will become more obvious and sensible unto the nation from the loss of that great revenue unto the Crown which is drawn from the produce of those countries. We have had woeful experience what may be done in this kind from the destruction which has been made of the province of Maine and a great part of New Hampsheire, whereby we have in a manner lost our mast, timber, and fishing trade, &c.

“Now, having so far insisted on the advantages which our enemies have and do draw from our remissness, &c., I shall further proceed to offer what remedies I humbly conceive may be most proper for the prevention of their designs, and the mischiefs which will otherwise attend us in those parts, &c.; as first, in regard to our Indians, no better method can be taken than by imitating the French, both as to their encouragements at home, as also to have some Chiefs of the divers nations to be sent into Engl[an]d, whereby to give a counterpoise unto their reputation and greatness, which a sight of the City of London, and what else may be shewed unto them here, or, if need be, in Flanders, will easily effect, inasmuch as those who shall be brought over cannot conceive any [thing] equal or greater than may be exposed unto them. Hereby, upon their good usage, return home, and the report they will make, we shall influence and regain amongst them an esteem of our power, numbers, strength, riches, &c., so that those who are our friends will be encouraged, those who are wavering will be confirmed, and we shall balance or equal our reputation to that of the French with those who are declared against us, &c.

“There are other things in regard of our traffic and trade with them, which will properly belong unto the Governors who shall reside on the place to regulate, by establishing such justice and equality in our dealings with them as may redress abuses of this kind, for where a full trust and dependence can be obtained, love and inclination will follow, even amongst them as well as other people.

“It were not likewise amiss to speak something concerning matters of religion, which in a manner we have wholly neglected the propagation of, except in some few parts near Boston, although there be a very considerable fund or stock established in this kingdom, under the title of an Indian Stock, to which does belong a Governor and Assistants, whose improvement is rather for an increase of [the] said Stock here, than for the instruction, encouragement, maintenance, and conversion of the heathen, according to the intention of the donors, &c. An inquiry herein might be of great use, and indeed the neglects we are under in this regard is [are] at once shameful and injurious; whereas the French, by the propagation of their superstitions, which they do by missionaries always sent and maintained amongst them, may even at our own doors, with our Indians, I say they do hereby, insinuate themselves unto our prejudice, so as to become masters of the consciences of the heathen, and thereby always have them at their devotion; and though our Indians have often made complaints hereon for want of the like due care and instruction, yet no notice hath hitherto been taken thereof, &c.

“In the next place, I must not omit the due encouragement which ought to be given unto our hunters about Albanie or other parts, so that, in all the expeditions that our Indians shall from time to time make upon the enemy, they may be still accompanied with some suitable number of our people, both to accustom themselves, as the French do, as also to enliven and back the undertaking; for otherways it cannot be thought that they should always expose themselves in our quarrels, whilst we remain by our fires, &c., and at the same time the enemy is never wanting in their personal assistance unto their Indians. We are not without as good men as they, but want the like methods, discipline, and encouragement; as for instance, in an action performed by one Skiler<sup>o</sup> of Albanie, whilst I was at Quebec, in the year '91, where he made one of the most vigorous attempts that hath been known in those parts, with great slaughter on the enemies' side and loss on his own, in which had he not been discovered by an accident, it is very probable he had become master of Monreall. I have heard the thing reported so much to his honour by the French, that had the like been done by any of them, he could never have missed of an acknowledgment and reward from the Court, &c., though I do not hear of anything amongst us that hath been done for him. I speak this only to show what discouragements our people are under, whilst the French neither omit nor spare anything for the promoting of their designs, &c.

“I am now to make another remark upon the principal and greatest defect and mistake we have hitherto lain under, which is the number and independency† the one from the other of so many small governments; whereby our strength is not only divided and weakened, but, by reason of their several interests, they are become and do in a manner esteem each as foreigners the one unto the other, so that, whatever mischief does happen in one part, the rest remain unconcerned. By this disunion our strength is weakened, whereas, were the Colonies of N[ew] Engl[an]d, Hamshire, Plimouth, Road Island, Conecticott, N[ew] York, &c., joined in one, we then should be at least 15 for one with those of the French in Canada, and might reasonably propose that, instead of a bare defence, we might be in a capacity, with the assistance of some ships from England, to make an entire conquest upon that place; to which enterprise if the securing of our interest in America, or if honour, profit, or facility in the undertaking could be sufficient arguments to induce, we are thereby obliged no longer to be negligent herein. I see not any particular advantage that our nation can pretend unto in this present war, but this, which is such as, if known, would I presume be no longer omitted. I have herein to instance from the value of their traffic in furs and peltry, which is not less than about 200,000 [L.] per annum. Whilst I was at Quebec they esteemed to have had much more value in the town; since which, upon their taking of Fort Nelson, in Hudson's Bay, they are become in a manner sole masters of that trade, and will be continually encroaching unless we put some stop thereunto.

* Major Peter Schuyler.—State Papers, America, 1691.

† “Of our Governments” interlined here, but struck out.

"I am not ignorant of the difficulties that may be objected, and the discouragements we are under from the unfortunate attempt of the late Sir W[illiam] Phips, wherein we could not reasonably expect much better, the affair being so rashly undertaken, without order, method, provisions, ammunition, or conduct, and yet had the enterprise been well timed as to the season of the year, and the forces from Albanie proceeded as was designed, the place had undoubtedly been ours; so that our miscarriage herein ought not to affrighten us from the attempt once more, wherein, if requisite, I could further enlarge, both as to the enemies' and our own circumstances, as also to the necessary methods and ways to be taken for the execution, &c.

"I shall now close what I have said, in discoursing unto your Grace the reasons I have for my jealousies of the French's enterprising upon some or more of those parts above mentioned; wherein you may please to take notice that, when I was removed from Angoulesme unto the Bastille, I had sent to treat with me, about the manner and circumstances of my release, the Marquis de Cheury and one Mr. de Lagnie, who is the Intendant General of the Commerce and Foreign Affairs of France; with whom, after divers other discourses, we fell into talk of Canada, N[ew] Engl[an]d, N[ew] York, &c., on which we all agreed in the woeful and miserable state those countries were in, from the barbarous cruelty of the heathen, &c., and that nothing were more to be desired than some good accommodation, if it could be found out; to which was proposed, as the only way, the setting on foot, if possible, the late Treaty of Neutrality for those parts, which was concluded on, in King James his reign, by the French Ambassador Barillon and my Lord Chancellor Jefferies, with others that were then appointed.

"The difficulty that we found remaining was, how to find out a way to treat, and with whom, since that the French King was at so great a distance as not to acknowledge King William to be King of Engl[an]d, &c.; to which we found out this expedient, that a power should be procured unto the respective Governors on both sides, to treat and conclude in their own names during this war; whereon I, as a private person, demanded whether they thought it might be agreeable to the Court of France, and, if so, whether they in their private names would give me assurance, without engaging the honour of our Crown, in case that the thing should be approved of in England, and the offer be made unto them, that they should likewise accept it. They told me that they would make the proposal unto Mr. Ponchartraine, and give me an answer. Accordingly, within about a week after, they came to me again, [and] told me that there would be no difficulty in France, the thing being very well liked of at Court, and that I might make the motion here, if I thought fitting.

“The matter remained in this posture between us for a long time, until the arrival of the Canada ships with the six Indians I formerly mentioned; on whose coming things were altered, and a petition from the Canada Company for my detention, as being dangerous to their interests in case I were at liberty. The thing was discoursed before the King in Council, and if my affairs had not been so far ended with me, I should have been detained until the end of the war. I was ignorant of these things, until by a visit from some gentlemen who came from Canada, who discovered to me the reason of my so long remaining in the Bastille, and the danger I was in. But at length they were swayed by a point of honour, in performance of their words, since I had complied unto all their demands. My passport was at last procured, and brought me by Mr. de Lagny and the Marquis de Cheury, who told me that the sentiments of the Court were then changed concerning the Neutrality, and that I should make no mention of it.

“I am since informed that Mr. d’Iberville is appointed with a considerable force for the carrying back the said Indians, and so to attempt upon the coast what he shall be directed unto. I know him to be a very enterprising man, and what the effects hereof will be, unless seasonable and sufficient succours be dispatched, is easy to be judged, especially if the state of those countries be reflected on, as being without Governor, soldiers, officers, or fortifications, or at least such as are rather to be despised than feared, all which the French are no ways ignorant of. I have heard them often discourse as truly and pertinently of those parts as any Englishman the best acquainted could ever do, &c.

“I shall now beg pardon for the weakness or length of this narration, which I have thought my duty to offer, in the interim, until your Grace may think fit further to satisfy yourself in any particular, to which intent I shall always be ready to wait on your commands.”

PAPER by J. NELSON, ON CANADA.

[ . ]—“The Methods or ways I propose for the Reduction of Canada unto the Obedience of the Crown, &c.

“Wherein I shall begin by setting down, the state, situation, and circumstances of that country, as previous unto what I shall offer.

“First, concerning the situation, being upon the great River of St. Lawrence, on both sides of which, for about 80 leagues unto Tadousac, or the Saganie, by reason of the extreme cold and rockiness of the country, is uninhabited. In all this space the River is very large and bold, being at the entrance or mouth about 18 or 20 leagues over, and so gradually lessens its breadth unto about eight leagues. Here, by reason of the Saganie River (which turns to the northward, and makes a passage unto Hudson's Bay), the going up (which continues about five leagues breadth) grows more dangerous, by reason of a very long and shoal point that runs directly cross the River, between which and a small sandy island (which they call the Isle Rouge) is a good channel, through which, having passed and doubled the point, we sail near 30 leagues, keeping the north shore on board, until we come unto the Isle de Coudre, where is also a difficult pass, because of the great tides, so that without a fair wind ships do not adventure themselves. From this place and a little below are some few settlements, to say about 15 or 20 families, until you come (still keeping the north side) unto a high mountainous point called Cap de Tourment, where commonly ships are forced to stop for an easterly wind with the flood to cross over about five leagues to the Island of Orleans. This I esteem one of the most difficult passages of the River; after which we sail upon the south side of Orleans, about seven leagues up to Quebec, without any danger, &c.

"I shall now give some account of their numbers and settlements, as well on both sides of the River as on the Island of Orleans. I begin on the north side, where are:—

	Families.
"From the Isle de Coudre to Cap de Tourment, including a saw mill - - - - -	12
"From Cap de Tourment to Quebec, about 10 or 12 leagues distance, which they call the coast of Beau préé, is said to be near - - - - -	600
"On both sides of the Island of Orleans is said to be about - - - - -	400
	1,012
On the south side of the River is:—
"From the River de Loup to the River Oalle not above - - - - -	3
"At the River Oalle, which is 10 leagues from the R. de Loup, about - - - - -	15
"From the River Oalle along the coast of the Grand Bay, about 10 leagues more, about - - - - -	10
"At the Cap St. Ignace about - - - - -	15
"From the Cap St. Ignace unto the Point de la Vie, which is opposite unto Quebec, 10 leagues, about	30
"The town of Quebec at most does not contain -	300
"Now to proceed above the town in the upper parts of the River, where you must note that the south side is so ill peopled as is not worth mentioning, so the first place of remark is called the Point au Tremble, where, in about three leagues' space, may be - - - - -	100

“ From the Point of Tremble upwards is here and there a single house, until about 15 leagues higher, where is a settlement of about - - - - -	120
“ From thence to the three Rivers, 30 leagues from Quebec, none or few inhabitants: here is a small palisado fort, and a governor, with a few soldiers, and about - - - - -	100
“ From the three Rivers, 30 leagues, no habitations, those that were formerly being ruined by our Indians, until you come unto Mont-Reall, in which town may be about - - - - -	250

“ The land hereabout is good, and was inhabited before the war, but now is all waste, &c. On the south side of the River below Mont-Reall is a small river coming out of the Lake Iroquois, at the head of which is a Fort called Chambly, built of palisadoes, with a garrison of about 60 men, &c.

“ From what is said the whole number and strength of Canada may be computed to be at most not above 2,000 families in near 100 leagues' space on both sides of the River, which is so broad and the tides so strong as renders a communication amongst themselves very difficult; besides, there is never less than about 500 of their best men always amongst the Ottoway Indians, which they can have no service from.

“ This is what I have to say of the situation, strength, and numbers, except the regular troops, of which they have near 1,000 men, with officers from France, who are dispersed in divers parts as occasion does require, &c.

“ I shall now speak something of the advantages, methods, and ways which we have for the subduing of them under the obedience of the Crown of England; wherein I first propose about 1,500 English from the United Colonies, and 500 Indians to march from Albanie, for whose subsistence must be provided a stock of provisions at the entrance of the Mohawke Lake, on which they are to be transported in canoes or flat-bottomed boats unto the Fort of Chambly, which they are to take in their way to Mont-Reall, where, according as they find the garrison weak or strong, they should either attack or beleaguer the place; if the town be taken, then to march down unto the three Rivers, which they are to destroy, and so along the coast, until they come in sight of Quebec; at which time we suppose the arrival of our Fleet, on which we must further have 2,000 men more to land, which men, if arrived before the coming down of our troops from Mon-Reall, are to be improved by making divers descents on the Island of Orleans, and on both sides of the River, whereby to ruin the country by burning their houses, killing the cattle, and destroying their harvest, which is all they depend upon for their subsistence, and which very often is not sufficient without supply from France. By this means, according to the advantage which the country gives of landing at 8 or 10 leagues distance on each tide, the inhabitants may be droven from place to place into Quebec, where it is impossible for them to have any supply of provisions, so that necessity and famine will force the surrender of the place.

“This may not appear so probable to those who are unacquainted, neither can I make the thing so plain as by discoursing on a c[h]art or map, whereon I presume I could easily answer any objections. And what would the more easily facilitate the enterprize is that, wherever our forces shall attack them, it will call their whole strength from the one end of the River unto the assistance of the other, so that the one or the other will be left naked; if they divide their strength they must be too weak, whatever side they turn; if they continue them joined together, the country must be wholly exposed, so that the only refuge left them will be to retire to Quebec, where, when all that body of people—men, women, and children—shall be pent up together, their harvest either destroyed or in our possession, and in those countries it is impossible to have any supply or assistance, so that hunger in a fortnight’s time will constrain the surrender, &c.

“I speak nothing of the value we may expect to find in the place, nor of its trade, or the consequence it is to the Crown by securing our Colonies, any one of which is of sufficient inducement to encourage the enterprize; but of this I have already in some measure explained myself unto his Grace the Duke of Shrewsbury.

“I have now to speak of the inducements and encouragements, both unto the Crown and nation, which will arise upon the success of this undertaking, as first unto the Crown:—

“1<sup>ly</sup>. The security of all our American Plantations, which the French are seeking not only to disturb, but subvert, by their interest with the Indians, wherein they have already made too great a progress. I say that the delivering of our Colonies from the fears they are in is alone sufficient argument, and is well worth the attempting, &c.

“2<sup>ly</sup>. The value we may be supposed to find in the place, which to my certain knowledge will not only defray the charge but recompense those who shall be exposed in the design, &c.

“3<sup>ly</sup>. In respect of dominion, it will be a vast augmentation unto the Crown, in respect of territory and extent. We thereby in a manner become masters, not only of the greatest continent in the world, but are masters of the most considerable fishing, whereby the French have hitherto enriched themselves; hereby we consequently increase our shipping, and give employment unto our men, &c.

“4<sup>ly</sup>. In respect unto the trade of our nation, which will be augmented for at least above 200,000*l.* per annum. We shall hereby become the sole masters of the peltry and fur trade, and our manufactory in England encouraged.

“5<sup>ly</sup>. The recovery of the Hudson’s Bay Company and that trade, which has hitherto been very considerable, and is now in a manner lost by the taking of Fort Nelson, &c.

“6<sup>ly</sup>. The last consideration to be made is the abatement and lessening the French interest and revenue, both as to the trade with the natives, as also to the employment of (sic) the cod fishing on the coast does give unto their shipping and men, which is the greatest they have out of France, and which may be esteemed their chief nursery of seamen, &c."

PAPER by RICHARD DANIEL, ON NEW ENGLAND.

[ .]—"The first chief Planters of New England (called Puritans) were for coactive Councils, and so kept the people in awe, and flourished; but such as since got into power, followed them that overthrew the Assembly of Divines, anno 1643, and are against Councils that are binding, and against a conclusive government. And what recognition those have made of any authority over them is considerable; and although they confess the members of their churches are not 3,000 men, and the freeholders and planters are above 100,000, nevertheless they persisted to get an authority to make such only as are members of the churches to be trusted with the whole power of making laws, raising moneys, and annual elections of all public officers; and that all other their fellow subjects, though vastly more able in estates and other personal qualifications, yet, if not members of their churches, to be debarred of all privileges of Englishmen, and bound to submit to the arbitrary will of a few, their inferiors.

"This was made appear to be of dangerous consequence, both to the King and to his subjects in general; to the King, in divesting him of his regal authority in the designation of the persons to rule and govern, and of his royal assent to the laws to rule and govern; and that it was destructive to the subject, in putting an unlimited power into the hands of the few to oppress the King's subjects among them, be they never so many, and investing one sort of people with that authority, and thus alienating them from the King and laws, whereby they might set up for themselves, or revolt to a foreign state, as they should have opportunity. And though their agents were often warned of their many breaches and forfeitures of their patent, viz. by levying moneys upon the King's subjects that were not free of their Company, and by their exercising the power of life and death, &c., and were friendly advised to submit, yet they continued so averse, that they looked on the very members of their churches as their enemies also that pressed them to that their duty.

"At length the Lord President declared that it was resolved that the King should have his due, and the people in New England should have all the same privileges that his Majesty's subjects in all other his Plantations have. They then, fearing the ill effects of their so long obstinacy would fall upon themselves, and they being then for the present only permitted to choose a government of their own party, closed herewith, and thus the King (after so many years' opposition) has his right of choosing the Governor, Deputy-Governor and Secretary. And the people had all their privileges confirmed, and those others, (as it were) against their will, were settled also. And how well such have since improved that his Majesty's gracious condescension, may (among many other instances) appear by a late printed letter from a person well knowing in that country; but, alas, what better can be expected from such who are both judge, jury, and themselves often parties also.

"So that, if we consider the vastness of his Majesty's territories in America, being above 1,000 miles from Port Royal in Nova Scotia to Charls Town in Carolina, from North East to South West, beside Nova Scotia, which is above 300 miles more, wherein all along are many safe and commodious harbours, navigable rivers, sweet situations, healthy and pleasant countries, abounding with all necessaries for human sustentation at home, and for trade abroad, and wherein are also many populous towns, and a militia of near 20,000 strong and resolute men, it may be well asked how it comes to pass that they defend not themselves against the depredations and incursions of a few hundred of French and Indians? To which [I] conceive the Moaks' answer may not seem impertinent, who say it is because the English are divided into so many petit-governments, that they, minding themselves so much, neglect and let the public interest sink; whereas the French, having but one considerable town upon Canada River, called Quibeq, and that in a cold and desert country, and have but 5,000 men, yet, having but one chief Governor or Vice-Roy, that keeps them in due subjection, have advanced the beaver trade to above 200,000*l.* per annum, and have made them so considerable that the Moaks, though they hate the French, yet are forced to make peace with them for their own security; and should they make a nearer league with them, which we may justly fear, if not timely prevented, such mischiefs may ensue as may not be repaired in ages.

"Now for remedy, it's humbly proposed that his Majesty may send a principal Governor, that is a Person of honour, courage, and generosity, with an experienced Secretary and good Assistants, who may see all the privileges which his Majesty has granted them in New England may be effectually performed, which [I] humbly conceive will never be done by any whose principles are the same, and whose interest is so interwoven with theirs, that they will not, or durst not, impartially execute the same. That the pay of the country ministers for their subsistence (wherein they too long have been abused) may with the town rates be brought to his Majesty's Treasurer, who shall faithfully pay them their due. This will encourage them to work the people to be more morally honest, to love one another, and to obey their superiors and the Government, and the others will, for their own interest, comply also. That — soldiers be sent hence, with able officers to discipline the Militia there, which will make them capable at least to keep under their enemies. To treat the Moaks with small annual presents, according to their custom, and to plant a fort above Albeny, near the said Moaks, to defend them from the French incursions. That the Prime Governor of New England may have a constant corre-spondency with the other Governors, so as to be mutually assistant against a common adversary. And when the Moaks see the English headed by persons of honour, courage, interest, and generosity (for such they only like), they will then renew their old friendship to the English, and cause the other six Indian nations, their confederates, to join with us also; who then may in some time drive the French at least to Quibeq; and we, having some frigates on the north side of Nova Scotia, may so block the French at St. Laurence River as to force them not only to truckle to us for the beaver trade, but for their Newfoundland Fishery also. And thus as Peru (though formerly by the English neglected) became and ever since continued to be the glory, wealth, and advancement of the Spanish interest, so New England, thus settled and encouraged, may become one of the best flowers in the English Garden.

“That the said Richard Daniel was a means to frustrate the French long designs of wresting those large countries from this Crown and nation; and was likewise a means to bring those that had got the power of that country (after their long opposition) to close with his Majesty’s late Charter, whereby the King had his due and right in choosing the Governor, Deputy Governor, and Secretary, and the people had their properties confirmed, and all in obedience to the laws of England, which in more than twenty years before could not be effected, &c.”

THE AMERICAN COLONIES.

[ . ]—“Considerations of the present Benefit and better Improvement of the English Colonies in America.

“A vulgar error has too much prevailed with some of our great men to the prejudice of those Plantations, and therein to the interest of England, viz. that the Colonies of the West Indies drains (sic) us of our people, in which consist our wealth and strength, and consequently we should be richer and greater without them.

“Ans.—1st. Since the Colonies that are of any antiquity, as New England, Virginia, Barbados, &c., were first planted, they have returned as many persons as they have received, as those respective Colonies are able to make appear.

“2<sup>dy</sup>. They received them poor, and returned them rich, which the Exchange knows very well.

“3<sup>dy</sup>. The labour of the people there is at twice the value to England that it would be at home, both because the commodities are more profitable, and that it gives England a market she could not otherwise have, both abroad and at home, to her great enrichment.

“4<sup>thly</sup>. Most of their consumption is from England and Ireland, especially as to cloths and all sorts of household stuff and furniture, and twice as good as they were able to have bought at home, and much oftener renewed, as the Custom-house books will declare; and yet we have the benefit of their labour.

