la flotte Angloise paroissoit en vue de la n're à 4 milles de luy et qu'il alloit lever l'ancre pour sortir de la baye et la rencontrer ayant le vent de la flotte Angloise, mais la mer étant fort agité le grand vent qu'il avoit fait le jour precedent lequel se renforça encore ce même jour sur le soir l'empecha et repoussa la flotte Angloise vers le detroit du canal. Pendant la sejour de son Alt^{se} dans cette ville la noblesse et tous les Gentilshom^{es} considerant la juste apprehension qu'ils avoit pour la personne de sa d^e Alt^{se} et la grande importance de l'affaire dans laquelle ils venoit de s'engager firent une acte d'association dont la copie va cy-jointe par laquelle ils crurent de s'associer en quelque maniere et prevenir les mechants desseins que nos ennemis pourroit avoir contre la personne de son Alt^{se} que Dieu preserve. Copie de l'acte de l'association. Nous sousignés qui nous som^{es} joint avec le Prince d'Orange pour la defense de la religion protestante le maintien de l'ancien Gouvernement et les loix et libertés de l'Angleterre d'Ecosse et d'Irlande promettons au Dieu tout puissant à Son Alt^{se} Le Prince d'Orange et l'un à l'autre de demeurer ferme dans cette affaire ensemble en defence d'icelles et de ne l'abandonner jamais jusques à tout que n're religion nos loix et libertés nous soient tellement assurés dans un parlement libre que nous ne soyons plus en danger de tomber sous le papisme ou l'esclavage. Et puisque nous nous som^{es} engagés dans cette commune cause sous la protection du Prince d'Orange par où sa personne pourroit être exposée à danger et aux entreprises desesperées et maudites des Papistes et autres personnes sanguinaires nous nous obligeons solennellement à Dieu et l'un à l'autre, qu'en cas aucunes semblables entreprises soit faites contre luy nous ne persecuterons pas seulement ceux-la qui en sont les auteurs mais tous leur adherants et tout ce que nous trouverons en armes contre nous avec la plus grande severité d'une juste vengeance à leur ruine et destruction; et que l'execution d'une semblable entreprise (dont le bon Dieu nous preserve par sa grace) ne nous detournera point de poursuivre cette cause laquelle nous venons d'entreprendre mais que cela nous engagera de la pousser avec toute la vigueur qu'une execution aussy barbare pourra meriter. Le 21^o 9^h Son Alt^{se} marcha d'Exeter à Hunyton laissant garnison dans cette ville où resta la plus grande partie de l'Artillerie et les ammunitions de guerre, l'hospital et beaucoup de bagage de l'armée que l'on ne put emporter faute de chariots. Le 22^o 9^h elle alla de là à Axminster où il

resta le 23^o com^e aussy le lendemain. Mons^r le Duc de Grafton, my Lord Churchill L^d Gen^l et Mons^r Barkley escuyer de la Princesse de Denmarc et Collonel d'un reg^t Dragons venant de l'armée du Roy le vindrent joindre là. Son Alt^{se} détacha ce jour là Mons^r de Bentineck avec douze cent chevaux et Dragons pour marcher à Wyneauntou près de l'armée du Roy pour donner occasion à ceux qui y étoit de nos amis de nous venir joindre. Mais com^e il arriva le lendemain à Sherborne il apprit par plusieurs officiers et Cavaliers qu'il rencontra en chemin venants de Salisbury sans y laisser aucun homme ce qui le fit arrêter et loger là les troupes en attendant l'armée. Le 26^o S. A. marcha jusques à Crokeborne. Le Collonel Trelawny avec tous les officiers de son Reg^t d'Infant^{ie} quasi tous les officiers du Reg^t Dragons de Canan et plusieurs officiers qui avoit été du quartier de Warmister le vinrent trouver. Le 27^o S. A. marcha à Sherborne et alla loger chez le comte de Bristol qui le vint recevoir avec le Coll^l Aranguish et un bon nombre de la noblesse de la Province de Dorchester à l'entrée de la d^e Province. Ce soir S. A. reçut nouvelle de la marche du Roy qui avoit passé à Andover où le Prince de Denmarc l'avoit quitté la nuit sans qu'on scent où il étoit allé, que le Gen^l Maj^r Herck avoit été arrêté pour avoir été soupçonné d'avoir le dessein de venir joindre Son Alt^{se}, et que le Reg^t de Trelawny s'étoit entierement dispersé de sorte qu'il n'en restoit qu'un officier et 40 soldats. Le 28^o au matin S. A. reçut la nouvelle que la forteresse de Plymouth s'étoit declarée pour S. A. avec un des vaisseaux de guerre de la flotte du Roy qui avoit été obligé de relâcher dans ce port, que la d^e flotte avoit beaucoup patie par la tempête ayant perdu 2 vaisseaux et que la plupart étoit rentré dans Portsmouth. Le 29^o Son Alt^{se} reçut la nouvelle que le Prince de Denmarc s'étoit sauvé hereusement jusques à Shaffsbury. Elle détacha cent de ces gardes de Cavallerie pour l'aller rencontrer et il arriva la même apres dinée avec M. le Duc d'Ormont, my Lord Dumbarton et quelques uns de ses gens. Le 30^o Son Alt^{se} marcha de là à Wyneauntou et l'1^{re} x^b de là à Hynden. Dans la marche il vint un Trompette du Roy avec une lettre de my L^d Feversham à S. A. par laquelle il demanda par ordre du Roy des passeports pour des commissaires que sa Maj^{te} vouloit envoyer à Mons^r Le Prince pour traiter avec luy. Le soir il arriva un Gentilhomme avec des lettres de my Lords de la Mere et Stanfort de Gloucester par lesquelles ils mandoit à S. A. leur arrivée dans la d^e ville avec 500 chevaux, qu'ils alloit marcher jusques à Bristol où ils attendoit ses ordres pour scavoir où ils devoit se joindre à son armée; que la peuple de Gloucester avoit forcé la prison et mis en liberté my L^d Lovelace que le Roy avoit fait arrêter et qu'ils avoit remis le Mayor catolique de la ville en sa place; que les my lords de Devonshire, de Derby, Lumley et plusieurs autres avoit assemblé de la cavallerie composée des Gentilshom^{es} du pays une partie à York et l'autre à Nottingham, qu'ils alloit marcher aussy vers Gloucester pour se joindre à n^{re} armée. Le 1^{re} au matin S. A. receut un exprés de my L^d Shrewsbury qui avoit été détaché avec un regiment d'infanterie et 200 Dragons à Bristol pour prendre possession de cette place qui est tres-importante par lequel il mandoit qu'il y avoit été recen avec une joye extrême aussy bien des Magistrats que de la populace et qu'il retourneroit pour joindre l'armée ici et enverroient le reg^t d'Infanterie selon ses ordres a Gloucester. Le soir il arriva un gentilhomme de la part d^e Mad^e la Princesse de Dennemark par lequel elle fit advertir S. A. que quand la nouvelle arriva à Londres que Mons^r Le Prince son mari s'estoit retiré de l'armée du Roy pour aller trouver Son Alt^{se}, la Reine luy avoit fait donner des Guardes pour l'observer mais que la nuit elle avoit trouvé le moyen de s'echapper avec my lady Churchill et Mad^e Barkley seulement, qu'elle s'estoit retirée premierement chez l'évêque de Londres, mais ne s'y croyant pas en seureté elle étoit sortie de la ville et qu'elle s'estoit retirée vers le Nort de l'Angleterre sous la conduite du dit Evêque et l'escorte de quelques gentilshom^{es} de la Province qui s'assemblerent auprès d'elle en chemin faisant, qu'elle étoit d'intention d'aller vers Nottingham pour attendre là des nouvelles de Mons^r le Prince de Dennemark. Le 1^{re} x^b S. A. renvoye la trompette du Roy avec les passeports requis. Le même matin arriva l'amb^r d'Hollande ayant obtenu la permission du Roy de venir, et le soir vint de Londres my Lord Clarendon et S^r Henry Capel frere du defunt Comte d'Essex ayant passé dans les quartiers des troupes du Roy Sans avoir été arrêté. Le 1^{re} Son Alt^{se} marcha a Salisbury où il fut reçu avec des acclamations ex^{tes} des habitans. Le Maire et le Corps du magistrat vint au devant de luy dans leurs habillemens. Le 1^{re} S. A. resta en ce lieu. Il y arriva de Londres Mons^r le Comte d'Oxford. Son Alt^{se} envoya un officier de ses gardes au devant des my lords de Halifax de Nottingham et Godolphin qui étoit arrivés à Andover à 15 milles de Salisbury pour les mener à Hungerfort et attendre là l'arrivée de Son Alt^{se} qui marcha le 1^{re} a Collingborn Kingston et le 1^{re} à Hungerfort. Le 1^{re} les commissaires du Roy eurent leur audience et proposerent de bouche ce qu'ils ont reduit et delivré par écrit com^e il paroît dans la copie cy-jointe avec celle de la lettre de creance qu'ils rendoient. [Here follows the copies mentioned with the reply of the Prince to the propositions of the King's Commissioners.] Le meme soir Son Alt^{se} reçut advis qu'un de nos partis qui avoit été détaché par Mons^r le Comte de Nassau de cent cinquante chevaux et de cent Dragons pour reconnoître s'il y avoit de troupes au Roy dans Reading y étoit arrivé ce jour là à 10 heures du matin y trouvant le Regiment de Cavall^{re} Ecossoise du six compagnies et trois compag^{es} de Dragons Irlandois postés à un pont à l'entrée de la d^e ville. Ils les pousserent vigoureuusement et les batirent. Ils en tuerent pres de vingt et firent entre 30 et 40 prisonniers et remporterent deux étandards du reg^t des Guardes et un drapeau des Dragons et apprennant que trois bataillons d'Infanterie étoit en marche à 3 milles de là pour prendre possession de la d^e ville, n^{re} party se retira. Le 2^{re} S. A. marcha à Nieuwbury ou l'on vint luy apporter la nouvelle que Mons^r le Comte de Nassau qui avoit marché ce meme jour à Reading avoit reçu advis que 500 hom^{es} d'infanterie avoit passé la d^e ville et venoit à luy à 3 milles en deça. Les ayant fait reconnoître il se trouva que c'étoit un des bataillons de Guardes Ecossoises d'Infanterie qui venoit se rendre a son Alt^{se} sans officiers étant com^{andé} par un sergent et deux corporaux gens que par cy-devant avoit servy sous son Alt^{se} dans n^{re} pays. Mons^r le Comte de Nassau les fit retourner vers la d^e ville pour prendre possession des ponts sur les deux rivières ce qu'ils firent fort bien et en tres bon ordre. Le 3^{re} S. A. ayant envoyé un mois de gage au dit bataillon et fait le sergent Capⁿ et les deux corporaux, lieutenants, et ayant fait marcher les troupes en avant partit pour aller à Oxford où il avoit été invité par ceux de la ville et de l'université. Il marcha ce jour là jusques à Abbingdon que n'en est qu'à 5 milles pour y être le lendemain au matin de bonne heure. L'après dinée à 3 heures il arriva un courrier de Londres porter la nouvelle que la reine s'estant retirée le jour d'auparavant le roy avoit fait la meme chose ce matin à 3 heures sans que personne s'en fut apperçue qu'à huit heures, que l'on ne scavoit où il étoit allé. Le soir à onze heures S. A. en reçut la confirmation avec ces particularités, qu'il étoit sorty par un degré "derobé" luy quatriesme, qu'il avoit pris un carosse de louage qui l'avoit mené vers le pont de Londres d'où apparemment il avoit descendu la riviere. Le même soir S. A. reçut nouvelle que six reg^{ts} des troupes du Roy avoit envoyé pour se soumettre à luy et pour recevoir ses ordres. Le 3^{re} à cause de cette retraite du Roy Son Alt^{se} changea son dessein d'aller à Oxford en celuy d'aller à Londres, et pour cett'effet alla ce jour à Wallingfort. Quasi tous les reg^{ts} de l'armée du Roy enverroient a S. A. pour se donner à luy et recevoir ses ordres. Aussy reçut-il là une lettre du Comte de Feversham L^e General de l'arm^{ee} du Roy d'Uxbridge du 21^e par laquelle il mandoit qu'il venoit de recevoir une lettre du Roy qui luy marquoit sa retraite hors du royaume et l'ordonnoit de ne plus faire desactes d'hostilité, qu'il l'avoit com^{muni}qué aux troupes et que ce seroit là le dernier ordre qu'il leur doneroit. Le 3^{re} Son Alt^{se} marcha jusques à Henley. Un tres grand nombre des gens de qualité y vinrent le trouver. Le magistrat de Londres y envoya une forte deputation pour le complimenter, le remercier et l'inviter de venir au plutôt à leur ville. La milice de la d^e ville en fit autant. Il arriva là aussy auprès de Son Alt^{se} quatre députés de tous les my Lords qui s'estoit trouvé à Londres tant spirituels que temporels. Le Comte de Pembroke, my Lord Culpeper, L^e Evêque d'Ely et Milord Waymouth, pour notifier à Son Alt^{se} ce qui s'estoit passé et pour luy faire compliment. Le 3^{re} nous marchâmes à Windsor. Le soir l'on reçut nouvelle que le Roy étoit arrêté à Feversham dans le Comté de Kent. Le lendemain au matin, 4^{re}, nous en reçumes la confirmation avec ces particularités, que le Roy étant sorti avec S^r Edward Hailes, Catolique Romain, et deux autres il avoit descendu la riviere dans un petit bâtiment nom^{mé} un hey; qu'il se trouva que le dit bateau n'étoit pas lasté et ainsi incapable de passer la mer ce qui l'obligea d'entrer dans la riviere de Feversham pour charger du sable. Dans ce temps des mariniers qui cherchoit dans cette occasion leur profit à arrêter les gens qui se retirot^t de ce royaume et de saisir l'argent qu'ils trouvoit sur eux vinrent avec 3 ou 4 barques de pescheur pour visiter ce bateau où ils reconnurent S^r Edward Hailes qui ayant été Gouverneur du Château de Dovres étoit fort connu et haï dans cette province. Ils l'arrêterent avec le monde qu'il avoit avec luy et les emenerent à la petite ville de Feversham là où des Gentilshom^{es} qui les voient reconnurent le Roy deguisé. Ils d'assembla d'abord au tour de luy un grand quantité de monde qui garderent la maison et protesterent qu'ils ne le laisseroit pas sortir sans ordre de son Alt^{se} qui envoya d'abord Mons^r de Zuylestein vers là pour le faire mettre en liberté. Mais devant qu'il y arriva les my Lords qui étoit à Londres y ayant envoyé quatre députés et 150 guardes, qui sur les assurances qu'ils le rameneroit à Londres vers son Alt^{se} le retirerent des mains de cette populace et l'emmenèrent de là à Rochester d'où il envoya my L^d Feversham à S. A. avec une lettre par où il l'invitoit de venir avec tant de troupes qu'il voudroit en^{er}ner à Londres; qu'il souhaitoit de luy parler afin de tas^{cher} à accom^{oder} les differends. Mais com^e S. A. avoit déjà envoyé deux jours auparavant un ordre d'arrêter le dit my Lord Feversham pour avoir licentié les troupes du roy sans en avoir eu son ordre, même apres qu'il avoit écrit à son Alt^{se} qu'il ne leur donneroit plus aucun ordre ce qui avoit causé que tous ces gens s'estoit dispersé par le pays faisoit beaucoup de dom^{age} aux habitans et puis étant entré dans les quartiers et même jusques dans la maison de son Alt^{se} sans en donner connoissance, il les fit arrêter et envoya M^r de Zuylestein au Roy pour le prier d'arrêter a Rochester et ne point venir à Londres où il croyoit que sa personne ne seroit pas en seureté; mais com^e il y arriva le roy y étoit déjà revenu devant luy. Le 5^{re} Son Alt^{se} ayant com^{muni}qué aux Milords là presents la lettre qu'il avoit reçu du Roy ils furent tous unanimement d'avis qu'il ne pouvoit pas demeurer à Londres pendant que son Alt^{se} y seroit, mais qu'il falloit le faire prier de vouloir se retirer à quelque distance de là l'on projetta pour cela l'Haime qui est une tres-belle maison du feu Duc de Lauderdale fort agreable et située sur la riviere à 2 lieues de Londres; au qu'y feroit don^{ner} trois milords, nommément Le Marquis de Halifax, Le Comte de Shrewsbury et My Lord de la Mer luy porter ce message com'e ils firent. Mais Le Roy ayant témoigné en être content choisit plutôt d'aller à Rochester qu'à Hamm ce que l'on crût d'abord être une marque du dessein qu'il avoit de se retirer d'autant plus parcequ'il fit demander à son Alt^e un passeport pour un Gentilhomme avec deux valets sans emprimer le nom qu'il vouloit envoyer à la Reine par de là la mer com'e il fit. Le meme jour S. A. marcha jusques à Sion pres de Branfort ayant envoyé ordre à Londres que toutes les troupes du Roy qui y restoi^t encore en sortiroi^t pour faire place aux siennes qu'il y fit entrer le meme soir. Le lendemain qui étoit le 2⁸e le Roy en sortit au matin avec une escorte de 60 chevaux et 100 fantassins des Gardes de S. A. et retourna à Rochester ; et l'après dinée Sa d^e Alt^e entra dans la ville sous de tres-grandes acclamations du peuple. Il alla loger à St James."

Copy of a letter from James II., "a mon Fils et Neveu Le Prince D'Orange," dated Whitehall, Dec^r 1, 1688, stating that he has sent Lords Halifax, Nottingham, and Godolphin to treat with him touching the meeting of Parliament and other matters.

W. Bentinck to De Dyckvelt. "Hungerford 2^o Dec^r (1688). Vous verrez monsieur par le relative que je vous envoya ce qui c'est passé depuis ma dernière comme ces copies vous informeront de ce que les commissaires due Roy sont venus dire, il paroît que les affaires se termineront paisiblement. Son Altesse a mis la proposition des Comm^s du Roy entre les mains des my Lords qui sont avec lui pour entendre cequils seront d'avis que S.A. doive repondre, ce quils doivent porter ce midi. Si je puis l'avoir a temps je le joindray encore ici. Jusques asteur (à cette heure) les troupes du Roy ce sont toujours retirees a mesure que nostre armée c'est avancée, ils ont mesme abandonné avant hier la riviere de la Tamise dont nous avons toujours eus qu'ils defendoit le passage ce qui estoit la chose la plus apparente a pouvoir faire, mais ils ont quitté Reading une petite ville sur le passage avec assez de confusion. Mais ce matin l'on est venu nouvelle que les ennemis avoit renvoye cinq cent cinquante Dragons pour garder le pont sur quoy le Coll: Marwitte a este commande avec cent cinquante chevaux et cent Dragons commander du Reg^t de son Alt^e et du sien pour recognoistre ce qui en estoit, et pour occuper le pont si il estoit possible. Il a trouvé la chose comme on la lui avoit rapportée, il a chargé les Gardes et entré pelle et melle avec eus dans la ville, a renversé ce qui vouloit se mettre en estat de defense, a fait quarante prisonniers et pris beaucoup de chevaux et c'est saisi du pont qu'il fait garder. L'on ne sait pas bien les particularites de l'affaire comme elle ne fait que darriver. S. A. a donné ordre que les deux Reg^t Dragons marchassent pour joindre M^r Marwitz en cas qu'il vint des troupes pour l'attaquer. Dans ce moment l'on vient demener un Major de Cavalerie qui a este pris prisonnier, l'on a remporté deus estendards des gardes Ecossoise et un drapeau de Reg^t Dragons de Butler irlandois."

A paper, without address or signature, dated Hungerford, 2^o Decemb^r 1688. "Ma dernière estoit du 8^e. Le 9^e le Prince de Dannemarck arriva aupres de son Alt^e Seren^e avec le duc d'Ormont, my Lord Churchill, son frere le Collonel at le Collonel Godfrey son beau frere. Son Altesse Seren^e luy envoya Mons^r de Suylesteyn avec cent gardes pour le recevoir a 3 milles du quartier. En arrivant son Alt^e Seren^e le recût dans son antichambre et luy donna la main à l'entrée de sa chambre comme à sa table ou luy fait les memes honneurs qu'à son Alt^e Seren^e. Un Capitaine aux gardes monte la garde chez luy, les gardes du corps le suivant tout de mesme que son Alt^e Seren^e. Dito, le magistrat de Bristol envoya des deputes a son Alt^e Seren^e pour luy offrir leur ville et une bonne somme d'argent du Roy. Dito, l'Evesque et magistrat d'Oxford ont rendu les memes devoirs. Dito, la noblesse de Dorchestershire est venue en corps asseurer son Alt^e Seren^e de leur fidelité. Le 10^e, son Alt^e Seren^e marcha à Newcaunton, l'11^e à Hyndon. Là on est arrivé un Trompette du Roy avec une lettre de my Lord Feversham a son Alt^e Seren^e dans laquelle il dit que sa Maj^e luy a ordonné d'escrire son Alt^e Seren^e que sa Maj^e ayant dessein d'envoyer des commissaires a son Alt^e Seren^e, il luy demanderoit des passeports. Dito, l'on a eu nouvelle que la Princesse de Dannemarck estoit arrivée aupres des lords dans le Nord, que my lord Dover ne payant plus les soldats et autres travailleurs du doc à Portsmouth ils avoient jetté leurs outils et refusoient de travailler et que la flotte du Roy estant entrée pour une partie dans le havre pour le radauter, les gens de marine n'y avoient pas voulu travailler et que huit des vaisseaux estoient perdus par la dernière tempete. Le 12^e on eut nouvelles que my lord Dellamer marchant avec ses troupes vers la ville Glochester la populace avoit rompus les portes de la prison ou my Lord Lovelace avoit esté mis, l'en avoit fait sortir, mis le Maire en sa place et fit my Lord Lovelace gouverneur qui tenoit la ville au service de son Alt^e Seren^e. Le 13^e Mons^r Citters arriva avec une passeport du Roy et entre autres nouvelles il nous dit que la Princesse de Dannemarck s'estoit sauvée de Londres avec Mesdames de Churchill et de Barklay dans le carosse de l'Evesque de Londres qui estoit allé avec elle vers les lords du Nord ; et que la Reine une heure apres luy avoit envoye des gardes pour l'arrester dans son appartement mais trop tard. Le peuple craignant quelque funeste accident pour la Princesse s'estoit assemblé devant Withal vomissant mille injures contre la Reine et seroit venu peut estre a des extremités si la Reine n'avoit envoyé l'escuier de la Princesse pour l'asseurer qu'elle s'estoit sauvée. Que le common council de Londres avoit resolu de ne pas desister des quatre points suivants.—1, de casser tous les papistes ; 2, de renvoyer tous ces Irlandois hors du royaume ; 3, de leur remettre la tour de Londres ; 4, de declarer la guerre a la France. Dito, est venu my lord Clarendon avec S^r Henry Capel frere du feu comte d'Essex. Dito, son Alt^e Seren^e ayant pris les avis de Lords presents (dont il y en avoient qui vouloit faire repondre par Mons^r le Comte de Solms a Mons^r de Feversham) a escrit au Roy et luy a envoyé les passeports et demandé en mesme temps un passeport pour une personne que son Alt^e Seren^e vouloit envoyer en Hollande. Le 14^e son Altesse Seren^e arriva à Salisbury avec les acclamations ordinaires, son de cloches etc. Le 15^e y est arrivé my lord Oxford portant l'ordre de la jarretiere. Le 16^e Son Alt^e Seren^e marcha à Collinghesborn Kinghston qui sont quinze milles. Le 17^e a Hungerford, la on arriva my lord Dellamer avec 500 chevaux du Nord. Les Lords Halyfax, Nottingham et Godolphin, Commissaires du Roy, eurent audience de son Alt^e Seren^e en presence de tous les lords et de Messieurs le Marchal de Schomberg, le Comte de Solms d'Ouverkerck et de Bentinck. Leur lettre de creance estoit escrite en Francois. Le Roy y traite son Alt^e Seren^e de cher fils et neveu. Apres qu'elle estoit lue publiquement les commissaires firent leur proposition disant que le Roy pour le repos de son peuple les avoit envoye pour traiter 1, des suretés pour le Parlement en general ; 2, de Lords en particulier, et, 3^e, de la manieres que les deux armées se comporteroient pendant les Sessions du Parlement et a quelle distance elles demeureroient de Londres. Surquoy son Alt^e Seren^e ayant respondus qu'elle n'estoit venue icy que pour l'amour des Lords et peuple d'Angleterre et que c'estoit proprement leur affaire il estoit juste qu'elle ne fit rien sans leur aggrément et ayant parlé avec eux l'on resolut de demander leur proposition par escrit et que leur estant dict ils sortirent et l'ayant escrit rentrerent et la donnerent, apres quoy ils demanderent de pouvoir chacun en particulier entretenir son Alt^e Seren^e, mais elle ayant regardé les my lords qui tesmoignoient ne pas gouter cela son Alt^e Seren^e le declinoit. Apres ils furent congediés et disnerent avec Son Alt^e Seren^e et causerent apres disner avec tout le monde dans la chambre pendant que les Lords delibrerent pour former la responce. Laquelle ils ont rapporté aujourd'hui a son Alt^e Seren^e. Il sont d'avis qu'au paravant de traiter le Roy doit casser tous ses officiers et soldats papistes, que pendant la Session du Parlement aucun Catholique ne pourra s'approcher de la vil de Londres de 20 milles sous peine de la vie, que la Tour seroit entre les mains du Parlement, que le Roy doit fournir l'argent pour l'entretien de l'armée de son Alt^e Seren^e, que le roi doit revoquer la clause de ses proclamations par ou il traite les Lords de Rebelles. Je ne scay pas encore ce que son Alt^e Seren^e aura resolu mais les commissaires seront despesches demain à ce que l'en croit. Les commissaires ont apporté le passeport désiré. Les troupes du Roy au nombre de 3000 ont quitté la ville de Redding sur la Tamise qu'elles avoient occupe depuis trois jours et cela seulement sur un bruit que nous marchions de ce costé là. La consternation est si grande parmy eux que trois jours passés un party de cent maistres estant dans cette ville icy et un des chariots de l'armée de son Alt^e Seren^e venant de loin cela les épouvanta tellement qu'ils s'enfuirent dans la plus grande confusion du monde, y laissant leur hordes des grenades un tonneau de poudre etc. Nous marchons demain vers Newbury. L'on tient l'affaire faite car ou le roy passera la mer ou il accordera tout ce que son Alt^e Seren^e voudra surquoy l'on peut faire fonds. Dans ce moment l'on recoit nouvelles que 500 dragons ayant recoupé la Ville de Redding le

Colonel Marwitz avec cent dragons et 150 chevaux commandés par Mous^t de la Platte de Sommelsdyck ont esté commandé de lever ce quartier surquoy ils sont entré dans la ville, occupés les portes et ponts, attaqués les corps de gardes et pris on tué tout le party tellement que de 500 il n'y en a pas dix d'échappés."

Paris, le 30^e Decemb^r 1688. (Without address or signature.) J'appris hier au soir et par des personnes qui reveñoient de Versailles qu'il y estoit encore arrivé deux Couriers d'Angleterre le jour auparavant mais qu'on n'y dit rien de ce qu'ils avoient porté; qu'on en conjecturoit que les affaires continuoient d'aller mal pour le Roy, que le Marquis de Louvoy auroit dit seulement hier qu'il y avoit trois partis en Angleterre sans qu'il y en eust aucun pour le dit Roy; qu'on confirme que le Regim^t Escossois sur lequel le Roy comptoit le plus ne seroit pas passé au Prince d'Orange mais bien auroit déclaré de ne vouloir pas se battre contre luy. Je vois d'ailleurs qu'on compte en effet par de ça sur Milord Halifax comme sur le chef d'un tiers parti et qui ne seroit pas attaché au Prince d'Orange; qu'on croit qu'il sera fortifié de celui des Evesques, et que du reste on ne savoit pas ou ne disoit pas encore à Versailles la reponse que le susdit Prince auroit donnée aux milords temporels et spirituels qui le sont allé trouver de la part du Roy; qu'on croit seulement et comme on le souhaite que ce Prince ne s'accommoderoit pas à ce qu'on luy doit proposer et fera des propositions de son costé qui n'agréeront pas non seulement à la cour mais au tiers parti susdit. Il ne faut pas doubter au moins que de ce costé cy on ne continue de mettre tout en œuvre auprès de la cour d'Angleterre et on pourra pour accrocher s'il y a moyen et embarrasser l'affaire de la convocation d'un Parlement au mois prochain, et pour se prévaloir à ce sujet les différentes veues de ces partis susdits et pour les commettre ensemble si on peut; que l'argent même n'y sera pas épargné de ce costé cy pour peu de jour qu'on y voye; qu'on n'oublie rien cependant pour rendre odieux de plus en plus par de ça le dessein de S. A. le Prince d'Orange et de son parti et comme si la tenue d'un Parlement hoc statu rerum, et que le dit Prince demeure armé ne pourroit aboutir qu'à la perte totale du Roy ou à tout le moins à la ruine entière de toute son autorité; qu'il n'y a rien à leur dire de plus opposé à la teneur d'un Parlement libre tel qu'on a fait mine de le demander; qu'on debite aussi par de ça parmi ceux qui en parlent la plus modérément comme si on auroit déjà mis sur le tapis en Angleterre que le Roy n'eust à l'avenir à estre plus que comme le President et Chef du Conseil qui auroit la direction des affaires, d'autres que le Prince d'Orange demanderoit d'estre déclaré Protecteur et Generalissimo par mer et par terre des trois Royaumes et que la Roy garderoit seulement la nomination aux charges et aux dignités à condition qu'elles ne peussent estre conférées qu'à des Protestans. Il y en a qui ajoutent et ce que j'entendois dire hier au soir à une personne de qualité comme si le Roy d'Angleterre auroit écrit une lettre à sa Majesté ou il luy marquoit le regret particulier qu'il auroit des conjonctures presentes où il se voyoit réduit nonnément pour l'intérêt de la Religion Catholique et la nécessité de faire la guerre à la France."

Tirimon to Dykvelt. - Brussels 6 May 1689. Je vous diray que par les lettres d'Italie l'on nous mande de Rome du 16 d'Avril que Porter avoit eu son audience de Congé en laquelle il avoit de nouveau fait les derniers instances pour obtenir du secours pour le Roy Jacques mais que Sa Sainteté continua de le refuser respondant que pendant les difficultez en quelles elle se trouvoit avec la France, elle ne pouvoit ni devoit divertir aucun moyen dont elle avoit besoin pour la deffence propre de l'estat Ecclesiastique pour les employer dans des assistances estrangeres. Elle adjouta qu'avant que le Roy Jacques devoit faire en sort que le Roy tres chretien restituât à l'Eglise le Comté d'Avignon qu'il se deporta de la franchise et qu'il repara tout le prejudice qu'il avoit causé, que lors Sa Sainteté se trouvant, deschargée de ces embarras et de l'obligation de garantir son domaine pourroit assister led^t Roy Jacques mais que d'autre maniere elle en n'estoit pas en état de le faire."

Same to Same. Brussels 8 March 1689. Je ne scaurois m'empescher de vous dire encor une fois la joye que nous avons de la confirmation des avis du couronnement de S.M.B., et des bonnes dispositions des affaires de pardela. Le billet de S.M. du 25^e qui estoit sous mon couvert a esté bien delivré, et S.E. l'a receu avec tout le respect qui se doit, comme il tesmoigne par la cy jointe. Ce que nous pou vons mander par ce courier est que l'on escrit de Paris que cet Roy Jacques 2^e devoit arriver le 5 a Brest ou tout estoit préparé pour se mettre à la voile au premier bon vent, que le Roy tres Chretien ne luy donnoit pas de troupes presentement, mais qu'elles demeureroient sur les costes prestes à passer en Irlande en cas de besoin, que toutes celles que led^t Roy Jacques emmène consistent en quelques officiers Generaux, 20 Capitaines, 30 lieutenans, et 40 cadetz, pour s'en servir comme il le trouvera apropos, mais que le Roy tres Chretien luy a promis de l'argent pour payer les troupes d'Irlande qui ne pourront estre payees que par des ordonnances Visees du Comte d'Anaux qui aura le manienement de l'argent."

Versailles, 23 May 1689 (without signature or address). "Londonderry est pris. Un courrier du Roy d'Angleterre est sur le chemin de Brest qui porte cette nouvelle et beaucoup d'autres. . . . Le Roy d'Angleterre estoit retourné à Dublin du siege de Londonderry le 5^{me} May pour tenir le Parlement qui devoit comancer le 10^{me} vieux stil. M^r de Chamberg est allé dans le nord d'Angleterre assembler ses troupes pour passer en Escosse, et il y en a qui disent que le Roy d'Angleterre fait encore faute de s'amuser au Parlement d'Irlande ce qu'il feroit mieux de soutenir le Duc de Gourdon et ses partisans de ce costé là. On dit que M^r de Turenne demand d'aller en Irlande."

"Extrait d'une lettre de Dublin du 3 Septembre" (1689) (without signature or address). "Nous sommes à la veille d'une crise. Je vous ay mandé que l'armée du Roy s'est entièrement ruinée au siege de Londonderry, et n'a point pris la ville faute d'artillerie et de tout ce qui est necessaire pour un siege. Vous avez aussi seen la deroute des Troupes qui marchaient vers Iniskilling causée par l'ignorance du general et par une terreur panique de la cavalerie et des Dragons qui nous ont fait perdre plus d'armes que de soldats, ce qui nous est d'une grande consequence. Tous ces malheurs ont été suivis de la descente de M^r de Schonberg vers le Nord-est du Royaume qui a achevé de consterner bien de gens. Le Gouverneur de cette Province a commencé d'abandonner le chateau de Carickfergus en n'y laissant qu'une foible garnison. M^r de Schonberg n'a point encore de cavalerie d'Angleterre, mais les Rebelles luy en envoient, c'est ce qui est cause qu'il na pas encore avancé. Il est à cent milles de nous. Cinq ou six mille paysans armez de baton ferrez ont entrepris de defendre le passage de Neury qui n'est qu'à cinq miles d'icy. Le Roy y veut marcher avec de la Cavalerie qui n'est point en état. Cependant il veut partir demain et personne ne le peut detourner de ce qu'il à envie de faire. Il pourra faire comme au voyage de Londonderry. Il assemble un corps d'infanterie proche de Dublin pour conserver cette ville dans l'obeissance; dès le moment que nous l'aurons perdue nos affaires seront dans une triste état. Le Duc de Tirconnel qui est convalescent y restera et amassera le plus de monde qu'il pourra. Nous n'en manquons pas mais le mal est qu'il n'y a pas grand fonds à faire sur la fermeté de nos soldats et de nos milices qui sont presque sans armes à feu. Nous manquons d'argent et la monnoye de cuivre qu'on avoit faite et qui avoit en un cours assez facile commence à se decrediter. Une piece de trente sols ne vaud pas deux liards. Cependant tout est cher. Si nos affaires bastent mal nous gagnerons les montagnes jusque at la mer en attendant un secours capable de les retablir ou des vaisseaux pour repasser en France. My Lord Melfort, secretaire d'etat pour la guerre a été changé à cause des plaintes generales qu'il y avoit contre luy. Tous les ministres du Roy ne sont pas plus propres aux affaires."

A paper entitled "Lettre écrite a Bord du Vaisseau nommé Lenox du 3^e Rang pres de Ouessant sur ce qui s'est passé dans la flotte Angloise depuis son depart de Torbay jusques au 3^e. Aoust 1691 cest à dire environ deux mois Par le Capitaine Le Chevalier Munden qui le commande, a un de ses amis." "Monsieur, Je m'acquitte aujourd'huy de la promesse que je vous ay faite de vous mander ce qui se passeroit sur notre flotte et je vay vous rendre compte en deux mots de toute sa course depuis le jour qu'elle partit de Torbay jusques a celuy-ci. Un Maitre de Vaisseau Suedois ayant prete serment devant un Juge de Paix a Plymouth qu'il avoit veu la flotte Francoise a quatre lieues vers le S. W. de Ouessant, on depêcha aussitot un exprez de la ville de Plymouth a L'amiral de nôtre flotte qui est Monsieur Russel par lequel on luy donnoit avis que les Francois faisoient voile vers notre canal et menaçoient avec des paroles insolentes de nous combattre par tout ou ils nous rencontreroient. Ce raport ayant été fait à nôtre Amiral toute la flotte partit de Torbay le 23 Juin avec un vent favorable qui nous poussa à la hauteur de Ouessant le 26 du meme mois ou nous demurames jusques au soir du 28. Mais n'ayant pas trouvé les ennemis en ce lieu nous commençames à apprehender qu'ils ne fussent allez vers les costes d'Irlande pour y rencontrer notre flotte de Smyrne. Dans cette pensée on depescha une fregatte qui fut envoyée à Kinsale pour tacher d'en apprendre des nouvelles et cette même fregatte étant de retour peu de jours apres et ayant rejoint notre flotte à l'ouest de l'Isle de Scilly, nous apprimes qu'une puissante flotte avoit paru sur la cote d'Irlande ce qui nous fit conclure apres avoir examiné meurement ce rapport que c'étoit la flotte Françoise que nous resolumes d'aller chercher à fin de l'engager au combat. Dans ce dessein nous mimes promptement à la voile vers le Cap Cleare en Irlande, mais n'y ayant pas trouvé les Francois nous primes notre course vers Kinsale et étant venus à la hauteur de cette place nous eumes l'agréable nouvelle de l'arrivée de notre flotte de Smyrne dans ce havre. Nous employames jusques à l'onzieme de Juillet à faire ce voyage. Apres cela notre flotte de Turquie partit de Kinsale et vint nous joindre au lieu ou nous étions, et le 13 au soir apres l'avoir escortée jusqu'au prez de l'Isle de Scilly ou nous la jugeames à couvert des insultes des ennemis, nous la quitames et reprimes notre course vers Oüessant à la veue duquel nous arrivames le soir du 16. Nous y demeurames jusqu'au 19 et sur le soir on détacha une escadre de vaisseaux qui fut envoyée devant de Brest sous le commandement du Chevalier Shovel pour tacher d'apprendre s'il étoit possible ou pouvoient etre les ennemis. Le 21 le Chevalier Shovel revint joindre notre flotte ayant pris quelques petits batimens qui étoient sortis de Brest, et ayant rencontré un vaisseau de guerre Anglois qui s'étoit difficilement tiré des mains des Francois, nous conclumes par le rapport qu'il nous fit que leur flotte étoit à 40 lieues du W.S.W de Oüessant. Et ce fut la la premiere nouvelle que nous en apprimes. Aussitot apres cet avis nous resolumes dans un conseil de guerre de faire notre route de ce coté là ou nous arrivames le 24. Le matin de ce même jour nous primes un petit vaisseau Francois chargé de fraiches provisions pour la flotte de France et il nous confirma le rapport qui nous avoit été fait auparavant. Ensuite de cela, continuant la route que ce petit vaisseau tenoit, nous arborames le pavillon blanc pour attirer à nous par ce moyen divers autres navires Francois qui nous pourroient voir. Mais à peine eumes nous commence à nous servir de cet stratagème que nous apperçumes neuf voiles qui venoient à nous mais qui peu apres revirèrent et seloignèrent le plus vite qu'il leur fut possible. Je ne scaurois vous dire s'ils nous reconurent ou non. Quoy qu'il en soit nous ne laissames pas de leur donner la chasse et nous en primes trois, le reste ayant eu l'adresse de se sauver à force de voiles. Apres les avoir examinés ils nous dirent qu'il étoient envoyés à la flotte Françoise on il portoient des moutons en vic, des bœufs, oyes, poules et diverses autres sortes de provisions et qu'ils avoient ordre s'ils ne la trouvoient pas et la hauteur ou ils étoient, d'aller vingt lieues plus avant à l'ouest. Ce fut la tout ce que nous fumes tirer d'eux, et ayant tenu la même route sur la latitude de 48 degrés 40 minutes à 52 lieues de Oüessant ceux de nos vaisseaux d'avis qui étoient les plus avancés vers l'ouest decouvrirèrent le 26 au matin deux navires devant eux vers l'ouest ausquels ils [a word torn off] la chasse. Mais pendant qu'ils les poursuivoient ils s'apperceurent que ces vaisseaux alloient mieux qu'eux à la voile et qu'il étoit inutile d'aller apres eux. Cependant à fin de ne rien negliger ils ne laisserent pas de les suivre et s'en étant approché ces vaisseaux ennemis faisant toujours voile vers l'ouest lacherent diverses bordees de canon auxquels d'autres qui étoient devant eux de distance en distance repondirent les uns apres les autres pour avertir leur flotte que nous approchions et qu'elle eut à se retirer. En effet elle prit le parti et par la manœuvre qu'ils firent tous nous jugames qu'il étoit impossible de la forcer d'en venir aux mains que de son propre consentement. car le même vent qui nous pousse vers eux les éloigne de nous et leur laisse la liberté de prendre telle route qu'il leur plait. Le lendemain 27 nous nous trouvames par observation à la latitude de 47 degrés 46 minutes et à la distance de 55 [lieues] de Oüessant ou nous batimes la mer avec nos vaisseaux qui croisent pendant plusieurs lieues jusque au 30^{me}. Apres cela il fut resolu de retourner au poste de Oüessant. J'oublois à vous dire que depuis ce 27 jusqu'au 30 le vent souffla furieusement au sud et que nous nous trouvames par estime à la latitude de 48 degrés 58 minutes et 63 lieues de Oüessant. Le premier Août apres avoir fait voile directement devant nous nous fimes 45 lieues apres quoy on eut de notre grand mat nous apperçumes Oüessant et reconnumes que nous n'en étions éloignés que de neuf ou dix lieues. Et c'est là que nous avons encore dessein de demurer avec notre flotte jusques à ce que nous rencontrions celle des Francois. Cependant toutes nos provisions sont presque epuises. Voila, Monsieur, la relation fidele de tout ce que nous avons fait depuis notre depart de Torbay jusques à cette heure pour chercher la flotte Françoise. Je finis en vous asseurent que je suis &c."

A letter, incomplete and without address, date, or signature, tempo. W. III.

"May it please your Excellency, Thoe others may be more fortunate in their conception yet I am confident y^t nobody employs their thoughts more often and wth more affection to his Maj^{ties} service than I doe. It is very obvious y^t y^c King's affairs are much perplexed, vast supplies are necessary & there is but a dark prospect where y^t mony will be had, or if y^c nation was in more wealthy circumstances y^c divisions y^t are amongst us would much obstruct y^c giving so much as is needfull at this time; but y^c greatest difficulty w^{ch} y^c King has to struggle wth is y^c danger of being ruined by y^c High Church & Tory Party, & y^c more he trust and confides in them y^c harder game will he have to play; for give me leave to say, the King can never be safe in depending upon them till they change their principles, or y^t he do foregoe his own. No man can have so mean a thought of y^c King y^t he will ever have so little honor or justice as either to deny or goe counter to w^t he has profess'd & practis'd during y^t whole course of his life. And its very plain y^t private intrest and not y^c Publick Good is y^c principle by w^{ch} y^t party has hitherto bin acted, & thoe they have some times seemed very zealous to serve y^c crown, yet they have never gone further wth any King than so long as they could serve themselves of him; & therefore unless they are govern'd by a more publick principle or have given more undoubted testimonys of their affection to y^c King than they have done to those they have formerly served, the more countinances he gives them y^c more he strengthens y^c hands y^t will be lift up agst him when a fair occation offers itself. The 7 Bishops who were sent to y^c Tower for refusing to read King James his Declaration were highly applauded for y^t action as a service done to y^c publick, but this proceeded from a wrong principle, for if their own particular intrest had not prevailed wth them they would not have bin so forward to read y^c Declaration of Charles y^c 2^d w^{ch} struck more directly at y^c heart of y^c Govern^{mt}. If y^t party has given any instances of that affection to y^c King either they are not publickly known or not well understood, but what on the contrary they have done is too notorious to admit of a dispute. Itt was y^t party y^t contended so obstinately for the Regency & when y^c matter came to be decided by a vote in y^c house of Lords there was but one Bishop y^t gave his vote agst y^c Regency. It was y^t party in y^c house of Lords y^t opposed y^c imposing of y^c oathes wth a penalty espially on y^c clergy, who are they at y^t Day besides y^c Papists y^t refuse y^c oathes. Even 5 of those Bishops y^t were sent to y^c Tower are now suspended for refusing y^c oathes. Its y^t party alone y^t now favor y^c Papists. And if any Protestants since this King came to y^c crown, have been found to be in a plot with y^c Papists they prove to be of y^t party. It rests at y^c door of y^t party whatever is obstructed in Parl^t y^t is in order to a setlem^t, & such of them now in y^c house of Lords who have bin preserved by this King speak & vote as much agst his intrests as they did before they tasted of his bounty. They are certainly a strang sort of men y^t can wth any face be so zealous to promote everything y^t tends to recalling King James & yet could passively look on whilst he was driven out of his Kingdome, w^{ch} is an undeniable argum^t y^t either they wanted courage ar intrest, & a defect in either of those makes them rather to be dispis'd than feared, for if they had neither courage nor intrest to serve him for whom they have so much inclination there is little reason to think y^t it will much mend y^c matter when this King is in y^c case, and I beg y^c Excellency but to observe this much further of this sort of men: They have not y^c face to justify y^c late illegal proceedings but yet they make it their whole business to keep in & get into imploy^{ts} y^c very persons y^t were then made use of. I dont desire y^t these people should be removed to make more room for me for I am very well satisfied wth y^c post I am in & wth all possible thankfulness acknowledge his maj^{ties} grace & favor, but I say this because I wish y^t every man y^t y^c King makes use of were altogether as honest & as much in his intrest as I am and as able to serve him as I am willing. I was & am dayly confirmed in my opinion y^t y^c King made a very wrong step when he imploy'd so many of y^t party; because it would unavoidably abate y^c zeale of many of his friends & I fear it has had this further ill effect to make those very people believe y^e either he is afraid of them or y^e they are necessary to him whose utmost hope & expectation was to shrowd themselves under y^e shelter of an act of oblivion. I am far from reflecting upon w^t y^e King has done for my thoughts trouble me very much as oft as I think of y^e consequences of it & I should not be better pleas'd than if I could offer any thing to help y^e King to make y^e best of a bad market, for he has a very tickle (sic) game in his hands. If he should now at y^e time discard y^e party no doubt it would very much confound his business for y^e present. And on y^e other hand if he do not so carry it towards his friends (till he may more conveniently put off these people) y^e they may see it is necessity and not choice y^e obliges him to keep them in, he will be in great danger of loosing so great a number of his friends as to necessitate him to depend intirely upon y^e party & then he will be in very untoward circumstances, for then if he will expect y^e they shall serve him he must make no difficulty of runing up to all y^e excess y^e they have formerly practis'd, and yet he shall not be y^e surer of them for as soon as they can make a better bargain they will leave him to shift for himself. This I conceive to be y^e Kings case and I wish anything could be thought of y^e would do his business effectually. I do highly approve y^e Kings method relating to ecclesiastical The rest is wanting.

J. de Pester to the Countess of Denbigh, 23 October 1744. "Vous savez, madame, que L^{dy} Granville, et la Duchesse de Marlborough sont ches les taupes. La premiere est morte sans tester, ainsi il n'est plus question d'elle. Le testament de l'autre fait l'evangile du jour, elle a nommé pour les executeurs L^d Marchmont, un medecin, un homme de loy, et je ne sais qui encore, j'ay oublié leurs noms. Chacun de ces quatre executeurs a un legs tres modique. Elle donne vingt mille livres sterling a L^d Chesterfield et la reversion de Wimbleton si M^r Spencer meurt sans heritiers males. M^r Pit a dix mille pieces, il y a quelques autres petits legs, j'oubliois dix mille pieces a mylord Clinkarty, un legs a chacun des enfans du Duc et trois mille livres sterling de rente a L^d Blandford, a condition qu'il ne se joindra point a son Pere pour se faire relever de la substitution. M^r Spencer est heritier du reste mais elle luy a lié les mains de facon qu'il ne pourra rien alienier. Je sauray tout cela plus au clair en ouvrir le testament samedi dernier, ainsi tout ce qu'on a pu en apprendre n'est qu'a baton rompu."

Same to same, 3 September 1745. "Le fils du Pretendant est sans doute en Ecosse, il a une petite armee, il s'avance vers le General Cope, et il y a toute apparence qu'ils se batront. Cette nouvelle est tres vraie car on en sait le detail par un de nos officiers qu'ils avoient pris et renvoyé sur sa parole. Les Hollandois arrivent incessamment, cependant la France, dit on, embarque des troupes, et l'escadre Espagnolle qui doit les joindre a cinq mille hommes a bord."

Same to same, 23 [Sep^r] 1745. "Il est venu madame, un expres d'Ecosse, qui a porté la nouvelle d'une action entre les troupes du Roy commandus par le General Hawley et l'armee des rebelles, ou ces derniers ont eû l'avantage, encore que nous eussions sept mille hommes contre cinq. Nous avons perdu sept canons et beaucoup de bagage nos officiers se sont tres bien comportez, et les soldats tres male. Il y a plusieurs des premiers tuez ou blessez, parmi lesquels je ne crois pas qu'il y ait personne que vous connoissiez. Enfin il a été resolu que le Duc partiroit incessamment pour tacher de reparer le dommage. Cette mauvaise nouvelle a, comme vous le jugez bien, causé une sorte de consternation d'autant plus qu'on ne sait si c'est poltronerie ou trahison qui a fait fuir ces soldats. Cependant on ne crois pas que le mal soit irreparable. On a appris d'un autre côté que les officiers qui avoient été faits prisonniers a Preston Pans se sont echappez de l'endroit ou ils estoient aupres de Perth. J'oubliois de vous dire que dans l'action la premiere ligne a fait feu et s'est comportée mediocrement bien, et que la seconde qui estoit composée des memes troupes que le Cope avoit a Preston Pans a pris la fuite sans tirer un seul coup; enfin que M^r Hawley s'estoit retire a Edinbourg."

Same to same, 24 September 1745. "Vous demandez des nouvelles d'Ecosse, madame, en voici qu'une expres a apporté la nuit passée. Les rebelles, bien loin d'être effrayez a l'approche du General Cope, sont alles a sa rencontre dans la plaine et l'ont battu a plat de couture; il a été obligé de se sauver dans un petit navire, tout son bagage et son artillerie sont demeures derniere et devenus apparament le butin des revoltes, ce qui les mettra peut être en état de faire le siege du chateau d'Edinbourg. En attendant ils y ont laissé une garnison de deux milles hommes, j'entend dans la ville, si je ne me tromp, le reste est en marche pour Lancashire. Une lettre de mylord Louthern, je ne sais si j'appelle bien ce nom, dit que nos soldats fuirient au plus vite et qu'il a été impossible aux officiers de les rallier. On ne sait meme pas trop ce que la plupart de cette soldatesque est devenue. Il faut esperer que le beau Cleon et son maitre ne traiteront plus cette affaire de bagatelle comme ils l'avoient fait jusqu'a present. Je ne sais si j'ay tort mais la chose me paroît devenir serieuse, il est vray qu'avec les troupes Hollandoises, celles que nous avons ici, et les regimens venus de Flandres, nous avons a peu pres vingt mille en droits differens, et avant qu'on les puisse rallier, les rebelles pourront faire bien du chemin. Voila un beau sujet a reflexions."

Same to same, 5 August 1746. "Que vous diray je des nouvelles? Nous avons été occupez la semaine derniere a pendre et a couper le col, c'est a dire que l'un est fait et l'autre a faire. On ne sait quelle sera la destinée des trois lords, le vent du bureau ne me paroît pas tendre a leur grace; cependant on ne sait qu'en dire. Le Balmerino, surement passera la pas, la vie luy paroit indifferente, et le public ne veut pas plus sentir pour luy qu'il ne fait luy même. Le Kilmarnock est charmant de sa figure, et toutes les femmes le voudroient sauver. Il y a bien des circonstances gracieuses dans le cas du Cromerty, une famille, une enchainure de circonstances, une belle femme qui s'est jetée au pieds du Roy. Si j'avois a passer pour le pardon d'un des trois ce seroit pour celui du dernier. Dix ou douze jours nous eclaireiront sur tout cela, en attendant on arrête et on a arrêté bien des gens, on a nommé d'autres. Le Murray a fait bien des decouvertes et il dit que s'il eut pu se sauver en France, il en aurait fait tout autant, que des gens assez laches pour ne pas tenir leur parole dans une affaire de cette consequence ne merite aucun menagement."

Extract from a letter, without signature, addressed to the Countess of Denbigh, apparently from London, and dated June 3 (1748). "The person for whom we are most concerned is well in health, but much distressed he see himself given up by the French. I am told to resolves to leave France. Most of his followers has already, and happy it is for him to be freed from them for such an ungratious sett of People I never heard of. Sure that man has a fate harder then can be thought[t], supportable by a human creature. The Peace is the surprise of every body, there must be some secret article nobody knows, for its certing we had no army and the French a gallant one. Its thought the want of bread and the bribe to Prussia has caused this great event. Spain they say will come in and our great Gen^l Cumberland they say by his sole authority made Lord Sandwich sign one of the articles in regard to Don Phillip settlem^t."

"I was in hopes to have had a good account of the Princes escape for you but its not yet come out nor will not. I have hear from Lady Mack some circumstances that I believe will be as new to you as they were to me. Gen^l Campbell had inclosed the Prince within six or eight miles, he had but one man with him and the Gen^l people made fires from one party to a nother to show their companies how close they drew to gether. In this distress the Prince nor the person with him could find no remindy but to put them selves under the protection of two the most noted cow stealers in the whole country whose cabin happened to be in that spott of grownd. When they came to them they told them they were people that had been in the late action, that Camp[bell's] people had inclosed that ground in hopes of finding the Prince, and begd they would help them out, on which one of the men said You dont think to deceive me; I know you to be the P. He told him he was mistake to which the man answerd S^r dont think to deceive me, I was with you att such a Battle and we will get you out or die for it. The way they contrived was to crawl on all fours pretty near the fires of the enemy while the P. and his companion past thro betwen. If either of the men were perseved by the guard of his side he was to make such a noise and bussel as would draw his companion to him who was to increase the confusion as much as they could till they judg[eu] the P. was gott to a good distance. It Pleased God their scheme took effect and the P. gott through without the gaurds taking the least allarm. He has sent each of these men a Hundred p^d since he gott abroad. The next story is that when he was in the utmost distress, had been a considerable time without meat, and if they had arms durst not shott, inclosed between rocks and no human help to support them, it pleased God a Dere fell down from the rock and broak its leg so that they could gett it and live on for many days. Since I am in a way of story telling I must tell you one I had from S^r John Douglass which is that Secretary Murry who never had above three hundred a year in the world before the P. left Edinburgh to come to England wrot to a Gent^l that S^r John knew very well and beg of him he would take two thousand pound of him which he wanted to lay out, that he was in such a hurry then he could not stay to have a Bond drawn but would take the gentleman's note for the money which he must certainly have cheated his master off and undoubtedly betrayed him in all things, for a man that could be so low a Rogue to pilfer such a sum of money would undoubtedly get it by any bad way he could.

"Poor Flora is like to come off ill with her annuity, its Hope[d] all the Poor folks that were ordred for transportation will be safe, though the Duke and his father in law are for Punishm^t. I heere the Duke of Cum. did not mett the King as he was to have done att his landing. Its said our two great Secretariys have had some words. Newcas[le] has changed posts, and Bedford demanded some papers that he said belonged to his office which the other refused to give up because he had done the business of that office. They say they agree so ill together that in spite of prophisey Newcastle will follow his master to H. rather than the other should. I must not omit to tell you that the Monarch to look gratus in the eyes of the People dress himself up in the Hanover colers the day he left us and hardly spook to the Princess. The children were all in a row waiting for him as he went to his coach but he never took the least notice of them which sett Prince George and the Princess in to violent tears. . . . Mackdonal is dying with his close confinement."

EARL OF
EGMONT.

THE MANUSCRIPTS OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF EGMONT AT ST. JAMES' PLACE.

Here are many volumes of collections for the history of the House of Percival; and one for the history of the house of Carew:—heraldic volumes by St. George and Lilly; papers about Nova Scotia; ten volumes of biographical collections containing notices of (amongst others) English persons, seemingly by a cotemporary; part of the first Lord Percival's autobiography; Sir Philip Percival's defence of his behaviour and services in Ireland when Commissary General there, in answer to Sir John Temple. The original letters are very numerous, and contain some good information during this disturbed period of the reign of Charles I. In the letter-books are copies of a number of letters from George Berkeley, afterwards Bishop of Cloyne, to Sir John Percival, from 1709 to 1730; they throw light on his early career in Ireland and on the Bermuda scheme, and contain notices of Pope, Steele, and Addison. Four volumes of Adversaria contain anecdotes of, and remarks on, celebrated persons. John Milton is said to have died a Papist. There are 12 folio volumes of diaries for 1730 and succeeding years; many letters by Sir Robert Southwell. Original entry book of the High Court of Castle Chamber, Dublin; the first date is 1573, and the last is 18 Jac. I. A volume of copies of records contains copy of a writ to take John Lewis, otherwise Abdiell Lewis, of Holbroke, and to burn him in Norwich; Sir Robert Southwell's letters while Envoy Extraordinary to the Duke of Brandenburg in 1680. A letter in 1713 notices the excitement produced by Addison's play of Cato; and Mr. Pulteney said the Queen (Anne) thought the Pretender was her brother. There are copies of 2 letters by A. Pope.

In 1721 is an account of the Picture Office, a company formed by M. le Blond to engrave pictures at a cheap rate. There are letters to Courayer by Lord Percival who invited him to England; and letters by Courayer showing his connexion with the new edition of De Thou's history. Notes of the debates in the House of Commons in 1728.

A folio volume containing copies of family deeds.

A folio common-place book.

A folio volume containing collections for the history of the House of Percival.

A folio volume containing a few pedigrees.

A folio volume containing copies of receipts to, and letters to Sir Philip Percival, temp. Car. I.

A folio volume containing a journal or diary from 1 Feb. 1684 to 10 May. (Private matters.)

ship "Dolphin," Samuel Wallis, Esq., commander, in 1766-7-8; by Robert Molineux, mate of the good ship. N.B.—After the return of Commodore Biron from the expedition upon which he was sent by the Earl of Egmont the First Lord of the Admiralty, and his discovery of Falkland Islands, together with other islands in his train through the Pacific Ocean; upon the representation of the said Earl to the King that the knowledge of the ports in the Falkland Islands and of the Straits of Magellan would greatly facilitate further discoveries in the Pacific Ocean south of the Line, if pursued before a war with France or Spain, or the jealousy of those two powers should oblige Great Britain to part with the possession of Falkland Islands, or otherwise interrupt the attempts of Great Britain in that part of the world, His Majesty was pleased to authorise this expedition to be taken in hopes of finding a continent of great extent between the Straits of Magellan and New Zealand. The ship which accompanied the "Dolphin" was lost.

It is a log-book. It has some accounts of the natives, and three or four drawings of boys, &c.

A folio volume. A leaf the size of the volume has a large woodcut of the arms of Richard St. George. It contains pedigrees, and an index of 11 leaves in four columns. On the cover are the arms of St. George. In the volume is a certificate by Wm. Dugdale, Garter, dated 28 June 1681, about Wm. Pettye, then a clerk to Fabian Philips in Chancery Lane, having made abstracts of inquisitions in the Tower of London of what concerned a Cornish family called Pettit, and drawn up a pedigree and continued the same to himself, and produced the abstract to Garter, making out that the Cornish family were seised of lands in Yorkshire where Pettye was born, and that Garter at his request subscribed the pedigree. But sometime afterwards, being asked by one Mr. Ralph Jennings, an undertaker in the Office of Records in the Tower of London, whether Pettye had not showed Garter such abstract of inquisitions for the effect of that pedigree, and Garter acknowledging that he had, he (Jennings) said that those abstracts of late times which seemed to deduce the Pettyes' of Yorkshire from the family of Pettit in Cornwall were fictitious, and framed by the said Mr. William Pettye to give a colour to the truth of their descents; assuring Garter that he knew it to be so, &c., &c.

(From an indorsement it seems that that Earl Marshal issued a warrant in the matter.)

The collections seem to be by Richard St. George; some of the extracts are from a register of the Priory of Coventry, compiled temp. Hen. III. The volume contains pedigrees deduced from writs and the Plea Rolls.

A folio volume of pedigrees compiled by St. George in 1606.

Large 4to volume, of about 90 pp., by St. George. It contains copies of questions and answers about prececdence; peerage cases; short arguments in peerage matters, &c.; discussion about baronets. A few leaves at the end are not by St. George.

At the other end of the volume are what seem to be sketches for speeches and arguments in the House of Lords after the conclusion of the peace and down to 1752.

A folio volume containing genealogy of the house of Percival; many leaves with arms; and at the other end are notes of speeches similar to those in the last preceding volume, 1742, &c.

Folio. 16th century. Creations of English nobility. Arms of Edward the Confessor and other kings. Arms of Barons from the Conqueror downwards.—Of Botteville (arms of Thynne) it is said that no issue remain. The compilation goes through the various kings' reigns. The arms are well tricked. The last two names (on leaf 66) are Sir Thomas Knyvett, baron of Escrik, and Sir Gervase Clifton, Baron Layton; but their arms are not filled in.

The various shields have quarterings.

Folio. 18th century. Miscellaneous collections for the history of the house of Percival (from manuscripts and printed books.)

Folio. Sept. 24, 1742. Account (in 3 pp.) of Lord Percival's interview with Mr. Sandys, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the state of the country.—Drafts of speeches and arguments.—At the other end of the volume are things of similar character, and some loose papers.

Folio. 18th century. Some long pedigrees of Harley and Rodney.

Folio. Only 9 pp. filled. Begins with a note of Sir John Percival having sickened at Barton, his mansion house, on 18 April 1686; he had a malignant fever, and died in 12 days. Then a few memoranda of his affairs.

EARL OF
EGMONT.

Folio. Genealogical history of the house of Carew with the genealogies and arms of the illustrious families with whom they have been allied, proved by records, &c., &c. by John Anstis. 45 leaves. (In the handwriting of Dr. George Harbin.)

Folio. 18th century. Index of names of persons in (Dugdale's) Baronage.

Folio. 18th century. Index of places in Dugdale's Baronage.

Folio. Book of letters from the Board of Trade sent to the Admiralty to inspect the treaties with the Indians and the Government of Nova Scotia. 1764. There are references to three bundles.—Extracts from long letter from Geo. Laurence, dated Halifax, 16 June 1760, to the Lords of Trade.—Copy of Memorial to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, by Robert Sanderson, Esq., late Speaker of the House of Assembly at Halifax (received by the Board 14 January 1761).—Several pages about the state of the Colony.

Folio. 18th century. Biographical Collections, vol. I., 158 pp. and index. The names are chiefly French. One is Stanhope, Dean of Canterbury.

Folio. 2 vols. The obligations of religion from reason and Scripture.

Folio. Biographical Collections, vols. 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11.

These volumes contain personal notices of a great number of people, ancient and modern; after vol. 6 the writing is by a second hand. The notices of English persons are sometimes as by a cotemporary.

Large folio, labelled. Ped. of Nobility, by Lilly. The writing is of the 16th and 17th centuries. The writing of the greater part seems to be the same as that in the volumes of St. George. There is an engraved title of the achievement of King James I., engraved by J. Hondius, 1614, surrounded by the arms of the early kings of England.

Some of the arms in the volume are coloured. The pedigrees are full, and seem to have been done for a Pawlet. At p. 147 the latest entry is, "Sir W. Hervey made Lord Hervey of Ross, in Ireland, and Baron Hervey of Kidbroke, 3 Car. I. By his first wife, no child: by his second wife he had four children, two sons who died s. p., and two daughters, Elizabeth, who married John Hervey, of Ickworth, and Helen, who died a spinster."

Large folio. Five pages of autobiography of Lord Percival, and account of his acquaintance with Frederick Prince of Wales.

A 12^o volume. Catalogue of the books and MSS., &c. in the College of Arms, transcribed by James Green, Bluemantle, 1719.

Folio. Begins imperfectly, 4 January 1676, and ends 6 March 1680. Copies of letters between Sir Robert Southwell and his nephew, Mr. John Percival, about his estates; and copies of letters from other members of the family.

Large folio. 17th century. Arms of R. St. George on the covers. This volume contains copies of various early documents.

136. Table of contents.

Folio. 18th century. Records of the house of Percival. "Note, that it is extracts from public records and private papers to prove other pedigrees, and intended to form a third volume of the history of the house of Yoery, &c., and was compiled by and is in the hand-writing of my father John, 2nd Earl of Egmout.—Arden, 16th Jan. 1798." The vol. contains 170 leaves; arms, pedigrees, copies of records and deeds and extracts from historians, and seals. One of the seals is from a seal (the deed lost) at Dunster Castle.

Folio. 18th century. Copy of a long speech by (Lord Egmout), advising the King to change his Ministers.—Skeletons of a few other speeches.

Folio. 18th century, I. "My grandfather, Sir Richard Percival's defence of his behaviour and services in Ireland when Commissary General there, occasioned by Sir John Temple's accusation in Parliament, 1647." Begins, Having been appointed Commissary General of the victual for the army in Ireland. . . . Ends (fo. 44) discontents of the army which did occasion that cessation.

2. The beginning of Lord Strafford's trial, from 22 to 29 March 1641.

3. Diurnal occurrences and proceedings of the Parliament concerning the Lord Deputy's tryal, from 29 March to 5 April 1641.

4. The same, to 12 April 1641.

5. Mr. Pym's conference with the Lords, 12 April 1641.

6. Diurnal occurrences from 19 April to 26 April 1641.

7. "Duplicate of my grandfather's defence in his own hand." (This is a foul draft.)

(No. 5 above contains copy of the paper which Pym produced for the purpose of procuring the Earl of Strafford's tryal.)

Folio. Letter book of John Percival.

1682, Oct. 19, Burton.—1684, May 24, Burton.—Some are autograph, and some are copies signed. They are on business. One is a letter of congratulation to the Duke of Ormond in 1682.

Letters.

1632–1687. Forty-four volumes, folio. Original letters.

1720–1733. Nine volumes, folio. News letters.

1736–1748. Ten volumes, folio. Original letters.

1751. One volume. Original letters.

The above contain a large amount of family and business matters, but also much of public interest. As a piece of what may be found I give extracts from the volumes for 1641, 1642, and 1643. In the other volumes, as might be expected, there is much of interest about Ireland, the family of Percival having large estates and holding high position there.

Vol. 1641-1641.

1640, Sept. 14, York. Capt. John Barry to Sir Philip Percival. The army has been got together with difficulty; and though as fair a one as any in Christendom, methinks they will not be got to fight. The Scotch insult them.—The writer speaks of the King's inability to make resistance, and the disgraceful quitting of Newcastle and Northumberland and the bishoprick, which the Scotch enjoy, and make them pay large contributions.—The manner of our disorder at Newcastle I will not adventure upon, since it may reflect upon many people of quality. We left the town and came away with 10,000 foot and a few horse that were not in the former day's defeat; left the King's magazine with 150 barrels of powder, lead proportionable, arms for about 1,000 men, infinite store of provisions, value 20,000*l.*, twenty or more pieces of ordnance upon the walls, and marched away in disorder.

1640, Nov. 24, London. The same to the same. . . . The Scotch Commissioners are at London, and did the other day refuse to treat with the King, but told it was a business concerned the Crown, and they would treat but with the whole body of the kingdom. I think my lord of York and Lord Wilmot go over justices. . . . He asks Percival for 100*l.* or 20*l.*; for the Parliament are taking an order to chasser all papists from the army, including him (Barry).—They began to banish us out of town and to remove all from court: they are aggravated against us by reason of a rogue the other day that stabbed a Justice of the peace in Westminster Hall. That was by order of the House bringing in a list of all papists' names in that end of the town; he said it was because the justice set him in the stocks almost a month ago, he being a gentleman.

1640, Jan. 29, Dublin Castle. Copy Order in Council to find corn for the King's army.

1640, March 1, Ed. Percival to [Sir Philip Percival]. . . Your governor it is thought will pay for his ambition shortly. He is generally thought to be the most unworthy member that ever England's kingdom bred.

1640, March 8, London. John Berry to Sir Philip Percival.—My Lord Lieutenant comes to his tryal, they say, this week; what will become of him the Lord of Heaven only knows; but the necessity that was (almost) upon our Saviour is upon him; somebody must be sacrificed to appease the people, and he is thought the fittest, though all indifferent men think his charge reach not his life. I believe his being alive or dead will not settle all things here to the content of those that most desire it.

Vol. 1641.

1640, March 23, London. John Barry to Sir Philip Percival.—Thinks the Committee cannot find just exceptions against his Majesty's proceedings and performance of all he promises them.—Alludes to the proceedings against Strafford.

1640, April 5, London. The same to the same.—Thinks that some of the Irish Committee are going over, and then Percival will hear of the King's growing inclination to hear and redress all the grievances of Ireland.—Thinks that the Lord Lieutenant will have his doom this week. Yesterday they entered upon the English Articles, as they call them, and proceeded to the 24th; all these he has fairly acquitted himself of, specially of any intention of bringing the Irish army to the sword, which was charged and laid to his charge as capital treason.—Hopes he will come off.

1641, April 21, St. Albans. The same to the same. Thinks the Lord Lieutenant's life is safe.—The young Prince of Orange came to court last night. . . he finds his Mrs. sick afore him, and her sweet pretty looks extremely changed.—Lord Holland is made general; he goes down to the army speedily; if he can keep them in good order without martial law or money, he does as well as a general who is desired to be expected.

1641, May 1, London. The same to the same.—Fears the ends of Strafford's tryal will be tragical, notwithstanding the King has declared his conscience unsatisfied with the proceedings.—The Bill.—The town is in an uproar, demanding justice.

1641, last of May, London. The same to the same. The King resolved to go to Scotland during the latter end of next month; the Queen says she will not stay behind; but all their resolutions change so often, &c., &c.

EARL OF
EGMONT.

1641, Nov. 5, Donerayle. Wm. St. Leger, president of Munster, to Sir Philip Percival. Bloody news out of the Lowlands, enough to fright timorous persons; but he believes nothing but what comes from the Justices or Percival.—The proclamation the Justices sent into these parts was not so well advised as it might have been; the end should have been to have settled the humours and dispositions of the people; and this has wrought the clean contrary effect. They were bad before, now they are ten times worse. I read the proclamation to Dr. Sullivan; at the reading of the words "ill-affected Irish Paptists," I did never observe more venomous rancour in any man's face than in his.—P.S. I hear the rebels gather strength, which, if they do, I must say their Lordships are too slow.

1641, Nov. 10, at my Lord of Montgomery's garrison.—John Galbraith to Sir Philip Percival. Military matters.

1641, Nov. 13, Donerayle. Wm. St. Leger to Sir P. Percival.—The State takes very little care of the safety of this province; instead of strengthening us they enfeeble us all they may; for they have taken away from all the companies we have always had except three.—Asks Percival to solicit the sending of three troops of horse. . . . Had I arms I could have drawn together three or four thousand good Protestants on whom we could have relied; but to put all our strength of arms into the hands of another religion, religion being the pretence of the war, is beyond my understanding.—He speaks of the weak state of the province.

1641, Nov. 18, Donerayle. The same to the same.— . . Methinks the State have a great opinion of me or else a mean value they put on this province, that they think I and one poor 40-horse is able to order all that may be amiss in these parts.—Complains of putting the arms into papists' hands.

1641, Nov. 22, Donerayle. The same to the same. Wishes the women and children were in a place of safety.—Complains of the neglect of that province.