“5<sup>thly</sup>. What England exports to supply the Plantations, and what it imports from them, makes so great a proportion of the yearly revenue of the Crown above what the same number of people in England are worth to it, that the odds are at least five to one; which makes the load lie the lighter upon our shoulders here, for the planter bears it at last.

“6<sup>thly</sup>. The circulation of trade within ourselves is none of the least advantages, especially since they at home purchase the industry of those abroad with at least a double advance upon their own growth and manufactories of what they are sold for here; whereas, were those people at home, their industry would help to abate the value of our own growth and manufactories, by supplying themselves and others who are now mostly supplied from us, and in return furnish us with that which is of more value to us, viz., sugar, cotton, indigo, logwood, cocoa, tobacco, furs, &c.

“Lastly, it more than anything augments our navigation, which being self-evident, and that it is so great a part of the wealth and strength of this kingdom, there is nothing more needful to be said to vanquish that objection, and to confirm their opinion that think America of great importance to the Crown.

“Now for the better improvement of these Colonies, the advantage of which must redound to England, I humbly offer:—

“1st. That the care of America may become the province of a select number of Lords and gentlemen, be it five, seven, or nine, of which there should be one of the Secretaries of State, an able lawyer, and an ingenuous merchant, to be authorised under the broad seal of England, by the style of Lords Commissioners of the English Plantations in America, whose business it should be to meet thrice a week certain, and oftener if need require, to inspect the condition of their affairs, and act what they shall see convenient for the preservation and improvement of those Colonies.

“2<sup>ndly</sup>. That they have the recommending of all Governors and the approving of all secretaries, judges, with other officers of the first rank in the said Colonies that the Governors shall nominate.

“3<sup>rdly</sup>. For their said application and attendance, each a salary in times of peace of 1,200*l.* per annum.

“4<sup>thly</sup>. That the respective Plantations be required to send a true state of their case to the foresaid Lords of their situation and extent, their numbers and produce, their revenue and civil police, with proposals which way to improve the growth of their respective Plantations, to their own and this nation’s advantage, which should be registered in the Plantation Office.

“5<sup>thly</sup>. This, compared with what the Lords may inform themselves of here, will give them such an idea of America, that it will not be hard for them to put things in that order which may insensibly improve those Colonies to the advantage proposed and desired. However, I shall take leave to touch upon a few things that contribute to it.

“ 6<sup>thly</sup>. A better discipline, which I call an artificial virtue, that men should be by constraint what they ought to be by principle, sober, just, and industrious, for at present there is too great a[n] idleness and lewdness indulged in some, and too much oppression upon others, a common complaint from the Sugar and Tobacco Plantations; whereas more and better goods might be produced, were there a good discipline established among them.

“ 7<sup>thly</sup>. Good encouragement should be given to produce that sort of merchandise which we want, and therefore are forced to fetch from strangers, as flax, hemp, tow, masts, pitch, tar, iron, timber converted, which in time of peace will pay freight; also wine, silk, oil, fruit, &c., which may be produced in several of our English Plantations; for, besides the advantage that will redound to us by purchasing of them with our own growth at home, it will prevent the Colonies abroad from falling into those manufactories for their accommodation, which England yearly supplies them with to their great advantage. And England has the greater reason to consider this, by how much it is but too evident that our Woollen Staple is not of that credit abroad it was, and that France and Holland are fallen into the same way.

“ 8<sup>thly</sup>. To redress real grievances, but secretly to punish groundless and vexatious complainers; but, because all these things are in great measure answered by wise and good governors, which is my last head, it is humbly prayed—

“ 9th and lastly. That great care be taken in the choice of Governors and approbation of proper officers under them. They have generally been hungry, ignorant, or extravagant, sent more for favour than merit, and have too much lived upon the blood as well as labour of the people. The whole rests much upon this, therefore I take leave to insist upon it. A Governor should be understanding and regular, have knowledge to comprehend the nature of the place, what it is capable of, and the genius of the people; how to direct and encourage their industry; and next of discipline, to regulate their manners, and make them sensible of the advantages of a good and even government. I think I need not say he ought to be just, since without it neither Colony nor Crown can thrive there. And, if I may be so particular, this Governor should send a yearly account of this administration, as well as legislation, and what revenue, ordinary and extraordinary, and how employed. I would also humbly offer that the Governors may have more of the breeding of merchants than soldiers, and not of quality or humour too big for their business or salaries, or the people they must converse among, men of business and some experience, and that would think 1,000*l.* per annum a bountiful encouragement and reward for their industry and integrity. Under such Governors the Plantations in America shall thrive more in seven years than they have done in thirty.”

“SCHEME of a COUNCIL OF TRADE.”

[ . ]—A paper endorsed as above.

“Tis proposed that a Council of Trade be constituted by Commission under the Great Seal, consisting of 21 persons, 14 merchants of several trades, and 7 noblemen or gentlemen, five to be a quorum, to continue only for twelve months.

“This Council to have power to meet, hear, debate, and report to his Majesty in Council, matters concerning Trade and Navigation, the security and improvement thereof.

“To be likewise empowered to consider such other matters as his Majesty from time to time shall direct under his Sign Manual or Privy Seal.

“That there be 1,500*l.* allowed for house rent, salary to a secretary, and clerks, books, paper, fire, candle, and other incidents.”

A PAPER ON NEW ALBION.

[ . ]—“The Province of New Albion, in America, is situated between thirty-six degrees and one half, the northern bound of Carolina, and forty-eight degrees of northern latitude, having to the east the most westerly bounds of the English Colonies already planted, and to the west the Pacifick Ocean or South Sea. This country is above half occupied by two great mediterranean Seas or Lakes of fresh water, each of them five or six thousand miles in circumference, between which runs a vast River in an almost direct course from north to south, of great breadth and depth, having its fountains at about sixty degrees, and disemboguing into the Gulf of Mexico, at thirty degrees, navigable by ship from the sea up into the country above fifteen hundred miles. And although this River have no immediate communication with the forementioned great Lakes or Seas, yet the same advantages may be made thereby as if it had, by reason of the vicinity of two large Rivers (which on each side empty themselves into the great River) unto two other Rivers, which run into the Lakes, not a league distance from each other; where two towns being settled, the inhabitants might receive such commodities as are brought up or down the great River, and communicate them to those [who] shall dwell upon the Lakes. And those who inhabit any parts of the Lakes may transmit to any parts of the world, by reason of the great River's communication with the Ocean.

“The northern parts of this country abound with beaver and other furs, from whence to the value of above 50,000*l.* are carried to the French at Canada; the south parts with an infinite number of animals, never till very lately known, whose hair would afford a material for divers rich manufactures, together with their skins, far more profitable than that of beaver.

“We have therein likewise discovered mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, copper, brimstone, saltpetre, vitriol, sea-coal, &c. And if there were no other than quicksilver only, it would bring in a vast revenue, the Spaniards being ready and desirous to take off prodigious quantities, without which they cannot work their silver mines, and for want thereof cannot produce a third part of what they might if supplied therewith.

“If this country were granted in a patent to a Company of Proprietors or Undertakers, an incredible benefit would soon redound unto his Majesty and the nation, and probably to the Adventurers. And a great number of persons, considerable for quality and estates, have been long endeavouring to procure such a patent, but hitherto unaccountably frustrated.

“If the Government of New Yorke were united unto that of New England, and both under a person of honour and probity in whom the Undertakers could confide, there are many persons of courage and estates who would immediately raise a fund and begin this noble undertaking, which, once established, would deprive the French, without fighting, of that trade which nourishes Canada, and whereof being divested, Canada would be abandoned; it being very obvious that the English may manage this trade with six times more ease and less expense than the French.”

The WEST INDIES and BARBADOES.

[ . ]—“A Brief Account of the present declining state of the West Indies, in reference to its Trade, &c., and in particular of Barbadoes, as also somewhat proposed for its relief.

“The many and great advantages which England receives from the West Indies, in respect to the revenue, navigation, and trade, do abundantly recommend their worth to us, obliging us thereupon to the utmost care of them in easing them under those insupportable weights and fatal distresses they have groaned under, and removing those feared evils that they are so much possessed with the dread of; it being the great maxim of trade, according to its worth, more or less, so to proportion a suitable regard thereunto. It's not my design to run over and discuss all the particular advantages in their full extent arising to us from the West India trade, yet I shall reflect upon such of them as may render their calamities the more impressingly affecting.

“The vast quantities of our home manufactures almost of all kinds exported thither, and how great we are, and how much depended upon for the produce of these Islands (Holland, Ham-borough, and sundry parts of Germany being so abundantly supplied from thence), also what great numbers of our subjects are employed in the manufacturing of sugars and cotton, are weighty considerations, and will assuredly be found so, if we on the other hand did but duly reflect upon the consumptive and dying state of these Islands, and what great and unaccountable mischiefs this nation will share in from the want of the aforementioned advantages accruing from the West India trade—a trade that hath been more remarkably and dismally wounded than that of any other parts we negotiate with.

“This is most evident from the great numbers of laden fleets, as well as single ships, which have successively been totally destroyed, not only from the mere events of war, but by being detained from sailing three or four months after their proper time, both from hence, and consequently homewards, so that they have had the fatal time of winter to return in; as well as great numbers of privateers to be exposed to, convoys being almost insignificant in their winter voyages, though very useful in summer. Indeed, this mistiming of our ships, both outwards and inwards, is and hath been the chief cause of our most melancholy losses, besides the mischiefs our perishable commodities have met with from such dilatoriness, so that they have been worth nothing upon their arrival. Not to forget the vast charges owners of ships meet with, as well as the ships themselves, from their being prejudiced both here and in Barbadoes, being mightily fouled and impaired, for they generally load very deep, and therefore ought to have the most seasonable weather in their home voyage, which they have missed of, by being so long detained for want of quick dispatches hence, as I said before, our losses have be[en] stupendously great; so great and repeated of late, that some single merchants have lost within these eight months 30,000*l.* value in goods consigned to them. The planters have drawn bills of exchange of great value, which are returned upon them from the loss of their goods, which hath and will otherthrow them in their estates and credits, for we have lost since August last one way and another fifty sail belonging to Barbadoes.

“Now, for our remedies, I do with submission offer some few things.

“1. That the Government will allow but one great fleet of merchant ships, so many as may bring almost all the crop away once a year. That they depart from England in December at farthest, and (casualty excepted) they will arrive about the time the crop is ready, and, being loaded, may depart in June and with sufficient convoy, and timely notice given to those concerned here and in Barbadoes, when they are to depart. By this mean we may on good grounds expect great safety in our fleets, and the seamen will upon their arrival become far more ready for and useful to the Government than they have yet been, and at those times they are so much wanted.

“2. That no single ship shall be allowed to sail alone either outwards or homewards. If any ship should drop into Barbadoes, she be not not admitted to load after the fleet for England be departed, but stay until the next fleet arrive; so that what sugar is left of the crop would be ready to be loaded on the next fleet till the new crop be ready. Then every year this fleet would bring away the remaining part of the old crop, and most part of the new.

“This method so observed would render trade far more secure and easy than it hath been as yet both to the planters and their factors here, for it would greatly accommodate the planters to have the fleet dispatched home the middle of June, for a little after that time the season for planting and rains approaching swallows up the whole of their time in being expeditious in getting the last part of their crop in; should the fleet be there and to be loaded at such a time, they would be exposed to great hurry and fatigue.

“It may be objected by some, that not to allow single ships to go in and out alone is an unreasonable imposition upon particular interests and commerce itself; they alleging that to have great quantities of goods in fleets exported or imported, doth lessen the value thereof, by clogging the market.

“To this I answer that our losses have proceeded very much from single ships, whereof not above one in eight have escaped and come well, thereby strengthening and encouraging the enemy and weakening ourselves. Besides, it must be allowed that it is more advantageous to the planters when their goods come in fleets, though sold twenty per cent. cheaper, the great risk they run being considered, in single ships, usually to their utter loss; and also they have in that case the advantage of far cheaper insurance. Moreover, it must be considered that the interest of a part ought to give way to that of the whole. Hence it is that our trade to the Canaries and to other parts that has been in fleets, in and out, has all along since the war began been so successful and secure, while they as well as we have suffered in single ships.

“3. That there be advice boats appointed to go to and fro the West Indies. Hereby the great point of intelligence (a valuable thing in time of war) would be secured both to the Government and traders thereof; the want of which, caused by the thick losing of our ships, hath occasioned great disappointments and distractions in trade, and had almost lost Jamaica.

“4. That there be a sufficient number of ships of war appointed as a constant standing guard to the Islands, they staying till the next fleet's convoy arrive, and then to return as convoy home with the loaded fleet, while the fresh convoy supply their room, for, considering how easy it is for our enemies, with five or six of their men-of-war, not only to harass them, as they may do Barbadoes, hovering round about the Islands, from one part to another, thereby so alarming them, that what through the heat of the country and dismal fatigues from their frequent marches, the small force they now have, and also the sweeping distemper of the country, to be so attacked there or in any other of the Islands that are naked, must and will be of dismal consequence.

“5. That our ships be not exposed to such wonted dangers as they have been when our men have been impressed by the men-of-war in the Island, so that they have been forced to come home so weakly manned, as that it hath issued in their loss.

“Now to conclude. The Islands expecting and craving relief in this their suffering state, their eyes being upon us for that purpose, what else can be done but a speedy application of such like remedies as have been proposed? For I must adventure to say, as these are more or less executed, such will our success be in our trading to those parts; and it is great pity that these Islands, that have been so serviceable and beneficial to this nation on many accounts, should lie so languishing, and we not more apprehensive of it than we are; when, to consider how the Portuguese did raise themselves from their sugar plantations, and what a value the French put upon theirs, and also the Hollanders upon theirs, and how much our Islands exceed them all, both in their produce and capacity of being much more improved, some of them, it must be acknowledged that we ought to exert ourselves to the utmost for their preservation and restoring to their former flourishing state.”*

The LINEN MANUFACTURE in IRELAND.

[ . ]—A paper endorsed, “The Linen Manufacture.”

“Since all attempts for establishing a voluntary national linen manufactory in Ireland hath hitherto failed, there seems a necessity of enforcing it by a law, yet such as England may without any imputation make, and Ireland without hardship perform, which is submitted as followeth.

“That a Statute be made in England, that from and after ——— day of ——— there shall be equally as much linen manufactory in value imported into this kingdom from Ireland annually as there shall be of sheeps’ wool.

“This law will not lie under the censure nor have that frightful aspect as a law would have to restrain the trade manufactories and exports of Ireland, but regulating trade and imports into England by their own Parliament is familiar.

“The wool of Ireland is of more value than one-fourth of their annual exports, and is in prospect the most growing and valuable fund of that kingdom, and such as they cannot be without; to preserve it they will comply with anything in their power.

* This paper is followed by the draft Commission for the Plantations in America, 7 Will. III., 1695; see p. 285.

“That which is here humbly proposed is attended with nothing but that which is profitable and practicable.

“1st. That by Act of Parliament there shall be exemption of hearth-money for seven years for all single hearths that shall annually spin and expose to sale ten spangles of linen yarn.

“That for an equivalent to the Crown all hearths in cities corporate and market towns shall pay sixpence each hearth more than now they do, such as are single hearths only excepted.

“2ndly. That all persons who have five hundred sheep shall be obliged to keep one loom all the year weaving linen, and so in proportion to four looms, on the penalty of 20 pounds forfeiture for the failure of each loom.

“That all freeholders of 200*l.* per annum keep one loom as aforesaid, and so in proportion to eight looms, and no higher.

“That for encouragement of fine spinning there shall be five pounds annually given to the person that brings in 20 spangles in each county of the finest yarn; three pounds to that person that brings in 20 spangles of the second best yarn; and forty shillings to the person that brings in 20 spangles of the third best yarn.

“That for encouraging the finest weaving there be given ten pounds annually for the finest web, six pounds to the second best, and four pounds to the third; and each person both of yarn and cloth to have their own again.

“That a fund be raised for the payment of this money of two shillings a pound upon all civil employments upon the first year's profit after entering into the said employments.

“All the foregoing particulars will be no charge to the nation, but rather a gift to the people.

“The easing the poor from hearth-money is a gift to them, and an advantage to the landlord in easing of his tenants.

“The sixpence a hearth that is to raise an equivalent for the King will be made up to the people by bringing trade to the towns and cities.

“What remains is the building workhouses and preparing bleach yards in each county, which must be raised by a tax in each county; and if his Majesty shall be graciously pleased to bestow his bounty towards so good a work, it will be a great encouragement, and fourfold returned in increase of the Excise.

“There is nothing more grievous to the poor Irish than their payment of their hearth-money, which though in itself seems small, yet their poverty is such that it is very rarely paid without taking distress, which adds another charge of fees, forfeitures, and several days' running after the Collectors and Farmers of Hearth-money to redeem their distress. Now to be free from this would be the greatest encouragement imaginable to those poor people, and the more when they gain money by it, and will be earned by the women and children, which now live upon the labour of the men.

“The improvement this design will make in Ireland, and yet take them off that they are now so fond of in the woollen manufacture, may not at first sight be observed. The particulars being so [too] numerous here to mention, I shall only name two.

“First, the public encouragement to spinning of linen will take them off from woollen. The work of these poor is their daily bread. Not one in ten can lay by a penny for their hearth-money, but once a year a pot or cadoe* goes for it, insomuch that often ten families join in the keeping one pot for all their use by turns. Now to be freed from this slavery, as they call it, without paying anything, and their neighbours lie under the burthen, will be such a spur to their industry as will put all that sort of people upon that employment which gives them a privilege above their neighbours, no people in the universe being more ambitious that way than the poor Irish.

“That of a reward to the finest spinning and weaving will also be an inducement, so that the linen spinners will appear in the country with garlands when the woollen will be in shackles; the advantages will be so much to the one that the other must in course fall, because the price for spinning wool must rise more than the trade can bear.

“It is a rule in manufactory that rewards, more than laws, advanceth them. A reward of a penny shall sooner change a hand than a penalty of a shilling shall drive them from one employment to another.

“Secondly, the introducing this general employment of the poor in the linen manufactory will add to the Fund of Ireland that will be lodged in England more than two hundred thousand pounds sterling per annum, which is more than one half of the whole exports of that kingdom, and this will be done by women and children who now add little to the trade of the kingdom; for though the woollen manufactory employs some, yet it reaches not to the country, but in corporate towns, the generality of the Irish living idle.”

The COINAGE in IRELAND.

[ . ]—A paper endorsed, “Moneys, &c., in Ireland.”

“Though the right denominations of coin and value of bullion and money is [are] at last understood in England, and that by over-valuing either we deceive none but ourselves, for that an ounce of silver is the same in all places, call it what we please, yet this rule holds not in all parts of his Majesty’s dominions, particularly not in the foreign Plantations, where men of real estates receive their rents not in money but the growth of the country, tobacco, sugar, &c. These they truck again for provisions, servants, or other necessaries for their plantations. If they sell for money, they value that, be it called what the buyer please, with relation to the value in England, so that there money may be called what they please; it affects nobody.

“Ireland stands under a different consideration also with England in this matter. . . . I conceive then, for the reasons following, that keeping up the present money of Ireland 20 per cent. above the standard of England is for the advantage of both kingdoms, but most for that of England.”

* Cadew, an Irish mantle.—Bailey.

The reasons are set out minutely. Towards the end the writer says: "Make Ireland rich, and they will be your bees, [and] bring honey to your hives; keep them poor, and that kingdom will produce nothing but wasps to sting you. The English will quit the country, and then it will fall into the hands of the Irish, with another people who grow apace and make their own way."

ESSAYS ON TRADE.

[ . ]—1. A paper headed, "The Preface," apparently to the following "Essays." Begins: "That antiquated pretence, the importunity of friends, often makes apology for a book that wants better authority." 5½ pp.

2. A long dissertation, endorsed, "Essays upon Trade." Begins: "It is by the infallible author reckoned the glory of a city that her merchants were princes and nobles of the earth." It consists chiefly of proposals for the improvement of the linen manufacture in Ireland. 27 pp.

TOLL ON THE ELBE.

[ . ]—A paper endorsed, "Reasons given by the Hamburgh Company against the Toll on the Elbe." It alleges that great damage will accrue to the navigation and trade of England and his Majesty's foreign Plantations if a toll be erected at Gluckstat. 1 p.; in the same hand as the letter of Gilbert Heathcote, of 18 March, 1694-5.

JOURNAL OF THE DUKE OF SHREWSBURY.

1700-1706.—"A Journal by his Grace Charles, Duke of Shrewsbury, from November the 1st, 1700, when his Grace left England, to January the 7th, 1706 [n.s.], when he landed at Deptford. In which are included his Grace's observations upon the most material passages that occurred to him in those Travels." (This title-page is in a hand of about 1800.)

The Journal is entirely in Shrewsbury's own hand, and is paged by him, 1-493.

"A Journal begun Nov., 1700.

"Nov. 1st.—I went from London, lay that night at Sittenbourn, and went into no house upon the road.

"Nov. 2nd.—I arrived at Dover, went into no house by the way, lay at Mackay's.

"3rd.—Embarked, being Sunday, after going to church at Dover, and seeing the Castle.

"4th; 15th, n.s.—Landed at Calais, went to Pigault the merchant's, where I dined and was all the time whilst I was in town. I was recommended thither by Mr. Sec. Vernon and Berionde. The commandant Mr. de la Tour made me a visit. The D. de Charost, the governor, has not been there since he made the late Queen of England wait till mass was done before he would come to her when she first landed there."

Remarks on Abbeville, Amions, &c.

P. 3. 19th.—"I came to Paris, where I saw nobody but the Ambassador [Earl of Manchester] and his Lady, with whom I stayed till past 11."

20th.—"I stayed at my lodgings in the rue St. Dominique all the morning; saw nobody but Sir. Hen. Wingfield and some shop-keepers, till the Ambassador sent his coach to fetch me to dinner; and at his house, looking on at ombre, I stayed most part of the afternoon. About 7 he and I went to see the Duchess of Portsmouth, who was not at home. Then I set him down, and in his coach went to visit Mrs. Talbot, who not being at home, I returned to the Ambassador, where I supped with him, my Lady and Lord Plymouth, and came home from thence at 11 at night.

P. 4. 21st.—“Being Sunday, I received a visit in the morning from Mr. Shadwell, Lord Windsor and his brother; stayed at home till the Ambassador sent his coach about 11 for me to come to church; after which I dined there; went to church after dinner, and then to the Opera; then supped with the Ambassador and his Lady, and went home soon after ten. I thought the music and voices of the Opera very indifferent; it was called ———. The scenes are fine, and the dancing, especially Ballon and one woman, is incomparable. Their action when they sing in such a piece is more graceful than the method of our people, who stand upon the stage like statues.”

P. 5. 23rd.—“This morning the Ambassador called me before seven, and we went to Versailles, where I saluted the King, and he received me tolerably civilly, but the Court was in too great hurry and exaltation upon their new K[ing] of Sp[ain] to admit much other thought. Nobody was so perfectly civil as my old acquaintance the Duke of Lozune, but perhaps it was not without design; for he began to tell me how kindly King James had always taken the distinguishing civility I had showed him when I was sent on the message, and was grounding upon this some further discourse, when I cut him short, and told him I confessed I had great compassion at that time for his circumstances, but desired that we might not discourse on that but on any other subject. An hour after he took occasion to commend the P[rin]ce of Wales, and wished that by any means I might have an opportunity of seeing so fine a youth. I told him I questioned not his merit, but had no great curiosity, but if I must see him, I would rather it were here than in England. This reply dashed all further discourse of this kind, though [he] continued extreme civil, walking with me all the time, invited the Ambassador and me to dinner, and offered all civilities there, at Paris, or at Montpelier.”

Remarks on Versailles, Fontainebleau, Nevers, the Loire, the Alier, St. Geran, Moulins, Roane, Tarrare, Lyons, the Rhone, Vienne, Cotte Rostie, Tient, the vine country, the Hermitage and its wine, &c.

P. 15. Dec. 4.—“This evening, before two, I came to St. Esprit. . . . The only thing remarkable here is the bridge over the Rhone; it has twenty great arches, and three or four small ones, and is reckoned one of the finest bridges in France. . . . About the middle of the bridge there is a small chapel, and over against it a prison, which goes down under the bridge, in which my host told me that about a dozen poor Protestant women had been kept for eleven or twelve years. They are conducted out every morning with a guard, to buy their provision, and there they work for their living, having bread only allowed them by the King of France. . . .

P. 16.—“Here, at Pont St. Esprit, I have eat[en] a very good flesh supper on a Saturday. . . . Some poor religious came to ask my charity, but I was out of humour, and refused them, because I had been refused to send charity to those poor Protestant prisoners for conscience sake, who had been so long kept in that hole upon the bridge; whom God comfort.”

5th.—“This morning the landlord came to tell me, if I would give those poor prisoners upon the bridge something, his wife should convey it. I ventured to be cheated of two louis d’or, and would have given them more, but that I much doubted whether they would have it.”

Nismes, the amphitheatre there, Diana’s temple, &c.

P. 18.—“In the inns in France you have often ill beds, always ill linen, generally ill chambers, and dirty and few attendance; but then the meat, drink, and cookery is [are] far beyond Eng[land]. I have come into villages where I have found turkeys, partridge of both kinds, hens, rabbits, leverets in the larder; and you will find nowhere so ill provided but you may have very good mutton, and a good second course.

“Here, at Ni[s]me[s], they are now making their provision of ice. . . . They tell me that before the persecution three parts in four of the inhabitants here were Protestants.”

P. 19. 8th.—“This morning, about nine, I left Nisme[s], and about two came to a little house prepared for me near Montpellier, no lodgings being to be had in the town, where the States were assembled. I only saw Mr. Piauch and his wife, Col. Clent, Mr. Gage, Mr. Talbot, his Governor, and a French gentleman.”

P. 20. 9th.—“I stayed at home all this day, being troubled with the headache, and being let blood. I received some visits from French and English.”

10th.—“I kept my bed most part of this day, being lame in my knee. I writ several letters for England, and received several visits from my Lord Preston, [Lord] North, Mr. Warr; the two Mess. Jartres and another came with him (sic), from Col. Clent.”

17th.—“In the morning I saw the Doctor, and prepared to take the air with Lady Calverly, but she came and made an excuse that one of the coach-horses was dying. . . . I had a visit . . . from Madame la Presidente Boilac; she said her husband was in the country, who had received a letter from Mons. Bourdieu concerning me, and she came in his name to offer me any civilities in their power. I understand, besides, she is a great gamester, and keeps an assembly, and by this abundance of civility might hope to gain a gamester to her house, which is what they contend furiously about here. . . . I had besides a visit from the Bishop of this diocese, who is Mons. de Torcy’s brother, son to the Ambassador Colbert that was in England, and died Secretary.”

P. 22. 18th.—“In the afternoon I had visits from Sir John Olston<sup>o</sup> and others, and went to wait on my Lady [Ladies] Sherard and Calverly.”

21st.—“Today I dined at the Comte de Roure [’s, Chief of the Estates,] who treated me with the utmost civility, ordered his own box for me at the Opera, and four of his guards to attend me thither, there, and back again. . . . The Opera was Amadis de Grece, indifferent, and worse executed.”

P. 23. 22nd.—“I discoursed with the Bishop of Montpellier about Cardinal Richelieu’s Testament; who says it is not certainly known to be writ by himself, but the best judges took it to be his.”

Visits from Mr. Waller, Mr. Danvers, Dr. Hignons, many Frenchmen, Bishops, &c.

P. 25.—“In commendation of our King he [M. de Roure] said publicly that no Prince in Europe deserved so truly the name of a great General as he; that others avoient fait le fanfarou, mais qu’il n’y avoit que luy qui s’etoit toujours exposé a la tete de ses armées.”

Remarks on Languedoc, the States, &c.; a History of Charles VII. of France, referring to the Dukes of Gloucester and Bedford, &c. Illness and death of Col. Clent.

P. 32. Jan. 18th, 1701.—“Lady Calverley and Madame de Cosse came to tell me that offence had been taken at the prayers Mr. Waller had said with Col. Clent; that it had been represented there was an assembly of Huguenots, and that prayers had been said by a minister I had brought over; and that thereupon M[ons]r. Bavile had once thoughts of sending the woman of the house to the Chatelet; but though this was now appeased, yet Madame de Cosse was fearful of burying him in her garden, as she had promised the Colonel in his sickness; and we consented he should be buried in a cave,† the key being secured, that his body might lie undisturbed.”

19th.—“Col. Clent was buried this morning, in an enclosed place not far from the Casernes, or, as I am since informed, in a house.”

P. 33. 25th.—“The Bishop of Lodeve and I discovered that we were schoolfellows at Navarr,‡ though we had forgot each other; he was called l’Abbé de Philippeaux.”

Several entries relate to a quarrel between Lord North and Mr. Talbot; balls, concerts, walks in the King’s garden, the Peirou, &c.

P. 38. Feb. 25th.—“This morning I went to the King’s garden, and walking with the Bishop of Lodeve, he told me the manner of Mons. Louvois’ death—that, discoursing with the King upon his business in Madame de Maintenon’s chamber, he proposed the burning and destroying Piedmont, as had been done to the Palatinate. The King answered, ‘Never propose such a thing to me again, for I will not make war like the Turks and the Moors.’ Mons. Louvois, upon this reply, threw his papers down, and said, ‘Let him serve you that will, for I cannot.' The King then laid hold on his cane, and was going to extremities, when Madame de Maintenon interposed. The King recollected his temper, and bid the Minister go out, and consider in what a condition he had brought his kingdom. Madame de Maintenon, who had ever been an enemy to Mons. de Louvois, nevertheless sent for him friendly, and asked him what he designed. He answered, he thought nothing remained for him but to retire to Meudon. 'Do not deceive yourself,' says she; 'you must either serve, or go to the Bastille; and I would advise you to go tomorrow to the King as if nothing had happened.' Mons. de Louvois did so, and the King, probably to disguise what had happened, began to rally him upon a new suit of clothes he had on; which when Louvois received not well, the King said, 'Let us go to our business;' which when begun, the King perceived his face to change, and Louvois confessed his head ached; and that growing worse, the King bid him go home, and they would do the business another time. He went directly home, threw himself in a great chair, called for Mons. Barbesieux, and immediately died. This was probably occasioned by the uneasiness his danger of disfavour gave him, or, as some say, it was the effect of poison.

"He [the Bishop of Lodeve] told me likewise that Mons. Colbert died of a hard word from the King, who, complaining of the faultiness of a beam at Versailles, said that every private man that built could be safe under his roof, but that he was every day in danger the house should fall on his head, after the great expense he had been at, but that was because he [Colbert?] undertook everything, and did nothing. Soon after this he died, and without any marks of religion or preparation for the next world; but when Père Bourdaloue pressed him to it, he said he was unfortunate, but that had he served God with as much pains as he had that man, he should have been a great saint. I think Cardinal Wolsey said something to the same purpose."

P. 40. 26th.—"I saw nobody all the morning; dined at home alone. Lord Preston came after dinner. I stirred not out till after five, when, by a message from the Bishop of Montp[elier], I was told the Marshal de Noailles would present me at that hour to the Princes. Lord Preston and I went, and were presented by the Marshal to the D[uke] of Burgundy, who received me with great civility, asking me many questions about my health. His person is none of the best; his face has something of Mons. d'Ollone; his hair not unlike the King's when Prince of Orange. He has some defect in his shape, but he seems to have a thoughtful head, and inquisitive, curious disposition, giving an exact [account?] of the several things he had seen in his journey. We were also presented to the Duke of Berry, who is more like his father, fat and fair, of a cheerful disposition.

"I supped at the Bishop's, where there were two great tables. The Marshal de Noailles was there, who was extreme civil to me, and free in his discourse. Amongst other things he told me Mons. de Sa[voy] had given passage for their troops, but he would first find his account in it; then, jogging me, said, 'Voyla vn parfait honete homme, vn homme dont on peut se fier.' I told him we had all reason to give him that character. He was inquisitive about our disposition to war. I told him it was thought in England that the people were much disposed for it, and that the King was rather backward in engaging, which I supposed was in expectation that such measures might be taken with France as would secure Holland and us for the future. I had something of the same discourse with Mons. de Someri ——— (blank), who seemed to wonder at the disgrace the Queen of Spain was fallen into. After this I went to Lady Calverley's, and home about eleven.

"They say that the number of people which met the Princes near this town, and the true joy they showed at their reception, was greater than they [the Princes] met with elsewhere; which was for the honour of the nouveaux conuertis, there being more of that sort hereabouts than anywhere. Illuminations were made all over the town, but except some particulars, they were very poor ones. There was a fire-work also tonight."

P. 41. 27th.—"I went out in the morning in the coach, and, when I came home, found an invitation to dinner from Mons. de Broglio. I went thither, where the Marshal de Noailles dined; and after dinner went with them to the Princes, and had the honour to see the shooting at the Peroquet in their closet, where no strangers were, nor anybody but the chief of their own tenants. The show was the meanest I ever saw, and the diversion the poorest.

"Whilst I was in that chamber, a gentleman said that the Comte d'Aubeterre had found not long since by accident in the Garonne a sword, whereon was writ, Ego sum Talboti; and that, upon seeing me at Versailles, the gentleman said, to do me a kindness, he would make me a present of it. I assured him the present would be most acceptable. I returned home, and the P[remier] President with me, who repeated his speeches. Then I went to Lady Cal[verley's], Madame de Broglio, and Bavile, and home about eight."

Remarks on the country, climate, and people of Montpelier, the provision of ice, the Pont du Gard, &c.

P. 45. March 4th.—"Soon after dinner I received news that the Dutch had acknowledged the King of Spain; upon which I deferred my journey till further news."

P. 47. 14th.—"Went to Lord Preston, who consulted with me how he should behave himself to give no suspicion, being inclined to do everything should satisfy the King and Government. . . . Dr. Chirac came to me this morning, and by his advice I was let blood twelve ounces."

P. 48. 17th.—"I left Montpelier this morning before 7 a clock." Pont St. Esprit, Montlimar, Valence, Viene, Lyons, Monloye, Chatillon, Colanges, and Geneva (descriptions).

P. 52. 27th.—"This morning a syndic and councillor [of Geneva] came before 8, and conducted me to church, where I sat among the Syndies in the first rank; and when I went to receive the sacrament, the first Syndic made me go first before him. They receive the sacrament here walking; the wine is white and given in glasses, both which is [are] unusual enough. In their prayer the preacher prays for the magistrates, their good allies, and particularly for the King of France and the King of Great Britain, for all the Protestant Kings, Electors, and Princes of Germany, for the States of Holland and Switzerland. . . . I was visited by Lord Holderness and two English gentlemen. . . . Lady Calverly and [Lady] Sherard, Lord Preston, Mr. Danvers, and [Mr.] Waller arrived in this house today." Shrewsbury's brother [Bridges?],* Sir Tho. Alston, Sir Tho. Morgan, and others are mentioned.

P. 53. 28th.—"This night I removed, and lay at Mons. Sarasin's, a minister." Observations on persons, manners and customs, buildings, the library, MSS., pictures, church matters, &c., at Geneva.

P. 56. April 10th.—"This morning, being Sunday, I heard M[ons]r. Turetin preach upon the proof of a Deity and Providence. I never heard a better sermon; it was much in the way of Dr. Tillotson, with whom he was acquainted, and whose works he reads with a just value; it had the plainness and pureness of his style and thought; and Mr. Turetin himself, besides admirable parts and great learning, has the sweetest temper I ever observed in a clergyman, except Dr. Tillotson."

11th.—"110 horses (sic) passed through this town this day in one company, to recruit the Duke of Savoy's cavalry."

P. 62. May 3rd.—"I had a letter from a Frenchman called François, that he had something to communicate to me relating to the King of England's glory, and the interest of his people. I appointed him the 5th, in the morning."

5th.—"This morning I saw the Frenchman; his name is François; he lives with Mons. le Faure, a wood-merchant. I heard his proposal, and have writ a letter today, in order to send it to Mr. Secretary Vernon through Holland, upon his proposal."

P. 63. Remarks on Servetus, his trial, &c.

P. 64. 9th.—"This morning early the projector François came to me to propose by writing to Bern to put some things in order, and [to] give him a letter to Mons. d'Hervart, that when His Majesty's directions come, he might be prepared to make the experiment. I declined it, and told him I would make no step in it till I received directions from England. I walked this morning alone, accompanied with my footmen only, in [the] Plain Palais."

He frequently refers to playing at "ombre," and sometimes at "papillon."

P. 65. 14th.—"The women here of all ranks ride astride; those of the best condition have [a] kind of long petticoats, which cover their legs and feet, open behind and before, to fall easily and conveniently on both sides the horse."

* See p. 69 of the Journal.

16th.—“This morning the French projector was here, and as I saw he affected to come to me, I desired he would forbear till I sent for him. . . . I had likewise this morning a relapse of spitting of blood.”

P. 66. 20th.—“I went out in the morning to sit for my picture.” There are other references to this. He mentions his lodgings at the Manège, and his lodgings in town; also Mr. Roundelle and a Scotch gentleman, both lately come from Rome.

P. 68. June 8th.—“Went to Lord Villiers, but he was not at home.”

P. 69. 14th.—“This morning I stirred not out, nor saw no stranger; dined alone, taking vitriol.”

18th.—“I received a visit from Lord Bridgewater.”

26th.—“Saw Mons. François do some part of his invention.”

28th.—“This day Lord Mont Hermon [Monthermer] came to Geneva, and the fort was taken in the P[alain] Palais, but I did not see the show.”

30th.—“I writ to Mr. Secretary, against tomorrow, something of what the projector showed me about his invention.”

July 2nd.—“Received a letter from the projector that he desired to speak with me. I dined alone; spoke with him immediately after dinner. He showed me a letter from the Comte de Cailus in France, that it was known he was working upon this secret, and invited him to offer it to the French King, exclaiming against the English ingratitude, and peculiar hatred to the French. I doubt the letter is a pretence, for there was no post-mark upon it. The projector resolves soon to go to Bern, but designs to write to M. d’Hervart, to know if there be there a piece of cannon of 32 pound. He desires me to write a note to the Envoyé, to accompany his, which I design to do tomorrow.”

P. 73. 12th.—“Mons. Pineau came to me this morning, and borrowed 1,500 livres to defray my brother’s debts before he left him. I dined alone. After dinner the projector came, gave me a letter from M. d’Hervart, and showed me letters to himself from M. d’Hervart and his secretary; but I suppose the project is at an end, for he would have borrowed 40 pistoles of me, which I was not such a fool as to lend him.”

P. 74. 18th.—“Went to my brother’s house in P. Palais to acquaint him with his father’s orders.”

21st.—“The last time Mons. Turetin was here, I remember he said he was convinced the story of Pope Joan was a fable; that as professor of ecclesiastical history, it would come in [his?] turn to explain the history of that time, and that he should mention it as a fable.”

P. 77. Aug. 13th.—“Was visited by Lord Hold[erness], Sir T. Alston, and Mr. Montague, lately come from Rome.” Mentions Mr. Smith, Mr. Hopkinson, and Mr. Musters, several times; also Colson and Mr. Thackery.

P. 80. 30th.—“I left Chateau Rosel this morning about 6; saw nobody but Mons. Roset; dined half-way between Geneva and Remilly, where I lay." Remarks on Aix, the baths there, Chambery, Echelles, the Charter-house, Montmellan, Modone, Mont Cenis, Veillane, &c.

P. 84. Sept. 5th.—"I lie at the Albergo Reale [Turin]."

7th.—"I stirred not abroad all this day, nor never dressed myself. I only saw my Lord Quaronden, Lord Litchfeild's son. The Duke of Savoy is very severe and exacting upon his subjects; his courage and great familiarity gains the heart of his people; he goes about the streets without guards in a chariot with two footmen; he plays at mall without any distinction. When he plays in the mall he will have no other company desist; but if a company of footmen are playing and meet him, they cry 'Guard,' and he stands up close to let their ball pass. He keeps a singer in the Opera, and sups often with her. He often visits two sisters of a dancing-master, and his coach stands at their door, and he shows himself in the balcony; before he went to the army he serenaded these sisters. He often walks incognito in the night about the streets." Observations on Turin.

P. 86. 8th.—"The Spanish Ambassador, who came for the Queen of Spain, was to make his entry today. I saw some of his footmen; the livery was scarlet cloth, with a broad gold lace with green velvet list, with green silk stockings, and green feathers. Will, my footman, walked with me all the morning. I am told the Spanish Ambassador's pages have red velvet embroidered with gold, a hot fancy for this season; there are 12 of them, and 42 footmen. I left Turin about noon."

Villa-nuova, Montcalier, Asti, Alexandria de la Paglia, Novi.

P. 88. 11th.—"I dined today at Campo-maroni. . . . Here Consul Kirk and Mr. [Shuckburg, a merchant?], met me, and dined with me. They brought a coach and six horses of the Prince of Doria's, in which I went to town [Genoa]. . . . The Consul obliged me to lie at his house." Description of Genoa, the Doge, buildings, pictures, gardens, &c.

P. 89. 12th.—"Signor Clemente Doria and Clemente Rouré came to visit me; the first I had seen in England, when he came to acknowledge the King."

P. 91. 15th.—"There is another [picture] in the same house [Durazzo's] of Vandick, which seems to me an excellent piece; it is Our Lady and Our Saviour, when St. John Baptist and St. Elizabeth came to Our Saviour; Jesus and St. John are two little boys; Our Lady is a charming face, and St. Elizabeth an old woman. I think to have seen the same story in King Charles's drawing-room at Whitehall, over the chimney, which was said to be of Vandick.

"Upon the murder of the Duke of Somerset at Lerice there was a pillar of infamy erected to the malefactors, and the window shut up from whence he was shot. This was done in Charles the 2nd's time; but the Consul now tells me that in King James's time he received a[n] order to acquaint the Commonwealth [of Genoa] that he [James] desired that should be removed, being convinced it was done by a mistake. The Senate were much surprised at such a step from our Court, and it is supposed it was obtained by the means of some Cardinals, friends to the family of the murderers at Rome. This Commonwealth have since given the title of nobles to that family." Remarks on galleys and galley-slaves.

P. 94. 18th.—"About 6 this morning I left Genoa, and went in a felouque, which I never left till I landed about 8 at night at Lerice. . . . I saw the house where the Duke of Somerset was shot; it is in the great place at Lerice." Then to Viareggio and Lucca.

P. 95. 20th.—Description of Lucca. "I went to San Frediano, an ugly old church. In one of the chapels above, over the altar, is writ, Hic iacet corpus S. Ricardi, Regis Anglie. Under the altar, when the altar-piece is taken away, there is a kind of tomb, with these words written upon it: Diui Ricardi Regis ossa et cineres. It is certain no King Richard of England was either canonised a Saint or buried at Lucca.* The inscription over the altar is express that he was a King of England, but that upon the tomb under the altar, which seems an older inscription, does not say expressly that he was of England, but a King only. . . . After dinner a[n] English priest called Eustache came to me; . . . he says the St. Richard, King of England, was before the Conquest, and lived about 750, [and] died at Lucca. The story, he says, is to be read in Baronius, to. 9th, and in Bolanda. But I have since spoke with Signor _____, who says in the Antiquities of the town it is said that this St. Richard was of the family only of the Kings of England."

P. 97. 23rd. "Father Thomas Eustace . . . showed me the exact model for size and everything of the chapel at Loretto. The Rector came to me; he showed me a piece of Thomas of Cantorbery's hair-shirt, which with much ado they have got from the Abbey of St. Victor's at Paris, where the shirt was pretended to be kept entire. One need I think only see the piece to be satisfied of the impostor [imposture]; it does not in the least resemble a hair-cloth, but is more like a brown gimp lace, as I have seen them, of an open work, only that this is made I believe of horse-hair as those are of silk upon paste-board. . . . The late King of Poland's son arrived this evening incognito at Lucca; . . . he seems a little inclined to be fat for his age, but has a good face and air, and they say a good deal of wit; though he has been long in Italy, he would speak no language but French." Genoese nobles and their houses.

P. 99. 26th.—"I dined at Lucca, and came to Pisa about 4 a clock." Buildings, a "garden of simples," the "tower awry, &c."

P. 101. 27th.—"I arrived at Leghorn about 4 in the evening; was immediately visited by the chief of the customs, who is Signor Teresia, that lived Minister in England 26 years, and was plundered at the Revolution. . . . I lay at Mr. Burrows'."

* "Saint Richard, King of the Anglo-Saxons," or of the West Saxons, who died at Lucca, c. 722, occurs in the Acta Sanctorum, ii. 69. Feb. 7; but "this legend is wholly fictitious."—Sir Thomas Hardy's Materials, i. 430, 870.

28th.—“Received a visit from the English merchants in a body.” The Jews, Corsica, &c.