1641, Nov. 27, Donerayle. The same to the same. Encloses a copy of what he has written to the Lords Justices.—Complains that when the King has made good forts and given them in charge to particular men, those men should be called away and the forts be left ready for the enemy to walk into.

1641, Dec. 3, Clonmell. The same to the same.—Is busy with complaints made by the English, which come like Job's messengers. Our state is thus; there is not left in the county of Kilkenny one Englishman or Protestant worth a groat.—They (the rebels) have already taken all Lord Ormond's cattle; they are at work in the co. of Waterford, and falling to work in the co. of Tipperary; and in a fortnight Cork and Limerick and all will follow, if some speedy course prevent it not. I believe Cork will hold out longest.

1641, Dec. 4, Waterford. The same to the same.—Account of my last day's work with the rebels. Leaving Clonmell the night I wrote last, I took about 20 of the rogues and rescued 300 sheep and 50 cows belonging to one Wallis an Englishman. Hence I pursued them to the passage beyond Waterford where the main body were hastening to get over the river. I was constrained to ride half a dozen miles as fast as my horse could carry me with only Lord Inchiquin, Will. Jephson, Redmund Rock, young Will. Fenton, and Will. Hide, and two or three of my own servants; we found about 300 of the rogues on this side and almost all their prey, which was a great one; we charged and killed near seven score; the rest or many we took prisoners and carried to Waterford, where we intend to execute them. Thus you see I have broken the ice here.—St. Leger asks that assistance and supplies may be sent to him.

1641, Dec. 6, Waterford. Ld. Inchiquin to Sir P. Percival.

1641, Dec. 11, Clonmell. W. St. Leger to Sir Philip Percival. Tells of another pursuit of the rogues, where he slew about 50 and rescued part of the prey (of Percival's cattle and his own), but so harrassed as they were not worth anything; and while he was doing this the country rose up behind him in every place, so that having worn out all his horses and tired his company, he was compelled to go home.—The slow coming help from England will prove very fatal, he fears. He is sending Lord Inchiquin into England to present the condition of that province to his Majesty and the State there.

1641, Dec. 15. Dublin. Original Council Letter (signed by Wm. Parsons, Jo. Borlase, Ormond and Ossory, Dillon, Adam Loftus, J. Temple, Ch. Lambart, Fr. Willoughby, and Robert Meredith) to Sir H. Vane, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State:—recommending Sir Philip Percival, and asking Vane to speak well of him to the King.

1641, Dec. 20. Wm. St. Leger to Sir P. Percival.—Says that he has received a commission from the Lord Lieutenant to raise a regiment and three troops, but has received neither money nor arms.—“The enemy here threatens me shrewdly, and intends, as he says, to dine with me on Christmas day.”—He intends to go out and meet the enemy.

1641, January 1, Dublin. Paul Davys to his brother Sir Philip Percival.—On the 30th of December Sir Simon Harcourt arrived with his 1,400 men, but with arms only for 1,100 men, which I wonder much, seeing the arms for the stores are come to Chester.—Gives an account of a skirmish with the rebels.

Other letters by Davys, Lord Inchiquin, and Sir W. St. Leger.

1641, March 3, Dublin. Ormond and Ossory to Sir P. Percival.—The reports and pamphlets lie.—Lord Dillon is mistaken. The writer abuses Raymond, and says that while he (the writer) serves the King he will go on constantly “neither sparing the rebel because he is my kinsman or was my friend, nor yet will I one jot the more sharpen my sword against him to public service whatever danger I may thereby receive in my private. A letter of Dr. Fenell's, written in character to me, was intercepted, and he is commanded, I suppose, by Lord Mountgarret to unriddle.”

1642. A proposition for victualling the army in Ireland. (1½ pp.)

1641, March 12, Chester. Nich. Whyte to “my noble gossipp Sir Philip Percival, at Mr. Brown's house, at the sign of the Axe in the Strand.”

1641, March 18, Warwick Lane. Richard Fanshawe to Sir Philip Percival.—Sends a copy of Mr. Carpenter's commission. (Percival seems to have called when Fanshawe was not at home.)

1641, March 23. Copy of resolution of the House of Commons about Sir P. Percival being Commissary General of the Victuals.

Vol. 1642.

Many papers about the office of Commissary General.—Copy of instructions to Sir P. Percival in his office, signed by the Earl of Leicester.—Letter of complaint by Lord Inchiquin of wrongs done to tenants.—Letters by Lord Inchiquin; some of them are addressed to Serjeant Thomas Reymond, commanding the castle of Liscarrol.—Council orders to Percival as Commissary General.—Names of the soldiers (38) in pay at Liscarrol; and an undertaking by Lord Inchiquin to entertain and pay them as part of the King's army.

Vol. 1643.

Letters by Lord Inchiquin to Reymond. (Lord Inchiquin was Chief Commander of the King's forces in Munster.)

Letter by Thomas Bulkeley at Baron Hill.

Papers about Sir J. Temple's purchase of the mill of Kilmaneham.

Council Letter to Sir P. Percival as Commissary General.

Certain grievances of Sir P. Percival, presented by his tenant Thomas Reymond.

Other grievances against him.

1643, Feb. 12, Cork. Hard. Waller to Thomas Betsworth:—about the settling of his quarters.

1641, Dec. 20. Copy of Sir P. Percival's will of this date, and of a codicil, dated 21 Feb. 1643.

1643, Feb. 23, Oxford. (Indorsed “Copy of letter by the Lord Bishop of Raph.”)—The Irish nation must stand or fall with King Charles: . . . Our country arms have had five repulses from Newcastle and other adjoining places upon the river where they attempted to pass An advice to murder Edward 2d in Berkeley Castle.

Edwardum occidere noli timere bonum est.

Jo. Raphensis.”

1643, March 9. Council Order signed by Ormond at the top, directing 57l. to be paid to Sir P. Percival, to buy stores for the King's army.

1643, March 11. Complaints, signed by James Cusack, against Crogher Reogh O'Calaghan, as not being faithful to the rebel cause. 5 pp. This is a copy “examined, Robert Walsh.”

Vol. 1644.

Examined copy of a letter by Lord Inchiquin to his brother Col. Harry Bryan.—He says, “the Irish have resolved not to leave the standard in a field, and to become subjects of a foreign Prince, unless the King turn Papist. I cannot believe he will change religion; yet we find he has put the kingdom and us into the power of the Irish who we know will prosecute with all malice the extirpation of the English kingdom. Wherefore our duty to God and our own safety call upon us to neglect the King's service in other things, and to preserve his interest against them who are his most dangerous enemies.—Get your regiment, or as many as you can, into the town of Wareham, from whence you may come to the Parliament shipping that will come to take you in and transport you to Ireland where the soldiers will now have extraordinary good pay.”

Copy (17 pp. close writing) of speeches or reports by Sir W. S., Sir Geo. L., Sir P. P., and G. D., to the Lords on the propositions of the Confederate Roman Catholics of Ireland.

Petition of Dermott McKarby alias O'Donough, Esq., to the Supreme Council of the Confederate Catholics of Ireland.

The like by O'Callaghan and others. (These petitions are about land.)

Papers containing the King's answers and views on the Irish Catholic propositions.

Letter by Wm. St. Leger.

(Date gone.) Lord Inchiquin to Thomas Reymond.—“Mr. Barry, of Lysgriffin, his usage of our people I shall require in due time. We must have patience, having agreed on a cessation till the 15th of this month (7 February).”

A letter by Barry.

1644, March 20, Oxford. George Digby to Lord Inchiquin. A letter of remonstrance on Lord Inchiquin having, as supposed, turned against the King. Asks him, in the King's name, to state his terms.

Folio volume of letters in 1645. Most of them relate to the family estates. The following are of general interest.

1645, March 31. Lord Inchiquin to Capt. Thomas Reymond. “I have sent you by the bearer half a dozen bundles of salt, half a barrel of powder, and your gun. I have notice that the Irish, notwithstanding their pretences of keeping the cessation inviolable till the 10th day of April, do intend to take some advantage upon us in the Easter week, and to siege some place near us in the great island and other places; and therefore I intend to be as diligent to prevent them as possible.”—Asks Reymond to send a man to Mayallo to receive orders.

1645, April 12, Clonmorne. Don O'Callaghan to the same.—Hears there has been a further cessation, but has not heard from his own party: he desires peace: he does not wish to begin hostility. “If you will acknowledge and serve the King against his enemies as I found you were resolved to do, and obey the Lord Lieutenant's commands, I see no reason why you should be held an enemy by our party.”

1645, May 4. [] tow Hill. Lord Inchiquin to the same.—Has received a letter from Maurice Fitzgerald saying that he and some others were invited to Raymond's Castle and there imprisoned. Asks Raymond to write a statement of the matter, so that Fitzgerald may be set free, if there is no ground for detainer.

1645, May 12. The same to the same. “From your letter I find that those of your ward and of Milltowne have forborne to do any service upon the enemy in expectation of receiving further order from me. I did not suppose I should have found you varying a second time from my directions, and assure you that if you shall give me a third cause to take exception to, I shall prevent you from doing it the fourth.”—Says he told Raymond by word of mouth that directly the cessation expired he was to harass the enemy: he now repeats it “We have beaten the enemy out of Barrymore and Imokelly and not left a man on this side of Blackwater that dare show his face. We are now drawing forth to besiege Barryes Court, which we are confident will be speedily either surrendered or enforced. The enemy lying with a good strength on the further side of the Blackwater dares not advance, we having 300 horse, 200 dragoons, and a party of foot who wait upon and face the enemy, so as he stirs not a foot but they are ready to have a bout

EGMONT.

"with him; and if the ground where he lyeth were fit for horse service, we would seek him out where he lies, and desire nothing more than to meet him on equal terms."

1645, June 7, Cork. John Hodder to Sir P. Percival. You notice with grief of hart of those castles we have lost: Malloroo was first that gave up on quarter; then Lisearrall yielded also; A . . . gh stood very valiantly and lost most of their men, and till the castle was much eliten would not give over. Then Lieut. Fisher commanding, with two or three went out to the Governor but could have no quarter, but was quartered with the rest. Then Milltowne yielded also, upon quarter, with one shot. Capt. Bettsworth was cleared, but Capt. Raymond is condemned; but I hope my Lord will have mercy upon him . . . All the castles beyond the Blackwater are taken except only Bellahooley.

1645, June 8th. Sir Percy Smyth to his brother. All our castles beyond the Blackwater, Bullinghouly excepted, are gone; most burnt to the ground; in particular Michelstown and Dunraile; Mullo and Lessarol yielded without shot or stroke, and so did Milltowne; but for Annuk(?) no place in Ireland ever better defended in which service the rogues lost at least 300 of their best men, and at last got it by treachery.

1645, Jan. Petition by upwards of 24 persons to the Lord President of Munster, Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's Protestant forces in Munster, that Reymond might be freed and put at their head again.—Lord Inchiquin writes at the foot that the petition shall be considered so as to appoint worthy men to command them, which Reymond was found not to be.

1645, June 19, Cork. Pass, signed by Lord Inchiquin for Capt Thomas Reymond and his wife and children to go into England.

1645, July 21, Cork. John Hodder to Sir Philip Percival in London.—The bearer, Capt. Reymond, will certify you of the loss of Riscorral, Mallowe, with all the castles we had in Munster, except Barriscourt and Bolvelle, which as yet we do enjoy.—It is feared we shall lose all our garrison towns in Munster, if we have not a speedy course taken for our relief. We have had nothing in our stores this month. Our soldiers have ever since lived upon 18d. per week, which have been paid by the poor inhabitants who are not able to continue the payment The enemy, Castellhaven commander, lieth over against Youghall; he had planted on the west side but could do no good there, so now has carried his guns, being 4 great battering pieces, and planted them by the river side near to Pilltown, and has already done much harm by battering the walls and houses, and have killed Lieut.-Col. Tofftes and Lieut.-Col. Badridge, with other soldiers, and very proudly boasteth that they will not give over till they have it, and will put all to the sword, men, women, and children. Cork is so full of men, women, and children from thence, that we can scarce contain them; and our markets are very poor and small. I doubt not you have heard of our losses of Col. Bryan, Lieut.-Col. Courtneye, with 4 other captains, with others who were taken prisoners in Rostilleon Castle. After we had taken it, they staying to clear and raze it, were afterwards surprised and taken prisoners to Kilkenny.

1645, July 28, Annabes. Edward Smyth to the same.—Writes of the sad condition of the Protestants in Munster.—"For Sir Thomas Fairfax, how he should relieve them I do not apprehend, in regard I have a letter in print from one of his officers, complaining they are disabled to proceed effectually, in regard they want for completing their own to the number it was established at, 1,500 horse and 6,000 foot."

1645, Aug. 19. Youghall. Percy Smyth to his brother. Whether I wrote to you by Lord Broghill I cannot tell. I was then at the legar (siege) of Bullymertie, which at 5 days end we took on quarter, but were forced to burn it within an hour after. Castlehaven with his forces came so fast on my Lord President with the Cork forces had much ado to get to Barriscourt, and those of his town under my command hardly got within a mile of the town before 2 troops and 18 was in the rear of us, we being not above 500 in all, yet we came safe home the 14th of June. From this time forward Castlehaven fell to taking of Castellions, Lismore, and all those castles on the Blackwater and Bide, which famons service he ended the 18th of June. The 29th June he shewed himself before this town with all his rebellious rout, to the number of at least 8,000 of all sorts. Some 3 days he came within half-musket shot of our walls, from whence we made 4 or 5 smart saileys, and forced him to settle himself further off, having there killed him at least 300 men without the loss of one to us. Some ten days after, he settled himself near the harbour's mouth, where they had formerly raised 2 batteries on the east side, and the first day, out of one shot from the ferry point, sunk the Duncannon frigate in the morning, and the same evening, with another shot into the foot of the keaye (quay?) killed Tom Budridge and a common soldier; the bearer will tell you how nearly I escaped; and did raise a battery which did much among us on the south, which we resolved not to endure; but on the 5th instant we made a sally before day on them, in which we killed by their own confession, 2 captains, 2 lieutenants, 3 ensigns, and about 300 Ulster men; we dismounted their culverin and threw it down the rocks, and made it useless to them, and took one brass piece of about 4 or 5 cwt.; we had not strength or time to bring the culverin away. This sally has put them to Bullenatun, where now they lie, and hope to stave us, the harbour being by them taken from us; only by night boats come in to us in the dark. Truly, I fear starving and not their forces; here are in the town at least 5,000 souls, of which not above 1,200 soldiers at most. . . . Seeing it is my fortune to have charge of the place, I will defend it to the utmost. . . . I have had many invitations from Castlehaven to yield it: his letters are kept by Sir J. K., but this bearer Phillips, who commanded the Mayflower, can give you many particulars.

1645, Aug. 20. Lord Broghill appoints Sir Philip Percival, his agent, to receive moneys for entertainments, &c.

1645, Oct. 10. Sir Henry Tichborne (Lord Justice of Ireland), certifies about some rye provided for the army at Dublin, and alleged to be sold by order of Sir P. Percival, kt., a Commissary General for the victual.

1645, Dec. 4, Culhampton. Sir Hardress Waller to Sir Philip Percival.—Sir William Fenton surprised me like one of Job's messengers, setting forth that all was lost if there could not be money and provisions got without sending to London, which the haste would not admit; and this desperate disease drove me to try the affections of some of the prime movers of this army . . .

. . . and they exerted themselves for our instant relief, despatching him personally away with 1,000l. in money, 50 tons of victuals from Lyme, as much from Bristol, and a very worthy person, a Com. of Parliament, sent into Wales to send such provisions from thence as they proffered our general for the supply of this army, which we shall not yet proclaim at London for fear of stopping supplies from thence, which do not seem to be over hasty. Our general hath been most noble herein, and what Lieut.-General Cromwell did is never to be forgotten.—After noticing the suggestion that he should enter Parliament, the writer says:—"Tis certain our greatest hope for Ireland is from the army, about which I have had many free and serious discourses with Lieut.-General Cromwell, whose spirit leads much that way, especially for the support of Munster, and to begin the war there, which, were he sent over, I should look upon the work as done; and therefore offer it to you as a matter very serious whether we should not all petition to have him our Deputy: only first enquire of Sir William Waller upon my score, whether there be any thing in motion or thought touching him for that business."

1645, Dec. 8. [Cosen L.] to Sir P. Percival. Here arrived at Carlingford the Lord Digby and Col. Marmaduke Langdale, and many other Commanders from the Isle of Man, and, as I hear, many more yet remain in that isle The British armies of Ulster about 6 weeks since went into Connaught, and there at Sligo killed about 1,000 or 1,200 of the Irish, with their Titular the great Archbishop of Tuam, who was President of Connaught for the Irish, with two of his chaplains: and since, Sir Charles Coote has taken 18 several castles and garrisons from the Irish, and in one of them put 80 to the sword: the Irish have no manner of force to oppose him.

1645, Dec. 9, Cork. Lord Broghill to Sir Philip Percival.—Mentions the Lord President's sudden departure, occasioned by the slow proceedings at London "Truly we are come to the crisis of our disease."—Is sorry that Sir Philip Percival is still persecuted;—thinks he has stopped one of the enemies.—Lord Ormond has declared himself publicly for the rogues.

1645, Dec. 22, Dublin. N. Loftus to [Sir P. Percival]. It is indorsed "Nich. Lo., 25 March 1646, with letters to Jeph. Temp., and Cromwell."—The Earl of Glamorgan was yesterday committed by the Lord Lieutenant and Council of Dublin for concluding a peace with the Irish without the State, and pretending a Commission from the King for it, which Lord Digby here doth protest against and if any such be, it was ill-gotten and without the King's knowledge. For ought I see, Glamorgan is like to suffer for his actions, and his intended peace is like to come to nothing; and I believe those men that were to be sent from England now, on his committal, will hardly be sent away. I doubt not the Articles and his pretended Commission are long ere this in London, being sent thither by Sir Robert Kinge, where you will at large see all for which the Earl stands committed;—for this business alters the whole design of the Irish, and Plunkett and Browne being at this present in town here, on the committal of the Earl, were presently ready to be gone for fear, but as yet they are here. . . . The Lord Lieutenant and Council do carry all things for the preservation of the Protestants.

1645, Dec. Copy of Lord Inchiquin's first proposition to the Committee. (5 pp.) Begins, Being directed by this honourable House of Commons to give an account unto this honourable Committee of the affairs in the Province of Munster.

1645, Dec. 22. Sir P. Percival to Sir H. Waller. (Draft letter.) Thinks his attendance in London will be beneficial.—Compliments for the supplies sent by Sir William Fenton and others.—Had an hour's talk with Sir W. Waller, who said he had had so many discouragements heretofore when he was near at hand that he can not think of being again engaged in like kind, although he wishes as well to the cause as any man. . . The truth is, the Scots had (till of late) a pretence to that command, and therefore it is conceived that it would not be conferred on him if he should desire it. Above 10 days ago Lord Lisle was named publicly in the House (by Sir John Evelyn) as a person fit for that place . . . There was also a Petition about that time privately to desire that your friend there might be designed for that service, as the [n] in the expedition, and it was stayed for some reason.—(There is a P.S. dated the 24th.)

1645, Jan. 14, Dublin. Nich. Loftus to Sir Philip Percival.—Mentions his brother Sir Adam Loftus, the Treasurer-at-War for Ireland.—This day the cessation is proclaimed for a month longer, to the 17th of Feb. next. . . The commitment of the Earl of Glamorgan has stumbled business here very much, and breeds a great stir and amazement among the Irish. The causes are in brief, 1st, a pretended Commission which he said he had; he concluded a peace with the Irish, and therein gave them all the churches and all the church lands, tenements, and hereditaments, with all the tithes to the Popish clergy, except only such as are now in the actual possession of the Protestants, which you know is very little; and if we had a peace it were to no purpose, for no wise man would take any benefit by it; and if he should he would hazard his life, as you may perceive by the most cruel act of the rebels now in this time of cessation committed on John Joyce, at Wicklow, viz. [a blot.] Wicklow Castle, the only strong place the king had in Wicklow, was, during the cessation, in the care of J. Joyce, Vice-Constable, and three men. One evening of the 29 Dec. 1645, they were bringing in the cattle; a number of the rebels got in with them, killed all the people, 4 men and women and a boy, with lots of stubble; carried off everything; tried to burn the bodies.—The Titular Vicar would not allow their burial in the churchyard.—Lord Digby protests against Lord Glamorgan, who stands stiffly to what he has done.

Copy of particulars of some charges against Sir Philip Percival by Sir John Temple and his adherents. Four short charges, and notes of evidence, rebutted in the margin.

1645, Feb. 12, Head-quarters. Sir H. Waller to Sir P. Percival. . . . As for the business of Ireland. I can only say that my spirits are something fallen in that business of late; because I do not hear the work is like to be carried on by such as carry a two-edged sword in their hearts as well as that in their hands; and for our affairs here in the west, which I ever esteemed our nearest way into Munster, the General leaves us with a good part of our army to go forward in the works he first engaged me, the distrusting of Exeter, to which purpose I have now advanced my quarters to within twice musket shot of the town, so as now to keep one another in perpetual action, and if the regiments come in to me as they have promised and undertaken to the General, I shall have 8 regiments of foot, and not doubt to give a good account of the place in convenient time, it being as strong as works can make it, and I believe abundantly victualled. The General within 2 or 3 days advances with a gallant body towards Barnstable where the enemy now is drawn near together in those parts, being able at the most to make up 2,000 foot and not 3,000 horse.

Draft letter by Sir P. Percival to Col. Jephson.

1645, last of Feb. Col. William Kingsmill deposes that the officers and soldiers of the King's army that came out of Ireland, that the intent of the King's party was (after a peace or accommodation obtained here) to prosecute the war of Ireland effectually;—and hearing that Sir P. Percival was, by command, employed as a Commissioner in the Treaty of Peace at Oxford, Simon Bridges, the major of the horse of the Prince of Wales, and myself, being major of the foot of the Duke of York, and others, did about and after 1644 repair to Oxford to the said Sir Philip Percival, and he declared to us at several times that he found the Commissioners and agents of the Irish well accommodated, favoured, and credited at Court, and the treaty so unequally carried that the Commissioners and agents for the Protestants could not get sufficient hearing; that the Act of Parliament for the Adventurers for subduing rebels was undervalued and laid aside, and a new Parliament for Ireland likely to be called, which must needs consist for the most part of rebels themselves; so that there was no possibility that the peace, if it should proceed, could render any security to the Protestant party; and that he had done his best endeavour to prevent it; wherefore the said Major Bridges and myself and many other officers and soldiers resolved to quit our service on that side, and adventure the sacrificing our lives in Ireland where we had lost our estates and fortunes, and accordingly many of us did (with the first opportunity) put the same in execution.

Same date. A similar certificate by Lord Inchiquin.

COPIES OF LETTERS OF GEORGE BERKELEY, AFTERWARDS DEAN OF DERRY AND BISHOP OF CLOYNE, TO SIR J. PERCIVAL.

1709, Sept. 22, Trinity College, Dublin.—Is sorry to hear that P. has lost the statues, medals, &c., that he had coming from Italy, but almost doubts if it is to be reckoned a loss, as the neighbours in the county of Cork would not relish them.—Remarks that P. seems to prefer improving himself by conversation before private study.

1709, Oct. 21, T. C. D.—Sir John having referred B. to Higden's View of the English Constitution, B. says that he agrees with Higden's approval of swearing allegiance to the King de facto. . . . Dr. Lambert* has lately published a defence of his letter: it has the character of being smooth and trifling. (2½ pp.)

1709, Dec. 27, T. C. D.—Reflections on Socrates, whom B. thinks "the best, and most admirable man that the heathen world produced." . . . Remarks on Whiston's notion that "adoration and prayer are not due to the Son and Holy Ghost, though he acknowledges their divinity. . . . Thinks that Whiston's large family are to be pitied, but not Whiston." (3½ pp.)

1710, March 1, T. C. D. The controversy occasioned by Mr. Boyle's sermon against Episcopacy is not yet ended. I hear he has a volume of above 60 sheets ready for the press.—B. sends Sir John a copy of his Treatise on Vision, and comments a little upon it. . . . Notices the Archbishop of Dublin's sermon denying that there was any more goodness or understanding in God than there were feet or hands. . . . Says that he had written to Mr. Clerke (Clarke) to give his thoughts on the subject of God's existence, but got no answer.

1710, June 29, T. C. D.—Congratulations on Sir John Percival's marriage. Asks him to present to Lord Pembroke a copy of the book which he (Berkeley) had dedicated to him.

1710, July 29, T. C. D. . . . Asks Sir John Percival to get opinions on his (Berkeley's) book.

1710, Sept. 6, T. C. D. . . . Is vexed at people's unfavourable view of his book.—Defends the book.—Tells how a drunken fellow made him pledge Dr. Sacheverell's health, in brandy, in a coffee room.—Does not wish to be thought an admirer of the Doctor. (5 pp.)

1710, Oct. 30, London. Sir John Percival to Berkeley. Dr. Clarke and Mr. Whiston have read Berkeley's book, and think him a fairer arguer and a clear writer, but say that the first principles he lays down are false.

1710, Dec. 20, Rathmore. G. Berkeley to Sir John Percival. . . . Thanks for presenting the book to Lord Pembroke. . . . Is at Mr. Blithe's house, co. Meath.—The printing trade is very flourishing in Ireland.

1710, Dec. 28, London. Sir J. P. to Geo. Berkeley.

* Ralph Lambert, afterwards Dean of Down, and afterwards made Bishop of Down 1717. In 1727 he was made Bishop of Meath, and he died in 1732.

EARL OF EGMONT.

EARL OF DUMFRIES

Says that Lord Pembroke thinks Berkeley an ingenious man and to be encouraged, but cannot believe in the non-existence of matter. . . . Again alludes to Dr. Clarke and Mr. Whiston.

1711, January 19, T. C. D. Geo. Berkeley to Sir John Percival.—Is just returned from the county of Meath. . . . Expresses his surprise at Dr. Clarke refusing to show where his (Berkeley's) error lies.

1710, Feb. 13, T. C. D. George Berkeley to Sir J. P. Sends a letter for Lord Pembroke. . . . There is a report that the plague is landed in Ireland.

1710, March 6, T. C. D. George Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Congratulates on Sir John having a son.—Asks him to read Locke's book on Education.

1711, June 3, T. C. D. George Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Thinks that if some Irish gentleman of good fortunes and generous inclinations would constantly reside in England, there to watch for the interest of their own country, they might at such conjectures (conjunctures?) bring it far greater advantage than they could by spending their incomes at home.

1712, May 17 and June 5, T. C. D. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P. Two letters about Sir John's little son.

1712, Aug. 18, T. C. D. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—About reports of war, and on politics.—“Lord Bolingbroke is expected suddenly from France, whither I suppose you know he lately went along with Mr. Prior.”—“Other day two malefactors were publicly pelted and afterwards burnt alive in Felster's shop, for having offered some affront to the memory of King William. . . . He gives an account of Sir John's children.

1713, January 26, London. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Gives an account of his journey from Dublin; and tells his impressions of England and London.—Says that Mr. Clerke went with him to Mr. Southwell, who introduced him to Lord Pembroke. “There is lately published a bold and pernicious book, a Discourse on Freethinking. I hear the printer of it is put into Newgate, as is likewise a woman for selling a ballad on the Duke ‘D'Aumont as being a wine merchant.’” The Provost and Mr. Molineux told him that Mr. Tickel, a fellow of Oxford, author of the poem on the approaching peace, told them of an oak in a forest of Hampshire which buds and shoots forth leaves every Christmas day. A year or two ago Tickel went himself. He saw it in a light night about two hours before day, at which time it had not the appearance of bud or leaf, but when day came was covered with both; several of the leaves were as large as a sixpence, and he carried them to Oxford where above 40 persons saw them, one of whom confirmed the story.—Berkeley has called on Steele, who desired to be acquainted with him. Steele was writing a play. Berkeley proposes no small satisfaction in the conversation of Steele and his friends.

1713, Feb. 23, London. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P. This night Mr. Bligh is to have a ball at the late Duke of Hamilton's house in St. James' Square. . . . Mr. Addison and Mr. Steele (and so far as I can find, the rest of that party) seem entirely persuaded there is a design for bringing in the Pretender. They think everything looks that way, and particularly three of the best Papist officers, Lt.-General Mackoni, Major-Gen. Laules, and Brigadier Skelton, being now all in London. Laules, Mr. Addison assured me, was discoursed by an officer at the Queen's birth-night; . . . all these are Irish that have followed the fortunes of King James. . . . I have heard . . . that the Duke of Berwick's aunt was known to say that her nephew would soon be in London. . . . The value you have always shown for the Spectator makes me . . . tell you that by his mother-in-law's death he is come into an estate of 500*l.* a year; the same day his wife was brought to bed of a son.—Remarks on Steele's fondness for his wife.—I told Mr. Steele if he neglects to resume his writings the world will look on it as the effect of his growing rich; but he says this addition to his fortune will rather encourage him to exert himself more than ever.—Says that he dines frequently with Steele at his house in Bloomsbury Square, and speaks of his good house, table, servants, coach, &c. “Somebody had given him my Treatise of the Principles of Human Knowledge, and that was the ground of his inclination to my acquaintance.”

1713, March 7, London. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—At Mr. Bligh's ball, the Marlborough family being there disgraced him with the Tories his friends at the Cocoa Tree, whither he constantly goes. And soon after it there was an advertisement published in one of the printed papers that the Duchess of Marlborough had left 100 guineas to be laid out in a ball at Duke Hamilton's house as a triumph over his Grace's memory.

This affront, which robbed him of the glory of his ball, could not but be uneasy to Mr. Bligh. Dr. Swift (whom I met by chance at my Lord Pembroke's two nights ago) told me Mr. Bligh had applied to the author of the Post Boy to publish a contradiction to his former advertisement, but that he refusing to do it without the Duchess of Hamilton's consent, Mr. Bligh prevailed with Dr. Swift to introduce him to the Duchess in order to obtain it. But her Grace being a smart woman, and the Doctor (as he says himself) very ill-naturedly taking part with her against Mr. Bligh, they proved to him the unreasonableness of his request, and sent him away in no small confusion. . . . It is reported that we shall have peace proclaimed this week. . . . You will soon hear of Mr. Steel under the character of the Guardian; he designs his paper shall come out every day as the Spectator. He is likewise projecting a noble entertainment for persons of a refined taste. It is chiefly to consist of the finest pieces of eloquence translated from the Greek and Latin authors; they will be accompanied by the best music suited to raise those passions that are suited to the occasion. Pieces of poetry too will be there recited. These informations I have from Mr. Steel himself. I have seen the place designed for these performances. It is in York Buildings, and he has been at no small expense to embellish it with all imaginable decorations. It is the finest chamber I have seen, and will contain seats for a select company of two (200?) persons of the best quality and taste who are to be subscribers. I had last night a very ingenious new poem upon Windsor Forest given me by the author, Mr. Pope. The gentleman is a Papist, but a man of excellent wit and learning, and one of those Mr. Steel mentions in his last paper as having writ some of the Spectator.

1713, March 27, London. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Praises Steele.—Mr. Addison has the same talents in a high degree, and is likewise a great philosopher, having applied himself to the speculative studies more than any of the wits that I know.—Those gentlemen's apprehensions are all over.—Mr. Steele having told me that he now imagines my Lord Treasurer has no design of bringing in the Pretender, and that in case he had, he is persuaded he could never perform it.—I breakfasted with Mr. Addison at Dr. Swift's lodgings. His coming in while I was there, and the good temper he shewed was construed by me as a sign of an approaching coalition of parties. Mr. Addison being more earnest in the Whig cause than Mr. Steele (the former having quitted an employment rather than hold it under the Tories, which by a little compliance he might have done), and there having passed a coldness, if not a direct breach between those two gentlemen and Dr. Swift on the score of politics. Dr. Swift's will (wit?) is admired by both of them, and indeed by his greatest enemies, and if I were not afraid of disobliging my lady and Mrs. Parker, I should tell you that I think him one of the best natured and agreeable men in the world. Mr. Steele's entertainment at York Buildings only waits the finishing of two pictures, the one of Truth, and the other of Eloquence. . . . He tells me he had some discourse with the Lord Treasurer relating to it, and talks as if he would engage my Lord Treasurer in his project, designing that it shall comprehend both Whigs and Tories. A play of Mr. Steele's which was expected, he has now put off till next winter. But Cato, a most noble play of Mr. Addison, and the only one he writ, is to be acted in Easter week: . . . he designs to give the profits to the actors.

1713, April 16, London. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P. . . . A person well acquainted with all the Ministers and with Lady Masham declares to me that he never heard the least expression drop from any of them (and he makes one in almost all their parties of private meetings) that looked like an inclination to the Pretender. On Tuesday last Cato was acted the first time.—I was present with Mr. Addison and two or three more friends in a side box where we had a table and two or three flasks of Burgundy and Champagne, with which the author (who is a very sober man) thought it necessary to support his spirits. . . . and indeed it was a pleasant refreshment to us all between the acts. . . . Some parts of the prologue, written by Mr. Pope, a Tory and even a Papist, were hissed, being thought to savour of Whiggism, but the clap got much the hiss. Lord Harley, who sat in the next box to us, was observed to clap as loud as any in the house all the time of the play. . . . This day I dined at Dr. Arbuthnot's lodging in the Queen's Palace.—Berkeley then mentions a project of the King of France to form a company to import 60,000 head of black cattle; but as they are chiefly to come from Ireland, Berkeley thinks it will be prejudicial to the Queen and to Ireland.—Dr. Arbuthnot is the first proselyte I have made of the treatise I came over to print, which will be soon published. His wit you have an instance of in the Art of Political Lying, and in the tracts of John Bull, of which he is the author. He is the Queen's domestic physician, and in great esteem with the whole Court, a great philosopher, and reckoned the first mathematician of the age, and has the character of uncommon virtue and probity.

1713, May 7, London. G. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—About the success of Addison's play.—They have acted it now almost a month, and would, I believe, a month longer, but that Mrs. Oldfield can not hold out any longer, having had for several nights past, as I am informed, a midwife behind the scenes, which is surely very unbecoming the character of Cato's daughter. . . . The very day peace was proclaimed, instead of associating with the Tories, I dined with several of the other party at Dr. Garth's where we drank the Duke of Marlborough's health, though they had not the heart to speak one word against the peace. Indeed the spirit of the Whigs seems quite broken. . . .

1713, May 14, Dublin. Sir John Percival to George Berkeley.—I hear your book new is printed though not yet published, and that your opinion has gained ground among the learned: that Mr. Addison is come over to you; and now what seemed shocking at first is become so familiar, that others envy you the discovery and make it their own. . . . You have now an opportunity of gratifying one piece of curiosity which I have heard you very inquisitive about: I mean the surprise of a person born blind when made to see. One Grant, an oculist, has put out an advertisement of his art this way, with whom I believe you would find satisfaction in discoursing.

1713, June 2, London. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Mentions a clergyman in Wiltshire having published a treatise wherein he advances something published three years before in his [Berkeley's] treatise concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge. . . . Is very glad to have made Dr. Smalridge's acquaintance. It is doubtful whether he or Atterbury will be Bishop of Rochester. . . . The Scotch are in a great ferment occasioned by the Malt Tax.

1713, July 18, Dublin. Sir J. P. to Geo. Berkeley.—Says that Swift says that Berkeley has not made a convert of Arbuthnot.

1713, July 19, Oxford. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Has been almost a month at Oxford, a most delightful place.—Grand performances at the theatre, and great concourse from London and the country, amongst whom were several foreigners, particularly about 30 Frenchmen of the Ambassador's company who, as is reported, were all robbed by a single highwayman.

1713, Aug. 7, Oxford. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. Dr. Arbuthnot's difference with Berkeley is only concerning some notions relating to the necessity of the laws of nature, and not regarding the non-existence of matter.

1713, Aug. 27, London. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Two or three nights since Mr. Bligh was married to Lady Theodosia Hide, daughter of the Earl of Clarendon.

1713, Oct. 2, London. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. Mr. Steele having laid down his employment, because, as he says he would not be obliged to those to whom he could not be grateful, has of late turned his head towards politics and published a pamphlet in relation to Dunkirk.

1713, Oct. 15, London. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. . . . I am on the eve of going to Sicily as chaplain to Lord Peterborough, who is Ambassador Extraordinary (on the coronation of the new King).

1713, Nov. 24, Paris. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. He left London on the 25th of Oct., O.S.—Gives an account of his journey.—The Abbé D'Aubigné is to introduce him to Mallebranche.

1713, Dec. 28, Lyons. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. Account of the fête on the occasion of the King's statue being set up.—Account of the town.

1714, Feb. 4, N.S., Genoa. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. Says that he stayed a month at Paris, eight at Lyons, and eleven at Turin, and that he now has been almost three weeks at Genoa.—Describes Genoa.—Says that the clergy are very ignorant; they shewed him in the library of the Franciscans of the town a Hebrew Bible, taking it to be an English one.—Lord Peterborough arrived about a week since.

1714, Feb. 19, Leghorn. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Lord Peterborough would not wait the arrival of his equipage, but left ten days ago on a Maltese vessel bound to Palermo on which he will stay a short time, and will put off his public entrance. He took but two or three servants. . . . The Secretary is an Italian. There are no less than nine different natives among my lord's domesticks.

1714, April 8, London. Sir J. P. to Geo. Berkeley.—Says that in a gallery belonging to a convent (he thinks of Austin Friars) one of their orders showed him a head of Friar Bacon, and said he was one of the most eminent Reformers under Henry the 8th. . . . There is an outcry on the Ministry that they design to bring in the Pretender.

1714, May 1, Leghorn. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P.—Has seen Pisa, Lucca, Pistoria, Florence, &c. Prefers England or Ireland. The only advantage is in point of air. . . . The people here are much dissatisfied with the hard government of the Grand Duke.

1714, July 13, Paris. Geo. Berkeley to Sir J. P. I parted from Lord Peterborough at Genoa, where I embarked with Mr. Molesworth, the late Envoy at Florence, and the Colonel, his brother, and have had a very pleasant journey with them to Paris, where I came about three days ago. My lord took post for Turin, and thence designed passing over the Alps, and so through Savoy and Turin on his way to England.

1715, July 6, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival.—He thinks people are tired of baiting one another, and that the spirit of party begins to cool.

1715, July 23, Flaxley. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—I have now spent a fortnight in Gloucestershire, and propose going to London next week.—Riots in the neighbouring counties, Worcester, Stafford, &c.—He gives from the report of a servant of a house where he was, an account of riots at Birmingham. Berkeley says the report is that the riots are got up by the Whigs to ruin the Tory party.

(Lord Percival, in reply, says that the rebellion is got up by the Tories.)

1715, Aug. 9, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. . . . The Highgate cobbler was whipped on Thursday, and a mob of several thousands threatened to pull the executioner to pieces if he did not perform his office gently. I hear that Lord Peterborough left the kingdom on Friday last with the King's pass. I do not know the occasion, having had no discourse with his Lordship since my coming to town. On the same day Articles were presented in the House of Commons against the Duke of Ormond. Berkeley was in the House during great part of the debate. . . . He says he cannot well leave for Ireland before next month.

1715, Aug. 18, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. A report of the French king's death. The rumour of an invasion by the Pretender is accredited more than ever.

1715, Sept. 8, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—Berkeley tells about the committal to Newgate of Col. Paul of the Guards, for attempting to debauch them in favour of the Pretender.—Further allusions to tampering with the soldiers.—“About a fortnight ago as I walked through St. James's Park there was an odd looking man in close conference with one of the centinels; I heard him mention the words hereditary right; and think the entire sentence was, But sure you are for hereditary right. . . . Tomorrow the Duke of Argyle, the Duke of Roxburgh, and Lord Sutherland set out for Scotland. There must have been some pressing reasons for this, it having been much against the inclination and endeavours of the Duke of Argyle. The Bishop of Bristol assured me the other day that the Court expect that the Duke of Orleans would, in case of need, supply them with forces against the Pretender; and I have seen two letters, one from the Duke Regent and the other from the new King of France to the Prince of Wales, containing assurances of friendship and affection.”

1715, Sept. 22, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P., J.P.—Gives reports as to the rebels in Scotland.—Alludes to the unhappy misunderstanding between the Dukes of Marlborough and Argyle. . . . Yesterday Lord Lansdowne and Lord Duplin were seized here. Lord Jersey was likewise sought for, but escaped.

1715, Sept. 26, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—Berkeley thinks bloodshed will be prevented by the discovery the Court has made of the persons and designs of the conspirators. Mr. Harvey of Comb, (a man of 7,000*l.* a year), was taken up and examined. He denied all he was charged with. Lord Townshend produced his own handwriting; he was sent away in custody of a messenger, and stabbed himself with a penknife in three places. Lord Nottingham, his uncle, was with him today; it is thought he will die. Sir W. Windham made his escape from a messenger. Rumour of a warrant against the Bishop of Rochester. Lord Duplin is in the hands of a messenger. Lord Lansdowne is in the Tower. The last advices from Lord Stair are that the Pretender is still at Bar-le-Duc.

1715, Oct. 20, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—Retracts his opinion that there was no more to fear from the intended invasion. . . . The rebels in Northumberland are said to be 2,000, and it is not doubted as many more passed the Forth under General Hamilton. The Court indeed gives them out to be 1,000 only.—Sir W. Wyndham's committal to the Tower is resented, I know not why, by the old Duke of Somerset, his father-in-law.

1715, Nov. 3, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. The Duke of Ormond is gone back to France, having lain one night at one Cory's in Devonshire. Lord Stair has sent to the Court a letter intercepted from him to the Pretender. . . . The forces under Lord Mar, no doubt, will languish and disperse in a little time. To do Lord Peterborough justice this was the opinion he always declared himself to have of the rebels and their projects. Dr. Friend who got the 20,000*l.* prize in the Lottery, is disposed to give up a living in the presentation of his Lordship. By what I heard he will resign it in a few months, in which case it may be worth my acceptance.

1715, Nov. 17, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. Congratulations on the victory at Preston.

1716, May, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. Is like soon to go to Ireland, the Prince having recommended him to the Lords Justices to succeed Charles Carr in the living of St. Paul's, in Dublin. The letter from the Prince is inclosed and seconded by Mr. Secretary Stanhope, so that, I think, it cannot fail of success. The living is reckoned to be worth about 100*l.* a year, but I put the greater value on it because it is consistent with my Fellowship.

1716, May 26, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. I beg the favour of you to write a letter to the Duke of Grafton imparting you are acquainted with me, and your conviction of my being well affected to H. M. Government. . . . I make this request because I have some reason to think that my competitors have wronged my character on the other side of the water. The Government of Ireland have yet made no answer to the recommendation of the Prince and Secretary Stanhope . . . and I am solicitous to have my character cleared to the Lords Justices.

On the 28th of May Lord P. wrote to the Duke of Grafton in favour of Berkeley.

1716, June 1, Charles Dering writes from Dublin that he doubts Berkeley's success, as the Lords Justices have made a strong representation against him.

1716, Nov. 24, N.S., Turin. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—I did not think it prudent to write reflections of the state of France while I was in it. . . . It is in a very bad condition. The Regent is generally disliked by the people, and his alliance with England has perhaps contributed to make him so. . . . We travel with all the ease and convenience possible. Mr. Ashe is a modest, ingenious, well-natured young gentleman. . . . We have unlimited letters of credit. . . . A very bad passage over Mount Cenis. Berkeley says that they let him fall six or seven times, and thrice on the brink of precipices. . . . He saw two avalanches. . . . A large wolf threatened them. They propose to take Milan, Parma, Modena, Bologna, Florence, Siena, Rome, &c.

1716, March 1, Rome. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—He mentions a picture in the gallery of the Great Duke of Parma, at Parma, the original of Lord Percival's Danae, which is esteemed one of the finest pieces that Titian ever did. . . . He intends to go to Naples as soon as possible. "I have got eyes but no ears. I would say that I am a judge of painting tho' not of musick. Give me leave to inform you of a piece of secret history that I learnt the other night from one who I doubt not knew the truth, and I have reason to think told it me. In England there are now 700 clergymen, in all, of the Church of Rome, of which 100 Jesuits, 300 priests, and the rest friars of several orders. In Wales 50 clergy, in the West 10, in the North 200. In London and the environs 150, of which in London 20 Jesuits, 10 Benedictines, 5 Capuchins, 3 Carmelites. The priests have at least 8,000*l.* a year terra firma in England (some say 30,000*l.*). The secular priests have 3,000*l.* per ann. The number of Papists in England is 70,000.

1717, April 6, Naples. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. He is enthusiastic on Naples. The nobility admit strangers freely to their entertainments; but he says they are not the politest people in the world.

1717, Sept., N.S., Testaccio, in the island of Inorine. —Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—They have been there three months in Inorine (more vulgarly called Ischia). The soil is very fertile. The people have got an ugly habit of murdering one another for trifles. Last year 36 murders were compounded for by the Governor; the life of a man being valued at 10 ducats.

1718, April 26, Rome. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P.—In the functions of the Holy Week were several of the nobility and gentry of Great Britain, enough to fill two coffee-houses. The well-affected meet in that in the Piazza d'Espagna, and the rebels have another part to themselves. Among the latter are Lords Mar, Southesk, &c.

1718, July 28, Rome. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. . . . In architecture the old Romans were inferior to the Greeks, and the moderns fall infinitely short of both in grandeur and simplicity of taste.—(In this letter Berkeley mentions that Mr. George Ashe is with him, and that he has brought prints and books for Lord Percival and Lord Pembroke.)

1718, Nov. 13, Rome. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. . . . The Pretender is hourly expected in that city, where he designs to make his residence. The greatest part of his followers are already come, and swarm in all public places. . . . Says that he sends some terra-cotta busts cast from the antique.

1720, July $\frac{9}{20}$, N.S., Florence. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. About medals, marbles, casts, and prints for Lord P.

1721, Oct. 12, Trinity College.—Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. I have now been a month in Ireland without writing to your Lordship. . . . I no sooner set foot on shore than I heard that the deanery of Dromore was vacant, with about 500*l.* a year, and a sinecure, which circumstance recommends it to me beyond any preference in the kingdom, tho' there are some deaneries of twice that value.—He says that he applied to the Duke [i.e., the Duke of Grafton, the Lord Lieutenant,] but was put off civilly:—that the Duchess was very civil, and so was Mrs. Fairfax.

(In an answer to the above, Lord P. said that he thought that the Duke delaying the disposal of it until the recess was a good sign for Berkeley.)

1721, Oct. 23, Trinity College. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. Asks for a copy of Lord Percival's paper on Banks.

1721, [December], Trinity College. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. Thanks for Lord Percival's paper on Banks. The deanery is still in suspense. Three days hence they are to entertain the Duke of Grafton at the College, and Berkeley is to make the Latin speech.

1721, Jan. 9, Trinity College. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. . . . There are vacant, besides the bishoprick of Leighlin and Ferns, the Deaneries of Down, Dromore, Limerick, and Cork, and also some smaller benefices. I applied at first for that of Dromore, and have not since altered my application; the bishoprick and rich deanery of Down being above my desires and the others below them.—He says that he sees the Duke and Duchess every ten days.—Mentions the death of Mr. Ashe at Brussels.

1721, Feb. 10, Trinity College.—My patent is now passing the seals for the deanery of Dromore.*

1721, Feb. 13, Trinity College.—He congratulates Lord Percival on the birth of a son.

1721, March 15, Trinity College.—Says that he has been allowed 50*l.* Concordatum money to carry on the suit with the Bishop of Dromore. He (Berkeley) employs 8 lawyers, and is assured that the expense will be several hundreds, and against one in the possession of the deanery and who has been practised in law suits for 25 years. The Chantership of Christ Church is vacant by the death of the Dean of Armagh [Dr. Drelingcourt], and is said to be worth somewhat more than 100*l.* a year. Berkeley asks for it, as it will enable him to carry on the suit.

(Lord Percival writes that he saw the Duke of Grafton about the matter, who said that Berkeley should be supplied by Concordatum money as he wanted it, but that the Chantership must go another way.)

1722, April 14, Trinity College. Berkeley's lawyers are six counsellors, two attorneys, and a civilian (naming them). The cause is a great cause, and he is told that fewer would not do. Is informed that his adversary has as many. He is to proceed by Quare Impedit, and serve the Bishop and Dr. Lesley with a writ that week.

1722, July 29, Trinity College.—Mr. Conolly is building a stone house at Castletown, 142 feet by 60, and 70 feet high. On Thursday the King's equestrian statue is to be uncovered. Berkeley wrote the Latin inscription. Hopes to cut short his law suit by a project contained in the enclosed, which he asks Lord Percival to seal and send to Mr. Molinex.

1722, Sept. 7, Trinity College.—Berkeley thinks he can only get the deanery by Dean Lesley being made a Bishop.—“We are much alarmed here by the seizing of “the Bishop of Rochester [Atterbury]. . . I am sorry “and ashamed to see a Protestant Bishop accused of “so foul a conspiracy.”

1722, Oct. [], Trinity College.—Bolton, Dean of Derry, lies dangerously ill of a palsy, and past hope of recovery. My friends think that in case of a vacancy I may have some pretensions to my Lord Lieutenant's favour, especially if his Grace shall not think fit to recommend my adversary to a bishoprick, without which I have little or no prospect of succeeding to the deanery of Down (Dromore?). As to Mr. Payzant's copying out of our library, it is at present so old and ruinous, and the books so out of order, that there is little attendance given; besides, it is unusual for strangers to be admitted to copy in it. . . . Berkeley offers to borrow himself and let Mr. Payzant have the books to copy.

1722, Dec. 16, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. at Bath.—Says that he came to London partly to see friends and partly to inform himself on some points of law which are not so well known in Ireland. He was nearly lost in crossing over.

1723, March 4, London. It is now about 10 months since I have determined to spend the residue of my days in Bermuda, where, I trust in Providence, I may be the mean instrument of doing great good to mankind. . . . The reformation of manners among the English in our western plantations, and the propagation of the Gospel among the American savages, are two points of high moment. The natural way of doing this is by founding a college or seminary in some convenient part of the West Indies where the English youth of our plantations may be educated in such sort as to supply their churches with pastors of good morals and good learning; a thing (God knows) much wanted.—Berkeley then goes on to state the proposed course of education of the youths in the college; and gives, in full, his reasons for preferring the group of Bermuda Islands as the seat of the college; dilating on the situation, commerce, climate, produce, security, the simple manners of the people, and the want of enriching commodities which might tempt men from their studies to turn traders. . . . “In case “I carry my deanery (as I have good hopes I shall) I “design to erect a charity school in Dromore, and to “maintain 10 savages and 10 whites in the Bermuda “University. But whatever happens, go I am resolved, “if I live. Half a dozen of the most agreeable and ingenious men in our college are with me in this project; “and since I came hither I have got together about a “dozen Englishmen of quality, and gentlemen, who “intend to retire to these islands, to build villas and plant “gardens, &c., &c.”*

1723, June 4, Trinity College. . . . Something that will surprise your Lordship as much as it doth me. Mrs. Hester van Omry, a lady to whom I was a perfect stranger, having never in the whole course of my life, to my knowledge, exchanged one single word with her, died on Sunday night. Yesterday her will was opened, by which it appears that I am constituted executor, the advantage whereof is computed by those who understand her affairs to be worth 3,000*l.*, and if a suit she had been carried, it will be considerably more. This is only a confused gross reckoning; in a little time I hope to see distinctly into the state of her affairs. . . . I know not what your thoughts are on the long account I sent you from London to Bath of my Bermuda scheme (which is now stronger on my mind than ever, this providential event having made many things easy in my private affairs which were otherwise before). Mr. Moore reports that Lord Percival is afraid of earthquakes at Bermuda. Berkeley asserts that one was never known there.

(On the 30th of June Lord Percival writes and congratulates Berkeley on the legacy. He thinks the Bermuda scheme will not succeed without the protection of Government. In July 1723, Lord Percival was at Spa, and wrote to London for Protestant tracts to dispose among the Protestants of a place three leagues off; and there are several letters about that matter.)

1723, Sept. 19, Trinity College. . . . In my last I gave you an account of a legacy left me by a lady. Since that, looking into her affairs, we find her debts to have been considerably greater than we imagined. I am nevertheless still likely to make 2,000*l.* clear, not reckoning in the law suit depending between the executors and Mrs. Partington. As to my suit about the deanery of Dromore, I despair of seeing it end to my advantage. The deanery of Down is now vacant, but there is such a crowd of competitors for everything, that I cannot promise myself success without such assiduity and attendance as I hardly think it deserves. The truth is, my first purpose of going to Bermuda sets me above soliciting anything with earnestness in this part of the world, which can now be of no use to me, but as it may enable me the better to prosecute that design; and it must be owned that the present possession of something in the Church would make my application for an establishment in those islands more consider'd.—I mean a Charter for a College there, which of all things I desire, as being what would reconcile duty and inclination, making my life at once more useful to the publick and more agreeable to myself than I can possibly expect elsewhere.

(On the 8th of Oct. 1723, Lord Percival, at London, writes to Berkeley recommending him to be more assiduous at Court, and to try hard for the deanery of Down.

On the 9th of Nov. 1723 Philip Percival, at Dublin, wrote to Lord Percival thus, “I believe you are no “stranger to Dr. Berkeley's inclination to Bermuda, “and for want of news I here send you some verses “which a little nymph of about 5 or 6 years old, drest “up all in flowers and myrtle, surprised him with at his “chamber: as she was perfectly unknown to him and “came alone, he had various conjectures in his mind “what this meant; and upon asking her several questions “which she still answered in French, and in ambiguous “terms, he at last began to mistrust it was some French “child designed to be left on his hands, and got his hat “and made the best of his way down stairs. . . .”

“To the Rev. Dr. Berkeley, the humble petition of Anne de la Terre.

Dear Doctor, here comes a young virgin untainted
To your shrine at Bermuda to be marry'd & sainted:
I'm young and I'm soft, and am blooming & tender,
Of all that I have I make you surrender.
My innocence led by the voice of your fame
To your person and virtue must put in its claim;
And now I behold you I truly believe
That you're as like Adam as I am like Eve,
Before the dire Serpent their virtue betray'd,
And made them to fly from the Sun to the shade.
But you, as in you a new race were begun,
Are teaching to fly from the shade to the Sun:
For you in great goodness your friends are persuading
To go and to live & be wise in your Eden.
Oh! let me go with you; Oh! pity my youth,
Oh! take me from hence, let me not lose my truth.
Sure you, who have virtue so much in your mind,
Can't think to leave me, who am Virtue, behind!
If you make me your wife, Sir, in time you may fill a Whole town with our children, and likewise your villa.
I, famous for breeding, you, famous for knowledge,
I'll found a whole nation, you'll found a whole college.
When many long ages in joys we have spent,
Our souls we'll resign with the utmost content,
And gently we'll sink beneath cypress and yew,
You lying by me, and I lying by you.”

1724, May 5, Trinity College. . . . Yesterday I received my Patent for the best deanery in this kingdom, that of Derry. The affair of Dromore is still undecided and likely to be so for some years, but it is now in other hands, God be praised. I have had some powerful competitors, who used many arts to undermine me; but two livings worth 700*l.* per annum happening to fall in the gift of the College, which the House, in order to further my promotion was so kind as to put into the disposal of my Lord Duke, this gave a strong turn in my favour. I am very sensible how much the Duchess hath been my friend, and as sensible how much I am indebted for that to good Lady Percival. The deanery is said to be worth 1,500*l.* per annum; but then there are four curates to be paid, and great charges upon entering, for a large house and offices, first fruits, patent, &c., which will consume the first year's profits, and part of the second. But as I do not consider it with an eye to enriching myself, so I shall be perfectly contented if it facilitates and recommends my scheme of Bermuda, which I am in hopes will meet with a better reception when it comes from one possessed of so great a deanery.

EGMONT.

1724, June 8, Elphin. "I am now on my return from Derry, where I have taken possession of my deanery, and farmed out my lands for 1,250*l.* a year. I am assured they are worth 200*l.* per annum more; but, &c." . . . Berkeley then describes and praises Londonderry, and says that the walls with walks round planted with trees are like those of Padua.—"My house is a fashionable thing, not five years old, and cost 1,100*l.* The corporation are all good churchmen, a civil people, thro'out English, being a colony from London. I have hardly seen a more agreeable situation; . . . much gusto grande in the laying out this whole country, which recalls to mind many prospects of Naples and Sicily. After all, I may chance not to be two pence the richer for this preferment; for by the time I have paid for the house and first fruits, I hope I shall have brought the Bermuda project to an issue, which, God willing, is to be my employment this winter in London."

1724, Sept. 9, Trinity College.—He is at ease from a cruel periodical cholick, which seized him after his return from Derry. The loss of 36 oz. of blood and about a dozen purgings and vomitings brought him to a weak state. . . . He proposes to go to England.

(On the 19 Jan. 1723, Philip Percival, at Dublin, wrote to Lord Percival that sometime since he had a letter of Dr. Berkeley, in which he gave an account that his intended scheme for Bermuda met with great approbation and would certainly succeed to his wish. The writer asks for Lord Percival's opinion.—On Feb. 6, Lord Percival answers that he approves the design and intends to give 200*l.*; he says that Berkeley's pamphlet has appeared. He lauds the climate of Bermuda, and thinks that Lady Percival and he may some day go. "The Dean is now busy in getting out his Charter, and intends, when all things are prepared, to set out April come twelvemonth. . . . The scheme meets with encouragement from all sorts of people."

1725, Dec. 28, London.—G. Berkeley to Lord Percival. Thanks for an elegant and suitable present from Lord Percival.*—He says that a pint of good French coffee is good for the cholick. . . .

"My long stay in town and great hurry of business had made fresh air and exercise necessary for my health. In this view I set out in September on a journey through eight or nine counties of England. I never travelled in worse roads or worse weather; so that all the advantage I got must be imputed to the motion. . . . For Bermuda, the subscriptions amount to 3,400*l.*, tho' the town has been very thin ever since I obtained the Charter. On the meeting of Parliament I have good hopes of seeing our affair thrive. The deferring of that, and His Majesty's absence, have been such drawbacks that I begin to fear it will not be possible to visit the island this spring."

1725, Feb. 10, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival.—I am now in a great hurry of business preparing an interest in the House of Commons against the introducing my affair of St. Christopher amongst them. . . . I hope it will be soon carried, there being very good interest made among the malcontents, and the Court being quite for it. . . . The subscription amounts to about 4,000*l.* Lord Palmerston is desirous that 900 and odd pounds in his hands should be disposed of to this our College, for breeding up young negroes agreeable to Mr. Delon's will. The trustees for directing the disposal thereof are your Lordship, Dr. Bray, Mr. Hales, his brother, and Mr. Belettha. The majority of these are of Lord Palmerston's mind, and your Lordship's concurrence hath been applied for. You have annexed a poem wrote by a friend of mine, with a view to the scheme. Your Lordship is desired to show it to none but of your family, and allow no copy to be taken of it

1726, May 17, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival. He tells Lord P. that on Wednesday the Commons voted an address to the King to make a grant out of the land at St. Christopher's; it was carried with only two negatives. He is pleased to see it carried contrary to all men's expectation. Wishes that Lord Percival's eldest son might be the first youth to begin with in the College; if not, then Master George. Yesterday the King made a gracious answer.

1726, June 6, Hague.—Lord Percival to Dean Berkeley.—Assurances of friendship.—Congratulations on the success of the scheme.—Last night Mr. Finch, our Ambassador, told me that the Duke of Bourbon had received a message from the King of France, importing that his Majesty had no further occasion for his services.

1726, June 24, London. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival.—Condolence on the death of George (son of Lord Percival). Apologizes for not having paid off 60 guineas which Lord Percival lent him several years ago. "The truth is the effects of Mrs. Van Homrigh are not yet disposed of, nor all her debts paid, there being a suit depending with Mr. Partinton. . . . Moreover, I am obliged to pay about 800*l.* for my deanery house, together with first fruits and other expenses, &c., &c."—Says he is now in a capacity to pay it, and asks where it shall be paid.

1728, Sept. 3, Greenwich. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival. Takes leave before setting sail.—To-morrow we sail down the river. Mr. James and Mr. Dalton go with me; so doth my wife, a daughter of the late Chief Justice Forster, whom I married since I saw your Lordship. I chose her for her qualities of mind and her unaffected inclination to books. She goes with great thankfulness to live a plain farmer's life, and wear stuff of her own spinning. I have presented her with a spinning wheel. Her fortune was 2,000*l.* originally, but travelling and exchange have reduced it to less than 1,500*l.* English money. I have placed that and about 600*l.* of my own in South Sea Annuities.—Says that he makes Lord Percival his attorney to take one journey a year into the City, and that only until he can find means to lay it out to advantage where he is going.—Address to Dean Berkeley, at Rhode Island, near Boston, under cover to Thomas Cashel, Esq., Admiralty Office, London.

1728, Feb. 7, Newport in Rhode Island. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival. . . . We came last from Virginia, where I received many honours from the Governor and the principal inhabitants; the same civil and kind treatment attends us here. We were a long time blundering about the Ocean before we reached Virginia, but our voyage thence hither was as speedy and prosperous as could be wished. Mr. James, who purposes continuing in Virginia 'till spring, and Mr. Dalton who pursued his journey to this place by land, will repent of their choice when they find we arrived so long before them. . . . There is a more probable prospect of doing good here than in any other part of the world; were it in my power I should not demur about situating our College here. But no step can be taken herein without the consent of the Crown, and I shall not apply for that until his Majesty's bounty from St. Christopher's is paid to Dr. Clayton, 'till which time this design should be kept private.—He asks Lord P. that if he travels again he will sell the South Sea Annuities and receive the dividends due, and place all with a banker to Berkeley's order.—Mr. Hoar, of all others, I should choose; but as the contribution money belonging to our College of Bermuda is in his hands, and as I would have my private stock entered in the banker's books under a distinct article as my own money, in order to prevent confusion, I request you to be particular with him on that head, if the money be put into his hands; and you'll be pleased to let me know his partners' names that I may draw in form, for I intend to purchase land in this country. . . . P.S. Since writing, circumstances occurred to make it expedient to draw for money.—He asks Lord P. to sell at once and place the money at a bank.

1729, March 28, Newport. Geo. Berkeley to Lord P. As he does not know whether the former letter arrived he repeats the request about the South Sea Annuities.—The climate of the place is like that of Italy north of Rome, and not quite so cold, though this season has been reckoned colder than ordinary.—He describes the country.—The town is prettily built, contains about 5,000 souls, and has a very fine harbour. The people are industrious, and though less orthodox, I cannot say they have less virtue (I am sure they have more regularity) than those I left in Europe. They are indeed a strange medley of different persuasions, which nevertheless do all agree in one point, viz., that the Church of England is the second best. Mr. Honeyman, the only episcopal clergyman in this island, in whose house

EGMONT.

I now am, is a person of very good sense and great merit.—Berkeley sends remembrances to Courayer.

1729, April 25, London. Lord Percival to Geo. Berkeley. Congratulations on Berkeley's safe arrival in Rhode Island, which he thinks may be a good position for the College, because of the dismal effects of a tempest some months ago in Bermuda.—He sold Berkeley's 2,000*l.* South Sea Annuities for 2,047*l.* 10*s.*, brokerage 2*l.* 10*s.*, and has placed the balance to Berkeley's account with Mr. Benjamin Hoar & Co., who will make a separate article for it; his partners are Henry Hoar and Christopher Arnold. . . . Parliament has called for an account of the lands of St. Christopher sold. . . . Will receive the dividends on the 2,000*l.* after the 23d of May.

1729, June 10, Virginia. J. Byrd to Lord P. About two months ago Dean Berkeley put into this country on his way to Rhode Island, where he is gone to purchase some lands that may supply his intended College with provisions. I had not the pleasure of seeing him by reason his stay was exceeding short. He only dined with the Governor, and went out of town in the evening. However, he visited our College, and was very well pleased with it.—Byrd says that he thinks when Berkeley comes to put his visionary scheme into practice, he will find it no better than a religious frenzy, and thinks the Dean as much a Don Quixote in zeal as that renowned knight was in chivalry.—Is it not a wild undertaking to build a College in a country where there is no bread nor anything fit for the sustenance of men but onions and cabbage. . . . The air is pure, but it is made so by a perpetual succession of storms and hurricanes. When the College is built, where will the Dean find Indians? There are none at Bermuda, nor within 200 leagues of it, upon the continent, and it will need the gift of miracles to persuade them to leave their country and venture themselves on the great ocean on the temptation of being converted.—The only way to get Indians is for the Dean to have the command of half-a-dozen regiments, make a descent on the coast of Florida, and take prisoners. This will be as wise and meritorious as the Holy War used to be of old, and then if those Gentiles will not be converted by fair means, he may take the French way and dragoon them into Christianity.—He thinks the Dean takes wild measures. Rhode Island, where he has gone, being more than as far again from Bermuda as Virginia; land not half so cheap, nor half so good. The climate is so cold that it will not produce Indian corn, the proper food for Indians, and very often not wheat.—Satirical remarks on the Dean.—I wish the good Dean may not find out at last that Waller really kidnapt him over to Bermuda, and that the project he has been drawn into will prove in every part of it poetical.

1729, June 29, London. Lord Percival to Geo. Berkeley.—Has received the interest on the annuities, amounting to 80*l.*, and paid it to Hoar.—“Your purchasing in Rhode Island is no secret, but I was the last to own it: a friend of yours mentioned it at Court to some company, of which I was one, and was more particular in the acres bought and money laid out and profitableness of your bargain than I knew before. The few I have conversed with think Rhode Island a better place than Bermuda to fix the College in; but what prospect there is of getting the 20,000*l.* your friends employed therein know best. . . . I hear you have already preached to the Quakers, and that they came to our church to hear you, acknowledging you to be an inspired man of God, who preach by the Spirit.”

1729, June 27, Rhode Island. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival.—The rumour of war decreasing, and no account being come that the St. Christopher money is yet paid into the Treasury, I think it advisable to let my money remain where it is. In case it is not taken out, I desire it may remain in South Sea Annuities.—I understand that in Ireland they have been told it is my resolution to settle here at all events. This report I am concerned at, and would have it by all means discouraged, for it may give a handle to the Treasury for withholding the 20,000*l.*, and at the same time disgust my associates. The truth is, I am not in my own power, not being at liberty to act without the concurrence, as well of the Ministry, as of my associates. I cannot therefore place the College where I please, and though on some accounts I did, and do still, think it would more probably be attended with success if placed here than in Bermuda, yet if the Government and the gentlemen engaged with me should persist in the old scheme, I am ready to go thither and will do so as soon as I hear the money is received and my associates arrived. . . .

Before I left England I was reduced to a difficult situation. Had I continued there the report would have obtained (which I had found beginning to spread) that I had dropped the design after it had cost me and my friends so much trouble and expense. On the other hand, if I had taken leave of my friends, even those who assisted and approved my undertaking would have condemned my coming abroad before the King's bounty was received. This obliged me to come away in the private manner that I did, and to run the risque of a tedious winter voyage. Nothing less would have convinced the world that I was in earnest, after the report I knew was growing to the contrary.

1729, Aug. 30, Rhode Island. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival. Congratulates Lord Percival on his share in redressing the villainies in the Fleet Prison.—Asks him to rebuy into South Sea Annuities. “Rather than break the 2,000*l.* I have got credit for 600*l.* at the legal interest, which Mr. Prior is to pay out of my deanery. This enables me to perfect the purchase of my land and house in this island, which purchase, in case the College should not go on, will be much to my loss. Land is about 10*l.* an acre.—Uncleared land might be bought for a twentieth of that price, but the clearing is expensive, would require time, and in the interim would produce nothing.” Thinks that if the College be settled it would be well to buy uncleared land as an investment. Complains of Treasury delay in sending the money.—“For the first 3 months I resided at Newport, and preached regularly every Sunday, and many Quakers and other sectaries heard my sermons, in which I treated only those general points agreed by all Christians. But on Whitsunday I could not omit speaking against that spirit of delusion and enthusiasm which misleads these people, and though I did it in the softest manner and with the greatest caution, I found it gave some offence. Till then they almost took me for one of their own, to which my dress, being only a strait-backed black coat without plaits on the sides, or superfluous buttons, did not a little contribute. I live now in the country and preach occasionally, sometimes at Newport, sometimes in the adjacent parts of the continent.”—Says he has not yet been at Boston.

1729, June 27, Rhode Island. Geo. Berkeley to Mr. Newman. That place seems a proper situation for the College, though it must be owned that provisions are neither so plenty nor so cheap as I apprehended. As to the inhabitants, I find them divided in their opinions: those in the country, or, as they are termed here, the men in the woods, being grossly ignorant and uneducated, are not a little alarmed at the coming of strangers, and form many fears and ridiculous conclusions thereupon. The inhabitants of the town of Newport, particularly the churchmen, are much better disposed towards us.—Says he has written to friends in England to get the translation of the College from Bermuda to Rhode Island as soon as the 20,000*l.* are paid.

1729, Dec. 31. Benjamin Hoare to Lord Percival. Says he will let the money be laid out in stock in his (Hoare's) name until the Dean's order is got.

1730, March 29, Rhode Island. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival. We have passed the winter in a profound solitude on my farm in this island, all my companions having been allured 5 or 6 months ago to Boston, the great place of pleasure and resort in these parts, where they still continue. . . . I wait here with all the anxiety that attends suspense, until I know what I can depend upon or what course I am to take. On the one hand, I have no notion that the Court would put what man call a bite upon poor clergymen who depended upon charters, grants, votes, and the like engagements. On the other hand, I see nothing done towards payment of the money.—Says he has hinted by letter to Dr. Clayton to go to the Treasury (with the King's command, sealed with the Broad Seal), and make his demand, that we may obtain at least a public and direct answer from the proper persons. My views are still the same with regard to Bermuda, whither I am ready to set sail as soon as the money is paid.

1730, July 20, Rhode Island. Geo. Berkeley to Lord Percival. Says he has not heard from Dr. Clayton since he was made a Bishop. Asks Lord Percival to give the enclosed letter to Archdeacon Benson, whom he (Berkeley) appoints to take charge of the College affairs, vice the Bishop of Killala.—After all, Bermuda is the proper place, for besides that the 20,000*l.* was granted for that spot, there are other reasons, particularly the extreme dearth of labour and difficulty of getting Indians, the number whereof is very inconsiderable in this part of America, having been consumed by wars and strong liquors As for the rallery of European wits, I should not mind it if I saw my College go on and prosper; but I must own the disappointments I have met with in this particular have nearly touched me, not without affecting my health and spirits. If the founding a College for the spread of religion and learning in America had been a foolish project, it cannot be supposed the Court, the Ministers, and the Parliament would have given such public encouragement to it; and if after all that encouragement they who engaged to endow and protect it let it drop, the disappointment indeed may be to me, but the censure, I think, will light elsewhere.

Adversaria. Four vols., folio, bound in vellum.

Vol. I., pp. 353 and 2 pp. of Index, among the titles of which are Calculations (houses in England, &c.), Canon, Characters (inter alios, Archbishop Tillotson, Duke of Berwick, General Dillon, Dr. Geddes, Lord Howard of Eserick, Lord Ossory, Charles Duke of Shrewsbury, Algernon Sidney, Mr. Collins, Dr. Tindal,) Ceremonies, Christianity, Councils, Dissenters, Eucharist, Heresy, Proverbs, Politicks, and History, Pope's Speeches, &c.

Characters. This morning Mr. Pope (he is a Papist, but I think a candid man) told me that the Duke of Bucks told him several times he thought Tillotson was a Deist, because Tillotson said he thought everyone should, and he would, conform to the religion of the country he was in. Pope also said that the Duke of Shrewsbury told him he was of the same religion he was at 14, and had never altered. Now, he being older than that when Tillotson converted him to the Protestant religion, and dying as he did in the same outward profession, Pope believed he was likewise a Deist.