P. 102. 29th.—“I arrived at Florence about 5. I found Mr. Whaley and Mr. Dod in Sir Lamb[ert] Blackwell’s house, ready to entertain me.” Visits to the Grand Duke, the Prince, Princess, and Cardinal. Visits from Sir Tho. Derham, Lords Scudamore and Bernard, &c. Pictures, statues, assemblies, buildings, libraries, gardens, lions, &c. Visits to Malabechi, the librarian. Deer-coursing.

P. 108. Oct. 12th.—“My Lord Bernard lent me a MS. of Algernon Sidney’s, which he recovered at Montpelier; it is writ in Latin, and is called Icon Cromwellij, Icon Caroli Gustavi, Suecicæ Regis, & Icon Henrici Vanij Junioris. It is the character of three persons. That of Sir Henry Vane begins thus: Henricus Vanius, genere illustris, pessimo patre natus, hic aulæ depravatæ labes, ille resurgentis Reipublicæ gloria et columen. If my Lord Bernard prints this MS., perhaps he will leave out these words in respect to his grandfather.”

P. 111. 23rd.—“In the morning, as we were going to take coach, an Irish Jacobin came to see me. I soon got rid of him, entertaining him in the hall before the servants.”

P. 113. 30th.—“In the evening I took the air with Sir Tho. [Derham], and with him went to the Opera, where I took a box for the time the Opera was acted. The scenes were poor, the theatre little, no dancing, and not above two or three good voices, but the music pleased me much better than the French. It is always set to express the meaning of the words. They sing the dialogue much faster than the French; almost as fast as if it were spoke, which makes it less tedious. Their songs have many repetitions, but many of them extreme fine.” Other visits to the Opera. “It is a great want in these operas that they have no flutes nor hautbois.”

P. 114. Nov. 6th “This morning I had a visit from Mr. Dashwood and Addison; they dined with me. Sir Tho. Deerham came after dinner. We went all four to the Opera. I returned home about ten. The G[reat] Prince and Princess were at the Opera; they sat in places prepared for them in the parterre.”

7th.—“This morning I went to the Gallery. . . . Sir Tho. Derham, Mr. Dashwood, and Addison dined with me. We took the air in the evening, and I came home about six.”

9th.—“This morning I had a visit from [the] Signor Depositario [or Treasurer of the Grand Duke], and one from Sir Tho. Deerham. We went out to visit Mr. Dashwood and Addison. Sir Tho. dined with me. The two English gentlemen came in after dinner, with whom we went to Poggio Imperiale, to the Opera, and I was at home before ten.”

10th.—“This morning Sir Tho. and I with Mr. Dashwood and Addison saw Ricardi’s Palace, and afterwards the Library of Manuscripts. They dined with me. We saw the Great Prince’s apartment, nobly furnished with pictures. There is [are] Calvin and Luther, drawn by Giorgion; they have a woman drawn with them, I suppose to laugh at them; but it is a good piece, and Calvin especially seems to have a sensible, thinking countenance."

P. 115. 12th.—"I saw no stranger in the morning, being not well, and denied. I dined alone. Mr. Shuttleworth, Dashwood, and Addison came to see me, and I went to see them, but neither found the other at home."

P. 116. 15th.—"I made several visits, and had my audience of leave of the G[reat] Prince and Princess. The first told me the naked Venus in his lodgings was the true original drawing by Titian in the Duke of Urbino's house; she was the Duke's mistress, whose heir the G[reat] Duke's mother was. That at Poggio Imperiale, and another at Rome, were copies drawn by a scholar of Titian's at the same time, and I doubt the King's<sup>o</sup> in England is but a copy; it is a naked Venus, with a woman looking in a trunk."

P. 117. 17th.—"This morning at the opening of the gates I left Florence." Descriptions of Sienna, Tornieri, Bolseno, Viterbo, &c.

P. 119. 20th.—"It was two hours in the night when I got to Rome."

21st.—"This morning I was visited by Signor Gregorio; he dined with me; he and Mr. Edwards went with me to St. Peter's. . . . Mr. Cecil made me a compliment. . . . Lord Holderness and Sir Thomas Alston came soon to see me." Buildings, statuary, pictures, &c.

P. 121. 22nd.—"Flamarin came to me; he carried me to visit the Princess Carpiena, but she was abroad; we found her at Madame Adaida's.† . . ."

P. 122. 23rd.—"Soon after dinner Dom Guglielmo, an Irish priest, came to visit me; he had been chaplain to Cardinal Howard; he pressed my waiting on the Pope, which I declined as discreetly as I could. I came home about 5."

24th.—"This morning Dr. Lippi came to discourse with me about my distemper. Afterwards I went with Signor G[regorio] and Ed[wards] to see the statues at the Vatican. . . . We saw the Library, a rare fabric, built by Sixtus V. What I chiefly observed was that the Library-keeper told me the MS. Bible was only a copy of the old MS., the old one being destroyed in some of the sacking[s] of Rome. They have some letters from Henry VIII. to Anna Bullen, which they say are of his original hand; I doubt it a little; they are some in French, and others in English." The MS. Virgil, compared with that at Florence.

P. 123.—"Carlo Marat has made [a] tomb for himself to be buried in the Chartreuse church, just over against Salvador de Rosa, who would never abide him while they lived together. I lie now at the house of Salvador Rosa's son."

* There are previous references to this picture in the Journal.

† Madame la Comtesse de l'Adalahide, on p. 123; see also p. 126. Com[tesse]de Ladehaide, p. 130. She is called "the Countess Adelaide" in later passages. Her surname was Paleotti. Shrewsbury was an almost daily visitor at her house during his stay in Rome, and subsequently married her.

25th.—“This morning I had a visit from Fa[ther] Mansfelt, the Superior of the English Jesuits here. I saw this morning the two Jesuit churches of the Grand Giesù, and the College.”

26th.—“I had a visit this morning from Bi[shop] Ellis. He said the King of France, by declaring the P[rince] of W[ales], had done service to King William, and that he never failed to do so upon occasion. . . . After dinner young Dreyden came to see me; he is like his father; Mr. St. John, and one Russel, a bastard son of the Bedford family, but bred up here.”

Description of Tivoli, gardens, the Campagna, Albano, Fiescati, Belvedere, Ludovisia, &c.

P. 130. Dec. 2nd.—“I saw no company nor stirred not abroad this morning. Si[gnor] Gr[egorio] dined with me. We went to visit Bishop Ellis, who speaking of the prejudice the Pr[ince] of Wales had received by the King of France’s declaration, in further discourse he said that when my Lord Portland was in France, he had told the King of France that if he would let us have that young gentleman to breed up, he would answer he should [succeed?] his master King William. I believe my Lord would say no such thing. I went to visit the Rector of the English Jesuits, who was abroad. . . .

“I forgot to observe that immediately after dinner Mons[ignor] Walgrave came to see me. And when I was with Bish[op] Ellis, he told me what the under-library-keeper of the Vatican had told me about the MSS. was a mistake, some leaves of [at] the beginning being torn out; others are added, which is [are] modern, but the bulk of the MS. is extreme ancient. I know [not?] which says true, but the Bishop took pains to inform himself, as he told me, of those who best understood the antiquities of that library.” The Pope’s palace at the Monte Cavallo.

P. 131. 3rd.—“I went to the music at the Grand Jesù, where there were many English. . . . In the rooms where the Pope gives audience he has doors made as in old chambers in England—three that come in within the room. The middlemost is never opened but for himself or crowned heads. Cardinals and ambassadors come in a side door, [and] make three genuflexions before they come to audience. An ambassador comes in with his hat and sword; all private persons leave both at the door.” Churches, palaces, paintings, MSS., &c., described.

P. 136. 11th.—“About noon Lord Hold[erness], and Sir T. Alston, &c., dined with me. We went to see the Card[inal] Barberin’s ap[artments] in the Palais Barberin. There are many fine pictures and statues, and that Palais is of a wonderful bigness. They were preparing for the solemnisation of King James’s funeral in a church here.”

12th.—“This morning I went to the Vatican Library. I met Bishop Ellis there, who stayed but a moment, going to have audience of the Pope. Sir Tho. Morgan, Mr. Lewis, and La Roche were with me. . . . Mr. Cecil, Monsr. Walgrave, and Mr. Dreyden dined with me.

P. 138. 13th.—“After dinner, in the evening, I went and heard the Opera rehearsed, and [besides?] the Imperial Amb[assador] there were Card[inal] Grimani,<sup>o</sup> the Venetian Amb[assador], and his lady. From thence I came home before ten. The [Imperial?] Amb[assador] told me he had spoke to the Pope about what he had said in his speech about King James. The Pope replied he had well considered what he had said, and thought it could give no offence anywhere; that he had only commended King James's constancy and adherence to his religion, and hoped his son would follow his example; that he must not forget he was a Catholic; but he had taken care to meddle nothing in the disposing of Crowns, which he was sensible was not his business."

P. 141. 19th.—"This morning I walked in the Villa Med[ici] alone; went with all the Eng[lish] to dine with the Amb[assador]. I saw his coaches designed for his entry, 12 in all; four are wonderfully fine, three of the Italian fashion, and one of the French.

P. 143. 31st.—"Visited after dinner the Rector of the English Jesuits. He talked much of the cruelty of the French at Leige [Liège], and the misfortune of those people to be under their government; that when they sent the Dean away prisoner, they tied his legs under the horse[s] belly."

P. 144. 1702, Jan. 2nd.—"Bishop Ellis came in after dinner. He mentioned the project of the English merchants, now retired from Naples and Sicily, [of] settling at Civitavechia; he said it was much opposed by the French and Spaniards, and the Pope was unwilling at this juncture to give them any unnecessary jealousy."

The Princess Carpegna and the Duke of Bracciano are frequently mentioned.

P. 145. 6th.—"I saw no company this morning, nor stirred abroad. I dined alone. Mr. Dreyden came to see me. I went with him to see some statues bespoke for Lord Exeter, to a man that makes fine tables, set him at home, and went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide], and home at six."

7th.—"This morning I went with Mr. Dreyden to Carlo Marat; he was abroad, but his wife and daughter showed us all the pictures; his painting does not much please me, and he is now much decayed. There is a picture of a Pope done by Dominichain, which he bought at a broker's for two Julios, [and] is worth 200. Mr. Dreyden dined with me. We went [to] Joseppe Chiary, a scholar of Ca. Marat's, and [who] does now better than his master. There is an old copy of the Transfiguration at Montorio, a noble picture, which has been much abused. We saw some pictures at Sig. Faulconier's; we went to a bookseller's. I set Mr. Dre[yden] at home."

P. 146. 12th.—"This morning I had a visit from my landlord, and one from Mr. Burrows, who owned himself ruined, and darkly complained of Sir Lam[bert] Blackwell. I dined alone; was visited by the Rector of the Jesuits and by Mr. Cotton.† I went to see Bishop Ellis. He talked a great deal to me about the quiet and submission he could wish the Catholics in England would show to the present Government."

* Cardinal Grimani, who had been the Imperial Ambassador at Rome, appears to have been succeeded by Count Lamberg about this time.

† He is mentioned several times before and after this.

15th.—"I went to the Comt[esse] Ad[elaide's], [and] to the Emp[eror's] Amb[assador's], where they danced, and obliged me to dance one minuet."

16th.—"Mr. Dreyden dined with me. We went to see some pictures of a gen[tlema]n at the Vatican; he set me down at the P[rincess] Carpegna[']s."

17th.—"This morning I went with Mr. Dreyden; saw the Chiesa Nuova. . . . Mr. Dreyden and Flamarin dined with me."

P. 147. 20th.—"Was visited by Mr. Dreyden, the Bishop E[li]lis, Sir Tho. Morgan, Mr. Lewis, and la Roche."

23rd.—"I went this morning with Mr. Dreyden, and bespoke two tables. He and young Rizzi dined with me. We went to see pictures." (Also on the 26th.)

P. 148. 24th.—"There was today a ceremony at the Pope's chapel at the Vatican in honour of King James; the Pope's nephew spoke an oration in his praise; I was not there."

30th.—"I went to the Comt[esse] Ad[elaide's]. The Princess Carpegna came in there, much afflicted about a quarrel with her husband."

P. 149. Feb. 1st.—"Went with Mr. Dreyden to Villa Borghese, where I met Mr. Cotton, Webb, and St. Johns."

2nd.—"I had a visit from Mr. Plowden, of the Roman College."

5th.—"I went this morning with Mr. Dreyden and young Rizzi; saw Mons. Strozzi's cabinet at Palazzo Strozzi. There are shells and many knick-knacks. They two dined with me. After dinner B[ishop] Ellis came; he repeated what he had said before, that my Lord Port[land], by order of the King, had offered the King of France that the P[rince] of W[ales] should succeed in case he might breed him up."

P. 150. 7th.—"I went with Mr. Dreyden and [Mr.] Gervaise to see pictures of an Oratorian at Chiesa Nuova. They dined with me. We went to St. Gregoire's and other churches." Visits by Lord Villiers.

P. 152. Feb. 28.—"Mr. Flammerin and the Abbé Tessu dined with me. The first made some overtures to me to enter into correspondencies towards making the peace, which I utterly rejected the meddling with. I was visited by Mr. Leake."

Visits by and to Lords Roxborough and Villiers.

P. 154. March 12th.—"Sig. Nicolò Morelli came to advise me about pictures. I went to call upon Mr. Dreyden; went with him to Comte Clementin, where I offered him a hundred pistoles for the St. Andrew. Mr. Dreyden, Flamarin, and Edwards dined with me. With Flamarin I went to the Corso."

P. 155. 15th.—"I dined alone; took the air with Bis[hop] Ellis. He told me many expressions, (sic) of my Lord Normanby and Lord Sunderland's conversion to Popery, and how zealous and sincere they declared themselves to him, though he never believed them; that the first used to shut the door and then ask him (sic) blessing; that Lord Sunderland owned he made F[ather] Peters of the Council, because he had upon those terms promised to make him Treasurer, but had failed."

Visits by Fa. Forbes and Fa. Mansfield.

P. 158. 28th.—"Mr. Dreyden dined with me. We visited Lord Roxborough and Paul Falconieri."

April 4th.—"We were told that the Cardinal Jansen had sent about the news of the King's [William III.'s] death with that joy and triumph that [it] is shameful; pray God send it prove as false as formerly. I came home at ten. I forgot to say that Mr. Leak and Mr. Pinfold were to see me after dinner; then I knew nothing of the ill news about His Majesty."

P. 159. 5th.—"This morning with affliction and a great cold I kept my bed, rise (sic) before dinner, dined alone; was visited by Mons. Flam[arin], who told me Card. Jansen, in giving part of the news to the Cardinals and Princes of Rome, declared he did it not for the interest his master had in it, but for the advantage the cause of religion received from it."

Visits by Lord Woodstock, Sir And. Fountaine, &c.

12th.—"I had letters and the confirmation of the death of King William the 3rd of England at Kensington, March  $\frac{19}{8}$ , 170 $\frac{3}{4}$ ."

P. 160. 17th.—"I was visited in my bed by the Ab[bé] Marchese, and by Mr. Dreyden."

20th.—"I spit blood again, and gave orders to make [a] mourning coach and liveries, seeing my stay here must be longer than I designed. I was visited by Can[onico] Warwick and Ab. Marchese. I dined alone; was visited by Sig. Gregorio, and Mr. Kenar, and Mr. Cuningham. Monsignor Wallgrave died today, or this night."

P. 161. May 3rd.—"I had this morning a large present and a message from Card. Sacripanti. Mr. Dreyden and I went to Trevigiani.* He and the Abbé Marchese dined with me. I went with Mr. Dreyden to see the ap[artme]nt prepared for the King of Spain at the Vatican, but they expected the Pope to see it, and we could not be admitted. We went to Villa Torres, to the physic garden, which is a very little ill-kept place; it may be well stocked with simples."

P. 162. 4th.—"I was visited by the Superior of the Irish Friars, by Lord Woodstock and Mr. Edwards; dined alone; went in the evening to Frascati, Leary and Goodiere in the coach; visited the Princess Carpegna, who was there, and came home about 9. I lay at Villa St. Angelo."

6th.—"One who was present when the Spanish Envoyé took leave of the Pope saw his Holiness weep like a child, which makes people conclude he is very tender-hearted; and some suspect him apt to dissemble because he cries so often for having been made Pope, which many say pleases him as well as another, and particularly Card. Carp., that no man ever made more intrigues than he to obtain that dignity."

* A visit by Trevigiani is mentioned at p. 164.

P. 163. 11th.—“The great character which King William has in these parts is chiefly owing to old P[rin]ce Vaudemont, who, when he was at Rome, gave them a true notion of that great prince—how much it was their interest to wish well to one who curbed the exorbitant power of France; before they esteemed him a tyrant and a monster.”

P. 164. 18th.—“I saw an Irish friar, a nephew of Aylmer. . . . Yesterday I had a letter from Lord Godolphine, to tell me the Queen would keep the place of Master of Horse for my return. Now I have almost been offered all the great places of the kingdom; twice I quitted Secretary, once Chamberlain; King William once offered me to be Lord Treasurer, often to be President and Privy Seal, to be governor to the Duke of Gloucester, and last to be Lieutenant of Ireland and Groom of the Stole at the same time.”

P. 166. 31st.—“Received letters from England that on the 19th April, o.s., my mother died. I said nothing of it in my family till I enquired how I ought to mourn.”

June 2nd.—“I went with Mr. Dreyden to see pictures, to Carlo Marcelli, to the garden at Monte Cavallo.”

P. 167. 10th.—“Saw only young Rizzi, who brought bills of exchange to sign upon England for 500[L.]st. He showed me the Declaration of War of our Queen and the States General against France and Spain.”

P. 168. 21st.—“I dined at the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's]; met her uncle, and the Ab. Marchese.”

P. 169. 28th.—“Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], and from the top of her house, this being St. Peter's Eve, saw the girandola at Castle St. Angelo, the finest firework for one moment I ever saw; and [it] looked like a tree of fire, or a shower of gold.”

July 1st.—“Visited Ab. Melchior; talking of controversy, he owned a General Council was an ill judge, as all the Italians do, and would reduce Infallibility to the Pope's person.”

P. 170. 2nd.—“Dined at the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's] with the Canonico [Paleotti, her uncle?], and Abate Marchese. Visited Lord Villiers and Mr. Leake,” &c.

P. 171. 9th.—“I was visited by [a] Carmelite friar, who came with Mr. Burrows about Mr. Jervaise Carton. Saw the P[rin]ce Borghese[']s entry as Amb[assador] of Spain.”

Pp. 171, 172, 173. 16th, 18th, 22nd.—“Dined at the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's] with her, her uncle, and the Ab. Marchese.” (Three entries.)

P. 173. 23rd.—“I went to take my leave of the Countess Adelaide, who went this evening to Bologna. I dined alone; was visited by Mr. Dreyden. We went to Villa Borghese; found there a Swede Abbot, who is turned Papist. I brought them both to Monte Cavallo, and came [home] at one hour.”

P. 174. 27th.—“The Procurator, a Frenchman, came and talked politics to me, which I little minded; he blamed the Queen's policy for making war. I made him no answer but that it was now too late to talk of that.”

P. 175. 28th.—“The English Papists here, and particularly F. Mansfeld, say they write from Paris that the Duke of Berwick is gone for Scotland, which agrees not ill with the account we have that D[uke] Hamilton and seventy others have protested against the Parliament.”

Aug. 1st.—“I heard the news that Mr. Cecil had drowned himself in the Lago di Costello near la [or Cà] Rizza, where he lived; he had filled his shirt and pockets with stones, to be sure to sink; he had been melancholy ever since the misfortune of killing his brother.”

3rd.—“I was visited by Fa[ther] Mansfeld and Canonico Warwick.”

P. 176. 4th.—“Saw Mr. Brown, who gave some account of the inquiry [which] had been made into Mr. Cecil’s death, where appeared some ground to suspect he might be murdered by rogues. I exhorted him to make the best inquiry I [he?] could into the matter.”

5th.—“I had a fresh relapse of bleeding. I went in the evening to visit the Guardian of the Irish Friars; the house is well situate, and the library handsome, but filled with wretched books; the church is pretty. There is a good Madonna of Carlo Maratti, besides two chapels painted all by him.”

P. 177. 13th.—“Mr. Plowden came to visit me, and told me my niece Plowden was dead.” Unfavourable remarks on “the beliefs of this country.”

P. 179. 22nd.—“I went to the Ab. Melchior. Bishop El[1] is came in; we talked of this victory the Germans say they gained the 15th.”

26th.—“Had a visit from B. Ellis; he told me the Court of St. German’s had a design to remove him from hence; that it was pressed he should go into England; he refused it unless he could obtain a general pardon. I approved his caution, and promised, if Card. Sacripanti mentioned it to me, that I would say the same to him.”

P. 180. Sept. 2nd.—“Was visited by Mr. Trelawny, the mer[cha]nt. . . . One Mr. Querk came this afternoon to take his leave of me, going soon into England.”

P. 180. 28th.—“I went to Frascati, to see the Princess Carpegne; she is used to honour me with her confidence, in asking my opinion in many things of her private concerns.”

P. 181. 6th.—“I saw one William, an Irish priest, who brought me an Irish Lord’s son, who lives with Card. Imperiali. . . . The watermen scold upon the water, as on the Thames.”

P. 182. 9th.—“F. Forbas came to see me, to bring me the news that my Lord Middleton and [Lord] Clermont were turned R[oman] Cat[holics]; and his head was so turned with the joy that, after having made a short, nonsensical discourse of controversy, he assured me, if I would abjure, nobody [but] he and Card. Sacripanti should know it. I asked him what ground I had given him to make me such a proposal; that when once I thought their belief the true one, I would not be afraid or ashamed to own it, but that at present I was so far from thinking that, I believed it more impossible for me to be a Papist than to be a Turk, and desired he would hold such discourses no more to me."

10th.—"I had a visit from Bishop Ellis; he brought me a draft of a licence granted by the [King] James the First to a priest, to stay and officiate in England, and [said] that the Emp[eror's] Amb[assador] had offered to gain him such another. I told him I thought it hardly possible, but that he might do well to try."

P. 183. 12th.—"I went with Leary to two shops to buy prints for my Lord Treasurer" [Godolphin].

15th.—"Sig. [P.] Falconieri told me, when Alg. Sidney was here, he conversed much with Card. Palavicine."

P. 192. Oct. 29th.—"Mr. Litton, West, Thorold, and Trelawny . . . dined with me."

P. 193. 31st.—"Took the air by Porta Angelica to Ponte Mole, where I met the Con. Ad. [Countess Adelaide] and her sister coming to town; went to her house, where I stayed till past 4, and then home."

P. 196. Nov. 23.—"Dined at the Con. Ad. Went with her, her sister and nephew<sup>o</sup> to Villa Benedetta and Torre; to her house, and home at 5."

24th.—"Was visited by my Lord Effingham."

P. 198. 30th.—"Lord Effi[ngham], his Governor, and Mr. Dreyden dined with me . . . Mr. Dreyden told us he had seen the last year the best account could be taken of the number of people in Rome, and it was less than 160,000."

Remarks on MSS. in the Vatican library.

P. 199. Dec. 5th.—"Signor Dom Rizzi and his son were with me, and showed me two letters directed for the King and Queen of England, in It[alian], which I suppose are intended for St. German's. He said the Duke of Poly's servant brought them to his house, he being not at home, and left a message with his servant that the Duke of Poly had sent them to the English Duke who lives near the Ara Celi (meaning I suppose me), but that I had told him I had no means of sending them, but advised him to carry them to Dom Rizzi. This is an invention of the Duke of Poly's servant, who was not with me, nor did I ever give him such an answer. . . . These Italians are more ignorant than 2,500 years ago, to think I could have any correspondence with those at St. German's."

P. 201. 12th.—"Took the air in the evening towards Ripagrande alone, to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide], where I met Monsignor Moncatini, her landlord, and understood he was the person Dom Livio sent to Poland to negociate his being King."

P. 202. 23rd.—"I was [went] to see my Lord Quarenden at the Montedors."

P. 203. 24th.—"Lord[s] Quarendon (sic) and Effingham dined with me."

P. 204. 30th.—"I received a message from the Emperor's Ambassador, with a letter [which] Sir Lamb[ert] Blackwell desired to Sig. Mulinari, which I enclosed to Sir Lamb[ert]. . . . My Lords Quarenden and Effingham, I am told, had this day a quarrel at Frascati, where the town rose upon them, shot a footman, and put them in danger.

1703, Jan. 1st.—“My Lord Eff[ingham]. . . related his affair at Frascati, methoughts (sic) not much to his advantage.”

P. 205. 5th.—“I was visited by my Lord Quarenden, who lays the fault of their bustle at Frascati on Mr. Lanieri, Lord Effingham’s Governor, whom he describes first very furious, and then very fearful, being the first who drew his sword, and the first who run away to secure himself in a house.”

P. 206. 8th.—“The Conte Matei . . . desired me to write to Sir Lamb. Blackwell and to England, and to send a letter of his, that any of our ships who (sic) should come to Ancona might have orders to apply to his brother, who is the Emperor’s consul there; there being at present one who, under pretence of a patent from King James, obliges the English nation to act by him, though he be at the same time an emissary of France, and a declared enemy to the present interest of the English nation.”

10th.—“I saw there [at the Countess Adelaide’s] the Duke of Bracciano, who said that the story of In[nocent] the 11th being made a Cardinal for a complaisance to Donna Olimpia at play, was not true; that his uncle had never been a gamester, nor been a soldier, nor was ever out of Italy, though some have said he was a soldier, wounded in the right arm, and had been in Spain, but all three are false.”

P. 207. 14th.—“About 2 at night happened the earthquake—about 7 at night English account. Most agree it lasted a minute; I perceived it not at first, but at the last plainly found the floor roll under my feet as if I had been at sea, and saw the walls move. I went to the Co[u]n[tess] Ad[elaide], and home at 5, when I heard processions going about the streets. All run to confession, imagining that mumbling a few words to the priest, and the priest to them, their consciences are safe, without any real or firm purpose to amend their lives. The churches were open, and the priests heard confessions all night. It is generally said that about 6 and 11 there were two other small earthquakes, which I did not hear. The motion of the first made me sick, with a little headache after, the manner one feels at sea.”

P. 208. 15th.—“It is said that in the hall of the Capitol the earthquake has forced some iron bars, and make [made] a great crack. I do not hear that any house is fallen, or any person killed.”

18th.—“Was visited by the Comte Matei, who recommended and pressed much that her Majesty would send a squadron into the Adriatique.” Damage done by the earthquake at certain places; people killed.

P. 210. 25th.—“I saw young Rizzi and the master of a merchant ship Sir L. Blackwell is concerned in. He said he came from England to Civitavechia in 30 days, and that 28 is a common passage. He touched at Leghorn. The voyage back is commonly longer, because the current at the Straits' mouth setting always into the Mediterranean there must be a good wind to carry you through; besides, the winds generally hang better to come this way than to return to England."

P. 212. Feb. 1st.—"I sat this morning to Jervaise for a picture."

2nd.—Another earthquake. A villa out of Rome was lent to the writer.

P. 214. 7th.—"Was visited at my villa by Lord Effing[ham], his Governor, and Mr. Dreyden."

9th.—"Carried the plan of Whitehal[l] to S. Falconieri."

P. 215. 18th.—"I went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], where Sig. Gioseppe Ferrari, the master of my villa, Sig. Pellegrini, [and] Canonico [Paleotti],* the Co[untess's] uncle, dined. After dinner came the Princess Carp[egna], l'Abbate Stuffi, and Comendator Spretti. I supped at the Co[untess's], and home at 4."

P. 216. 22nd.—"I visited Sig. P. Falconieri, and discoursed about the building Whitehall."

25th.—"I sat all this morning for my picture at Jervaise[']s lodging."

Pp. 217, 218. Remarks on the government of Rome, the Inquisition, and the Pope's character.

P. 220. March 7th.—"Was visited by B[ishop] Ellis, who told me he heard a plot had been discovered, laid by the Whigs in England, to dethrone the Queen, and to call in the P[rince] of Hanover, and to marry him to the Duke of Newcastle's daughter; that, under pretence of subscribing money for Prince Eugene, a writing had been signed to this effect, and was presented to Alderman Dashwood, who discovered it to the Queen; but she found it so general that she thought best to take no notice of it. This I suppose is Jacobite news, which they flatter themselves with."

9th.—"Went to the Ab. M[elchoir],† where I found a Camerier Segreto del Papa. After he was gone the Ab. showed me a copy of a letter from the Pope to the Queen of Poland, which she had sent into Germany, where it had been intercepted. I observed four things—that he praises and encourages the E[lector] of Bavaria in his present zeal and undertaking; praises the Primate of Poland for joining with the King of Sweden against the King of Poland; encourages Prince James to join with Sweden in order to get the Crown; and lastly mention is made of a letter writ by the King of Sweden, but it is not clear whether to the Pope or to the Queen, but I doubt he has correspondence with both."

P. 221. 10th.—"Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide]; took the air with her and the P[rincess] Carp[egna], who told us that Card. B. had told her that the cause of the Archbishop of Cambray's disgrace was that M[me.] de Maintenon had loved him, was jealous of him for another, and for that reason enraged against him."

12th.—"Lord Effingham visited me to take his leave, intending tomorrow for Venice and Vienna." Number of persons killed in the earthquakes in the Pope's State, at Norcia, 2,067.

"Some days since I was told by one who had it from Card. Norris, that he the said Cardinal believed no man in the world more learned than Dr. Lloyd, the present Bishop of Worcester. He had some years since sent him some doubts in chronology, and in a letter he had in answer he affirmed there was learning enough to make a volume."

P. 222. 15th.—"Was visited by F[ather] Forbas. He, talking of the Pope's health, said I might cure him, meaning flatteringly if I would turn Papist. I seemed not to understand him, and replied I was no good physician. He told me Dr. Gordan (sic), the late Bishop of Galway in Scotland, and who was here since last summer, was turned Papist. Certainly nothing but interest and no religion can make a man of sense and learning embrace that sect in this country, where one sees nothing among them but pride, luxury, and ignorance."

P. 223. 18th.—"Jervaise was with me, and drew my picture; he dined with me. I was visited by Mr. Trelawny and Lord Quarenden."

19th.—"This morning the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's] daughter took the habit at the Ursulines in Campo Marzo. . . . I dined alone; . . . to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], and home at 4."

P. 224. 22nd.—"They told me (my servants) that Mr. Montagu came to town last night."

P. 225. 24th.—"Mr. Montague (sic) was here with his Governor."

P. 227. April 7th.—"I remember today the Princess Carp[egna] in discourse said it was generally believed at Paris, that the daughter [who?] is said to be the Queen of Eng[land] was a child the K[ing] of France had of Madame Seignelay, which he was unwilling to own, and took that method to make her great at the same time it served to confirm the legitimacy of of the P[rincess] of Wales."

8th, Easter Sunday.—Another earthquake.

P. 229. 13th.—"The Comte Mattei came from the Emperor's Ambassador to desire I would write two letters, one to Sir La. Blackwell, the other to Mr. Wheley, [to] assist a privateer who with the Emperor's commission had taken two French prizes and brought them into Leghorn, where it was contested they were not good prize. I writ accordingly; took the air alone; went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide], and home at 3. She showed me the copy of a letter [which] Pavia, who has made himself religious of la Trappe, writ to his brother at Bologna, where he tells that this last summer Lord Clermont, being desperately sick, was converted [converted to?] the Roman Church, and no sooner received extreme unction but began to recover wonderfully; which worked so much on his father, Lord Middleton, that from a most inveterate heretic he turned good Catholic."

P. 230. 14th.—"I writ a letter to the Comte Mattei, to dissuade the Ambassador to come to visit me, because I could not return it to take the left hand, and did not think fit to go a-nights without ceremony, as was proposed."

15th.—"I was visited by Comte Mattei, who told me the Ambassador would positively come this evening to visit me without ceremony; desired I would neither come to meet him nor conduct him; he expected no return visit, but desired my friendship. . . . The Ambassador came to see me; he would by no means permit me to go down with him, but would be treated without ceremony, as he would treat me."

16th.—"This morning I was visited by F[ather] Forbas, who began again to desire I would think of another world—that I might do anything here with all secrecy. I told him I imagined they were all here in a mistake about me; that I would this moment own myself a Cat[holic] if I thought it right; but I appealed to God and used several imprecations upon myself if I did not really believe they were in error; and so I do profess to God I think the Roman Church full of ignorance, tricks, and error. Mr. Dreyden died this morning, about an hour after midnight. F[ather] Forbas mentioned several by their intercession to King James had recovered health and limbs, so I perceive they intend to make him a Saint."

"P. 231. 20th.—"The Comte Mattei . . . brought me his memorial to send to Mr. Stepney."

P. 232. 22nd.—"Went . . . to the German Amb[assador's]; sent in no Ambasciate, but went in and came out without ceremony."

P. 233. 29th.—"Was visited by the C. Car., who offered his service to her Majesty, to give her notice of what passed in this Court, without any private interest or taking money, and mentioned means he had of knowing things well worth accepting."

P. 236. May 19th.—"I saw the under Library keeper of the Vatican, who came to desire I would send to get the copy of a certain MS. in the Cotton Library; he told me he had examined the MS. of St. Mark's Gospel at Venice, and was sure it was Latin. He told me, by the ancient MSS. [which] had come to his view of the things in Italy, the people of Rome had sworn fidelity to the Popes to get rid of the dominion of the Greeks, and afterwards would have got rid of the Popes; that contest lasted several ages; but the Popes were never entire masters till about an. 1600, before when, if they would send the sbirri, they were obliged to send to the R[oman] Senate to have them. . . . I met the two Mr. Ulmes and their Governor, . . . Mr. Montagu, and Mr. Lopt, a Hollander."

P. 237. 24th.—Another earthquake.

P. 240. June 2nd.—"Went with Leary to see [seek?] lodgings for my Lord Brudnell."

5th.—“Was visited by Canonico Bassan[o], who told me the Venetian Ambassador, who had long had a desire of my acquaintance, would [meet?] me tomorrow evening in the garden at the Ab. Melchior's.”

P. 241. 6th.—“I went to Ab. Melchior's and walked in his garden, where soon came the Venetian Ambassador, who is a fine gentleman, and seems a good, familiar sort of man; but he talks so openly of the German side, at least did so to us, that I much doubt his sincerity, for if he be really sincere, he said too much for a prudent man.”

10th.—“This morning Mr. Mont[agu], his Governor, [and] Mr. Gervaise came at 14 [Italian time] to me, to look upon the draft for Whitehall. They dined with me, and Lord Quarenden.”

P. 242. 16th.—“At 24 Lord Brudnel, his brother and Governor arrived; they supped and lay here. I stayed with them till they went to bed, and went to bed myself about 4 a clock.

17th.—“This morning Mr. Montague and [his] Governor came to see Lord Brud[enell]. I invited them to dine.”

18th.—“I went with Lord Brud[enell] and [his] brother to St. Peter's; as we returned we met Mr. Mont[ague] and [his] Governor; went all to Villa Mattei. I set Lord Brud[enell] at home. . . . The German Ambassador sent Comte Mattei to acquaint me that the Germans had defeated that part of the French army commanded by Albergoti.”

Many other references to Lord Brudenell and Mr. Montagu. Mr. Cuffaud and Mr. Radcliff are mentioned.

P. 246. July 11.—“Went . . . to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], where came the German Ambassador, who said that upon the last visit he made there in company with the Venetian Ambassador, the Pope had been told that great consultations had been held against his State; when I think hardly three words of politics passed in the whole night, and not one word relating to his State.”

15th.—“Heard the news that the Marshal de Boufflers had routed a party in Flanders.”

P. 247. 16th.—“Was visited by the M[arquise] Guerini, a noble Venetian, who lives at the Court of Hanover.”

18th.—“The [German] Ambassador told us that Erizzi, the last Venetian Ambassador, used to laugh when people said that the Pope and the Venetians were making a league; he said the P[ope] had neither resolution, honour, nor money, and the Rep[ublic] had need of no such ally to engage her in war, and leave the burden to be supported by them.”

P. 248. 21st.—“Went with Lord Bru[denell, his] Governor and brother to Cardinal Sacripanti. . . . The Cardinal always mixes, as he did now, in his discourse how the Pope recommends to his missionaries not to meddle with politics. The Cardinal called the Queen of England Queen two or three times.”

22nd.—“The [German] Ambassador told me he was sure the French had promised the Pope Modena, Reggio, and Ferrara for his family, and to recompense the Church for the alienating the last with giving it a part of the Abruzzo.”

P. 249. 24th.—“Went to the Ab. Melchior, where was Monsignor Marciani, who said that before the declaration of this present war he had orders from the Duke of Modena to propose to the Pope, to offer to the French, that in case Naples and Milan might be left in the Pope’s hands to be disposed on after as should be agreed, the Emperor would send no troops into Italy; but the answer of Cardinal Jansen and the Spanish Ambassador on behalf of their masters was, that if the Emperor would accept of the marriage of one of his daughters with Philip the 5th, he might have it, but was never to expect una palma di terra; upon which the Pope wittily said, ‘Questa comedia non hà da finire col matrimonio.’”

26th.—“The German Ambassador . . . told me that the M[arquise] del Vasto writ him word, that having pressed the Emperor in an audience to some expeditious resolutions, he answered, ‘La nostra tardanza non ci [h]a mai pregiudicato’; so del Vasto took his leave.”

P. 250. 28th.—“Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide’s], where the German Ambassador, after having searched [for] me all over the town, came to desire I would write to Mr. Stepney, to incline him to press the Court at Vienna upon a matter he communicated to me, and upon which he had discoursed at large that very day with the A[m]bassador of V[enice]. The German Ambassador thought the Court of Vienna ought to conclude whilst the others were exasperated, and not lose time and let their courage cool.”

P. 252. Aug. 3rd.—“I discovered by the [German] Ambassador’s discourse that the reason why the Court of Vienna deferred the A[rch]d[uke’s] departure was in hopes that upon the arrival of our Fleet some revolution might happen at Naples or in Sicily, in which case they would send him this way.”

P. 254. 11th.—“There came an Italian gentleman to me; said he came from the Comte Lamberg; was going to Leghorn in order to go aboard the English Fleet, having a commission for captain from the Emperor in the designed descent. He desired my letter of recommendation to the Admiral. I excused myself as being a particular here and acting in no public character, [and] little known to the Admiral.”

“The Queen’s [of Poland?] serenade at Trinità di Monte” is mentioned two or three times.

P. 255. 16th.—“The German Ambassador . . . told [me] for certain the treaty with Savoy was concluded, and he knew the articles.”

18th.—“Yesterday I saw Sir Philip Sidney’s Arcadia in Italian; the translator says he translated from the French, and in his preface hints it had been turned into High Dutch, which shows in how many languages that romance was put.”

P. 256. 23rd.—“Went to Ab. Melchior, where there came in the Ambassadors of the Emperor and Venice, and I took soon my leave, but understand that at Vienna they desire to know whether the Venetian Ambassador made the late proposition with the knowledge of the Republic; in that case a proposal shall soon be made from the Emperor.”

P. 257. 27th.—“I visited the M[arquis] Guarini, by whom I think I discovered that the Elec[tor] of Hanover would gladly command the Army in Flanders. . . . The G[erman] Ambassador . . . told me upon his discourse with [the] Venetian he found him more cool and uncertain than formerly, but said he would write. The Ambassador gave me notice that at the Countess Ad[elaide's] spies were put to know what I said; but that little concerns me, for I have nothing to do here, nor will have nothing to do either here or elsewhere, and should be glad such good spies were put about me as might discover that I have no business; for if I would engage in business, I might have a post that would become me better than than being a little agent or spy here at this wretched Court, which may be esteemed by those who take him [the Pope] to [be] God's vicegerent, but by us is not esteemed more than a D[uke] of Parma.”

P. 258. 29th.—“I received the melancholy news of my g[rand]father's<sup>o</sup> death, who died at Dean† the 15th of July, o.s. I went immediately and acquainted the present Earl of Cardigan with it; went with him and his brother to Ripa Grande. They set me at home, whence I stirred not out, being not well; the apothecary gave me a glister.”

30th.—“Saw F[ather] Mansfeild, and afterwards Mr. Cuffaud, who was of opinion less the [than?] 1,200 for Lord Cardigan, and 300 for his brother, would not be a proper yearly maintenance. I dined alone; visited Lord Quarendon, who was ill; walked with Lord Cardigan and [his] brother in Villa Montalta; went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], and home at 3 [Italian time].

31st.—“Visited Lord Qua[rendon], who told me that two Germans had both told him that the M[arquis] Guerini said he was here on business from the Court of Hanover.”

Sept. 1st.—“I received a letter from Mr. Trelawny that he was carried to the new prison for debt; I sent Leary to him.”

P. 259. 3rd.—“My Lord Qua[rendon] sent to me to come to him; he told me how busy the priests, and especially [the] F[ather] Rector, had been about him. I found him well inclined to resist their tentatives, and encouraged him in his good disposition.”

Duel between the young Marq[uis] Santa Croce and one Gavotti.

P. 260. 6th.—“I was visited by F. Rector. It blew a great storm of wind at the north, which may be bad for our Fleet; we hope it may end the hot weather.” References to the Inquisition.

P. 261. 13th.—“Yesterday Abbate Scarlatto died, they say heart-broken, his pension of a thousand crowns a year from England failing with the death of King William, and another from the Emperor upon this breach with Bavaria, whose minister he was formerly in England, and now here at Rome.”

16th.—“Was visited by Lord Card[igan], his brother, and Mr. Rigby, lately come to Rome.”

* Robert Brudenell, Earl of Cardigan, 1664-1703; succeeded by his grandson, George Brudenell.

† Deene, co. Northampton.

P. 262. 20th.—“I bought three pictures of Sal[vator] Rosa, and one of Luca Giordan. . . . I saw two English gentlemen; one of them they say is named Beckley, who goes to the German Ambassador’s, but converses with no English. I did not speak to them.”

22nd.—“I was told the Elec[tor] of Brand[enburg] would turn Papist, [and] join with the King of Sweden in order to be King of Poland; which I believe not a word of.”

23rd.—“After I was in bed I was wakened, and told William, my English footman, had killed Domenico, an Italian footman, in an osteria. Will[iam] presently fled, I sending him money to carry him to Leghorn.”

P. 263. 24th.—“This morning I sent Leary to have the poor dead fellow buried, [and] to the Ab. Marchese to advise; he carried Leary to his brother-in-law, and I hope no further trouble will come of the matter. Thomas, as present, is to be examined by the Judge about 20 a clock.”

P. 265. Oct. 3rd.—“I had letters from Sir L. Blackwell and Mr. Wheley that our Fleet arrived at Leghorn the 30th Sept. I understand they want not only water but provisions. . . . Saw a little Spanish friar, who desired my letter to protect him from being taken in his voyage by sea from hence to Spain, which I refused him.”

4th.—“Visited the German Ambassador, who the same night after midnight went post for Leghorn; he told me our King of Spain had prepared a present of a very rich sword for the Duke of Marlborough. This day I had letters from Mr. Stepney, by which I find he is convinced, and I am too, that I at the desire of Co[m]te Lamberg writing to him upon the proposition made by the Venetian Ambassador, his answer to me was taken out of Consul Broughton’s packet by the Government of Venice. It is certain it never came to my hands; and by this means that matter may have come to the knowledge of some who should not have known [it], not by my fault, who acted no otherwise in it than as Co[m]te Lamberg himself desired me. I am glad this justification is come to me, because at present I think he suspects I blabbed it where I should not, though I protest before God I never opened my lips of it to anybody living, nor writ it to any but Mr. Stepney, as he requested me to do.”

P. 268. 15th.—“Last post brought the news that the French had secured the Savoy troops in their service, so that it is concluded that Prince is declared for the Emperor. . . . I heard that the Abbate Melani has been dead about twenty days; he was Resident for the Elec[tor] of Hanover. It is worth remark that that Prince keeps a minister in the Court of Rome; there are now many pretenders to that employment. Melany (sic) was highly partial to the French.”

17th.—“Received a letter from Sir C. Shovel, who mentions his orders to repossess the Straits before the end of this month, and the Dutch to be at home by the 20th Nov., o.s. He says that, landing for water at Alatea, in the kingdom of Valencia, in Spain, he was so well received that several of the magistrates, clergy, and gentry came on board him; told him, if the Governor tried to molest him, they would send him his head; and declared that in the kingdom of Valencia they believed there were non [not?] 100 men well affected to Philip 5th. I dined alone; went to see C. Lamberg, who arrived from Leghorn yesterday. He seemed perfectly satisfied with the Admiral's reasons for not staying longer in these seas. He said the Dutch and English do not agree over well, and the first had showed particular resentment to Sir L. Blackwell. . . . I visited [the] M[arquis] Huntley at the Monte d'oro."