Lord Ossory.—In the margin: "Of my Lord Ossory, son to the Duke of Ormond, and father to the present, now in rebellion; given by Sir Robert Southwell in 1656. See more in my Biography, vol. 6. p. 245."

Collins is a speculative Atheist, and has been so many years, as he owned to Archibald Hutchinson, Esq., who told it to Dr. Dod, and he to me.

Dr. Tyndal, L.D., now living, 1732. Dr. Dod told me likewise that Dr. Tyndal, L.D., who is in the same College in Oxford with himself, owned to him he is a speculative Atheist. It was he that writ the Rights of the Christian Church.

This volume contains many political, humorous, and amatory poems, some in French.

The writer sometimes states the book whence he derived his information.

Vol. II.—Loose at the beginning is part of an autobiography of Sir John Percival.—The contents of the volume are similar to the contents of Vol. I. There are indices.—Of the "Characters," some are by Sir John Percival, and some ex relatione.

Milton, the poet, died a Papist. Dr. Charlette, Master of University College, Oxford, told me lately at Bath that he remembers to have heard from Dr. Binks that he was at an entertainment in King James' reign, when Sir [Christopher] Milton, one of the Judges and elder brother to the famous Mr. Milton, the poet, was present; that the Judge did then say publicly his brother was a Papist some years before he died, and that he died so.—(p. 287). I am still more persuaded of it from what Dr. English told me that he had often heard Mr. Prior, the poet, say that the late Earl of Dorset told him the same thing.

Selden wrote his book against Tithes, in revenge for "Ignoramus," which ridiculed lawyers.

There are characters of Lord Edward Coke, Sir W. Petty, Sir Robert Southwell, Lord Chief Justice Pratt, Lord Cowper, William Lord Berkeley, living in 1730, Richard Bentley, &c.

Queen Henrietta Maria.—Thomas Carew, Gentleman of the Privy Chamber, going to light King Charles into her chamber, saw Jermyn Lord St. Albans with his arm round her neck;—he stumbled and put out the light;—Jermyn escaped; Carew never told the King, and the King never knew it. The Queen heaped favours on Carew. She quarrelled with Jermyn and tore her will;—after reconciliation she made another will in his favour; he brought it to her to sign; but she being asleep he deferred it till the next morning, when she was found dead of a dose of laudanum she had taken, 1669. My authority is old G. Clarke, Esq., formerly Lord of the Admiralty and Secretary to Prince George of Denmark.

In the year 1657 when my uncle Sir R. Southwell was at Oxford, one Edgerton, six score and 13 years of age, walked from Cheshire thither and beg'd of him an others. Sir Peter Pett had his picture by Fisher.

Vol. III. Similar to the last. The Characters are numerous, two or three hundred. There is a good index.

Nel Gwyn.—Dr. Garth comforted a dying courtesan in despair by telling her on his honour there was neither God nor future state.

Duke of Marlborough (long).

Dr. Hook, Professor of Mathematics, whom I remember well 20 years ago, a little, dirty, grey-headed man, when I first entered a member of the Royal Society: (stories of his avarice).

Oliver Cromwell. A story told by Mrs. Gibbons (aunt of Sir Geoffrey Gilbert, ob. 1726, Chief Baron of England), Housekeeper of Whitehall, of Cromwell praying three quarters of an hour every evening in a room alone.

Characters of Lambert, Steele, Thomas Creech, Lord Bacon (from Sir Simond Dewes life in MS.).—Dr. W. Whiston. He has sometimes access to the Queen, who is generous to him; with her he converses as with others in a very blunt way. She asked him in 1739 what the world said of her, and he replied that she did not mind her prayers.

Characters of Lilburn, Desborow, Calamy, W. and John Fairfax, killed at the siege of Frankendale, Sir H. Sidney (said to be of French extraction).

Vol. IV. Similar to the others. It has a few Lives and Characters, but none original: a few anecdotes and poems. A few extracts from records about Ireland.

Twelve folio volumes of Diaries 1730. Jan. 8 to 174, Aug. 30. They seem to be interesting.

Six large folio volumes containing copies of letters and papers numbered.

Vol. 1, pp. 486.

1618, March 16. Council Order for Mr. Percival in reference to his services in the Court of Wards, Ireland.

1618, March 17. Letter to the Lord Deputy and Council, ordering payment of 40*l.* per ann. to Richard Percival, Esq., for services in the Court of Wards. (He was clerk and registrar of the Commissioners for Wards.)—A few other papers about the Court of Wards.—Others about the Percival's land business in Ireland. The last paper in the vol. is dated 28 Sept. 1641.

Vol. 2, pp. 464. Here are copies of letters by the Lord President and others to Sir Philip Percival, about the rebellion in Ireland. The last is dated 14 January 1644.—At the end is a pedigree from Robert dominus de Breherval et de Ilverio, in Normanniâ, down to John Percival, Lord of Templehouse, a Viscount in 1737, and his children.

Vol. 3, pp. 472. Ends, 25 June 1647.

Vol. 4. Down to p. 127 the papers are temp. Sir R. Percival. Thence to p. 470 are letters to Lady Percival, Mr. John Percival, and others. The last paper is No. 1,229.—pp. 165-8 are torn out.—In 1653 Val. Savage, at Chester, gives a little English news.—1653, Dec. 17, S. Percival writes from London of the inauguration of Oliver Cromwell on the day before.—In 1654 some good passages may be selected.

Two large folio volumes.

Vol. 1, pp. 457. Letters and papers of Sir P. Percival.—p. 123. Sir P. Percival's speech in Parliament in England, touching his actions in Ireland, 5 July 1647.

Papers about the Customs of Dublin.

1646. Many letters by Col. Thomas Pigott.

1646, Nov. 27. Committee of Lords and Commons for Ireland. Resolution for a recruit for Lord Inchiquin.

1646, Sept. 26. Lord Ormond and others to the King: application for troops.

1668. Petition of Robert Southwell to the Lord Deputy and Council of Ireland, for his salary for the Dutch prisoners, and salary as Sub-Commissioner of Prizes.

1674, Sept. 22. Robert Percival to Sir R. Southwell Mr. Thynn and his lady came here (to France), and they have this day invited me to dine with them.

Letters to John Percival at Westminster School.

Vol. 2 ends with p. 1373; and ends imperfectly in a letter dated 26 Dec. 1679.

1681, July 3. A letter by Sir N. L'Estrange.

1681, July 17, Oxford. Mr. Lane to Sir John Percival, about College's plot; and other letters about the same.

1683, July 3. Sir Robert Southwell, Sir John Percival. A long letter about the Plot and other matters.

There are many by Sir Robert Southwell.

Many of the letters relate to family matters and business; but some interesting general information may be extracted.

The last batch of letters are from Sir Philip Percival to Sir Robert Southwell.

In the volume are some papers as late as 1683.

EARL OF
EGMONT.

Thick folio, between 500 and 600 pp., 16th and 17th centuries. This (at least as far as p. 166) seems to be the original entry book of the High Court of Castle Chamber, at Dublin. A few leaves at the beginning are absent.—p. 15, the names founde gylty. These persons as were . . . indytement, viz., Barnabe Comiske, of Tarmonfeikin, 13s. 4d., and 36 other persons named, with various sums opposite the names of many.—Signed by W. Fitzwylliam, Adam Dublin, custod. Sigilli, Halliden, and four others of the Council.

p. 16. The names of such persons as in their several answers then confessed to be at the spoyle of the shipp. A long list of names follows, with fines against nearly all. Str against the sums.—Signed as before.

p. 18. 1573, Nov. 4. In the suit, John Bath, the Queen's Solicitor v. Danyell Boo and others. It appears that Danyell Boo and Patrick Taylor were guilty of the riot. They are to pay 40s. each to the Queen, and to be imprisoned during pleasure.—Signed as before.

pp. 27 and 28 to pp. 41 and 42 gone.

p. 40. The document is signed by Fitzw[ylliam]. T. Armagh, Roland Ballinglas, H. Meden, Thomas Slane, Jo. Plunket, Lucas Dillon, John Falconer, R. Stone, N. White, Garvey.

The index shows the subjects: Patents and creations, Lieutenant's levies, Provision for war, Ordnance, Oyer and Terminer, Inquire, To survey and examine, Reparation and Fortification, Pardons, Writs, Council of the North, Wales, Ireland, Safe conduct, Treaties, Armour and horses, Queen's debts, Ecclesiastical, Warrants, Parliament, Protector, Accompt, Provision, Victual, Subsidy and Benevolence, Musters, Piracies, Sale of Land, The King's stamp, Tower, Arrest, &c., &c.

Collections for family history, &c. 7 volumes.

Folio. A journal of passages, chiefly publick, which, for the sake of my memory, I have thought fit to keepe according as I had time and opportunity to write them down.

10th Oct. 1711. Landed with my family at Dunbary after a narrow escape at sea;—about 140 leaves, down to 6 Sept. 1715.

He left Ireland 2nd March 1714, and got to London on the 14th, but on the 3rd of July 1714 he was in Dublin again. While in London he gives copies of letters which he writes to his brother Percival and his cousin D. Dering. He inserts also copies of letters to himself from London. He gives accounts of proceedings in Council in Ireland, characters of persons, and notices of events.

Folio. A continuation of the above; with copies of letters to and by him; the last letter is dated in 1717. It contains notices of the Pretender.

Folio. My journey to Spa in 1723; 31 pp. in a school-boy hand. With index by Percival.

My journey to France, Holland, and Flanders in 1718; 281 pp., with index by Percival.

A folio cover with a number of separate fair copies of papers by and signed Henry Hutchinson, relating to South American countries and affairs. At the beginning is a letter (dated from Chatham) by Henry Hutchinson, the son, to the Earl of Egmont, saying that he sends by his father some of the papers which are copied; that his father is in distress; that he would like to succeed him; that some of the papers show the losses sustained in the Expedition which was the cause of the family's ruin.—The papers are in 1739, 1762, &c. They are against the Spaniards.

Folio. Somersetshire pedigrees, penes Jo. Anstis, Garter, Oct. 1737. The book compiled 1636; copied 1737 by me. P. (13 leaves).—At the other end are copies of 2 or 3 letters.

Loose are some notes of John Earl of Egmont, born 1683, second son of Sir John Percival. 40 pp. It is a draft corrected by himself. Ends imperfectly in 1713.

Manuscript Collections, 5 vols., folio.

Vol. I. Sir R. Temple's speech in Parliament against the Triennial Bill, 1692, out of a MS. Mr. Southwell lent me.

It is alphabetical; giving the name of each knight, his county, when created, and by whom; created baronet, when so created; created a peer, when so created.—A lower margin shows knights created temp. Charles II. and James II.

EARL OF
EGMONT.

Lists of sheriffs and lord mayors of London, 1520-1724, with the names of the companies of which they were members.

Folio. pp. 198.—Copies of letters by and to Lord Percival. Some give accounts of debates in the House of Commons, with speeches of various members, 1730 and 1731.

Folio.—The Sudden Turn, in the fall of Clawpole and Bellygut:—

Bellygut, King of Lubberland; Flatterall his favourite; Clawpole, chief of Norfolk; Pimpey his friend; Bungay, brother to Claypole; Cynderaxa, cook to Bellygut. (36 pp.)

pp. 41-62.—A true narrative of the hustings' usage of me in the life of my son's election for member of Parliament 1734 (election for Harwich).

pp. 62-125. A short discourse of Heresie.

pp. 145-150. General observations on the Septuagint translation of the Bible.

Folio; original letters; pp. 1-788, and index. To Sir John Percival, Bart., at Dublin, at London, &c. 21 Nov. 1701 to 16 Dec. 1711; all in business.

Eight volumes, vellum bound. Copies of letters.* Vol. I, pp. 292.—1697, May 19.—1709, Dec. 27. Note to the first letter "From Mr. Henry Roby, my father's 'chaplain while he lived, and afterwards my tutor 'till I 'went to the French school in Greek Street. He lived 'with me till he died in 1707.'"—The writer of the note was evidently the copier of the letters, i.e., John Percival.

The letters are from Henry Roby to John Percival.

John Percival to Sir R. Southwell (many), John Percival went to Magdalen College, Oxford; R. Smallbrook was his tutor there. Sir R. Southwell writes religious letters to John Percival, who translated Aristotus into English, and dedicated the translation to Sir R. Southwell.

1701, June 24. Mr. Parry's directions to John Percival for travelling in England (pp. 83-88).

1701, June 24. Peter le Neves' directions to John Percival on the same subject (pp. 88-103).

1701, Sept. 18. John Percival to Digby Coates; tells of his expedition to Scotland.

170 $\frac{1}{2}$, March. John Percival is in London; and his letters tell a little news. Ann Whorwood, at Denton, was his cousin. Basil Kennett was his brother Philip's tutor.

170 $\frac{1}{2}$, March 21. John Percival to Thomas Knatchbull.—The Queen happening to blush very much when she spoke her speech from the throne, some compared her to the sign of the Rose and Crown. You can't imagine how assiduous the Whigs are to curry favour with her. The Bishop of Salisbury, it is said, lay all night in St. James's Court that he might be the first to wish her joy; but though that's false, he was the very first that told the news of the King's death, but she would not believe it 'till the Marquis of Normanby affirmed it.

1702, March 26. The same to the same. The coronation medal is to have the emblem and motto in allusion to Jupiter in his war with the giants, who rested awhile and slept while Pallas maintained the conflict. The King appears in heaven, and the Queen stands under him armed, with the motto "Vicem gerit illa Tonantis." He sends copy of a lampoon on various persons of note.

170 $\frac{1}{2}$, March 17. Ch. Dering to (his nephew) John Percival. . . . This day the opera of Camilla is acted expressly for Lord Marlborough. Our famous Nicolini got 800 guineas for his day; and 'tis thought Mrs. Tofts, whose turn it is on Tuesday next, will get a vast deal. She was on Sunday last at the Duke of Somerset's, where there was about 30 gentlemen, and every kiss was 1 guinea; some took 3, others 4, others 5, at that rate, but none less than one.

1709, April 2, London. Wm. Wogan to John Percival. Lady Betty Cromwell died on Thursday; she miscarried on Tuesday of a girl, and is to be buried at Henbury in Mrs. Southwell's burying place.

170 $\frac{1}{2}$, Feb. 14. Lord Cutts is dead. Although his place gave him 6,000*l.* per annum, he died vastly in debt, and his aides-de-camp dubbed 10*l.* a piece to bury him.

170 $\frac{1}{2}$, Jan. 3, Dublin. W. Percival writes an account of his brother Charles' defence of Denia, of which he was Governor.

1708, Oct. 10, Denia Castle. Major C. Percival writes to his brother an account of the second siege of the castle. (But he was obliged to surrender.)

170 $\frac{1}{2}$, Dec. 10. Sir J. Percival to Archdeacon Percival. Account of proceedings in the House of Commons in Sacheverell's trial.

1708, Dec. 18, Florence. The Grand Duke of Tuscany to Sir J. Percival. Thanks for a book of prints (Smith's mezzotints).

This volume has an alphabetical Index of Letters, an Index of Matters, and an Index of Names of Persons.

Vol. II. 170 $\frac{1}{2}$, January 1.—1712, Dec. 31. Letters to and by Sir John Percival. No index, pp. 275.

1710, Jan. 9. Sir John Percival to his cousin.—A long letter about a debate in the House of Lords on Lord Peterborough's doings in Spain. The Queen was there for 4 hours.

1711, June 30, Bath. An original letter by Sir J. Percival. Says that he has been to Blenheim, and that the house is not finished. Describes a marble fountain there, brought from Alicante, began by Bernini, who died before it was finished; it has representations of the 4 great rivers of the world, with other ornaments; the figures are half as big as life.

1711, July 14, Bath. Letter by Sir John Percival, sending a drawing of a Roman inscription, dug up while mending the road, and let into a wall near the Cathedral.—Julius vita | lis Fabricie is | Leg. xx. v. v. | stipendior | um. ix. anor. xx. | ix. natione Be | lga ex colego | Fabricie. elatu | S. 1711. Several letters from Matthew Buchanan, from Barcelona, who seems to have wished to be chaplain; having been a deputy chaplain. In 1712 he writes that he left Spain in November and went to Italy; and he dates from Bourdeaux. In September he dates from Holly Hill, and has got a cure.

Vol. III. 171 $\frac{1}{2}$, January—1714, Dec. Letters to and by Sir J. Percival. No index, pp. 375.

1713, April 28. Lord Castlecomer to Sir J. Percival.—Notices the universal applause of Cato.—Such has been its run on the stage that the Ministry has been obliged to come into the applause. Now the word is given that Cato must either mean the Lord Treasurer or Bolingbroke, and the contention is which party shall applaud it most. . . . At Court I met Mr. Harcourt (the Lord Chancellor's son) and asked him how he liked our play. Your play! my Lord, 'Tis ours, says he; or at least you will allow Cato to belong to us, by reason Mr. Booth is one of us. Very good, quoth I, take him? God's name; You purchased him at the rate of 54 guineas which Lord Bolingbroke collected among you young gentlemen at the play the other night. At that rate, my Lord, says he, if your friends will give him 60, you may bring him over. Upon which I observed it was by no means worth our while, and further added, they might make the best of their player since we had our poet; and bribe him if you can.

1714, March 27, Dublin. Daniel Dering to Sir J. Percival. . . . Our Lord Lieutenant has this day published a proclamation which you represented as necessary to him some time since. It contains an alphabetical list of all papists that are licensed to wear arms, with the places of their abode, &c., &c.

1714, April 17. Sir J. Percival to his brother.—Gives an account of the debate in the House of Commons on Thursday last, about voting the Succession not in danger. . . . Great notice was taken of Don Patricio Mauros being presented to the Queen under character of a Spanish nobleman, which man, though discovered a year ago to be Sir Patrick Lawless, an Irish papist, in arms for the late King James, and an outlaw constantly in arms against us, and attending the Pretender, was nevertheless suffered to come to court.

Vol. IV. 171 $\frac{1}{2}$, Jan.—171 $\frac{1}{2}$, Jan. 3, pp. 530. No index.

In Vol. 4 are many letters from Philip Percival in Ireland, and from Sir John Percival in London, and many memoranda of events by Sir John.

171 $\frac{1}{2}$, March 24, London. Sir John Percival to the Earl of Sunderland. Thanks for the intended peerage.

1715, April 22, — to —. To-day there was a total eclipse of the sun. All the astronomers are agreed that the moon has an atmosphere.

1715, May 12 — to —. To-day Mr. Pulteney, late Envoy at Denmark, told me there was no doubt the late Queen thought the Pretender her brother, and was troubled in her mind that she not only kept the kingdom from him, but had contributed to render his restoration for ever impracticable. Pulteney told her of a conversation between Mons. Plessen (who was much trusted by the late Queen for his faithful service to Prince George during his life, to whom he was Master of the Wardrobe and Privy Purse), some time before her death she unburdened herself, expressing her regret that she kept him out. M. Plessen argued against his restoration, because of restoration of popery and the destruction of the liberty of the people. She ended by saying, I think you are in the right.

1715, May 28. Anniversary of the King's birth; but the bells toll'd faintly: the churchwardens pretended the ropes were lost. 'Tis said the mob have a ridiculous health, viz., Limp, L., Lewis; I., James; M., Mary, the late King James' Queen; P. Pretender. A pamphlet called The Conduct of the Duke of Ormond in 1712, though published by his direction, does him no service, nor the party. The Tories confess the same, and wish it had not been published. The riots in London, Oxford, and other places, are marks of dissatisfaction at the King's choice of his Ministry. The night before last, viz., 2 June (sic) six score foot of the Duke of Marlborough's regiment made a public bonfire before Whitehall, and threw in their shirts . . . this was by order of their Colonel the Duke, who, to compensate them being so coarsely clothed, promised them 2 new shirts apiece, a new waistcoat, and a new pair of shoes. . . . The blame lies on the agent. . . . The soldiers found out when the King walked on the garden in St. James', and one dropped a letter wrapped in one of their new coarse shirts as the King was passing; he read the letter, put it in his pocket, and afterwards he "gronda pour la première fois," said the Page of the Black Stairs, who related this to the friend who imparted it to me. I am assured that the Prince said that a certain General ought to be . . . whether he meant General Tatton or the Duke of Marlborough, I can't tell. People think the latter.

1715, July 3, Dublin. Lord Percival writes that he is sworn into the Privy Council.

1715, July 19, London. Daniel Dering to Lord Percival. . . . Prior has certainly given up all the papers, so that there will be the fullest evidence against Lord Oxford.

1715, Aug. 19. A letter of this date says that Lord C. Brodrick showed a letter from a member of Parliament that the Duke of Ormond's friends offered to compound for his perpetual banishment, and to vote for it, if the Ministry would forbear to attain him.

1715, Feb. 12, Dublin. Philip Percival to Lord Percival. A strange appearance in the moon the 6th and 7th of this month, more particularly remarked by Mr. Bingham, the clockmaker. I sent the draught on the other side, with his own words, as he sent it me. He said it was so flaming a red that at first he thought it had been a chimney over against him on fire. It was a bright moonshiny night, so it could not be owing to fogs. (On the other side is a drawing of the crescent moon on its back; near the right horn a triangle (representing, I suppose, the red appearance) cuts off about one seventh in length of the crescent. The clockmaker's notes are "Feb. 6, at 5 minutes past 10, I saw this piece of a bloody spear.—And on the 7th, at a quarter past 9.")

Vol. V. 1715, Jan.—1723, March 23, pp. 325. Three indices, as in Vol. I. Letters to and by Lord Percival.

1723, Jan. 3, Merton College, Oxford. Philip Barecroft to Lord Percival. He has examined the MSS. Sir Harry Unton's Embassy to France, 340 pp. folio, written closely in a small hand; at the end are 33 letters by Queen Elizabeth. The Life of Sir John Hawkwood is a manuscript not very fair, 372 pp. folio. The account of the services of Signor Gondomar, 16 pp. folio. The University price of transcribing is 1s. per sheet.

(1722), Sept. 22, Twickenham. Alexander Pope to Lord Percival.—Did not know till after Percival had gone that the person with him was Col. Hunter, one of the directors of the opera. "The Duchess of Buckingham has a request to the Board, that the late Duke's play may be performed at the Theatre in Drury Lane, with several pieces of Music written in the manner of Ancient Chorus, partly by himself and partly by me, and that in case any voice or part of the instrumental music should be wanted, they would permit them to perform in it for a few nights, supposing those nights not to interfere with the operas. Your Lordship's interference in this matter will be a double obligation to her and to, &c., &c."

1722, May 8. Under this date Lord Percival writes that "Lady Sunderland told the Bishop of Winton, from whom I had it, that the child who died the other day, of 3½ years old, of the small pox, complained that a coffin should be brought into his room, and cried to have it taken away, for he would not die; nor was he easy 'till the servants seemed to remove the phantom. His father died the Thursday before, but the child knew nothing of it. She said the same boy when but two years old could not be persuaded to go into a room where an old tutor of my Lords.

"who died a day before, was laid in order for burial, though unknown to him, but made no scruple of it when the corpse was gone. Thus the Bishop related it to me."

1723, Jan. 8, Temple. Sam. Forster to Lord P. The Bishop of Rochester swears that Col. Williamson intended to murder him, and that what he did was in self-defence.

1721, Aug. 30. Lord Percival, in London, to his brother. He alludes to the "Picture Office." A company seems to have been formed by a M. le Blond for engraving pictures at a cheap rate, and also expressing any pictures in tapestry. Lord Percival sends some.—In October his brother expresses his great satisfaction with them. In November Lord Percival sends the bill for seven, viz., Two Children, hand unknown, 10s.; Rebecca, after Caratch, 12s.; Susanna, after Picairi, 12s.; Magdalene, after Caratch, 10s.; Holy Family, after Baroccio, 15s.; Virgin, after Raphael, 15s. The Office has since put out a St. Catherine, after Corregio, and our Saviour and St. John the Baptist, after Vandyke. . . . Our modern painters can't come near it (the invention) with their colours, and if they attempt a copy make us pay as many guineas as now we give shillings. On the 27th March 1722 Lord Percival writes, The picture project has suffered under a great deal of mismanagement, but yet improves much. On the 7th of March 1723 D. Dering tells Lord Percival of a general meeting of the proprietors held yesterday, by order of the assignees, by the desire of several members. About 40 or 50 met; Col. Guise was in the chair, who said the trustees had called the meeting to give an account of their conduct. Mr. Penny read an historical account of the proceedings, which contained several reflexions on M. le Bland, who as constantly interrupted him with, Je declare que cela est faux, &c. The managers then read what they called a paper of facts. They had sold 490 shares for 15*l.* each; and sold pictures for 600*l.*, and with what had been paid in by the old proprietors the sum they were to charge themselves with was, I think, near 9,000*l.* That almost 7,000*l.* of that had been spent; 5,000*l.* under le Bland's directions, which produced 4,000 pictures; and if all were sold at the price fixed on them, there would be 2,000*l.* loss; and 2,000*l.* had been spent under Guine, which had likewise in 10 months produced 5,000 pictures, which, if all sold at the price fixed, would occasion a gain of 1,600*l.* That in the method they now use, there might be made with the 25 plates now in being 14,000 more, which, with the above 5,000, would bring in, if sold, 12,000*l.* That as to the second branch of weaving, they had spent 950*l.*, and the produce was a child's head and a piece of silk which, if sold, would yield about 30*l.* Lord Hunsdon moved that 7 persons might be chosen to inspect all the transactions had by virtue of the Patent. There were chosen Lord Carpenter, Sir J. Guise, D. Dering, Wm. Lewis le Grand, Mr. Bultell, Mr. Cowmaker, and Mr. Vezzian; and to make a report in 5 weeks.

1722, Sept. 25, Chalton. Lord Percival to A. Pope. This morning Brigadier Hunter returned to London and told me the chief singers engaged would not be permitted to perform in Drury Lane, but he was sure you might have Bosci and any of the instrumental musick on such nights as did not interfere with the opera. He was very ready to serve you, and desired I would let you know that Sagioni, formerly known here by the name of Maria Gallia, is returned, and sings to his judgment extremely well. She is not engaged to the Haymarket, and will probably perform at Drury Lane upon moderate encouragement, for she is come with the view of maintaining herself by scholars.

1723, Jan. 8. Samuel Forster writes that the Duke of Buckingham's play will not be acted at all.

1723, Dan. Dering to Lord Percival. Col. Disney, Lord Stair, and others went to see Lord Sunderland's library. Disney came up to Lord Stair and says, My Lord, have you been at the expense of seven or eight hundred guineas for composers of operas, while Lord Sunderland could have supplied you for nothing with more curious ones out of the library than any those fellows can produce.—He said, "My Lord, I saw at that end of the room twelve large folios, and they are Operas S. Augustini."

1722, March 27, London. Lord Percival to Ch. Dering. Sir R. Steel got his election by a merry trick. He scooped an apple and put ten guineas into it, and said it should be deposited for the wife of any of the voters that should be the first brought to bed that day 9 months. Upon this, several that would have been against him, and who lived some miles from the town, posted home to capacitate their wives to claim the apple, and the next morning the election past in his favour before they returned.

Vol. VI. 1723, March 30—1725, Sept. 9. No Index, pp. 326.—Many letters by Lord Percival about his travels in England.

1723, Nov. Philip Percival at Dublin. Writes to Lord Percival that Lord Fitzwilliam told him that one Sir John St. Barb, of Hampshire, had died lately and left very considerably to some Percival of Ireland.

1724, Aug. 9, Oxford. Lord Percival to Dan. Dering. Says that his last was from Beaconsfield in Buckinghamshire. Friday morning, on leaving Becconsfield, we went half a mile out of way to see Hall Barn, Mr. Waller's house, a London box, if I may so call a house of 7 windows every way.—Waller being hunting, they did not see the inside of the house. There were 80 acres of garden and walks and views; he mentions the bench, a seat of the famous Edmund Waller the poet, which is so revered, that old as it is, it is never to be removed but constantly repaired, like Sir Francis Drake's ship. The present Waller is his grandson. All this fine improvement is made by himself, or by Aislabie, his father-in-law, who had this house and the lands about in right of his wife's jointure, but gave it up in the South Sea year to his son-in-law. There is a great deal more still to be done, which will cost a prodigious sum; but this gentleman by marriage, South Sea, and his paternal estate [is able] to do what he pleases.—He went to Woodstock: tells how the Duchess of Marlborough turned off a porter, because he had let the Duke of Montague pass the outward gate against her orders, she being absent; and how the porter of the second gate shut the door, and swore his Grace should not enter for love or money.—At Lord Abingdon's house, a mile from Tetsworth, a venerable old seat moated round, he saw, among other pictures, one of Sir Edmund Verney, standard bearer to King Charles the 1st.—On the 11th of August Lord Percival writes from Oxford; in Bodley he saw the works of Cicero, printed in 1475, esteemed the first that was ever printed in England; and a New Testament 1,300 years old.

There are several capital long letters by Lord Percival to D. Dering, describing houses, gardens, and pictures that he saw in his tour.

1724, Oct. 26, Twittenham. A. Pope to Lord Percival.—I assure your Lordship, that I take it as an obligation that you think so rightly of me as to judge the pleasure I should receive in obeying any commands of yours. There are some people in the world for whom one's esteem can never be extinct, though it may be dormant by distance or accident; and I beg you to apply this where I mean it, not to transfer it, where your modesty otherwise might, to any other of my acquaintance. I went, as soon as I received yours, to my Lord Harcourt, whose answer was that he was not pre-engaged, and would give the gentleman his vote, but were unwilling to throw it away, as he must, unless there was a majority made by it. He ordered to enquire of your Lordship what persons of the Governors they were who had engaged for Mr. Bearcroft, and, if the addition of his own voice to theirs will do the business, he shall have it. I forget who are the Governors, it is not unlikely I may know one or two others of them. If I had a list of those you are not yet sure of, it would be sincerely a pleasure to me to do my best with any such. My Lord, I earnestly desire you to think me, with all respect (tho' the hurry of my life is such that I have few opportunities of expressing it as I would in person), your most faithful and obedient servant, A. Pope.—P.S. I desire your Lordship to put my old friend young Mrs. Minshal in mind that I am always hers. My services attend your whole family.

Vol. VII. 1725, Jan. 10,—1726, Dec. 28. No index, pp. 443. Letters from Lord Percival about his travels in England.

1725, Sept. 22, Paris. Lord Percival to Mr. Newman.—Account of interview with Father Courayer, librarian of the Abbey of St. Genevieve (who defended English Episcopal Ordination), who was about replying to Father Le Quien's attack. He desired much to have the 1752 edition of Parker's Antiquitates Ecclesiæ, with the Archbishop's life by himself, because therein the register of Lambeth touching the consecration of Archbishops is cited; whereas the adversaries say that the register never appeared until the reign of James 1st. Asks Newman to get one, if possible, (naming persons who have copies).

Newman, in a letter, says that Lord Sunderland's copy was Parker's own, and was annotated by Parker.

1725, Feb. 3, Mid. Temple. Henry Newman to Lord Percival.—In a late conference with the Archbishop of Canterbury, his Grace told me he was glad you were acquainted with Father Courayer, and that he hoped you would employ some skilful person to revise his translation of English Memoirs sent to the Father from England. . . . and that you would recommend in the strongest terms to Father Courayer to conceal as much as possible the Archbishop's name in whatever he has furnished the Father with relating to the controversy. His Grace showed me a little book printed in old English in 1574, by one Drake, or Blake, then head of Bennet College, who being then degraded by Archbishop Parker for some misdemeanours, he wrote that book way of droll upon the Archbishop's Antiquitates, which is a demonstration that the Antiquitates was then in being, though the adversaries of Father Courayer say that it never appeared till 1605.—Yesterday being Candlemas-day, the ancient custom of revels was so far revived that the Inner Temple presented my Lord Chancellor and the judges of their houses with a feast and a ball in their hall. And the Society of Lincoln's Inn had a feast and a ball in their Hall at the same time, to compliment Sir R. Walpole, who, it seems, is a member of that house, and several of the judges belonging to that Society. At this entertainment they had the King's musick, and the Prince and Princess did them the honour to pass an hour with them.

1726, March 30, Paris. Lord Percival to D. Dering. . . . Lord Blandford is at Paris.—At the Abbey of St. Germain des Prés Montfaucon showed an ancient Ritual printed in 1459, which, he says, is the first complete printed book that appeared in France; it is on parchment.

In one letter is a drawing of the Duke D'Antin's gallery, with the positions and names of some of the pictures there.

1726, April 9, Rome. Edward Southwell to Lord P. 1726. A letter from N. Roettier (the King's head, engraver of money) to Lord Percival. Complimentary.

From a letter by Lord Percival, dated April 23, it seems that Roettier lived in a cottage two leagues from Paris; he was chief engraver of the King's coins, and had been servant in the same post to Kings Charles II. and to James II., whose fortunes he followed when his master abdicated. His father, old Roettier, was the most famous artist in this way that Europe of late years produced. He was engraver to King Charles I. He is on a suit of medals of the Kings of England from the conquest, which record all the memorable events of their reigns; it is to cost 12,000*l.* sterling. The Royal Library has 100,000 printed books and 20,000 MSS. Lord Percival saw Henry 4th letters to Marchioness of Verneuil, his mistress. . . . He says "I never saw such spelling in my life."—He saw the famous globes of Coronelli, presented to Louis 14; twelve feet in diameter.

1726, April 29, London. A letter to Lord P. says that Faustina (a singer) was arrived.

1726, May 4, Paris. D. Dering to Lord Percival. Saw a new tragedy named Pyrrhus. . . . Old Baron, the chief actor of these [tragedies], now above 83 years old and contemporary with Molière, who died 53 years ago, performed extremely well.—Lord Blandford is at Paris.—The writer went to see Mr. Meers' fine engine at Passy. . . . A cord and a half of wood serve 24 hours, and it throws out of 3 pipes, twenty four inches wide, near 16 muids of water in a minute. Meers computes that when going in perfection it casts about 25,000 muids in 24 hours. Capt. Savery in England gave the first hint of this machine.

1726, July 1st, Vienna. E. Southwell to Lord Percival. The Court late and fear us, and the unlimited power the King has received from Parliament doth much alarm them.

1726, Feb. 4, Rome. Edward Southwell to Lord Percival. Tells how the Pretender's Lady was insulted by a rival. She went with Lady Southwell into a convent.

1726, March 14. D. Dering to Lord Percival. Five robbers were this day to have been hanged, but they had provided pistols, and when the summons and the cart came they said they chose to die in their chamber, and would not let anybody come near them. I have not learned the issue.

1726, April 2, Paris. Lord Percival to D. Dering. Account of the Queen of Spain at dinner at Vincennes. She was fat, not 17, gluttonous, ate with both hands; the two men attendants carried her off swinging in their arms like a fat spirit in Henry 8th; her feet did not touch the ground till she landed in the third room, and then she fell a-boxing them; she never reads or works; seldom plays cards, and crops her hair like an English schoolboy.

1726, April 3. Lord Percival to D. Dering. Mentions the miracle of a woman's flux of blood stopped on her being carried into the street where the Bon Dieu was passing.

The majority of the letters are between Lord Percival and D. Dering.

Vol. VIII. 1729, Jan. 19.—1730, Dec. 29. No index. pp. 462.

1729, Feb. 19, Paris. Lord Blandford to Lord Percival. Seeing that a Syriac translation of the Bible was making by his Majesty's orders and committed to the care of several divines and scholars of various sorts, among whom I saw the name of one Dodichi, a man of Aleppo, whom I knew myself in Italy,—Lord B. says he is a scandalous profligate fellow as to matters of faith and morals.

(Lord Percival replied that he found on enquiry that Dodichi had only to transcribe for the press, and that the transcript passed through the hands of Dr. Bedford, who understood Arabick well, and compared it with the original and likewise with the Polyglot).

1727, June 14. Lord Percival to his brother.—On the King's death by apoplexy. The King was at sea three days, and very sick and empty, and when he came to land being hungry he satisfied his appetite too much, particularly in eating strawberries, which disordered him the day before he arrived at Osnaburg.

1727, July 15, Paris. Courayer to Lord Percival.

• 1727, July 27, Harwich. Lord Percival to Walpole. About Percival's election, and the misdeeds of post-masters.

1727, Sept. 23. Lord Percival invites Courayer to come to England.

1727, Oct. 25. Courayer accepts the invitation, if he leaves France.

1728, March 25 (or 26). Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, to Lady Percival, asking her to get Lord Percival's brother to attend the House of Commons and vote on a petition of Mr. Guidott against Mr. Collier. She does not want Guidott to get into Parliament because it will enable him to defend himself longer against paying a just debt due from him to her family. She alludes to frauds proved against Guidott in Chancery and in the House of Lords.

1728, May 7. Notes of debates in the House of Commons on the King's letter for a vote of credit. Notes of speeches of Norris, Lewis, Brampston, Lister, Shippen (almost an hour), Talbot, Solicitor General, Sir J. Jekyl, Mr. Pelham, Sir Wilfred Lawson, Sir W. Stuckland, Sir W. Pulling, Mr. Sands, Sir W. Yorke, Gen. Ross, Sir R. Walpole, Sir W. Barker, Sir W. Windham. (7 pp.)

1728, June 22, Charlton. (Original letter). Le Courayer to Lord Percival. News of several persons.

1728, July 19, Charlton. The same to the same. (Original). Has heard of a letter to the Archbishop of St. Genevieve published under his (Courayer's) name. Says that truly he did once write to the Abbé, but from the account of the printed book it is not what he (Courayer) wrote; but some one has borrowed Courayer's name to mortify the Abbé.—Tells a little foreign news.

1728, July 24, London. The same to the same.

1728, Nov. 2, Charlton. Le Courayer to Lord Percival. (Original letter).

1728, Dec. 27, London. The same to the same. He has agreed with the Dutch booksellers, and his MS. is despatched.

1729, May 29, London. The same to the same. The Archbishop has spoken to the Queen about him, and she said she intends to continue the allowance.

1729, June 10, London. The same to the same. Tomorrow or Thursday he will leave on the yacht King William and Queen Mary, which Mr. Duncombe has obtained; and will return in a month or five weeks.

1729, June 16, Rotterdam. The same to the same. A short account of his journey from Greenwich.

1729, Aug. 29, London. The same to the same. Has returned from Holland, and has just got copies of his newly printed work.

1729, Sept. 12. The same to the same. The Bishop of St. Davids sends by Courayer a copy of his book against Woolston. Courayer has dined with the Archbishop of Canterbury.

1729, Dec. 19, and 1730, May 5, London. The same to the same.

1730, Dec. 15, London. The same to the same. The business of M. de Thou is not yet finished. Even the plan has been a little changed since you wrote; Dr.

Mead thinking to please the Queen in proposing to her rather to finish the work, has preferred to divide it with another person. The Queen agreed, if I consented. I did so with pleasure, because it is so much trouble saved; and as it was not for profit I entered the business, I am content whatever mode is adopted. The difficulty now is on the conditions. He is chosen, one Des Maizeaux, demands a payment. I need not enter on the subject; I said that as the Queen had been pleased to allow me a pension while I was here, it was not proper for me to make conditions; that I never laboured for money, and would not begin with this work, but relied on her Majesty's generosity, and that Des Maizeaux, who was in another condition, might treat as he pleased. I expect to see the Queen soon, and apparently after that and an interview with Dr. Mead, the thing will be stopped.

FURTHER ACCOUNT OF THE MANUSCRIPTS AT KNOLE, KENT, THE SEAT OF THE RIGHT HON.
LORD SACKVILLE.

LORD
SACKVILLE.

They are miscellaneous and not in order of date. They are mostly in the time of Lionel Cranfield, 1st Earl of Middlesex, but some are later. Many relate to the Customs; a good many to Irish affairs; there are some accounts of expenses at the funeral of Queen Anne, wife of James the 1st, and a notice of King James, at the request of the Spanish Ambassador, releasing from prison a large number of recusants; many petitions for money owing to servants and others by the Crown; among them is one by the two persons who were appointed by the King to be Official Reporters of Law Cases. The gold given, with the Royal Touch, for the King's Evil in eleven years of King James' reign was upwards of 6,000*l*. There is a copy of the Articles of Capitulation of the Castle of Heidelberg; a few interesting letters during the Civil War, and a few letters from Tangier in 1664 when Lord Berkeley was Governor.

A packet indorsed, "Papers of a legal nature that respect the Sackville property,"—inter alia.

(11½ pp.)

1640, Aug. 24th. News Letter.—The Earl of Northumberland is still sick of a fever, under the care of Drs. Baskerville and Mayerne. My Lady Carlile is continually with him.—Lord Cottington preparing to lodge in the Tower as constable thereof.—The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, now Lord Lieut.-General of the King's army under the Earl of Northumberland, by commission from him, has gone this day for York and so to Newcastle. The army that lays near Selby has gone cheerfully towards Newcastle, and is to arrive there this day, consisting of 17,000 foot, besides the trainbands of Yorkshire, amounting to 12,000 foot and 4 or 500 horse. All the trainbands of England are commanded to march on short warning. The horse of our army exceeds 3,000, besides 500 in garrison at Berwick and Carlisle.—Scotch army.—Lord Cottington on Saturday last demanded of the East India Company in the King's name, all their pepper lately brought in to the value of 80,000*l.* sterling—he offered to pay like the others—had their books brought to him. Altering of the moneys any way seems to be laid aside. These are the new proclamations, one for levying ship money, one for declaring the Scots who invade England to be rebels, and one for bringing those English to present attendance on the King in this war, who hold by such and such a tenure, or else to compound before Michaelmas, which is held likely to bring in a great deal. Our army which was to be sent to Scotland, under the Marquis of Hamilton's command, is discharged, only all the officers are continued, after the rate of the old pay, which they shall have.

Copy of the Earl of Rothes reply to my Lord Chamberlain's answer (dated 8th March), directed to the Earl by Secretary Windebank. (3 pp.)

(It is an address to the King.) A. seized of lands holden, &c. The author quotes Sir E. Coke in Lord Cromwell's case. 2 Rep. 81. (7½ pp., good writing.)

Another paper on the same subject. Indorsed, I presenting this unto his Highness for his Majesty had answer to attend and deliver it unto your honour. (The writer abuses Coke as falsifying the sayings and opinions of Judges.) It seems Coke had bought a manor held in grand serjeanty and aliened without license; hence he argued that it was only fineable, not forfeit.

Letters from Matteo de Renzi.

1630, Oct. 12th and Dec. 13th.

1630, Feb. 14th.—Lord Cork has linckt himself so every way that he is absolut the greatest and pourefullst man in the kingdom.—Many were afraid that he should have been deputy. My Lord Williams is now the man, something talked of here, but having married the Lady Moore he would draw with him all the Lord Chancellor's faction. The kingdom is best governed by one that hath no alliance here, and one that hath means of his own.—Discusses the impost of tobacco.—If the proclamation lately come from England that all tobacco shall be first landed at London and nowhere else, and thence be transported to other his Majesty's dominions is to be in force, it will overthrow both the custom and import of tobacco altogether in Ireland, for it will be stolen in enough from foreign parts, so that the country will be punished, and no custom or import be the better for it.

1631, Aug. 15th. By last post it is written to his Lordship (Cooke) and to the Lord Chancellor, that the Earl of Middlesex, Sir A. Ingram, and Mr. Burlamachi had farmed the Customs of Ireland for 16,000*l.* per annum and a fine of 10,000*l.* Mr. Burlamachi wrote to him (De Renzi) by a letter of July 9th, that the business was concluded, but that the Earl of Middlesex for some reasons must not be seen in it.

1631, Sept. 8th.

1631, Sept. 17th.—With a note by (Lord) R. Ranelagh added on the same paper. These letters are chiefly

On the back of a paper are the following 8 lines.

"I hate a lye yet late a lye did run
Of Goring's death and noble Kensington;
But since they did not so untimely dye
I love the lye because it was a lye;
For had it been an action of such ruth
I should have grown in hatred of the truth;
The lye was better, give the lye his due
Ten thousand times then if it had been true.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

THE MANUSCRIPTS OF SIR FREDERICK GRAHAM,
BART., AT NETHERBY HALL, CO. CUMBERLAND.

Those noted below consist, with a few exceptions, of the official papers of Sir Richard Graham, Viscount Preston. In 1632 he was appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of France. He succeeded Henry Savile, who, being pressed to recommend one M. Godet for secretary to Lord Preston, wrote a private letter giving a not very good account of Godet, who nevertheless was afterwards employed by Lord Preston. King Charles's original instructions to Lord Preston are among the papers, which include many relating to Orange and Luxembourg, and to the proposal to our King to be the mediator of a peace between France and Spain, and relating to French excesses in the Netherlands. He no sooner got to Paris than he had to complain of insults offered to his servants by some of the servants of the Count of Nassau, and had to interest himself in the affairs of Mrs. Siderfin, a widow who was carried off by Capt. Clifford and others on Hounslow Heath, and taken by them to France; and in the affair of Mr. Whiting, of Lille (an Englishman), who was terribly oppressed by French officials in order to compel him to pay for the support of one of his daughters, who had fled to a French convent. In August 1682 Lord Preston gave notice of a plot being concocted in France against our King, viz., a descent upon Ireland; and he employed spies to collect information on the subject, and their letters to him are with the papers. A long letter by Secretary Jenkins tells how the King received the communication. The King afterwards had an interview with Roger Tilley, otherwise Capt. Shelton, one of these spies, but believing him to be a liar, ordered him out of the kingdom. Lord Preston had also to interest himself for some Jersey merchants, whose money, gained in France, was seized as they were leaving for Jersey, and had to advocate the cases of several people who suffered from the Droit d'Aubaine, and to attend to the privileges in France of the Scotch people, for doing which he got the thanks of the Scotch royal boroughs. He had also to remonstrate against encroachments by the French on the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company. In November 1682 it was proposed that the Earl of Burford (the King's son by Nell Gwyn) should be sent to Paris to live with Lord Preston. In April 1683 he promises, at King Charles's request, to send some Italian players into England, and he obtained the King of France's leave for them to go, Scaramouche being the head of them. In the same month he went to England, but returned to Paris in the following June. In the beginning of 1684 Lord Preston heard reports that he was to be recalled, and he wrote to the King on the subject, who sent him a very cordial letter denying any such intention, and expressing his perfect satisfaction with Lord Preston.

In April 1684 his letters allude to the plot in England against the King, and to the intended siege of Luxembourg by the French (which afterwards took place, and of which accounts are given). He had to make application to the French king on behalf of Sir Samuel Morland, who had gone to France to superintend some of the waterworks at Versailles.

In 1682 is a notice of the Earl of Anglesey's book called "Comments on the Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs concerning the Wars in Ireland," which comments the Duke of Ormond said contained scandalous reflections on King Charles I.

In 1683 are several letters about the plot against the King. In October of the same year the Earl of Sunderland, by the King's command, gave Lord Preston directions to let the ministers in France know what a very ill man Dr. Burnet was. The doctor seems to have been made much of in France, but Lord Preston declined to receive a visit from him. In the History of his own times the doctor alludes with complacency to his one interview with the Prince de Condé, but a letter by the Prince in this collection shews why he had only one. And it appears that Lord Preston had King Charles's orders to represent Burnet in unfavourable colours to the French Court. There are many letters to Lord Preston from Sir Lionel Jenkins and other officials in England, and from Sir Richard Bulstrode at Brussels, Edmund Poley at Frankfurt, B. Skelton and Dan. Petit at Hamburg, B. Skelton at the Hague, Charles Faushaw at Lisbon, Peter Levet at Madrid, and E. Poley at Ratisbon. In 1684 Sir R. Bulstrode gives notice of Sir William Waller, Armstrong, and Ferguson being at Bremen. In March 1683, Daniel Petit mentions a report from Berlin that the white ghost which usually appeared before the death of any of the family of the Elector of Brandenburg had been seen.

In October 1683, Lord Preston was ordered to endeavour to trace out Bomeny, the valet to the Earl of Essex, who it will be recollected was suspected of being privy to that nobleman's death in the Tower.

At the end of October 1688 Lord Preston was made Secretary of State in the place of the Earl of Sunderland; and in the months of November and December of that year the letters to him are numerous and interesting. Some are from Sir John Reresby, Governor of York, who was put in confinement because he would not join the rebels; some are from Sir Robert Holmes, Governor of the Isle of Wight, giving news of the fleet of the Prince of Orange. Other letters tell how the county of Devon soon declared for the Prince; and how the King refused to allow mortars to be mounted for the purpose of repressing rioters in London. The Earl of Middleton writes in indignant terms of Lord Churchill's defection, and tells Lord Preston, by the King's command, to seize his goods and furniture, both at the cockpit and at St. Albans. Among the letters by Lord Feversham is one in which he says that he had written to the King asking for a pardon for all crimes, but that he did not desire that the crime he was accused of, viz., that of disbanding the army, should be inserted in it. There are letters by Admiral Herbert, inviting the addressees to join the Prince of Orange. A letter by Lord Dartmouth expresses in earnest terms his regret at not having been able to encounter the Prince's fleet. There are also letters to Lord Preston from the English ministers at Amsterdam, Copenhagen, the Hague, Hamburg, Stockholm, Christiano, Vienna, and Ratisbon. The volume of 1688 is full of interest for the events of the last two months of that year.

In 1682 Lord Preston at Paris took measures to get the suppression of a book written by the Abbé Primi, which contained passages reflecting unfavourably on King Charles and his sister, the Duchess of Orleans. Besides the notice of the affair in Ld. Preston's letters, there are two letters of advice in this collection which give an account of the Abbé and his book. In 1684 he alludes to Gregorio Leti having been ordered out of England by Charles II. on account of a book called Il Treato Britannico. In December 1684, he mentions that M. de Louvois recommended Louis XIV. to revoke the Edict of Nantes, but that the Chancellor opposed that step.

Several of Lord Preston's letters were printed (from the letter books) in the last century by Sir John Dalrymple in his Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland.

There are original official letters which Lord Preston received from England, and original letters from the King and the Duke of York; many papers relating to Orange and Luxembourg, and King Charles's mediation between the kings of France and Spain; letters from English ministers abroad; News letters from London, &c. &c.

PAPERS CONNECTED WITH LORD PRESTON'S EMBASSY AND OTHER OFFICES.

A few papers about passports, books, &c., bought for Lord Preston, and Queen Catherine's jointure lands.

Copy (2 pp. folio) of wardrobe orders for the Queen and Prince (on the birth of Prince Edward, son of Henry VI.).

ROYAL LETTERS.

1629, Feb. 3rd. Our Pallace of Westminster in the fowerth yee of our raigne. "Charles R." (and wafer seal of the royal arms). Whereas, upon information of insolent and frequent robberies committed in the northerne partes, as well to the great scandall of justice and government, as to the damage of the countrie, We, in our royall case, were pleased to graunt to you speciall commission and give other direccions for the suppression of those robbers. Since which tyme wee have bene given to understand that divers of those malefactors, namely, Edward Armstrong, alias Kinmond, Hector Armstrong, alias Stubborn, John Graham, alias Holmefoote, John Moreton, alias Holmefoote, Lodowick Johnson, alias Malontee, Andrew Armstrong, alias Thunnergarth, and Andrew Turner may be drawne in from that wicked course and doe very acceptable service in discovering the rest of the theeves that disturbe the countrie, and their releevors and abettors, whereby justice may be speedily executed, and our good subjects secured from those evils they now they suffer under. Wee, being well pleased to take the readiest course to give our people safetie and peace, doe hereby promise, that if the offenders whose names are above written, or any of them, shall come in, and submit themselves to some of our justices of peace, and performe the service now promised of discovering the theeves and robbers that infeste the countrie, together with their abettors and releevors soe as that goode worke of reformation which we much desire may bee speedily and effectually performed by the due punishment of those evill members, wee will in our gracious goodness spare the lives of such of the said persons above written as shall soe come in and doe that service, and will dispose them to some employment abroad, where they may make some amends for their former lewde course of life, and soe avoide the punishment which they have deserved by the same. And of this grace any of our justices or commissioners may give assurance to the parties, which wee will effectually make good. Given under our signet. . . .

[To Sir Richard Graham, Bart.]

1682, Jan. 19th, Edinburgh.—James, Duke of York, to Lord Preston. (Unsigned.) I was very glad when I heard his Ma. had been so kind to you, as of himself to name you to succede Mr. Savile in France, and hope now you will soon be dispatched thether, and shall as you desire me in yours of the 10th recomend your concerns to Lord Hyde. I do by no means thinke it proper for you to come hether before you goe for severall reasons, but I shall be glad to heare constantly from you when you are there. I see by your letter Sir Rob. Carr will not part with his place, and you may be sure if that or any thing els should become vacant during your absence that were fitt for you I should do my part that you might have it. You have heard of what passed at Lanerik, this day sennight; some of the forces are sent thether, and yesterday the treasonable declaration the rebels put up there, with the Sanquher declaration and the solemn league and covenant, were by order of councill burnt at the crosse of this towne by the hand of the hangman. I cannot yet learn the names of any of those that came to Lanerik, they were not above 28 horse and 16 foott, of the horse 20 were very well armed and as well mounted, the rest in very ill equipage, their foott were indifferently armed; so some as they had done their feat and were passed over the river againe they dispersed, I beleve they did this to keep up the harts of their party, for since I have heard no more of them. When you write to me do it without ceremony.

1682, June 1st. St. James.—James (Duke of York) to Lord Preston.—At my arrival here I received yours of the 27th of May from Paris, and am glad to find you are satisfied with your reception in that country, I am sure those who are my friends will be civile to you. By the last post you will have been allarumd with the newsc of his Majesty's indisposition, but now God be thanked he is quite well againe, it having been nothing but a feavor of a cold. I went to Windsor on Sunday, came back hether on Tuesday, and am agoing with the Dutchesse this evening to Richmond and from thence to-morrow to Windsor. All things go very well here and are like to continue so, which is all I shall say to you now.

1682, Sept. 28th, London. The same to the same.—I could not refuse my nurse Mrs. Elliot to recomend an affaire of her grand child who she tells me has been contracted to the Lord Abergeveny whose mother it seems dos what she can to break it. I do not understand the affaire very well, and therefore all I have to desire of you is that you will countenance the yonge woman, as far as will consist with law and justice. As for newse, the two honest sherifs were sworn this morning by the Lord Major, which besids the advantage of having two so loyal men sherifs, will I hope have a good effect as to the election of to-morrow; but lett the city choose who they will, if his Ma. dos not like him he can refuse him. On Monday we are to go for Newmarket, where I beleve his Ma. will stay above a fortnight.

1682, Octo. 26th, London.—The same to the same. (Unsigned.)—Since I came from Newmarket I received yours of the 24th, by which I see you had gott the passe for the Calers wive, and if they have had as faire an autum there as we here it must needs be very good this yeare. As for newse, Sir Will. Prichard was yesterday at the common hall declared deuly elected, so that that affaire is well over, to the great greef of the Whigs. Lord Shaftesbury absconds still, and 'tis likely will do so for some time. Lord Halifax is made privy seale. I was this day told that our Turkey merchants have had letters from Constantinople, that there hath not for these many years been such preparations for war as is now amaking there, and that 'tis beleved the grand signior himself will go this winter to Belgrade, to be ready to fall into Hungary in the spring.

the most Christian King; countersigned by L. Jenkins. —Whereas by our letters of privy seal, bearing date the 31st of August 1677 we did will and require that Christopher Lord Slane of our kingdom of Ireland, Henry Fleming his brother, and Alice Fleming his sister, all infants, then in France and in the custody of Michael Moore, Gent., and some Popish Priests, should forthwith return into our kingdom of Ireland and render themselves to Alice Countess Dowager of Drogheda in our said kingdom of Ireland, their grandmother and guardian, or such as she should appoint, under such penalty as in our said letters of privy seal is expressed. And whereas our said letters of privy seal have not hitherto been served, or at least have had no effect but that the said Michael Moore still detains the said children, and as we are further informed is about disposing the said Christopher Lord Slane in marriage, without the knowledge and consent of the said Countess of Drogheda. Our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby require that you forthwith use the best and most effectual means to have our said letters of Privy Seal served, according to the tenor of the same, to the end they the said Christopher Lord Slane, his brother and sister, may be put into the hands of their said grandmother and guardian; and that you require the said Michael Moore in our name, not only to deliver the said children, but also to forbear meddling in any wise with the disposing of the said Christopher Lord Slane in marriage, or treating any marriage for him, as he will answer the contrary at his peril. For which this shall be your warrant (Wafer seal of the royal arms.)

1683, July 26, London. James Duke of York to Lord Preston. (Unsigned.) On Sunday I had yours of the * by which I am sorry to find that the Queen of France was dead, which surprised us very much here, having not heard of her having been sick. I believe it will be Sunday sennight before we shall go into mourning, it not having been notified yett in the formes here, and besides the marriage is to be on Saturday or Sunday next, which one would willing have over some days before the mourning. I thanke you for sending me the printed Gazette, which pray continue doing. As to what concerns the conspiracy that has been here, I see you have the same sense of it as becomes every loyal subject; when the tryals are printed (which will be by the end of this weeke) all the world will see, as well as by his owne speech, with what disingenuity, and little christianity, Lord Russell died, and what damnable designs these conspirators had. The next weeke I believe we shall go to Windsor.

1683, Sep. 29th, London. The same to the same.—Recommending the bearer, Mr. Vaudry.

1683, Jan. 22nd, London. The same to the same. (Unsigned.) Last weeke I had a letter from Sir Ja. Dick from Edinburgh, in which he tells me he had writen to you and sent you a memorial about the concerns of the royal burrows of Scotland. It is about the affair of the fifty sols per ton which has now for several years been exacted on their shipping in France. I susepe you have had orders to solicit this concerne of theirs, it being of great importance to them; therefore pray presse it for them; I will also speak to M. de Barillion about it, that he may see I am concerned to have it done. What newse is here you will have it from the secretary, so that I need not repeat them Lord Sunderland comes in againe to be secretary in Lord Conway's place, and his Ma. has done that which satisfies that Lord, I mean Lord Conway. The Dutchess was lett blood last night for a feaver of a cold, after which she slept well and has now very little feaver left, so that to-morrow I make no doubt but that she will be quite well.

1683, Feb. 19th, London.—The same to the same.—Some tyme since I receved yours of the 9th, and the other day yours of the 15th, in which last you give me an account of the person you have sent over who pretends to discover new plots, and by what I hear of him since his being here am of your mind, he will prove a cheat; he has been examined by the Secretary, but has not yet closed his narrative, but will within a day, and then it will be seen

[1684] May 8th, Windsor, "Charles R." (at foot) to Lord Preston. (Indorsed in Lord Preston's hand: "A letter from King Charles II. Received at Valenciennes.")—I receaved your letter in which you give me the accounte of the kinde reception that Harry has receaved from the king of France, he has done very well to go to Luxembourg, for I hope there will be action to be seene, but at that siege the states of Holland having shewed so much inclination for peace will end the matter with the losse of it upon Mont. d'Avaux last proposalls. I wonder at the rumour of your being recalled from the post you are in, for I assure you I have never had the least thought of it, being extremely satisfied with the service you do me in that court, and I am glad upon this occasion to tell you that I am so satisfied with all the services you have done me, that you may rely upon it that I will ever be your constant friend.

1688, Sept. 22, Whitehall. "James R." to Lord Preston. On the occasion of issuing writs for the Parliament, he authorised Lord Preston to give deputations to any such of the deputy lieutenants and justices of the peace lately removed as should be willing to serve him.

1688, Oct. 9th, Whitehall. "James R." (countersigned by his Majesty's command, Sunderland) to Viscount Preston, lieutenant of our counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland.—Directing him to inform himself of all abuses and irregularities within his lieutenancy in the regulations of the corporations, and to make report thereof forthwith.

1688, Oct. 19th, Whitehall.—The same to the same and countersigned as above.—Authorising and requiring him (with reference to the intended invasion) forthwith to raise such part of the horse militia as he shall think requisite for securing the peace and quiet of the country, leaving it to him upon any exigency that may happen to raise such part of the foot militia as he shall think necessary for the purposes aforesaid, &c.

1688, 18, Gravesend. "James R." (at the foot) to Lord Preston.—Let Lord Dartmouth and Sir Will. Villers know I will not have Sir William have anything more to do with my stables or horses, and that at present I have ordered James Graham to give directions how to dispose of my horses.

1689, January 18th, n.s. The same to the same—(signed, J. R.; not addressed, but indorsed: "From the King from France.")—Yours of the 31 of December was safely delivered to me, by which I find howsoever other people behave themselves to me you continue loyal. I approve of what you have resolved as to yourself in staying in towne till the convention and the Parliament, as they will call it, be over, and I thinke you can do me much more service by staying in England then in coming hither to me at least at present. When I think otherwise I shall lett you know it, and as often as you can with safty to yourself lett me know what passes. I need not recomend to you doing me what service you can, I am sure you will do it, and you that are acquainted with members of both houses may do me very much by speaking and consulting with such of them as you can trust, and considring of the best ways how you may do it the most effectually. I send by this bearer, Sheldon, to Lord Middleton, a letter to be delivered to my prive councill, which I hope will be made publike as well as what I left on my table at Rochester, when I came from thence. Remember I must have great consideration for such of you as have stuck firme to me, so few, so very few having done it.

1689, Jan. 23.—The same to the same (not signed or addressed).—I wrot to you last weeke, which I hope will get safe to you, I writ now againe to you by this bearer who brought one to me from you when he came hether. I hope he will have as good luck in going back as he had in coming to this place, and that this will be safty given to you; lett me heare every post from you what passes in the convention when it meets, and send the Gazettes and such printed papers as are worth reading; you may easily find a way of directing them so as they may come safty to me, tho' I have been advertised that most letters are opened at the post-office. All your friends here are very well.

1689, 26, St. Germain's. "James R." (at the foot) to Lord Preston.—Having been obliged to cause a new signet to be made for the despatch of what letters I have to write of publik concerne, and that I must make use of one to keep it; I have put it into Lord Melford's hands, but that without any prejudice to Lord Middleton or yourself, being entirely satisfi'd with both of you, tho' at present I do not thinke it proper for either of you to come over to you (sic) for reasons I shall not now mention.

1689, Jan. 29. The same to the same—(unsigned and not addressed).—Some days since I had yours of the 10th, and so soon as I had it had a freind of yours wrote to you that I was ready to do what you proposed concerning yourself; he tells me he has done it, so that

I suppose your friend here as sent an addresse how you may direct yours. I think it much more for my service for you to continue where you are then to come hither at present. When I judg it proper you may be sure I shall lett you know it. I dare say no more now tho' I hope this will gett safe to you.

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. I.

LETTERS TO ENGLAND, MAY, 1682.

1682, May 11th, o.s. On board the yacht before Diep. —Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I am just now safely arrived at Diep. After having had a very good passage tho' something tedious by occasion of contrary winds. I intend to go for Paris to-morrow morning by post, and as soon as I arrive I shall not fail to write to you and to be ready to receive the King's commands. I hope to be there to-morrow night or upon Saturday morning early.

1682, May 17, Paris.—The same to the same. I hope before this time you have received my letter from Diep which I sent by Capt. Davies. After a troublesome journey I reached Paris on Monday, and immediately gave notice to the Introduceur des Ambassadeurs of my arrival, who visited me the next morning and went immediately to Versailles to acquaint the King. I suppose about the middle of the next week I shall have my public audience there for which I am preparing, and also to be ready to receive any commands which I may have from the King or from yourself. Mr. Fen, who is a gent. belonging to the Duke of Monmouth, here tells me that he hath by the order of Mr. Savile sent you since his departure the Gazette à la main and the prints of this place and hath brought me a bill of them. If I have your commands to do so I shall pay and crave an allowance in my extraordinaries, or otherwise it must be allowed in those of Mr. Savile.—Asks also about the disposal of some money placed in his hands on his departure from England.—The person who used to write to you in Mr. Savile's time in cypher, and who hath discontinued to do so since his departure, hath been this day with me and will be ready to continue his former correspondence. Every day since my arrival here there hath been variety of reports as to the designs of the King relating to peace or war, but it seems most likely that at present he is inclined to the former notwithstanding his new series of men, and that he is only resolved to be upon the defensive. I am informed that the Marquis de Bouffars, who is general of all the dragoons here, hath ordered his equipage of 60 horse to be ready to go this day from this place, but whether towards the frontiers of Germany or Flanders is not known. The Marshal de la Fenillade is said to be going to a country house of his in Poitou for 12 days or a fortnight, but doubtless he hath other orders and another design than that of taking the air at this busy time. The Prince of Condé hath appeared at court of late more frequently than he used to do, so that it is thought he will be general of the army in Germany, and that the Marshal de Crequi is to command under him. The Duchess of Monmouth begins her journey for England on Tuesday next, and the Duchess of Portsmouth is expected here in 10 or 12 days, and after a very short stay at this place for England.

1682, May 30th, n. s. Lord Preston to Mr. Cooke.—Thanks for a letter received from him I have sent to Mr. Secretary what has past worthy his knowledge since my last, and have also given him an account of an insult which has been made upon some of my people by the Count de Nassau's men since my arrival, for which I have demanded satisfaction, and doubt not but to have it.

1682, May 30th, n. s. Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Has received his of the 25th.—I am sorry that I must be forced to trouble you with an unhappy business which fell out at my first arrival in this manner. A wagon laden with my goods from Diep was coming into my gate and the foremost horses being within, the Count de Nassau came by in his coach and one of his laquais called to the wagoner to stop; he told him he was just going in and would make way for him immediately, upon which one of his men leaps off the coach, and with a great stick knocked a servant of mine down, who was sitting upon the wagon.—Gives an account of the affair I was told that Mons^r. Arnauld of the Sorbonne hath lately printed a book of his own in which he reflects very much upon the English Consuls and upon the nation in general; I shall see it soon, and either send it to you or give you an account of

it. If it be so I suppose the King will order some notice to be taken of it and satisfaction to be demanded here.

1682, June 3rd. n. s., Paris.—The same to the same.—About the Count de Nassau's visit and apologies to him for the insult.—That day (Monday), I went to Versailles and made a visit to Mr. de Croissy and shewed him my credential, he received me very civilly, and told me he should be ready upon all occasions to serve me in that court. He said he was very sorry to hear of what had happened at my arrival, but that the King had ordered me all imaginable satisfaction, which I should have as soon as the Lieutenant-Criml. had sent him an exact account of the matter. He asked me when I desired an audience, I told him I should be ready for it upon any day of the next week which the King should appoint.—They conversed upon the differences between France and Spain.

P.S. Be pleased to let the King know that I could not have the blew marine which he commanded me to buy, ready to send when Sir Th. Bond went away, but that it is now ready and shall be sent at the first opportunity.

1682, June 6, n. s., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received yours of the 22nd of May with the intimation that no resolution hath yet been taken concerning the accepting or refusing of the French proposal; It is a piece of news which I believe was not expected at this court. I shall take the first opportunity I can of discoursing with Mons^r. de la Fuente upon this subject, and if he be not gone to Versailles, I hope to see him this night, and by the next post I shall give you an account of our conversation. I shall not fail to assure him of the King's readiness to use all his endeavours to promote and preserve the peace of Europe, and to hinder and prevent any misunderstanding which may happen betwixt the two crowns. I have already done the same to Mons^r. de Croissy, where it was received very well, he telling me that his Master did not doubt of the King's inclinations to peace, and of his readiness to procure it by his good offices and endeavours. . . . Asks for orders about the affair with the Comt de Nassau's servants.

1682, June 6th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir Jon. Leyonbergh Envoye Extraordinary from the King of Sweden.—Has received his letter and sent yesterday his (Leyonbergh's) letter to the ambassador who was not at home 1682, June 10th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Blathwayte (complimentary).

1682, June 10th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The next day after the receipt of your letter I discoursed with the Spanish ambassador upon the subject of it; I found that he had received no letters from Spain, nor did he know anything of the resolution of the ministers there relating to the French proposition. I recounted to him in what manner it had been made to the King our master by the French ambassador, and told him he had acquainted Don Pedro de Ronquillos with it and also given order to his own minister at Madrid to communicate it to the King's ministers there, so that I did not know what other method our master could take to make it known to the Spaniards, nor what more formal intimation could be expected, &c. . . . I told him that I knew the King my master was ready to enter on any office which might accommodate and heal and promote a good understanding betwixt two so great Princes, but I did not know whether or not he would think it fit to ask either party to accept of his mediation. He said . . . that whatever the effects of the King of England's mediation might be hereafter, he was sure at present the French made use of the name of it, for of six memorials which he had lately presented he had no other answer than this, that the French King had submitted all things in dispute to the King of England: some other complaining he made, and so our conversation ended. . . .

Mons^r. Arnaud's book was brought to me late the last night, so that I have not had time to look into it, but in my next I shall give you some account of it . . . We are very impatient here to hear of the safe arrival of their R. R. H.H., I hope God will bring them safe home.

P.S. I doubt but you have had an account of the banishment from Court of the Prince de Roch-sur-yon and several other young Lords for horrid and unnatural crimes.

A French letter of the same date from Lord Preston to Sir John Sharding.—Complimentary and thanking him for letters of credit and recommendation that he had given to Lord Preston.

1682, June 13th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Halifax . . . This Court at present expresseth great inclinations to peace, but is preparing with great diligence for war, for new levies are making every day of horse and foot, all commanders are preparing their equipages, and it is said something is apprehended from Germany. Notwithstanding the King's late order to the clergy not to assemble till his further command they have met, tho' not so frequently as they used to do, and yesterday there was a considerable meeting of them in the hall of the Grands Augustins, their usual place of assembly, which makes people imagine they have some private orders, and that matters betwixt this Court and Rome are not so near an accommodation as they have been presumed to have been.

1682, June 13th, Paris.—Lord Preston to the Duchess of Monmouth.—I hope this will find your Grace safely arrived at London after a tedious journey.—Since your Grace left this place I find they have considered a little at Court of the usage you received in the matter of your passport, and I believe (as there is some reason for it) they are ashamed of it, therefore last night I received a passport, signed by the King and countersigned by Mons^r. Colbert (as you will see by the copy enclosed), for the plate which you brought from England, and for your horses, coach, &c. ; I was a little surprised at it, it being a proceeding something extraordinary, but I know nothing was to be done but to send it back to Mons^r. Geraud, the Introduteur des Ambassadeurs, who had transmitted it to me. I writ to him that I believed it was not unknown that your Grace was gone several days since, that because you could not, when you desired it, have a passport for your plate, you had disposed of it here, and had paid the custom of all your other goods, so that the passport was of no use to you. I therefore thought fit to return it, but should not fail to acquaint your Grace with the King's favour to you.

1682, June 12th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins . . . About French remittances of money to Italy and Denmark.— . . . I am to have my audience at Versailles upon Monday next. Be pleased to write anything of concern in cypher for I have reason to suspect my letters are opened.

Several of the young men of quality who have been lately banished from this Court are I hear going to England. . . .

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Viscount Hyde. We are very much overjoyed here with the news of his Majesty's recovery, having received that of his being ill the post before.

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Conway . . . Before the receipt of your lordship's I had received an account of Mrs. Sidrossens [Siderfin's] affair from Mr. Secretary Jenkins, and Coll. Riche, and according to their desire I made all the enquiry I could after her, and at last had notice from Mr. de Rovigny that she was arrived at Calais, and was there in the hands of the President. I immediately writ to her to know what her condition was, and to know if I could serve her in anything; I have not yet received her answer. But I am assured she is safe: I writ also to Mr. Croissy to acquaint him with the affair, &c. . . .

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Riche. About Mrs. Siderfin.

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Capt. Legge.—About Mrs. Siderfin to the same effect as in the last letter.

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Clarendon. . . . At present a general disposition to peace appears, tho' the preparations of war are great. Much money is remitted daily, and many men are sent towards Italy, and I am told the Emperor is sending 15,000 men thither for the defence of the Milanois, which they apprehend may be attacked by the French. . . .