P. 269. 18th.—“This evening the D[uke] of Norfolk and [his] brother came to Rome; I did not see them.”

19th.—“I went with H. G.,<sup>o</sup> and met Lord Card[igan], his brother, and Governor at the Vatican Library . . . . As we came back, G. confessed himself so alarmed with the In[quisition?] that he was desirous I would try if I could get him a chair to teach jus civile in Holland, retaining his own religion. I dined at the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's]. I went to the D[uke] of Norfolk's, but he was not at home. Letters from Leghorn advised that our Fleet sailed from thence the 13th October, s.n. I saw a letter from the Great Duke to Sir Clow. Shovel, where he gave him the title of Excellence.”

P. 270. 23rd.—“Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's]; she told me she had something like a proposal of marriage† from Jean Anto. St. Piere, by means of the Ma[rquis] Otieri. I advised her, as a friend, not to decline it. I dined at home at the Ave Maria, and was told there had been a quarrel between my steward and butler, in which the first was in the wrong.”

24th.—“Saw only Sig. Gregorio, who treated the acomodement between my two servants. . . . It was confidently reported, when the D[uke] of Bed[ford] was here at Rome, that he made his recantation to Colredo, a Cardinal, esteemed of great piety, lives in a palace which joins to the Chiesa Nuova, and lives and eats in community with those Fathers of the Oratory.”

P. 272. 29th.—“Found Mr. Cuffaud‡ at home, who complained of both his pupils' [Lord Cardigan and Mr. Brudenell] hours, and of Mr. Bru[denell's] carriage. I dined alone; went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], where I found an English or Irish Capucin, who had run from his convent in France. She had sent for Lord Card[igan], who went with me to the Duke of Norfolk's. Lord Car[digan] recommended the friar's case to the Duke, to recommend to Monsignor Caprara.”

P. 277. Nov. 8th.—“Examined my china which came from Lord Halifax.”

P. 277. 22nd.—“Called at the villa of the English Jesuits, where my Lords Huntley and Cardigan were a-shooting. The Jes[uits] who were there for diversion invited me to dinner. I excused it, and dined at home alone.”

* Or A. G.?

† She had been married before; her daughter is mentioned previously in the Diary.

‡ Cuffauld, pp. 278 and 285.

P. 278. 23rd.—“Mr. Stepney writes me word that our King of Spain has given the Duke of Marlborough a sword worth 30,000 florins, and, to make it more valuable, gave it him from his own side.”

27th.—“Visited Comt[e] Lamberg, who told me he had had notice that Sir La. Bla[ckwell] had advised Card. Jan[sen] of all that had passed when he interpreted between the Admiral and the Ambassador, but that he was convinced the calumny was false, because they could not relate the true word (sic) that passed in the conversation. He said he believed the Fr[ench] would endeavour to set a-foot a treaty of peace here at Rome this winter.”

P. 280. Dec. 2nd.—“I understand that about the 9th of the last month the Duke of Norfolk kissed the Pope’s foot, having received, as they say, all the honours paid to dukes and peers of France or grandees of Spain; he went with hat and sword. I hear [the] M[arquis] Huntley did the same, the same day.”

P. 283. 11th.—“I went to wait on the M. Huntley, who designed to leave Rome tomorrow or next day. . . . [The] M. Huntley told me, when he waited on the [Pope] yesterday to take his leave, as well as at his first coming, he was admitted to his presence with his sword; which shows Lord Tavistock’s error, to allow himself to have his sword taken from him when he went to audience.”

14th.—“I went to be present at a consult about Lord Card[igan], where was the Pope’s doctor, Gatucci, and Collegiano, the G. Duke’s famous surgeon for the stone. They all agreed it was gravel, or as they say calcoli, at best; they ordered him to be blooded, to drink the waters of Lucca, and bathe every other night; they agreed, did the season permit, that the baths of Lucca were good for him. I went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide], who is ill also of the gravel.”

P. 285. 21st.—“A Franciscan, a Hollander, desired me to send a medal of the A[rch]duke [to] the Queen in England, which I excused.”

P. 286. 30th.—“The Prince Carpegne (sic) told me the Malta Ambassador, who lives at Casa Sachetti, had declared that no English should come to his house, being enemies to France and Spain; and the Resident of Spain had sent to the Princess Carp[egna] that she would excuse his not coming to her as usual, since she received English.”

P. 287. 1704, Jan. 3rd.—“This morning, calling on F.F. [Fathers] Mansfeld and Powel, we went to the Library of the Augustines, where we were showed a book printed in 1472 that speaks of the invention of bombs. We saw there another book called ‘Prodigiorum et Ostentorum Chronicon,’ printed at Basle in 1557, which says: ‘Anno 1536, in Hispaniæ quodam op[er]ido, die Februarij mensis septimo, circùm horam noctis secundam, ut in aliis Finzelius recitat, visi sunt cælo acquoso ac nubilo duo adolescentes armati gladijs congregientes, quorum unus habuit in læva manu Parmam aquilâ insignitam, cum inscriptione Regnabo, alter verò scutum prolongum cum inscriptione Regnavi.’”

P. 289. 13th.—“ My Lord Huntingdon . . . came to town tonight.”

P. 290. 18th.—“ I was informed this evening that the Elec[tor] of Hanover has sent another agent here to Rome, the Baron Scarlatti's nephew, placed page in that Court by the late Abbot Scarlatti. Besides the surprise that he should think an agent necessary for a Pro[testant] Elec[tor] in the Court of Rome, I wonder he should send one of the family of Scarlatti at this time, when they are so entirely devoted to the interest of Bavaria.”

20th.—“ Was visited by Doctor Timone, brother to the English interpreter at Constantinople.”

P. 291. 22nd.—“ I saw Mr. ———, who is making two large porphyry pots for our Queen. . . . Monsignor Bonaventura told the Princess Carp[egna] yesterday that the King of France had discovered that the Duke of Savoy, whilst he was in league with him, had fomented and supported the Cevenols [Cevennois], at which both the King and the Pope are highly exasperated, and it is designed that the fort (sic) of the war shall be made the next year in Piedmont.”

24th.—“ Mr. Cuffauld came and told [me] Lady Mid[dleton?] had in a letter to him presented her service to me; that she did not write, for fear it might not be welcome. I desired my service might be returned to her; that I was glad to hear she was well, but desired to be excused in the present circumstances from corresponding by letters. . . . Was visited by Sir F[rancis] Hungat.”

P. 292. 26th.—“ Was visited by Mr. Raddcliff, impatient to know the news about the conspiracy, and the D[uke] of Ber[wick's] secretary [being] taken.”

P. 293. Feb. 2nd.—“ Went . . . to Lord Cardigan's, who gave a music and a great supper to all the English after midnight; home at ten [Italian time].”

4th.—“ I went to a collation at the Jesuits' Villa, given by the English Jesuits. There were present Lord Hunt[ingdon], Card[igan], Qua[rendon], Mr. Mont[agu], Brudenel, Rigby, &c.”

P. 294. 9th.—“ I visited the Comte Lagnase; he complained that the King of Poland had been ill used by Denmark and Brandebourg. The first had soon made his peace, which when the other saw, he did not only not enter upon the war, but detained the provisions and magazines [which] had been made in his country, though it was in concert and league with them that the war was begun. He complained also that the Pope should send a Dominican friar to compliment the King of Swede[n], an heretic, and encourage him to continue the war against the King of Poland, a convert.”

13th.—“ Dined at Lord Hunt[ingdon's] with Lord Qua[rendon], Card[igan], &c.; played there at whisk all day.”

P. 295. 15th.—“ When the Duke of Savoy began with (sic) the war with France, he no treaty established neither with the Emperor, England, nor Holland. He thought he had had one with the Emperor, but at Vienna they altered all [that] was concluded between his R.H. and Aversperg. They are now making one which it is hoped may succeed."

P. 297. 23rd.—"This morning died Cardinal Norris, famous for learning. He had been an Augustine Friar, born in the Venetian State, but pretended he came out of England. A prelate of a good deal of wit said he was sorry for his death, but it was convenient in this respect, that now one might say boldly the whole College of Cardinals were ignorant; before, one was put to the trouble to except Norrice" (sic).

P. 301. 13th.—"Sig. P. Falconieri's valet de chambre brought me the draft he had corrected for Whitehall, and one for a house for me. Two or three days ago his master kindly remembered me, and ordered him to put them in my hands; he was then near expiring, and he died this 13th of March, about 24 hours, Italian."

14th.—"I looked into [a] convent called St. Eusebio near St[a]. Maria Maggior, and found the Abbot, an old Bolognese, called Guicciardin, very civil; he showed me the convent, which is of Celestin monks. He had been in England 25 years since, and saluted King Charles II."

15th.—"Was visited by the Duke of N[orfolk], who said he believed he was refused [permission?] to go to Naples, because he had visited the Emp[eror's] Ambassador at Leghorn, and gone aboard the Eng[lish] Fleet."

P. 303. 25th.—"Was visited by F. Mansfeld, no more Rector."

27th.—"Called at the Duke of Norfolk's, but there was Cardinal Sacripanti."

30th.—"The Duke of Norfolk came to take his leave of me, but coming just as the German Ambassador sent to know if he might see me, he would not come up. . . . The Ambassador, when he was here this morning, told me that when the King of Spain was at the Hague, the ministers of England and Holland endeavoured to get him to promise that our merchants in Spain and his other dominions might have some more liberty in the exercising their religion. The King answered that any promise of that nature, if known, would be so prejudicial to his interest in Spain that he thought it more serviceable for them that he remained in silence on those subjects. The Ambassador praised the artifice and quickness of the answer, but I doubt it shows but too clearly that, let us do what we will for the interest of these Popish princes, they at the bottom intend nothing but our ruin."

P. 305. 5th.—“Prior Vahini,<sup>o</sup> who has been these last two years General of the Galleys at Maltha, is lately arrived at Rome; but, before he left Maltha, having some misunderstanding with the Inquisitor, Monsignor Spinola, who, according to the custom there, is Nuncio likewise, he purposely neglected to visit him when he left the Island. When he came to Rome, he waited on the Pope, and was well received; but the Inquisitor's letter of complaint coming the day after, it was brought into the Congregation of the H[oly] Office, and the Prior is ordered to depart Rome is [in] six days, and be at Maltha in three months, and there pay the visit to the Inquisitor.”

P. 306. 7th.—“The P[rincess] Carp[egna] sent to me to come to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide]; she was in concern because the P[rrior] Vahini was by the Pope's order obliged this evening to go to Naples, in order to go to Maltha.”

P. 307. 13th.—“The M[arquise] de Rich[e]lieu, who had been at Vienna, says the Elec[tor] of Bavaria was angry with the M[arquis] de Villars, because he had proposed several opportunities of beating P[rince] Louis of Baden, which the other neglected; when the truth was, Villars had orders not to beat Baden, who takes money and is in a right understanding with the K[ing] of F[rance]. I believe this was the report at Vienna; the truth time must clear.”

15th.—“I saw Mr. Cuffauld, and afterwards Mr. Mont[agu] and [Mr.] Gaugain, who sealed their pictures. I desired they might be sent when I sent mine.”

P. 308. 18th.—“Visited Ab. Melchior; I find the Comte Lamberg and he are not well together. He excused himself that he did not come to visit me, saying he knew not what pretence the Inquisition might take to persecute him in case he sought the conversation of heretics, but that I was very free to come to him, for that they could not object to him for that. I met there in the garden with Monsignor Falconieri and Priuli. The first told me that Sig. P. Falconieri, some days before his death, had said he owed his death to the too much application upon the draft on (sic) Whitehall.”

P. 309. 22nd.—“Went abroad; met Lord Cardigan, who was concerned that the Queen of Poland should take ill something he, young Cavalieri, and Teodoli had said to her footmen. I doubt they had more reason to complain of her Majesty's equipage and their insolence; however, they designed to go and ask her pardon. We visited Mr. How; walked all in Villa Medici."

23rd.—"Visited Lord Cardigan and Mr. Hales."

24th.—"I saw F[ather] Mansfeld, who desired me to get him a pass from the German Ambassador to Holland. . . . I received the passport."

26th.—"Was visited by F[ather] Forbas. A youth desired to speak with me, who said he came from Fat[her] Sorba, or some such name, and pretended to have it from Dom. Carlo Albani, that the Cardinal Jansen had had an audience of the Pope, to press him to interpose his credit to incline the Emperor to a Peace. The Pope excused himself upon his being incapable to do much in regard he was esteemed so much a Frenchman; and, besides that, the matter depended not upon the Emperor, but that the English and Dutch would oblige the Emperor to continue the war till France were depressed. The Cardinal desired the Pope to interpose his authority at Vienna, and leave the Dutch and English to his master, who was inclined to give them either Flanders or a reasonable barrier there, and also the W[est] Indys, which they desired above all things; that he would take Lorain, Naples, and Sicily, give Milan to the D[uke] of Lorain, and, in short, dismember the monarchy of Spain in a most notable manner. Who this youth is, or by what authority he speaks, I know not, but I never saw anybody so young, and so meanly dressed, speak with more sense and nobleness than this young man did, who seemed not to be 18 years old.* He desired me to give notice of these particulars to our English ministers abroad, that they might inform the grandees of Spain how their monarchy is offered to be divided; but I, having no better authority than this, answered civilly, but resolve not to meddle in the matter."

P. 311. 28th.—"I settled the account this morning with the goldsmith for my plate."

29th.—"Went . . . to the German Ambassador's, who showed me a letter of Charles the 3rd [of Spain] to employ him as his Ambassador here at Rome. He confirmed to me all that the youth told me on Saturday of the conversation between the Pope and Cardinal Jansen."

30th.—"This morning a Spaniard came to me, recommended by Sig. Adriano, to teach me Spanish."

P. 312. May 6th.—"I visited Mr. How, and, at Co[m]te Mattei's request, told him, in case our Queen were disposed to know what passed in this Court, she could employ nobody more diligent and faithful than the Comte, who, for a small pension would serve her well; that I was sensible it was not without objection, and could not be done by way of public character, to receive a grant which, to the Court of Rome, was penal by our law; but it might be done in the way of an intelligencer or spy, without any character, in case her Majesty and Ministry judged it of use."

P. 313. 11th.—"One Berkly, a Swede, but [who] pretends to be of Scotch extraction, tells me that an English gentleman, whom I have seen here above a year, though he never came near any English, is run into extravagance. He says his true name is Williamson, though he goes by the name of Davenport. He desires me to take care he be not ruined, and to ship him off for Leghorn, where Mr. Fuller, a merchant, has private orders from his friends to furnish him with money. I sent Mr. Leary to discourse Mr. Brown upon this particular; Mr. Jervaise was with me. Leary tells me this man's name is Latwood; that Mr. Montagu knew him a merchant at Constantinople, but he desired to be concealed. Mr. Brown thinking him a little distracted, I have sent him to persuade him to let blood and take physic, and and then go for Leghorn and England." There are several other references to this "madman."

P. 315. 20th.—"Leary came to me, and I perceived was inclined to go for England, and, as his health was bad, desirous to go through France. 20th.—“ Mr. Cuffauld came to tell me some words had passed between Prince Carp[egna] and my Lord Card[igan]. . . . [The] M[arquis] Ottieri came to me; told me Lord Card[igan], by the report of those present, had grossly abused the Princess Carpegne (sic) in substance, though not in plain words, telling her she cheated; that what he said to her was public, and might excuse the Prince if he answered something warm to my Lord.” . . . .

P. 327. 27th.—“ Consul Kirke’s letter of the 21st June says the Duke of Norfolk embarked that day at Genoa upon a Genuese galley, and was to be landed at Toulon.”

P. 328. 30th.—“ Ab. Gravini told me the man who had copied my Italian translation of Lucretius, having scruple, had been at confession, and by advice of the confessor gone to the Inquisition, and had named not only me, but Ab. Stuffa and Gravini, who had helped me to the book and copyist.”

P. 329. July 4th.—“ Mr. Hill writes me word our Fleet under Sir G. Rooke had seen the French Fleet, but both continued their course.”

P. 330. 6th.—“ Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide’s], who was like to die in the night, by the mistake of a physician or apothecary in a prescription of opium. Called at Prior Vahini’s, who had liberty two days since to return, but he was not at home.”

“ P. 332. 17th.—“ Yesterday by the post I had the news of the death of Mrs. Stonor, my nephew’s wife.”

P. 333. 18th.—“ Co[mte] Mattei tells me that they have here described the Duke of Marlborough as such a barbarian and cruel man as has not been heard of since the time of the Hunns, and I suppose with whiskers like a Tamberlan. God knows how different this is from his character and person.”

P. 334. 21st.—“ Was visited by F[ather] Sorba, and it is observable how violent the whole Order is; he was pleased above measure to hear that the Duke of Marl[borough] had put all to the sword in Donavert.”

P. 335. 23rd.—“ The Co[untess] Ad[elaide] . . . told me the reason of her some time since desiring Lord C[ardigan] to come not so frequently to her house was that B[ishop] E[llis] had been twice with the Pope to complain as if she designed to trapann him into a match. I have already observed how great a liar this prelate is, and here he show[s] his malice. . . . We have by this post the confirmation of the victory P[rince] L[ewis] of Baden] and the Duke of Marlborough have had near Donavert.”

P. 336. 24th.—“ The German Ambassador sent his gentleman of the horse to tell me that in the coffee-house over against his palace the night before had happened a quarrel between Mr. Gordan (sic) and Jervaise; that he was so dissatisfied with the assembly there that he would put down the coffee-house, but only it bearing the name of the English Coffee-house, he would not do it without my consent. I told him his Excellency might do as he pleased; that [neither] I, who never went there, nor I believed none of the nation, would take it amiss, since it was not otherwise called English than that some English used to go there.

“I was visited by the M[arquis] Ottieri, who told me at the Palace they were much alarmed that the Eng[lish] and Dutch Ministers at Vienna had offered, upon the late business at Ferrara,<sup>o</sup> that their masters should chastise the treachery on the Pope, if the Emperor would permit. They heard Prince Eugene was to come into Italy, and the Duke of Marlborough, with 15,000 English and Dutch. They were comforted at this Court that Verceil was taken, and with the hopes that the Duke of Savoy would make his peace with France.

“I went to the Imp[erial] Ambassador to confirm what I had said about the coffee-house. He told me that some months since sending (sic) to the Pope in favour of the Duke of Savoy, the Pope had answered he wondered the Emperor would interest himself for one who more than ever was treating with France; that he had acquainted the Duke of Savoy with what the Pope had said, who, making his just complaints to the Pope upon so hard an expression, the Pope answered he said it only in private discourse, and knew it only from public report and the foglietti.”

P. 338. 28th.—“Mr. How told me that Jervaise in his late combat was so frightened that he fell into [a] swound, and his [How's] Governor found him so; that at the coffee [-house] all say none but Gordon was upon him, though he says three or four; the rest came to part them. At the request of somebody the Ambassador has not put down the coffee[-house], but sends every night some of his bravos to make their rounds and keep good order there, which has frightened away the French and Spaniards.”

P. 339. 29th.—“Was visited by Mr. Burk; walked in V[illa] Borghese; went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], and home after one. She supped with the Canonico, her uncle.”

30th.—“I went this morning to the bathing-house; they took off my hair with laying a stinking stuff upon it, of a colour between black and blue, or a leaden colour; it is composed of calcia viva, or lime, and orpimento, in English orpiment. They let it lay upon me about a quarter of an hour, and then took the stuff off with their finger, and the hair came away with it without pain. They scour the body with a sort of flour or powder, and afterwards with a lather; then you go into the bath; and last they wash you in another lather, and put you to bed. I gave half a pistole. I dined at home alone. One may observe they advised me not to take off the hair on my breast, as not wholesome, nor did I do it. This stinking stuff must be let lie on more or less time according to the strength it is made of; the lime burns the hair, and the orpiment takes it off. This orpiment they told me was found in the copper mines, and used by painters; Jervaise is now here; he says, only by ill painters. I took the air alone; went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], and home before 4. Orpiment is a kind of poison; the stuff laid upon you is called mardocchio."

P. 340. Aug. 1st.—"The [German] Ambassador showed me a certain project for the D[uke] of M[arlborough] to finish this camp[aign] in Italy, which I believe might put an end to the war if it were practicable, but it depends on too many things to make it a thing one can promise oneself; and the first is, that Bavaria be immediately reduced, or agreed with; the last may be done in a few hours; the first will always take more time than is consistent with this project, besides divers other objections. . . .

"Count Lamberg [the German Ambassador] told me there was a League in project between the Pope, [the] Venetians, Florence, Genoa, &c., to exclude all foreign troops out of Italy, which I count a League for the French. This Venice Ambassador was zealous for it, which shows him as double-hearted as ever I believed. Erizzi and the Ambassador expected here oppose it."

P. 342. 4th.—"Comte Mattei was with me, who says that a year ago I was so ill in the opinion of the Pope that it was thought a crime to go near me; now that they fear the D[uke] of Marl[borough] and his red-coats should come into Italy, his Holiness does nothing but commend me. The Princess Carp[egna] told me last night that Mons. Bonaventura said mighty things the Pope had spoke in my praise, and that I had moderated the business in Ferrara. For my part, I have neither moderated nor exasperated, nor indeed meddled in the matter."

5th.—"This morning I began to take Nocera waters."

P. 343. 6th.—"Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], where Ab. Stuffa told me that after our Fleet had been the last year at Leghorn, there was carried to the mint 160,000 crowns of English money."

P. 344. 8th.—"I saw Cont[e] Mattei, and desired him to speak [to] the German Ambassador about Mr. Serle's niece, representing to him the ill consequence such a proceeding (sic) might be to the Cath[olics] in England."

9th.—"Saw Mr. Cuffauld, and Mr. Hales, who goes tomorrow to Leghorn, Genua, and Constantinople; he told me an odd story how Mr. Macky had been poisoned."

P. 345. 10th.—"Co[mte] Lamberg told me he would press that Mr. Serle should have all imaginable liberty to speak to his niece, and that she should be taken out of the convent, and declare to him, herself, her mind."

12th.—"I dined at the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], going first to Giu. Chiari, to see Mr. Montagu's two pictures, one the Apollo and Muses, the other K[ing] Midas. I observed his copy of the Ascension, and believed it done by some scholar of Rafael; it is the best I ever saw, and the two prophets, Moses and Elias, are otherwise clothed than in the original. . . . I hope the D[uke] of Mole's project to bring an army into Italy is no great secret, for the Princess Carp[egna] told me Monsignor Caunitz had told it her today."

P. 346. 13th.—“Saw . . . an architect who was designing a house for my Lord Cardigan.”

14th.—“My Lord Cardigan is much nettled at a letter Lord Dun. writ him upon his conduct and loss of time at Rome; he was with me about it. I pacified him all I could. I dined at home alone. Saw Mr. Cuffauld. Goodere tells me the coffee-house over against the German Ambassador’s is put down by order from the Pope, and the man (sic) told him that the Government said the reason was because Mr. Gordon, in the quarrel with Jervaise, had called our Queen a whore; a great nicety of his Holiness, and the fact is not true, for Gordon said no such thing; and if he did, the Pope more justly should punish him, who has a pension from him.”

15th.—“The M[arquis] Ottieri told us that the M[arquis] Maldachini had a letter from the Nuncio at Paris, which says C[omte] Toulouse has orders to fight our Fleet, coûte qui coûte.”

P. 347. 18th.—“I put the letters to the design for Whitehall, assisted by a young architect.”

P. 348. 21st.—“I signed legacies to three several people, endorsed on the back of my will, and [for] better security I made, signed, and sealed an instrument in paper to the same effect, both witnessed by Mr. Cuffauld, Mr. Brown, the tailor, Matia — and Thomas Venables, my servants. . . . This day I sign the addition to my will, and do entreat my heir to make it good, though it should anyways be defective in the nicety of law.”

Account of a “serenade” at Rome in honour of the birth of the Duke of Britany.

P. 351. 26th.—“I saw Lord Card[igan] and his stonecutter about his chimney-pieces. The German Ambassador sent a gentleman to give me the news the Ba[varians] and French were beaten by P[rince] Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough. . . . The battle happened the 13th of August.”

P. 353. Sept. 3rd.—“Mr. Stepney writes to me that the Duke of Marlborough sends him word he had above 12,000 prisoners in this battle, and taken since. The Duke’s letter was three days after the fight, Aug. 16th. A greater victory has not been gained in these last ages.”

P. 354. 6th.—“Mr. Rigby left Rome this night.”

7th.—“The Princess Carp[egna], talking this evening to me of the Peace, said that the Père Chartreux, an emissary of Cardinal Jansen, said the agreement was easy with our Queen, giving her to reign for her life, and that the P[rince] of W[ales] should reign after her. She asked my opinion. I told her I thought the nation would never bear that, and that any Minister who should treat such a Peace would lose his head.”

P. 355. 11th.—“F[ather] Forbas was here to persuade me to incline my Lord Card[igan] to go to the Pope. I told him I thought my Lord ought to receive those treatments [which] were due to his quality, which if refused, it was the Pope refused to see him, not he the Pope. He hinted it would be believed that I hindered him, which I care little if it be.”

P. 356. 12th.—“Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], where finding Conte Mattei, I desired him to tell the Ambassador what Mr. Hill writ me—that in letters intercepted from the G[reat] Prior to his brother, it was discovered the Pope had made a treaty with the Fr[ench], and they endeavoured to bring the Venetians into it.”

13th.—“Conte Lamberg sent me the copies of certain intercepted letters of Cardinal Jansen and the G[reat] Prior Vandom [Vendôme], by which it is apparent the Pope is in a treaty with the French, and they both press the Venetians to come into it. The design is to hinder the Germans returning into Italy. The Venetians hearken, but they do not conclude. But it is plain Morosini, the Ambassador here, is not so well disposed to our League as Conte Lamberg once believed.”

P. 357. 15th.—“I went to take my leave of Lord Card[igan], &c.; he went away this evening.”

18th.—“The Spa[nish] Ambassador pretended to have great news of a victory over us at sea.”

19th.—“The letters from Genua do not confirm the French victory by sea, but give hopes to the contrary. Abbé Villeneuve has this morning been throwing money to the people, and crying ‘Viva la Francia.’ They took the money, and, when they saw an end of the game, cried ‘Viva l’Imperatore.’”

P. 358. 20th.—“F[ather] Peters came to take his leave, being to go soon for Flanders.”

21st.—“Mr. Jervaise was with me, [and] signed his will in my presence, Goodere, Venables, and Tom Burford being witnesses. He gave it into my custody; in case of my death, to be delivered to Mr. Baldwyn, his uncle, at Shrewsbury.”

P. 359. 23rd.—“M. Ottieri sent me a copy of a letter from the N[uncio] in Spain to Card. Carpegn[a], I went to the M. Ottieri, to F[ather] Poscut, [and] to the German Ambassador, who told me that when the Secretary of Spain carried the news of their pretended victory to the Pope, he fell on his knees, and said the Te Deum, and immediately after told his nephew he knew it was not true.”

24th.—“I went this morning to see my Lord Card[igan's] chimney-pieces, all four, before they were packed up.”

25th.—“I went to see Mr. Boucher, lately arrived from England. . . . I went to V[illa] Mattei, where came the young M. B[u]on Giovanni; . . . his business was only to recommend his uncle the C[onte] C[arendini]* to the Queen's protection—that she would interpose that the Emperor would give him the diploma designed him before his capture. He said his process was made; he was proved innocent, and several witnesses had confessed to have been suborned, and to have sworn falsely against him; and that without the last injustice he must be returned to his house without any punishment.”

* There are many subsequent references to proceedings against him, before the Inquisition. He was probably the person referred to previously as “the C. Car.,” on p. 763.

P. 360. 27th.—“I am told that M[me.] de Maintenon, writing to Card. Jansen upon the defeat at Hochstet, said they were so used to success that every little disadvantage seemed much to them. She called that little.”

P. 363. Oct. 10th.—“Received a letter from Sir L. Blackwell, to desire I would be g[od]father to the child his Lady expects. . . . Count Mattei was with me this morning, who told me the Duke of Savoy had declared to the Emperor’s Minister at Turin that, if not immediately succoured, he must think of his own preservation.” The Conte and Contesse Carendini, &c.

P. 365. 17th.—“Was visited by Mr. Seudamere, who arrived yesterday at Rome.”

P. 367. 28th.—“I visited Mr. Edwyn Turner, and [his] Governor.”

P. 369. Nov. 6th.—“Visited Mr. Downing, Car[r], and How.”

8th.—“I was visited by Mr. Carr and English. At the Co[untess] Ad[elaide’s] I found Comendator Jonas, a Venetian, who had been lately Ambassador from Maltha to Sicily. He said the Sicilian noblemen, knowing he had served the Emperor, discovered to him their affection to the House of Austria, and desired he would write to Vienna that something (sic) only the English Fleet might appear, and they would declare. He says the ports in that island are admirable, particularly I think Augusta, capacious enough for three royal fleets.”

9th.—“All the English gentlemen in town dined with me. We were 14 at table; after dinner Mr. Brown [came?]; the strong Englishman he did not shew.”

10th.—“I saw Dom. Rizzi, and Edwards the painter.”

P. 370. 13th.—“I was told Card[inal] Wolsey built not the house near St. Peter’s, formerly belonging to the Eng[lish] Amb[assador], but another, where Rondanini now lives at Pozzo delle Cornacchie, so called from the cornacchie [rooks], the Card[inal’s] arms.”

P. 371. 15th.—“P[rior] Vahini told me Malta was about 60 miles about, and so well fortified that it was worth the seeing. It affords great riches to the King of Spain, having corn, meat, and almost everything from his dominions, the island itself being very barren.”

P. 373. 19th.—“Mr. Macky came yesterday to Rome, and saw me this morning.”

21st.—“Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide’s], where Count Lagnase showed a copy of a letter of the Queen of Poland to Prince Alex., her son, very angry he had not accepted the Crown.”

P. 374. 22nd.—“This morning came above 40 Dutch seamen to my door; they had been prisoners at Naples. I gave them 8 giulios a man to go to Leghorn, that they might not here be debauched from serving their country, and from their religion.”

P. 375. 28th.—“I saw Mr. Brown and the strong man, who has a small wrist and small legs, but big arms and thighs. Mr. Seudamer, Turner Edwyn (sic), and Governors dined with me.”

P. 376. Dec. 2nd.—“I dined at P[rince] Carpegne’s, with Mons. Caunitz and the Co[untess] Ad[elaide]. We went to see the strong man; there is great art as well as strength in the lifting the board with his teeth, and breaking the rope.”

P. 377. 6th.—“I saw the boy that uses to come from Fa[ther] Sorba; he came to enquire if the news of Gibraltar were true.”

P. 379. 12th.—“I read today the Elec[tor] of Bav[aria’s] manifest against the Emperor. . . . I also read a memorial by the M. de Prie, Ambassador of Savoy at Vienna, in which he uses some harsh and improper expressions towards the Court of Vienna for their not succouring his master, and speaks not handsomely of England and Holland, saying they mind their private interest, and that of their trade; and so it must be expected they will neglect the war of Italy, and perhaps may have in view at the end of the war to content themselves with some agreement like that of the Treaty of Partition. I am apt to suspect it is not a true, but supposititious memorial; it was dated, I think, the 10th of Sept.”

P. 381. 23rd.—“Was visited by two young Carys, lately come from Lisbon, with an Irish Dominican, and an Irish priest, nephew to Sir James Butler the last. The Sp[aniards] last year entered Portugal, where they were,” &c.

P. 382. 25th.—“I received this evening the news that Mr. Brudenel had the small-pox at Venice.” Visit from Mr. Burk.

13th.—“Sig. Bart. came to copy my Portia of Guido.”

P. 386. 16th.—“Was visited by Mr. Scudmere, who told me he had seen Mons. Ventimiglia’s engine yesterday, which had raised a pillar of 1,000 pounds weight, he only using his little finger to help it.”

P. 387. 22nd.—“Mr. Carr was with me, and told me he thought he could procure a pass to go to Naples; that not only his curiosity but his health required it. I told him, in the last case, I could say nothing against it, and believed there was no danger. The greatest inconvenience appeared was what they might think in England, now that his brother was in the Ministry. He told me the Spa[nish] Ambassador said that as he was a Scotchman he would grant it, but to no Englishman; which shows the hopes they flatter themselves with from Scotland.”

24th.—“Saw Mr. English, who goes with Mr. Carr tomorrow to Naples.”

P. 389. 31st.—“I spoke with Sig. Bartolomeo and others, and bought four pictures of Rosa for Lord Hal[ifax] and myself.”

P. 390. Feb. 6th.—“Visited the two Carys and the Roman seminary Mr. Tufnail.”

7th.—“Toseano came to clean my teeth, and he being concerned in wagers, whether the French or we had had the victory at sea, he told me Card. Jansen pretended there was an attestation from Copenhagen, declaring the French had the advantage. I know not why in Denmark they should be able to judge of that matter better than in other places, unless it be that I think I remember a Danish Admiral came to serve on board Sir G. Rooke as a volunteer, to gain experience, and perhaps it is he that presumes to make this decision."

P. 392. 14th.—"This evening the Q[ueen] D[owager] of Poland left room [Rome], Card. Sacripanti accompanying her as far as ———."

16th.—"The German Ambassador . . . told me the King Aug. of Poland was a little suspected at the Court of Venice to be treating with the French; that a courier of the Queen of Poland's had been stripped on the borders of Trent by his, the Ambassador's, order, and 70 letters taken about him for Monaco."

4th.—"Was visited by Ab. Gubernatis, who brought me a letter from Mr. Hill."

P. 398. 10th.—"The Ab[bate] who sold me Roza's (sic) pictures, came to desire Roza might retouch and mend what faults were in them."

12th.—"I had the news [from Venice?] of Mr. Rowley's death."

13th.—"Co[m]te Ferrante of Naples came to see me. I had often refused to see him, but he said it was business of importance. He told me two English gentlemen had given money to a servant of Card. Jan[sen] for a pass to go to Naples, but if they went, they would be made prisoners; and that he was so told by one who gives those passports from the Sp[anish] Ambassador. He said he would send me the names of the gentlemen this afternoon. . . . Mr. Grey came to Rome this evening."

P. 400. 19th.—"Moineau was with me; he has finished my Lord and Lady Exeter's tomb; he says they are to give him 6,000 crowns for it, he furnishing the marble; so to be sure that is the most."

to offer the Crown of Sicily to the D[uke] of Monmouth, which K[ing] Ch[arles] and the said Duke at first warmly embraced, but were afterwards changed, by reason of the turbulencies (?) of the Parliament, [and?] regard to the Spaniards, or perhaps to the French; these (sic) being of those Mes. who had revolted from Spain, and, finding France could not protect them, tried England. In short, they were drove out of England, being even refused passports; and, persecuted for this after in France, fled to Italy. He assures me that the Governor of the Castle of Messina and the Viceroy of Naples have orders from the Giunta in Spain to receive no French troops, though they should have an order for the same signed by the King of Spain and his Cab[inet] Council."

P. 405. April 8th.—"By a letter I received tonight from Mr. Macky, I find the D[uke] of Bu[ckingham] writes often to the old Electrice of Hanover, but send[s] his letters open to be read by young Davenant at Frankfort. They correspond in letters of wit, without giving titles or subscribing name[s]."

P. 407. 15th.—"Giu. Chiari and his brother came to retouch Mr. Montagu's two pictures."

16th.—"F[ather] Forbas was to see me, who says my Lord Melfort has been readmitted to the Courts of Versailles and St. German's; that he resides at Paris, executes no employment, but is called Duke of Melford (sic), for which title he had a patent when King James was in Ireland. . . . [Went] to see the fascie or clouts the Pope sends to the Duke of Britany by Monsignor Palavicini; . . . the mantle and cradle-cover &c. is [are] embroidered. . . . Part of these fascie were made for the p[retended] P[rince] of Wales, but never sent to him. . . . Mr. Frankland told me he heard that Mr. Macky had writ and sent characters of our Court to that of Hanover, and said Mr. Macky had owned something to that effect to him."

P. 410. 20th.—"Visited the Duchess of Aiguillon, who wept with the thoughts that she had little hopes of returning to England. I met her, the P.P. [Prince and Princess] Carp[egna], and Co[untess] Ad[elaide] at the Card. Arquin's villa, where the P[rince] Carp[egna] gave for a collation a pigeon pie."

21st.—"I was visited by Canonico Paleotti, Mr. Scudmore, [Mr.] Boucher, and [their] Governors. I dined at the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's]; visited Ab. Melchior; came home; was visited by an Aug[ustinian] Friar of the Popoli, and a great Imperialist. Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's], where the Pr[incess] Carp[egna] and the D[uchess of] Aiguillon came in; the last recommended (sic) to send her word if there were any hopes she might return to England, and wept for fear. She desired I would speak to the D[uke] of Marlborough and Lord Montagu in her favour. I found by her she desired I would make her no more visits at home, for she found it might displease the Constable, and give jealousy to the Ministers of the two Crowns." The Duke of Britany, &c.

P. 411. 24.—"Went to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide's]; first in my whole life talked to her of 191081210 31 27."

26th.—“I designed this morning to have begun my journey, and my things were all packed up for that end, but I deferred it till tomorrow.”

P. 412. 27th.—“This morning about 12 I left Rome, and arrived at Narni about 2.”

He went by way of Terni, Spoleto, Foligno, the Apennines, Loretto (where he saw F. Mansel, an English Jesuit), Ancona, Sinegaglia, Fano, Pezaro, la Catolica, Rimini, Cesena, Ravenna, Mangiavacca, and Volana.

P. 415. May 3rd.—“I took a vessel, left Volana at 12, and arrived at Venice after 24. Lord Car[digan] was out of town, but [he] having left orders with Mr. Cufaude that I should be received at his house, I lay there that night. I took out of charity a German and [a] Neapolitan friar, to give them their passage; they were both zealous Austrians.”

Descriptions of architecture, pictures, sculpture, &c., in Venice.

P. 425. 31st.—“Arrived at Padoua.”

* Called “the Consul of Zant,” on pp. 418, 427.

June 1st.—“I went this morning with my servants to see M. Obizzi’s house by water, seven miles from Padoua; it’s called Cataglia; it is the most convenient habitation I have seen in Italy. The palace for strangers, where are the apartments, is painted by P. Veronese, and one picture is the M. Obizzi receiving the Garter from Edward the Third, and the other mentions [the] signal service he did the said King against David, King of Scots.” Selvatico, Este, Monfelicce.

P. 426. 3rd.—“Came in a peota to Venice.”

P. 427. 5th.—“Lord Car[digan] and Mr. Cuffaude came to discourse with me. I satisfied the last with the pressing arguments I used to the first, who, having no reply, would not say he would or would not go for England, but told me he would give me an answer tomorrow. He will consult his Lady, and I doubt not go.”

6th.—“Saw Lord Car[digan], who promised solemnly to be in England this winter.”

From Venice the writer went to Padua; thence to the baths of Alano, to Praglia and Vicenza. Descriptions of architecture, pictures, gardens, &c. He returned to Padoua and Venice.

P. 434. 20th.—“The Consul brought me three Mr. Terrys, Irish gentlemen, one a clergyman; the other two serve in the troops of this Rep[ublic].” Music and singing.

P. 436. 23rd.—“Went to Rose Alba’s, where Mr. Hoar was sitting for his picture.”

27th.—“Writ this night to 9000,* my 17102216† 6242522272516.”

29th.—“I had a gentleman from Cornaro, designed Ambassador in England, to know if I would be at home this afternoon; he designed me a visit. . . . Was visited by Cornaro.”

P. 437. July 1st.—“I sent to Cornaro, to tell him, if it were not troublesome, we would wait on him this afternoon; he returned answer, we were padroni. Mr. Frankland and Cope came to see me. I went with Lord Car[digan] and [his] brother to see Ambassador Cornaro; he showed us their place, where the Cardinal, his uncle, when in Venice, his father, and four sons live; it is the noblest I have seen, and seems also convenient in small apartments.”

P. 438. 3rd.—“I delivered to Mr. Cufaude my Will, desiring him to keep it till further order for me, and in case of my death to acquaint Sir Jo. Talbot and Arden that he has it in his possession.”

5th.—“I set out from Venice.” Concluding remarks on its churches, paintings, palaces, people, &c. “It is the only great city I ever was in where I declare I could not live, for there is no place to walk and take the air, and I think the air moist and unwholesome.” He travelled by way of Mestre, Castel Franco, and Bassano. Lamentations on leaving Italy. Then to Primolane, and various places in the Tirol, to Trent, Bolzano, Ozlan (?),

* The Countess Adelaide.

† There is a space between the foregoing and the following figures.

Brixen, Sterzzingen, the Mountain Brenner, a mountain called Shonberg, Inspruck, Rotenbach, &c. Descriptions of these places. Several references to the Elector of Bavaria's recent march and retreat through this country.

P. 448. 16th.—Arrived at Auxbourg.

17th.—“Was visited . . . by two sons of Mr. Blaithwayt, their Governor, an English gentleman, that lies of (sic) the same house, and is of Bristol, and one of the town. I was ill, and had letters to write, and went not abroad.”

18th.—“The Bristol gentleman told me the magistrates here refused him a pass. I sent Goodere to them, to certify he was an Englishman.”

P. 449. 19th.—“The merchant<sup>o</sup> came and brought me letters. We went out in a coach; he showed me the ruins the French had made in the town with their bombs, where they and the Bavarians lay after the battle of Donavert, and where the Imperialists and English were at Fridberg. The French had the River Leak before them, pretty broad, but the depth of it is but narrow; they had the works they had cast up before them, and the town behind, else the camp is a meadow on an absolute flat.”

P. 450. 23rd.—“I went to take a private lodging, the same where Marshal Marsin lodged. I was told the Duke of Marlborough had forced the French lines in Flanders. I sent to this Bishop's secretary to know the truth, who said it was so. . . . Heard that P[rince] Max. of Hanover was in the house; I waited on him; he seems [a] hearty, free German, but [what] I most wonder at is that his companion is a Jesuit.”

A. 454. Aug. 7th.—“They tell me Cornaro, the Venetian Ambassador to England, is arrived here. I sent to make him a compliment, that I was lame, and not able to wait on him. He came to me about 7, and stayed till past 9.”

P. 455.—Entry of the Comte de Truesess into Augsburg, &c.

P. 456. 20th.—“I saw Mr. Molesworth and Pultney, who came to visit me.”

P. 457. 28th.—“I stayed at home all this day writing, and by this post sent to 9,000† to come hither.”

Sept. 2nd.—“Was visited by the Lutheran Minister and the Senator; the last I think is called Stetin. I find by their discourse that the House of Hanover is in reputation in Germany to be very indifferent in matters of religion, meaning that they have little, and have bred up their children to practise that was most convenient where they were married. I think they profess Lutheranism.”

5th.—“Was visited by Mr. Thinn, Harry Thinn's son, and his Governor, Mr. Downes.”

P. 458. 7th.—“I sent to speak with Senator Stetin, and communicated to him my intention towards 9,000, and enquired if one who had changed religion, and was a subject of the 200, * “My merchant, a Lutheran,” on p. 450.

might safely pass through the country of the Popish Eccle[sias-tical] Princes; he thought, without the least difficulty."

11th.—"Alone in the evening with the Lut[heran] minister; I told him my intention concerning 9,000."

18th.—"The Lutheran minister came to acquaint me that he feared his superior might make some difficulty, we being not of the Lutheran communion. I desired him to discourse his superior. I took the air; at my return I found [the] Co[untess] Ad[elaide] at the inn. I sent for Mr. Van Stetin, to get him facilitate. I supped with the Co[untess] Ad[elaide], and came home after 9."

19th.—"This morning Mr. Van Stetin, and after the minister, have been with me, and all difficulties are removed if the Countess declare her resolution to become Protestant. I went abroad with the Co[untess] Ad[elaide] in the morning, Mattia* and his wife being in the coach. We went to goldsmiths. After dinner the Senator visited her; she declared herself to the Senator in a manner that gave him full satisfaction as to religion. We went again to other shops. I supped with her at the inn, as I had dined; came home before 10."

P. 459. 20th.—"This morning I went at 8 to the Co[untess] Ad[elaide], and brought her to my lodging, where to Mr.——, the Lutheran minister, she made her declar[at]ion to change religion; then he before 10 married us, in the presence of Mr. Van Stetin, his brother-in-law, Mr. Hervart, two patricians, the master of this house, and all her servants and mine. After dinner we took the air; to [the] woods, and home about 6."

21st.—"This morning I went not abroad. The Senators who were at our marriage, the minister, my landlord, and merchant dined with us. My wife and I went abroad, and came home after 6."

P. 460. 28th.—"Today we dined alone. The Lut[heran] minister sent a harpsicol; came and played on it. The Senator visited us."