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Savill.—The news of the King's illness was very surprising to all here, but the next post brought us the welcome account of his recovery. All things here are very quiet, and a general disposition to peace appears, though great preparations are made for war, but I cannot find that anything more is intended this year than to be upon the defence. . . .

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to my Lord Bishop of Rochester.—I received your lordship's this day by the hand of Mr. Dolben, who arrived safe here the last night. I assure your lordship I shall be very careful of him, and upon all occasions be ready to serve him here, or any one who is related to your lordship. . . .

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I was infinitely rejoiced to find by your letter that the King was safe and well recovered; the news of his illness was a strange surprise and trouble to me, and to many others of his good subjects here—

SIR
F. GRAHAM

More about Mrs. Sidrofin. . . . They press the general farmers to make a funded six millions extraordinary for the King by the end of this month. . . . P.S. To-morrow I am to have my audience at Versailles.

1682, June 24th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. . . . Upon Wednesday last I had audience of the King, Queen, Monseigneur and Madame le Dauphine, at Versailles, as I had yesterday of Mons^r. and Madame at St. Cloud. I was received very well by them all, but with particular marks of favour by the King. He told me he esteemed himself extremely happy in the friendship of the King, my master, whom he valued more than all the princes of Europe. He said his inclinations were so great for peace, that he laboured for nothing more, and that he endeavoured to obtain and secure it, with very great expense, and no small industry, and that he was ready to join in any measures which might make towards the attaining of it, which is the substance of what he said.—News from Constantinople and Croatia. . . . The proces is now made against the Comte de Nassau's servants, and as soon as it is brought to me I shall obey the King's commands in your last. I have not yet heard from Mr. Chudleigh nor from Sir H. Goodrick, tho' I hear every post from Sir R. Bulstrode, therefore since you are pleased to offer it, I should be very glad to have the copies of their letters when there is anything in them necessary for me to know. . . . I have written to Mr. Whiting at Lisle to have the exact state of his affair, as you commanded me, and when I have it, I shall move in it as I find opportunity.

1682, July 1st, n. s., Paris.—The same, to the same, Foreign news.

1682, July 4th, Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Legge.—I should before this time have given you the trouble of this, and have congratulated with you your late happy escape at sea, if I had known of your being arrived at London. All things here are quiet, tho' great preparations have been made for war, and it is now much discoursed that it will be, and this King will take his advantage when he finds that the Germans cannot subsist abroad, when the corn and grass is off the ground, if matters be not accommodated before. That which makes people believe that some design is soon to be executed, is the journey that Mons^r. de Louvois hath lately taken, as it is thought into Flanders, tho' he will certainly go into Germany before his return. . . .

1682, July 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Clarendon.—I have received the honour of your last, for which I return you my humble thanks; and since that I have had the honour to see my Lord Cornbury, whom I assure your lordship I take to be a very accomplished gentleman upon all accounts, and to whom I shall pay all imaginable service whilst he is here. I am so happy as to see him sometimes, and before he leaves this place, I shall wait upon him to court and present him to the King. We have at present very little news here; Mons^r. de Louvois returned on Monday last from Flanders. . . .

1682, July 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Mentions the return of Mons^r. de Louvois on Monday last; he hath only been in Flanders, and visited some places upon the Saar and the Moselle. The money which I told you in my last was sent to Stratsburgh is ordered to remain there till further orders. . . . The Emperor hath again declared that he will rather run all hazards than accept of the propositions of France. . . . The late brief from Rome was addressed immediately to the King, and was delivered to him without passing thro' the hand of the secretary; it hath been seen by very few, but it is said that the Pope in it hath expressed his resolutions not to recede from what he thinks is the right of the Church. . . . I did yesterday present two memorials to Mons^r. de Croissy, one concerning Mr. Whiting and the other relating to Sir John Fredericks business, of both which I attend a speedy answer which I shall transmit to you. Mr. Whiting's case is considerable and doth concern all our master's subjects that dwell here, and are not naturalized; I found he had had notice of it before, but he could say very little in excuse of so rigorous a proceeding. I believe the King will order Mr. Whiting shall have redress. I have sent you a copy of the memorial which I presented upon that subject.

1682, July 11th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received yours of the 26th of June v. s., in which you are pleased to write that you send two papers put into your hands by the Spanish ambassador containing matter of complaint and infractions of the treaty of peace in the neighbourhood of Namur, and also the copy of a letter from Mr. Whiting, of Lisle, to Mr. Vice-Chamberlain; none of these papers were enclosed in your paquet, so I suppose they have been forgotten, but if you please to order them to be sent by the first post it may do as well. I shall not in the mean time fail to speak to Mr. de Croissy, and to acquaint him with the King my master's desire that the most Christian King would give his orders that no infractions may be made, or invasions of any kind suffered or authorized to the prejudice of the crown or subject of Spain. Mr. Whiting is here at this time expecting what the answer to my last memorial may be. I have sent this day to Versailles about it, but I am afraid I shall not have it to transmit to you this post; his case is indeed very much to be pitied, but if no redress be to be had, many others of the King's subjects may be affected, for if in one case it be allowed that this King can oblige strangers not naturalized in matters of religion by his edicts or declarations, it cannot be denied but that he may do it in all others; I shall not fail to press the matter as much as I can, and to endeavour see this poor gentleman righted. The French ambassador mistakes if he says that I did press that those people who stole away Mrs. Sidrofin might be delivered up and sent into England, for I know by the law of nations that all countries are an assyle to stranger criminals; but I did confess desire when I heard that one was in prison, and the others were near being taken, that they might be secured till I had the King my master's orders concerning them, and that Mrs. Sidrofin might have her liberty to go to England, because the President writ from Calais that he desired the King's order for her departure. . . . It is much discoursed here that some French troops are marching towards Liege and Treves, into which place the King designs to put a garrison to prevent the Imperialists from doing it, which, if true is doubtless one effect of Mr. Louvois' late voyage. An hundred thousand livres have been returned to Strasburg within these two days, besides the 50,000 pistols mentioned in my last. The officers of the Musqueteers here are putting themselves in a readiness and increasing their equipages.

I am certainly informed that as soon as Madame la Dauphine is brought to bed, the King intends to march, and it is scarce doubted but that there will be a considerable war on one side or the other. . . . The Treasurer for the Extraordinaries of War, hath also declared that a war will soon ensue, for he hath orders to make very extraordinary provisions of money. The King's tents have been ready these 3 months.

. . . Since I began my letter I have received this answer from Mr. de Croissy in Mr. Whiting's business. The King hath sent to his officers at Lisle to be thoroughly informed of the whole matter, and as soon as the King hath received an account from that place I shall have an answer. The Court seems not at all satisfied with the resolutions taken by the King of Denmark and the Elector of Brandenburg at their late interview. . . .

1682, July 11, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of London.—. . . I am entreated by Mons^r. Claude and some other very worthy persons of the Religion to entreat your lordship's favour and countenance to Mons^r. du Plessis, a gentleman who is very well esteemed of, and who hath a very good character here, and who hath withdrawn himself into England upon the account of his conscience, as I find a great many others designing to do, who are of the best rank and quality, if they can by any means carry their estates with them into England. This gentleman's family is very good, and his condition here was also such, he having commanded as Lieutenant of horse long; if your lordship can therefore shew him any favour in England it will be a great charity, and also lay an obligation upon several people of good quality here.

1682, July 13th, Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Arran, Lord Deputy of Ireland.—. . . The bearer hercof, Mons^r. Chaille, is of one of the best families in Rochelle, and also a very honest man, and well seen in the affairs of the sea, he hath also been secretary to the Marquis de Montau, son to the Mareschal Duc de Navailles. He hath a design of settling himself in Ireland, and in order to that hath already bought some estate there. He desires only the honour of your lordship's countenance and protection there, which I humbly desire on his part; he having been recommended to me by several worthy people here. . . .

1682, July 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I received by the last post the papers which were given you by the Spanish ambassador, and yesterday I went to Versailles, and delivered them to Mr. de Croissy, and told him that they contained matter of complaint of some infractions of the treaty of Nimeguen in the neighbourhood of Namur. That they had been delivered to the King my master by Don Pedro de Ronquillos, and by his command transmitted to me, that I was also further ordered to intimate the desire of the King my master to his most Christian Majesty that he would give his orders that no such infractions as are complained of in those papers, nor any other innovations of any kind may be suffered much less authorised to the prejudice of the King of Spain, or of his subjects in those countries. Mr. de Croissy told me that he did not believe that these complaints were better founded than many others that the Spaniards had of late made, that he could say nothing to the particulars, but that he would acquaint the King his master with the subject of those papers, and also of the desire of his Majesty of Great Britain, but he believed no other answer could at this time be reasonably given than this, that all matters in difference betwixt France and Spain of all kinds were referred and submitted to the King my master, that if the Spaniards would accept of his mediation, this and all other things would easily be ended and composed, but if they did not soon declare themselves upon that subject, he believed his master would think himself no way engaged by any thing which he had done or promised for the settling of peace of Europe, which he passionately desired, but that he should be at liberty to take those measures which he should think would conduce most to his advantage. I also yesterday pressed for an answer to the memorial I delivered in concerning Mr. Whiting; he told me that they had not yet had a return from Lille, &c. . . . I am told privately that they are inclined to give the King my master satisfaction in it, and to give orders not to persecute Mr. Whiting any more. The last week the Spanish ambassador was standing by the King when he was at dinner, and finding no great notice to be taken of him he went away. A little after the King asked the Cardinal de Benzi, who was standing by him, where the ambassador was; he told him he was gone out, the King replied He hath obliged me very much, and done me a very great pleasure, for he is the most disagreeable man to me in the world, and one whom I cannot suffer. This being told to the ambassador, he hath sent home to desire leave to demand his Congé. These extraordinary expressions of the King against a public minister make people believe that it is not designed to keep long a good correspondence with Spain. . . .

1682, July 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Lyonbergh.— . . . Mons. Lisienrode, the Swedish Envoyé here, is a person to whom I am very much obliged, he is a very worthy, and a very understanding man, and I think myself very happy in his acquaintance.

1682, July 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of Rochester . . . I assure your Lordship Mr. Dolben will deserve all that you can do for him, and all the respect which his friends can pay him, for he behaveth himself to the satisfaction of all that know him and gains the love and esteem of every one, and I do not question but he will reap great advantage by this voyage, and I am sure he will make a considerable man.

1682, July 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Soames.—I have received yours of the 29th June with one enclosed for Madame la Comtesse de Aulnoy, which shall be delivered to her as soon as I can find in what quarter of the town she lodgeth . . . I am sorry to hear of the great disorders which have happened at London at the election of the sheriffs, I cannot think that the city will find its account by that violent way of proceeding.

1682, July 18th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—There is nothing considerable stirring at this time with which to acquaint you; for the letters from Germany and Italy are not yet come in. Its now reported that the Duke of Savoy is past recovery, if he be not dead; but most people believe the latter. Monsieur de Louvois hath been here since Thursday, and returns this night to Versailles. He sent on Wednesday last his orders for the returns of money for the extraordinary of war for the next month which are as followeth . . . I am informed that Monsr. Colbert hath given orders for the increasing of the customs paid by merchant strangers at Bordeaux, and in particular that they have considerably advanced those upon English commodities. I thought fit to give you this account that the King, our master, might be acquainted with it before the merchants make their application to him.

1682, July 22nd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same. —I have before acquainted you that Monsr. de Croissy's answer to me, when I delivered the late memorial concerning Mr. Whiting, was that he had sent to Lisle to be informed exactly of the state of the affair, and that as soon as he had a return from thence I should have the King's resolution concerning it; the matter continued so till Sunday last, when I had an account from Lisle that the order of Monsr. Pelletier, the intendant, was executed with all violence upon Mr. Whiting, that several of his goods and merchandizes were sold, not only for paying the pretended arrears of the pension, but also the pay of the archers, who had been commanded to lye upon him for several days, all which amounted to a great sum. Upon the notice of this I sent my secretary to Monsr. de Croissy to let him know what I heard from Lisle . . . He told him with a great deal of heat that Monsr. l'Intendant had done nothing but his duty, that it was not just that the daughter of Mr. Whiting having changed her religion voluntarily should be denied subsistence from him. That so long as he was at Lisle they would take his last sol for the payment of that pension; that the King of England did what he pleased in his own countries, without his Majesty concerning himself, and he doubted not but that he would do the same without the leave of any other prince . . . The next morning I went myself to Versailles to speak with Monsr. de Croissy, and told him I was very much surprised to find, that whilst I was making instances in the name of the King my master, on the behalf of Mr. Whiting, one of his subjects, the sentence of the intendant of Lisle should be so rigorously executed upon him, that I thought it was a proceeding altogether extraordinary, and that another sort of justice might reasonably have been expected in this case. He told me that nothing could be more just than that a father should maintain his child, and that in this case it would be expected that Monsr. Pelletier had done what he ought to do, and that he could say no more in it.—Further conversation about it.—I must say that this rigorous proceeding against him hath not been so decent, just at the time when it hath pleased the King my master to appear for him. Monsr. de Croissy told me that he had also acquainted the King his master with the complaints of the Spaniards of some late infractions of the Treaty of Nimeguen, contained in two papers which I put into his hands the last week; that the King's answer was that he did not believe these complaints to be at all well grounded, and that when the matter came to be examined it would appear to the world that they were not so; but that he having submitted all matters in dispute betwixt the two crowns to the King my master was bound up till he knew whether the Spaniards would accept or refuse his mediation, by which all things might be accommodated, but that he did not intend to be long so, for he resolved soon to move the King my master to press the Spaniards to give a categorical answer, which if they would not speedily do, he then would take those measures which should be of most advantage to himself and his affairs. L'Abbé Primi, an Italian, having lately written in his own language an history of the late wars of this King, did the last week at Court begin to present some copies of it, and amongst other persons did give one to Monsr. de Croissy, who the same day taking occasion to look upon the book, fell by chance upon that part of it, in which he speaks of the negotiations with England. He carried the book to the council, and having made a report to the King in what manner Primi had spoken of those negotiations, he seemed to be extremely surprised, and his Majesty then gave order that he should be immediately arrested, and sent to the Bastile, as he then was, where he now remains, and that his papers should be seized, and all the copies of his book suppressed, which was done accordingly, but however, some of them are dispersed abroad, tho' I cannot yet by any means get one of them to send to you, but I have obtained liberty to transcribe a passage out of it which concerns England, most which I send enclosed to you to shew to his Majesty. The history of this Abbé Primi (as near as I can inform myself) is this: He came to the court some years since upon no other account than to tell fortunes; he pretending great skill in physiognomy and palmistry, and under that pretext he insinuated himself much into the company of the ladies, and amongst the rest, he became very particularly acquainted with Madame la Comtesse de Soissons. After some time he thought that writing the history of this King and his actions would be a very good way of making his court, having also that prospect which others of his countrymen have of succeeding Monsieur L'Abbe Syri in his employ of historiographer in the Italian tongue, for which he hath a pension of 1,000 crowns; but he having no great stock of learning, nor being well acquainted with the elegancies of his own language, became acquainted with Monsr. de Rose, Secretary of the cabinet, with Monsr. d'Angeau, and with L'Abbe de Choisy, which last was to translate his history into French. These his friends have obtained for him several gratifications from the King, which have also been given him upon the account of his work; with these supplies he was enabled to make an impression of this book more than a year since, and hath shewed some parts of it to his friends, tho' he hath kept the first part of the history very close, till he published it within these 3 days. Upon the first notice that I had of this book, I was resolved to have spoken to Monsr. de Croissy about it; but hearing at the same time that the author was in the Bastile, and that the copies were suppressed, I resolved to say nothing till I should have the commands of the King my master in it. It is, I am told, reported about this town that the King my master having notice of this book sent to the King here an account of it, and also desired that the writer of it might be secured. All that I say to it is, that I do not believe the King my master hath yet seen or heard of the book, but that I do not doubt but when he doth he will demand satisfaction against the writer, finding himself so injuriously and basely treated, and so impudently abused by a false and mercenary scribler. If the King will have anything done in this matter I shall be ready to obey his commands, however I think it my duty to give you as early notice as I can of anything which may reflect upon my master or the government as this doth. —(Cipher).—I am afraid this book is written with a design to disturb us, and if anything can make our people madder than they are, this will. 'Tis said some copies are gone into England, doubtless to be reprinted there, therefore 'twould do well to have an eye upon the press. Three things are very observable in this matter.

1. He hath had a pension upon the account of writing of history.

2. He says he had memoirs from the ministers by order.

3. The liberty of printing the book was obtained by an extraordinary way; for the chancellor ordered the privilege to be expedited at the request of the friends of the author pretending never to have read it.—(End of cipher)

1682, July 22nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Duchess of Monmouth.—I have received the honour of your Grace's of the 6th. . . . Upon the receipt of the passport from Monsr. de Croissy for your Grace's goods so long a time after your Grace's departure, I confess I was a little surprised, and did send it back in as slighting a manner as I could to him, and in doing so, I thought I should do most agreeably to your Grace's mind, and since that time I have not mentioned it to him, believing that before this time a way might have been found of conveying what you had left at Calais into England, but if that be not done, if your Grace will have me move for another I will most readily do it, and you have only to intimate your commands to me by the next post, and they shall be most exactly obeyed.

1682, July 29th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received the favour of yours of the 10th current, s. v. yesterday with the memorial of Monsr. Van Benninghen inclosed; but because you are pleased to mention some papers in my Lord of Conway's affair, I shall attend till you transmit them to me, and then be ready to obey what orders you shall give me in it. . . .

1682, July 26th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Legge.— . . . The bearer hereof, Capt. O'Connor, is a wealthy gentleman, and one who himself hath served the King well, and whose family hath suffered very much for him, he hath now a very good prospect of being prefer'd here, and wants nothing towards it but only the recommendation of the King our master to this Court, which is all that he desireth of him. If Sir you would be so favourable as to assist him in this matter I should look upon it as a kindness, and I assure you I would not desire it of you if I did not know his merit.

1682, July 27th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his brother, Coll. Graham, Recommends Captain O'Connor and asks the Colonel to present him to the Duke. . . .

1682, July 28th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Marquis of Winchester. Your lordship's passport hath been expedited with all the readiness and respect imaginable by the Court, and it is fuller than any one I have seen. I am sorry I could not have it before your lordship's departure, but I doubt not but it will overtake you at Roan (Rouen) and so come opportunely enough.

1682, July 29th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—All things here are so quiet that since my last there hath nothing happened worthy of giving you the trouble of a letter. I was yesterday at Versailles but I did not say anything to Monsr. Croissy concerning the Prince of Orange's affair, because I attend your further instructions in it. I am assured that the ligue which I mentioned to you to have been betwixt the Kings of Sweden and Poland is not yet perfected as it was said to have been, but that it is expected that in a little time it will be finished if it doth not meet with opposition from this Court. . . .

1682, July 19th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Dr. Chamberlaine.—I have received your kind letter with the notice of the honour you have done me in dedicating one part of your book to me. I esteem myself very much obliged to you for it, and in return I can only assure you that I shall let no opportunity pass by which I may express my service to you.

1682, July 19th, Paris. Lord Preston to Monsr. le Chevalier Chardin.

1682, Aug. 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Turkish affairs.—The French camps which have been formed in several places will, 'tis said, certainly be raised the 15th of this month, but no one can tell which way the troops will be ordered to march; those which are at Metz and in Alsace will go into Franche Comté to passe apparently by that way into Italy. A courier extraordinary arrived on Monday last from Rome and says that the Pope was much surprised at the late proceedings of this Parliament against the doctors of the Sorbonne, and that he was going to write an expostulatory letter to the King about it, but that Cardinal d'Estrée fearing it might create some new misunderstanding, hath prevailed with him to let the matter sleep. The same courier says that the Jesuits have lately chosen their general, who is a Fleming.

P.S. In a paper by itself, as not being of consequence enough to insert in my letter, I writ thus: Sir Ellis Leighton came to me the last week and told me that he had thoughts of going into England with the Marquis of Winchester, but that I, being the King's minister here, he would not do it without acquainting me with it, I answered that he knew in what circumstances he was in England, and that therefore I should neither advise him to, nor dissuade him from the journey; but I told him I thought it was very fit he should have the King's leave before he undertook it. He said he believed he should have that, for my Lord Marquis had written about it. They went towards Diepe together on Monday last.

1612, Aug. 1st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of London.—I am so much solicited by poor Protestants retiring into England to give them recommendations to my friends that it is a very great trouble to me to receive the addresses which are made on their behalfs here, and it would be much a greater to my friends in England if I should do it as often as I am desired. I am therefore, and shall always be, very cautious not to importune your lordship on this account, and I had not done it at this time if I had not very good attestations of Monsr. Rolas, the bearer hereof from the pastors and antients of the Church of Charenton. All that he desires is that if it lies in your lordship's way you would show what favour you can to a son of his who is now placed at a College at Cambridge, and hath made there a very good progress in his studies. He is not very well able to maintain him there much longer, and if by any means he could be admitted as a scholar of any of the foundations there it is all he desires; he doubts not but to be able to maintain himself and family by what he hath carried over, and by his industry.

1682, Aug. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Viscount Hyde.— . . . As soon as I received your lordship's, I sent one express to Versailles to Monsr. de Croissy, and desired a passport for my lady, which he expedited with all readiness, and sent it to me by the same messenger; it is very full, for all my lady's hardes, and her equipage, and doth expressly forbid the opening of any of her things at the Douane at Diepe. I will dispatch it to her this day, and address the letter as your lordship directs me, so that I hope it will be there before her arrival. All things are very quiet here; but it is discoursed the King will go to Chambour to hunt as soon as Madame la Dauphine is brought to bed; but doubtless he designs another voyage, for the camp in Flanders is already raised, and the troops of the King's household have orders to be in readiness to march.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

In cipher.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

There is a great rendezvous of the troops ordered to be in the Franche Comté to march from thence towards Italy. . . .

1682, Aug. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Gwinne.— . . . We attend every day when Madame la Dauphine will be brought to bed, after which it is expected that the King will make a voyage, and doubtless it will be of importance. All the troops of his household are ordered to be in readiness. I pray present my most humble service to Lord Conway. . . .

1682, Aug. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have the other day received yours of the 5th of July from the hands of Count Konigseck, and I shall be ready to do him and his brother all the service I can upon all occasions. By yours of the 20th also I have received orders concerning Mons^r Garnier, and shall take the first opportunity to execute them. The troops of the King's household have orders to be ready to march against the 15th of this month, and the farmers are very much pressed to have the late sum demanded of them in readiness against that time, which makes people now no longer to doubt of the King's intentions of making a voyage when Madame la Dauphine is brought to bed. . . . The letters from Vienna confirm the former concerning the great preparations of the Turks; they have sent precise orders to the Prince of Transylvania to march with all his troops to the rendezvous, and will not accept the excuses which he hath made for the deferring of his march, under the pretext of getting in their harvest. In the mean time Count Tekeli hath mustered all his troops and hath dismissed all the Germans who were in garrison in those places of which he is become master by his marriage with the Princess Ragotzi. They are much surprised at the proceedings of the Count, who sent to desire the Emperor's leave for that marriage after he had consummated it. . . . In my last I told you that the Pope was much dissatisfied with the proceeding against the doctors of the Sorbonne here, the last letters confirm the same from thence, but that he is at present appeased and resolves to attend what measures the King will take in the affair. . . . I have now with much difficulty got one of the books of l'Abbé Primi, but it is the French translation of it, and by the first sure hand I will send it to you. The other day, being with Mons^r de Croissy, he took occasion to mention the book, and also to testify the King's displeasure against the author. I told him that indeed I did very much wonder to see such a book printed here, and with privilege too, that I thought the King could not do better than in punishing the author in an exemplary manner; that for the treatment he gave the King my master in it he deserved the highest punishment, and that I did not doubt but that his Majesty would do justice in this case, since I heard the Intendant has got as many copies as he could by any means, and that they have been torn in pieces publicly. I could not say what I would have done to Mons^r de Croissy upon this subject, because I have not yet received his Majesty's orders concerning it, which you are pleased to tell me I shall have by the next post.

1682, Aug. 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—This Court is very full of joy upon the birth of the Duke of Burgundy; yesterday the Introduteur des Ambassadeurs was sent from the King to all the foreign ministers to acquaint us with it, and also to let us know his title was Duke of Burgundy. Courriers are dispatched to all Courts. . . . You are pleased to desire me to inform myself if the daughter of a Roman Catholic do, upon pretence of too much severity in her parents fly to a convent, whether her parents shall be bound to maintain her against their wills? I have informed myself from the best hands, and am assured that they are by no means obliged to do it. I am very glad that the King hath taken Mr. Whiting's affair in his own hand. I am very sure if it be pressed home by him to the French ambassador redress may be had. The question about the Libre exercice de la Religion reformée. I think is best let alone, for I find that no Protestant strangers have ever had chapels or churches allowed them here, but they have never been hindered to go to Charenton or any other churches of the Protestants in the kingdom.—A postscript to the foregoing letter. I have enclosed sent you a memoir of several manuscripts, some of them are choice and curious enough. If you have a mind to have any of them, I will take care to have them transcribed, and sent to you. I am making a collection of these kind of things myself, and I will take care to have exact copies for you of anything you like.

1682, Aug. 8, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Duke of Ormond.—I have received the honour of your Grace's letter of the 15th of July, with your commands to me concerning Lewis Bachelier, a Frenchman, whom your Grace hath entertained in your service, which I shall execute as speedily as I can. It may, perhaps, be a little difficult to obtain leave for him to retire; but, however, I shall use all possible means about it, and endeavours with the ministers.

1682, Aug. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The letters from Vienna of the 24th of July say they are daily from thence sending forces for Hungary, they being assured that the Turkish army and that of Count Tekeli, together will make 60,000 men.—News from Turin.— . . . The King hath appointed the 15th of the next month for his voyage to Chambor, but most people are of opinion that he will not go thither. It is said here, tho' very privately, that his intention is to surprise Newport; and therefore several troops are ordered that way, to be in a readiness to execute that design.

1682, Aug. 18th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received yours of the 31st of July st. vet., with his Majesty's commands to me concerning the Duke of Holsteins Gottorp, which I shall exactly obey. I received a letter the same day from Mr. Skelton upon the same subject from the hands of that Duke's Envoyé, who came to visit me, and stated the affair of his master to me. I shall endeavour to represent the matter with all I can, and to show the equal regard which the King hath to both those Princes, as being the same nearness to him in blood.—News from Vienna.— . . . —News from Hungary and Portugal.

1682, Aug. 22nd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—In this time of public joy this place affords very little news. . . . All the ministers here have been to compliment the King, Queen, Monseigneur, the Duke of Burgundy with Monsieur and Madame. Wednesday last was appointed for all the Protestant ministers of whom I was ordered first to have audience. As I was going to the King's apartment, I told Mons^r de Boneuil, the Introduteur des Ambassadeurs, that I was informed of a novelty that had been very lately introduced (and which had been first taken notice of by the Swedish Envoyé the other day at the audience he had to notify to the King and Queen the birth of the Prince of Sweden), at the audience which the Queen gives to Envoyes; which was, that the Duchesses were ordered to sit whilst they were speaking to her. . . . Lord Preston remonstrated.—When I went in the Duchesses were sitting, but immediately stood up, and so continued during my audience. . . . Upon Tuesday next I intend to speak to Mons^r de Croissy in the Duke of Holsteins business, and by the next post I shall give you some account of it. . . .

1682, Aug. 22nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Lang, Consul for the English at Marseilles.—I shall endeavour to do you all the service I can in your affair, having the King's express orders to do it; but before I move in it, I must desire you to send me an exact state of your pretention and of your business that I may be better armed to argue the case with Mons^r de Croissy.

1682, Aug. 26th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received yours of the 12th current st. vet. for which I return you my humble thanks; you shall soon have my answer to it.—News from Turin about the Duke of Savoy, and from Rome and Constantinople. . . . —News from Vienna.—My Lord Faversham and my brother arrived here on Monday night, and, I believe, they will have their audience about the beginning of the next week.

1682, Aug. 29th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—Assure yourself, Sir, that I shall do Mr. Morgan and your kinsman all the service in my power here. I was very well acquainted with Mr. Morgan's father in the House of Commons. They are not yet come to town, but I suppose they may be here soon.

1682, Sept. 1st, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—Mons^r de Louvois parts to-morrow, as it is thought, towards Stratsburgh, though a report is spread that he designs for Geneva, and that all things are prepared there, and many people disposed to submit to France, but it is not very likely that this King will at this time give so great an alarm to Switzerland, being able to possess himself of that city when he pleaseth. . . .

1682, Sept. 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Tempest.—I have received yours, I am very glad to find by it that you got safe to Calais. . . . I pray before you come away get some instructions in the painters and Mr. Colvin's business. I must also intreat you to bring over one or two new cyphers with you, and speak to Mr. Secretary about it.

1682, Sept. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

In cypher.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

Secretary Jenkins.—Upon Wednesday last I spake to Monsr. de Croissy in the Duke of Holstein's affair, and told him that that Duke had represented to the King my master the ill treatment which he had received from the King of Denmark, and the hard terms which he had imposed upon him in the Duchy of Holstein Gottorp, which they do possess in common, and that he had also moved his Majesty to be pleased to endeavour to dispose the most Christian King to prevail with his ally to treat him the said Duke as a prince of the same house with himself, and as his brother-in-law; that at his request the King my master who hath always born a great affection to those two princes, as being related to him in an equal degree of nearness in blood, had commanded me to desire his most Christian Majesty to interpose his offices with the King of Denmark towards the accommodating and reconciling of all differences betwixt them, which I then did in his name, at the same time the Envoy of Holstein was called in and heard what passed. Monsr. de Croissy told me that the King his master always had, and would ever have, great consideration of whatever was proposed to him in the name of his Majesty of Great Britain, but that in this case he did not believe that he would concern himself, because the proceedings of the Duke of Holstein had been something extraordinary in his carriage towards him and the King of Denmark of late by no means obliging, &c. . . . I am afraid it will not be very favourable for the Duke. The Dutch ambassador sent to know of me the other day if I had received any orders from the King to represent the injuries which had lately been done to the Prince of Orange by pulling down a part of the wall of that town, and by sending of troops into it to live at discretion, and also by a judgment that had lately been given against him for a barony which he had possessed in Flanders, I said that I had received no orders in either case, but that for the latter I did believe the King my master had charged himself with it, and had spoken to Monsr. de Barillon about it . . . The ambassador of Spain hath every day some hard thing or other put upon him; the other day he demanded an audience of the King to give him an answer to those letters which he had written to the King of Spain upon the birth of the Duke of Burgogne; the answer was that as he had not yet made his entry, nor taken his public character upon him, the King would not give him an audience, but that he should deliver his letters in private. The Queen who was impatient to have hers, sent to demand them, of him, but the ambassador excused himself, and said he could not give them to her without the King's leave, which, he permitting, he delivered them to her in her own apartment, where the King coming before mass received his also . . . By the last advice from Rome, the Pope is said to be very much offended at the late proceedings of the clergy here, and to be very much alarmed with the great numbers of French which daily march to Italy, and that there is no great appearance of a speedy accommodation of affairs betwixt him and this King. It is hotly reported here this day that all the higher Hungary hath revolted from the Emperor and declared for Tekeli; but this news wants confirmation.—News from Vienna.— . . .

1682, Sept. 12th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Monsr. d'Allmagne.—I am very sorry that I cannot give you a better account of my success in Madame de Regny's business, after all the endeavours I have used to serve her in this court. It is now 10 days since I delivered in a memorial to Monsr. de Croissy, in which I desired in the name of the King liberty for Madame de la Barre to pass into England with her children to settle some affairs of concern to them with Madame la Marquise de Regny. I also acquainted Monsr. de Croissy that it was an affair in which the King had ordered me to make all possible instances in his name, and that therefore I hoped that it would not be refused. On Monday last, I received this answer from him, that he had acquainted the King his master with it, who said that he remembered well that this thing had been proposed to him several times, and particularly not long since by Monsr. de Ruvigny, and that as he had been then refused it, so now he could not grant it, because that it is against that rule, which he hath resolved to follow in all matters of this kind. . . .

1682, Sept. 12th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—It is now very confidently reported that the King goes towards Lyons, and not to Chambor, but I cannot find that anything is certainly known of his voyage, but that all that is said of this voyage is only by hearsay. He leaves Versailles the 23rd of this month . . . Mr. Whiting writ to me the last week from Lisle and desired me to acquaint you that if something be not soon done for him they will towards the latter end of this month make a seizure of his goods for the payment of another quarter's pension, which they pretend to be due to his daughter. I writ back to him that the King had taken his affair into his own hands; so I doubted not but orders would be given soon in his favour . . . — News from England.— (P.S. in Lord Preston's hand.) This letter is not perfect, for the post going away there was not time to copy it.

1682, Sept. 16th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir J. Worden.—I received your last with letters inclosed in it from his Royal Highness to this King, Queen, Monseigneur le Dauphin, Madame la Dauphine, Monsieur and Madame, and I did the last week deliver them to them all, except Madame la Dauphine, who hath not yet been seen by anybody, for she is very ill of her breasts. I have enclosed a letter which I received yesterday from Madame, which I entreat you to deliver to the Duke with my most humble duty.

1682, September 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received by Mr. Tempest a procez verbal from Orange, touching the demolition of the wall of the town with the article of the peace of Nimeguen, whereby the Prince of Orange is restored to all that he was dispossessed of by reason of the last war. As also by the post your letter of the 31st August, with his Majesty's commands concerning that affair, which I shall obey as soon as I can meet with Monsr. de Croissy, though I am afraid our offices will be employed too late, for it is said that the Marquis de Montanegues, Lieutenant du Roy in Lanquedoc, hath already quartered 400 dragoons in the town, and 400 more in other towns and villages of that principality . . . The affairs of this Court go very ill at Rome, and there is now a greater appearance of a rupture than ever.

1682, Sept. 20th, Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Middleton.— . . . My Lord Glames I do assure your lordship is a very worthy and a very hopeful gentleman, and promiseth as well as any of our countrymen whom I have seen here, and he shall be assured of a very humble servant while I am here.

1682, Sept. 20th. Lord Preston to the Earl of Clarendon.— . . . I have sent to your lordship by my brother that insolent book of Abbé Primi, which, tho' disavowed now, was certainly printed with the good leave of this Court, but the man had the misfortune to publish it unseasonably, for it was calculated for a Parliament, and so came out too soon, which obliged the ministry here to show some resentment: and I will only desire your lordship to peruse the licence at the end of the history, and then I will ask you if you ever saw one more full and ample in your life. I could not get you the Italian one, but have sent you the translation, which is not near so full as the original. I could not get another in Paris, and when you have done with it, be pleased to shew it to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I believe it will be soon printed in Holland; it was reprinting at Geneva, and I got notice of it and acquainted Monsr. de Croissy with it, and desired that orders might be taken to suppress it, which I hope is done.

1682, Sept. 24th, s. n. The same to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Ever since I received his Majesty's commands concerning the Prince of Orange I have been so ill that I have not stirred out of my chamber, and I am yet but little better, which is the reason that I could not see Monsr. de Croissy before his departure with the King. I writ to him to let him know that I had the King's orders to make instances in his name on the behalf of the Prince, and I also acquainted the Dutch ambassador with the same, who sent to me to know if I had any commands to move in that affair. The matter is now ended, for that ambassador having delivered in two memorials by the order of his masters, received the following answer from Monsr. de Croissy on Saturday last, which I send you in his own words:—"That the King had law and right in doing what he did, because the inhabitants had undertaken to make new fortifications, and that now the fortifications and the walls being demolished, the troops had gone out of it. As regards the money that was taken from the Bourgeois, that was against the King's orders, and his Majesty has given orders that restitution should be made. As regards the decree forbidding commerce, that it had not been put in execution because those of Orange had satisfied the King's demands, which were that they should receive no more students of religion into their college." . . . On Monday last Monsr. de Louvois ordered the funds for the extraordinary expenses of war for the next month. The sum appointed, they say, amounts to above four millions.—News from Vienna. . . . P.S. This letter inclosed is from Mons^r. to the Duchess.

1682, Sept. 26th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Carlisle.— . . . The absence of the King (who on Monday last went to Chambor, an hunting house about 50 leagues from this place.) hath quite disturnished us of news. In a little while he intends to remove to Fontainebleau, and from thence doubtless designs to make some great voyage, but which way he will go is yet a mystery . . . I must confess I cannot but think it very likely that he hath an eye towards Flanders, and a design upon some place of importance there, and none sooner than Luxembourg, which covers a great part of his conquests. I cannot tell whether this is believed in England or not, but perhaps it may prove true. It hath been the happiest thing in the world for him that he hath been engaged in no war this year, for had he been attacked in the beginning of it his fortifications upon all his frontiers were in so ill condition that he must have suffered very much; but now he hath had time to repair them all, and to put them in a better posture of defence than ever they were. . . . It is looked upon as a strange politick here, that this King should do his utmost to destroy the Protestants in France, and to support them against their lawful Prince in Hungary. It is certainly resolved here to ruin them all, for there is not a day in which some edict or other doth not come out against those of that religion, or some order given to demolish a temple. This is the most considerable of what we have here, and I shall not fail sometimes to let your lordship know what passeth here. . . .

1682, Sept. 26th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Since his Majesty is not pleased to dispense with my absence from this place, I am very well satisfied to continue here, and to do him the best service I can. I have received by yours of the 11th, v. s., his further commands concerning the business of Orange, with two Verbaux and other papers inclosed, and if my health (which is yet very ill) would by any means have permitted me, I would have gone to Chambor to have spoken to Mons^r. de Croissy about it, but having by the last post given you his answer to the Dutch ambassador, and which I know is the same which I should have upon this occasion, I have adventured to defer moving further till his Majesty hath seen it, because, perhaps, there may be occasion to send me new orders in it; for I find that it is not very satisfactory to the Dutch ambassador, who tho' the King here sayeth he hath given orders for satisfaction to be given to the burghesses for the money which hath been forced from them, thinks it will be very difficult to have it from the French dragoons. And I believe the States will order that point to be pressed here, and it is thought they will desire the King our master to join with them in it. The other point, too, of the magistrates promising to receive no students of their religion into their college is looked upon as a great abridgment of the Princes sovereignty, and it is believed it will be no better received by him and the States. I took care to acquaint Mons^r. de Croissy by letter before his departure that I had received the King's orders to make instances in his name in this affair, and I also let the Dutch ambassador know the same, which I know he hath imparted to the Prince of Orange; so that it will appear manifestly what his Majesty's concern hath been in this business, and how he hath laid it to heart. By letters from Hanover of the 18th of this current, we are assured that the marriage of Princess of Zell with the Prince of Hanover is concluded, to the disappointment of Prince Casimir of Nassau. . . .

1682, Sept. 30th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of London.—I am as much troubled as your lordship or anybody can be at the ill success of Mad^{me}. de la Bars' affair, in which I do assure your lordship I did move more heartily and took more pains than perhaps I have in any since my arrival here; but when I first spoke of it to Mons^r. de Croissy I found it had been a thing often moved to the King, and as often refused, and that it is a business concerning which they have taken some particular resolution. I argued long with Mons^r. de Croissy about it, and I thought I had left him convinced of the reasonableness of the thing, but notwithstanding that in some days after I had the answer which I did transmit to Mad^{me}. la Marquise de Regny, and which I believe she hath imparted to your lordship when I left London. My Lord, I had only a verbal order from Mr. Secretary Jenkins concerning this affair. If I had had it with the rest of my instructions under the King's hand, I could have taken another method after the secretary's refusal and have demanded an audience about it. I do assure your lordship the circumstances of an English minister in this Court are much different from those of a French one in England; for tho' we have access to the King at all times, and may discourse him upon indifferent things, we cannot mention business to him without all the formality of an introduit and of an audience, and besides there are several other difficulties found which I shall not trouble your lordship to mention at this time. . . .

1682, Sept. 30, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of Rochester.—I had the honour of your lordship's of Sept. 14th, s. v., for which I return you my humble thanks . . . Speaks well of Mr. Dolben . . .

n. d. Lord Preston to Madame la Marquise de Regny in French expressing his regret at his not being able to procure a passport for her niece Madame de la Barre.

1682, Sept. 30th, Paris.—Lord Preston to Mons^r. d'Allemagne in French.

1682, Sept. 30th, Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.— . . . News from Vienna.—The Emperor hath demanded of the Pope the 10th of, the clergy to support his wars in Hungary, which he hath positively refused him.

1682, Oct. 3rd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received yours of the 18th Sept., in which you are pleased to say that his Majesty expects from me an account of the matter of fact, and of the pretensions of this King in the affair of Orange, as they are represented on this side, I find that his Majesty hath had the most exact account of what hath passed there that can be by the several Verbaux which you have been pleased to transmit to me hither, the particulars of which I do not find at all question'd or contradicted here. And for his pretensions, I do not find they are any other than what are specified in the answer of Mons^r. de Croissy to the Dutch ambassador, viz., that the inhabitants of Orange had attempted to make new fortifications, which the King would not suffer any one to do in his kingdom; the people of the place say for themselves that they did not design to fortify anew, but that they only repaired a breach in their walls which had been occasioned by throwing down their former fortifications, and therefore they could not deserve such treatment from the French. The great question will be whether what the most Christian King hath done will amount to a contravention of the peace of Nimeguen, which they will here as you may imagine by no means allow; and till thus be decided, as I humbly conceive, his Majesty need not to engage in any offices upon this occasion. . . . The Gazette à la main inclosed gives you at large the account of the imprisonment of Mons^r. Chassignet, the Emperor's Secretary, which very much surpriseth all people here; it is a reprisal for the imprisonment of Mons^r. la Fayette at Vienna, who was secured there as being the person who conveyed the intelligence and messaged the correspondence betwixt this Court and Comte Tekeli and the rebels, but owned by the envoy of France there as his escuyer.

1682, Oct. 7th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—On Monday I received the favour of yours of the 21st of September, s. v., with the copy of Mons^r. de Barillons memoir inclosed concerning the time which the most Christian King hath given the Spaniards to accept of, or refuse the mediation of the King our master, at the same time, it was advised from Ratisbone and Francfort that the same thing had been declared there by the French ministers to those of the Emperor and of the other princes of Germany.—News from Italy. . . . By the last post you had an account of the imprisonment of Mons^r. de Chassignet, the Emperor's secretary, since that Madame de Mansfield hath received for answer from Mons^r. de Croissy to a letter which she writ upon that subject that Mons^r. de Chassignet was arrested pour une abondante assurance of the person of Mons^r. de la Fayette at Vienna, who had been for three months a domestique of Mons^r. de Seppville, who had indeed been in Tyrolle to take a view of the Emperor's troops there, but it was by the order of the Envoyé to whom as to all men of his character tis permitted to employ all means to have information of what relates to the service of their masters.—News from Vienna.— . . .

1682, Oct. 10th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The letters which should have come in yesterday are not yet arrived, so that I do not know what commands they may have brought for me. The Court is still at Chambor, but it removes from thence to Fontainebleau upon Monday next, whither Monseigneur le Dauphin is gone this day to meet the King. The late Ligue betwixt the King of Denmark, the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Bishop of Munster, occasions much discourse here, and variety of conjectures. It is said to be for maintaining the peace of the Empire, but it hath given great apprehensions to all the other Princes of the Empire, because of the consequences which it may have, in particular from the Bishop of Munster's being director of the Circle of Westphalia.—News from Vienna. — . . . The Intendant of Poitou hath lately signified to the ministers and to the consistories of that province the names of all those who have been converted, to the end that they may not receive them any more into their churches under pain of incurring the penalties prescribed in the late edicts of the King. The same method (it is said) is to be pursued in all the other provinces of this kingdom.

1682, Oct. 14th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mons^r. d'Almagne.—I have received your last, in which you send me a copy of a placet to be presented to the Duke, of which I approve very well, and shall be, tho' if it should not have the success which I desire it most heartily should have, I hope I cannot justly be blamed for the miscarriage, when I have done all that lies in me to make it succeed. I will most willingly write to the Duke and in the most pressing terms I can; but that my endeavours may have the better effect I could wish that in your next you would give me a little more light as to the matter of the service which you propose to do him under hand; . . . do not subscribe your name to your letter. If you write to me by the next post, your letter will be here time enough for me to answer it, before the Duke comes from Newmarket, for I had a letter from him by the last post, in which he tells me that he was to go thither with the King on Monday last, and that they were to stay a fortnight. I writ to you in my last concerning the affair of Madm^e. de Regny, I am sure I have omitted nothing to serve her here, whatever may be thought or said at London. I shall obey any new orders which are sent me from the King; and if I may advise you, Madm^e. la Marquise de Regny should oblige those who speak to him in her behalf to desire him to move the French ambassador in it (as he often doth in other businesses) that so by our joint endeavours in this Court the business may succeed better. For assure yourself (as I writ to the Bishop of London) there are some particular resolutions taken in this case.

1682, Oct. 14th, Paris.—Lord Preston to Madame la Marquise de Regny. (French.)

1682, Oct. 14th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—There are no news at present from the Court; the King is expected at Fontainebleau this night, whither I intend to go on Monday or Tuesday next.—News from Vienna.— . . . There hath been of late a great conspiracy discovered against the life of the Emperor. It is for this reason that Strasoldo hath been recalled from Hungary, and immediately arrested upon his arrival at Vienna. It is said that a great number of persons of quality are accused of the design against his Imperial Majesty, but the particularities of it are not yet public here. It is reported that La Fayette who was lately imprisoned at Vienna had letters found about him which related to this conspiracy. . . . —News from Turin.—The affairs of this Court at Rome go very ill, and the difference is now certainly at a very great height. A courier is lately arrived here from thence with letters of the 2nd current, which say that upon the complaints made by the French minister, that Cardinal Ottobon, and Cardinal Azolini had sentiments opposite to the interests of France in the matter of the Regale, the Republic of Venice, to which Card. Ottobon is a subject, had sent to him to order him not to concern himself any more in that affair; which proceeding hath so offended the Pope, that he hath forbidden Card. Cibo to have any more conferences or commerce with Card d'Estrees, he seeing the design of France to deprive him of those whom he takes to be his best ministers. He hath also declared that if the affairs relating to the Regale in France be not settled upon the same foot they have lately been, and if the late acts of the assembly of the clergy be not abolished, he will proceed to the censure of those propositions, and some say to excommunication. Mons^r. Heinsius, Envoyé Extraordinary from Holland, is every day expected here. He comes expressly upon the affair of Orange. We hear that that Prince is gone to Breda to confer again with the Marquis de Grana. I did receive his Majesty's answer to the Spanish ambassador's memorial from Mr. Wynne. . . .

1682, Oct. 24th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I have received two of yours of the 5th current, s. v., and yesterday one of the 9th. . . . I had some discourse with Mons^r. de Croissy about the affair of the mediation; he told me that the King his master was extremely well satisfied with the late proceeding of his Majesty my master in that matter, and that he had acted and advised it in with the prudence and the tenderness of a friend and a father. He said that all the world would have reason to be astonished if the King of Spain did not readily accept of the proposal, and that the refusal of it would certainly have very ill consequences, for his master was ready to demand satisfaction another way; that the Spaniards were not in a condition to do any great things, and that they could not hope to have any great assistance from the Emperor, who was so much pressed at present by the Turks on the side of Hungary, which the King his master regretted as much as any one, and if these differences were amicably composed, he was sure that he would be one of the first Princes of Christendom who should give him assistance against them. I told him that the King my master had at all times shewed his inclinations to peace, and that he had travailed more than any one to work a good and true peace betwixt the two Crowns . . . I also, according to your orders, moved him for the King's leave to Mons^r. Rambour, the painter, to go into England, and also for permission to Madm^e. Cordin, the Queen's laundress, to continue there. I shall, upon the next occasion, move the affairs of Mons^r. Justel, and Mons^r. Faubert, in obedience to his Majesty's commands by yesterday's post. I return you my most humble thanks for the copies of Mons^r. van Beanninghen's, and the Comte de Thun's memorial. It is doubtless a good and a pious design of his Majesty to endeavour to prevent that the war break not out at the end of November; and I heartily wish that it may have success and that Spain may give such an answer as may tie up the hands of the most Christian King . . . It is very certain that France will make a great difficulty, and reasonably too, to proceed to the naming of a place for a general congress till the Spaniards have declared themselves, and in plain terms accepted the offer, which I wish they may do speedily to prevent those inconveniences which may happen to themselves and others when hostilities are once begun . . . The last letters from Rome say that the Pope persisteth to demand of the most Christian King that what relateth to the Regale may be set upon its ancient foot, and that all the acts of the clergy may be abolished. Mons^r. Heinsius is expected here daily, to make instances in the name of the States General about the affair of Orange; I doubt his errand will not be very grateful to this Court, nor his success great. Mons^r. Basin, the French ambassador in Sweden, hath left Stockholm without having an audience; and it is reported here that the Elector of Saxony hath promised to enter into the league of association and guarantee with Sweden.

1682, Oct. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Blathwait.—I have received the last with one enclosed from the Duchess of Portsmouth to Madame de Croisy, which I delivered at Fontainebleau the last week where the Court is at present, and will continue there a fortnight or three weeks yet . . . La Fayette (whom the Envoyé of France hath owned for his domestique, tho' he was seized upon as a spy) hath, it is said, been put to the question, and confessed all with which he hath been charged, which hath occasioned an order to keep Mons^r. Chasignat, Count Mansfield's Secretary now in the Bastille, more close. The affairs betwixt this Court and Rome are far from being accommodated, the breach grows wider every day, the Pope demanding that the propositions of the late assembly of the clergy should be abolished here, and that the affair of the Regale should be set upon its ancient foot, otherwise its said he threatens excommunication. A ligue defensive betwixt this Crown and Savoy is late concluded, the subject of it is for the defence of Pignerol and Casal.

1682, Oct. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The ambassador of Savoy doth not yet publicly own the Ligue said to be concluded betwixt this King and his master, but the last letters from Turin speak very particularly of it, and say also that it is believed there that the Duke of Mantua is comprehended in it . . . The Treaty of Alliance betwixt the King of Denmark, the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Bishop of Munster, was certainly signed the 14th of the last month, to the great satisfaction of this Court. It is for the maintaining the peace of the Empire, and for the mutual defence of their estates and countries from winter quarters, and from other vexations . . . Letters from Vienna of the 11th current advise that the Turks are certainly retired, after having left 10,000 men with Comte Tekeli, who hath strongly fortified himself in the towns of the mountains. He hath already coined money with the inscription Americus Dux Hungarie, and hath put all the countries near him under contribution ; after all this he pretends that he is not far from an accommodation with the Emperor. It is said here that the Swisses, laying aside the differences and late disputes amongst them about religion, have made a new league defensive for the security of their borders. I find by the Dutch Ambassador that Mons^r. Heinsius will not be here so soon as he was expected, if he came at all ; for some intimations have been given under hand that his instances here would not prevail, nor much advantage the Prince of Orange The passports are granted for Mons^r. Rambour, the painter, and for the Queen's laundress, but for the other matter relating to Madame la Marquise de Regny about which you have been pleased to write to me, I believe what she desires will be granted with the greatest difficulty in the world, if it be at all, for I believe the King hath some exception to her I am very ready to obey his Majesty's commands about Mons^r. Justel, but I have deferred to do it at present, because what he asks is not necessary, and I am afraid may be of ill consequence to others of the religion, for I am certainly informed by those who are obliged to know it, that those who are Protestants are not forbid to sell their estates, nor Catholics to buy them. It is true there hath been a late declaration which confirmeth a former of the year 1669, which makes defence to all this King's subjects, and particularly to seamen, from going to dwell in foreign countries. It also declareth that all alienations which shall be made by those of the religion of their goods, and estates, unless they actually stay a year in the kingdom after such alienation is made, are not valid. It is also true that this declaration hath been enregistered and published in the Parliament of Normandy, and also enregistered in the Greffe of that of Paris ; but it is true too that notwithstanding the enregistrement and publication it is not executed in that province, and that they buy and sell there as freely as before, and that the Intendant of Roan, by the order of the King, hath assured them that they may do so. In the Parliament of Paris there is yet less difficulty because, &c. . . . This may be of prejudice to others of the religion as well as to Mons^r. Justel himself, for it may be drawn into consequence, and brought as an exempt against them, to oblige them to ask leave to sell their estates when they are not now bound to do, and also to make them give in lists of their fortunes, and to leave what part of them the King pleaseth unsold, as a pledge of their return, if they design at any time to retire out of the kingdom. If Mons^r. Justel will be pleased to reflect upon this, he will find it not unreasonable, but if he still desires that application should be made to the King, I shall very readily do it, and I believe the thing will be granted with no great difficulty.

1682, Oct. 31st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Wynne. . . . All people here have great expectations of what the Spaniards' resolution may be in the matter of the mediation offered. I wish it may be such as may prevent a war, for which this King is very well prepared. It is now confirmed from Italy that the Duke of Mantua is comprehended in the late league concluded betwixt this Court and Savoy, there being an article in it by which they oblige themselves to maintain the Treaty of Casall Le Pere le Brevel de l'oratoire, and 10 or 12 Jansenists have lately been arrested at Roan for having been privy to the bringing in of several prohibited books, lately printed in Holland, relating to the Regale, by the way of Normandy. . . .

1682, Nov. 4th. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. The letters from Vienna of the 18th of the last month say that Comte Tekeli had sent his secretary to the Palatine of Hungary, to negotiate a cessation of Arms, and to propose on his part to put the Emperor again in possession of the towns of the mountains. . . . —News from Berlin.—It is advised from Rome that notwithstanding the present state of affairs, the Pope is resolved to send les Langes [linges?] benits to the Duke de Bourgoyne, which is an honour not before done to those Dukes ; they are to be brought by a nuncio which will serve as a preliminary towards the concluding and accommodating of that difference betwixt the two Courts. . . . Mons^r. Colbert hath ordered upon Monday last 100,000 crowns to be remitted to Rochelle for carrying on the works at the Isle of Rhé and Rochfort, but the greatest part is ordered for the first. He hath also demanded of the farmers and receivers-general 20 millions of livres for the end of the month.

1682, Nov. 4th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. I have received your cypher, which I desire Mr. Wynne by the last post to intimate to you ; I shall obey the command in it and shall not be wanting to use all endeavours to find out the bottom of that business . . . I cannot, Sir, but take notice to you of the barbarous treatment of poor Mr. Dolben, by some officious person who hath very falsely represented his behaviour here to his father. Were anything of that here true which hath been said of him I am sure I should have known it early enough, and not failed to have given him the best advice that I could, and if he would not have taken it, I should have been the first man who should have acquainted my Lord of Rochester with it in friendship and justice. I should have thought myself obliged. I believe nothing of what hath been said of him is true, and except when he comes to me, or goes to his fencing master, he never sets his foot in this Fauxbourg. . . .

1682, Nov. 7th, s. n., Paris. (The same to same?).—News from Vienna and Milan.— . . . The affair of Orange is (I related it to you in my last) to preserve to the house of Longueville its rights and actions since the year 1531, when it pretends that the substitution made in favour of the children of Alice de Chalon did begin to take place. I hope by the next post to send you a copy of the arrest, and also a memoire instructif concerning it. A report hath run here these eight days, and is yet very strong, tho' I dare not write it for a truth, that Mons^r. hath received a letter from the Queen of Spain, which intimates to him that after all the endeavours she hath used to make his Catholic Majesty to accept the mediation of the King our master she hath not been able to prevail.

1682, Nov. 11th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. . . . The Court continues at Fontainebleau till Monday, from whence it removes to Versailles, some say the King may stay some days with Mons^r. at St. Cloud. News from Turin . . . I cannot yet get a copy of the arrest relating to the affairs of Orange, but the account I gave you of it is true. I was told the last night by one who is seldom mistaken, and this morning it is confirmed to me, that a courier within these three days is dispatched to Francfort with orders to the Plenipotentiaries of this King there, to break off all conferences, if the Plenipotentiaries of the Emperor do not accept of the proposition of an accommodation, and to retire themselves.—News from Vienna—and Stockholm. . . . News from Berlin.—A postscript to the foregoing letter. I have just now sent to the post house for my letters again, this being the third day, and I am answered that they are not come, tho' I am very well assured that several people had their letters yesterday, nor do I expect them to-morrow, because the ministers are not come from Fontainebleau till night. I hope there is nothing of great consequence in them, so that their curiosity will not be much satisfied, but the proceeding is a little extraordinary, and such as I believe people do not meet with on our side. Mons^r. (Fromont) particularly, a considerable, (Banquier) had an account by Monday's letters (whether true or false I know not) of the loss of a great English merchant man in the mouth of the Thames, which makes the complaint just enough.

On the same page is pinned a short note in French, endorsed "Pour Monsieur Godet." Sir, we have not received any letters from London but other private persons have had some, since they have had intelligence from Mons^r. P. Formont of the loss of this great English ship at the mouth of the Thames worth 1,700,000*l*. I know nothing else at present, being so busy as not to be able to reply to yours. Send me back the bearer by 4 o'clock p.m. I may have something to inform you. I am, &c. the 11th Nov. 1682.

1682, Nov. 14th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Wynne.—I received yours of Oct. the 26th, o. s., for which I return you many thanks. The news in it of the election of Sir Will. Pritchard was very acceptable to me, and to all those who love the King's affairs here. I must intreat you to excuse my not writing to Mr. Secretary by this post, and to give him my most humble service. I thought to have sent him the project of the Arrest in the affair of Orange, which is not yet published, but I believe he may have had before this time. P.S. Be pleased to tell Mr. Secretary that the memoire for the fonds of this month will be given out on Monday next, and that this day or to-morrow will go by voiture 200,000*l*. for Flanders.

1682, Nov. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Recommends Mons^r. Dalmagne the bearer. . . .

1682, Nov. 18th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Marquesse of Halifax, when made Lord Privy Seal.—If I do not so early as other people congratulate with your lordship upon the subject of his Majesty's late grace and favour to you, it is not because I am less rejoiced at it, or that I take less part in all the good fortune which may arrive to you than others do, but because I was loath to importune your lordship or to take up any of that time which I know you spend so usefully in the service of the King and of the public . . . I found yesterday by Mons^r. de Croissy that they have had nothing yet from Spain touching the proposal to the King, and that it is the opinion of this Court that no very direct answer is at present to be expected, which hath doubtless made this King already take his resolutions and measures for the beginning of the next month. Vast fonds of money and unusual sums are preparing. The ambassadors of France at Francfort are already making up their baggage, and putting themselves into an estate of part immediately upon the expiration of the terms if the Spaniards still continue in the opinion they have lately been, so that as things look at present it is difficult to imagine how a rupture can be prevented. I am very glad to hear that things go so well with us at home, and that his Majesty hath received so good satisfaction in the elections of London. . . .

1682, Nov. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. By the course which I had yesterday at Versailles with Mons^r. de Croissy I find that this Court hath yet had no account from Spain of any resolutions taken there concerning the proposition lately made to them, nor that at present they do expect any direct one, so that I question not but that measures are taken here for the beginning of the next month.—News from Turin.—The affairs betwixt this Court and Rome seem at present to be in a little better posture than lately. It is said that the Pope intends to send a magnificent present to the Duc de Bourgogne, and that the Nonce who brings it shall reside here. But this wants confirmation. The Genoese hath been long under apprehensions of the designs of this King against them, but of late they seem to have some good hopes because of some civilities that have lately passed betwixt the Duc de Mortemar at his entrance with the French galleys into their port, and them.—News from Vienna and Stockholm . . . It is said that the Duc of Zell upon applications made to him by the Duke of Gottorpe hath answered that he would not wholly declare himself against the King of Denmark till he had adjusted his measures with Sweden. Orders are given out here to procure all the letters of exchange which can be had for Italy. The memoir of the fonds cannot be had before the next post. Having received the last week another letter from poor Mr. Whiting of Lisle, that he is threatened anew to have the late violences acted over again for the payment of a pension to his daughter, I spoke yesterday to Mons^r. de Croissy in it, and desired that all violent pursuits against him might be stopped at present, he continuing to be still subject to his natural Prince, having taken no letters of naturalization, and so not obliged to laws made for the subjects of France; he seemed to receive the matter favourably enough, and hath promised me to move the King in it, and to give me a speedy answer. I also moved him in the business of Mr. Long (as I have had former instruction to do) having received several letters from him about it; and desired that he would move the King to make him be acknowledged consul of the English nation at Marseilles, he having had his Majesty's commission to exercise that function a long time. He hath promised me to acquaint the King with it upon the first opportunity; but he said that the French had no consuls in England, and he did not think it more necessary for trade that the English should have in this kingdom. I told him that the great number of English negotiators residing in this country, and particularly in Marseilles, made it very necessary to have consuls established there, and in other ports also, and therefore I hope no difficulty would be made in this business.

1682, Nov. 21st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir Thos. Cutler.—I received yours of the fourth current, s. v. . . . I have enclosed according to your desire a certificate of your being knighted, but I do not know whether the form will please the heralds or not . . . I have procured my most humble service to Sir Robert Atkins, and let him know that I am very glad to hear his return into England.

A copy of the certificate is pinned on the same page as the letter and signed by Lord Preston.—“These are to certify that I was present in his Majesties bed-chamber at Whitehall, when hee was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood upon Sir Thomas Cutler, and that I saw it done. In witness whereof I have hereunto sett my hand and seale at Paris this 21st day of November, st. no., 1682, Preston.” By order of . . . Row. Tempest.

1682, Nov. 21st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have at last procured a copy of the Arrêt given in the affair of Orange, but it is not as yet published according to form; I was in some doubt whether or not to send it, because here is a report that the copy of it with the genealogy of the Dukes of Longueville have been sent over from hence to his Majesty. I shall observe to you that towards the end of it you will find these words à savoir motus requeroit que le titre de Souveraineté Ser. seroit rayé; upon which this interpretation is put, that the King doth not now set up a new title to the sovereignty of Orange as some people who do not so well understand the affair would persuade themselves; but that the truth is, that as the pretensions which the King hath upon that sovereignty as Comte of Provence, and Dauphin of Viennois, have not yet ever been judged en dernier ressort, the Parliaments of Provence, and Dauphiné, to which heretofore all appeals from judgments given in the Courts of Orange lay, have ever protested against all acts which might derogate from the sovereignty of the King, and of the Grand Conseil, which since the year 1531 hath always taken cognizance of the differences arising betwixt the contending families, &c. . . . Letters from Holland of the 15th say that the States General are now anew resolved to send Mons^r. Hensius hither, with the character of Ambassador Extraordinary; that they are daily considering of his instructions, which will be principally to endeavour the preservation of the peace, and to make strong instances in the affair of Orange, &c. . . . People here seem to think that the blows of Luxembourg is already begun, since the country people have been forbid to carry in any forage, and since the troops quartered on that side are already either actually marching or in a condition to march. It is reported also that a courier is dispatched to Francfort with orders to the plenipotentiaries of this King to propose a continuation of the term till the last day of the next month; but besides that the marching of the troops, and this seems to be a contradiction. I have some reason to believe that there are no such orders sent.—Italian News.— . . . Mons^r. de la Fuenté, the ambassador of Spain, hath twice demanded his Congé of the King within these few days, but hath not as yet had any answer . . . The fonds for the next month for the extraordinaries of war are these . . . I have had a complaint made to me by some merchants of the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, that whereas time out of mind they have trafficked with this nation in stockings, and other manufactories of wool and silk, and have always had liberties, after they had made their markets here, and bought commodities which they usually carried home, to carry the remainder of their money in specie home with them without ever being stopped under pretext of any edict forbidding the exporting of gold or silver out of the kingdom, it nevertheless happened that t'other day, embarking themselves at the port of Containville, in Normandy, in a little vessel, with several bags of silver with them, they were arrested, and their money seized by the officers of the Douanne, and yet detained by them. They desired me to make instances for them at Court, which with his Majesty's leave I shall willingly do, because I believe their case hard, and their complaint just. They have already given a requete to the King, but as yet have had no answer, &c. . . . Lord Preston cites the second and third Articles of the Treaty of Commerce concluded betwixt the two Crowns, the 24th of Feb. 1677. . . . I do not clearly comprehend his Majesty's commands concerning Capt. O'Connor. Be pleased in your next to let me know whether it be intended that I propose anything in his behalf or only that I should countenance, and own him, as one for whom his Majesty hath a regard upon any occasion which may be for his advantage.

1682, Nov. 27th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The bearer thereof, Mons^r. Achtausen, the Duke of Holstein's Envoyé in this Court, being commanded by his master to pass into England upon his affairs, hath desired me to recommend him to the favour and protection which I take the confidence to do, as being a person of singular worth and merit.

1682, Nov. 27, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his brother, Col. Grahme.—Recommends the bearer, Mons^r. Achtausin, Envoyé to the Duke of Holstein in this Court. . . .

1682, Nov. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of Rochester. . . . I can with a great deal of satisfaction confirm to your lordship that true account which I gave to Mr. Secretary of Mr. Dolben. . . .

and his brother ought to be charged upon no other account than their own worth.

1682, Nov. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Capt. O'Connor. — . . . I have received by two several posts his Majesty's commands concerning you by Mr. Secretary Jenkins, which I shall with much satisfaction obey, but defer to do so (according to your desire) till your arrival, which I hope will be soon. . . .

1682, Nov. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The post which should have been here yesterday is not yet arrived. By that before I received his Majesty's commands concerning Mons^r. Ammonet, which I shall obey so soon as I am applied to here by any one from him. The Dutch ambassador hath sent to me several times to know if I had received any order in the affair of Orange, which maketh me believe that if application hath not been already made to his Majesty for the employing his offices with the most Christian King in it, the Prince, or the States design soon to do it. I have, therefore, been more careful to know the true state of the case, and the reason and ground of this King's pretensions, that his Majesty may be rightly informed, and having the whole matter before him, may better know how to take his measures. In my last I sent you the arrest given in this business, and also some account of his most Christian Majesty's pretensions to be sovereign of that principality, but since I have informed myself farther of that matter, and can give you this account which followeth:—The King as Comte of Provence pretends to fealty and homage from the Princes of Orange. The condition of this treaty was, that if the said sum was not paid in the time limited, the Comte de Provence should remit to the Prince his fealty and homage. The Princes of Orange pretend that the sum hath not been paid, but in answer to that here it is said that it may be proved that it hath been offered and refused, and that besides that this contract should be null, for several reasons out of their law, which it were too long here to deduce.

—He goes into the history of Orange.— . . . We have the assurance of his Majesty's orders to his plenipotentiaries at Ratisbon to continue there, and to receive till the first of Feb. next all propositions which may be made to him for the establishing of peace, and a perfect intelligence betwixt him and the empire. A courier which arrived the other day from Montpellier hath brought the news of the arrest of the Parliament of Tholouze being published there, ordering the demolition of the temple of that place, and yesterday an English gent. was arrested here, being accused of a conspiracy against the King, and of holding correspondence prejudicial to his service with some of the Protestants of Languedoc. He was sent the last night to the Bastille, and his papers were seized by the Lieutenant-General de Police, and sent to Versailles, and his doors were sealed up. He goes by the name of Charleton here, and hath lived near 6 years at Montpellier, but his true name is Courteine, and he is heir to Sir Willm. Courteine, and to his broken fortune, upon which account he hath been forced to travail here and conceal his name. Mons^r. Achtausen the Duke of Holstein's Envoyé in this Court was with me the last night to acquaint me that he had received the orders of his master to pass into England upon his affairs and to continue some weeks there. . . . I suppose it is to desire his Majesty to interpose his offices with the King of Denmark on his behalf, who now presseth him very hardly in his country.

P.S. (In Lord Preston's handwriting.) Since the finishing of my letter I am told that the charge against Mr. Charleton is high: but that it is kept very secret, and also that if Mr. Hamden the younger had been here still he would have also been seized upon the same account. I know he hath been thro' all Switzerland, and a great part of Germany and of France, with the Protestants of which places he may have entertained a correspondence. . . .

1682, Dec. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I was yesterday at Versailles, and I found by discourse with Mons^r. de Croissy that what his Majesty was pleased to propose by Mons^r. Barillon was not ill received. I governed myself in what I said by your directions. He told me he could not then acquaint me with the resolution of the King his master in that affair, but that at night he would receive his orders and dispatch a courier this day to Mons^r. de Barillon. He said in general, that he knew great consideration would always be had in this Court for whatever his Majesty should propose, and expressed himself so, that I believe before this comes to your hands you will hear by this French ambassador that a delay is accorded. . . .

1682, Dec. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Arlington.—I have received the honour of your lordship's of the 13th of Nov., s. v., and in it your commands concerning Mons^r. Ammonet, with which I shall endeavour to comply [when] good opportunity I shall have. When he first petitioned the King our master in this affair, he might have sold any part of his estate here without asking leave; for tho' there hath been an edict prohibiting Protestants to sell their estates, and Catholics to buy them, it was only enregistered in the Greffe of the Parliament of Paris, but never published, so that it had not the force of a law; but since within these three days the case is altered, for by an arrest of this Parliament publication hath been made of the edict before-mentioned, and no one of the religion can either sell or buy without permission. . . .

1682, Dec. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received your last of the 20th of Nov., s. v., and in it his Majesty's commands concerning the merchants and inhabitants of the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, which I shall obey upon the first opportunity I have. . . .—News from Vienna.

1682, Dec. 9th, s. n. The same to the same.—The post which should have been here upon Monday is not yet arrived.—News from Vienna and Italy.— . . . Mons^r. Mayererone, the Envoyé of Danemarke, made me a visit the other day, and after some discourse, I found it was to sound me concerning the voyage of Mons^r. Achtausen into England. He told me, he was informed that his Majesty was sending an Envoyé into Danemarke; I told him I had not heard of it, but that if his affairs required it it might very well be. He told me he heard that it would be at the instance of the Duke of Holstein, whose Envoyé was gone into England to desire his Majesty to interpose his offices towards the accommodating of matters betwixt the King his master and the Duke. I answered that Mons^r. Achtausen was gone into England, but that I knew nothing of his commission.—Their conversation on the subject. . . .

1682, Dec. 12th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Clarendon.— . . . The bearer, our good friend doctor Turner, I suppose will have recounted to you the many disasters of his journey from this place. I pitied him as he knoweth upon many accounts, but I did not think that his misfortunes would have been so many as I hear they have been. We seem here to think of no business . . . Postscript. Since I have ended my letter I am assured the voyage of the Comte de Roy to Danemarke is by the order of the King retarded for some time, some new measures being taken.

1682, Dec. 12th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to his brother Mr. Fergus Graham.— . . . Mr. Wigan hath spoken to me about a very ingenious young man, Mr. Mercator, who is in Mr. Bridge's offices, under Coll. Leg in the Ordinance. He is son to the famous mathematician of that name; and if my Lord Burford comes over, if any employment could be found for him under him, it might do well. . . .

1682, Dec. 12th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I wonder to find by your last that the courier dispatched to Mons^r. Barillon with this King's resolution concerning the prolongation of the term should be so long behind the mail, for Mons^r. de Croissy promised me to dispatch him the next day, and I believe he did so. I question not but that he arrived soon after that your letters came away. I received your cypher of the 23rd of Nov., st. ve., for which I return you my humble thanks. I cannot find by the discourses which I have had with the Spanish ministers here any great inclination towards the accepting of the arbitrage offered by his Majesty, the great aim of the allies is once to engage him in a war, and then to give him as little assistance as they can. For their great maxime is that England is rich, and that it ought to bleed in its turn as well as other estates; but as his Majesty hath long known their design so he knows very well how to frustrate it. The last letters from Madrid by the ordinary bring the news of the acceptation of the propositions made by his Majesty under the conditions declared before by the ministers of Spain in England and Holland; but yet there are some particular advices which give some occasion to believe that the arbitrage of the King our master will be accepted, if in a little time no other conditions can be obtained. This advice is confirmed also from Amsterdam, by letters of the 7th of this month, which add further, that a remise is very soon to be made from Spain into the low countries of 600,000 crowns, and that 50,000 crowns were already sent to the Princes of Luxembourg. An ambassador extraordinary from Holland begins now again to be expected here, because we hear from thence that the deputies of the States general are assembled to deliberate upon his instructions. . . .