Oct. 1st.—"My wife at [had] letters from Rome, that her relations there, without her knowledge, having petitioned the Inquisition for leave that she might marry me, they refused it upon account that I had changed religion. What will they say when they know she did it by a Lutheran minister only? But as this application was made without her knowledge, so I think the denial will trouble her conscience no more than it does mine."

P. 461. 6th.—"The Senator came in the evening; my wife gave him an English sword."

9th.—"This morning we packed up. The Senator brought me two passes for me and my three servants I sent away this evening."

10th.—"This morning, before 7, we left Augsbourg. . . . At Don[a]vert we passed the Danube. . . . About noon my wife and I took a surgeon, who spoke Italian, and went to see the field of battle, about seven miles from Donavert. The French seem to have committed a fault in letting our mean [men] pass a small rivulet and marshy ground; that done, they had a fine plain, the Danube on their left, a wood on their right, and a village called Blenheim in the middle. There their body of best infantry were taken prisoner [s].”

P. 462.—They went by Monheim and Wessenbourg to Nuremberg. Description of that city, the Imperial crown, &c. Thence by way of Kutzingen, Wurtzberg, and Hainaut to Francfort.

P. 466. 17th.—“I acquainted Mr. Davenant of my arrival, who came when we were at dinner.”

18th.—“Mr. Davenant says that the present Duke of Buckingham told him that Isaack Vossius was his preceptor, and that he was persuaded the same Vossius had writ Aloisia Toletana; and the same was confirmed to Mr. Davenant by his own preceptor, Mons. Capel, a learned man, who had been professor of the oriental tongues at Saumur. I much doubt whether Vossius had a good style enough in Latin or a genius proper to compose such a book; and though I knew Vossius well, and the Duke of Bucks most particularly and intimately in the time Vossius lived, I never then or since till now heard that Isaack Vossius had been Lord Mulgrave’s tutor, nor ever observed such a familiarity between them, though I know they were acquainted.”

P. 467. 19th.—“I visited Mr. Davenant; he dined with us. We went to see jewels and rich stuffs, and then went to our new house. He went with us. He told me he was present with Sir Ch. Sedley in his last hours, and that he died like a philosopher, without fear or superstition.” Vineyards, architecture, &c.

P. 468. 23rd.—“Saw the Calvinist minister, and brought him to my wife. He was well satisfied with what she said touching her conversion. We determined to go to church on Sunday. The minister promised to come in the interim to instruct her.”

24th.—“I was visited this morning by Mr. Mainard; saw the French minister who instructs my wife.” Entry of Comte Solms into the city.

P. 469. 25th.—“This morning my wife and I, with our Prot[estant] servants in a second coach, went to the Fr[ench] Calvinist church, about a mile and a half out of town. The congregation was about 300 persons. It is in the Comte de Hainaut’s country, those of Francfort having refused her Majesty [Queen Anne?], the King of Prussia, and most of the Protestant potentates, who have desired the Reformed might have a temple in the suburbs of Francfort.”

P. 470. 27th.—“I signed an instrument in the presence of a notary, and my wife signed the same, by which we resigned to her mother my wife’s portion at Bologna.”*

P. 471. 31st.—“This morning my wife and I dined at Mr. Geldermasen’s. About 4 the Duke of Marlborough arrived, [and]

* The Duke frequently refers to descriptions of the countries and cities through which he passed, by Misson and Coronelli, and corrects some of their statements.

was saluted by the cannon of the town. I saw him, and supped with him. He gave me passes from the E[lector] of Bavaria and the Marshal de Villeroy. I came home before 9."

Nov. 1st.—"This morning the Duke of Marlborough came and drank tea with me, and stayed above an hour. I spoke to him on the case of the Sicilian or Me[s]sinese, but he would not enter into it. I mentioned the case of Carendini; he accepted my proposition to write the whole at length to Mr. Stepney. His discourse was to show how averse the Queen of England was to a peace, [and ?] to persuade me to come into business. He went to make up his letters. After 1 he returned, saw my wife, and dined; at table there was my wife, the D. of M., Mr. Geldermasen, Davenant, Card[o]nel, and Durel, and a Savoy Comte. Before we had quite dined, they brought news that [the] P[rin]ce of Baden was arrived; which civility surprised the D. of Mar., who expected to go to Heidleberg, far out of his way, to see him. The D. of Mar. presently went to P[rin]ce Lewis, to the Maison Rouge. Though news was brought that P. Lewis was come, it was a mistake. Lord Marlborough came back at 6, and sat with us till 9, when they brought word P. Lewis was arrived."

2nd.—"I went to the D. of Marl., but he was gone out to P. Lewis; I avoided making that visit. I came home. The D. of Marl. came, and would give me place in Mr. Davenant's coach; we went to Mr. Geldermasen's, where we dined with P. Lewis, Wakerbach, who commands the Saxon troops, Conte Merci, and others. This last is [a] young man, fat, and a bon vivant, but seems to have wit and spirit, and they say is a good officer. P. Lewis loves talking, has wit and the air of quality. At 4 he went away towards the army. My Lord M., Mr. Geldermasen, and I came to my house, where we drank tea with my wife. At 7 the D. of M. went home; at 8 I went to take my leave of him, and came home after 9. Mr. Cardonel gave me a pass from the Duke of Marlborough, and the Duke two days before me (sic) gave me two passes he had got from the Elector of Bavaria and M. Villeroy."

P. 472. 3rd.—"This morning, before 7, the Duke of Marlborough went away, the cannon of the town firing. I did not see him. The Gran[d] Doyen of the Elec[tor] of Treves and his Chamberlain came to visit me, and also two English merchants come from Constantinople by Vienna."

6th.—"Mons. Autun, the minister, came to instruct my wife."

7th.—"This morning with Mr. Davenant we went to Bocknam, where, after sermon, my wife went into a chamber, where, in presence of Mr. Davenant, myself, and two elders, she made her recantation to Mons. Autun, the ancientest Reformed French minister. Mr. Davenant dined with us. I was visited by the Emperor's Resident, and my wife by the Contesse Holo, sister to the Elector of Mentz, and her niece, a canoness."

P. 473. 8th.—"This morning I went to Boynenam (sic), with my wife, where we both received the Sacrament, with Mr. Geldermasen and Davenant, &c. We dined alone; were visited by all three French ministers, by the Contesse Solmes, a Dane, sister to Alfelt, who was abroad, Governor to the present King of Denmark."

P. 474. 12th.—"Before 10, in a long boat, with board partitions that make three chambers, we left Francfort, Mr. Davenant coming with us. We arrived at 5, with a fair wind, at Mayence. . . . We lay at the Anchor, a good inn."

13th.—"This morning, before 8, we re-embarked at the bridge, taking leave of Mr. Davenant."

They then proceeded down the Rhine, by Bingen, Bachrach, Coblantz, Lintz, and Bonn.

P. 476. 15th.—Before 3 we came to Cologne, as big a town as any I have seen in Germany, but the streets narrow, ill built, ill paved. I saw the Cathedral church, a large, Gothic, dark building. About 6 m. (sic) Ferd. Paleotti came to see his sister [the Countess Adelaide]; he supped with us. Then the Marquis of Hartford, who had been to see the Elec[tor] Palatine at Bensberg, lying in the inn where we did, came to visit us, and stayed till past 10. The inn was the H. Ghost, near the river, a very bad one."

16th.—"My brother-in-law [Paleotti] dined with us."

17th.—"After 7 we embarked; my brother embarked with us." Dusseldorp, Keyserwert, Wesel, Nimighen, Tiel, Rotterdam.

P. 478. 22nd, at Rotterdam.—"Went to a painter's (being carried thither by Mr. Davis), who is in the service of the Elector Palatine; he showed us the Duke of Marlborough's picture, well done, and some others of history, well finished, but not done after the good gusto. We embarked at 2, and arrived at the Hague before 6; we had a lodging provided near the Marshal Turenne. Mr. Stanhope came to see us."

23rd.—"My Lord Albermarle (sic) was to see me."

24th.—"Was visited by Conte Clermont, the Elector Palatine's minister, who brought me a letter from his master. I also [saw] Mr. Bever, the jeweller. Madame Geldermasen's sister dined with us; but before dinner I was visited by Mocenigo, the Ven[etian] Ambassador, and by Mr. Stanhope. After dinner I was visited by the Minister of Hanover, by Lord Plymouth, and my wife by Lady Albermarle."

P. 479. 25th.—"Sir David Mitchel, newly arrived with the yachts from England, . . . dined with us; but besides my wife and her brother, there was the Envoy of Denmark, Mr. Coddoggan, Mr. d'Ayrol, and their three wives. We played at Loo till near 9, and then straight home." Particulars as to Count Clermont and others. The Opera, French Comedy, &c. Marquis Paleotti, Mons. Auverkirck, and others mentioned.

P. 480. 30th.—"With my wife I saw Lord Portland's garden, which is pretty, but nothing noble."

P. 481. Dec. 5th.—"We embarked on a yacht, and arrived at Leyden." Visit to Bidloo, professor in anatomy. Then to Amsterdam. Description of the Admiralty, synagogue, &c. Mr. Chitty's daughter and son-in-law; the Venetian Secretary: Mr.

Drummond, Mr. Sweet. The East Indian magazines; churches, pictures, &c. Return to the Hague, on the 11th.

P. 484. 13th.—“Was visited by the Chev. [de] Croissy, who desired me to employ my interest with the Duke of Marlborough to give him leave to go to France on parole.” Mr. Strickland; the envoys of Denmark and Prussia, &c. “This day Venables and Nena were married.”

14th.—“Was visited [by] Mons. d’Aligre [and] de Valsemé, French prisoners (all these officers wore their swords), and by Mons. d’Auverkerk. The Duke of Marlborough arrived here this evening; lodged at my Lord Albermarle’s, where I waited on him, and home at 9.”

P. 485. 15th.—“I stayed at home this morning, writing; saw nobody but Mons. Brunet, who from Lord Alb. came to invite my wife and I [me] to dinner. Saw a jeweller. There dined with the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Alb. and Lady, my wife and I, Mons. d’Auverkerk, [Mons.] Gromco, Lord Sunderland, Marquis d’Aligre. . . .

“I forgot, in the art[icle] of Amsterdam, to observe how much the Duke of Marlborough is beloved by the people of that city; besides his success and personal merit, they think, as being a stranger so well established elsewhere, he cannot be dangerous to their liberty; he may do them good, but can do them no hurt. They are so enraged against [Count] Slanenbergh for being his enemy, as well as a Jesuited Papist, that had he come to Amsterdam this summer, after he hindered the battle, he would have been de Witted.”

16th.—“I was visited this morning by the Port[uguese] Envoy, Mr. [Col.] Coddoggan, and the Duke of Marlborough. This last showed me a letter from P[rince] Eugene, who styles him Altesse.”

17th.—“Lord Marlborough called here, and we went together to Schivelin. He told me all the plans for P[ea]ce now proposed to these people. The pr[esent] King was to remain in Spain, which he agreed with me could never be well for England. . . . I visited Lord Portland’s son-in-law, who was lame.”

P. 486. 18th.—“My wife and I dined with the Duke of Marlborough at Mons. d’Auverkerk’s.”

19th.—“I saw Capt. Sanderson and Brinfeild, [the] D. of M. [s] gentlemen of the horse. Lord Alb. brought Mr. Buis, Pensionnaire of Amsterdam. I find by him the Dutch think themselves too high charged in this war, and we too low. I know not whether it be not true. I find by him the notion of a Peace here, leaving King Philip in Spain, and sending King Ch[arles] into Italy. I believe this is the Peace at present most feasible, and by this means the Dutch would get as much of the Spanish Low Countries as they desire, but leaving Spain in the hands of the French. I think we in England can never be contented, and ought to spend to the last rather than lose our Med[iteranea]n trade, and the West Indias also, if Philip remain King of them, though the French will promise a free trade.”

20th.—“I was ill all night of my breast and the toothache. [The] Duke of Marlborough came, and over persuaded me to go with my wife to dinner to Lord Alb.; but first we went to Levy, a Jew, who has pictures, and some good jewels. I came home before 6, ill of my teeth.”

21st.—“Was visited before dinner by Lord Sunderland; after dinner by [the] Duke of Marlborough and Lord Sunderland.”

P. 487. 22nd.—“I was visited by Sir David Mitchel and the Envoy of Hanover. I went to make some visits. I and my wife dined at Mr. Smettau's, with the Duke of Marlborough. I afterwards saw Mr. Buis, Penr. of Amsm., who in his discourse shows to be a great Republican, to have a much veneration for de Witt and Barnevelt, well inclined to agree matters between the Arminians and the Predestinarians, and the Church of England and [the] Presbyterians.”

23rd.—“I was visited this morning by Mr. Pultney and Molsworth. I dined at Mr. Stanhope's, with the D. of M., Lord Sund., Lord Buckurst, the Han[over] Envoyé, &c.”

24th.—“Lord Dalremple and Mr. Coddoggan made me a visit. I went with the last to taste wine; then to Co[m]te Les[cherin], who showed me a project of Peace from good hands at Paris: Spain and the Indies to King Philip, with free commerce to the last; Lorain and the province of Luxembourg to the Crown of France; Flanders to the Duke of Loraine; Naples and Sicily to the Elector of Bavaria, with the title of King; Bavaria to the Archduke, with [the] title of King; Milanese, a commonwealth. Les. is not well satisfied with the D. of M.; says he is sure nothing was resolved at Vienna. The D. of M. desires that P[rince] Lewis may go there, and make a project; he has promised to make a project. Les. is ill-satisfied with our Ministers, particularly with Mr. Harley, of whom, in three months that he was at London as Envoyé from the Elec[tor] Pal[atine], he could never have one audience. I dined at the Envoyé of Hanover[s], with the D. of M., &c.”

P. 488. 25th.—“Went with my wife to the seaside; the wind was fair, but our convoy was not come.”

26th.—“Dined at Mons. d'Almet[s], I and my wife, with the D. of M. . . . I went with Lord Marl., Sund., and Alb. to Schivlin.”

27th.—“The D. of M. sate here an hour. After dinner I visited Lord Buckurst, and our Envoy[;] went to Lord Alb., where the D. of Mar. showed us one of two great gold vases given him by the Landgrave of Hess, worth above 2,000*l*.”

28th.—“I dined with my wife at Mr. Opdam's, where was the D. of M., LL. Alb., &c.”

29th.—“News arrived last night that five ships of the convoy were come, but I knew it only this morning; Mr. Davis told me it. I visited the D. of M. and Lord S.; came home to write. We dined at Lord Alb., and the D. of M. told me he had concluded with the States to send 10,000 men into Italy—7,000 Palatines and 3,000 of Saxe-Gotha. I visited the Ven[etian] Ambassador, and home at 6.”

30th.—Visit to Lousdun and Hounslore dyk.

P. 489. 1706, Jan. 1st, s.n.—“At 10 we embarked on a yacht at the Hague, and arrived at Rotterdam at 2.”

2nd.—“We went aboard the Peregrine and Henrieta yacht[s]. After dinner we were visited by Mr. Baile, who seems a man of cheerful and free discourse, much fire and wit.”

3rd.—“The wind was fair for England. . . . The D. of M. not coming today, we have lost probably a fine and quick passage. . . . Visited by Mr. Furly; he showed me a letter from his son, secretary to L[ord] Pet[erborough], that the siege and attack of Barcelona was against that Lord's opinion and that of several councils of war, but forced to it because the King of Spain declared he would continue in Catalonia, though the forces quitted him. Furly seems a pious Christian, but of no church, nor goes to none.”

4th.—“I went alone and sat with Mr. Furli, where an intelligent merchant of this town was; he told me their trade with France was prejudicial to them, and that the merchants almost universally were of that opinion, but that it was set afoot and carried on by a few interested persons. He said the notion of Peace, which he owned was ruinous to them, was got among many even of the honestest Republicans, lest by the continuance of the war a Stadholder should be imposed on them; and jealousies had been spread among them, as though the English were in the contrivance, of the falsehood of which I endeavoured to convince him. The wind was still fair, but the D. of M.[s] affairs detained him at the Hague.”

P. 490. 5th.—“My wife and I dined today at Mr. Lier's, the bookseller's, where dined Mr. Baile, [Mons.] Banage, a physician, and several others. Mr. Banage seems a man well bred, of admirable conversation as well as learning; he told me Mons. Fontanelle, when he was at Rouen, was his particular friend, and writ to him, Mr. Banage, that letter of the Isle of Borneo, which caused him some trouble in France. Mons. Fontanelle never was a Protestant, but, being a free-thinker, had contempt for many of the superstitions of Popery. I came home at 6 to finish my letters. Capt. Sanders and Moses were with me; the first came from the Hague, and told me from the D. of Marl. that the cause of his delay was that he expected an answer from the El[ector] Pal[atine], and the States were desirous he would be there when it arrived.”

P. 491. 6th.—“I saw Mons. Cailot, the French mer[cha]nt [who] conveyed formerly the advices from France to me, and continues to do so still to our Court. He made me a compliment from Mons. Jurieu, whose age and infirmities hinder him from going much abroad. He tells me there is a Popish officer at the Court of St. German's, who desires to have his pardon, and, being disgusted, can discover the practices of that Court in England. He says Queen M[ary] has disgusted her whole Court, who once had thoughts of publishing a factum against her; that they have thoughts of carrying the young Prince to Scotland, but the Court of France will not consent.

“Mons. Cailot says that Mr. de Buis was one of the most earnest for setting afoot this commerce with France, and that he argued so weakly and passionately for it that he gave some suspicion of himself, for all understanding persons are convinced the commerce is ruinous to this country. Mons. d’Ayrol told Cailot that he knew de Buis had had several meetings with these emissaries of Peace from France, who are still here, nobody can give a good reason why. The merchant I saw at Mr. Furley’s, as well as Cailot, tells me they are here; they were long at one Nieuport’s house, between Rotterdam and Delft. Veeland of Utrecht is one of the chief for Peace, and some suspect Buis to be another. It will be well to observe who[m] he converses with in England.”

P. 492.—“There is great discourse of a letter writ by the Duke of Savoy to the Queen, in which he does a little reflect on the D[uke] of Marl[borough].

“After dinner I was with Mr. Davis to see the Eng[lish] Ch[urch], where I find no fault but that it is too big for so small a congregation. I was visited by Mons. de Croissy and Leers, who came and went away together.”

Remarks on Mons. Banage, Mr. Baile, &c.

P. 493. 7th.—“This morning her Majesty’s yachts fell down from hence to the Brill; they began to sail about 9. I took a small yacht, and about noon embarked to follow them, the wind being fair, but misty. I came aboard the Henrietta yacht half an hour after 4. Soon after the D[uke] of Marl[borough], going aboard the Peregrine, came to make us a visit, Lord Sund[erland] and Mons. Buis being with him. The sea was so calm that no[w] at anchor the yacht makes not the least motion, and I hope to sup well, as I did. We had a fair wind, and lying all night in the Pills below the Briel, Thursday night, we sailed next morning, and came to Deptford on the Sunday, 8 at night.”

CIRCULAR OF THE COMMISSION.

 HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE,
 CHANCERY LANE,
 LONDON, W.C.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING has been pleased to ratify and confirm the terms of the Commission issued by Her late Majesty, appointing certain Commissioners to ascertain what unpublished MSS. are extant in the collections of private persons and in institutions which are calculated to throw light upon subjects connected with the Civil, Ecclesiastical, Literary, or Scientific History of this country; and to appoint certain additional Commissioners for the same purposes. The present Commissioners are:—

Sir R. Henn Collins, Master of the Rolls; the Marquess of Salisbury, K.G., the Marquess of Ripon, K.G., the Earl of Crawford, K.T., the Earl of Rosebery, K.G., the Earl of Dartmouth, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, M.P., Lord Alverstone, G.C.M.G., Lord Hawkesbury, Lord Lindley, Lord Stanmore, G.C.M.G., Sir Edward Fry, Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, O.M., and Sir H. C. Maxwell-Lyte, K.C.B.

The Commissioners think it probable that you may feel an interest in this object, and be willing to assist in the attainment of it; and with that view they desire to lay before you an outline of the course which they usually follow.

If any nobleman or gentleman express his willingness to submit any unprinted book, or collection of documents in his possession or custody, to the Commissioners, they will cause an inspection to be made by some competent person, and should the MSS. appear to come within the scope of their enquiry, the owner will be asked to consent to the publication of copies or abstracts of them in the reports of the Commission, which are presented to Parliament every Session.

To avoid any possible apprehension that the examination of papers by the Commissioners may extend to title-deeds or other documents of present legal value, positive instructions are given to every person who inspects MSS. on their behalf that nothing relating to the titles of existing owners is to be divulged, and that if in the course of his work any modern title-deeds or papers of a private character chance to come before him, they are to be instantly put aside, and are not to be examined or calendared under any pretence whatever.

The object of the Commission is the discovery of unpublished historical and literary materials, and in all their proceedings the Commissioners will direct their attention to that object exclusively.

In practice it has been found more satisfactory, when the collection of manuscripts is a large one, for the inspector to make a selection therefrom at the place of deposit and to obtain the owner's consent to remove the selected papers to the Public Record Office in London or in Dublin, or to the General Register House in Edinburgh, where they can be more fully dealt with, and where they are preserved with the same care as if they formed part of the muniments of the realm, during the term of their examination. Among the numerous owners of MSS. who have allowed their family papers of historical interest to be temporarily removed from their muniment rooms and lent to the Commissioners to facilitate the preparation of a report may be named :—The Duke of Rutland, the Duke of Portland, the Marquess of Salisbury, the Marquess Townshend, the Marquess of Ailesbury, the Marquess of Bath, the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Carlisle, the Earl of Egmont, the Earl of Lindsey, the Earl of Ancaster, the Earl of Lonsdale, Lord Braye, Lord Hothfield, Lord Kenyon, Mrs. Stopford Sackville, the Right Hon. F. J. Savile Foljambe, Sir George Wombwell, Mr. le Fleming, of Rydal, Mr. Leyborne Popham, of Littlecote, and Mr. Fortescue, of Dropmore.

The cost of inspections, reports, and calendars, and of the conveyance of documents, will be defrayed at the public expense, without any charge to the owners.

The Commissioners will also, if so requested, give their advice as to the best means of repairing and preserving any interesting papers or MSS. which may be in a state of decay.

The Commissioners will feel much obliged if you will communicate to them the names of any gentlemen who may be able and willing to assist in obtaining the objects for which this Commission has been issued.

R. A. ROBERTS, Secretary.