1682, Dec. 16th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same. I went yesterday to Versailles with a resolution to move Mons^r. de Croissy in the affaire of the merchants of Jersey. At my arrival I found them there, and they told me that they having presented a requeste at their first arrival to Mons^r. Colbert had yesterday this answer to it from one of his Commis.; that the demand which they had made of having the money seized by the officers of the Customs at Coutainville in Normandy restored to them was not granted; and without giving any other reason for that refusall, tho' asked, their petition was again put into their hands.—Lord Preston's conversation with M. de Croissy on the subject.—. . . I have lately received letters from Sir John Lanier and from Sir Philip, and Sir Edward Cartaret, who all assure me that without the continuation of this liberty those islands cannot trade, and consequently not subsist. . . . Mr. Charleton was on Sunday last released from his imprisonment in the Bastile. He hath been with me since, and tells me that he was examined in general upon some correspondences which they suspected he had had with the Protestants of Montpellier, and in Longuedoc. All things are restored to him but his papers.

cypher.

L'Abbe Princi is lately at liberty, and as I am very sure hath a pension settled upon him, and a sum of ready money given him now. The extract of the Treaty betwixt this King and the Duke of Savoy, which I sent you by the last post (and told you then it was suspected), is supposed by all people to be fictitious, and is almost proved so now by certain marks.—News from Italy.—The Comte de Castillo arrived on Sunday last from Spain with the character of Envoyé of that King to compliment his most Christian Majesty upon the birth of the Duke of Burgundy, but it is thought that he will not in haste have his audience because he hath a particular order not to give the quality of Duke of Burgundy to the young Prince, and in appearance here they are resolved to insist upon that circumstance.—News from Vienna.

1682, Dec. 19th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—. . . It hath been discoursed of here for some days that Mons^r. de Louvois was made Garde des Sceaux and the title of Chancellour to continue to his father for life. But it is not a thing yet done. . . . We hear that Mons^r. Verjus, the Plenipotentiary of France at Ratisbonne, did present the first day of the month a memorial to the Diet, which contained in substance, and almost in the same words, that which the ambassadors of France represented the same day at Francfort. . . .

1682, Dec. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Col. Oglethorpe.—. . . His (Oglethorpe's) nephew is a very pretty young gentleman, and he will no doubt make a good man. . . .

1682, Dec. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Blathwait.—I have received yours of the 7th, s. v., with an account in it of his Majesty's orders to Mons^r. Faliseau to depart the kingdom, for which I return you my thanks. I think his Majesty hath done but what was right in this case, for assuredly he had instructions from and correspondence with others than the Elector of Brandebourg, as would soon have appeared by his negotiations if he had been received. Your advice of what passed concerning him came very seasonably to me, for I had been before attacked by Mons^r. Spanheim in this affair, of which I gave notice to his Majesty by Mr. Secretary Jenkins, and again yesterday at Versailles (he having received an account by Monday's post of what past), but by the favour of that letter I knew better how to answer him, and did so far lay home to him that the reasons which his Majesty had to do what he hath done that he seemed to be satisfied. . . .

1682, Dec. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax. I received the honour of your lordship's of the 4th current, s. v., upon Monday last. . . . Your lordship judges very right that the prolongation of the term lately obtained by his Majesty is the likeliest means to preserve the peace of Christendom, and the world hath reason to wonder that the Spaniards and their allies either do not or will not seem to see it. I have frequent occasions here of conversing with the ministers of Spain, of which there are now three in this Court, and in their discourses they seem still to be averse from accepting the arbitrage of our master, and urge the same things which their Envoyé at the Hague hath lately offered in a memorial. . . . One of those ministers told me the other day that he could wish with all his heart that the King my master would find out a temperament for the composing of those differences. I asked him if he could propose any temperament, or any means more likely to produce the effect he intended than that of his Majesty's accepting the arbitrage proposed. He said he believed that if the King would call a Parliament it would put him into a better condition to bring this King to reason, whose custom it is to observe no Treaties longer than they appear to be for his advantage, unless he be forced to it. . . . I answered that his Majesty was in very good circumstances and in a capacity to undertake the arbitrage, and also to see that what was concluded should be observed: that I believed he would not be pleased that any one should prescribe to him the time of calling his Parliament, that he would do it when his affairs required it, and not before. . . .

1682, Dec. 23rd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received two of yours of the 4th instant, s. v., in one of which you are pleased to let me know that his Majesty would be glad to know what offices the Dutch ambassadeur would engage me in the affair of Orange. I acquainted you some time since by one of the 28th of Nov. last that the Dutch ambassadeur had sent to me twice or thrice to know if I had received any orders in that affair; my answer was that I had not, which was all that passed betwixt us. . . . I have it from a good hand that it is resolved that Mons^r. Heinsius shall come, but his journey is retarded at the present till they know his Majesty's resolutions, it being hoped there that I shall have his commands to act in concert with him. It is my duty to represent all things as truly as I can; and I must tell you that I believe no manner of success is to be hoped from any instances which may be made in that affair. For besides what is personal betwixt this King and the Prince they do say that it is a private business, and that it doth no way regard the affairs of Europe. . . . Mr. Charleton's enlargement from the Bastille hath answered a great part of your other letter, only I must observe to you that Mr. Poney hath a little overshot himself in telling you that I expected orders to deliver in a memorial in that affair; for besides the folly of the thing, you may assure yourself I should not communicate with him in my business. . . . I yesterday hinted to Mons^r. de Croissy the orders which his Majesty had given to the Governor of Tangier upon the subject of Mons^r. de Seignelay's letter to Mons^r. Barillon, and I also added that his Majesty was resolved strictly to observe all the treaties in force betwixt the two Crowns. I found it was very well received, and he promised me to acquaint the King his master with it. I had not omitted to have mentioned the prolongation of the term to you if I had not known you would have it from the French ambassadeur long before the arrival of my letter. . . .

1682, Dec. 23rd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I was yesterday in hopes to have had the King's answer from Mons^r. de Croissy in the affair of the merchants of Jersey, but I found that he had not spoke to him in it, though I believe he had to his brother, for he begun to dispute, and refine upon it; but when I urged the words of the Treaty he could not offer much against them. I told him that I had his Majesty's orders to use my utmost endeavours to procure a restitution of the money seized, and to prevent any such proceeding for the future, and that if justice were not soon done I should find myself indispensably obliged to apply to his most Christian Majesty in it. He hath promised me not to fail to procure me an answer soon, and the men are ordered to attend the council to-morrow. . . . Mons^r. Spanheim took an occasion again yesterday to speak to me in the affair of Mons^r. Faliseau, he having received an account from England of his Majesty's late orders to him to depart the kingdom, as also the copies of the letters which passed betwixt the King and the Elector, which I suppose were transmitted to him from Berlin. By the favour of Mr. Blathwayte, I was also advised of what had passed and had also the copies of those letters, which enabled me to be the better to justify the reasons which his Majesty had to do what was done.—The conversation with Spanheim.—. . . The Spanish ministers here seem to have the same sentiments in the affair of the arbitrage; and I find build yet upon a further prolongation of the term.

The Envoyé lately arrived from Spain hath not yet given notice (as is usual) to the Introduceur des Ambassadeurs of his arrival. He hath certainly instructions not to give the title of Duc de Bourgogne to the young Prince. The Queen as well as the King is very angry at it, and hath refused to see him privately as she usually hath the ministers sent from that Court. . . . The King of Danemarke and the Elector of Brandebourg are certainly resolved to break the peace in the month of January next . . . It is not my custom to be very positive, but I dare adventure to assure you of this. And what more confirms it is the daily accounts we have here of the great preparations which both these Princes have made of late for war. So that if his Majesty (as I am sure he doth) resolve to hinder hostilities, and to prevent the breaking out of a war, he hath no time to lose, but must soon take his resolutions in a matter in which both his glory and his interest are concerned.—News from Constantinople and Vienna.

1682, Dec. 26th, s. n. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Coventry . . . I have sent you some melon seeds, which I am told are of the best sorts. . . . I am promised soon some of the Spanish and Italian kinds, and if I can procure them I will not fail to send them to you.

1682, Dec. 26th, s. n. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. Monsr. de Croissy reported the affair of the merchants of Jersey concerning their money seized upon Wednesday last at the council before the King, and it was there resolved upon the report to write to Monsr. Barillon to know how it is practiced in England in regard of the French, and if they are suffered to export the coin of the kingdom without particular permission. The letter is this day written to Monsr. Barillon, and I believe goes by the post. . . . Some streaks of light begin now to appear, and one of the Spanish ministers hath of late explained himself in the affair of the arbitrage. For being asked why it was not accepted in his court, he answered, because they had no mind to part with Luxembourg, which they were sure was to be sacrificed if they did accept it. Yet he said he believed the proposal would be received if the King of England would call his Parliament. Being asked why they did not declare that now, he answered that they knew well enough that France had no mind to enter into a war at present, but if it so happened that they came to be much pressed, it would be time enough to declare it then. . . .

1682, Dec. 30th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Monsr. Haythausen, Envoyé from Holstein to England.

1682, Dec. 30th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I am told that Monsr. de Barillon hath written to Monsr. de Croissy that you had spoken to him from the King, and recommended earnestly the affair of the merchants of Jersey to him, and that he hath also desired him to use his endeavours that they may have satisfaction by restoring their money to them. I also the other day had an opportunity of moving the King in it and of acquainting him fully with the case of these men. He heard me very favourably, &c. . . . I am made to believe that it is designed that these men shall have their money returned to them, but that it shall be as a grace, and not as a right. If this be, and if we cannot have the points settled at once, new complaints will every day arise, and his Majesty and his minister here will never be free from them. The siege of Luxembourg is now again hotly discoursed of here, but I must own that it is extremely hard to make any judgment of what is designed. . . . A courier is dispatched hence in all diligence to Lisbon to propose the Duke de Vermandor for the Infanta, and if that be not approved of, then the Prince de Roche sur yon is to be offered. The first most people conclude will be rejected as not being legitimate, and they doubt much whether they will admit of the other, tho' he be a Prince of very extraordinary qualities. Of this I assure you. The last letters say that the ministers here are proposing the Prince of Bavaria, or one of the house of Medici. We have an account also from Turin of the imprisonment of the Marquis de Pianezza, lately the Premier minister there. The true cause of his disgrace I believe is yet known to few, tho' many here pretend to assign it, that which seems to be the most likely is that he having suggested secretly to the Duke that he ought to send Madame Royall his mother to a convent, that so he might be absolute in the government of his estates for the future, &c. . . . The late Plenipotentiarys of France at Frankfurt are arrived, and on Monday last were at Versailles to render an account of their negotiation.—News from Vienna We are much surprised here at the proceedings against Sir Henry Goodricke at Madrid; perhaps Sir Henry's restraint may have put him out of the way of giving you an account of the particulars of it, I shall therefore recount to you what we have of it here by letters of the 10th current from Madrid. Some days before an order of council was made by which Sir Henry was ordered to take down his Majesty's arms from above his gate, and to go out of the town, the Introducteur des Ambassadeurs was ordered to signify this to him, who, going to his house, acquainted his secretary with it, and charged him to notify the order to Sir Henry; he answered that he would not be charged with any such commission, and that he had best speak to himself and deliver the message. So that the order was no otherwise signified, nor at all observed. The Introducteur having advised the Duc de Medina Celi how the affair had passed, it was remitted to the council.—It was then proposed to send the Marquis de Los Balliards to him, but that advice was not followed, because by doing so they would acknowledge him to be a minister, after having declared that they would not own him as such. It was then resolved that that very day the Sieur Portocarrero, Alcade Mayor, with several other Alcades, should go and take him in his house, and conduct him out of the city. That was executed upon the 10th. The Alcade Mayor, with several other of the Alcades, and a great number of Alguazils, seized him in his lodgings, and made him immediately go into one of their coaches, and with that train of Alguazils conducted him to a convent of the Hieronymites out of the town. My Lady Goodricke was the same day conducted to the same place, with the difference that she was conveyed in the Dutch ambassador's coach, and two letters which I have seen say that she was not escorted by those Alguazils.

1682, Jan. 2nd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same. I have been endeavouring for some time to trace Mr. Hampden the youngest in his travels through France, Switzerland, and Germany, in all which places he hath been extremely industrious to vilify and misrepresent our Governors and Government, both in Church and State, and here in particular he hath blown up the Protestants, and given them strange impressions of the King and his ministers. At this, however, I should not have wondered much, because I know that it is the principle of his family to hate their Prince, and to endeavour to ruin our monarchy. But I must confess I am surprised at this, with which I shall acquaint you and which I certainly know to be true, which is, that he had a letter of recommendation from Monsr. de Barillon to the Archbishop of Paris, and that he was at least four or five times with him during his stay here. This matter got wind amongst the Protestants, which made them entertain some suspicion of him, tho' before he was looked upon as one sent from heaven to save them. He hearing of this was forced to own that he had such a letter, but that he did not visit the Archbishop but sent it by another hand. I must, Sir, speak the truth to you, and tell you that it is evident to him who observeth the least that the Phanatick party is highly countenanced from hence whatever may be pretended to the contrary, and that tho' the hand is at present invisible that keeps the breach open yet in time the effect will shew its cause. I hint this, Sir, only to your self. I confess I do not know what use you will make of it, more than that perhaps you will think it fit to have an eye upon the gentleman, and that it may enable you to judge better of the proceedings of such men who pretend to reform so very thoroughly as he and his party do, and also of their ends.

1682, Jan. 2nd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same. The cause of the imprisonment of the Marquis of Pianezza, at Turin, is now certainly known to be that which I mentioned to you in my last, which was, that he endeavoured to persuade the Duke his master to shut up Madame Royale in a convent, and to take the whole authority upon himself.—News from Ratisbon and Polish news. . . .

1682, Jan. 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Robson. . . . I hope my Lord Rochester and the commissioners of the treasury will now think of me that I may not be troublesome to you nor my other friends more. The last day of December, our style, will be the last day of another quarter, so that I shall then have another half a year due to me for my ordinaries. . . .

1682, Jan. 6th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of London I hope you will not doubt of my utmost endeavours for Madame de Regny. I will take the first good occasion of moving the King in it since we have had so ill success with his minister. I heartily hope that what she desires may be granted. But I must sincerely tell your lordship I dare not hope much. . . .

1682, Jan. 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins I could not yesterday at Versailles know the King's positive answer in the affair of the merchants of Jersey, tho' I did press Monsr. de Croissy upon it. I believe they have not yet heard from Monsr. de Barillon, and till they have his answer I do not think that anything will be concluded. Nothing is yet resolved in the affair of Monsr. Ammonet. Monsr. de Croissy told me that there was something particular in what related to him, and I find they have conceived some prejudice against him. I shall not fail to do all that in me lyeth to serve him.

By a singular circumstance, which I had at the same time with Mons^r de Croissy, I am led to believe that another letter may be granted.

The French Embassy at Genoa hath signified to that Republic by the order of the King his master that his Majesty had commanded his officers at sea to visit not only their ships, but also their galleys which intimation hath been received there with all the chagrin yet with all the respect that could be . . . I have enclosed a letter from the Emperor to the Spanish ambassador here upon the affair of Mons^r de Chassignet, and also a late harangue of the imperial resident to him.

1683, Jan. 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

1683, Jan. 9th, Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Whiting. Assures him of attention to his case.

1682, Jan. 9th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. This morning I received a letter from Mr. Whiting of Lille of which I have enclosed a copy. You will find that he was threatened with a garrison which I believe before this time is placed in his house . . . I shall be very glad to know what his Majesty will command me further to do, for some speedy course must be taken not only to hinder the ruin of Mr. Whiting, but also to assert the privileges of all his Majesty's other subjects who do, or shall live in the French Dominions.

1682, Jan. 10th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of Oxford . . . The Spaniards seem still to be averse from accepting the arbitrage of the King our master, and this King doth at present as much press it. The late delay accorded to them will expire on Friday next, and I am apt to believe they will not move his Majesty to employ his officers here for a further prolongation, tho' it is said the Hollanders will, but as yet I have received no orders concerning it. Never was conjuncture so favourable for England as this. I wish to God his Majesty may lay hold of the advantages of it; another opportunity like this can scarce ever be offered to him, and I must assure your lordship that however our councils may be censured at home, and whatever may be said of them, it is a most glorious figure which his Majesty makes abroad.

1683, Jan. 13th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins . . . In my last to you, I enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. Whiting, as I do another, which I received yesterday from him. By it you will find that they have constrained him to submit to the payment of a pension to his daughter by putting a garrison into his house. He writes a little hotly, but the treatment which he receiveth must plead his excuse. On Monday I received this answer in his affair from Mons^r de Croissy, that the King's intention was not to discharge Mr. Whiting of that pension, it being not just he should refuse bread and substance to his daughter under pretext that she is converted to the Catholic faith, for altho' that the said Whiting be not naturalized, his actual abode at Lille, which is within the French territory, for now near 20 years together, maketh him to be regarded as upon the same foot with the natural subjects of the King in what respects politic regulations to which he must submit as well as they, &c. . . . Upon the affair concerning the restitution of the money belonging to the merchants of Jersey seized at Coutanville, he told me, that the King had not yet had an answer from his ambassador in London concerning some lights which he demanded of him in that affair, but that they did expect it soon, and then I should have his Majesty's positive resolution and answer to my demand . . . In the affair of Mons^r Ammonet he told me that in consideration of the instances of the King my master, his Christian Majesty granted permission to the said Mons^r Ammonet to continue in England with his wife and family, and that in his case he had dispensed with the payment of his late ordinances. I have sent inclosed the brevet which came to my hands on Monday. Having been pressed much by Mr. Lang, to whom his Majesty hath given a patent to be consul of the French nation at Marseilles, and also having by my original instructions his Majesty's orders to solicit Mons^r de Croissy to move Mons^r de Croissy in it, and desired that he might be acknowledged as such and admitted to exercise that charge there. He assured me that the King could not permit that there should be a French consul in that city of Marseilles, because French consuls are not permitted in the towns of trade in England, nor in any other of his Majesty's dominions, and that besides, these consuls are useless and fitter to trouble commerce than to favour it . . . I find indeed that the English merchants themselves are against the having of any consul there, and that they find means to oppose the admitting and approving any one by the King, so that I do not know whether his Majesty will think fit to have any more instances made concerning this affair.—News from Vienna . . .

Having received no letters of late, I did not go yesterday to Versailles, but I am assured that Mons^r de Croissy did say that they had received their letters from Spain by which they found that that Court had refused the arbitrage of his Majesty. I suppose you will have had notice of this, if true, before this can reach you. We hear that Sir Henry Goodrick is still at the convent to which they conducted him, but that the arms of his Majesty were still over the gate of his house, and that then they had not proceeded to the violence of pulling them down. There is nothing at all worth writing to you from Italy.—P.S. Since I concluded my letter, the agent of Mons^r Ammonet shewed me his desire that the original brevet might be put into his hands to make use of now.

1683, Jan. 13th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Whiting. I am infinitely troubled for what is happened to you. I received your 2nd letter yesterday, and have by this post transmitted a copy of it to the King with some reflexions of my own upon it, and also upon your treatment.

1682, Jan. 14th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to my Lord M. of Halifax . . . I find that after all the great things spoken here by the ministers of Spain they are in a most terrible fright, for yesterday & the day before I have had no less than two visits and one letter from the Baron Delval to know if I had received any orders to demand a further delay. They say that they believe Spain will not desire it. But I find that their great hopes are that the Dutch ministers have orders to move his Majesty, our master, once more to ask it.

1683, Jan. 20th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I have received the honour of two of yours of January 1st, s. v., one in answer to my letter concerning Mr. Hampden, and I most heartily thank you for it . . . I own that at first sight the circumstances of Mr. Hampden's being recommended to the Archbishop of Paris is a little unaccountable, but if you will consider that there is not a more intriguing man in the world than the Archbishop, and also that he and father la Chaise are employed underhand to carry on all sorts of designs as well temporal as other by this King's ministers, and also that there can be nothing of more advantage to their religion, than to keep on foot the dispute amongst the English Protestants, and the divisions in our Church, for which no persons are fitter than those of Mr. Hampden's principles, you will not find it strange that he should have been addressed to him. Besides you will imagine that things of this kind being not so much accused, yet it would have been a little too plain to have given him recommendations to Mons^r de Louvois or to Mons^r Colbert. Upon the whole matter I have much reason to believe that the thing is true.

1683, Jan. 20th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same. The term being now expired, I find that the ministers of Spain have met with some disappointment, for I believe they did not doubt but that either his Majesty of himself, or upon the instances of the Dutch ministers, should have demanded a prolongation of it, which perhaps would not have been refused here. But how all soever the consequences may be, they are to put them all to their own account, and to charge them upon their own conduct. The explanation which you are pleased to make of that article of the treaty of commerce, which declares that silver and gold coined, or not coined, to be no merchandise contrabande, is extremely just . . . The Dutch ambassador being with me yesterday told me that he expects Mons^r Heinsius the next week. I find he thinks his stay will not be long, because there is no great hopes of his succeeding in his negotiations about Orange . . . Tho' the 15th of this month be past, yet his most Christian Majesty doth not begin to move, nor hath seemed yet to make any step towards a rupture. The only thing which may give a conjecture of a design in hand is that Mons^r de Channeley Maréchal de camp general, whose office it is to make all the campments, is parted within three or four days, but we cannot find yet which way he is gone. It is said that Italy has more reason to fear than her own country, and that Genoa is the place aimed at. It is said that the affairs betwixt this Court and Rome are not in a better posture than formerly.

1683, Jan. 20th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Dartmouth. I received your lordship's very obliging letter of Dec. 26th, s. v., from my wife, who arrived here upon Sunday last, after having been in a very great storm, as I know you have heard. Whenever my Lord Burford cometh here you may be assured that I am ready to do him all the service that I can, and that he shall be extremely welcome to me, and that I will take all imaginable care of his education. Mr. Digby shall also find that he hath a true servant here upon all occasions, and that if my advice or assistance may be of advantage to him he shall not want it. I am obliged to do this to any one in whom you are concerned, or who hath any relation to my Lady Dartmouth, to whom I present my most humble service.—Congratulates him on his new accession of honour. . . .

1683, Jan. 23rd, Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins . . . A report from Vienna that Comte Tekeli is dead in his way to Moncaz, and that it was believed that he was poisoned. But as the imperialists have heretofore spread the same report, a confirmation is to be expected. All the advices from Ratisbone give great hopes of a sudden peace with the empire, all the resolutions of the diet there seeming to tend that way. . . . Mons^r. Heinsius is expected here every day, and it is now said that though he comes expressly upon the affairs of Orange, yet whatever the success of that may be he shall reside here in the place of Mons^r. van Staremburg, who is to be recalled at his own desire. Letters of the 17th instant from Amsterdam and the Hague bring us the resolution of the Estates General to have 24 men-of-war at sea very well equipped . . . We hear from Madrid by letters of the 9th that Sir Henry Goodricke having complained that he was kept as a prisoner, the King had declared by a decret that he had his liberty to go where he pleased, provided that he did not come to Madrid. I find now that the Spanish ministers here are very sensible that the proceedings against Sir Henry Goodricke hath been ill-timed. . . .

1683, Jan. 27th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. The letters which should have been here on Monday are not yet arrived. I could yesterday at Versailles have no answer to the affair of the merchants of Jersey; it is still remitted till they have an answer concerning it from Mons^r. de Barillon. Mons^r. de Croissy seems to be very fair in the matter, but Mons^r. Colbert makes some difficulties as I am told . . . I did not find by Mons^r. de Croissy yesterday that they had any great hopes that the Dutch would yet change their measures, for he told me (as you were pleased to write to me) that he had heard from Mons^r. de Barillon that Mr. Claud-leigh had intimated to his Majesty that there were hopes that the States would press the Spaniards to accept the arbitrage, but that Mons^r. D'Avaux had advised the contrary, and that by his letters it did not appear that they were like to make this step soon, because the interest of the Prince of Orange continues still so very great with the estates of Holland. . . .

1683, Jan. 30th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I have received yours of the 15th, s. v., and am very glad to find by it that his Majesty hath been pleased to take the affair of Mr. Whiting into his consideration. He doth rightly consider that it gives a great scandal at present, and that hereafter it will have very ill consequences if the point be not settled. I shall endeavour with all care and exactness to inform myself of what you are pleased to propose. I have in some measure done it already, and I hope within a post or two to give you a satisfactory account of it.—News from Ratisbon.— . . . They are a little surprised here to find that the Nonce there doth cabal so strongly with the ambassador of Spaine against France, and they seem to believe that the Pope will not approve his conduct. I hope by the next post to give you some account of the affairs of Orange. Mons^r. Heinsius is now upon the road. . . .

1683, Jan. 30th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Whiting. I received a letter yesterday from Mr. Secretary Jenkins, which very much rejoiceth, and which assures me that the King taketh the affair very much to heart, and that he is resolved to right you. I have particular instructions concerning it, for informing the King of several points which he designeth to know, and I am assured that very soon I shall have orders to act vigorously. Being obliged to be at church this day, being the 30th Jan., and also it being the morning of my dispatch, I am mightily streightened in time, so that I can say no more at present, &c.

n. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I was the other day desired by Mons^r. Rambour, the painter, for whom I have obtained by his Majesty's order permission to retire into England, to transmit this enclosed memoir to you, and to beg of you if it be a thing to be granted that he may have a passport particular mentioned for them, that so they may not be seized at his arrival, they being things absolutely necessary for his trade. He is a very honest good man, and an excellent artist, having worked long for the King, and who may be serviceable to the King our master at Windsor. He will carry over very good effects with him. If a passport may be granted in this case, you will be pleased to transmit it to me.

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir Phillip Cartaret . . . I should sooner have acknowledged your letter if I had not attended the return of the hearers. We have not yet had any answer in their affair, tho' I have made many frequent and pressing instances in it, but I hope as to their particular case we shall do well enough and have satisfaction in it. I have written more at large to Sir Edward Cartaret, who I know will communicate my letter to you.—Complimentary.

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir Edward Cartaret. I was very glad to receive your obliging letter I was in hopes before this time to have given you an account that we had had success in the affair which you recommended to me, and that the instances which I have made in the name of the King our master had prevailed, but as yet I can have no answer, tho' I have had several conferences with Mons^r. de Croissy upon the subject, and one particular audience of the King. They have written to Mons^r. de Barillon and expect some lights from him, so that till they have his answer they will take no positive resolution. The Treaty of Commerce betwixt the two Crowns will, I am afraid, do us no good, for it is extremely defective in this and several other points, so that I believe his Majesty will be obliged in a small time to think of concluding a new one. The arguments which we must urge must be grounded upon the mutual tolerance and the constant usage, and the privilege that the subjects of Jersey and Guernsey have always had of exporting money in specie from this kingdom, as those France have had of bringing it from thence. This is the point which I am ordered to urge and press most, and you may assure yourself that I shall not fail to do whatever lies in me to procure a satisfaction to these merchants concerned. I am made to hope that in this particular case we shall have reason, but when that is done, I hope the King our master will think fit to have the point settled, otherwise seizures of this kind will be made every day, and so his Majesty will have frequent occasions of trouble.— . . .

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir John Lanier about the Jersey merchants.— . . . Speaks of the treaty as in the above letter to Sir E. Cartaret.—

The King and his ministers I find are of his opinion, and I have had so much signified to me by Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I do not know what may be done hereafter, but I am in hopes that in this particular case we may have right done us. I shall not fail to do what lies in my power to procure it for these injured merchants.

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir An. Forrester. I have received both your kind letters . . . The enclosed with a memoire of the privileges of the Scotch nation in France from Sir James Dick, I have also received, and I must entreat you to convey to him by the first ordinary. I am infinitely obliged to the Royal burroughs for the honour which they have done me at their last assembly. . . .

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir James Dick, late Provost of Edinburgh.

I have received yours of Jan. 11th, with a memorial concerning the privileges of the Scotch nation in France . . . I find myself infinitely obliged to the estate of the Royal Burroughs for the honour they did me at their last meeting in acknowledging, so much beyond my expectation or deserts, the good intentions I have of doing them service . . . At my departure I had the honour of his Majesty's instructions concerning this affair, but that being some time since, I have by this post written to have his more particular commands, which I expect in a few days, and then I shall not fail to begin my instances. . . .

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mons^r. D'Almagne. . . .

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of Rochester . . . I am to return my thanks to your lordship for your cheese; it makes a very considerable figure here, and is much for the credit of our country. The Frenchmen are very much surprised at the sight of it, it being of a size something beyond their Angelots . . . Complimentary.—

1683, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Robson . . . I suppose by this time my Lord Hyde and the commissioners of the treasury will think fit to remember me, and to have some consideration of a man who is obliged to live in this place, and to make some figure. I have examined your accounts, and find them extremely just and fair, and am ashamed that I am forced to be so much your debtor. . . .

1683, Feb. 3rd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Doctor Levot, Principal of Magdalen Hall in Oxford.—Complimentary.

1683, Feb. 3rd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Marquis of Halifax. I have some reason to suspect that sometimes our letters are looked into, which is the reason that I do not so often impart to your lordship what occurs as I would otherwise do, therefore I will take the confidence of the preventing any inconvenience which may arise from that practice to send to your lordship within a very few days by a trusty hand the project of a cypher which will be short and easy to be used, and I think extremely difficult to be found out. . . .

1683, Feb. 3rd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. Since the arrival of Comte Mansfield the ministers of Spain pretend to know positively the Emperor's resolution as to a treaty with France, and say &c. . . . Mons^r. Delvall being with me the other day, fell to discourse upon the present state of the Spanish affairs, he asked me if I had heard anything out of England concerning a further prolongation of the term? (for the report hath reached that Mons^r. de Barillon had privately acquainted his Majesty that the King his master would accord a delay till the last day of the last month). I told him that I had heard nothing of it, nor did expect to hear anything, since Spayne seemed to desire no such thing. He said that Mons^r. de Ronquillos had received a reprimand from the Spanish Court for desiring one the last time, he not having orders to do it, and he was sure that it would not be demanded this time because it would be a tacit owning of the pretensions of France. I answered that I wondered that the conduct of Mons^r. de Ronquillos should be disapproved on that occasion, since I thought that it was the most considerable piece of service that he was capable of doing to his master at that time.—Conversation about Luxembourg.— . . . I spoke with the Dutch ambassador the other day upon the affair of Orange, but I find he hath no particular instructions about it, so that I can give you no light into it till the arrival of Mons^r. Heinsius, who is now said to be upon his way.

1683, Feb. 3rd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—News from Vienna. . . .

We are in expectation here of an Envoyé Extraordinaire from the Emperor, in the place of Comte Mausfeldt, who goes for Spayne the next month, besides the resident ordinaire, who is to [be] established here. 'Tis thought he may come instructed to notify his Imperial Majesty's intentions for settling of the affairs of Germany. They seem to flatter themselves yet at Vienna with the hopes of a prolongation of a truce with the Turks, but, however, they are endeavouring to put themselves into the best posture of defence that they can. The demolition of the Fauxbourgs for an hundred paces about the city is continued with great diligence, and the fortifications in the great Island of the Danube for the securing of an army of 30,000 men is also very much advanced. . . . I shall within a few days be able to give you some lights in the business of Mr. Whiting. . . . I received yesterday a letter from Sir James Dick, late Provost of Edinbourg, with a memoire enclosed concerning the privileges of the Scotch nation in France with reasons for the obtaining of 50 sols per ton lately laid upon Scotch ships to be taken off.

I had, when I left England, his Majesty's orders about this affair, they having been obtained at the instance of his Royal Highness, and I had also an additional instruction concerning the Scotch privileges in general, but I don't think fit to move in this affair at this time without his Majesty's particular commands so to do.

LETTERS TO ENGLAND, 1683.

(Autograph note on the flyleaf). Nota. All lines that are marked, unless those where anything of another language is interposed, have been put in cypher thro' this whole book.

1683, Feb. 6th, Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have informed myself, I think, very particularly of whatever can relate to the affair of Mr. Whiting, and I shall convey my letters to you upon that subject by the hand of a gentleman who leaveth this place the next week, and intends in few days after to beat London. Mons^r. Heinsius, not being yet arrived, I cannot do so in a manner of what will be of great concern- ing the affair of Orange. . . .

1683, Feb. 9th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—(Autograph note.—Sent by my brother-in-law, Mr. Howard, Feb. 11th, '83.) I did receive, some time since, your letter of the 15th of the last month, s. v., concerning the affair of Mr. Whiting, of Lisle. But I have not been able to make any satisfactory return to it till now, tho' I have lost no time in endeavouring to inform myself of what may in any measure relate to this case. You are pleased in it to let me know that, the pension being newly paid for the quarter now running on, his Majesty will have the time employed in finding precedents whereby to make it appear by judicial decisions upon edicts, and ordonnances by the express declarations of the most Christian King himself, upon complaints to him made and by confessions of the ministers upon several occasions, that the edicts and ordonnances relating to the reformed religion were made and intended for French subjects alone, and not for strangers born; most especially not for English merchants. I have received also in the same letter inclosed the state of Mr. Whiting's case, as you have been pleased to draw it up, which is very exact and comprehends every particular which may concern it. I cannot yet inform myself of any judicial decisions which may have been upon the edicts and ordonnances relating to the reformed religion which may clear the point proposed, and I do not hope much that any will be found, but, however, I have ordered an exact search to be made for them, and I shall not fail to acquaint you with the success of it. In the time that Mr. Savile was his Majesty's minister here two cases happened in which he obtained a declaration from the Court much to our purpose, and which maketh it plainly appear that there is no reason for the subjecting the King's subjects not naturalized to the execution of an [all?] declarations, edicts, or arrests relating to religion. The first is the case of Mrs. Bickerton, an English gentlewoman, and the other is that of my Lord Hamilton, son to the Duke of Hamilton, both which died here. A little before their deaths the Commissaires du Chastelot and the Curé of St. Sulpice went to their several lodgings to make them declare, according to the declarations of the 2nd of December 1680, whether or not they would die in their religion. Mr. Savile having notice of this practice, complained of it to the Court, and the King ordered that the said commissaire and the said curé should go to his house and excuse themselves for what they had done, and that he should also be assured in his name that for the future no trouble of this kind should be given to the subjects of the King his master living in the French dominions, under pretext of new edicts, declarations, arrests, or reglemens touching religion. This declaration, then, being so general, must include this case of Mr. Whiting's, as well as all others. But nothing can make the intention of this King more evident than the words of the declaration itself, which I have enclosed, where, thro' all the parts of it, you will find that only his own subjects were intended to be included, and that no other words are used than nos sujets and nos sujets de la religion P. R., and that in whatsoever manner it is considered this will appear. If we consider the spiritual excitations, and the other means employed by his most Christian Majesty for the conversion of his subjects of the reformed religion, which are the only motives of that declaration of the 17th of June 1681, it will be found that they are by no means applicable to the subjects of the King our master, but only to the subjects of France, and that it is impossible to understand the declaration otherwise, for besides that part of it which regulates the pensions to new converts, it contains other depositions touching the education of such children who change their religion, which it would be ridiculous to apply to strangers. Mr. Whiting, in his last letter to me, acquainted me that the French ambassador did oppose to what you urged in his behalf, that a merchant stranger, when habitué or domicilié by more than 7 years residence in the French dominions is as much subject in his house and effects to the Ordonnances et Reglemens de Police as the native subjects are. I had this thing proposed by a friend of mine, the other morning, by way of discourse, to several advocats of the Palais, to know surely whether or not the assertion was grounded well, and they all laughed at it as a thing which hath no manner of ground or foundation in their law. I find generally that all those who have been consulted with upon this affair, and who have given their advises without pre-occupation or interest, are of opinion that there is no manner of reason to pretend to subject strangers not naturalized to the execution of this or of any other edict, or declaration, &c. concerning religion. I have enclosed the opinion of one advocate of very good credit here, which Mr. Whiting obtained before he left this place. I have myself consulted two others of the robe, who are very eminent in their profession, and very worthy men. I have pressed them to give me their opinions in writing upon this affair for my own satisfaction. But I can by no means induce them to that, they being apprehensive that it might turn to their prejudice if it were known that they had advised in such an affair. However, they have discoursed the matter very fully with me, and as near as I can remember I shall give you the substance of what they said.—He gives their reasonings at length.

1683, Feb. 10th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to his Royal Highness (the Duke of York). I did not receive the honour of your Highnesses letter of the 22nd of January, s. v., till yesterday; the packet boat having been stopped by contrary winds for some days. By the post before I received a letter from Sir James Dick, with a memoir inclosed concerning the privileges of the Scotch nation in general, and also with some addition of matter relating to the particular affair of 50 sols per tun exacted from the Scotch merchant ships. I have (as your Highness may be pleased to remember since you obtained it) an original instruction concerning the Scotch privileges in France, and also a particular order from his Majesty to demand the taking off of this imposition. But because it is a great while since the matter was moved to his Majesty, I thought fit to put him in mind of it again before I make instances in his name, which I have done by my letter to Mr. Secretary the last week. We have also a troublesome business or two depending to which I would have some answer before we make any demand in this case; which I believe will meet with difficulties, because it leads to the lessening of the finances, which are very strictly managed at this time. If your Highness will (as you are pleased to say you intend to do) speak to the French ambassador in this affair, it will be of great advantage to my offices here, and it will advance them much . . . I am much troubled to hear that the Duchess hath been ill; I hope it is past, and I wish with all my heart that she may give England the happiness of a young Prince. Since his Majesty and your Highness are pleased with my Lord Sunderland, all other people ought to be satisfied with what is done, and I hope he will be never unmindful of the obligations which he hath to you both.

1683, Feb. 10th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I received yours of the 22nd of Jan., s. v., but yesterday, the packet boat having been stopped by contrary winds. I received also the last night yours of the 25th, s. v., by Capt. Matthews late the last night. I shall give you an account of the affair about which you have written within a few days. I charge Mr. Howard, my wife's brother, with a letter concerning Mr. Whiting's affair; he leaveth this place to-morrow, and I hope within a few days will present it to you. Mons^r. Spanheim yesterday, at Versailles, told me that he was commanded by the Elector, his master, to acquaint me that he was troubled that he had given a character to Mons^r. Falliseau, since he was a person so unacceptable to his Majesty; if he had known that he would not have been agreeable to him he would by no means have sent him, and he desired me to assure his Majesty of this. He said further that his electoral Highness was troubled and surprised at one expression in his Majesty's last letter to him, which seemed to insinuate that he had held correspondence with his disaffected subjects, and given them encouragement to continue in their disobedience, and did assure me in his name, and did desire me to do the same to his Majesty, that he never had given no commission to his minister to entertain it, not that ever he would. But that he did not think fit to answer the letter, because it might occasion new disputes, and rather hinder than promote good intelligence, which he would endeavour to have with his Majesty. Mons^r. Spanheim also, upon his own account, made professions of service to his Majesty, having received great obligations and favours from him. I told him I should not fail to represent what he had told me to the King my master, who I doubted not had the same desire of living well with his electoral Highness, and that he would be ready upon any occasion to make it appear. You will be pleased to let me know in your next if his Majesty will have anything said in return to Mons^r. Spanheim. He told me at the same time that he had received instructions in the affair of Orange, but I did not find by him that his answer was other than general, &c. that he hoped for much success. I hear of some proposals made to him for the satisfaction of the Elector as to his particular pretensions in this affair, but he said nothing to me of them himself. I send you enclosed a memoire put into my hands yesterday by an agent of the Prince's, who is lately arrived here from Orange. I have scarce had time to read it over. He hath delivered the same by the Prince's order to the Dutch ambassador and to Mons^r. Spanheim, and is to stay here to furnish Mons^r. Heinsius when he arriveth with memoirs in the course of his negotiation upon that affair . . . Our letters from Spain, of the 21st of January, say that the King had refused to Sir H. Goodricke the liberty of returning to Madrid to take away his papers, and that that Court doth still persist in their resolutions of not accepting of his Majesty's arbitrage, but to treat conjointly with the empire and their other allies, and that they were extremely satisfied with the conduct of Don Pedro de Ronquillo in what relateth to that affair. Mons^r. de Croissy told me yesterday that they had received advice from Vienna, which yet wanted confirmation, that the Emperor had written to the Marquis de Grana to acquaint him that he found himself so pressed on the side of Hungary by the Turks that he should be obliged to his own security the best he could, and to hearken to the propositions of France. They have great hopes here of the affairs at Ratisbone, which seem to go well.

1683, Feb. 11, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Marquis of Halifax.—This will be presented to you by the hand of Mr. Howard my brother-in-law, who at the same time will deliver to your lordship a cypher which it will be necessary for me sometimes to use, for I have reason to suspect that my letters are often opened both in going and coming hither; he will shew your lordship's secretary the secret of it.

1683, Feb. 11th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I sent yesterday to Versailles to find out Captain Shelton, but he was abroad all the day; I hope to have him here this night, and with the first opportunity will give you an account of that affair. This will be presented to you by the hand of my brother-in-law, Mr. Howard, son to the Earl of Carlisle, whom I must recommend to your favour as being a young gentleman very well qualified, &c., who hath profited as much by his travaux as any of our country; he will have the honour at the same time of putting into your hands a cypher which himself brought out of Italy. I believe you will like it well, and if you please to order it I shall make use of it sometimes.

1683, Feb. 11th, Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Carlisle.—Complimentary—and praising his (Carlisle's) son. He says that his lordship will do very well to endeavour to put him into business, for he (Preston) is strangely mistaken if he do not prove a very considerable man, and his lordship knows the hazard of the sword as well as any man, and how small advantages are to be reaped by that way, especially in England, therefore he (Preston) would advise that his lordship should settle him upon the other bottom, for besides that he hath parts learning and languages he (Preston) is apt to believe that his inclination lieth enough that way . . . (Mr. Howard was afterwards killed at the siege of Luxembourg.)

1683, Feb. 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Conway.—Compliments . . . I will not say whether I am glad or sorry that your lordship hath laid down so troublesome tho' so honourable a charge as that of which you were possessed.

1683, Feb. 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Bridgman.—I received yours of Jan. 29th, s. v., on Saturday last intimating to me that the Earl of Sunderland was to succeed my Lord of Conway in his charge of Secretary of State . . . I had also by the last post the honour of one from his lordship, to which I have answered by this gentleman, the bearer, whom I have sent express upon his Majesty's affairs . . . I shall not fail to order the Gazettes to be sent every week to you, and also to give you an account when anything extraordinary happens worthy of your knowledge, and I should be glad to have copies of memorials or things of that kind which pass your office to be sent a little early here.

1683, Feb. 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Gwynne.—I know my Lord of Conway so well that I could not have doubted of this manner of receiving the King's commands tho' you had not been so kind as to have intimated it to me. I never wish the King a better servant than he hath been, nor his country a truer Englishman. Our old friend Danvers is now at Montpellier, but I hope in a little time to have him here again. I intend to write to him soon, and will not fail to let him know of your kind remembrance. The late dispute betwixt our two great men makes a great noise here; we are in suspense to know what effects it may have in England; I wish the King's affairs may not suffer, and then no great harm can be done.

1683, Feb. 20th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I received yesterday yours of Feb. 5th, s. v., with his Majesty's commands to perform offices on the behalf of the Scotch nation, and of their trade; which I shall obey with the first opportunity, as also those others concerning Mons^r. Holzauff and Mons^r. D'Agar. I find that little is to be hoped for in the affair of the merchants of Jersey, unless the restitution of the money be demanded as a thing which shall have no consequences for the future. If his Majesty thinks fit to order this to be done, I believe it will be readily restored. I have enclosed another copy of a letter which I received the other day from Mr. Whiting. A courier who arrived upon Wednesday night last from Madrid brings a confirmation of the report which hath run here for some time, that they are resolved in Spain to forbid the use of the English manufactures, and the letters from thence also say that Sir Henry Goodrick is departed in some haste, and that he hath left my lady to follow him some days after My Lord Ferrers having been lately at Marseilles, at his return brought me from some of his Majesty's subjects there who have been condemned to the galleys, and served above the time prescribed by their sentences, these following papers and certificates of their several condemnations, and also desired me to use my endeavours for their liberty. I have thought fit to transmit them to you, that his Majesty's pleasure may be known concerning them. If he thinks fit to order me no offices to be performed on the behalf of these people, you will be pleased to send back the papers that I may reconvey them to Marseilles.

1683, Feb. 24th, s. n. Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes.—I must intreat you after the tender of my humble duty to acquaint his R. Highness that yesterday I delivered in the memorial (of which I inclose the copy) to Mons^r. de Croissy to be presented to the King. I discoursed the matter pretty fully with him, and gave him those reasons by word of mouth for exempting the Scotch merchants from the impositions exacted from other strangers, which I did not think fit to insert in my memorial, for I find when we reason in our memorials it doth but give them occasions to refine upon us, and so start difficulties by having time to consider, which they do not think of when the affair is discoursed. I also told him that I had received the Duke's commands as well as those of the King my master in what relates to this matter, and that it was an affair in which he was pleased to concern himself much. He told me he had very very great regard for his Highnesses recommendation, and that he should not fail to present the memorial to his Majesty, and to obtain a speedy answer to it; but I do not think that anything will be done in it till the King return from his intended voyage, for he goes on the 4th of the next month, and betwixt this and that time little business will be done. I pray write to Sir James Dick and acquaint him with the state of the business, and what is done in it, and excuse my not writing to him by this post, for I am very much pressed and have many letters upon my hands. Present my humble service to Sir Andrew Forester, and let the Duke be put in mind of speaking to the French ambassador and of recommending this affair to him with concern.

A billet enclosed (these words are in Lord Preston's handwriting).—I would not put it into the body of my letter, but you may tell Sir Andrew Forester from me that nothing will more facilitate this business than if the Duke would write a particular letter upon this subject to this King and to send it to me to be delivered. I would then discourse the matter fully with himself, who you know is better to deal with than his ministers. Mons^r. Colbert you know hath an old grudge to the Scotch nation. I do not propose to the Duke, and pray say nothing of it to him from me. I only hint it to Sir Andrew and you to consider of, and to do as you please. Shew this paper to nobody but Sir Andrew.

1683, Feb. 24th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I received the favour of yours of the 8th current, s. v., yesterday, for which I return you my humble thanks. In obedience to his Majesty's commands, I yesterday moved the affair relating to the late imposition of 50 sols per tun upon Scotch merchandize exacted here to Mons^r. de Croissy, and represented to him the reason which his Majesty hath to demand the taking of it. He told me he would not fail to acquaint the King his master with, and to procure his speedy answer in it, which I yet do not expect till his return from his intended voyage, because all the ministers are now leaving Versailles and making preparations to go with him. Letters from Vienna are not yet arrived, but we hear that difficulties are daily started at Ratisbone by the Austrians, and that matters do not go so smoothly on there as it was hoped here they would have done. I have enclosed a copy of the propositions made by the Turk to the Hungarian. The Pope hath lately sent a brief to his most Christian Majesty, wherein intimating the very great danger in which Christendom is from the invasion of the Turks now near, he declareth himself bound to exhort all Christians to unite against the enemy of their faith, &c., &c. He desireth therefore his most Christian Majesty that he would not pursue by way of arms his pretensions against the Emperor and Empire, nor hinder them from resisting the infidels. The Pope adds that he hath written on the same occasion to the Emperor, to induce him to condescend to an accommodation in this time of eminent danger. His most Christian Majesty it is said hath returned an answer in very civil terms, the substance of which is, that he is very ready to assist the Empire against the Turks, provided that the Emperor will leave him in quiet possession of what he enjoys at present The Envoyé of Holstein told me yesterday that he believed he should be recalled soon, having no hopes of succeeding here in what he negotiates The Duke of Northumberland arrived here on Saturday night. He doth me the honour to take a mean lodging with me. I believe he expects his Majesty's orders. P.S. The merchants of Jersey have put the enclosed paper into my hands, which I have promised them to transmit to you.

1683, March 6th, s. n., Paris. — Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes.—I could have wished with all my heart that you had the cypher, but that cannot be helped. I pray write to me, however, as often as you can; you must disguise your hand a little, and do not set your name to your letters. I pray write fully to me 1683, March 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Countess of Rochester. Complimentary.

1683, March 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I am heartily sorry that I am not in a condition to write to you, I have so violent a defluxion of Rheume at this time upon my eye that I am not able to look down. I hope within a few days to be better. I was very glad to hear by yesterday's post that Mr. Deanes and his charge arrived safe. I question not but before this time you will be come to the bottom of this business. Mr. Bernard Howard hath been very well received here by the King, and according to his quality; he hath received also a very considerable present from him; perhaps an account may be given to the King our master of something which he hath said here, of the particulars of which I am no so well informed as yet, but I must do him the right to say that I know the discourse which was concerning the affairs of England was forced upon him, and that he could not well let it go without a reply.

1683, March 10th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I am very glad that his Majesty is come to the bottom of the Irish affair, and I am infinitely obliged to his Majesty and to my Lords of the Council for the declaration which they have been pleased to make in favour of me, and concerning my acting in it; it is impossible to answer for the truth of informations of this kind, but it is certainly the duty of any man who hath the honour to serve his Majesty abroad to acquaint him with them, who is best able to judge of them. Mons^r. Vauban and another engineer are lately sent to the Isle d'Oysant or d'Eysant, which lies just at the entry of the channel, and directly over against the Lizard point, to view it; the King designing to make a port there, as he hath endeavoured to do at Ambleteure. The expense of it will be very great, and it is calculated to about 6 millions of livres. It is believed they will begin to work at it this year, tho' I hear that Mons^r. de Quesne hath given his opinion that by violence of the sea in that place it will never be brought to any perfection. Mons^r. Heinsius is expected here everyday, I am afraid his negotiations about the affair of Orange will not be very successful, for I find no manner of disposition here to recede from what hath been done

1683, March 17th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Advices from Ratisbone give little hopes that affairs there will pass at present to the satisfaction of this Court: the College of Princes having lately made a declaration to quite contrary to that of the Electoral College The Comte de Mansfeldt sets out this day towards Spayne. I think myself obliged to acquaint you with something of a dispute which hath happened betwixt him and me upon a point of ceremony, which tho' it be of no great consequence yet hath occasioned some discourse here. At his return some weeks since from Vienna he sent his secretary to me to acquaint me of his arrival, and also to make me his compliments. The next day I sent my secretary to him and ordered him from me to make him a very civil compliment, and also to testify to him the great satisfaction that I received in the account of his safe return. Some days passed in which he expected that I should make him a visit, but I not doing it, he did by a third hand take care to let me know that he wondered that I would not do him the honour to see him. I replied that I should be extremely glad to have the honour of his acquaintance and of a commerce with him, but having been the last comer I hoped the Comte Mansfeldt would not refuse to do me the same honour and to pay me the same civilities which other ministers had done, which was that of a visit. I having at first given notice of my arrival to Madame de Mansfeldt, and also visited her. It was answered to me that Comte Mansfeldt was but just now arrived, and would by all people be looked upon to have come last, that he was also now ambassador, tho' not to this Court, and that the Envoyé of Genoa, who came much about the time that I did, had made no difficulty to visit him. That it would look ill if I should refuse to do it, and that no man should be better received, he having a great honour and respect as well for my person as my character. I made an equal return to his civilities, but to what was alleged I answered, that tho' he was but now arrived he had brought no new credentials with him, but had complimented the King upon the birth of the Duke de Bourgogne, and also taken his audience of Congé upon the ancient foot of his character, and that also in his absence satisfaction had been given for an insult made upon his coachman as if he had been here, so that he was looked upon always to have been present, and that in his absence, tho' long, he ought to be considered as only to have gone to have made a visit, or upon any other occasion. That for his being ambassador he had not that character here, but if he had, I did not take myself to be obliged to make the first visit to any ambassador resident here before my arrival, and that I had not done it to any since I came here; but that I had received it from them. That the Envoyé of Genoa knew what he had to do, and that I did pretend to the same, but that I thought Comte Mansfeldt would not believe that that Envoyé and I were upon the same foot here. This is what hath passed upon this subject betwixt us, and I hope I am not in the wrong. Most people who know anything of these kind of affairs here say that I am not.

F. GRAHAM,

1683, March, 20th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —It is said that upon the instances made by the Minister of Brandebourg in the name of the Elector, the King hath ordered Mons^r. le Prince to proceed no farther in the affair of Orange, but to put a stop to the process. I hope by the next post I may assure you of this, but by this I cannot, tho' it be strongly reported. Mons^r. Hensius is expected here this night or to-morrow without fail, so that we shall soon know the intentions of that King as to that affair . . . Sir Henry Goodricke is arrived here, and designs for England to-morrow or Monday.

1683, March 24th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes.—I have received yours of March 8th, s. v., and at the same time had the King's answer by Mr. Secretary to my request of going over, which is, that his Majesty doth think fit that I should not be absent at this time that the Court of France is in motion, and alarms all about; but that his Majesty will be well content when the Court is at Versailles, or elsewhere fixed for some time, to gratify me in your request. I know what the meaning of this is, and from where it comes, and I hope within a very few weeks to take my measures accordingly. The Courts returns this day to Versailles, and I shall not fail upon the first opportunity to move for an answer in the Scotch business. I received inclosed in yours my Lord of Feversham's certificate concerning Mons^r. La Croix, and should be very glad to do any service to him; but you know that in this case the King's order is very necessary. We succeed sometimes ill enough when I have it, but without it I am sure we can hope for nothing.

1683, March 24th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir H. Goodricke.—I hope this will find you and my lady safely arrived at London; the notice of which would be very acceptable to me. I had the misfortune to be detained by some business a little too long that morning which you left Paris, so that I got to your lodging just a quarter of an hour after you had left it, which was a very great trouble to me that I was deprived of the happiness of seeing yourself and my lady before you left this place . . .

1683, March 24th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received the honour of yours of March the 8th, s. v., with his Majesty's answer to my request for leave to pass into England for a week or 10 days. I shall attend his Majesty's pleasure, and also the time which he shall think most proper. But I assure you I had not desired now to have been from hence, if my presence in England were not almost necessary for the settling of some affairs which concern my private fortune . . . The affairs of Ratisbone are not yet much advanced, yet they hope well here from the voyage; they hear that Mons^r. Stratman hath undertaken to Vienna with a design to represent to the Emperor the true estate of affairs, and also to lay before him the evil consequences which will attend further delays in that negotiation, so that he may be undeceived in several things of which he hath not hitherto had so clear an account . . . We hear from Lisbon that Comte de Simonetta, Envoyé of Parma, altho' then incognito, had had great conferences with the Secretary of State, he insinuates that by the means of the D. of Modena he shall have the good offices of the King our master. The D. of Parma as I am assured hath also written it hither himself. I believe to Abbe Syri, his agent here; they seem to be well assured here that he is out in his measures concerning the D. of Modena; for what regards his Majesty's part in this affair is best known on your side. It is said here that the Grand Duc doth not press his proposals at present for two reasons. The first is the respect which he beareth to his most Christian Majesty, which obligeth him not to act in it, whilst he seems to support the pretensions of any one to the Infanta; a second is that he hath some hopes that an exclusion may soon be given to the Prince proposed from hence, and that then he may meet with fewer difficulties than he is like to encounter at present. They say here that tho' the French ambassador in Portugal may have some personal obstacles, as not being grateful to that Court, yet that the affair is in a good condition, and that he hath obtained the promise of the council that he shall have all the time necessary for the success of the designs of the King his master . . .

Cypher.

1683, March 27th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —Tho' the Court arrived at Versailles on Wednesday last all the ministers have been private here since that time, so that I have not yet seen any of them. On Tuesday next I intend to see Mons^r. de Croissy, and to demand answers to those businesses which I proposed before the departure of the Court to Compiègne. It is almost impossible to have any lights concerning the present designs of this King. Many conjectures are made and many reports are spread, but none of them are so well grounded that I dare adventure to write them to you. The alliance of this King with the King of Denmark, and the Elector of Brandebourg, is now said to be stricter than ever since the augmentation of their subsidies hath been yielded to, so that those two Princes are now entirely at the devotion of France. Mons^r. Mostin, Grand Treasurer of Poland, who is entirely gained to the French interests, and to oblige him the more to them was permitted to buy a very great fortune in France whilst he was ambassador here, assures that a war betwixt the Emperor and the Turk is certain, and also that in a very little time the Diete should be broken; that they were resolved to do it by the strength of the French faction alone, but if they did not succeed so, they would call into their aid the Elector of Brandebourg's party, which continued entire, and had yet made no effort upon any occasion in the Diete. The mystery of the answer of the French ambassador to the commissioners deputed to him, which I mentioned in my last, seems now to be deciphered, and we are assured that it was given with the design that it might be made use of in the Diete by this King's party there to show the good intentions of his Majesty, and his inclinations to peace, which might amuse and perhaps catch some indifferent members, or some who do not see so clearly, but at the same time when it is to be urged there are orders to insinuate that at present that kingdom is not in a state to enter into a war, or to make any resistance against the Turk, that therefore it will be best not to conclude any league with the Emperor at present, but to defer it till the month of October, when the Diete may meet again, and, they being in a better condition, may take then into consideration what is now proposed. This is thought to be the method projected for breaking the Diete. At this time the Queen is very ill with France, and hath been complained of by Mons^r. de Vitry for having procured the key of his cypher by corrupting one of his servants. The Imperial agents are therefore very active in endeavouring to keep her for the Emperor's interests by promising her that her father shall be made a Prince of the Empire, when it is so near the Emperor's sight with her, since this King refused to make him a Duke and Pair of France. On the one hand, the Prince, not knowing of what she may be to her affairs, and this conjuncture are not all, but offer great things, and represent to her the advantages she may draw from her, and assure her of all protection and favour. The King should do, and she think of a retreat hither. This account comes from a very good hand, and I think you may rely upon it. By it you will find that there is no great likelihood that the Emperor will beat him, but on this side this year; but that the King if he does as is proposed, I think he has no need to if he can by any means possess himself of what he pretends to, will be free to attack his neighbours on which side he pleases; the Emperor upon the same being equally designed; for from thence he may go to Strathbourg, Geneva, Lyons, or where he will, he may go to Italy or Germany, being equally at liberty. He is reported to be sending that he will have put a negative upon the two French Princes in Portugal as to the marriage of the Infanta, but this wants confirmation.

1683, March 27th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Whiting.—Thanks Whiting for sending some papers, and assures him of attention to his affair.—Let me know in your next if Mr. Sidney be in Holland, and how I may write to him, and I will do all that lies in my power for your son with him, tho' I have thought of a better way to procure him an employ there; for by the means of Mons^r. Heinsius (who is now here about the affair of Orange) I will make it my request to the Prince of Orange to take care of him and to employ him. I believe the Prince will not refuse me, I being in some measure in a capacity of doing him service, being in expectation to receive orders to act in the affair of Orange for him . . . P.S. Send me a memoire by the next of your son's name, and what you would have me to do for him.

1683, March 29th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—The bearer thereof, Mr. Monroe, hath been long soliciting in this Court an affair of great consequence, in which himself and several English merchants are concerned, and which Mr. Secretary Jenkins, by his Majesty's order, did recommend very earnestly to my care. I shall not enter into the detail of it because I hope your lordship will be pleased to permit him to open the matter fully to you. I have also enclosed the state of his case, upon which I must intreat your lordship to cast your eye. But I shall only acquaint you that I have used all possible endeavours to obtain justice from this Court in this matter, and that after all the ministers have given the most unjust sentence that ever was, as I am sure your lordship will say when you have considered it. This bearer and the other petitioners have now resolved to have once more recourse to his Majesty, and to beg that he will procure justice for them, and have desired me to recommend them and their business to your lordship's favour and protection.

1683, March 29th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—You may be pleased to remember that at my first coming hither you were pleased earnestly to recommend to me an affair in which Sir John Fredericke and some other English merchants were concerned. The state of their case I have enclosed, and the bearer, Mr. Monroe, who hath all along solicited the business in this Court, will inform you very fully of all things relating to it . . . The persons concerned design now to have recourse to his Majesty, and to beg once more his protection. They have also desired me to recommend their affair to you.

1683, March 31st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Wynne.—I have enclosed a petition from the Comte de Beauregard to his Majesty our master, which I think is not ill grounded, it comes recommended to me from Mons^r. de Prie, who also spoke to my Lord Feversham about it when he was here. I would not mention it in my letter to Mr. Secretary, because I do not know whether his Majesty will think fit to take any notice of it or not. But you may be pleased to put it into Mr. Secretary's hands, and be disposed of as he pleaseth. I believe a very little application will do the business, for I perceive they are inclined enough to favour the Comte here . . .

1683, March 31st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.— . . . The Envoyé of Genoa told me that Mons^r. de Crassy had by the King's order declared to him that his Majesty was surprised with the advice which he had received from Mons^r. de St. Olone that the Republic of Genoa had resolved to augment their squadron now at a sea with four galleys, which were ordered to be fitted out; that he had some reason to believe that it was with a design to favour his enemies, and that, for that reason, if the Republic did persist in its resolutions the King would order the commander of his ships of war to find them out and to sink them wherever they met them. The Envoyé answered that they had armed out these galleys for the safety of their commerce, and that the Republic had no other end than that in doing it. That in this conjuncture it was more necessary than ever for them to be strong at sea, since they had advised of great preparations making for sea at Constantinope, and since the Corsaires of Barbary did infest the sea more at this time than ever; that he should not fail to inform the Republic of his Majesty's declaration, that it might take those measurers which might conduce most to it safely. This looks like searching of a pretext to begin with the Genois, whom most people believe to be in some danger this summer . . . The Dutch ambassador brought Monsieur Heinsius, the day after his arrival, to make me a visit. He asked me if I had received any orders to act de concert with him in the affair of Orange. I told him I received none. He told me that his Majesty had promised that as soon as he had notice of his, Mons^r. Heinsius, arrival here, that I should have instructions in this affair, and that the States General had written to his Majesty to signify his departure. If his Majesty doth think of this I must beg to have his punctual orders how far I am to engage with Mons^r. Heinsius, and that if I am to join with him, we may present no memorials but such as are first seen and approved of by his Majesty. I see very well that it will be a business of volume and of trouble enough. Mons^r. Spanheim hath orders also from the Elector of Brandenburg to act with Mons^r. Heinsius. (In Lord Preston's hand). I have enclosed the account of the proceedings of the doctors of the Sorbonne upon the proposition of the Archbishop of Strigonium.

1683, April 7th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Keeper North.—I have received the honour of your lordship's very obliging letter . . . I have ordered the Gazette to be sent to Mr. Cooke for your lordship every week, and any other prints which come out worthy of your perusal. If there be any books or other things which your lordship would have sent from this place be pleased to let me have your commands without ceremony.

s. d., Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of Oxford. I have returned your inclosed letter to my Lord Ferrers, who hath been in England near a month. I shall do my Lord Grey what service lieth in my power whilst he is here, he doth me the favour sometimes to see me, and indeed I cannot observe any inclinations in him. It is one great fault in our English gentry who come hither that they keep too much company with one another; but it is impossible to break them of it whilst they stay in Paris . . . If Mr. Wigan hath any occasion of my assistance in procuring the M.S. of Josephus out of the Chancellor Siguier's library he shall have it, but he tells me he hopes to obtain the use of it without any difficulty. If upon any occasion I may be useful to your lordship or the University whilst I am here I must entreat you freely to command me . . .

1683, April 7th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

1683, April 10th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Ber. Howard.—Mons^r. Giraud brought this letter inclosed to me the other day from the Duke de la Rochefaucault, and desired me to convey it to you. He also brought your coat au brevet packed up, and a ticket from the Donanne that all duties were satisfied. I intend to send it away the next week to Madame la Jeune at Dieppe, who shall take care to have it sent over by the first yacht that arriveth there.

1683, April 10th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Cypher. Secretary Jenkins.— . . . One who hath a dependance upon Mons^r. de Crassy, with the person also who was sent over lately from hence to examine the records in the Tower, about the Reformation, came to a servant of mine (in whom they think they have an interest) and desired privately to be informed of the value of the Archbishopric of York, and of all the other bishoprics in gross, because they should have some use of such an account soon. I do not think that this seems much, but I thought it fit to inform you of it.

1683, April 14th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes . . . I have according to what you writ deferred to demand an answer to the memorial which I delivered in relating to the Scotch privileges, and shall move no more in that affair till I hear from you what measures the Duke takes concerning it. I am promised within a little time to have leave to go over, when I shall not fail to do whatever lies in my power, to serve you, and my brother I know in the meantime will do it. When you have anything to write which you would have more secret I pray make use of the cypher which my brother Howard sent you. You will have all the news from this place from Mr. Wynne. I pray my hearty service to Sir Andrew.

1683, April 14th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have received your lordship's of the 29th of last month, and shall obey his Majesty's commands in it concerning the Italian players, and I shall also hasten them away. This King, by reason of the progresses which he designs to make this summer, I know will have no use of them; however, I sent yesterday to know that of Mons^r. de Croissy, who hath promised to let me have his answer this day. As soon as I receive it I will send for Searamouche and speak to him. Nothing was to be done in the other affairs about which your lordship writ to me from Newmarket relating to the Sieur Baube condemned to the galleys. The chain went from this place the next day after the receipt of your letter. I told Mouchon when he formed his petition here that I was sure the King would not meddle in it, and without using his name we have seldom great success here in anything.

1683, April 14th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The last week my Lady Harvey came to me to acquaint me that her coachman being very ill of a fever, two men, one of which was a priest, came the night before to her house and with great violence rushed in and went up to his chamber, where they found the man in a very ill condition. They immediately went to his bed, and laying hands of him pressed him to confess himself, and told him he would certainly be damned if he did not die in their faith, and much more to this purpose. The coachman was extremely disturbed, but constantly said he would die a Protestant, and bid them be gone, which they would not do till they were turned downstairs by the other servants. I being ill when I received the notice of this could not see Mons^r. de Croissy myself, but I sent a memorial for the King, of which I have enclosed the copy. The King at the same time when Mons^r. de Croissy communicated this memorial to him, being informed that the coachman had demanded a priest, and that he had a mind to die a R. Catholic, had a mind to know the truth of this by some creditable person; he therefore ordered Mons^r. de Croissy to send Mons^r. Bergeret his first commis to the house with a priest who understood English. Mons^r. Bergeret on Friday last, in pursuance of that order, went to the house, and making Mons^r. de Croissy's compliments to my Lady Harvey acquainted her with the King's order; she, out of respect to it, gave way that the priest should ask the sick person if he would die of their faith; he answered that he had never had any design to change his religion, but that he would continue in it to the end of his life, and desired them that they would importune him no more upon that subject, but suffer him to die in quiet. After this my Lady Harvey told Mons^r. Bergeret that after she had suffered him, out of respect to the King's orders, to question this sick person, tho' she knew well that the subjects of England residing here were not obliged to receive this sort of visits, yet she expected some sort of satisfaction for the violence done to her house under a false pretext. But nothing having been done towards a satisfaction, either to me or her, I sent yesterday to Mons^r. de Croissy (not being able yet to stir out myself) to put him in mind of my memorial; he hath promised this day to speak of it to the King again, and I shall not fail to press for that satisfaction which is due to the King our master in this case. The visit of the priest, tho' it passed with a great deal of civility, may yet have very ill consequences for those of the English nation residing here if it be [not] declared that we will not be subjected to this manner of proceeding. The coachman is dead, and was buried yesterday morning by my chaplain, who was with him through all his sickness, and to the minute of his death. I have received a letter from Mr. Lang, from Marseilles, of the 3rd of this month, in which he acquaints me that one Mr. Elliot, who was charged with a paquet from Admiral Herbert to his Majesty, was seized. Mons^r. Heinsius hath not yet obtained an audience of the King, tho' he demanded it some time since, but is remitted till after the holy days . . . My Lord of Manchester's corps are expected here from Montpellier, in order to their transportation into England. Father Patrick hath been in the agonies of death almost these 2 days, having been seized with a violent fit of the stone; he speaketh again this morning, but they have very little hopes of his life.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1683, April 17th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to his Royal Highness.—The bearer hereof, Captain Barker, being to go in diligence to London, I thought fit to lay hold of the opportunity, and to give your Highness a short account of things here . . . I have taken the liberty to send to your Highness by this gentleman a new edition of Boileau, and also another little book to entertain you at your spare hours at Windsor. And I must intreat your Highness if I can do you any service in sending what comes out here worthy your reading or in any other thing freely to command me. Mr. Bastrick, of Dover, writ to my secretary the other day to desire him to inform himself of the particulars of a process depending here betwixt the grand farmers and some persons who have set up boats to the prejudice of the paquet boats at Dover. I have ordered him to give a speedy answer to Mr. Bastrick, and to give him the best information he can of what he desires to know. P.S. (by Lord Preston). Poor Father Patrick died the last night of the stone, after having been near 80 hours in the agonies of death.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Duchess of Monmouth.—Compliments.

1683, April 17, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Capt. Barker. I have according to promise sent the Secretary's paquet addressed to you, which I must intreat you to deliver with all care, and to take no notice but that you come directly from Paris. I have enclosed a letter for his Royal Highness and one for the Duchess of Monmouth . . .

1683, April 17th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Since my last Mons^r. de Croissy hath given me this answer from the King to the affairs of Mr. Ellyot, who was stopped at Marseilles. That his Majesty could not dispense with him from making the quarantine, the plague raging in that place from whence he cometh. That his Majesty is well informed that the English have had communication with the Algerines, and that they had carried thither powder and other things for their supply; that if a Frenchman had dared to have done that which Mr. Ellyot did, he should certainly have been hanged; but that his Majesty will give his orders that he shall be well treated in consideration of the King my master. As to what relates to the dispatches with which he was charged, he saith that Mr. Ellyot refused to put them into the hands either of Mr. Lang or of the officers of Marseilles, who offered to send them away after they had passed the fire, for preventing the inconveniences of their communicating the ill air. In fine, he did assure me that Mr. Ellyot should have all sorts of good treatment, but that he must unavoidably make the quarantine, as a Duke and Pair of France must, if he were in his place. I hear the King hath ordered an account of all this to be given to Mons^r. de Barillon, that he may inform his Majesty of it. It looketh a little hard that his Majesty's couriers should be stopt thus upon slight pretences. I am in hopes that Capt. Nicholson, who hath passed this way from Tangier, may have carried along with him the duplicate of Admiral Herbert's despatch, he having met with a paquet from him at Madrid, addressed to Mr. Brisbane . . . Mons^r. d'Oppede is not yet recalled from his Embassy of Portugal, tho' they are ill satisfied with his conduct in the business of the match lately proposed. We hear that the proposals of the Grand Duc are much listened to there, tho' the Jesuits solicit powerfully in that Court for the Prince of Parma. There is nothing considerable at this time stirring in this Court. P.S. Father Patrick died the last night at 6 of the clock.

1683, April 21st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes.—I have received yours of the 5th of April, and at the same time the intimation of my leave to go over by the letters of my Lord of Rochester and the secretary. I set out from hence (God willing) on Friday with the design of passing in Monday's paquet boat, so that in likelihood I shall be at the post house at Gravesend at some hour on Wednesday, from whence I intend to take the water. I should be very glad to see you at Gravesend if possible.—P.S. If you were on Tuesday next at Gravesend perhaps it were not amiss.

1683, April 21st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—At the same time that I received the favour of yours of the 5th instant, s. v., my Lord of Rochester was pleased also to intimate to me the King's leave to take a short turn into England about my private affairs, for which I return you my most humble acknowledgments of his Majesty. I intend to begin my journey upon Friday next, having taken leave of the King yesterday, and I hope this day seven-night on the day following to be at London . . . Mons^r. de Seignelay Cypher.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

... the T... yesterday, but his voyage is put off till Saturday. He has for a longer time upon some affairs, and is now at sea. He is expected to be a courier from M... of his dispatch. Two... to Toulon, and the other to Brest. He to Toulon carried orders for a squadron of men-of-war to pass from thence into the channel; the other... ready of several ships at Brest, and... they shall be in the channel (as 'tis said). I cannot imagine what the design is, unless it be... 12 in number) which the Dutch... to the assistance of Sweden. I know his Majesty will order these ships to be watched if they come into the English seas. The preparations... to be considerable for Algiers.

1683, April 21st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The King hath given leave to the Italian comedians to attend the King our master at Windsor this summer. Saramouche hath been with me this morning, and I told him (as you directed me) that the King would have him and his company pass into England for his diversion at Windsor, and that he should have the same conditions which his Majesty gave him before; that they should think of going with the soonest, because his Majesty left London this week. He told me that they were ready to obey his Majesty's orders, and to wait upon him as soon as possibly they could be ready. But he said that they could get nothing at Windsor, and therefore they hoped the King would consider them; that there was an hundred pounds of an old arrears due to them which he hoped his Majesty would order to be paid. He also desired that they might have (as they had the last time) some money advanced to them here, otherwise some of their company could not get away; and that when that was done, a yacht coming for them to Diepe, and they having 10 or 12 days' notice, would be ready to go. If the King will send his orders concerning them my secretary in my absence will execute them, I being obliged to set out towards England on Friday next.

1683, June 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I arrived here yesterday, and am making all the haste that I can to join the Court. I hope to be in a readiness on Monday or Tuesday next to set forward. . . . The King of Spain is perfectly recovered, public prayers and great expressions of joy having been made for his recovery. . . .

1683, June 26th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—It hath been the report of this place since yesterday that the Duke of Lorraine, commanding the Imperial forces, had rendred himself master of all the out works and of the city of Neuhausel; but that 300 Turks who had retired into the citadel did make an obstinate resistance there, but that in all likelihood it could not be maintained 24 hours. The Comte de Taxis, Grand Master of the Posts of the Empire, is said to have been killed there upon Whitsunday on the morning in attacking a church whither a body of Turks had retired. . . . The Republic of Genoa is constantly resolved not to grant the demand which his most Christian Majesty hath made to have permission to make a magazine of salt at Savona, that it may be sent from thence to Montferrat. I can have no manner of account of the sailing of those men-of-war towards the Baltique, of which Mons^r. de Barillon hath given notice to the King our master. . . . In one of yours I have received his Majesty's commands concerning my Lord of Stare, his brother, and his sister, which I shall execute as soon as I possibly can. . . .

1683, June 30th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Middleton.—I am desired by Mr. Conne to accompany this enclosed from him, with one of mine to your lordship in behalf of the Earl of Kinoull, who is left here destitute of the protection of anybody since the death of his mother, and of his uncle the Earl of Salisbury. By reason of which he is in danger of running a great risk in that fortune which is left to him. . . .

1683, June 30th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—In my last I acquainted you with a report which was opened of the taking of Neuhausel by the imperial army, but . . . the German post arriving upon Saturday night brought a certain account of the raising the siege of that place, and of the retreat of the imperial troops into their ancient camp at Comorra.

1683, July 6th, s. n., Metz.—The same to the same.—I received yesterday at Verdun the favour of yours of the 2nd inst. and am much obliged with a copy of Don Pedro de R... memorial, lately presented to his Majesty inclosed, for which I return my humble acknowledgements. By the memorial I perceive that the allies are not weary yet of repeating and pressing the same thing. It is time alone which must convince some of them that they have refused a much better medium for the re-establishing of the peace and quiet of Christendom than any one that can be now proposed. I am just now arrived here, where I have met with the ambassador of Savoye on his way from the camp to Paris. . . . I cannot omit to congratulate with you his Majesty's late happy success against the city of London. The news of it had reached Paris before I left it, and run before me all the way in my voyage, so that I have had nothing to do but to confirm it. I find that it doth already make people here think otherwise of his Majesty's affairs than formerly, and I hope it will have all the good effects at home that his Majesty and his servants can wish.

1683, July 12th, s. n., Metz. The same to the same. I received yesterday yours of the 21st of the last month, s. v., with the surprising account of the discovery of an assassinate designed against the King's and Duke's persons, and of an insurrection to follow it. That so horrid a conspiracy is to come to light is an happiness for which we cannot be too thankful, and I hope that the punishment of those who are concerned in it will be as exemplary as their design was impious and unnatural. His most Christian Majesty arrived here yesterday, and was lodged in the Archbishop's palace. I had the honour this morning to make the King our master's compliments to him, which he received with all imaginable civility and satisfaction; he told me that he should always consider and value his Majesty above all the Princes of Europe; and that it should appear by his actions to his Majesty and to all the world that he intended nothing more than the establishment of the peace and of the repose of Christendom. He then asked me about the late conspiracy, of which I gave him the best account that I could. After having viewed the citadel (the works about which they are now repairing, they having been long in an ill condition) and all other places in this city worthy to be seen, and having 3 or 4 days to spare before the arrival of the King, I thought I could not pass them better than in going to view the camp upon the Saar, which I have done, and returned the last night.—He describes it.—This morning his most Christian Majesty about 10 of the clock left this place and lodgeth at Malatour, a small village about 4 leagues off. The morrow he goes to Verdun, the next day to St. Menhoude, and from thence he taketh the nearest way to Versailles. Having had the honour to salute his most Christian Majesty this day, and having no very pressing orders upon my hands at this time, I have taken the liberty to make a little tour towards Nancy, which is not above 8 or 10 leagues out of my way, and which I have a mind to see, with the design nevertheless of joining the Court again at Chaalons. I hope his Majesty will not be offended at it; and I must beg of you to make my humble excuse to him. I shall not have occasion of writing again to you till my arrival at Paris, unless some new thing happens.

1683, July 12th, s. n., Metz: Lord Preston to Mr. Tempest. . . . I pray remember me to Mons^r. Godet, and thank him from me for the care he hath taken of my letters, which have all come safe to my hands. Excuse my not writing to him now, because I hope to see him soon. Tell him that because of the indisposition of Mons^r. de Croissy, and of the absence of Mons^r. de Boneuill, I have not been able to do any business here, and that I shall do nothing till my arrival at Paris. I pray write also to Mr. Bridgman, to my Lord of Sunderland's office, and let him know that I have received his letter, and at my arrival at Paris I shall not fail to write to him and to give him my thanks for it. I pray write also to Mr. Ball, and let him know that I have received his letter, and that I shall not fail to acknowledge it at my arrival at Paris. . . .

1683, July 21st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Upon Sunday night I arrived here, as the greatest part of the Court did also. Yesterday his most Christian Majesty after having hunted in the park, and been treated at the Chateau de Vincennes by the Mareschal de Belfonds, passed thro' this city in his way to Versailles. The accounts which we hear from Vienna and all parts of Germany are very sad, and declare the deplorable estate of the Emperor's affairs. The Turkish army, which is very numerous, was upon the 16th of this month advanced to within 14 leagues of Vienna, and had in a manner besieged and surrounded that of the Emperor, obliging the foot to retire into the Island of Schut, and the horse to shelter themselves under the cannon of Raab and of Comorra. The same day 20,000 Tartars in a body approached to within 6 or 7 leagues of Vienna, and set fire to near an 100 villages within sight of that place; the Emperor beholding the flames from the windows of his palace. This lamentable prospect and the near approach of danger have obliged the Emperor to leave Vienna and to retire with the Empress and the Archdukes and Arch-duchesses to Lintz, upon the Donow, which they say is one of the strongest places of Germany. The consternation is so great at Vienna that people of all conditions are endeavouring to get out of it, and to retire with their goods and furniture further into the country. They are razing the suburbs, and doing all that is possible for the defence of the place. Notwithstanding this, some people here tell us that these accounts are not certain, but that they need confirmation, but I am apt to believe that they are too true The Pope's Nuntio arrived here on Sunday last at night incognito. It is not yet known when he shall have his audience. Orders are gone to all the commanders of French men-of-war in the Mediterranean to search all vessels upon which they may suspect that any goods belonging to the Genoese are charged, and where any are found the goods are to be confiscate and the vessel seized, provided she do not belong to England. In that case they are not to meddle nor molest any of our ships. But the order is general as to all other nations.

Letters writ in his lordship's absence to Mr. Secretary Jenkins from April 24th till June 23rd, 1683. (14 letters giving epitomes of foreign news.)

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. 3.

1683, July 31st, s. n. Lord Preston to his Royal Highness.—Yesterday betwixt 2 and 3 of the clock in the afternoon this Queen died of violent fever which seized her some hours before, and was occasioned by a great black swelling betwixt her breast and her arm; the physicians are blamed for having let her blood thrice in 24 hours' time, which 'tis said drew the humour inwards, and was the occasion of her so sudden death. . . . I may take notice of it to your Highness (tho' it is not much necessary to do it to others) that since I have been here I have always thought it a piece of my duty to have an eye upon the Gazette, and I think I may say that the affairs and occurrences of England are represented from no place more fairly and truly than they are from hence. The prints of Holland, and of some other places, speaking often very undecently of them, and I am sure very little is at any time inserted in the chapter of England but what the writer of the Gazette hath from me. Tho' I do not so early as other people, yet I am sure I do it with no less sincerity and hearty joy, congratulate his Majesties and your Highnesses late happy deliverance from the horrid design of those traitors (whom some have long suspected) against your persons.

1683, July 31st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

s. d., Lord Preston to the Lord Archbishop of York.—I have received your very obliging letter of the 19th of the last month S. V. . . . It hath not been in my power to do any real service to Mr. Dolben, but if it had I should have done it with a great deal of sincerity and a very good heart. Mr. Dolben is not in town at present, but is gone, I believe, to see some of the towns upon the Loire. He told me when he went that he should be back in a little time. He hath left his address, and your letter for him was dispatched away yesterday. I am now to congratulate with your grace his Majesty's late favour to you, and I must at the same time tell your grace that I think myself in particular and our poor country very happy in the assurance we now have of having you to reside amongst us. It hath long been my wish and hope, which I am very glad to see accomplished.—Offers of services, &c.

s. d., Lord Preston to Mr. Jackson.—I have sent you, according to your desire, a list of all the classic authors lately printed for the use of the Dauphin, with the prices of them in sheets; they will come in all to under 12*l*. sterling. If you have occasion for them, I will take care to have them sent over to you. The Jesuits, I believe, or some others may go on with others of the ancient authors, but I do not hear that they are busy about them, because the Dauphin is past that sort of studies.

1683, Aug. 4th, Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The daily accounts which we receive here from Germany are very dismal.—News from Vienna Mons^r Guinski, the present Envoye of Poland in this Court, demanded the other day audience of this King, to desire in the name of the King his master assistance against the Turks, and at the same time to notify to him the Queen of Poland's being safely delivered (I think) of a Prince, and also to present to his most Christian Majesty the King his master's letters of complaint upon the subject of the conduct of Mons^r. de Vitry the late French ambassador in Poland; he hath received for answer from Mons^r. de Boneuil that the carriage of his Majesty of Poland in the affair of the late ligue made with the enemies of his most Christian Majesty's, and upon several other occasions hath been so extraordinary, and the usage of his ambassador so ill, that he can have no further correspondence with him, that therefore he, Mons^r. de Boneuil, was commanded by the King his master to let him know that he would not receive the King of Poland's letters, and that it was his pleasure that he, the Envoye, should retire out of his kingdom, which I hear he is preparing to do, and to pass into England with the same character of Envoye Extraordinary. I suppose his commission will be to desire the King our master's assistance against the Turks.

1683, Aug. 4th, st. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Middleton.—(Autograph.)—The bearer hereof. Mrs. Colvils, hath long attended a process here grounded upon the foot of the privileges which those of the Scotch nation have long enjoyed in France. She hath had the misfortune to have a sentence pronounced against her, but she thinks it hath passed upon misinformation.—Recommends her.

1683, Aug. 7th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The Spanish fleet (of which I enclose a list) sailed from Cadiz the 18th of the last month, and by the way of Madrid we receive an advice which I hope is not true; 'tis this, that as that fleet was going out of port an English frigate coming from Tangier happened to pass by; the Comte d'Aguilar, the admiral, sent to the captain of it to let him know that he expected he should salute the royal flag of Spain, the captain returning for answer that the King of Great Britain's ships were not obliged to salute any one, that admiral sent on board of him again to let him know that if after 3 hours time (which he would give him to resolve in what to do) he would not salute, he would sink him to the bottom, which at last he consented to do. I find that the English consul at Cadiz, having notice of it, did protest against the captain and his proceeding, that so no ill consequences may be drawn from the action, and did also declare that he doubted not but that he would be punished for his conduct at his return into England. There is arrived within these 8 days a vessel dispatched from Mons^r. de la Barre, Governor of Canada, by which he advertiseth Mons^r. de Seignelay that the French colonies had at present great and new differences with the Colony of Boston in New England concerning their boundaries, and also complaineth that the English do favour the Indians, and supply them with arms and powder, which hath encouraged the Iroquis to begin the war again upon the French

1683, Aug. 11th, s. n., Paris. (The same to the same?) The last night the body of the Queen was carried from Versailles in order to its interment at St. Denis, where passing thro' St. Cloud, the village and Bois de Boulogne, Clisly (Clichy), and St. Ouen, it arrived betwixt three and four of the clock this morning; his most Christian Majesty refusing to suffer it to be carried thro' Paris According to my orders, the last time that I saw him, Mons^r. de Croissy, I did acquaint him with the subject of the letter which the Republic of Genoa had lately written to the King our master, and with the commands he had given me to represent to his most Christian Majesty the sincerity of the designs of that Republic in arming out those 4 galleys, which had given offence; that it had been done with no other design than that of securing their trade against the Turkish pirates, &c.; that this being so, the King my master did hope that his most Christian Majesty would have the same favour and kindness for that Republic which he had heretofore entertained for it. Mons^r. de Croissy did at length give me the reasons of the proceedings of the King his master against that Republic, but told me that he was sure that all imaginable regard should be had to the King my master's interposition, and that he would not fail to represent what I had said to him to his most Christian Majesty

1683, Aug. 11th, st. n. Paris.—Lord Preston to his Majesty sent by Mr. Gwynne.—The I do not do it so early yet I do with no less joy and thankfulness to Heaven congratulate with your Majesty your late happy deliverance from the designs of those lately discovered cruel traitors against your sacred person . . . I have made bold to send to your Majesty by Mr. Gwynne the plans of some fortified places, which I believe are very exact. If your Majesty hath them not before, and if you approve of them, I do not question but to have draughts of all the other fortifications of France in a little time, and I shall beg of your Majesty to let me have your commands in this matter soon by Mr. Gwynne, who will transmit them to me . . .

1683, Aug. 14th, st. n. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The Intendant of Genoese hath informed the Court that the Protestants of those parts continue to assemble armed upon the ruins of their temples and to hear preaching; that in the several meetings of the ministers and gentlemen of that religion means have been proposed for the defending of themselves if troops should be sent against them. That he finds that of late the Protestants in the cities, towns, and in the country, have cleansed their old arms and have bought new, and that they have also bought up all the powder and lead which the public fairs and markets could afford them. Upon this advise 4,000 horse are commanded into that country where these humours seem to draw to an head, and they are to be commanded by a Lieutenant of the Gardes du Corps . . . There is a cabale of his Majesty's own subjects here who do much more mischief than any of the French, and are more industrious in representing things falsely and maliciously, and if it be required I can very easily let you know who they are. It hath been hotly reported, and I believe believed by some that my Lord of Essex's throat was cut by the King's command, and that the story of doing it himself was false, the King and Duke being at the Tower when it was done. It is easy to have any of the French punished upon whom it can be fixed, and for his own subjects here I should think it would not be hard to make them know themselves better.

1683, Aug. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—It hath been reported here that the siege of Vienna is raised, but there is no certainty of that. Monst. de Staremberg hath defended it with great gallantry, and giveth hopes of holding it till succours come, which are now on the way from all parts.—Account of the siege . . . I received yesterday a letter from Mr. Westcombe, the English consul at Bayonne, and this morning the inclosed memoire from his agent here, which contains the state of his case and his request. You will be pleased to acquaint his Majesty with it, and to know his pleasure concerning it.

1683, Aug. 21st, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—Account of the relief of Presbourg.

1683, Aug. 25th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have received the honour of your lordship's by Mr. Betterton with his Majesty's commands to me to assist him in treating with some persons capable of representing on opera in England, which I have obeyed as far as it was possible to do it, and Mr. Betterton hath by this post given a full account to Mr. Bridgman of what hath passed, to which I must refer your lordship. By the last post I also received another letter of the 9th instant from your lordship, in which you were pleased to intimate that his Majesty would have me treat again with the Italian players, if by reason of this Queen's death those divertisements cease for this winter here. I am very ready to obey his Majesty in it, but I must acquaint you that all those things are begun again. The comedians acted on Sunday last, and the Italian players on Monday, and tomorrow or the next day the opera will be represented again, so that I believe it will be difficult to persuade those people to leave this place this winter. Your lordship will be pleased to acquaint his Majesty with this, and by the next post to let me know if it be his pleasure that I should treat with them. I shall in the mean time at a distance take care to have them sounded without engaging with them.

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Goddard.—I received yours, and am glad by it to find that you continue in health. As to the subject of it, I am sure you for answer that to dedicate your book to the Duke who is never unmindful of those who are ever to do good service to the Crown or himself, as I am sure you will have done by refuting solidly those pernicious maxims which you find everywhere dispersed thro' that book which you undertook to answer.* . . .

1683, Aug. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Some days since Monsr. de Boncuil by the order of the King his master came to notify to me, as he did also to other foreign ministers, the death of this Queen; within two or three days after I demanded an audience, as is usual, to make my compliments of condolence. The answer that was given to me was that his most Christian Majesty was resolved only to receive compliments from those who had the answer of the Princes their masters to those letters which he had written to them upon the death of this Queen to deliver to him. If this resolution had been observed I should have had no reason to complain. But the next day the ministers of Catholique Princes who had received no answer from their masters more than myself had a day given to them for their audiences at Fountainbleau upon the subject of condolence; accordingly they went, and have received them. I do not know upon what account this distinction is made, nor shall I know how to behave myself for the future, nor how to acquit myself in this matter without his Majesty's directions. I have said nothing, only I have not appeared at Court since the receipt of the answer mentioned above. I do not love to complain, nor to make business to the King when I can possibly avoid it, but so many attempts are made to gain points upon us here, and to abridge and lessen our undoubted privileges, that if some opposition be not made, and some countenance be not given to us within a little time, a foreign minister will not be distinguished here from other men.

1683, September 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Pr. Seal. I have received lately the honour of two of your lordship's letters, for which I am to return my humble acknowledgments. To some particulars in the first I shall by the first opportunity give your lordship an answer; to answer to some others in it a little more time and observation will be necessary. . . .

1683, Sept. 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—You were pleased in yours of the 13th to let me know that the Gazettes à la main were not so much heeded as extracts of letters from Passau, Lintz, Algiers, and Italy, &c. For such extracts of letters and for relations, and for everything which may relate to the sea (as you are pleased to order), all imaginable care shall be taken to procure them, and most of these kind of things cost me little because I communicate the occurrences of England to some of the ministers, and to my other friends, and in return they transmit to me what cometh to their hands. But I must confess I have found fault with the writer of the Gazette à la main for twenty impertinent things he hath put into it, tho' I could never yet hinder him from carrying on his custom. His long relations concerning persecutions here, and the remarks he pretends to make upon several subjects, I know cannot be grateful nor useful. You know, sir, I found him here, and that he hath corresponded with you long before my time, but if you will have him write no more I can with ease order that matter to your satisfaction. . . .

s. d. The same to the same.—I am to acknowledge the honour of two of yours, one of the 10th the other of the 16th of August. I shall observe his Majesty's commands in the first in having a strict eye over those of his subjects here who talk sancily and seditiously of the government, and in giving an account of their discourses when it shall be required. The latter brings me orders to desire the Congé of the Sieur le Vaisseau, which I shall obey when I find a fitting opportunity, and shall observe what you intimated concerning it. Upon Sunday last, in the afternoon, this King's intentions were declared at Fountainbleau of sending his troops into Flanders. The whole Court was in a great surprise and everyone went to prepare for the voyage. That night orders were given to the musquetaires to march, and to several detachments of the Gardes du Corps, of the Gens d'Armes, and of the Cheveaux Legers . . . Most people were surprised with the sudden resolution of this King to send troops to Flanders. They had before spread a report that the King our Master had declared to his most Christian Majesty that if he attacked any place in the Low countries he should be obliged to oppose him; but rumours of this kind are industriously put abroad to amuse people, and are generally within a day or two contradicted . . . You would admire to hear the malicious and senseless reports which are raised here concerning the fleet under my Lord Dartmouth's command, but you have so many of them where you are that I shall not trouble you with recounting any of them. My Lord Dumbarton arrived late the last night: notice is given of his arrival to Mons^r. Bonneuil this day, who is at Fontainebleau. My Lord will write himself the next post.—P.S. Mr. Verney, son to Sir Grevil Verney, and grandson to my Lord of Bedford, and I think the only son of his own family, is just now in the agonies of death; he was very hopeful and seemed to be of a very good and loyal principle.

1683, Sept. 4th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—Upon Thursday last this King being hunting in the Forest of Fontainebleau fell from his horse, and by the fall put his left arm out of joint at the elbow. It was immediately tied up by making a scarf of his cravat, and he was brought home in his coach, where it was set, tho' with some pain to him, he giving two or three great shrieks in the operation. The alarm came very hot hither that night that his Majesty had broken his arm into several pieces, but the accident happened as I retail it . . . The Nonce is said to have proposed under hand a general peace, and to have pressed the matter very much. There are reasons to believe that his offices are not ill received, and that they may not want success. The Archbishop of Paris was this week to wait upon the Nonce, and yielded to him the hand in his own house, to which he before pretended. . . .

1683, Sept. 8th, st. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Duke of Ormond his grace. I have received the honour of your grace's of the 16th of August, st. v., and with it your commands concerning Mr. Veridet your chaplain, which I shall execute with all readiness and exactness when I find a fit opportunity for it. I dare not promise your grace that I shall have success, for they are extremely delicate in things of this nature here; but your grace shall find that I will leave nothing undone which may depend upon me for the obeying your commands. Your grace I know saw the last account which I gave to Mr. Secretary Jenkins of the illness of Mons^r. Colbert. On Monday morning at 3 of the clock he died, and you may guess what inconveniences will attend his death. Monsieur Pelletier, Counsellor of State, and cousin and creature of Monsieur de Louvois is declared Controuller General of the Finances, in the place of Monsieur Colbert; Monsieur de Louvois hath the surintendance des Bastimens, of which employ he hath got the reversion for Monsieur d'Ormoys son after his death; I think he hath some consideration for it, but not to the worth of the place. Your grace will perceive by this that Monsieur de Louvois will now wholly have the ministry in his hands, and I do believe that this is but the beginning of sorrow for the family of Colbert. . . .

1683, Sept. 8th, st. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Rochester.—The death of Colbert and its consequences.—We begin to think here also that the war will not be very bloody this year in Flanders, for we hope that some accommodation is treating of between France and Spain . . .

1683, Sept. 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—On Monday last at 3 of the clock in the morning Mons^r. Colbert died . . . (He again mentions the appointments of Mons^r. Pelletier and Mons^r. Louvois.) . . . Mons^r. Delval being returned from Bruxelles went immediately to Fontainebleau, and it is likely that he hath some propositions to make for hindering the troops from advancing further into those countries. The Spanish ambassador hath been there since Sunday last, and I hear he hath not been unemployed . . . I have put into the hands of Colonel Churchill who passed by this place in his way from Tangier, and who is gone for England this morning a memoir relating to the subject of salutes at sea. It was drawn up lately (that is within a few years) by the order of this King, and I am told that the orders relating to that ceremony which are given to his ships when they go to sea are partly grounded upon it. I shall endeavour, according to your commands, to inform myself of all things relating to that subject, and to give you as soon as it is possible a good account of them. My Lord Dumbarton hath his audience upon Friday next at Fontainebleau; I go thither with him to present him, but I shall leave Tempest here to give you an account of what cometh to hand by Saturday's post.—P.S. (In Lord Preston's hand.) Doctor Burnet I hear is lately arrived here. I have been pressed to enclose a little memoir about the means of clearing the city of London from smoke; I can say nothing of it, but you may be pleased to shew it to his Majesty.

1683, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Murray.—The Bishop of Rosse coming hither some weeks since out of Schotland to be cut for the stone, did in 3 or 4 days after the operation fall into a fever, and finding his death to approach, he sent for my chaplain to assist him at his last hour. He accordingly went, and after that he had administered the Sacrament to him, and done what else was requisite upon that occasion, the bishop told him that having had the misfortune in his lifetime to lie under some prejudice and misconstructions, he thought it very necessary for him, now that he was to leave the world, to make a declaration of his faith and his principles relating to the government under which he was born, that so he might justify himself when he was gone. He then dictated this enclosed paper and signed it, desiring Mr. Fall, governor to my Lord Dumianguicke, and Mr. Wake, my chaplain, to be witnesses to it; within a few hours after he died; but before, did intimate some desire that the enclosed paper might be put into my hands, and that his Majesty might have a sight of it. He seemed also desirous that it might be transmitted into Scotland and lodged with the Archbishop of St. Andrews, that so he might at once justify himself and give a testimony at his death of his religion and of his loyalty to his countrymen. This, as Mr. Fall and Wake told me, who brought to me the original paper, did seem to be his desire, with which I think myself obliged to acquaint your lordship, transmitting it at the same time to you, and to leave the declaration in your lordship's hands to be disposed of as his Majesty shall order. I know your lordship will think fit to make his Royal Highness also acquainted with what hath passed . . .

1683, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I received yesterday yours of the 30th of Augt., s. v., for which I return you my humble thanks. I doubt not but that the entry of the French troops into Flanders will give great disquiet of thoughts to his Majesty; but I believe this Court in this conjuncture will not be willing to give him too great cause of offense. If by the march of these troops his most Christian Majesty can give a fright to the Spaniards, and so bring them to submit to his pretensions, it may do well; but be assured that great regard will be had to whatever the King our master shall say in the business if he shall find that the troops make any further progress. Much also of the resolutions which this Court will take in this and in other affairs will depend upon the taking or the raising of the siege of Vienna . . . My Lord Dumbarton and Col. Nicholas had their audiences from this King, Monseigneur. le Dauphin, Madame la Dauphine, Monsieur and Madame, and were very well received by them all upon Friday last.

s. d., Lord Preston to Dr. Busby.—When I was last at London I did endeavour to wait upon you, but had the misfortune not to find you at home. I should have attempted it again if I had not been so much pressed that I was not master of my time . . . I give you the trouble of this at the desire of Monsieur de Malnoe, an advocate of Parliament here, who is a very honest man and a good Protestant. Charles de Malnoe, his son, is at this time in the school of Westminster, but for some reasons which touch the private affairs of the family it would be of advantage to him if his son might have permission to come over hither for some little time.—Asks Dr. Busby to permit the son for some time to pass over to France and he Lord P., will engage that he shall return at the time to which Busby shall limit him.

1683, Sept. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—About the siege of Vienna.—This Court is not at all satisfied with the conclusion of the College of Princes at Ratisbone for accepting the truce without agreeing to the time and conditions proposed. But it is yet thought that Mons^r. de Crecy may have new orders to continue there a little longer . . . The Protestants of Languedoc, who have lately given disturbance upon the demolishing of their temples, have submitted themselves, and his most Christian Majesty hath granted a general amnesty for what hath passed.

Note. (Autograph), 1683, Sept. 21st. I writ this day a letter to my Lord Allington upon the subject of Mr. Verney's death, and sent it by Mons^r. Rasigarde his governor, but I had not time to have it copied.

1683, Sept. 22nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Goddard. The copy of the epistle designed for the Duke enclosed I have perused, and I do approve of it very well. You have only done me too much honour in it, which I look upon of the friendship to me, but I cannot imagine that by any means I deserve it.

we have various for several days here; but we have not yet received any news from the Duke of York. I should not have presumed to give your Highness the trouble of this if something of charity had not induced me to it. I was at the instance of a person of his Majesty's, who some time since was obliged by a misfortune to leave England. It is Mr. Grahme, sir, whom perhaps your Highness may remember. Mr. Betterton coming hither some weeks since by his Majesty's command, to endeavour to carry over the Opera, and finding that intention did not meet with Mons. de la Fuente to go over with him to endeavour to represent something at least like an Opera in England for his Majesty's diversion. He hath also assured him of a pension from the House, and that he is very willing and ready to go over. He only desireth his Majesty's protection when he is there, and what encouragement his Majesty shall be pleased to give him if he finds that he deserves it. I take the confidence therefore on his behalf humbly to beseech your Highness to speak a good word for him to the King, whose protection he only desireth whilst he is in England, and I doubt not but he will perform something to his Majesty's and your Highness's satisfaction 1683, Sept. 22nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness (the Duke of York).—I should not have presumed to give your Highness the trouble of this if something of charity had not induced me to it. 1683, Sept. 24th, s. n., Fountainbleau.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I can now confirm to you what I writ in my last that Vienna is succoured and the siege raised. The paper enclosed will acquaint you with as much of the particulars of that action as is yet known here.

1683, Sept. 29th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received yours of the 13th current, s. v., to which my next shall be an answer. The Court of Spain hath answered by the ordinary of yesterday to the dispatches of Mons^r. de Grana, and of Mons^r. de la Fuente, touching the declaration made in Flanders for the satisfaction of the pretensions of the King. It hath approved of the answer which that ambassador hath given here, and also of that which Mons^r. de Grana did give to Mons^r. d'Alfeldt, and hath further declared that since the Emperor in the perils conjuncture of the siege of his capital city and of the desolation of his hereditary countries had not made the least step towards the abandoning of his allies, by making of a particular peace, it would be extremely dishonourable for the King of Spain to abandon him and his other allies at this time, without the consent of whom he could hearken to no proposition of peace The report runneth here that the Republic of Genoa hath refused audience to Mons^r. de St. Omer, because his most Christian Majesty hath refused it twice to their minister here. My Lord of Dunbarton and Coll. Nicholas had their audiences of Congé at Fountainbleau upon Saturday last. My lord hath been extremely well received, and this King parted with him with particular marks of esteem and favour. He told him that the King our master could have sent no one who could have been welcomer to him, and that he would thank his Majesty particularly for sending of him; he intends to leave this place within 5 or 6 days.

1683, Oct. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.— . . . I pray take notice here of a report which hath run for several days, and which hath made a great noise, of a ligue offensive and defensive lately entered into between the King our master and his most Christian Majesty. It is industriously spread here, and some of his Majesty's own subjects are not backward in repeating it forward. I have been much upon it several times; but all that I can say will not persuade some people here of the falsity of the rumour.

1683, Oct. 3rd, st. no., Paris. Lord Preston to the Duke (autograph). I would not omit the opportunity of conveying this to your Highness by the hand of Capt. Berkeley. I have charged Capt. Berkeley, sir, with some particulars which it may be very fit for your Highness to know. I choose the rather to desire him to deliver them by word of mouth, because he having been a witness to some passages here may better confirm the truth of them.

1683, Oct. 13th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—

Versailles that it doth not afford matter enough to make the subject of a letter. The great discourse at this time here is of this King's demanding the Infanta of Portugal in marriage, of the orders sent to Mons^r. d'Humieres to withdraw the troops from Flanders upon the 15th of this month, and to Mons^r. de Priuli to bring back the French fleet from Danemark. The Spanish fleet is still at Naples, and by the last advices from thence we are told that a great council of war had been held on board the Admiral, where all the Spanish commanders were present, that the result of it was kept very secret, but that nobody doubted but that the deliberation had been upon its return to Spain, because, &c.

1683, Oct. 16th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.

1683, Oct. 20th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I received yesterday the honour of your lordship's of the 4th instant, with his Majesty's command concerning Doctor Burnet, which I shall obey with all readiness. I have in some measure already executed them, for at his arrival he sent to me know if I would permit him to visit me, and I returned to him for answer that I saw nobody who was not upon better terms with the King my master than I perceived that he was. I met him afterwards at Fountainbleau, where he had made some acquaintance, and I did not fail there as occasion served to give that character of him which he deserveth. I am told that he goeth to-morrow or upon Friday to Versailles to see the curiosities there, and that upon Monday next he pretends to leave this place and to go towards England. I shall not fail, my lord, to give an account of his merits to the ministers and others here upon every occasion which offers itself, and if he continueth here I do not doubt but that he will be treated as he deserveth.

1683, Oct. 20th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The post did not arrive till Monday. It brought me two of yours, in one of which are his Majesty's commands concerning Bomeny. Since the time that you mentioned him to me in a former letter I have used all possible endeavours to find him out. I ordered Tempest to inform you two posts ago that I had found out one of that name, but I doubt he hath been settled here longer than the person you mention can have been. I am at this time making strict enquiry after him, and if he be here be assured, sir, that neither pains nor cost shall be spared to have him found out and sent over. To those offices which I passed some time since by his Majesty's command in favour of the Republic of Genoa in this Court, I had yesterday this answer from Mons^r. de Croissy, that the King his master had several just reasons to be offended with that state, which had augmented his forces by sea at a time when he had cause to believe that it had no very favourable designs for his interests, that it had also put itself under the protection of Spain in opposition to him. That however it was in the power of the Genoese to be well with France when they pleased by altering only their former conduct, and by giving no umbrage or cause of suspicion for the future. He added that his most Christian Majesty had so much regard for the interposition and instances of the King my master that he was willing to sacrifice to them all his resentments how justly soever grounded against that Republic at present, and that they should not in this conjuncture make him press anything against it which may disturb the peace of Christendom or put a stop to the more weighty negotiations which may be set on foot to establish its repose. I have acquainted the Envoyé of Genoa with this answer, who hath received it with all demonstrations of respect and gratitude imaginable to the King our master, and told me that he would not fail to impart to his Republic, which he was sure was resolved to make some public acknowledgment of the honour of that protection which his Majesty had at this time afforded to it, both to himself and to his subjects; he added that he was also ordered to make me a compliment in its name for the pains which I had taken There is a late advise from thence (Portugal), which because it is something extraordinary I will recount to you though perhaps you may have had it from Mr. Fanshaw. There were brought upon this last fleet from Brasil two English prisoners, who were arrested in the Indies as guilty of one of the most horrible actions that hath of late been heard of. About 12 years since a Portuguese vessel, named Nostra senhora d' Ajuda, came from Goa, richly laden, and brought upon it 6 considerable families which returned to Portugal, besides a great number of passengers. This vessel in her way came to an anchor at an island where 3 English vessels had before anchored, not fearing anything from a nation with which Portugal was at peace. But the English, tempted with the richness of the cargo, attempted the vessel by night, cut the throats of all the Portuguese, pillaged, and at last sunk her, that she might be no more heard of. They saved only a negro of an extraordinary shape, who was sent from the Indies as a present to the Prince Regent. This negro they carried with them into England, who returning about 5 or 6 years since, being discontent with the English, into the Indies, discovered this whole matter to a Portuguese factory; of which the English there hearing, killed the negro, but the Portuguese made these 2 men who are now at Lisbon to be arrested, and it is said that they pretend to receive a very great satisfaction from the English nation upon this account 1683, Oct. 24th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.— . . . Mons^r. Delval (who hath since the ministry of the Marquis de Grana solicited the affairs of the low countries here, and who, I think, had a character from Spayne, tho' this Court made a difficulty to receive his credentials, was ordered upon the receipt of the enclosed billet, signed by Mons^r. de Louvois, to leave Paris and to return to Bruxelles. It was delivered to him upon Friday morning by a courier du Cabinet du Roy, who told him that he had orders not to quit him till he saw him over the river of Honeau, which is upon the French frontier. Mons^r. Delval, after going to the Spanish ambassador and staying a quarter of an hour with him, took post immediately attended only by the courier and his valet de chambre, and is gone for Flanders Mons^r. Heinsius, finding that he can obtain nothing in this Court in the affair of Orange, did on Tuesday last demand his audience of congé, and is preparing to leave this place in a few days. . . .

1683, Oct. 27th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Graham.—I have been solicited here by Madame la Marquise de Flamerin, mother to the Marquis of that name, who is now in the Court of England, and by some other persons of quality, to write you in favour of the Sieur Bolger, who hath lately had the misfortune to kill a man at London, and is now in Newgate for it. They apprehend much that he may be condemned. I desire that if it be possible to get a reprieve for him by the interposition of the Duke (if his case deserveth it): it would be an obligation laid upon some persons of quality here.

1683, Oct. 27th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—I have used all possible endeavours to find out Bomeny, but hitherto without any manner of success. The person of his name mentioned in my former letters hath lived long here, and knoweth nothing of the other. At this present I have those employed who make strict enquiry after him, and I am persuaded before Friday night, if he be here, that I shall get notice of him. He might have been traced with more ease if I could have had any knowledge of his country or any description of his person. I am told of a little ordinary near the Queen's Chapel at St. James, and just by Monsieur Labaddy's house, the wine merchant, where many of the French valets de chambre usually eat; perhaps, if enquiry were made privately there after him, some notice might be had of him, or at least it might be known in what province of France he was born. I hath some suspicion that he hath changed his name, or hath taken upon him some disguise, having come away upon an ill account Mons^r. de Croissy said some day since to the Nonce that the King his master would be satisfied with another equivalent for Alost than that of Luxembourg, and that he would consent also that it should not be in the Low countries, nor in the Milanois Mons^r. Heinsius hath this day his audience of Congé. The Nonce is said to have received orders to negotiate an accommodation of differences betwixt this King and the King of Poland. I take the task not to be easy at present. This King hath sent a chain of gold, with his picture in it, valued at 1,500 livres, to the Escuyer of the Nonce, and 2,000 louis's d'or to be distributed amongst his domestiques, who brought the Langes [Linges?] benites to the Duke of Burgundy.

1683, Oct. 20th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I take the liberty to enclose my bill of extraordinaries expenses for these 7 months last past, ending the last day of September. Explains it. . . .

1683, Oct. 30th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Dumbarton. Preparations are here making now for a war, for it appears plainly that the Spaniard are resolved to have it at any rate. Their conduct in Flanders is extraordinary, and their proceedings upon the French territories brisk. . . .

1683, Oct. 30th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Be pleased to acquaint his Majesty that I did the other day wait upon the Prince of Condé, and acquaint him what you were pleased to order me in your letter. He received me with all civility and kindness, and told me that this was not the first honour that his Majesty had been pleased to lay upon him, nor the first obligation he had bound him by; that his favours to him were of an ancient date, that he received this last with all gratitude and acknowledgement, and that he should embrace all occasions of expressing his resentments of it. He desired me to beg of his Majesty the continuation of his favour and support to the Prince de la Roche-sur-yon, and the honour of his protection.

1683, Oct. 30th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—After all the enquiry which I have made, and all the endeavours which I have used, I have not yet been able to have any news of Bomeny, which maketh me believe that he is either not here, or if he be that he is under a disguise. Doctor Burnet, as I am told, left this place yesterday, in order, as he pretends, to go for England. I hear that he hath taken Roan in his way, where he will make some short stay . . . This Court hath ordered an answer to the late manifesto of Mons^r. de Grana; it is written by way of letter to the Mareschal de Humieres, and several printed copies of it are sent to the commanders of places. It is ordered by that letter to attack all the subjects of Spain, to burn thirty of their villages for one of the French, and to commit all sorts of hostilities by way of reprisal. The Dutch ambassador in this Court having some time since complained that the French had made certain villages depending upon Maestricht to pay contributions received yesterday only this answer, that his most Christian Majesty did disavow the action, but no mention was made of restitution, or of satisfaction for the damage

1683, Nov. 3rd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—Having occasion yesterday to see Mons^r. de Croissy I was told by him that the Spaniards, by the small inclinations which they expressed to give the King his master a reasonable satisfaction upon the just pretensions which he hath to several places in Flanders, and by the hostilities which they had begun to exercise against his subjects in those parts, had obliged him to send his orders to Monsieur de Humieres to lay siege to some town within the Spanish territories, leaving the choice of the place to him; that he believed he would pitch upon Courtray, and in likelihood if the illness of the season and ways did not hinder the march of the great cannon, that it would be invested as on Sunday last. He said that he had by order of this King given notice of this to Mons^r. Barillon by a courier express, who was to acquaint his Majesty with it, and with all to let him know that when the place is taken his most Christian Majesty is willing to submit it and all his differences with the crown of Spain to his disposal and arbitrage, and that he maketh this attempt only with a design to oblige his Catholique Majesty to take the same wholesome measures That the sincerity of his intentions may appear to the whole world, and that nobody may doubt of his earnest desire to establish the peace of Christendom, the King his master did offer to the Spaniards to take his equivalent three ways, and that he left it to their choice to yield that which they could part with the least inconvenience. The first was by the cession of Luxembourg with its fortifications razed, and of 14 or 15 villages which depend upon it.

2. The second was by yielding the towns of Courtray, of Dixmude, the fortifications also razed, with some neighbouring villages, and their dependencies.

3. The third was by putting into his hands Puigorda in Catalonia, with the rest of the county of Cerdagne. These, Mons^r. du Croissy said, were the 3 propositions which his most Christian Majesty thought fit to make to the King of Spayne, and that he expected to have his determination before the end of the year, which if he had not, he would not stand longer engaged. And that nobody might think that the King his master when he had made a peace with Spayne would attack the empire, his Majesty doth offer a truce to it of 30, 25, or 20 years, according as that matter shall be regulated by the Diete of Ratisbone. This, to the best of my remembrance, is the substance of what Mons^r. de Croissy said yesterday to me, and I see no reason to doubt but that his most Christian Majesty meaneth sincerely It is written from Naples that the English vessels which I mentioned before to have run foul upon a gally of the Duke of Torsis squadron hath been burnt by accident. I received a letter some time since from one Lionel Croft, an Englishman of Algiers, in which he acquainted me that Mons. du Quesne had some days before seized of a Puke which belonged to an admiral which was Dutch built, and of an 100 tons, and purchased it and sold it to Sally. He says he had bought it from the governor of the city and was to have it with thirty of the horses of the garrison. He has sent a copy of her passport from Tangier, and also the original certificate* of the chief Caddi of Algiers, that she was bought of Tunisians, with whom the French have peace, and not of those of Sally, with the translation of it attested by Mr. Rycaut, our consul. By the last post I received notice from consul Lang, of Marseilles, that the said Pinke was brought into Toulon by order of Mons. du Quesne, with his desire that I would solicit her restitution in this Court. I thought it my duty to represent the matter yesterday to Mons. de Croissy, who hath promised me to solicit the release of the vessel, but desired me to give a short memorial of it to be presented to this King, which I have done and enclosed the copy of it. With yours of Oct. 15th, sir, I received inclosed in a memoire in the nature of a petition to his Majesty that I might be empowered to interpose with his most Christian Majesty to have the ancient privileges of the Scotch nation in this kingdom made good to those of it now, which you were pleased to say was transmitted to you by Sir Andrew Forrester by the Duke's command. I do not know what kind of offices his Majesty would have me to pass in this matter. I have once by order attempted something in it upon the occasion of a new imposition laid upon Scotch ships coming into the French ports. But I could never yet obtain any answer to the instances I made. If in general we demand the confirmation of those privileges, in likelihood it will not be granted, but if there be any particular case depending at present and grounded upon the privileges, I suppose those who are concerned in the Scotch affairs will convey his Majesty's commands to me, which I shall take care to execute with all readiness. I have taken care to give the character here of Doctor Burnet which he deserveth. I find they are troubled, and a little out of countenance at Court, for the reception which was made there for him, and say that if he had been known this King would have taken care that he should have been treated otherwise. He hath left this place on Thursday last, and pretends that he is gone towards England.

SIR

SIR
F. GRAHAM

1683, Nov. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Recommends the bearer.

1683, Nov. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Lord Marquis of Halifax.—The bearer hereof, my secretary, having some occasions of his own, which call him into England, I have ordered him to deliver this into your lordship's hands, and at the same time to assure you of my most humble service. Since my last to your lordship I have had some more lights concerning Mr. Mountague, and I have them from an original hand, and I dare assure your lordship of the truth of them. He did twice during his stay here desire to see this King in private, and twice it was refused to him, he being told the last time that his most Christian Majesty did not think fit to see him at this time, when he had so good a correspondence with the King our master, and when he, Mr. Mountague, was so ill with him. When he could not obtain an audience, he then by the same hand desired to know if he might not expect some money as a gratification, he having at this time occasion for it. He was denied that also, which made him make more haste away than he designed to do at his arrival here. I am told he intends to leave my Lady Northumberland at Montpellier, and to pass the winter himself in Italy, at least he pretends this. I remember I took particular notice of the word gratification when this thing was told me, and I desired to know if that were his term which he used, and the person who told me assured me a second time that it was. It need not be observed to your lordship that gratification pre-supposeth service. I have since I had this account considered why Mr. Mountague should have been treated worse than Doctor Burnet, and I can only think of those reasons for it. First, he cannot be so useful at this time as the doctor, who, if he be gone into England, may continue his former practises with the discontented party. In the next place if Mr. Mountague had had a reception, it could not have been excused so to the King our master as that of Doctor Burnet was. In the next place if his Majesty's pretending not to know the character and circumstances of, or, perhaps, another to be charged with the present scarcity of money here, where they are begun to retrench in all sorts of expenses. It is a question now often asked at this Court in confidence whether there have been really any such thing as a conspiracy in England, which I take to be one effect of the doctor's late conversation here. They are much perplexed here in their councils about Flanders; their honour, as they think, being engaged to maintain their violences there . . .

s. d., Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of Oxon.—I received yesterday your lordship's very obliging letter of the 16th October, s. v. . . . Your lordship could not have obliged me more than by sending Mr. Wake with me; no man can live a more regular life than he doth, nor give better example or more content to all people. He preacheth extremely well; he is very careful to do all necessary duties to all those of our country who fall ill here, of which of late there have been great numbers, and many who have died. I have recommended to him to be more careful in this particular, because the priests and cures here are very busy in attempting upon many of the King's Protestant subjects when they are upon their death beds. I have had many sharp contests with this Court upon that subject, but I thank God I have got the better, and I hope nobody after me will have trouble upon that account . . .

1683, Nov. 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—This place since my last affords very little more considerable than the assurance that Courtray was invested upon the 31st of the last month, and formally besieged upon the 2nd of this . . . The Court of Genoa suffers much by the great disorders which they (the galleys of Spain) commit. And that Republic which assembleth often in council to deliberate upon the proposition of the Secretary of Milan doth not seem at all resolved to accord the salutes as the Comte d'Aguilar demands them, nor to yield to other things which he proposeth. It is thought that one of the principal of them is, that the Spaniards would oblige the Genoese to make public the secret treaty which they have lately made together. To which rather than they will yield, and by doing so give ombrage to France, it is believed that those people will give a sum of money for a dispensation . . . We hear here that my Lord Dartmouth hath begun to demolish Tangier, and to embark the garrison. The Vice Roy of Naples hath cashiered all the French who were in the troops of that kingdom, and in the service of Spain there.

1683, Nov. 10th, st. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Bishop of London.—The bearer hereof, Mr. de Bourdeau, was minister of the Protestant church at Montpellier, when it was lately demolished by the order of this King. He is a man of singular merit and learning, and very much esteemed here, which things I know are enough to recommend him to your lordship's generous favour and protection. Being driven from his own country, and the place of his former residence, he is willing to seek a retreat in England for himself and his family. I know your lordship will honour a person who deserves it so well with your protection . . .

1683, Nov. 10th, st. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—Recommends M. de Bourdeau.

1683, Nov. 10th, st. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of Rochester. I received the honour of your lordship's kind letter, accompanied with your excellent sermon preached upon so solemn and so late an occasion, from the hands of Monsieur Beaumonde but the last night; his passage having been very long and very dangerous by sea . . . I am to congratulate with your lordship, as I do with all my heart that honour which the King hath of late, tho' you have long deserved it, though 'fit to lay upon you. The trouble of it will be to your lordship, but the advantage will be to the church and to us . . .

1683, Nov. 10th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The business of the English ship seized by Monsieur du Quesne at Algiers, which I mentioned in my last to you, is referred by this King to the report of Mons. de Seignelay, so that I have not yet had an answer to my late memorial upon that subject. The town of Courtray being taken, the citadel capitulated, and soon after surrendered itself. I enclose an extract of a letter of the 6th instant from that place, which recounts the particular of the action. We are also assured here that Dixmude is besieged. The courier who was sent to Mons. d'Arax with orders to notify to the States General the propositions which this King have thought fit lately to make to Spain upon the subject of the equivalent, arrived, by reason of the many windings which he was obliged to make for the avoiding of the Spanish troops, by one day too late at the Hague, for the city of Amsterdam had the day before consented to the new levies of 16,000 men, which it is believed here those new offers would have hindered 1683, Nov. 13th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The Pope's Nuncio had upon Monday last a particular audience, in which he represented to this King that the consequence of the present progress of his arms in Flanders would be the engaging of Europe in a war, and that it would render all offices for an accommodation of differences betwixt this Crown and Spain ineffectual. He did therefore most humbly intreat his most Christian Majesty to send his orders to the Mareschal de Humieres to cease from committing any further hostilities, and that the troops might be recalled from those countries. It was observed that the Nuncio was heard with some impatience, and I find that his answer was not so favourable as he expected that it should have been. Dixmude is taken without great difficulty We have no confirmation from Holland of what was reported here of the resolution of the city of Amsterdam to consent to the new levies, which maketh me suspect that it is not true; but you will have had before this time an account of this from Holland It hath been reported here very lately, and very industriously for these 2 days, that my Lord Dartmouth hath taken Gibraltar, and yesterday I saw in the Amsterdam Gazette that he had taken possession of it by virtue of a treaty betwixt his Majesty and the King of Spain. But this is according to the usual liberty of these prints.

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Cooke.— . . . I saw in a postscript to your last letter to Mr. Tempest that the Queen had been pleased to lay her commands upon me in the affair of Mons^r. Le Vaisseau, which I am upon all occasions to obey, and which I have in this particular done. For yesterday I did demand his Congé; I am in hopes soon of a very favourable answer, for Mons^r. de Croissy hath promised me to move this King in it this day at Council, which so soon as I have I shall not fail to transmit to you.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Earl of Carlisle.— . . . I received the honour of your lordship's by Sir Nathaniel Johnson The present conjecture of time, as your lordship will well perceive, is very delicate and critical. The war is certainly begun, tho' this King is very loath to own that he hath made a contravention to the Treaty of Nimegue, tho' he sayeth that his attempts upon Courtray and Dixmude, and the proceedings of his troops in Flanders, were only begun and continued with a design to make the Spaniard submit to the arbitrage of the King, as he hath offered to do. It is hard yet to judge whether a real war will ensue or not, because we cannot know whether the Spaniard will accept of the late propositions for an accommodation of differences made by this Crown before the end of the year, or whether they will utterly refuse them. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—I am only by this to acknowledge the honour of your lordship's of the 1st of Nov., which I received yesterday. For the late ordinary occurrences of this place I shall take leave to refer you to mine of this day, to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. If anything more particularly worthy of your lordship's knowledge had happened I should not have failed to have imparted it to you.

1683, Nov. 17th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Orders have been sent from this Court for the clearing of the vessel which I lately mentioned in one of mine to have been seized by Mons^r. du Quesne at Algiers and sent by his order into Thoulon; accordingly I have received a letter of the 6th instant from Consul Lang at Marseilles that the said vessel had liberty to depart and that she was then about to sail . . . Be pleased to let me know if Dr. Burnet be arrived in England or not; there is a report, to which I give not much credit, that he is still in this place.

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. 4.

1683, November 20, n. st. Lord Preston to his brother Howard This place hath now only war for the subject of its discourse, and great preparations are making for it, so that all the world being in a hurry the usual diversions of it are much lessened

1683, Nov. 20th, s. n. Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. The Nuncio had the last week a conference with the Spanish ambassador upon the subject of the peace. The former told the latter that the question was now no more concerning Luxembourg, but about a little territory in Flanders, which this King desired because it lay convenient for him. That if Spain would not yield so small a thing the French arms might even this winter make a further progress in Flanders, but if on the other side it would, the Emperor might undoubtedly in a little time make himself master again of the kingdom of Hungary.—The conversation between them on the subject.—This was the subject of the conference of those two ministers, since which I am told the Nuncio begins to loose the hopes of a peace, and by consequence of the continuation of the war against the Turks News from Germany: movements of the French Court . . . The Princes and Volontaires are returned from Flanders, and the Duke of Northumberland amongst the rest, to whom they do a great deal of justice here in giving a very honourable account of his behaviour at Courtray, where he was all the first night at the head of those who opened the trenches. Leave is refused to all officers of coming from thence hither, and they are strictly ordered to continue at the head of their commands, and to be in a readiness upon the first alarm. Even those of the Guards are commanded to stay there 1683, Nov. 14th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Tempest.

1683, Nov. 24th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Cooke.— I am to acquaint you that I have obtained the passport of Monsieur Le Vaisseau, I expect it every moment, but if it doth not come time enough to be sent by this post I shall not fail to send it by the next.

1683, Nov. 24th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir Stephen Fox My Lord of Northumberland arrived here upon Thursday last, and did me the honour to come hither, where you may assure yourself he is extremely welcome. Unfortunately at that time two chimneys in my house were taken down, which have rendered one side of my house useless at present; but we are making all haste to have them repaired, and then his Grace shall command all the convenience that I can afford him; in the meantime he hath a very good apartment at the Hotel d'Entrague, which is just by me, and doth me the honour to eat constantly with me, and to be pleased with the poor cheer which I can make him I had the honour to wait upon my Lord Duke yesterday to Versailles, where he saluted this King, and was received by him with great expressions of affection and esteem

1683, Nov. 24th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have received yours of the 8th instant, s. v., with a copy of Don Pedro de Ronquillo's late memorial inclosed, and an account of his Majesty's answer to it, than which nothing can be more reasonable and strong; nor is there anything which can justify more to all the unprejudiced part of the world the prudence of his Majesty's conduct in this critical conjuncture of affairs than it doth. The strange reports which are spread here (and I suppose in other parts of Europe) of a ligue offensive and defensive concluded betwixt his Majesty and this Crown, of Monsieur de Tilladets chimerical journey into England, with I know not what proposals from this King, of his Majesty's not only knowing of the siege of Courtray, and of the taking of Dixmude, but of his consenting to and promoting them, are the acts by which the Spaniards hope to bong up their sinking affairs, and their reputation, and to make that which naturally floweth from their own ill mesnagement appear to be the effect of designs which they intend that their neighbouring Princes have formed against them. To what you are pleased to desire to be informed of concerning the method of giving answers to the memorials of foreign ministers in this Court, I must return that all observation and inquiry that can be made I find that they have ever avoided to do it by writing here, unless it be ordered otherwise by the King's particular command, which he seldom giveth but when he desireth that the answer should be made very public Upon Monday night a courier arrived here from Monsieur d'Avaux; he brought the particulars of the reception of the Prince of Orange at Amsterdam, and an account also of the harangue of the pensionary to the Counsel of that town. I enclose a relation of them. We have yet no certainty of any resolution which is taken, but it is generally believed at this Court that the instances of the Prince of Orange will be so effectual as to prevail with that place to consent to the new levy of 16,000 men proposed The farmers of this King's domain have seized upon the goods and personal estate of my Lady Borlase, who died here the other day, under pretence of her being subject as a stranger to the Droit d'Aubains. Application hath been made to me, and I am in hopes to obtain a restitution of them. The King's Scotch subjects are allowed to be exempted from that law here, and in my time one or two cases have happened by the death of some of them in which no trouble hath been given. But this privilege and exemption is disputed by the English subjects, and I should be glad from you, sir, to know how the matter is understood in England, and how I am to behave myself in regard of them: when my Lord St. Albans was his Majesty's ambassador here upon a case which then happened, he obtained an arrêt of the Council of State in favour of the English, a copy of which I have. I have procured this King's permission for the Sieur le Vaisseur and his family to continue in England according to the orders which I have had, and shall send over the brevet by the next post . . .

1683, Nov. 27, n. st., Paris. The same to the same. —Since the last conference which the Nonce had here with the Spanish ambassador (of which I have already in one of mine informed you) the former hath in a visit which he made to Monsieur de Croissy conferred with him upon the same subject of the peace. —Their conversation on the subject. —Monsieur d'Oppede is arrived from his embassy of Portugal, either at Brest or at Rochfort. He hath acquitted himself so ill there that people think he will not be over well received here . . .

1683, Dec. 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Dunbarton. —Complaining of ill offices done to him by the Earl.

1683, Dec. 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Coll. Grahame on the subject of the last letter.

1683, Dec. 1st, n. s., Paris. —Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. — . . . I have this morning dispatched one away express with my letter to Mr. Bomeny at Alençon, which is 40 leagues from this place. If he be there I am sure the messenger will find him out. I have written to him that it is in order to his Majesty's particular satisfaction in some points that he is sent for with so much care and diligence, and that he will not loose his time by making haste into England. I have directed him, sir, at his arrival to address himself to you, and have ordered the messenger to furnish him with a supply for his journey, if he should make any difficulty upon the want of money. —Polish and Spanish affairs.

1683, Dec. 4th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. —I received yesterday yours of Nov. 19th, s. v., and I am to return my humble acknowledgements to you for the great lights which you give me in it concerning the Droit D'Aubeine, which will not only be of great use to me in the present case of my Lady Borlace, but in all others of the like nature which may happen hereafter: I shall not fail to do what in me lyeth to have the exemption allowed of in this case, and to obtain if possible a general declaration in favour of his Majesty's English subjects; but I dare scarce hope for the latter. —Conversation on the subject with M. de Croissy. —I am to return my humble thanks for the communication of Don Pedro de Ronquillo's last paper; I perceive it is not like to be the last which you are to have; for I met the other day this Spanish ambassador who told me pleasantly that Monsieur de Ronquillo had written to him that he had now received an answer to his late memorial presented to the King, but that not being able to obtain it in writing, he did not well remember what it was . . . On Saturday last the Nonce had again a long conversation with the Spanish ambassador upon the subject of a truce, which he endeavoured to persuade him by many reasons to consent to, but the latter excused himself by his want of orders . . . 'Tis said that there is at present some negotiation on foot betwixt France and its allies; I believe it may be only that they are taking measures about the manner of acting in case of a rupture: great preparations are making at Thoulon for the setting out a considerable fleet in the spring; but there seems to be a necessity for it, since the Algerines have put to sea seven ships which have already taken three vessels belonging to St. Malo's, upon one of which was embarked the daughter and the equipage of Monsieur d'Oppede returning from Portugal, which he sent by the nearest way into Province, where he usually resideth, being a President of the Parliament of Aix . . . P.S. I have sent you Le Pêcheur Fidèle, the famous Almanack of Milan, which is much enquired after and credited here. You will see in several places that the prophet speaketh French. Be pleased to present one to his Majesty, and to accept of another.

1683, Dec. 11th, s. n., Paris. —To Mr. Secretary by Mr. Godolphin by my Lord's orders. —(The letter is signed C. Godolphin.) My Lord Preston being yet under the constraint of his gout, which hath confined him ever since this day seven night wholly to his chamber, and for the most part to his bed. His Lordship finds himself obliged to employ another hand to answer some of your honour's expectations from hence: and in the first place I am ordered to acquaint your honour that on Thursday morning last Bomeny set forward from hence in the Calais coach, intending at his arrival there to embark himself with the first opportunity, either in the yacht expected by Col. Nicholas, or else in the packet boat, and as soon as he comes to London he will wait upon your honour. The messenger whom my Lord sent to Alençon for him says he hath the character there of a very honest man, and was very ready to come away with him on the signification of the King's pleasure, which he intendeth to have done sooner on a former intimation from one du Plessy, his brother-in-law, at London, who is in the Guards, but that he wanted money for the journey, which my Lord hath furnished him with, and upon his lordship's assurance of the King's protection to him in England he said he should be ready to satisfy his Majesty in all the particulars that should be desired of him. The Spanish ambassador here, having received his orders from the Court of Spain to retire from hence, gave Monsieur de Croissy notice of them in a letter on Thursday last, by which he desired his audience de Congé; the answer he had then from Monsieur de Croissy was that he would produce his letter at the Council . . .

1683, Dec. 21st, n. s., Paris. —Lord Preston to Lord Churchill. —I received but yesterday your lordship's, with one enclosed for the Marquis de Boufflars, which should have been here on Friday. I immediately sent to enquire after him and found that he is at Courtray, where he will remain for some time; I have therefore enclosed yours to him in one from myself, and desired him that he would send the answer to me, which I shall take care with all diligence to transmit to your lordship.

1683, Dec. 21st, s. n., Paris. —Lord Preston to the Earl of Dunbarton. —Amicable.

1683, Dec. 22nd, s. n., Paris. —Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. — . . . The enclosed from the King I have sent after the Duke of Northumberland this day to Metz, under the cover of the Mareschal de Crequi, so that I hope it will be delivered safely to him. I cannot avoid here to take notice of the great civilities which Mons^r Colbert de Maulievrier hath paid to his Grace as well at the siege of Courtray as at his Government of Tournay. He hath not failed also since to give that advantageous character of my Lord Duke in this Court, which indeed he deserveth, so that perhaps it would not be amiss if his Majesty would order me to say something to Mons^r. de Maulevrier, as I shall meet him upon occasion either at Court or elsewhere. I know he would take it as a particular mark of the King's favour. Upon the instances which I have made in the affair of my Lady Borlace an arrest hath passed in the last Council of State which orders the restitution of the effects of the said Lady seized under the pretence of the Droit D'Aubeine to her executors and heirs. A clause is also inserted prohibiting the farmers of the domaines to sell any part of the goods for satisfying the expenses of the seizure, as they pretended to do; but the arrest specifeth that this restitution shall be without consequence for the future . . . The Mareschal de Crequi was upon Monday last to begin to throw bombes into Luxembourg, and Mons^r. de Vauban hath given assurance that they will have good success, and hopeth within 14 days to give a very good account of the place. But the season seemeth to be very unfavourable for that design. His most Christian Majesty hath said that he wills only by this endeavour to make the Spaniards repent of their sudden declaration of war, but that he hath by no means changed his sentiments and resolution for a peace . . . It is said that Mons^r. d'Avaux is endeavouring under hand to hinder the estates of Holland from consenting to the new levies, and from taking away resolutions contrary to the interests of France. He offers the re-establishment of commerce upon the foot on which it stood in the year 1671, with assurance that his most Christian Majesty shall attempt nothing in Flanders which may give jealousy to the United Provinces . . .

1683, Jan. 5th, Paris. The same to the same. —I am very happy that his Majesty is satisfied with my endeavours in this last affair of my Lady Borlace. The gracious return that he is pleased to make to me for doing my duty is too great. I think his Majesty hath very well resolved to let that affair rest as it is, without making any attempt for a general declaration in favour of the English, for we can now, if any new occasion happens, upon very good grounds demand another arrest; and the general matter may be regulated hereafter by some new treaty of commerce I am preparing against the next week to pass offices in the affair of Canada, and I shall take all possible care and caution in it. I hear of two persons come over from that governor to represent here how things are pass'd there. I perceive they have not been over well heard here, nor seem they to be over well pleased with the conduct of the governor.—News from Portugal.—The particulars of the business of Luxemburg are not well known here, more than that is said in general that 3,000 bombs are fallen into the place; that they have put fire to several places of the low town, and that it is believed that the magazines of Fourag have been burnt. About 2,000 French are said to be killed, starved, and lost, in this action. The Prince de Chimay, the governor, to make the contempt that he had of the French appear the more, made the baultboys and violins to come one night upon the Rampart and give a serenade to Monsieur de Crequy. The answer was given from the mouth of the Mortiers, for express order was given not to advance or to run any hazards The States of Holland are said to be still occupied in their deliberations touching the levy of 16,000 men, because of the opposition of Amsterdam, which continues still in its first sentiments Mons^r. d'Avaux hath lately presented a new memorial at the Hague, in which he declares that his most Christian Majesty will yet prolong the term given to the Spaniards for one month, that is to say, till the end of January. . . .

1683, Jan. 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness.—Your Highness may be assured that I will take all possible care in the affair of Canada, and not the less since you are concerned in it, and are pleased to recommend it. I find the justice on our side to be so great that I hope we shall meet with no great difficulties here. I design to begin to pass offices in the next week By this last the Duke of Monmouth hath crowned all the other actions of his life, and he will by it make himself as famous in history for his probity as he hath already done to the present age for his duty and loyalty. I must confess, sir, I look at the hand of God in this business, which to me is pretty visible, for I do not see how the King and your Highness could have been in safety if he had continued longer at Court. His stay there would certainly have made room for more of his party, and how bloody and black designs are all too well known. The God of Heaven preserve you both from them. . . .

1683, Jan. 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Coll. Grahme.—About his state of health and the coldness of the weather making his recovery extreme slow. . . . I cannot conceal from you that I was a little surprised at the reception with which I met when I was last in England. I found that the King and Duke had been prepared and were prejudiced against me, that my just pretensions were obstructed without any great reason given for it. If, therefore, I did not make my Court so much to those persons to whom both my inclinations and affections would have directed it, but sought protection from those that gave it me, and by doing so kept me a little in countenance, I do not think that I am very much to be blamed. . . .

1683, Jan. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.— . . . All things seem here in suspense till the resolutions of the States General for the levies are known. This Court seemeth very much busied at this time. Couriers are dispatched, and arrive daily to and from all parts. The resolutions concerning the naval preparations and the armies by sea are not yet taken, which maketh that this King expecteth to see a more certain disposition either for peace or war before he determineth any thing of that. . . .

1683, Jan. 19th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—The extreme sharpness of the weather and my great weakness hindering me from going yesterday to Versailles, I sent my secretary to Mons^r. de Croissy to know if most Christian Majesty had ordered any answer to be given to my memorial concerning the enterprize of the French upon Nelson's Port; his answer was that in France as well as in England there were certain rules established touching the plantations, and that one of the nations would not suffer the other to enter into the lands which it possessed; so that if the English had first entered into any of the territories which belong to the French it was no wonder if they had acted the same thing upon the English; that however the King his master had commanded him to remit the whole affair into the hands of Mons^r. de Seignelay, it belonging naturally to his province; and that I was to address myself to him in what I had to act in that affair for the future . . . I find the great support of Mons^r. de la Barre, the present Governor of Canada, is from the Jesuits in this Court, which order hath always a great number of missionaries in that country, who besides the conversion of the infidels have had the address to engross the whole castor trade, from which they draw considerable advantage. The late Governor, the Marquis de Frontenac (in whose time this enterprise was proposed and rejected by him as a thing which must prejudice the good correspondence which subsists betwixt the two Crowns), did ever oppose himself to their designs and exerted the King his master's right to that traffique, but they found the means by the interest of Father de la Chaise to have him recalled, and the present Governor sent, who complyeth with them wholly, and giveth them no kind of trouble in their commerce. By this, sir, you will see that we are like to have those Fathers our enemies in this affair, and they are very powerful solicitors in this Court; but the justice of our cause is so great that I hope it may very safely be relied upon, and the more since his Majesty is pleased so heartily to espouse the interests of the company. Raditon (concerning whom you were pleased by your last to transmit to me his Majesty's commands, which I shall execute very soon) arrived about the time which you mentioned at Rochelle upon a French frigate, and hath been in Paris these 5 days. There came on shore at the same time, from on board of a merchant man, one Des Guzelieres, a person whose story is very well known in those countries, and who accompanied the other in his action. I am told that they both took possession for the English of this very Nelson's River and Port by a commission which they had from England since the return of his Majesty. They are both despatched from Mons^r. de la Barre with instructions for his and their own defence. A friend of mine who hath seen the former since his arrival and discoursed with him tells me that he finds him much alarmed with the charge which is given against him. Tho' I hear the son of Mons^r. de la Barre sayeth that the action passed much otherwise than we relate it, and that his father will justify himself very well, and that this King is already prevented in his favour, and that the complaints of the English will signify nothing, I apprehend that we shall meet with some difficulties in the progress of this affair, which makes me solicitous to be as perfectly informed in all particulars relating to it as I can be; I therefore take the liberty, sir, to desire that some cartes and relations of voyage into those parts which I remember to have seen and read in England, and which I believe the company either hath or may easily furnish, may be sent to me, and I the rather desire this, because perhaps it is not very reasonable that we should wholly rely upon the faith of the French cartes, which give very large boundaries to the territories of this King, especially in those parts of the world which are not so well known to Europe. The cartes and voyages which I think might be of use to me here are that of Hudson's Bay, and the relation of the voyages of Button, Baffin, and Nelson, with those of Captain Fox to the N.E. and of Captain James, all which I remember well that I have read. If some copies of sea cart's were also sent which have been taken in late voyages to those parts it would not be amiss. I the rather desire this because I hear Radison is come charged with a great number of them, which are doubtless drawn for his purpose. I am told privately that a relation of the moment of taking possession of Port Nelson in the name of the English by those very Des Grozelieres and Radison may be found amongst the papers of Prince Robert. This doubtless would be very useful to us, and it would be of consequence to have it here if by any means it can be found . . . From Holland we hear that the States General were to assemble to determine the affair of the new levies, and to declare absolutely, as it was believed there and is here, that they would not make any. They endeavour, however, to persuade France to prolong the term given to the Spaniards, because it is too short to have an answer from Madrid upon affairs of so great importance as are now negotiating. . . .

1683, Jan. 20th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—My Lord Arran and Colonel Finch arrived here on Wednesday at night, and they will, I suppose, have their audiences towards the latter end of the next week. . . .

1683, Jan. 26th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—In obedience to my orders I have demanded justice against Radison by the inclosed memorial, which Mons^r. de Seigneley hath promised to communicate to his most Christian Majesty and to procure me a speedy answer thereto. I am exceedingly sorry from him yesterday to my first, which is, that the King his master commanded him to know that he could not well give a satisfactory answer to his Majesty in this affair before he had been informed of the particularities of it by the Governour of Canada, since it was not just wholly to rely upon the complaints of the English without hearing what the accused had to say for their justification. That his most Christian Majesty had given his orders for the procuring of this relation with all speed, which appeared so much the more necessary to be expected, because Radison and de Grosseliers, who were just arrived from Canada, had related the action much otherwise than it had been represented by me I am informed by another way that Radison and de Grosseliers have seen Mons^r. de Seigneley since their arrival, and that they had informed him that they had lived in that country for many years in very good intelligence with the English, having furnished them many times with powder when they had need of it; but that they having a design once to insult Radison and des Groselieres in their barque, and to take from them 3 or 400 pounds of powder which they had in it by force, they defended themselves, that in truth it was the English who had upon several occasions begun the hostilities, but that in the end they proved themselves not to be strongest. This is the story which they have invented, and the son of Mons^r. de la Barre seconds them by publishing the same thing, and by declaring in all places that the English have been the aggressors, and that by their complaints they make the damage done to appear greater than in reality it is. I have inclosed a memoire which is fallen into my hands new presented by a master of a ship of Boston to Mons^r. de la Barre, with his answer to it, by which some of the practises of Radison and de Grosseliers will very well appear You were pleased in one of yours to mention the expectation of the resident of Genoa that I should pass some further offices in favour of the Republic in this Court. You have, sir, seen the answer of Mons^r. de Creissy to me upon that affair, and you know what my orders were, and that I have gone to the utmost bounds of them, so that I dare act no further without some new instruction.

1683, Jan. 29th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The marriage being now declared by his most Christian Majesty betwixt the Duke of Savoy and Mademoiselle, I suppose his Majesty will order a compliment to be made to her here before her departure. If I am appointed to make it I must beg of you to know his pleasure concerning the expense which I must make here upon it I would also willingly know his Majesty's pleasure as to my following this King if he goeth towards Italy a little early, that I might be preparing myself beforehand for the voyage.

1684, Feb. 2nd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same. I have as yet received no answer from Mons^r. de Seigneley to my last demand of justice against Radison; but I hope by the next post to send it to you Every post brings sad accounts from Bruxelles and other towns of Flanders of the general desolation of the Spanish territories by the French troops who spare nothing where they pass, so that it seemeth to be the design of his most Christian Majesty to raise the country wholly, as being the only means to reduce in a small time to his obedience, because so the Spaniard will not be able to make their troops subsist, nor can the towns be succoured by them My Lord Arran and Mr. Finch had their ordinances upon Monday last at Versailles.

1684, Feb. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Carlisle The Comte de Roussy, eldest son to the Comte de Ruyve now in Danemarke, and nephew to my Lord of Feversham, hath this week declared himself a Roman Catholick, the younger son having done it before at Rome; so that in a little time the Protestants will lose that family which hath always been a considerable support to their cause and interests.

1684, Feb. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Congratulations on the great which the King had deservedly conferred upon him.

1684, Feb. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Coll. Graham.—I have received two of yours, I shall write to you at large by Colonel Finch, and send you the for yourself and my Lord Chief Justice, to whom I have written by this post. I have enclosed some snuff, which is the best in Paris, and costs 4 pistols the pound, if you would have perfumed send me word by the next post, but everybody likes this better.

1684, Feb. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to his brother, Mr. Howard.—I do not think the colds can be greater in Muscovie than they have been here for now almost 3 months. The night before the last twenty people were found dead in several streets of this city, and scarce a night passeth without 7 or 8 being found starved, tho' all the day great fires are made almost in every street.

1684, Feb. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Dunbarton My Lord Arran had his first audience on Monday last, and I believe he will soon have that of Congé, because the voyage holds to Compiègne upon the 20th of this month.

1684, Feb. 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I have yet had no answer from Mons^r. de Seigneley to my last instances concerning Radison, he not having come to Paris this week, but I hope to see him upon Tuesday next at Versailles, and by Wednesday's post I shall give you a further account of that affair. Upon Thursday and yesterday I received the honour of two of yours, one of the 14th the other of the 17th of January, the severity of the weather hindring the arrival of the post sooner. His Majesty's commands concerning the Comte d'Alby I shall with the first convenience execute, and observe what you are pleased to say seemeth to be the intention of the King as to the manner of my passing the offices. I do not know how far he may have been serviceable to his Majesty here, according to what the Marquis d'Albeville pretends, but the cause assigned by these ministers for his commitment to the Bastille was his holding intelligence with Spayne from hence, and his being in the nature of a spy for that Crown From Madrid we hear that the substance of the negotiation of the Dutch ambassador there is to press the Council to declare the number and quality of the succours which his Catholique Majesty pretends to send to Flanders, and to demand that they may explain themselves fully upon that subject The Baron Delval is said also to be at this time at the Courts of the Princes of Brunswick pressing to know what succours the Low countries may expect from that house; but he hath not yet advanced in his negotiation. The affairs of Holland seem still to be in the same position. The assembly of the allies is not yet opened, the Prince of Waldeck employing himself much to adjust and to settle the preliminaries. . . .

1684, Feb. 9th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I sent yesterday to Mons^r. de Seigneley to know if his most Christian Majesty had yet ordered any answer to be given to my second memorial concerning the affair of Canada, and particularly relating to Radison, the chief actor in the violence offered there by the French. He replied that he had presented the memorial in Council, but that no other answer could be given to this second than had already been given to the first, since the King his master could not in justice punish Radison till he be fully informed of the circumstance of his attempt from his Governour of Canada to whom he had written for information upon this subject. His most Christian Majesty declared to the Nonce at his last audience that he would give his consent to a truce for some years if the Spaniards could not be persuaded to agree to a peace The advice of the resolution of the state of Holland, which was carried by a plurality of voices for the levy of 16,000 men, was brought here the other day by a courier from Mons^r. d'Avaux. Amsterdam, Scherddam, Delft, and some other towns are still said to dissent, as Frizeland and Groninguen still continue to oppose it Mons^r. Delval is said to be still at Hanover, where his negotiations do not advance much; the Princes of Brunswick have sent of the Hague Mons^r. de Wikdorf to assist at the assembly of the allies on their part. It is written also from those parts that it is believed that Sir William Waller will be soon chased from his government of Bremen upon what hath been represented there concerning him in his Majesty's name. . . .

1684, Feb. 12th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The Dutch ambassador is to have an audience this morning at Versailles to notify to this King the late resolution of the States General his masters, to augment their forces by the levy of 16,000 men; but at the same time he is to declare that they design not by it to give any cause of jealousy or offence to their neighbours, intending no more by it than to put themselves into a better posture for their defence. He is also to desire a further delay for the Spaniards, and to propose a cessation from all acts of hostility in Flanders by the French troops, for four, three, or two months, as his most Christian Majesty shall think fit, that in that time they may have the opportunity by the offices of their minister at Madrid of insinuating to the Spaniards wholesome council, and of persuading them at last to hearken to a peace. That ambassador told me yesterday that he had reasons to hope that his answer would be favourable. He also said that it was believed in Holland that Amsterdam and the other dissenting towns would be brought to consent to the resolution of the States General, notwithstanding that Mons^r. van Benningen continued to make all possible opposition . . .

1684, Feb. 16th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The answer which his most Christian Majesty gave to the proposal made by the Dutch ambassador at his late audience at Versailles, and which I mentioned in my last, was that he had already received advice of that which the ambassador was ordered to propose to him, and that he had sent his resolution upon it to his ambassador at the Hague, to be communicated to the States; that his intentions were good, and that he endeavoured nothing but the establishment of a lasting peace; believing at the same time that they had the same thing in their aim and view, but that in this case he was first to know what the Spaniards resolved to do . . . The Marquis Nigretti who came here from the Duke of Modena to compliment this King upon the birth of the Duke of Anjou, hath order to pass into England with the character of Envoyé Extraordinary of that Duke; he begins his journey towards Calais to-morrow.

1684, Feb. 23rd, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—Care is already taken of what you desire to be informed of relating to the case of Monroe, and you shall very speedily have an account of it. We are in great expectation here to know what the States of Holland will resolve upon the late propositions of his most Christian Majesty, made to them by Mons^r. d'Avaux at the Hague, which, as Mons^r. de Croissy told me, were, that if first they could persuade the Spaniards to accept of any one of the equivalents formerly proposed, the King his master was willing to consent to an accommodation, tho' the opiniastreté of the latter had obliged him to a vast expense in making new alliances, and in raising of fresh troops. Or if the King of Spayne would not give ear to this, if he would accept of a truce for 20 years, conjointly with the Empire, his most Christian Majesty was ready to grant it; but if both these proposals were rejected, if the States of Holland would promise to assist Spayne with no men or money, nor to enable them any other way to carry on the war against France, this King was ready to promise to them to do nothing in Flanders which might give them any just cause of ombrage or offence, but he would only carry on the war as the Spaniards should think fit to direct. That is, if he was insulted or attacked he would endeavour to defend himself and to repel force by force; but of all this I know that his Majesty hath notice before, Mons^r. Barillon having had orders to communicate it to him. We have now the confirmation of the disgrace of the Marquis de la Fuente, late ambassador of Spayne in this coast. . . .

1684, Feb. 23rd, s. n., Lord Preston to Lord Chamberlain Arlington . . . I have been very much solicited by the Marquis de Quesne and his sons to recommend to your lordship's favour Mons^r. Sartre, late minister of the Protestant's Church at Montpellier, before their temple was razed. He is their relation, and a person of great learning and piety, as I am assured from many of good reputation here. Being destitute of employment he designs to pass into England and to settle there, and carrieth with him a good fonds. The humble desire of Mons^r. Sartre is (in which I also join, if your lordship may without inconvenience grant it) that he may have the title of chaplain to his Majesty, and be admitted only ad honores, without pretending to any other advantage by it. . . .

1684, Feb. 26th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—The Nonce having at his last audience made a proposition of the same nature with that lately made by the Dutch ambassador to this King, had for answer only an account of the late orders sent to Mons^r. d'Avaux, which his most Christian Majesty told him contained his resolution touching an accommodation with Spayne, from which he would by no persuasions recede.—French military movements.

1684, March 1st, s. n., Paris. The same to the same, s. d. The same to the same.—A courier dispatched from the Hague by Mons^r. d'Avaux arrived here on Monday morning. He brought advise that the town of Middleburgh had also joined itself with that of Amsterdam to oppose the new levies of 16,000 men; that the Prince of Orange had immediately upon notice of that resolution sent Mons^r. o'dyke to the Governor with orders to put the Bourgeoisie in arms, and to let him know that himself would very soon be there, but that the Governour had answered that the danger of putting arms into the hands of the burghers was very great; because it would be very difficult to disarm them, and that therefore he thought he should serve the Prince better in not executing of his orders than in obeying them. We expect here with impatience to know what resolution the Prince will take upon this answer, with which he seemed to be very much displeased. It is also believed that other towns in those provinces may follow this example. . . .

1684, March 4th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the King.—Gives a good account of the Duke of Northumberland.—This King hath upon all occasions honoured him with particular marks of his esteem, and since the business of Courtray hath never failed to speak very advantageously of him; and I do not believe that any one hath in so short a time gained more the value of this Court (which as your Majesty knoweth is not over favourable to strangers) than his Grace hath done . . . Your Majesty, I think, could not have made choice of a fitter person than Mr. Colt to be about his Grace. . . .

1684, March 4th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir S. Fox.—Complimentary.

1684, March 4th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Guin.— . . . I am in great pain for my poor Lord Dartmouth, of whom we hear nothing here, but I hope he will not be long out. Mr. Seymour hath for these 4 weeks been in a dying condition, but is now something recovered; he hath at the same time been under great necessities, inasmuch, that if I had not supplied him with a small sum of thirty pistoles, I cannot imagine what he would have done. If he recovereth his health I think truly it will not be convenient to continue him longer here. You may represent his condition to his father, to whom I would do myself the honour to write if it were not on this subject. What lieth in my power for his service shall be performed with all readiness.

1684, March 7th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Bishop of London.—Mons^r. d'Allemagne hath lately solicited me to write in his favour to your lordship, and to recommend his interests to you, which I know he need not do, your lordship's charity and goodness having already been so great to him. He also tells me that if I would write to the King in his behalf it might very much further his pretensions to a benefice. I would willingly do what lieth in me for his advancement, and I should not stick to do this if your lordship shall think it may be of advantage to him and fitting to be done. I shall humbly beg a line from your lordship upon this matter by the next post, and I shall be ready to observe what you shall advise in it.

1684, March 8th, Paris. Lord Preston to Mons^r. d'Allemagne.— . . . Sends him a letter for the Bishop of London, which he desires him to give, and as regards the letter for the King, which d'Allemagne has asked him to write, he will be ready to do so if the Bishop thinks fit, and if he will present it to the King.

1684, March 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Pembroke. I should not presume to give your lordship the trouble of this at this time if I were not solicited by Mr. Wake, who is my chaplain here, and a very good and worthy young man, to recommend him and his interests to your lordship's favour and protection. He hath desired me further to represent to your lordship, that his father having some time bought of Mr. Tregonwell the next presentation to a parsonage in your lordship's gift, called Chilmarke, with the knowledge and consent of my late Lord, your brother, and the incumbent being dead some 10 days since, that he is in hopes that your lordship will either do him the honour to present him to the place yourself, or at least you will not oppose those who by my Lord your brother's donation, have acquired the right to do it.—Asks the Earl's favour for Mr. Wake.

1684, March 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—I received yesterday your letter of the 21st of February, s. v., with a memorial enclosed and recommended to me by the Lord's Committees of Trade and Plantations concerning some English pyrates in the West Indies, who have put themselves under the protection of the French there. I shall not fail of taking the first opportunity to represent the subject of it to Mons^r. de Seignelay, and also endeavour to procure such an order from this Court in it as those Lords seem to desire. Mons^r. de Seignelay doth at his day report at length to this King all that hath been represented to him concerning the affair of Canada, so that I hope within a few days to hear from him something upon that subject. To what you were pleased to demand concerning the authenticknesse of the petition of the master of the ship of Boston, to the Governour of Canada, I can answer that nothing can be more authentique than it is, it having been copied from an original, which I believe Radison or des Groziliers brought over hither, and which, I believe, they did not think would have fallen into my hands, because I hear they are concerned that it hath gotten abroad. As for the point, whether Mons^r. de la Barres setting free the English and their ship, be not a tacit owning of their right to the places of which he dispossessed them when he made them prisoners, and whether by the laws of the French plantations he could thus have given them their liberty, if they had unjustly possessed the same places I can only return that I cannot yet, after much enquiry, be certainly informed whether he could or not by those laws do it; but some who understand very well these affairs tell me that they believe he could not. But however, if the matter be insisted upon, the Governour will doubtless pretend that he rather chose to pass over a nicety of the law than to lose an occasion of shewing his kindness to the English, or than to give the least subject of discontent to them whilst the correspondence is so good betwixt the two Crowns.—Asks the secretary's directions.— . . . The Nonce of the Pope in Spayne hath lately written to him who resideth here that the Spaniards continue to be so obstinate against hearing of any proposal which may tend towards an accommodation, that he now began to despair that the good offices of the Pope would have any effect. This is also confirmed by the last advices from Spayne . . . The new offers lately made in Holland by the order of this King for the establishment of the peace are said to have been very well received at the Court of the Princes of Brunswicke, and it is assured that those Princes are very well intentioned towards an accommodation.

1684, March 11th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—Describes the French fleet designed against Algiers.

1684, March 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Rochester.— . . . The subject of the late memorial presented by Mons^r. Van Citters to the King is not at all relished here. The proposal which relateth to Germany is looked upon to be so extravagant as nothing can be more. Brisac having been yielded to this King by the Treaty of Munster, it cannot be imagined that he will easily part with it, having acquired so just a right to it. As for Fribourg, tho' 2 years since he offered to demolish it upon some considerations, yet having since fortified it at a vast expense, it cannot be imagined that he will think of parting with it. And to give up the fort of Keil he looketh upon it to be giving up of Stratsbourg. As for what relateth to Flanders, I believe your lordship will find that tho' perhaps there may be something in the proposal which might give grounds to a treaty, yet this King is resolved to recede from his former propositions at the Hague, since he seeth that by the extravagance of the offers of the allies they seem to desire nothing more than a war with France. And his most Christian Majesty hath said upon the first notice which he had of Mons^r. Van Citters' memorial that the allies seemed to speak as if they had gained already an hundred battles against him, and that he took this their last proposition as a second declaration of war.

1684, March 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Duke of Ormond.—I have at last been able to obey your Grace's commands concerning Mons^r. Viridet, your chaplain, and have enclosed this King's permission for his abiding where he is, and for his selling what he possesseth in France. I am sorry that I have not been able sooner to obtain it, but I hope it will arrive soon enough for Mons^r. Viridet's affairs . . .

1684, March 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—Mons^r. de Croissy informed me yesterday that upon the instances which I had made by the King's order in favour of the Comte d'Alby, his most Christian Majesty had been pleased to grant to that Comte the liberty of the Bastile, and that orders to that effect would be speedily dispatched to the Government of that place. I have also represented the affair of the pirates in the West Indies as it came recommended by the Lords Committees of Trade and Plantations. Mons^r. de Croissy hath promised to move this King in it. I find that the proposition lately made by Mons^r. Van Citters to his Majesty is not at all well relished in this Court (&c., as in the letter to the Earl of Rochester). The French have already begun to throw bombs into Fontarabie, and to batter Andage, but notwithstanding all these efforts the Spaniards do not yet shew any inclination to an accommodation that I can hear of . . . Two of this King's men-of-war appeared lately before the port of Genoa; they were commanded by Mons^r. de Tourville and Mons^r. d'Amfreville; they were in pursuit of some corsaires of Algiers, who now begin to cut them out work . . .

s. d. The same to the same.—Mr. Dymmocke, son of Sir Edward Dymmocke, the King's champion, and a person of great fortune and considerable interest in Lincolnshire, died here the last night. His mother is in great affliction, and hath entreated me to procure a yacht for the transporting of his body, which I believe the King will not refuse. She desireth that it may be ordered to carry it to the port of Boston, which is near to Sir Edward's dwelling-house. If you will be pleased to move either the King or the Lords of the Admiralty in this matter I believe the thing will be easily granted . . .

1684, March 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Pr. Seale.—Your lordship will have seen by mine of the 15th instant to Mr. Secretary Jenkins how the subject of the late memorial presented by Mons^r. Van Citters to the King hath been relished here, and that this King said openly that he took it for a second declaration of war. Since that I find that this Court complaineth much of the assembly at the Hague, because the members of it (as is said here) take upon them to treat of the affairs of the Empire, having no authority to do it, Ratisbone being the place assigned for that; to this it is answered that that assembly doth not pretend to meddle with the affairs of the empire, but that the design of composing it is to find out the means of obtaining a lasting peace, and to concert as friends the several interests: that every souveraine hath the power of doing this at all times, and in all places, and that this assembly hath made no propositions, nor will it make any. I find that the ministers of Dannemarc and Brandebourg make this Court more warm in this matter, being unwilling that any step should be made towards a peace to which their masters shall not contribute . . . Alludes to the proposed marriage between Lord Elland and Mademoiselle de Gournet.

1684, March 18th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—I take the liberty to enclose a letter which I received last night from Sir Sam. Morland. You will find in it what his humble request to the King is, which you will be pleased to represent to his Majesty, either by shewing him the letter or by what other way you shall think fit. His present condition requireth that something be done as soon as may be, because if this King goeth away without giving some order concerning him he will be in very uneasy circumstances. Mons^r. de Louvois hath indeed used him a little hardly, but I do not think that his most Christian Majesty knoweth anything of it.

s. d. The same to the same.—I received yesterday the honour of yours of the 3rd instant, s. v., with the answer to the Dutch ambassador's late memorial inclosed. In my last I acquainted you how the notice of the propositions which is contained had been received here; since I find that besides the rejecting of them, this Court complaineth much of the proceedings and conduct of the assembly of the ministers of the allies at the Hague, and principally because they pretend to treat of the affairs of the Empire there, which they have no authority to do, Ratisbone being the place chosen for the negotiations relating to them, &c. . . . Mons^r. de Croissy and others of the Court are at present here for perfecting of their equipages, and it is said that the King's voyage holds for the 10th or 15th day of the next month, and all the officers who are to serve in Catalonia have orders to be at their posts that day. This King hath spoken openly of some great siege which he intends to make . . . This King hath by his ambassador at Venice demanded of that Republic the reason of its entering at this time into a ligue with the Emperor and the King of Poland, and of its arming so powerfully and making so great preparations for war; it hath been answered that all this only regards the Porte, and is done for the defence of that State, and that no Christian Prince ought to be jealous of the conduct of the Republic in the present conjuncture.

1684, March 25th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of Oxford.—Mons^r. le Sueur, minister of the Protestant Church of la Fierté sur jouar, hath a design of sending his eldest son into England to be educated, he designing him for the Church, and with your lordship's permission would settle him in the quality of a commoner at Christ Church. He hath desired me to recommend him to your lordship's favour and protection, which I cannot refuse to do, knowing him to be a worthy, sober, and a learned man, and having received civilities from him in my passage thro' la Ferté, when I followed this King in his last voyage into Germany and Lorraine. Mons^r. le Sueur hath a good fortune in land here and a good advantage by his Church, though he feareth it may be soon demolished, since it is lately questioned upon the pretext of some irregularity in its first erection. The father of the person whose letter I take leave to inclose to your lordship hath written in French the general History of the Church and Empire in six volumes in quarto for 800 years. The present Mons^r. le Sueur hath continued it with very good success for 200 years more, and designeth to go further. His book is at present in the hands of the ministers of Charenton, attending their license for printing it.

1684, March 25th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—I received on Thursday yours of the 16th instant. I shall as you are pleased to desire me take all possible care of Mr. Ord, the banquier. He is not yet dead, but he cannot live many days. I hope we shall not meet with many difficulties in his business, he being to be considered as a Scotch man and a merchant stranger. In the first capacity, the ancient privileges of that nation to which regard is yet had here, I hope I may secure him, and in the latter he will certainly have protection from the treaties which subsist betwixt the two crowns, all of which (as you are pleased to intimate) do especially provide for the security and the indemnity of those of his profession. Upon Wednesday last the Nonce had an audience of this King, in which he pressed him much to defer his voyage for some time, but the answer was that it was impossible to do it, and that after the late treatment which he had received from Spayne he could think of nothing but of putting in practise those measures which he had taken. The Nonce then told him that the Emperor had sent one express to Madrid to persuade the King of Spayne to accept the truce, and that if France did attack any place before his resolution was known it would inflame things more, and have as ill effects as the taking of Courtray and Dixmude had had. But these reasons did not at all weigh, his most Christian Majesty still declaring that he could no longer defer his voyage. The Nonce took the liberty in this audience to call the Prince of Orange a diabolique instrument. I am not to conceal that it hath been since insinuated to me by a third hand that if the King would hinder a speedy rupture, and prevent the ruin with which Flanders is at present threatened, it was now in his power to do it, by employing only his interest with this King to retard his voyage but for some days; in the meantime good news might come from Spayne and some expedient be found out for putting an end to the present differences. My answer in general was, that the offices which the King had of late passed in favour of Spayne, and for promoting and establishing the quiet of Christendome had been so little taken notice of by that Court, that I did not know whether he would or not at this time concern himself further, and that I should not charge myself to offer anything of this kind to him By an express which my Lord of Arran sent into England on Thursday last, I ordered an account to be given to you of the fonds which are ordered for the next month; but lest that may not come to your hands I take the liberty to repeat it . . . Great preparations are making every where for the setting of it (the French fleet) soon out to sea, and orders are particularly sent to Dunkirke for the buying up of 8,000 barrels of beef, which will be of some advantage to Ireland. I have received an account from Calais of an Irish ship laden with salmon, and some other commodities of Ireland, which hath been taken by a French ship out of Ramsgate road, and brought in thither. I intend on Tuesday to move Mons^r. de Seignelay for the release of it, which I hope will not be refused.

1684, March 29th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—This King's intended voyage is said to be deferred to the latter end of the next month, or the beginning of May, because the ill season has so retarded the spring, that before that time it cannot be hoped that any grass or herb will appear upon the ground. Others think that this change may proceed from another cause, that some hopes are given by the Emperor that the King of Spayne may at last be persuaded to accept of a truce as it is proposed by his most Christian Majesty; one of his couriers having passed by this place 3 days since in his way to Madrid, having obtained the passport of Mons^r. de Louvois The only discourse at this time here is of preparations for war and of equipages. The mareschals and lieutenant generals, and other officers who are to serve the approaching campaign in this King's armies, are now named. In that which is to act in Flanders 4 mareschals will serve under his most Christian Majesty, who will command there in person, to wit (he gives the names of the marshals and other officers). The Elector of Brandebourg is said to have made new instances to the Princes of Brunswick to persuade them to concur sincerely towards the obtaining of a peace, as well by their offices at Ratisbone as at the Hague. But those Princes have not answered so categorically as that Elector could have wished.—News from Hamburg.

1684, April 1st, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I have received the honour of your letter of the 17th of March, and have acquainted my Lord of Arran with that part of the contents of it which relateth to his lordship. This place hath afforded almost nothing worthy of your notice since my last, more than that it is said that the intended voyage of this King is deferred till the 4th of May, and that the discourses of a war begin not to be so frequent, and those of an accommodation to be reassumed The bombs which this King's troops have lately thrown into Oudenarde have caused much disorder there, and have ruined a considerable part of that town. Matters in Holland seem still to be upon the same foot, and the appearances of reconciling of them are but small. . . . P.S. Before I received by yours the King's answer concerning the yacht, my Lady Dymocke sent me word that the corps of her son were parted from Diepe in a vessel bound for London. I am very glad that it hath fallen out so, for now there is no need of acquainting her with the refusal of one.

1684, April 1st, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Bishop of London.—I have received the honour of your lordship's late letter (under the cover of Mr. Secretary Jenkins) accompanied with one for Mons^r. Claude, which I immediately transmitted to him. . . . I shall observe the method which you are pleased to prescribe to me concerning the affair of Mons^r. d'Allemayn, and write by the next post to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, and I doubt not but you will be pleased to represent him and his pretensions to the King and Mr. Secretary. The bearer hereof is Mons^r. de Sartre, lately one of the ministers of the Protestant Church now demolished at Montpellier.—Recommends him strongly.

1684, April 1st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Grace of Canterbury.—Recommends the bearer, Mons^r. de Sartre, giving an account of him as in the last letter. Says the great persecution under which the Protestants are here at this time hath made many of them retire already into England and other countries, and more of them to think of doing so, but he could wish that all of them carried over with them has good principles as he is sure this gentleman doth. . . .

A letter of the same date to Mr. Secretary on the same subject, and one also to his brother, Coll. Grahme.

1684, April 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Privy Seal. I received the honour of your lordship's letter by Mr. Innis, who arrived here on Monday night. I find by him that the Lords of the Treasury are resolved to observe (at least towards me) their ancient and laudable methods. . . .

1684, April 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Carlisle.—Matters are here still upon the same foot; this King's voyage is much discoursed of, yet the desire and hopes of an accommodation are not wholly laid aside. The courier who passed by this place lately in his way to Madrid with the Emperor's despatches to the Comte de Mansfeldt, which order him to press the King of Spain to accept of a truce, as proposed by France, giveth grounds to believe that that Court will change its resolutions and enter into more peaceful measures, since no assistance can be hoped for from his Imperial Majesty whilst he hath the Turks upon his hands. In the mean time all preparations are making for war here. The officers of the armies are gone to their posts. . . .

1684, April 5th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.—The bombs which the French have lately thrown into Fontarabie are said to have wrought no great effects, those of that place having received them with great contempt, having also found the means of returning them back to the enemy, which I believe is something difficult The affairs of the peace are not yet more advanced at the Court of Spayne than they were before; we must attend to know what good influence the Emperor's late orders to his ambassador there may have upon it. Another extraordinary courier dispatched from the Nuncio at the Imperial Court to him who resideth in Spayne is passed by this place with some news of importance The project of the ligue so much discoursed of having been sent from the Emperor by an extraordinary courier to Venice is returned from thence, having received there the approbation of the Senate, so that the signing of it now only remaineth, but we are not yet informed here of the conditions of it A letter which the Duke of Hanover had lately written to the Emperor touching the conclusion of a peace with France hath not been conceived in so strong and pressing terms as it was expected here that it should have been, which maketh this Court to doubt a little of the sincerity of the inclinations of that Duke towards the interests of France. He is said in it rather to have praised and approved of the good intentions and the conduct of the Emperor than by firm instances to have endeavoured to persuade him to take good measures, and to come to a good conclusion in that matter. This King's preparation for sea are very much hastened, and the arming of 30 galleys in Provence is carried on with great diligence. Mons^r. de Seignelay leaveth this place in order to go thither on the 15th or 20th of this month. . . .

1684, April 8th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—A report which came from Versailles upon Tuesday last accompanied also with several circumstances of the discovery of a new conspiracy in England against the King's person hath very much alarmed all people here; but I, having had no account of it in my last letters, and those which should have arrived yesterday being still owing, live in hopes that either the thing is not true, or if it be, that the mischief is prevented What I mentioned some time since to you of a design which this King was supposed to have had of besieging Luxembourg seems now not to have been ill grounded, for there are 50 pieces of cannon and 25 mortars pieces lodged at Thionville, which is not above 6 leagues from that place. Great stores of ammunition and other things necessary for a siege have been in readiness at Sedan for some months past. The city of Amsterdam hath pressed this King very much not to enter into the Low countries, declaring that it will be the means of their ruin, seeing that by it they shall be obliged to follow the other towns and to submit themselves to the pleasure of the Prince of Orange Several officers are arrived lately here from the expedition of Oudenarde. They report that 2 third parts of that town is laid in ashes, that the magazines of victuals and ammunition, the house of the Governour, which was a noble structure, with several other private and public edifices are all burnt, that great numbers of wives and maids were violated in endeavouring to escape out of the town that they might avoid the burning, and that in fine nothing can be more deplorable than the desolation of that place There hath been for some time in this place one Carew, a person well known in England and Holland, and particularly by having been concerned in recovering the debts of Sir Wm. Courten and Sir Paul Pindar, deceased. He presented a plant (plainte?) some days since to this King, in which he requests his assistance for the recovery of some debts which are due to several of his Majesty's subjects in his new conquests in the Low countries, creditors to the persons above named from some merchants of Middleburgh and others the subjects of the States of Holland. His meaning is to obtain letters of reprisals against them. The answer to his petition hath been that nothing could be done in his business because it concerned the interest of several nations against whom his most Christian Majesty would not as yet by any action of importance declare his inclinations good or bad, but that when he should have made that declaration he should know what might be done or not done. He hath brought over his case printed at large in English, in which he reflects highly upon several of the Lords of the Privy Council, and particularly upon the late Lord Chancellour, for their proceedings against him. He hath dispersed Copies of it, of which I have by chance gotten one, and I hear that he is translating it into French. He hath already printed and dispersed copies of the King's letters of reprisals granted him and others some time since against the Hollander's for 150,000 and odd pounds in French, and is publishing his manifestoes here every day.

1684, April 12th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —I have received yours of the 4th, and also yesterday that of the 27th of March. In the former of them I have his Majesty's repeated commands concerning the affair of Canada, which I shall punctually perform, and I shall endeavour to know this King's resolution concerning it, before he beginneth his voyage, which holdeth still for the 22nd of next month. Mademoiselle was affianced to the Duke of Savoy at Versailles upon Saturday last, and married to him upon Monday in the castle there at high mass, the Duc de Maine being that Duke's proxy for both. The Cardinal de Bouillon performed the ceremony of the marriage Mons^r. de Seignelay goeth for Thoulon upon Monday next to hasten the putting to sea of this King's ships of war and of 30 galleys, which are all arming with great diligence. Those of Genoa have received the letters of credence of the Envoyé of Spayne lately arrived there, notwithstanding the difficulties which was at first made because the King of Spayne giveth to himself in those letters the character of Protector of the Republic. It is believed that the Genoese have passed by that, upon the hopes that that King may procure their being comprehended in the treaty when a peace shall be made A sentence hath been given in the Chambre du Tresor against the executors of Mr. Ord, the banquier, lately dead here, upon the account of the droit d'Aubeine, and they are assigned to appear this day; but it is observable that in the sentence they mention Mr. Ord only in general a stranger and not a Scotchman. Upon their application to me I moved Mr. de Croissy yesterday in the matter, and I desired him to represent it to the King his master as an infraction of the privileges which those of the Scotch nation had long enjoyed here, and which had been confirmed as by several former Kings, so particularly of late times by the Kings Henry the 4th and Lewis the 13th. He told me that it was his most Christian Majesty's intention that all the King's our masters subjects should be exempted from the Droit d'Aubeine, and that so often as they were troubled upon that account arrests would be granted in their favour by the Council of State. That this King having let those casualties to farm, the farmers were willing to make the best of them, and had therefore tried if by these means they could draw anything out of the executors, but that they had no other thing to do than to appear this day and to plead that Mr. Ord was a Scotchman born, and that he hoped the poursuite would cease. But if the Chambre du Tresor should after such a plea proceed further, he assured me that, upon the notice which I should give him, an arrest of the Council of State should be granted in favour of the persons complaining. I have again moved in the business of the master of the Irish vessel who was taken out of Ramsgate road by a privateer of Calais. I hope we shall have justice in that matter before this King goeth from hence. The poor man is come hither himself after having been very cruelly treated at Calais.

1684, April 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Coll. Gramme.—I received yesterday the King's orders to follow this King into Flanders from Mr. Secretary Jenkins, which I am preparing to do, but I must of necessity have some supplies, otherwise it will be impossible for me to go so soon as I would. This Court parts on the 22nd or 24th without fail, and I intend to set out the 26th or 27th. I was much surprised with the ill news of Mr. Secretary Jenkins removal; I am sure I have lost an hearty good friend, but I must endeavour to bear it.

1684, April 15th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.— . . . I do very easily imagine that the King hath not without much difficulty granted to you, sir, that permission which you have with so much earnestness solicited. His Majesty knoweth how to value those services which you have rendered to him and the nation in the most difficult times, and with what zeal and courage you have combated for him, and in the behalf of the Government against those who have designed and attempted the ruin of both. . . .

s. d. The same to the same.—I have received yours of the 31st of March, s. v., with his Majesty's commands to me to follow this King into the campagne, which I am preparing to do, and I hope to be in a readiness to set out from hence within a day or 2 after him. Be pleased, sir, to make my most dutiful acknowledgments to the King for the care which he hath been pleased to have of me in recommending my affairs to the Lords of the Treasury, and for the provision which he is pleased to order me for my support in the field The advices from Spayne inform us of no other resolution yet taken in that Council of State but that of sustaining the war vigorously which hath been declared, tho' without any means of doing it. The chiefest of the foreign ministers who reside at Madrid write that they find all imaginable obstacles in endeavouring to dispose the ministers of that Court to accept either a peace or a truce. It is known that the King of Spayne wisheth an accommodation, as do also the two Queens. The Council of State there is divided, the greatest part of it is for the war, and supports the Duke of Medina Celi in that well grounded resolution . . . I shall do what I possibly can in favour of Mons^r. Duarte, of Antwerp. I have formerly moved Mons^r. de Louvois in the affair at the request of Sir Richard Bulstrode, and his answer to me was that the goods which had been stolen from Mons^r. Duarte were seized with the thief also at Cambray, but that the goods were detained as belonging to an enemy, and that his most Christian Majesty had given them to an officer of the garrison there. I shall observe his Majesty's further commands concerning the Comte d'Alby.

1684, April 19th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —In your letter I received his Majesty's second commands concerning the affair of Port Nelson, and having frequently before spoken to Monsieur de Croissy and to Mons^r. de Seignelay upon that subject, from both of whom I always received the same answers, which I have formerly imparted to you, I thought it convenient to receive the final one from the King himself; I therefore demanded an audience, which his most Christian Majesty was pleased to grant me privately in his cabinet upon Monday last. I then recounted to him at large how this whole matter passed, and I also presented to him the inclosed memorial, which I think is drawn exactly according to the orders sent me. He received it, and what I said to him also upon the subject very well; but told me that this affair had been often under his consideration, and that he had always ordered Monsieur de Seignelay to let me know that he would take no resolution concerning it till he had heard from his Governour of Canada, to whom he had sent to know how the action passed, and that at this time he could give no other answer. I replied, &c. . . . From this, falling upon the subject of the intended voyage, his most Christian Majesty was pleased to take occasion to praise very much the prudent conduct of the King in this conjuncture. I took the liberty to tell him that I was sure that his Majesty desired nothing more than to procure a firm and well settled peace to Europe, &c. . . . His most Christian Majesty was pleased to add that he was glad to hear that I was ordered to follow him in this voyage, that I might be a witness of his conduct, and of what he did in Flanders, that so the King my master might have a just account of what passed. I was no sooner arrived at Versailles upon Monday last but the Dutch ambassador and the Envoyé of Sweden came in after me. They immediately went to Mons^r. de Croissy and desired him to procure for them an audience of the King. At their return from thence they told me, &c. . . . The Nonce is to have audience this day, and the Dutch ambassador and the Envoyé of Sweden to-morrow. By my next I shall be able to acquaint you with what passeth at both of them. When the Nonce demanded his audience Mons^r. de Croissy told him, amongst other things, that the King his master was willing to consent to a peace, but that he would have it en maistre. Mons^r. de Seignelay hath taken leave of his most Christian Majesty, he is now in town, and goeth for Thoulon to-morrow, and hath orders to hasten out the fleet. They begin here to whisper again as if there were some design against Genoa.

1684, April 19th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I am forced to importune you again upon the account of poor Sir S. Morland, from whom I have received this day the letter enclosed. It will be a very seasonable kindness to him to acquaint his Majesty with the contents of it; he hath writ this day upon the same subject to my Lord Chamberlain.

1684, April 22nd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —In my last I imparted to you the subject upon which the Nonce, the ambassador of Holland, and the Envoyé of Sweden had severally demanded audiences of this King. Upon Wednesday the Nonce was admitted to his, in which he did set forth at length the propositions of the allies, and pretended by arguments to induce his most Christian Majesty to the acceptance of them. But he returned to him for answer that if any other person had presumed to have spoken to him upon those propositions he would not have heard him, especially since the King our master, who had found them unreasonable and impertinent, would not charge himself with the making of them, and that after that it would be his reproach and shame to give ear to them. But that he, the Nonce, being his friend, he was willing to grant to him an audience that he might tell him, that after having expected a long time, and with much patience, that the Spaniards would think fit to give him a just satisfaction, and seeing that they did not at all make any advances towards the doing of it, he had made new levyes and recruits, and had prepared all things necessary for the obliging of them to it, and that he could not yield those villages which they demanded without leaving his own subjects exposed to great incommodities and dangers, &c. To the Dutch ambassador his most Christian Majesty answered, receiving at the same time his memorial, that he knew the contents of it, and that he was astonished that such propositions should be made to him in the present conjuncture; he added that he had no other answer to give him. That ambassador did then offer to present to him the cartes on which the line was marked which is desired for a frontiers. But this King told him that it was not at all necessary that he should receive them, and that he already knew all. The Envoyé of Sweden had audience upon the same day with the Dutch ambassador, which was Thursday, and in return to what he offered upon the subject of the propositions this King said that no other answer could be expected from him than that which he had already given to the Nonce and to the ambassador of Holland . . . That the Opinionâtreté of the Spaniards was the cause of the misfortunes which would necessarily arrive, that he was now ready to depart, and that he found himself in a condition to make Spain repent of its way of proceeding. The French troops have orders to be in a readiness against the 25th instant, and to be in a condition to march within 3 hours after their orders. Since the death of Mr. Ord, a Scotch banquier here, the Chambre du Tresor hath adjudged all his goods and effects to be fallen to this King by the Droit D'Aubeine. I have had all the trouble that could be about this business, but I have yesterday obtained this King's letter to Mons^r. le Pelletier to grant a main levée in favour of the heirs and executors of Mr. Ord: unless some general order may be obtained in favour of the King's subjects a trouble will be entailed upon his minister in this Court so often as any other shall die here. The master of the vessel which was brought to Calais by a privateer of that place from Ramsgate Road is still here. I not having been able to obtain an order for the release of the ship; those of Calais having possessed Mr. de Seignelay, and he having reported it to this King, that she had several goods on board her consigned to the subjects of the King of Spayne . . . If in the meantime the King would be pleased to order this matter to be recommended to Mons^r. Barillon, and if he were desired to write of it hither, it might facilitate my offices. I have been more active in this affair, because I am assured from Ostend (and it is very fit that the King should know it) by some English merchants of good credit there that those of that place finding by this instance that English ships are brought up by the French under the pretence of having goods on board belonging to the King of Spayne, or consigned to his subjects, altho' belonging to the English, are resolved to seize the English ships also under pretence of their having French goods on board them.

1684, April 26th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Chamberlain.—I have received the honour of your lordship's letter of the 10th current, s. v., by the hand of Mons^r. d'Allemagne. I shall endeavour to execute your lordship's commands in it relating to his Grace the Duke of Grafton as soon as I can . . . If in a month's time the passeport be not obtained, and I shall not fail to demand one so soon as I shall join the Court, which will be on Wednesday or Thursday next, either at Cambray or Condé, and to send it with all expedition to Calais.

1684, April 26th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary.— . . . What hath been spread concerning a letter which Mons^r. hath received from the Queen of Spain, in which she is said to have assured him that the truce as proposed by this King is accepted at Madrid, hath no foundation.

1684, April 29th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —I am just now advertised that Mons^r. hath received advise by a courier express from his most Christian Majesty that Luxembourg was to be invested as yesterday, and the siege formed by the Mareschal de Crequy, that he with his Court would continue at Conlet, and send a great detachment of his army on the side of Luxembourg. In my last to you I acquainted you that the business of M. Ord, the banquier, lately deceased, was in a very good way, but since that I find that new orders have been given for the seizing his effects as fallen to this King by the Droit d'Aubeine. I have inclosed an account and exact relation of all the steps which have been made in that affair The proceeding of Mr. le Pelletier in this business, after this King by himself and Mons^r. de Croissy had promised me a main levée, hath been a little extraordinary On Sunday last my Lord of Purbecke, Captain Kenely, and Mr. Roberts on one side, with Mr. Lutterel, Sir Thomas Nugent, and Captain Barret, all Irish gentlemen, on the other, decided by duel in the Pais de Lieg, a quarrel which had been begun in this place; my Lord of Purbecke is killed, and Mr. Lutterel is slightly wounded, the others are come off without hurt; they fought upon some ground belonging to the Prince of Orange, but the Government of Liege hath taken notice of the thing, which hath obliged those whose who survive to take sanctuary in an English convent in that city.

s. d. The same to Sir L. Jenkins.—I have this day received a letter from my Lord of Sunderland, in which he hath given me notice of your resigning of the seals of your office to his Majesty, I could have wished that I might have had the happiness of your correspondence longer, but since satisfaction of ease will attend your retreat I am to congratulate it with you The bearer hereof is Mr. Courteene, a gentleman who hath had obligations to you formerly, when he was by misinformation made prisoner in the Bastille He hath now the misfortune to be persecuted here by one Carew upon the pretension of his being administrator to the goods and chattells of his grandfather, Sir Wm. Courteene; Mr. Carew's character is so well known to the King and yourself, and to many others, that I need not take the pains of giving it. Mr. Courteen hath thought fit to remove into England, where he hath great reason to hope that his Majesty will grant him his royal protection: I therefore take the liberty to recommend him to your favour.

1684, April 30th, Pont S^c. Maxence.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.— Your lordship may be pleased to assure the King that I shall not fail to continue to solicit the affair of Port Nelson in obedience to his commands. Just as I was going into my coach at Paris, in order to begin my journey, I received an advice that his most Christian Majesty had left his orders with Mons^r. de Seignelay to signify his pleasure to the Governor of Canada that the French should restore the possession of Port Nelson, and of all which they had violently taken to the English. I shall know the truth of this from Mons^r. de Croissy when I see him, and I shall transmit the account of it to your lordship. I have by this night's post acquainted Sir Sam. Moreland with his Majesty's bounty to him, for which I am sure he will not fail to make him most dutiful acknowledgements

1684, May 3rd, s. n., Cambray.—The same to the same.—I am thus far upon my voyage, and I hope to join this Court to-morrow at Condé. His most Christian Majesty is there at present, and doth resolve not to remove from thence for some days. By a courier who left the Court this morning I am informed that Luxembourg is formally besieged, and that this King declareth that he will take it to repair the expence which he hath been at in bringing an army into the field. A courier hath been dispatched to Mons^r. d'Avaux at the Hague with orders to acquaint the States General there that if they do not immediately recall their troops from Flanders his most Christian Majesty will declare the war; their answer is expected this day at Condé

1684, May 6th, n. s., Valenciennes.—The same to the same.—I arrived here upon Thursday, and I was yesterday at Condé, where his most Christian Majesty will continue to expect the answer to the memorial presented upon the 24th of the last month by Mons^r. d'Avaux at the Hague, which before this can arrive your lordship must have seen it, having been printed there the next day both in the French and the Dutch languages. All things are here at present very quiet, and will continue so till the resolutions of the States of Holland be known. It is hoped here that they will be such as may promote an accommodation. The Prince of Orange hath countermanded his equipage, which was upon the way, and hath deferred his departure from the Hague till the States have considered the subject of Mons^r. d'Avaux's memorial. That Prince is said to be much embarrassed at present, and the more since he finds that what his most Christian Majesty proposes seems to be relished by the Government and people of Holland, and that it may have good effects. He seemeth still to act by his passions, and hath lately declared in public that he would rather choose to die at the head of 20,000 men in the field than be assassinated with only his valet de chambre at the Hague Luxembourg hath been invested for some days, and the last night the trenches before it were to be opened. There are about 35,000 foot now before it, and considerable bodies of horse are placed at Dinant and at other places near it. The besieged have adventured to make a sally, but without much success, some few of the French were killed and two or three of their party taken prisoners. By those they are informed that they already want within the town provisions for their horses, and that the garrison doth not consist of above 2,500 men at the most. The Duke of Grafton arrived here the last night, and I am just going to wait upon him to Condé. I expect the Duke of Northumberland this night.

1684, May 10th, Valenciennes. Lord Preston to Mons^r. Godet. (French.) Sends the letters which he has promised him, and has recommended him to Mons^r. Jenkins, and doubts not but that the Bishop of London and his (Lord Preston's) brother will do all they can in his service.—He also sends the passport for which he asked.

1684, May 10th, Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to Mr. Se. Jenkins.—The bearer hereof, Mons^r. Godet, who in Mr. Savil's time and mine hath had the honour to write to you the occurrences on this side, hath occasion to go upon his particular affairs into England hath desired me to give him an occasion of saluting you, and to desire your favour to him if it may lie in your way to shew him any.—Lord P. recommends him.—It is seven years since he hath been employed by the ministers of England here.

Letters of same date to the Bishop of London and to Coll. Grahme recommending Mons^r. Godet to them.

1684, May 10th, n. s., Valenciennes. Lord Preston to Sir Stephen Fox.—Says that the Duke of Northumberland had gone to Luxembourg. The Duke of Grafton went towards that place yesterday. I hope he will get safe thither, tho' there may be danger in passing the woods. He is advised to go a little about, which will be securer for him. . . .

1684, May 10th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to Sir J. Worden.—I have delivered the enclosed to my Lord of Arran, who arrived here on Monday, tho' much diseased with his sore leg.

1684, May 10th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to his Majesty.—I humbly presume to acquaint your Majesty that I had the honour to wait upon the Duke of Grafton the next day after his arrival here to Condé, where he was received with many particular marks of favour and esteem by his most Christian Majesty, and with all expressions of honour by this Court. When his Grace had delivered your Majesty's letter this King told him that Luxembourg was now invested, and that since your Majesty had sent him over to see action he thought that he would do well to go thither. His Grace replied that he came over with the design of serving his most Christian Majesty, and that he was resolved to go thither in all diligence. When my Lord Duke was going out of the room this King was pleased to tell me that he hoped your Majesty would approve of the counsel which he had given the Duke of Grafton of going to Luxembourg, since action was now begun there. I answered that I was assured that his most Christian Majesty might dispose of his Grace as he pleased, and that your Majesty would very willingly approve of any counsel which he should be pleased to give him. Upon Monday his Grace took leave of this King, of Monseigneur Le Dauphin, and of Madame La Dauphine. His most Christian Majesty advised him at parting not to take the shortest way by the forest of Ardennes to Luxembourg, for fear of boores who lie in wait in those great woods for passengers, and of some parties of the enemy, which might entrap him. His Grace is resolved to make a tour and to keep himself as near the French frontier as he can till he reach Verdun. My Lord Duke hath been received and treated whilst he remained here with great respect by Mons^r. Magalotti, the Governor of this place, and Mons^r. de Croissy told me that he had the King his master's order to write to the Marl. de Crequi to Luxembourg to hinder his Grace from exposing himself too much at that siege. I answered that my Lord Duke was infinitely obliged to his most Christian Majesty for the care which he had of him, but that he came over with a design to render him service, and that I believed he would endeavour to acquit himself as might become him there. I will not pretend to recount to your Majesty the particular instances of the Duke of Grafton's behaviour during his short stay in this Court, nor to say more than that it was every way equal to his birth and quality. I have never before presumed to trouble your Majesty with anything relating to myself, but I must now take the liberty humbly to represent to you (tho' I know your Majesty's moments are precious) that I am every day alarmed, as well from home as from abroad, it having been almost a weekly subject for the foreign Gazettes, that I am not long to have the honour of serving your Majesty in this post . . . I only humbly beg that if I am to be recalled it may be with as few marks of your Majesty's displeasure as may be, for those will touch me very sensibly and will ruin my future fortunes.

1684, May 10th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. Since my last to your lordship the freshest advices from Holland are that in the assembly of the estates 18 cities are for accepting of a truce as proposed by his most Christian Majesty, but that 12 of them are for doing it without giving communication of their opinions to their principals before the resolution be taken, and 6 are for not taking the resolution before communication be made. The time now draweth near when we may expect their resolutions from Holland upon the subject of Mons^r. d'Avaux's memorial; till these be known we shall continue in these parts . . . A courier who left Luxembourg on the 5th inst., bringeth advice that the lines of circumvallation and contravallation were but then almost finished, so that the trenches could not be opened till Sunday or Monday last, tho' the orders were sent for doing it before. The Prince of Conti was to mount them for the first time at the head of his own regiment; 36 pieces of great cannon and all the engineers were then before the place. Mons^r. de Vauban adviseth this King that contrary to expectation they have found ground before that place which will suffer them to make their trenches 8 foot deep; that he doth not find his business there so difficult as he expected, and that if his most Christian Majesty pleaseth he can shorten the siege, but for the menaging of men's lives he desireth only 18 days for giving a very good account of the place. The morning when I left Paris I writ to Mr. Secretary Jenkins an account of my proceedings in the affair of Mr. Ord, a Scotch banquier, who lately died there; Mons^r. Pelletier was not over favourable to us in that matter; but since my coming hither I have obtained an arrest of this Council of State for exempting the heirs and executors of Mr. Ord from the Droit d'Aubeine. The copy I enclose. I have not yet been able to do any thing towards the releasing of the English ship taken by a privateer of Calais, tho' I have used all endeavours imaginable.

1684, May 11th, n. s., Valenciennes.—The same to the same.—The person who will have the honour of presenting this letter to your lordship is the master of the ship of Corke, which was some weeks since taken out of Ramsgate Road by a privateer of Calais. After a great deal of ill usage at that place he came to Paris and applied himself to me.—Lord Preston tells what he had done in the affair . . . The master who hath followed me hither, finding that nothing at present is to be done here, hath desired me to give your lordship this account, that so the whole case may be stated and laid before his Majesty . . . At the return of Mons^r. de Seignelay I shall not fail to use all endeavours to procure a favourable end to this business, and if in the mean time his Majesty doth give me any new orders concerning it, it shall be exactly executed by, &c.

1684, May 11th, Valenciennes. Lord Preston to Mr. Holland, &c. the owners of the vessel; refers them to the master for an account of what he has done.

A letter of the same date to Mr. Motlew, &c. the factors at Ostend, from Lord Preston, to the same purpose as the above

s. d. Lord Preston to Coll. Finch.—I have received both your kind letters . . . The bearer hereof is the master of a vessel belonging to Corke . . . He desireth to deliver a petition to the King himself, which I must beg of you, as my friend, to assist him to do, either as the King walks in the Park, or when he is most at leisure. Captain Gunman will not fail to be with him at the same time. If you would also at the same time take an occasion of saying something of this business to the Duke you will oblige me. . . .

1684, May 13th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Carlisle. At my return yesterday from Condé to this place I had the happiness to find my brother Howard safely arrived in the company of my Lord of Ossory and of my Lord of Kinsale. In the afternoon they were all presented to this King at Condé, who received them extremely well. This morning they are gone post to Luxembourg, and Mons^r. Le Mareschal de Schomberg hath obliged me so much as to recommend my brother Howard in particular to the Mareschal de Crecqui, who commands there . . . Here they make no doubt but that place will be taken before the end of this month; the besiegers having, contrary to expectation, found ground which suffers their trenches to be 8 foot deep, and when the last courier came from thence the besieged were no longer able to maintain the counterscarpe. . . .

1684, May 13th, Valenciennes. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—We have yet received no other account from Holland of the deliberations of those States upon the subject of Mons^r. d'Avaux's late memorial than what I gave your lordship in my last. This King is resolved to expect their answer at the head of his army till the 20th instant . . . In the mean time the siege of Luxembourg is vigorously carried on, and they seem here to make no doubt of taking it before the end of this month, and so sure they seem to be of this, that they name the 26th or 27th day for it. When this great obstacle is once removed I believe that things will tend more naturally towards an accommodation. The last advices which we have from Luxembourg are not very particular; they only say that the besiegers are very far advanced, that no person of note hath been killed, and very few common soldiers, and that the besieged were no longer able to maintain the counterscarpe . . . Mons^r. de Croissy told me yesterday that either your lordship or Mr. Secretary Godolphin had spoken to Mons^r. Barillon concerning the Irish barque taken in Ramsgate Road, and that Mons^r. Barillon had written about it. He giveth me good hopes that at the return of Mons^r. de Seignelay (which will be within 14 or 15 days) an order may be given for the release of it. He also maketh me hope that at the same time a favourable answer may be given to the affair of Cavoda. My Lords of Ossory and Kinsale and Mr. Howard were presented to day to this King at Condé, and were well received; they are gone this morning by post towards Luxembourg, and several Scotch gentlemen have followed them. The ambassador of Venice is coming hither with orders to notify to that King the conclusion of the ligue betwixt the Emperor, the King of Poland, and that Republic against the Turk.

1684, May 15th, n. s., Valenciennes.—The same to the same.— . . . This morning at the break of day the French army decamped from Fresne, his most Christian Majesty marching with it, and having passed the narrow but deep river of Escault, and also another smaller river, by two bridges thrown over them, is gone to encamp within the Spanish territories, Kievrain being the last village which the Spaniards possess on this side. . . . I enclose a 2^d memorial presented by Mons^r. d'Avaux at the Hague, tho' I believe your lordship may have had it before, it having been printed there. From Luxembourg we hear that the besiegers were advanced to the first palisades: that all the shots from the town passed over their heads, they being got so near to it that very few men had then been killed, and that nobody of any consideration, except one captain, had been wounded. It is hoped here that that place cannot hold out longer than the 22th current, but Mons^r. de Vauban hath written that he apprehends the greatest difficulty may be met with in the fossée, and that if a good resistance be made there they may loose many men and the town may hold out some days longer than is expected. . . .

1684, May 15th, Valenciennes.—The same to the same.—I take the liberty to enclose a bill of my extraordinary expenses in his Majesty's service since the last day of September 1683 to the last of March 1684, which completeth 6 months. I have omitted to mention any thing in it concerning the Duke of Northumberland, who, by his Majesty's order, did me the honour to be at my table during his stay this last winter at Paris, which was near 6 months. I was obliged by his being there to keep a much greater table than I needed to have done otherwise, but I do not know what to charge for it. If your lordship will be pleased to know the King's pleasure whether I shall charge this or not you will lay a great obligation upon me. . . .

1684, May 15th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to Mr. Bridgman.—I have only time to acknowledge the receipt of yours with Don Pedro de Ronquillo's memorial and the answer to it enclosed.

1684, May 18th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. His most Christian Majesty arrived here yesterday, and I believe he resolveth to continue here till the siege of Luxembourg be ended; from thence we hear, &c. . . . My Lord of Arran hath obtained the King's leave to go to Luxembourg, and he is accordingly gone thither this morning. I would have sent to your lordship by this post a plan of Luxembourg, and also of the camp at Kieverain, if I could have had them copied in time, with the approaches marked which the besiegers have made to Luxembourg, but my Lord of Arran hath promised me that he will supply that omission by sending them this night either to the Duke or your lordship A courier arrived yesterday from Holland and bringeth advice that in the assembly of those States General they had deliberated upon the subject of the late memorial of Mons^r. d'Avaux, and that their resolution was that they could not engage to deliver Luxembourg to his most Christian Majesty because it belonged to Spain, but that they were not for entering into a war, and for supporting upon their own bottom; therefore, since it was necessary to give a speedy answer to his most Christian Majesty's propositions, they resolved to send orders to their troops in Flanders not to act against France. Mons^r. Fagel was commanded to dress this resolution, but he excused himself from doing it till it was communicated to the Prince of Orange. The States upon this sent their deputies to that Prince, but when they offered to inform him of what had passed he turned his back upon them and the next day went to Bruxelles, whether with a design to dispose the Marquis de Grana to an accommodation, or to put himself at the head of the Spanish and Dutch troops, and to act something on this side, is yet uncertain. This King may after the 20th instant make higher demands than he hath hitherto done. The Nonce arrived here upon Tuesday, and yesterday at his most Christian Majesty's arrival here he complimented him upon the great happiness of the conjuncture, and upon the great likelihood there is that a peace may ensue. This King answered him that he found that the more he was in a condition to oblige his enemies to accept of reasonable proposals the more averse he found them from hearkening to them. He told him then that he had an army now in the field which was capable of giving repose and peace to Christendom The peace being made with Algiers it is believed that it (the fleet) may be designed against Barcelona or some other place in Spain, this King resolving perhaps to endeavour to bring the Spaniards to reason by urging them a little on that side The passports which your lordship mentions for my Lords of Ossory and of Cornbury are expedited. I have obtained also some for the Dukes of Grafton and Northumberland and for my Lord Charles Murray. I have in my last given to your lordship an account of the affairs of Mr. Ord, which to my great ease is ended. As for what relateth to Mr. Carew I shall exactly observe his Majesty's commands concerning him. I have had certain information very lately that that person hath been the cause of the taking of several horses coming lately from England into France by the Ostenders. Some persons of desperate fortunes having of late scoured the seas under the pretence of being Mr. Carew's privateers, and under the shadow of his old letters patent from England have found them too weak to protect them, and do now seek by him to obtain further commissions from France, which have been refused them. These persons are at present at Dunquerque and Calais, where they eat and drink upon that account, and have the opportunity of sending intelligence to the Ostenders when any good prize is to be had; by the means of those persons all the horses above mentioned have been taken as prize, upon the account of their going into the French service, and they have their shares in them.

1684, May 22nd, n. s., Valenciennes. Lord Preston to Sir Richard Bulstrode at Bruxelles.—Here we continue in expectation of an answer from Holland to the late propositions made from hence, the time being now elapsed; if it do not arrive soon new measures will certainly be taken. We draw near to Mons, the French army being encamped not two hours from it, and the advanced parties go within the reach of the cannon of that place every day Mons^r. de Louvois said yesterday that he made account that upon Saturday night the second countrescarpe of Luxembourg would be carried. I have had accounts from thence which say that the besiegers have lost more men than they own, but the town must at last be taken if no succours arrive, and it is hard to conjecture from where at present those should come. I believe we may continue in this place till Luxembourg be taken. I will use all my endeavours with Mons^r. de Louvois to obtain what you desire as to the refuge, but I am in hopes there will be no need of it, for I do not think that we shall advance so far. I wish the accommodation may be made before this King leaveth these parts, if that be, I may perhaps kiss your hands at Bruxelles, but incognito 1684, May 22nd, n. s., Valenciennes. Lord Preston to Mr. Whiting at Lisle.—I received some days since by Mr. Mawle a letter which you were pleased to convey to me from Sir Richard Bulstrode.—Cannot be answerable for the success of his endeavours.

1684, May 22nd, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The French army continueth still at Kieveraine. There hath been a rumour these two days here that it is to decamp soone, but I hear nothing of it. The conflicts are frequent betwixt the advanced French parties and those of the garrison of Mons; no great hurt hath been yet done, only prisoners are daily taken on both sides. The other day the Marechal de Schomberg advanced very near to that place with 4 squadron of horse to view, I suppose, the ground. The Prince de Râche, being advertised of this by the sentinels who espied the party from the walls, sent out 4 squadrons also, and every horseman was to take a footman behind him. They drawing so near that the mareschal saw the design, he thought it better to retire in good order than to engage with a double number, and so he returned safely to his camp. A courier arrived here the last night with letters dated on the 19th instant from the Hague; they give good hopes of an accommodation, but the conclusion may perhaps be deferred till the taking of Luxembourg. The propositions of France are said to have been the daily subject of the deliberations of the States since the return of the Prince of Orange to that place Advices from Luxembourg are expected every hour, we only hear from thence that two redoubts are taken, and that Monsieur de Vauban was in hopes that the second countrescarpe would be taken upon Saturday last at night

1684, May 25th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to Sir James Hayes.—I have seen yours of the 8th inst. s. v., to Mr. Tempest, relating to the affair of Port Nelson, and am very glad to take occasion from it to let you know from myself in what estate at this time that affair is in this Court. All the offices which I have hitherto passed concerning it are very well known to you. I having given exact accounts of them formerly to Sir Leoline Jenkins, which accounts he hath from time to time communicated to you. The answers which we have hitherto had from this King and his ministers upon the subject of our complaints are not to be interpreted a refusal of doing justice to the English Company of Hudson's Bay, they are rather dilatory and given with a design to gain time that they may see how things will turn, and if a fairer pretext may be formed to keep what those adventurers of Canada have by violence put themselves in possession of. The reason of this is obvious; for Radison and des Grozelieres have not failed since their arrival here to represent to these ministers all the advantages which the French nation may draw from this King's being master of the territory which belongeth to the English company, which will put the whole castor trade into the hands of his subjects, whose profits hath already been very great by that part of it which they at present possess The morning when I left Paris I had that account which I gave to my Lord of Sunderland of this King's ordering Radison and des Grozelieres to withdraw the French with their effects from Port Nelson, but not having it from any minister of this Court I durst not write it positively. Since my being here I have asked Mons^r. de Croissy if he had any order from the King his master concerning it, he answered No, but Mons^r. de Seignelay, in whose hand the business naturally was, might have one. Till his return, which must be within 12 or 14 days, nothing more can be known. In the mean time I think the proposal inclosed may be worthy of the consideration of the company, and I must add that it cometh to me from the hands of those who are assured that it will be made good. The time which they desire for putting the habitation and fort which they have seized into the possession of the English company seemeth long, but you will be a better judge of the reason which they give for it than I am

1684, May 25th, n. s., Valenciennes.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The deliberations at the Hague seem slow, and (as I hinted in my letter of the 22nd instant) I believe they will advance equally with the siege of Luxembourg and no faster. A courier arrived here yesterday from Monsieur d'Avaux with advice that 11 of the cities had entirely declared for the acceptance of the truce as proposed by France; and that he did not doubt of the good success of this negotiation, nor do they here at all seem to doubt of it. —News from Luxembourg. — . . . What I gave notice of some time since relating to the privateers of Ostend to seize upon English vessels where they should meet them upon the pretext of their having French goods on board them is now proved true, for I received yesterday a letter from Ostend which informs me that upon the 16th instant a small English vessel was brought into that place, belonging to Weymouth, which they intended to make a prize, because she either came from France or was bound to France; the person who writes to me having not then been informed whither.

1684, May 29th, st. no., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. — . . . Yesterday morning a courier arrived here from the Hague and brought advise that the resolution had certainly been taken in the assembly of the States of Holland on Friday last for the acceptance of a truce if a letter had not arrived from Mons^r. Van Citters just at the instant of their assembling, in which he lets them know that the King had assured him that after the taking of Luxembourg all disputes on this side would be ended, and that if this King offered after that to advance further into Flanders his Majesty would hinder him and put himself at the head of those who should oppose him; this letter it seemeth wrought a very great effect, for Mons^r. Fagel took the occasion from it to remonstrate that since his Majesty had given the assurance to their ambassador that after the taking of Luxembourg nothing should be attempted against these countries by this King, they had no reason to disgust their allies by coming to a sudden resolution upon so importing an affair as that which was before them, nor to abandon their allies, since the danger would be over so soon as this King should be master of that place. Upon this the assembly broke up without giving any answer to Mons^r. d'Avaux, who had then orders to have signed the truce. . . . One thing which hath contributed much to the ill success of this negotiation is the confident report which hath run at the Hague that there is a treaty betwixt the King and his most Christian Majesty which obligeth the latter to attempt nothing after the taking of Luxembourg against the Spaniards. . . . The late news from Holland hath given occasion to his most Christian Majesty to send his orders to the Marl. de Crequi to press with all vigour the siege of Luxembourg. . . . Poor Mr. Howard did on Wednesday morning last receive the shot of a musket on the top of his right shoulder, and the bullet was the same morning cut out near the reins of his back. It is thought that it hath not only pierced his lungs but his kidneys; and on Saturday when the last courier came from Luxembourg he was in a fever and it was thought that he could not live. The French fleet under the command of Mons^r. du Quesne is now before Genoa; when it appeared first off of that place the Genoese sent to know why it came there; Mons^r. de Seignelay, who was on board it, sent for answer to the Senate that they were sent there to demand satisfaction for several pretensions which the King his master had upon that Republic, and that if that Senate would treat with him upon them that he was ready to enter into a treaty. The answer of the Senate was the discharge of an 100 pieces of cannon at the fleet. Orders were then immediately given to throw bombs into the town, and a courier who came from thence on the 18th instant saith that when he came away he saw fire in three several places of it. They say here that one great misfortune of that place is that its guns will not carry above 700 paces, and that the bombs will have their effects at the distance of 1,400. . . .

A letter of the same date addressed by Lord Preston to Sir Ph. Howard, giving him an account as above of the wounds of his brother Howard. — Asks him to write to Lord Carlisle, for he cannot, that "my poor Lady" and he may be prepared to hear worse news if it "cometh."

1684, June 1st, st. n., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to Mr. Frowde. — I have received the favour of yours with one enclosed from the Duke to my Lord of Arran, which I immediately forwarded to Luxembourg, where he now is. Perhaps by the next post you may hear of the taking of that place. I have received the ill news from thence of the death of my brother-in-law, Mr. Howard, who was killed there by a musket shot.

1684, June 1st, st. no., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to Sir Ph. Howard. — What I told you in my last was the subject of my fears is now arrived, the death of my poor brother Howard; he died upon Monday last, and was buried before the place. He was sensible to the last, and hath disposed of what jewels and bills of exchange he had into the hands of my Lord of Ossory to be delivered to my Lord of Carlisle, and hath given some horses and other things amongst his friends and servants. . . .

1684, June 1st, st. no., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to the Bishop of Oxon. — I have received your lordship's very obliging letter with one enclosed for Mons^r. le Sueur, which I have transmitted to him. . . . Gives an account of the death of his brother Howard, and says "he had the happiness of being under your lordship's care long, so that I need not give you his character, but he was a youth of great hopes and is infinitely regretted by all people, but by none more than myself, for I did really love him as my own brother." . . .

1684, June 1st, n. s., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to the Duke of York. — I was overjoyed to find by the last advises from England that your Royal Highness was once again to exercise the functions of that great charge which is only due to your birth and courage. Our sea affairs having never succeeded better than when under your Royal Highness's conduct, and our fleet never having acted more honourably than when under your command. . . .

1684, June 1st, n. s., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to the King. — The honour which your Majesty was pleased to do me in writing to me* with your own hand, and in so condescending terms, was so great that I cannot hinder myself from taking the liberty humbly to acknowledge it. I shall leave the letter to my family as a mark of your Majesty's goodness never to be forgotten, with a lesson to those who shall succeed me ever to be loyal to those who shall reign after your Majesty, to whom I owe so much.

1684, June 1st, n. s., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. — Since my last to your lordship we have heard nothing from Holland, the late letter of Mons^r. van Citters having put a stop to the negotiation of peace there. I enclose a relation of what passed upon Sunday last at Luxembourg; — Account of the doings of the French fleet before Genoa. — . . . This day the report at this Court is that 3 parts of that great city are burnt, that two descents had been made, one from the vessels commanded by the Chev^r. de Liry Chef d'Escadre who is killed, and the other by the Duke de Mortemar, seconded by the Chevalier de Tainville, with a good body of foot. . . . It is thought that the King of Spain will never consent to a peace without the comprehension of the Republique of Genoa in the treaty, since it hath put itself under his protection, which will be a new obstacle to an accommodation. A thing which happened this day here hath brought Le Pescheur fidel, the famous almanack of Milan, into great request, for a gentleman shewed a place in it to this King, in which it is said that in the month of June une superbe citée sera fort humiliée par des foudres which is interpreted of Genoa. It is said that since the late misunderstanding betwixt the Elector of Brandenburg and the house of Luenbourg the subsidy of that Elector is to be augmented by this King, and that he is to begin to act soon in the northern parts if things be not accommodated. The cornette of the 1st troop of mousquetaires being void by the advance of officers upon the death of Mons^r. Fourbin, this King hath given it to Mons^r. d'Artagnan, relation to him who commanded the same troop at the siege of Maestricht and who was killed there. His most Christian Majesty also yesterday disposed of several vacant bishopricks. And this day being the fête de Dieu he went in procession here carrying a flambeau from the hostel de Ville to the Church of Notre Dame, being accompanied by the Dauphin, Madame la Dauphine, Madame la Princesse de Conti, and the whole Court.

1684, June 2nd, Valenciennes. — The same to the same. — This King received advice at midnight that Luxembourg had capitulated ever since yesterday morning at 4 of the clock, that the hostages on both sides had been delivered without difficulty, and that the besieged had not attended the effect of the mine which is under the bastion of Barlemot, that the demands of the Prince of Chimay were high, and that amongst other things he demanded to carry away all the cannon. . . . I forgot one particular in my last relating to Genoa, which is, that those of the city have cut the throats of all the French which they found in it. A courier is arrived here this morning from England.

1684, June 2nd, s. n., Valenciennes. — Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode (autograph). — I have only time to tell you (my courier being just packing) that Luxembourg hath capitulated ever since yesterday morning at four of the clock. A courier brought that news that night at midnight; I suppose before that time the place is reduced. Monsieur Lambert is named to be Governor; Monsieur le Maréchal de Schomberg was sent for by a courier express that morning at 3 of the clock from the army. He arrived at 8, and hath been with this King and Monsieur de Louvois ever since he came; doubtless he is to receive some important order.

Le Vendredi Soir (Friday evening) 2d Juin. (In French.) The news from England is good. The King my master has declared that he has spoken to Monsieur Van Citters on the present conjuncture of affairs, and that in the hope of persuading the Messieurs of the States of Holland to give their consent to an accommodation, he had said that he believed that after the taking of Luxembourg the King of France would undertake nothing. Mons^r. Van Citters has acknowledged to have written something approaching to this. Nevertheless the King my master has declared that he only wishes for peace, and that he is resolved to take all kind of measures to arrive at it, and if the Messieurs of the States will not contribute all that depends on them, he advises not to find it strange the measures that he will take afterwards . . . P.S. Burn this note if you please.

1684, June 5th, s. n., Lisle.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—In my last I gave your lordship an account that Luxembourg had capitulated. It is true that the Prince de Chimay did desire of the Mareschal de Crequi to consent to a truce of eight days; but Mons^r. de Crequi demanding that after that he should deliver up the place, which he refusing to do, and at the same time making proposals too great to be granted, the hostages were re-delivered on both sides, and they began to shoot again, so that the siege is not yet ended, but may continue some days. The King thought himself so well assured of the place that on Friday last the Te Deum was sung solemnly for the victory in a church at Valenciennes by the Archbishop of Cambray, where his most Christian Majesty and all his Court assisted, after having received the compliments of all the foreign ministers upon it; but before the solemnity was ended a courier arrived with the advice of the continuation of the siege, which hath a little changed the good humour of this Court. . . .

Memorandum that the 6th Mr. Tempest from Douay by the order of my Lord gave advise by a letter to Mr. Mounsteven, which was to be communicated to my Lord Sunderland of the surrender of Luxembourg.

1684, June 10th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—At my arrival here yesterday I received your lordship's letter of the 19th, and also two of the 26th of May. In the first your lordship giveth me his Majesty's commands to endeavour for the immediate restitution of the Irish ship lately taken in Ramsgate Road by a privateer of Calais, with its lading, and also to demand that the party may be indemnified for the loss which he hath sustained by so unjust a proceeding. I shall not fail to execute this upon the first opportunity which I can have, and to press the execution of that part of the late treaty of the year 1672 mentioned by your lordship which relateth to this particular case, without a formal contravention to which they can have no pretence to detain the said ship. I shall also not fail to demand the restitution of the pinke called the St. George of London, taken by the French in the West Indies, according to your lordship's direction in the same letter. I am, in pursuance of the very exact and clear instructions which your lordship giveth me in one of yours of the 26th of May, preparing two memorials to be presented to his most Christian Majesty, one concerning the exemption of the King's subjects from the Droit d'Aubeyne, and the other for the confirming of the ancient Scotch privileges. I shall within a few days present the memorials and transmit the copies of them to your lordship. In your lordship's other letter of the 26th of May you were pleased to explain to me the design of what his Majesty was pleased to say to Mons^r. Van Citters upon the subject of the present conjuncture. . . . This King arrived the last night at Versailles, having lodged at Chantilly upon Thursday. The Prince of Chimay signed the capitulation for the rendering of Luxembourg upon the 3d instant, but since he had not appeared to go at the place before the 6th, the French garrison was not to enter till that day. There was a great contestation concerning two points . . . The French garrison is to be conducted to Bruxelles. Mons^r. de Vauban, who hath had the conduct of the siege, hath received 5,000 louis d'or as a gratuity from the King, and is now using all diligence to repair the fortifications of the place, and to put it into a posture of defence, and five battalions are destined to carry on that work . . . The Marquis de Marini, Envoyé of Genoa, was sent to the Bastille upon Tuesday last, where he hath been hitherto well treated, and all people have had liberty to see him, but there is now a report that he is to be removed to the Chateau de Vincennes. If it be so I am afraid that it is of ill abode to him. Mons^r. de Seignelay is returned from before Genoa, and joined this Court at Mouchy upon Wednesday last. . . .

1684, June 14th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The Estates General have yet taken no resolution upon the French propositions; but Mons^r. d'Avaux hath given hopes here that that will soon be done, and that it may be such as is desired here; the term limited for it is still the 20th of this month, so that till that time things are in suspense here . . . The Nonce is to have an audience this day upon that affair (Genoa). It is pretended here that the Genoese have first violated the law of nations by setting a price upon the heads of all the French within their dominions. Since the retreat of the French fleet they have put themselves entirely under the protection of Spayne, having concluded a ligue offensive and defensive with that Crown. . . .

1684, June 17th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir N. Butler.—I did yesterday receive yours of the 2d instant, s. v., in which you are pleased to recommend to me the affair of Mr. Bankes. I had before received his Majesty's commands in it from my Lord of Sunderland, and I have already prepared a memorial (a copy of which I have sent to my Lord by this post) to be presented to his most Christian Majesty upon that subject. You may be assured, sir, that I shall not fail to endeavour to obtain a speedy satisfaction for Mr. Bankes.

1684, June 17th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have received your lordship's of the 2d instant, s. v., and I shall according to the instruction in it do what I am able in the affair of Mr. Westcombe, Consul at Bayonne, having already passed offices upon it in pursuance of orders conveyed to me by Sir Leoline Jenkins. Your lordship hath also been pleased to enclose and to recommend to me the case of Mr. Courten, to which I am no stranger; his request I perceive is to have a cause depending here betwixt him and Mr. Carew transmitted into England, in order to have it determined in some of his Majesty's Courts of Justice there. I have had the good fortune before the receipt of your lordship's, by the favour of the Lieutenant Civil here, to obtain that, he having done it at my desire with all readiness; his adversary threatens to appeal to the Parliament of Paris, but I shall take care of the affair in that Court also. Since the denial which Mr. Carew hath received of the letters of reprisal which he solicited against the Dutch in this Court he hath set on foot another project, which is the selling of a title which he pretends as administrator of the goods and chattels of Sir William Courten to the Island of Barbadoes. He is at this time very busy about it, and proclaimeth everywhere the great wrongs which he pretendeth to have received from the King and his ministers in England, of whom he speaketh very freely. I have taken care to give his exact character to Mons^r. de Croissy, and to inform him of his intrigues at Calais and Dunkirque, which hath produced this King's order to the Lieutenant Criminel to observe him well; so that, perhaps, he may act and discourse himself into the Bastille, which I am sure he deserveth. Mons^r. de la Salle, the great French discoverer in the West Indies, is now at Rochelle employed in equipping a small fleet for Canada, composed of one frigate of 36 pieces of cannon, of a flute of 18 pieces, and of some other smaller vessels. He carrieth to the number of 400 persons with him (of which des Grozeliers concerned in the enterprize of Port Nelson is one) . . . The design and course of this small fleet are very secret, but is scarce doubted but that some attempt will be made by it upon the Spaniards in the West Indies. It is believed that the 14 men-of-war which they are by this King's order setting out to sea from Rochefort and from Brest are to back and to sustain this expedition. It is likely that the Mareschal d'Esirees, who is now actually at Rochefort, will command this fleet, he is soon to go from thence to quicken the preparations at Brest. They are making at this time levies of 2,500 men to serve as soldiers and mariners upon this fleet in the parts about Brest, and of the same number in the places about Rochefort, upon the same account. It is believed that the Comte de Penna Lozza will embark with the Mareschal d'Estrees; he hath been heretofore Governor of New Mexico, and perhaps he is not unknown to the King and to the Duke, having been at London some seven or eight years since I may assure you that the last dispatches of Mons^r. d'Avaux give great hopes of the speedy success of his negotiations in Holland. The Nuncio had an audience of this King upon Tuesday last, in which he exhorted his most Christian Majesty in the name of the Pope to a peace, and to pardon the Genoese and to grant passports to those deputies which that Republic was ready to send hither It is thought that the confinement of the Envoyé of Genoa will not be long, since they are now convinced here that no violence hath been offered to the French Consul

1684, June 21th, n. s., Paris.—The same to the same.—I did yesterday put into the hands of Mons^r. de Croissy two memorials relating to the English and Scotch privileges, the copies of which I have by the last post transmitted to your lordship, and he hath promised me to present them upon the first opportunity which he can have to his most Christian Majesty.—Conversation with M. de Croissy on the subject.—I endeavoured to have met yesterday with Mons^r. de Seignelay, and to have spoken to him concerning the release of the English vessel taken in the West Indies and out of Ramsgate Road, but he was at his house in the country The Nuncio hath demanded the liberty of the Marquis de Marini, Envoyé of Genes, but it hath been refused to him. The Duke d'Estrees, this King's ambassador at Rome, hath lately had an audience of the Pope, in which he designed to have declared to him the reasons which the King his master had to batter Genoa with his bombes, but the Pope without hearing him put himself upon his knees before his oratory, and weeping brought forth these words, Defende causam tuam O Domine, and the ambassador, not knowing what to say, retired

1684, June 24th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mons^r. Godet (French). Has received two letters from him, and assures him of his continued regard and desire for the establishment of his family. Puts him in mind of their last conversation when Lord Preston gave his reasons for not writing to the English ministers in Godet's behalf, with which reasons Godet expressed himself satisfied. Has written on his behalf to Mr. Jenkins, who, although not in the ministry, Lord Preston knows has shown the letter to Lord Sunderland, and if he has not appeared disposed to support Godet's propositions he is seemingly cognizant of the King's intentions thereupon. If the King thinks fit to give Godet the commission to act for him which Godet desires, Lord Preston will be pleased; but he (Lord P.) does not think it necessary to renew his application, or propose the matter anew to Lord Sunderland, having already clearly expressed himself thereon to Mr. Jenkins

1684, June 24th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—Upon Wednesday at night a Lieutenant of the Guards was sent to the Duke of Mecklebourg to order him in this King's name to render himself forthwith prisoner in the Castle of Vincennes, which order he obeyed, and remaineth at present in those lodgings which the Prince of Condé had formerly It is said with assurance that his most Christian Majesty hath a design to buy the principality of Monacho, which will give him a power of bridling of Genoa. He hath already a garrison in the place since the Spaniards have been driven thence The Chevalier de Tourville, who lately made the peace at Algiers, hath, as I am certainly informed, given advise hither that those of that place told him in confidence that they are resolved to make prize of the first English merchant ship with which they shall meet, under the pretext that our slaves have not been redeemed at the time which was agreed upon. I have some intimation also of this by a letter which I received the other day from Leghorn.

1684, June 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Dartmouth.—Mr. Wharton arrived here by post upon Sunday last, and brought me your Lordship's of May 24th. I am heartily sorry that I was come for this place before Mr. Phillips and he arrived in Flanders. I should have been ready to have done all things for them which might have laid in my power. I do very much approve of your lordship's design in sending them over. . . .

1684, June 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir Ch. Musgrave.—Giving the same particulars about Mr. Phillips and Mr. Wharton as in the letter to Lord Dartmouth.

1684, June 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I was yesterday with Mons^r. de Croissy, who told me that he had laid my two last memorials concerning the English and Scotch privileges before the King his master in the Council, and that he was ordered to let me know that his most Christian Majesty could not resolve to make any general order relating to that affair, because he thought that those privileges to which the English and Scotch nations pretend here might be better assured and settled by a new treaty of commerce betwixt the two Crowns, in which the King his master, to make appear his great readiness to comply with all things which his Majesty should propose, would not refuse to accord any thing to his subjects which could be reasonably demanded in their favour.—Their conversation on the subject.—I enclose the latest accounts from Germany, and tho' I know that Mr. Poley must have given an earlier account of the posture of the negotiations of Ratisbone, yet I will let your lordship know how the present estate of those affairs is represented hither. The ministers of the Emperor there speak of nothing but a war, and after having concluded and resolved upon the raising of the siege of Luxembourg in the time when it was capitulating, they proposed an Imperial decret, and a conclusion of the College of Princes for arming in defence of the circle of Burgundie, &c. . . . The Chevalier de Tourville cruisseth now before that place (Genoa) with 4 men-of-war and 4 galliots; the Chevalier de Villoy is also gone from Thoulon to convey 4 flutes, which are sent to Civita vecchia to bring several marble statues made for this King at Rome, and amongst others, that equestral figure which the Cavaliere Bernini hath made of his most Christian Majesty, his figure and the horse being all of one entire piece of marble Yesterday the courier from Holland was expected with great impatience, I am told this morning that he is arrived, tho' I am not sure of it. It is said that he bringeth with him the acceptance of truce for 20 years, upon the conditions proposed by this King, and also the advise that all the ministers of the allies have consented to it, except him of Spayne. Mons^r. d'Avaux hath orders to give notice to the Mareschal of Schomberg of the resolution of the States, and he hath orders to continue or to put an end to all further hostilities, according as he shall find the nature of that.

1684, July 1st, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I received advise yesterday from Mons^r. de Seignelay that his most Christian Majesty had ordered the restitution of the Irish vessel lately taken in Ramsgate Road, and that on Tuesday next the Arrest de Conseil would be signed and put into my hands; a copy of which I shall transmit to your lordship by the next post. As to the affair of Petites Guanes he sent me word that it had been a custom, and established by the laws, to seize of all strangers ships trading within the Isles of America; and that so the Governor of Petites Guanes had with justice seized that English vessel, having found it actually trafficking. My Secretary whom I had sent to him, desiring Mons^r. de Seignelay to observe that it was proved by the certificate annexed to my memorial, that the master of the pincke had put into the Bay of Meriguana with a design only of taking in fresh water, he answered that that was the same thing, nothing being so easy as for a vessel to lie by under the pretence of watering, and then to traffic privately with her chaloupe; but that he had by this King's order lately written to Mons^r. de Barillon, because he had received a letter from him upon this subject; so that before this letter can arrive your lordship will have had a further notice of this King's intentions as to this affair. Your lordship will also have had, I suppose, notice of vessel of Limrick coming from the Guyne in Gallitia, and bound for Ostend, which hath been lately taken by a privateer of Dunkirque and brought into that place. I have not yet been enough instructed of the particulars to have done anything towards its release. I am to acknowledge your Lordship's of the 16th of June, s. v., which I received yesterday. Be pleased to assure his Majesty that I shall carefully watch Mr. Carew's steps in an affair relating to the Barbadoes and not fail to inform him from time to time of the progress which he shall make in it, but I believe it will come to nothing. I have a private intimation yesterday from a very good hand that Carew having found himself thwarted in all his projects here hath now declared his willingness to submit himself to his Majesty by delivering up the letters patent for reprisals, and by signing any instrument which he shall think fit, not doubting (as he saith) of his Majesty's goodness towards him for some reparations according to the circumstances of his cause. I confess I have very little confidence in him; but if the King thinketh it for his service to have those letters patent suspended, I am in hopes that it may be brought about. Your lordship will be pleased to receive His Majesty's orders, if he thinketh it fit to give any in this affair, that I may be instructed how to act. Notwithstanding all the reports which have been spread here for several days that this King had received the Treaty signed from the Hague touching the truce, it is very certain that he had it not yesterday, but he hath had the assurance that it would be concluded and signed without delay. Upon which it hath been stipulated on both sides that all the acts of hostility should be suspended We must now expect the resolutions which the Emperor and King of Spain shall take during the 6 weeks of delay which his most Christian Majesty hath granted to the instances of those estates for that Two ambassadors or deputies from the Divan of Algiers arrived here on Thursday, and are defrayed and lodged by this King at the Hotel des Ambassadeurs, they will soon have their audience. I hear they make no secret of the design that the Algerines have of making war with us, but speak of it publicly Just as I am writing this, Mr. Walker, one of the executors of Mr. Orde, the banquier, lately deceased here, hath brought me the copy of the requeste of Mons^r. Fauconnet, Farmer-General of the King's domains, which I enclose. Your lordship will find by it that notwithstanding the arrests which I have obtained, sealed with the Great Seal of France, and signed by his most Christian Majesty, in the cases of my Lady Borlase, and of Mr. Ord, there is a design to deprive their heirs of the advantages which they may reap by their succession. My Lord, these are tricks, which are practised in no place of the world but here, and if some notice be not taken of it to Mons^r. Barillon, that he may represent the King's resentment of this kind of proceeding hither, and if some intimation be not given that the French subjects dying in the King's dominions shall receive the same treatment, it will be impossible to serve his Majesty as he ought to be, for we shall never know when our orders are executed, if this be permitted. One thing I shall observe to your lordship, which is that for the 3rd part of Mr. Ord's Aubeyne Mons^r. Fauconnet demands 20 thousand £ which is more than all that he hath left doth amount to, so that the design is to deprive his heirs of the whole succession. I humbly beg of your lordship to let me hear from you upon this subject upon the first occasion.

1684, July 5, s. n., Lord Preston to Mr. Charlton.—I received the favour of yours of the 19th of June yesterday Mr. Carew finding himself opposed here upon all occasions, and having railed as much as he thought fit to do, is, I hear, retiring to Dunkirk within a few days. He hath spent all his money, turned off his man Jones, and had a bill of 6 or 700 livres protested from Dunkirk. He hath made some offers of delivering up his letters patent to the King: I thought it my duty to acquaint his Majesty with it, but at the same time to let him know that no great trust is to be reposed on what he offers or says. He hath lodged his business in this Parliament, but within a few days I hope to have it thrown out.

1684, July 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—A courier arrived here on Monday morning very early from the Hague and brought the enclosed Treaty signed to the Dutch ambassador, with the orders also of the States General to him to dispatch one express to Madrid without delay with the said Treaty and with their letters and orders to their ambassador there. He sent his secretary the same day to Mons^r. de Louvois for the necessary passports, and it appeared that the said secretary was the first who had brought the news of the conclusion of the Treaty, the courier of Mons^r. d'Avaux, who came by sea, not arriving till yesterday morning, so that the passports being granted the Dutch ambassador was intreated to communicate the Treaty, which he did yesterday at Versailles. There is at this Court a great appearance of joy upon the conclusion of this Treaty, which is a great mark that both his most Christian Majesty and his ministers do very sincerely desire peace The Algerines had audience yesterday of this King at Versailles. They gave him the title of Emperor, as it had been stipulated with the Divan of Algiers. To the chief of them they have given the title of ambassadors here, tho' in reality he is only deputed by that Divan to bring hither their ratification of the late Treaty, and to carry back the ratification of it by his most Christian Majesty. . . . The Genoese have armed out two more of their galleys, and are putting to sea 3 or 4 stout men-of-war. Genoa seemeth to be a little uneasy by the Spanish garrison which it hath received, the soldiers of that nation, but above all the Neapolitans, robbing and breaking open the houses of citizens by night and entering into the shops of the merchants in the day time and taking from thence what they like I find lately that his most Christian Majesty is more incensed against the Genoese than he was the last week, and that if the Spaniards are resolved to have them comprehended in the Treaty, it may create a greater obstacle than was at first imagined

1684, July 8th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received your lordship's of the 23rd of the last month with an order of Council enclosed in favour of Mr. Monroe. I am well acquainted with his case, and I shall do what I am able towards the obtaining of justice for him here; but in order to it he will do well in sending me a copy of the last sentence given against him, of which I am to demand a review. . . .

1684, July 12th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his cousin, Mr. Grahme, of Clifford's Inn.—I have only time to let you know that there is a rumour here that Ludlow hath been privately in England for some months watching the success of the late conspiracy. I have also had notice of it privately, but I cannot say how well the advice may be grounded; I shall be as diligent as I can in enquiring further into it; and I shall endeavour to have information from Genoa concerning him, and whether he hath lately been seen in Switzerland, where he hath for a long time dwelt in a town near the Lake of Geneva. I should be glad to know if you have had any notice or suspicion of this. I have forborne to write of it to my Lord of Sunderland, because I cannot answer for the certainty of the report. If I may have a line or two upon this subject I shall write more at large to you. In the meantime be pleased to keep it to yourself, and I will be as diligent as I can to be informed whether there may be truth in the advice or not. I pray be pleased to present my most humble service to Sir Nicholas Butler, and to let him know that I received his letter of the 26th of June last yesterday. I have two posts since given an account to my Lord of Sunderland of the answer which I had to the memorial which I presented upon the subject of his friend Mr. Bank's affair, which I suppose my Lord of Sunderland may have communicated to him, and therefore I shall not repeat it here; Mons^r. de Barillon, having written hither upon it, hath orders from the King his master to justify as I believe the acting of the Governor of the Petites Guanes in that affair. Therefore Sir Nicholas Butler and Mr. Bankes would do well to be watchful and to take care that his Majesty may be thoroughly informed of the violence and injustice of the proceeding, and be pleased to assure them that if any further orders come to me I shall take care to execute them vigorously here.

1684, July 12th, Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I enclose the copy of the arrest granted for the release of the Irish barque lately taken in Ramsgate Road by a privateer of Calais. I have sent the original thither to the master, who is now there. Your lordship will find that there is no satisfaction ordered by it to the owners and master for the damages which they have sustained by the taking and long detention of the said barque, tho' in pursuance of my orders I did demand it. I have yesterday also received by the hands of the persons concerned your lordship's letter of the 19th of June, s. v., with his Majesty's commands to demand the restitution of the ship called the James and John of London taken lately by a French privateer and carried into Dunkirk and confiscated there, and also reparation and satisfaction to be forthwith made to the said owners for the capture and the loss which they have sustained thereby. I shall take care speedily to render an account of this affair The Genoese do their best to put the Spaniards into a condition to support the war; they have not only furnished that which was necessary for the arming of the squadrons of Naples, Sicily, and Sardinia, and joined their own galleys to them, but have at their own expence embarked upon the fleet those 4,000 Corsi and 1,000 Germans which I mentioned in my last to your lordship to be landed in Catalonia. This fleet hath appeared upon the coast of Provence and hath alarmed the people there; but it afterwards put off to sea and hath not been seen since, and here they pretend to have advise that it is returned into port The buildings at Versailles are carried on with great diligence, they are now taking away a very large hill which standeth in the view of the palace. There are 15,000 people at work, and besides these 10 battallions of Foot are ordered to go to work there.

1684, July 15th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received your lordship's of the 30th of the last month, s. v., and I shall not fail to obey his Majesty by representing to this King and to his ministers what I am ordered concerning the privileges of the English and Scotch subjects, and particularly concerning the Droit d'Aubeyne. Mr. Monroe hath written to me by the last post and desireth me not to move in his business till his arrival here, he being upon the way. I am very glad that your lordship hath had orders to speak with Mons. Barillon about it, and also about the affair of Mr. Banke's ship. The Marquis de Grana is so much dissatisfied with the late Treaty concluded at the Hague, that upon every occasion in his discourse, and in his writings, he giveth it the qualification of infamous The affairs of the North are in terms of being pacified to the satisfaction of all parties. The King of Denmark hath consented to an accommodation, having sent his troops into their quarters, and declaring that he will content himself with the reunion which he hath made of the Duchy of Sleswicke to his Crown, which I am afraid will scarce recompence the vast expense which he hath been obliged to make these 2 last years in setting out of his army and his fleet Tho' it be not yet sure that either the Emperor or Spayne will accept the truce no advises having come from either Court since the conclusion of the Treaty at the Hague, yet, according to all appearances, they cannot resist long, nor oppose a good so reasonable to all Christendom, and so necessary to themselves, in which his Majesty will justly have the greatest share of the glory, having contributed more to it by his prudent conduct and his firmness than any Prince of Europe Mons^r. de Croissy hath notified to the Nonce and to the other Princes of Italy that the King his master was resolved not to carry his arms into that country, but at the same time he gave them to understand that he did not intend that the Genoese should be comprehended in the peace with Spayne, but that if they would make any propositions to his most Christian Majesty from themselves they should be favourably received. There are great grounds to believe that the Republic of Genoa doth begin to find itself incommoded by the protection of Spayne, which maketh itself too often put its hand into the purse. The Consul of France hath been put in prison there since that Republic hath had advise of the arrest of Mons^r. de Marini 1684, July 19th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. I am to acknowledge your lordship's of the 30th of the last month, s.v., which came to my hands upon Friday. I have yesterday in pursuance of the orders conveyed by it spoken effectually to Mons^r. de Croissy upon the subject of the privileges of his Majesty's subjects here. He hath promised to represent what I said to his most Christian Majesty, and, if the answer be not favourable, and such as may put an end to the pursuits and proceedings under pretext of the Droit d'Aubeyne, I shall take an occasion of moving this King himself in it, and of laying the justice of our pretensions before him. I have yesterday also demanded the restitution of the ship lately taken by a privateer of Dunkirk, which I hope will be released without difficulty, since the proofs are very clear that all her cargo belongeth and is consigned to the King's subjects. Carew after having seen all his projects disappointed here is retired 3 days since to Roan, from whence, as I am told, he designeth to go privately to England A remarkable Thesis is lately published, which the Abbé de Louvois is to sustain. The graving of it is admirable, and the design something singular. His most Christian Majesty is there seen with an air of greatness and in a military posture, having at his feet flocks of sheep feeding in peace. On the opposite side is the Emperor, the King of Spayne, and their allies, with the figure of a Spaniard making offers to draw his long sword but is hindered by the Belgique Lyon. This Thesis did hang yesterday within the Ruelle of this King's bed The Algerines, as I have before advertised your lordship, give marks of their design of making a war with England, having already taken 3 of our ships, as the last letters from Provence intimate Some vessels are lately parted from the Western parts of this kingdom with some forces on board them bound for the Islands of America. The Mareschal d'Estrées having always in prospect the making of some conquests there. Monsieur de la Salle, of whom your lordship hath been before advised, is gone to Canada with some forces to pursue that great discovery which he made the last year in those parts. As a consequence of the peace they apply themselves more and more every day here to building. That of Versailles is continued with a most incredible expense, and at the same time that of St. Germain en Laye, and of the Invalids It hath been declared to the Nonce by order of this King, that his most Christian Majesty will not suffer the Genoese to be comprehended in the Treaty with Spain, and that he will hear nothing of an accommodation with them till they have first restored all that they have taken from his subjects since the capture. The Duke of Northumberland arrived here the last night from the camp in Flanders.

1684, July 22nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. I have your lordship's of the 7th instant, s.v., with his Majesty's commands concerning Madame d'Aversé, which I shall take care to execute The Spaniards do still govern at Genoa, and their councils do upon all occasions obtain there. They have proposed the building of a citadel for the safety of the Republic, which if they agree to will be indeed a ready and a good way for them to render themselves masters of that city. The Chevalier de Tourville with his squadron hath made a descent upon the Island of Corsica, which belongeth to the Genoese, but the particularities of it are not yet known 1684, July 26th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—When the news arrived at Madrid that the Hollanders had concluded the truce with France that Court expressed a great concern, and in its discourses treated them very ill. But in the end the Pope's Nonce and the ambassador of the Emperor are said to have brought his Catholic Majesty and his ministers to consent to the acceptance of it upon the conditions of the inclusion of their allies, and of a general garentie The estates of Holland are extremely desirous that the Prince of Orange should be re-established in the possession of what belongeth to him in France and in the conquered countries, and have testified so much to Mons. d'Avaux; but I am afraid that his present conduct will not create in this King any inclination to answer favourably to such a proposal. The exchange of the ratifications hath been made at the Hague, and the secretary of Monsieur d'Avaux is expected here hourly, who is to bring them. The Prince of Orange hath hindered Utrecht to ratify, so that at present 4 provinces have only signed, but however the affair is passed by a plurality of voices in the assembly of the Estates General. Those estates have signified to Mons. d'Avaux that since they have retired their troops out of the Spanish territories they are in hopes that his most Christian Majesty will withdraw his also, but there is no appearance that he will do that before the Spaniards have accepted the truce. The article relating to the Genoese may, I am afraid, be an obstacle to this, but in that case I believe they may content themselves here, provided that the Emperor and the Empire consent to it, Holland being now out of play The expence of the buildings at Versailles is now regulated to 200,000 frances each week The Duke of Grafton, having taken leave of the Court, leaveth this place this night or to-morrow morning, in order to embark himself at Diepe for England. His most Christian Majesty hath presented him with a sword set with diamonds.

1684, July 29th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I give your lordship the trouble of this particular letter, because I must leave it to your lordship either to communicate the contents of it to his Majesty, or to suppress it, as you shall judge most convenient, for I have ever avoided to meddle in anything which hath not immediately concerned me as being in this poste, or to offer anything which may look like an advise, knowing that I have nothing to do but to obey those orders with which his Majesty is pleased to charge me. This being premised, I must acquaint your lordship that Mons^r. de St. Romain hath by his last dispatches given great hopes of the success of his negotiations in Portugal, particularly of that in favour of the Prince de la Rochesur-yon, that also that he hath signified that he hath lately had some discourse with Mr. Fanshaw, and that he is very well satisfied with him now, and is assured of his good intentions, tho' formerly he had intimated hither that he thought he had not executed vigorously enough the orders which he had received relating to this affair. It is believed here that his Majesty's countenance and good offices by his minister may contribute much to the success of it, for the continuation of which the Prince of Condé doth as I find in particular hope since I had the honour to assure him of them, in his Majesty's name, when this proposal was first made by Mons^r. d'Oppede before the death of the late Queen of Portugal I have grounds to believe that it would not be disagreeable here if Mr. Fanshaw might be continued at least till the conclusion of this affair for the reason which I have mentioned above.

length is said to have made a pure and simple acceptance of the truce conformable to the electoral declaration, which I enclose. The courier whom the French ambassador sent lately to Madrid returned on Thursday last with advice that that Court insisted upon the inclusion of the Genoese in the Treaty to be made, and that it could not accept of the truce by separating itself from its allies. That ambassador dispatched the same night a courier to Mons^r. van Citters and another into Holland. Mons^r. d'Avaux hath signed a particular article in explication of the 9th of the late Treaty, by which this King engageth himself not to attack the Estates either by himself or by his allies; and they have declared that since they have no alliance offensive with any Prince they will attack the first aggressor The Spaniards continue still in Genoa, and are the masters there. It is said here that Mons^r. de Louvois is to make a voyage to Luxembourg to examine the condition of that place, and to see the repairs which are there making. . . .

1684, Aug. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. . . . Upon offices which the Nonce hath lately passed here in favour of the Genoese it hath been declared to him that this King is resolved not to attack Genoa nor any place upon the Italian coast; but that he is resolved by no means to agree to the comprehension of that Republic in any Treaty to be made with the Spaniards, or to have any accommodation with them till it hath made a submission and given satisfaction to him, as to the demands which he hath made.

1684, Aug. 5th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. . . . Mons^r. de Louvois went upon Wednesday last towards Luxembourg to view the condition of the place, and to give the necessary orders for the repairs which are to be made there. From thence he goeth to Stratsbourg, whither his son the Marquis de Courtenvaux is already gone. These movements must doubtless much alarm the Empire. . . . There appeared upon Thursday a new declaration of this King, which forbids all his subjects of the religion to assemble themselves in any places except in their Temples, which is done with design to abolish their assemblies in the fields. The ministers of Rochelle are accused for having received a relapse lately into their congregation, which it is believed will occasion the demolition of their Temple

1684, Aug. 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Marquis of Halifax.—This morning I found this Court a little surprised with the late advice from England of Mr. Thynn's and Sir Dudley North's being added to the commission of the Treasury. It is looked upon to be of ill abode to my Lord of Rochester (in whom here they seem to repose trust), and to augur something of a Parliament. It is said to be done wholly by your lordship without the knowledge of my Lady Portsmouth, who hath (as 'tis writ from England) with great instances and many tears endeavoured to obtain from his Majesty to add no body to the commission, but to confine it still to the number of three. I endeavoured to sound Mons^r. de Croissy this day upon this affair, and find that he had been very well informed of all the particulars of it; but I could not by any means bring him to enter into conversation concerning it, he still waiving the discourse. It is the common style of these ministers and of this Court that your lordship presseth the assembling of a Parliament in England, and that you are using all endeavours to bring the King to a resolution of declaring war against France. . . .

1684, Aug. 9th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The acceptance which the House of Austria and the Empire make of the truce proposed by France containeth so many clauses contrary to the Treaty of the Hague that I look upon it as scarce possible that this King should be satisfied with it. The consideration of the interests of the parties grieved, of the possession of the limits, of the place of treating of a peace, of the general guarantee, of the comprehension of the Genoese in the Treaty with Spain, and of several other particularities will certainly be an hindrance to the negotiations on foot. In the mean time orders are sent to Mons^r. de Crecy at Ratisbone to grant till the 15th of this month for the acceptance of the truce, if he finds that they negotiate in earnest; but if within that time they do not come to such a resolution as is desired here, he is to advertise the Mareschal de Schomberg at Stratsbourg, who doubtless hath his orders to that effect. . . . Mons^r. de Vauban is gone to Luxembourg to receive from the orders of Mons^r. de Louvois; from thence they will go together to Stratsbourg. . . . Sir Samuel Morland hath desired me to enclose this petition, and I hope your lordship will do him so reasonable a favour as to present it to the King.

1684, Aug. 12th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —I received yesterday your lordship's of the 28th of July, s. v., with the copy of an Order of Council inclosed in favour of Mons^r. Duarte of Antwerp, the King's jeweller. I shall not fail to repeat my instances in his behalf; but I fear they will be still ineffectual, since I know that the jewels, and the other things which were taken upon the malefactor, have been given as a gratification to the Major of Cambray, at the request of Mons^r. de Louvois Mons^r. de Louvois is returned from his voyage, having given all necessary orders to Mons^r. Vauban for fortifying the frontier places of Germany. It is assured that since yesterday the Mareschal de Schomberg hath stopped his march, from whence it is judged that the ministers of Ratisbone may have reformed their conclusion concerning the acceptance of the truce. However it is certain that the Mareschal is arrived at Ratisbone. The Pope's Nonce here hath again made new instances in favour of the Genoese, and his most Christian Majesty hath explained himself, and ordered Mons^r. de Crecy to insinuate it to the Diete at Ratisbone that he will not attack Genoa nor any other place belonging to that Republic, provided that it will make a submission 1684, Aug. 12, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to ——. Dear Frank.—. . . The new addition of the Commission of the Treasury was surprising enough, because an alteration of another nature was expected. This Court was also alarmed at it; and upon Tuesday last I was told of it there (tho' I had notice of it before) it having been represented by Mons^r. Barillon with all its circumstances. I wish to God that something were done for our poor Lord Dartmouth, I am sure he deserveth well, but he hath enemies as well as other people.

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. 5.

Letters to England, 1684 and 1685.

Most of the letters in this volume and of the others during my embassy were copied by Charles Sandford, my second secretary at Paris, Mr. Roland Tempest being my chief secretary, who is now dead, being a designing ingenious young gentleman, and son to Coll. Tempest, of Old Durham, in the Bishoprick of Durham.

1684, Aug. 16, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The term being now expired which was accorded by his most Christian Majesty to the Emperor and Empire for the acceptance of the truce as proposed by his minister at Ratisbone we expect here with impatience to know what resolution may have been taken there upon that affair. The Imperial ministers have hitherto raised great difficulties upon the conditions of the truce, and above all upon the article relating to the possessions. It seemeth as if they would elude the arbitrage of the King in regard of the differences which may arise between France and Spain during the said truce, as it is established by the Treaty of the Hague, for they have proposed that they should rather be submitted to the arbitrage of the Emperor and the Empire, to which this King will never consent. Mons^r. de Crecy hath before this time declared to the Diet the resolution of the King his master relating to the article of Genoa, which is, That if the Republic will dismiss the Spanish garrison his most Christian Majesty will engage neither to attack the city of Genoa nor any other place within its territories, and that he will be willing to hearken to an accommodation with that estate if it be sought after a decent and a due manner The citadel of Stratsbourg being at present finished, the wall of the city on that side is opened for communication. Those inhabitants will now be well bridled by it. The States General on one side and the Elector of Brandebourg on the other continue to solicit this King for the restitution of what belongeth to the Prince of Orange within his dominions, tho' that Prince seemeth to be unconcerned in it. The Elector of Brandebourg acteth in this with regard to his own interest, the succession in case of the failure of the Prince of Orange's line coming to his children. The Marquis de Bethune hath lately written to this King that nothing can be in better order or more numerous than the army of Poland; it is composed of 40,000 nobles with their trains and attendance of 40,000 dragoons, and 6,000 Cossacks. The King of Poland is to march at the head of this army upon the 20th instant . . . I hear that another article of the Treaty made by this King with Algiers is, that those corsairs shall take no slave of any nation whatsoever upon any French ship . . . The voyage of Chambert is declared for the 15th of the next month, tho' some say that it may yet be changed to that of Fontainebleau. Coll. Berkeley went from thence towards Lyons on Saturday last in his way to Turin.

1684, Aug. 19th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—A courier arrived the other day from Ratisbone with advice from Mons^r. de Crecy that the commissarie of the Emperor having upon the 6th of this month communicated to him the power which the King of Spain had given to his Imperial Majesty for the acceptation of the truce, after many difficulties they agreed to meet in a monastery of Jacobins. The Comte de Crecy in one chamber, and the Imperial commissioners in another; the several secretaries carried and reported what was said on both sides. They entered into this kind of conclave upon Tuesday last was a sevensnight, and after several contestations the Treaty was signed upon the 10th instant at eleven of the clock and an half at night. The article relating to Genoa was the most contested. The Genoese are not directly comprehended in the Treaty, but this King engageth himself not to attack them directly nor indirectly, it being still understood that they shall give the satisfaction demanded by his most Christian Majesty, who otherwise reserveth to himself the power of chastising and mortifying of them without troubling the repose of Italy.—Encloses characters of the King of Portugal and his ministers.—My Lord of Aran's page was unfortunately killed upon Wednesday last in this Fauxbourg by one Collins, who had formerly ridden in the Duke's Guard in England, who lately fled from thence for killing a man there.

1684, Aug. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The news of the acceptation of the truce by the Emperor was so long expected here and with so much impatience that this Court began to enter into some suspicion that the Imperial ministers at Ratisbone had signed the Treaty for Spain with a prospect only of gaining time to the Emperor till he might see what the success of his arms would be before Buda; but this was soon removed by the arrival of a courier from Mons^r. de Crecy on Monday last with the certain advice that at his departure from Ratisbone, which was upon the 16th instant, s. n., all the ingredients of the Treaty for a truce had been agreed upon to the satisfaction of France, and that the Plenipotentiaries on both sides were then forming and dressing of it, so that we may hope to see it here soon in good and due form . . . A ligue defensive hath been proposed betwixt this Crown and the Estates General of the united provinces. The occasion of the late voyage of Mons^r. d'Avaux to Amsterdam was to endeavour to induce that town to consent to it, and to order its deputies to propose it in the next assembly of the Estates General, but I find that he hath advised hither that Amsterdam hath at present refused to consent to any separate Treaty with France, but that he doth not despair by one way or another to bring it about . . .

1684, Aug. 26th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—At length the truce is accepted by all parties, the Emperor and Empire having consented to it as well as the King of Spain. The secretary of Mons^r. de Crecy arrived here from Ratisbone with the Treaty in good and due form late upon Wednesday at night, with which his most Christian Majesty is very well satisfied . . . The Genoese seem now to think of making their submissions to this King, and by a peace to deliver themselves from the Spaniards who have not been firm to them. His most Christian Majesty now declareth that he will receive no proposals from them till the Doge and four of the principal senators come hither in person to ask his pardon; but it is thought that upon the instances of the Pope this preliminary may be dispensed with . . . P.S. (In Lord Preston's handwriting.) The Duke of Northumberland left this place yesterday, and is gone for Bruxelles; having missed his fit of the ague.

1684, Aug. 30th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—Notwithstanding that I have used all possible endeavours to obtain the release of the Irish vessel lately taken near Ostend by the privateers of Dunkirque, I have not yet been able to do it, nor to procure any positive answer to the memorial which I did present some time since concerning that affair; tho' Mons^r. de Seignelay seemeth not to favour us in it, yet I hope that an end may be soon put to it, for Mons^r. de Croissey told me yesterday that his most Christian Majesty had appointed the Chancellour himself, Mons^r. de Seignelay and another councillor to take cognisance of it, and that the day for hearing of the several parties would be soon appointed. In the meantime if your lordship would recommend the matter to Mons^r. de Barillon it might make my offices here succeed more easily . . . The ligue projected betwixt the King of Danemarke, the Elector of Brandebourg, and the Princes of the house of Lunenbourg, which I have before mentioned to your lordship, can now have no effect by reason of the acceptation of the truce proposed by France by all parties at Ratisbone. The Princes of Lunenbourg are said to have entered into it, only with a design to break it, and to sound to the bottom the measures which the other two Princes had taken or should take in relation to Sweden. The ministers of France are said also underhand to have discovered this ligue, and to have first given it air, because his most Christian Majesty, desiring peace in this conjuncture, had no mind that it should take effect . . . The Marquis de Bethune hath had good success in his negotiations in Poland, and he will in likelihood work a better understanding betwixt the two Crowns. Upon the refusal which the King of Poland hath made to suffer the Prince his son to accept of the order of the Toison d'or lately sent to him by the King of Spain, the Emperor's ambassador hath demanded his Congé, and will soon return to Vienna.

1684, Sept. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.— . . . All the late advices from Italy signify that the Genoese seem disposed to accommodate themselves in earnest with France, being now convinced that the Spaniards have taken no great care of their interests in the Treaty concluded at Ratisbone.

1684, Sept. 6th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I received your lordship's of the 18th, s. v., late upon Saturday, which should have arrived early the day before. I the next morning demanded an audience, which could be appointed me no sooner than to-morrow, because the intervening days had been given to other ministers who had demanded audiences before. I shall then present that memorial concerning the withdrawing the French troops out of the Spanish low countries, of which your lordship sent me a draught. I could wish that upon his Majesty's instances the most Christian King may be prevailed with to withdraw the troops from those provinces, since their present misery according to all accounts is extremely great . . . I have in pursuance of my further instructions in the same letter laid before the Abbe Balatti the several particulars of the late horrid conspiracy against the persons of his Majesty and the Duke, which was so happily discovered the last year, intreating him to endeavour to give to the Princes his masters such a notion and impression of it as may convince them of the truth and reality of it; that being done I told him I did not doubt but that they would detest it, and refuse all sort of protection or countenance to any person who has been concerned in it; this I told him the King my master did, and had reason to expect from them as Princes and his ancient friends; he answered me that he was much surprised to find that there was any occasion to remonstrate any thing of this kind to the Princes of the house of Lunenbourg, his masters; that being at Hanover when the plot was first discovered no person could express a greater detestation of it than the Duke did, and he heard him make a declaration that if the chief person concerned in it should come to him for protection he would order him to withdraw out of his estates; and that he was sure that the other Princes of that house had the same sentiments; that himself had the honour to make the compliments of congratulation to his Majesty from those Princes upon his happy deliverance, and that he was sure that nobody congratulated with him for it with more sincerity than they did, that if anything had happened since his departure he was a stranger to it . . . He asked me then if I knew the name of any particular conspirator who might have been protected by the Princes of Lunenbourg, and said he had never heard of any disaffected person to his Majesty who had been near those countries except Sir Wm. Waller, who was at Bremen. I told him if those Princes had shewed any countenance to that person they could not have done it to one who deserved it less or who merited worse from the King than he did. A review of the sentence which I have been ordered to ask lately given here in the case of Monro, with which his Majesty and your lordship is well acquainted, is absolutely refused. The commissioners met yesterday to receive the proofs relating to the Irish ship lately taken near Ostend by a privateer of Dunkirque, so that

In a few days we may hope to see an end of that business. The enclosed memorial concerning the Fubrick of Cal. is after a slow and more convenient way has been lately put into my hands. Your lordship may be pleased to shew it to his Majesty, and if he thinks it of use he will send it me who may it be produced when his Majesty pleases.

1684, Sept. 9th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.

—I received yesterday your lordship's of Aug. 5th, s. v., by Mr. Ackeman, which containeth orders to me to renew my instances with this King in order to obtain the taking off of 50 sols per tun, and other impositions charged of late upon the Scotch merchandises, and also the confirmation of the ancient privilege of that nation in France. I did receive about two years since the same instruction about the 50 sols per tun, and also about a duty exacted upon the Scotch ball which was usually sold at Roan; but Mons^r. Colbert did so violently oppose himself, and appeared so eagerly against us, that we could obtain nothing. I wish with all my heart that our successors may be better now. The letters which should have arrived from England are still due; I do not know whether the fault be in the masters of our packet boats or on this side, but I am sure I have scarce received twice my letters regularly for these 8 or 10 months. Upon Thursday morning this King gave me an audience at Versailles, in which I represented to him that the King my master having been informed of the great misery under which the inhabitants of the Spanish low countries laboured at present by reason that the troops of his most Christian Majesty continued there still, could not but be touched with compassion for those unfortunate people; and that since the Treaty at Ratisbone had been concluded betwixt the Crowns of France and of Spain upon the same foot with that of the Hague, by which it was stipulated that the French troops should retire so soon as the Treaty should be ratified by the Catholic King, His Majesty, being persuaded that no difficulty can be made as to the said ratification, had commanded me to acquaint his most Christian Majesty that it would be extremely acceptable to him if at his request he would give the necessary orders to his troops to cease from hostilities and to withdraw immediately from the said provinces. I added that his Majesty had reason to hope that this might be granted, because his most Christian Majesty had upon all occasions testified his inclinations towards the re-establishing of the peace and repose of Christendom, and to the end that I might better explain to him the sentiments and desires of the King my master, and also acquit myself of the commission which I had received with more exactness, I would take the liberty to put a memorial into his hands (which was that of which your lordship sent me the draught), to which I did humbly desire a speedy answer. His most Christian Majesty replied that the King my master could have no reason to be dissatisfied if he executed the Treaty of Ratisbone according to the letter; that the King of Spain had not yet sent his ratification of the Treaty in form, and that before that arrived he could not resolve to withdraw his forces out of the Spanish territories: that it was true complaints had been made of disorders committed by some of his troops, but that where there were so great numbers of men it was impossible that there should not be some fripous amongst them, &c., &c. . . . and that he would examine my memorial and return a speedy answer to it. After dinner I went to Mons^r. de Croissy to know if he had anything in charge to say to me in relation to the memorial which I had presented at my audience. He told me that the King his master had commanded him to acquaint me that he desired nothing more than the contentment of his Majesty of Great Britain, and that he should be extremely glad upon this and upon all occasions to be able to do anything which might conduce to it; that he is ready to withdraw his troops so soon as the ratifications are exchanged, or when the Marquis de Grana shall give good caution for the payment of the contributions now due and demanded; that the ratification of the Treaty of Ratisbone is expected here the beginning of the next week, according to the assurance which the Baron Delval had given of it to the King his master; that his most Christian Majesty had already sent his ratifications to the Hague and to Ratisbone, and that he had the draught of one ready here to be exchanged, if the ratifications came directly hither from Madrid, so that no time should be lost here, but all things should be expedited with all readiness, his most Christian Majesty designing sincerely to observe and execute the Treaties. Some other general things he added, and in the end told me that he had written upon this subject to Mons^r.

Barillon who had orders to entertain his Majesty more at length upon it. When I arrived at Versailles upon Thursday I found the Dutch ambassador there, who was come upon the same business. He told me that he had received a courier the night before, and that he was ordered to desire his most Christian Majesty to withdraw his troops from the Spanish Netherlands, and at the same time to represent some disorders which had been committed by the French troops in the country about Maestricht; he also told me that a courier had been dispatched from the Hague into England to desire the concurrence of his Majesty's offices in relation to the withdrawing of the troops. He only saw Mons^r. de Croissy, who charged himself to represent what he demanded to the King his master, and to bring him back a speedy answer, which in short was this, that if the Estates General would have his most Christian Majesty execute the Treaty of the Hague he was willing to do it, and according to the 9th Article of the said Treaty to cease from all hostilities and to withdraw his troops, but that he would still retain Courtrey and Dixmude and the dependencies upon those towns, he being only obliged by the 3rd Article to have restored them to Spain, provided that his Catholic Majesty had delivered in good and due form an Act of ratification within six weeks to be counted from the day of the date of the Treaty; but that if they would have him held to the Treaty of Ratisbone, the term for ratifying of it is not yet expired, and as soon as the ratifications shall be exchanged his most Christian Majesty will not retard one minute the withdrawing of his troops out of all the Spanish dominions Since the Genoese make no haste to satisfy this King as to the demands which he maketh, he hath sent orders to Mons^r. du Quesne and to the Duc de Mortemar to approach again to Genoa with their men-of-war and galleys to endeavour to make them explain themselves. It may also happen, as it is whispered here, that if they continue obstinate the Duke of Savoy reinforced by some French troops may attempt something against them 1684, Sept. 13th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir John Worden.—Upon the receipt of yours of the 18th of August, st. v., I addressed myself to Mons^r. de Croissy for a passport for 50 tuns of wine for the Duke's use, which hath been granted, and was delivered to me yesterday. I shall keep it in my hands till Mons^r. Labady doth arrive. . . .

1684, Sept. 13th, st. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I did yesterday deliver a memorial to Mons^r. de Croissy, of which I enclose the copy, concerning the privileges of his Majesty's Scotch subjects in this nation. He hath promised me to lay it before the King his master so soon as he can have an opportunity, but I except no answer to it till the return of this Court from Chambort. He told me that he did believe that difficulty would be made to grant a confirmation of the Scotch privileges in general, and in particular to exempt the merchants from paying the 50 sols per tun; but he told me (as I have in some of my former letters acquainted your lordship) that all these matters might be easily settled by a Treaty of Commerce, and by it what is desired more easily obtained than by any other way. I told him that I did not find the King my master averse from hearkening to such a Treaty, but till that could be agreed upon he desired that his subjects might enjoy those privileges which have been granted and confirmed to them by several of the most Christian Kings, and which they had obtained for the service they had rendered this nation. I suppose it will be indifferent to his Majesty whether the above-mentioned privileges be assured to his subjects by a new Treaty or confirmed to them by an Arrêt of this Council of State, but I must own that I believe the end will sooner be obtained by the former method. I met yesterday accidentally Mons^r. Balatti, who told me that since I had last spoken to him he had been considering of what I had represented to him by his Majesty's order, and that tho' he had heard nothing from the Princes his masters concerning it since his being here, yet he had called to mind some things which might perhaps have given to them some subject of dissatisfaction which he would impart to me as a friend, and not as a minister. One was that he did not hear that his Majesty had returned the congratulatory compliment which had been made to him in their name, upon his happy deliverance from the late horrid conspiracy, either by Mr. Skelton, his minister, or by any other hand. Another was that he did not know whether or not his Majesty had returned an answer to a letter of notification which the Prince of Hanover had written to him upon his marriage Monsieur d'Avaux is now said to disavow that he had ever made any proposition to those of Amsterdam concerning a defensive league to be made with the States General, but notwithstanding it is very certain that he hath done it, and I have good reasons to believe that he still negotiateth it underhand. His Majesty will have greater light concerning this from Mr. Chudleigh if he be gone for Holland than I can possibly give him from this place Mons^r. de Bethune is said to have succeeded above expectation in his late negotiation in Poland; that King is said to be entirely regained to the French interest by the promise of great sums of money, a considerable part of which is already returned, and an assurance of this King's assistance towards the advancing of the Prince his son to the throne of that kingdom after the death of his father, it having been insinuated that the Emperor will certainly promote the interest of the Duke of Lorraine The Ambassador of Venice had yesterday audience of this King, in which in the name of his Republic he acquainted him with the taking of the fortress and of the Island of St. Maura by the Venetian fleet. The conquest is of some consequence, because that Island is situated betwixt those of Zant and of Corfu, and was the great harbour of pirates who invested those seas. He also informed his most Christian Majesty that the Venetian army had approached the terra firma, where it was to make a descent and to engage a body of 3,000 Turks that had appeared on that side to give some succour to the fortress of St. Maura. This King leaveth Versailles upon Monday and goes towards Chambort. The book of Gregorio Leti, called Il teatro Britannico, for which his Majesty ordered him to withdraw from England, hath appeared here within these few days, having been printed at Amsterdam in 5 volumes in octavo. I do not find that it is sold here by authority, but copies of it are dispersed privately, one of which is come to my hands.

1684, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness (the Duke of York). I have presumed at the earnest request of the bearer hereof, Mr. Monroe, humbly to address to your Highness in his behalf. He hath long endeavoured to obtain justice from this Court upon a great and inhumane violence acted upon several of his Majesty's subjects some time since by some privateers of Cherbourg, with the particulars of which he shall acquaint your Highness if he may have the honour of an audience. His Majesty's ministers here have been charged with frequent orders to demand justice in this case, and myself amongst the rest have made all possible instances for obtaining of it; but hitherto without any effect. A very disadvantageous sentence having been given in the affair in the year 1633, his Majesty did lately command me to demand a review of that sentence, which hath been absolutely refused, so that the said Monroe and the parties concerned with him have no other recourse than to the protection of his Majesty, and to the favour of your Royal Highness, to which I take the liberty humbly to recommend him. The case of two Irish merchants will also merit your Highnesses compassion; their ship and goods having been taken by a privateer of Dunkerque, and contrary to all right just now condemned here.

1684, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—Tho' I have some days since communicated to your lordship the answer which I received to the affair of Mr. Monroe, yet I cannot refuse at his request to give your lordship a more particular account of what hath passed here relating to it. In pursuance of his Majesty's orders transmitted to me by your lordship I put the memorial into hands of Mons^r. de Croissy, of which I enclose the copy.—He gives an account of what he did, but M. de Croissy told him the King could not by any means grant a revision of a sentence so solemnly given.—Your lordship will be pleased to acquaint his Majesty with the substance of the answer given in this affair. The wrong done to the English merchants is great, and the injustice is crying. I hope some way will at length be found of righting them.

1684, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—Recommends to his care the case of Mr. Monroe.—It is very observable that in this case the violence acted upon the people of the ship taken by the privateers of Cherbourg hath been thought here so great and so inhumane that the Sieurs Beaumont, who were men of quality and relations to the Mareschal of Belfonds, who took the English vessel, were condemned to be beheaded, but they fled and are still banished; the interpreter was condemned to be broken alive upon the wheel, which was executed in rigour upon him, and the judge of the place to be hanged, as he actually was; and yet after all the effects of the merchants, his Majesty's subjects, were never yet restored, but are found good prize, and I believe they would be willing to hang as many more as they have done, provided that that might give satisfaction. A case parallel to this is just now depending; one Duarte, a jeweller of Antwerp, who has been for these many years jeweller to his Majesty, and is in the roll of his domestiques, was robbed about 11 or 12 months since by his servant, who carried away a considerable quantity with him of jewels and gold. Duarte pursueth him as far as Cambray, and taketh him there with the jewels and gold about him. The magistrate of the place seizeth upon the jewels, under pretence of securing them for the owner when he should prove them his own, putteth the malefactor in prison, condemneth him immediately upon the proofs brought against him to be hanged, which sentence was executed upon him. Mons^r. Duarte demands his jewels and goods of the magistrate of Cambray; the answer was, that he being the subject of a Prince who had declared war against the most Christian King the jewels and gold did belong to his most Christian Majesty, and that he had given them to the Mayor of Cambray; that justice had been done in hanging the criminal, and that he was to expect no other. Mons^r. Duarte applieth himself to his Majesty, who sent me his orders to endeavour to obtain right for him as his domestique, but tho' Mons^r. de Croissy did own to me that if he had been judge he would have ordered the restitution of the jewels at the same time that he had condemned the malefactor, yet he told me that they had been given to the Mayor of Cambray, that Duarte was the subject of a Prince who was enemy to the King his master, and that therefore restitution could not be ordered. Mons^r. de Louvois hath appeared in the thing, and therefore no other justice is to be expected.

1684, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I did some days since acquaint your lordship that his most Christian Majesty had appointed the chancellor, Mons^r. de Croissy, Monsieur de Seignelay and Mons^r. le Pelletier, commissioners, to examine and to judge of the affair of the English vessel lately taken by a privateer of Dunkirk, and carried in thither. The said commissioners did accordingly meet and examine, as they say, the affair with all its circumstances to the bottom, and the answer which I am to report to your lordship, and which was sent to me yesterday by Mons^r. de Seignelay is this, that the affair of the English vessel taken by the Armateur of Dunkirk having been examined by the commissioners named by the King his master for that effect, the ship hath been judged a good prize, and is declared to be confiscate to the profit of the Armateur, which judgment hath been founded particularly upon the declaration which the King our master himself hath made, viz., that every vessel which hath no passport shall be accounted good prize. I must own to your lordship that I think this one of the most unjust sentences that was ever given in any case; for besides the several proofs which we have made by authentique pieces upon oath and attested by French notaries that the ship was of English fabric and that that and the cargo belonged and was consigned to his Majesty's subjects, we have produced the passport given by the English Consul of the Groyne in Galicia, attested by Mr. Peepes, which is the only passport which the parties concerned could have, it being impossible that they should know anything there of the above-mentioned declaration. I enclose a copy of the memorial which I presented to this King upon this affair, which will fully inform your lordship of all the particulars relating to it, so that I shall omit the repeating of them in this letter, and only add that I have not omitted any endeavour by which I could hope to obtain justice for the parties concerned.

1684, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—The bearers hereof are two of his Majesty's subjects, Irish merchants, who have had the misfortune to fall into the hands of a privateer of Dunkirk, and to have their ship and merchandises carried in thither. The said privateer hath found so great protection here from Mons^r. de Seignelay that the ship and goods are just now declared to be confiscate to the profit of the pirate, . . . I humbly beg your lordship's interposition with the King for his favour and protection to those poor injured people.

1684, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Dartmouth.—Recommends the case of Mr. Monroe and of the two Irish merchants.

1684, Sept. 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Middleton.—I did receive the honour of your lordship's by Mr. Aikeman. I shall take all possible care in the affair of the Scotch privileges, and not be wanting to serve Mr. Aikeman in anything which may lie in my power here. I have already delivered a memorial upon the subject of the privileges, but I can expect no answer to it till the return of this Court from Chambort. Your Lordship will now give me leave, as your old friend and servant, to congratulate with you, as I do most heartily, your late promotion to that honourable charge. Your lordship enters into affairs in a very favourable conjuncture, the peace being now concluded, which will make the fatigue of your place, at least for some time, not so great as it would have been otherwise.

1684, Sept. 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The courier of Spain who, as I acquainted your lordship in my last was stopped at Valenciennes by order of this King, hath been released, so that we may hope soon to see the ratifications betwixt France and Spain exchanged. In the mean time Mons^r. de la Trousse and Mons^r. de Boufflers are still in the country about Gande with their flying camps, and they will continue there till the exchange be made. This Monsieur de Louvois declared the last night at Meudon to the Baron Delval, and added that the troops of the King his master should not only stay in the Spanish territories till after the ratifications were exchanged, but that they should not be withdrawn till an entire satisfaction were given to all the demands of his most Christian Majesty without the diminution of one penny, and without compensation for the pretensions which the King of Spain might have upon the subjects of France for contributions demanded. . . . The body of the late Cardinal Mazarin, which had been deposited since his death in the Church of Vincennes, was brought the other day to the College des Quatre nations, where it will be interred when all shall be ready for the funeral ceremonies. That College is going to be repaired, and to be regulated according to its institution, and the Doctors of the Sorbonne are to have the direction of it. It is the present Chancellor of France who payeth his respect to the memory of that minister, the late Mons^r. Colbert, who had greater obligations to him, having had no care to see it performed. . . .

1684, Sept. 20th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Countess of Carlisle.—About the burial of her brother Howard.

A letter of the same date from Lord Preston to his aunt. On the same subject as the last addressed to Lady Carlisle.

1684, Sept. 20th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. Three of the Marquis de Grana's couriers addressed hither to the Baron Delval having been stopped the last week at Valenciennes, the Baron obtained a passeport from Mons^r. de Louvois for one of his servants to go to Bruxelles, and to return, who brought him upon Monday at night the King of Spain's ratification of the Treaty of Ratisbone. Yesterday morning he accompanied the Pope's Nonce to Mons^r. de Croissy's and there shewed him the Act of ratification, and told him that he was ready to exchange it, adding that the Spanish provinces in the Netherlands had not only given severally their obligations to the several intendants of France in those parts, but had also given for hostages some of the most considerable subjects of those countries to assure the payment of the arrears of contributions demanded by this King, so that he hoped no difficulty could be made as to the exchange of the ratifications as to the withdrawing of the French troops from those countries.—Mons^r. de Croissy made some technical objections which L^d. Preston details. The Nuncio, the Dutch ambassador and L^d. Preston agreed against them. . . . Upon the subject of the Scotch privileges, Mons^r. de Croissy told me that he did not find the King his master at all disposed to grant a general confirmation of them, because the causes were ceased for which they had at first been accorded. I then asked if any resolution had been taken in relation to the taking of the 50 sols. per tun imposed upon the Scotch vessels trading hither, and I endeavoured by particular instances to make him comprehend how much the trade of wines, salt, brandy, and coals had been diminished since that duty was laid on and exacted from the Scotch subjects, and urged at the same time that the French in Scotland were still treated upon the foot with the natives. He told me that his most Christian Majesty was resolved to have the opinion of some merchants whom he was willing to gather to consult about the commerce of this kingdom before he would come to any resolution in that matter, and he promised me to represent in Council to this King what I had laid before him concerning it, which is all the account which I can yet give to your lordship of that affair. The Elector of Cologne is going to resume entirely the government of the city of Liege, and they have already begun to rebuild the citadel. . . . The Venetian ambassador showed yesterday letters from Vienna at Versailles, which say that the Comte Lesly had with the army which he commanded beaten a considerable body of Turks, which was assembled near the bridge of Essak with a design to succour Buda, from whence and from the junction of the troops of Bavaria to those of the Emperor it is conjectured that that place cannot hold out long.

1684, Sept. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Johnston.—The ratifications of the Treaty of Ratisbone by this King and the King of Spain were exchanged at Versailles upon Thursday, as I suppose the Emperor is at Ratisbone before this time. . . .

1684, Sept. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I may now assure your lordship that the truce is made betwixt France and Spain, the ratifications having been exchanged upon Thursday last, and the orders given for the recalling of the French troops from Flanders, and I believe out of the other Spanish dominions, it being, however, understood that the obligations and hostages shall first be given for the arrears of contributions due to France. The Baron Delval delivered into the hands of Mons^r. de Croissy the ratifications of Spain, and he told him that the act of ratification of the King his master wanted only the seal, and that he had sent it to Chaville to the Chancellor to have it put to it, but that it should be sent that afternoon to the Nonce, who should deliver it to him, which was accordingly done. After the delivery of the ratification of Spain, Monsieur Delval saw his most Christian Majesty, who told him that tho' the Act of ratification of the King his master was not in form, yet he was willing to accept it, and to pass over those exceptions which were very justly made against it, that the sincerity of his intentions for the re-establishment of the peace and of the repose of Christendom might appear to all the world; and that on his side he was resolved inviolably to observe the truce, which he hoped the King of Spain would do also. The ratification of the Emperor and the Empire will be very suddenly exchanged at Ratisbone, if it be not done already; there was also in that some faults which have been corrected. Thus my lord the great work is at an end which hath been so long negotiated, and it is very glorious for his Majesty to have contributed more than any Prince of Europe towards the perfecting of it. It is only now to be wished that it may be durable. . . . The French fleet is thought to be at present before Genoa, where the people were extremely divided, and it is thought that that division may increase when they are fully informed that Spain hath by the Treaty of Ratisbone abandoned the interests of that Republic. . . . Mons^r. Delval hath desired me to enclose this letter for Don Pedro de Ronquillo, which I take the liberty to do.

1684, Sept. 25th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I having at present the affair of the Scotch privileges and two or three others upon my hands, concerning which I have sometime since received his Majesty's orders, have thought fit to follow this Court to Chambort to solicit them. I hope to be here again about the middle of the next week, but before my return I shall write to your lordship from Blois. Since the departure of his most Christian Majesty nothing hath happened here worthy of your lordship's remark, more than that a courier hath arrived from Mons^r. de Crecy, who hath brought hither the ratification of the Emperor and the Empire, which was exchanged at Ratisbone, and is gone with it to Chambort: he bringeth advise from Vienna that the Turks have abandoned the bridge of Esseek, which maketh us believe here that they have no more thoughts of succouring of Buda.

1684, Oct. 1st, s. n., Blois.—The same to the same.—Since my arrival here I have been at Chambort, from whence I am just now returned. I found the Court there not very well full, his most Christian Majesty having choosed and named the greatest part of those who have attended him in this voyage. There arrived with him in his own coach, Monseign^r. le Dauphine, Madame la Dauphine, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, the Princesse of Conti, the Duchesse of Arpajou, the Mareschalle of Rochefort, and the Marquise of Maintenon. The diversions of the place are hunting, balls, and comedies, with which his most Christian Majesty seemeth so much satisfied that he resolveth to continue here till the 12th of the next month, when he removeth to Fountainbleau. A courier is arrived here from Vienna with the advise of the junction of all the Bavarian troops with the army of the Duke of Lorraine before Buda, which giveth grounds here to believe that that place will not hold out long, if it have not already been surrendered. I advertised your lordship in my last that the ratification of the Emperor and of the Empire was arrived, I can now assure you that it is approved of and accepted here. The matter of the contributions demanded from the Spanish Netherlands is adjusted with the Marquis de Grana, some longer time is accorded to the inhabitants of those countries for the payment of them, and the French troops are now marching out from thence. The discourse of a general peace to be treated is begun, and it is said that this King seemeth inclined that Ratisbone should be the place for the Congress. . . .

1684, Oct 4th, s. n., Blois.—The same to the same.—In my last to your lordship from this place I acquainted you with the orders which Mons^r. de Chassignet had received from the Emperor relating to the affair of the Duke of Lorraine. I am now to let you know that the other day he had a conference with Mons^r. de Croissy upon the subject, in which Mons^r. de Chassignet, having expos'd to him what he had in command to offer received only from him an answer in general terms, which was that the King his master was so lawfully possess of Lorraine since the Treaty of Nimegue, and that that province did at present make so essential a part of his estates, that tho' he did not yet know his sentiments upon that subject, he could assure him before hand that neither himself nor any other of his ministers could be so much against his interests as to persuade him to the restitution, &c. . . . Madame de Montespan, during the stay of this Court at Chambort, is gone to visit her sister the Abbess of Fontevraud, and hath carried with her her two daughters and the Admiral her son; reports are running here that she is gone with a design to continue in that convent, but I find no grounds for them . . . The Genoese continuing still to refuse to give the satisfaction which this King demandeth from them, he seemeth resolv'd to endeavour to oblige them to it, taking himself to be disengaged from his word, and to be free to attack them openly, since the King of Spain hath not ratified that article of the Treaty of Ratisbone which relateth to them; in order to this they are equipping at Toulon the galiotes à bombes, which are to join the French fleet. . . .

1684, Oct. 10th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—Your lordship will receive this at the same time with another of the same date, which I had sent to the posthouse before I could give to your lordship the account of that which maketh that subject of yesterday. Mons^r. de Chassignet, who was formerly secretary to the Comte de Mansfeldt, and who hath been since continued with the character of secretary of the Emperor, arrived here this night. He came to visit me, and shewed me a letter to him from the Emperor, in which he ordereth him to represent to the ministers of this King that Mons^r. de Crey, having refused to hearken to any proposition for the re-establishment of the Duke of Lorraine in his countries by the late Treaty concluded at Ratisbone, had assured the commissioners of the Emperor there by the order of the King his master that so soon as that Treaty should be finished his most Christian Majesty would most willingly admit him to expose his pretensions, and to offer what he could produce for the verifying of them. It hath given occasion to his Imperial Majesty will think fit of restoring him to the possession of those estates which have been so long detained from him, and also to send his orders to Mons^r. de Chassignet to demand in his Imperial Majesty's name that justice may be done to the Duke of Lorraine, and that his right may be speedily considered of. Mr. de Chassignet also told me that he had been advised from Vienna that the Comte de Thun would be ordered to desire his Majesty's concurrence and offices in favour of the Duke of Lorraine. He goeth to-morrow to Chambort, and I believe that I may be able by the next post to give your lordship an account how his offices have been received, and of what answer he hath had.

1684, Oct. 11th, s. n., Paris.—The same (to the same). I am to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's letters of the 15th and of the 18th of September; the latter met me at Orleans, from whence I had return'd to Chambort to have executed the orders in it, if all things relating to the affairs of Flanders had not (as I inform'd your lordship from Blois) been adjusted and settled before, and the French troops actually retired out of those provinces. I shall as your lordship instructs me take care to pursue the directions which I have formerly received concerning the violence acted upon his Majesty's subjects at Port Nelson, and also solicit that orders may be sent to the Governor of Canada not to continue his hostilities against them there tho' notwithstanding the plausible answer which I received to my last offices passed upon this subject, I am under fears that Mons^r. de la Barre will scarce be ordered to quit the possession of what he hath so unjustly seiz'd in Hudson's Bay; but that he may rather by sending more forces thither, as he intimateth in his letter to the Governor of Boston, endeavour to assure his conquest . . . Mons^r. de Louvois arrived here on Friday at night, and went the next day to Versailles to give orders for the repairing of the beams and roof of the great gallery there, which is in a very ill condition, and for which the late Mons^r. Colbert is very much blamed. The greatest part of the general officers of the army of Flanders, and of that of Catalonia, are already return'd to this Court, which will certainly be at Fontainebleau upon Saturday next, where the Pope's Nuncio will have an audience upon orders which he hath received the other day by a courier from Rome. It is believed that he hath something agreeable to offer, relating to the affair of Genoa. It is also thought that the Envoy of that Republic will be soon enlarged from the Bastille . . . The Chevalier de Talon who was at Hamburg with a design to return hither, having received orders from this Court for that purpose, is gone to Stockholm under pretext of his particular affairs; what he is to negotiate is yet a mystery, but it is said that his voyage is made with the consent and privacy of the Court of Denmark.

1684, Oct. 11th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Johnstone . . . Nothing in the world can be more curious than my Lord of Argyle's cypher, and nothing can be more exact than your description of it: and then all the accounts which you give, it is a pleasure to me to read them, which maketh me beg the continuance of the correspondence. I am just now returned from Chambort, where no business was to be done. This King and his Court being wholly intent upon the diversions of the country there. It will be no news to tell you that the ratifications of the Emperor and Empire are accepted and exchange'd here, as well as that with Spain. The discourse is now of a general congress for concluding a peace, and Ratisbone or Nuremberg seem to be thought of here for the place. I wish this truce may be durable, but I fear when our fortifications are finished here, and our finances a little recruited, we may think fit to begin a German's quarrel; this time will shew. I have nothing more worthy of your remark . . . P.S. If you have a mind to have the Gazettes of Paris and a Gazette à la main, which may sometimes amuse you, I will order it to be sent weekly exempt from the charge of postage.

1684, Oct. 11th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Bridgman.—I am extremely glad to find that the King and Court are returned so safely to London, and that they have been so well diverted at Winchester. I hope his Majesty will have the same satisfaction at Newmarket, with a speedy and as safe a return. . . .

1684, Oct. 11th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—His most Christian Majesty is expected this night at Fontainebleau, where he will continue till the 15th of the next month. The voyage to Chambort hath been fatal to several people, for besides the hurt which the Prince de la Roche sur Yon and the Duke of Lude have received by falling from their horses, the Mareschal of Schomberg is now ill of a fever which he hath contracted by a fall received in hunting, and the Marquis de Liancours, second son to the Duke de la Rochefaucault, hath had his arm broke by the same accident. Madame is going to join this Court at Fontainebleau, but Mons^r. doth not find himself well enough to go thither; he cometh this day to Paris, and intendeth to pass his time here and at St. Cloud till this King's return to Versailles. . . . This King is going to establish at Noisy le Secq, a place distant about 2 leagues from Versailles, a communauté, where an hundred and fifty young women of good quality shall be maintained, who shall have wherewith either to marry themselves from thence, or to make themselves religious, as their inclinations shall lead them. Madame du Maintenon is to have the direction of this establishment. The ministers of the Protestant Church of Rochelle, who have appeal'd from the sentence given against them in that town to the Parliament of Paris are arrived, and are sent to the prison of the Conciergerie. Their affair will be judg'd so soon as the Parliament shall assemble; but I believe they will scarce gain their process . . . The affair of Genoa is the subject of the audience which the Pope's Nuncio is to have this next week at Fontainebleau. That Republic seemeth now disposed to consent to almost all the demands which this King maketh, it only seemeth unwilling to yield to that of breaking with the Spaniards, because of the considerable effects which its subjects have within the estates of his Catholic Majesty. The Nonce acquainted Mons^r. de Croissy lately by letter that the Envoy of Genoa had now received permission from his Republic to oblige himself not to leave France without the consent of his most Christian Majesty, provided that he may be enlarged from his imprisonment, which was all that was demanded at first; but Mons^r. de Croissy hath return'd for answer that the King his master is willing to grant his enlargement from the Bastile if he will give his assurance in writing not to go out of Paris without his leave, and if the Nonce will be garant of this, which he hath refused to be without the leave of the Pope. I take liberty to inclose an account which I received the last night relating to the affair of Genoa from a very good hand; it is very particular, and your lordship hath it as it came to me.

1684, Oct. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir G. Fletcher. At my return from Chambort, whither I have been obliged to follow this King in his late voyage, I received your last very kind letter The truce being now accepted this place affords very little worthy of your knowledge, and I thank God I am a little more now at my ease than I was when the conjuncture was more busy. I suspect that this peace will not continue long; however, it giveth a breathing time to the Spaniards and opportunity to other Princes of Europe to consider of the measures which they have to take for preventing further growth of the power of this monarch. I hope they will lay hold of the occasion P.S. The affairs of the North are accommodated, or are in a fair way to be so; this King continues firm not to suffer Sweden to be attacked by the K. of Danemarke, Elector of Brandebourg, and the Princes of the house of Lunenbourg, as had been projected by them. The Prince of Orange is like also to come to an understanding with the town of Amsterdam, as we have certain advice from thence. This you will imagine is not unwelcome to this Court.

1684, Oct. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I will not omit to acknowledge your letter of the 2nd instant, and also to acquaint you that I shall go very early to-morrow morning to Fontainebleau in order to execute the orders conveyed by it. If I can receive any answer in time I shall communicate it to your lordship by Saturday's post from thence; but if I have none I shall defer writing till my return to this place. I enclose the copy of a letter which I received the other day from Mons^r. Balatti, in answer to what I represented to him some time by his Majesty's order The war with the common-wealth of Genoa will not hinder the exact payment of the rents to those of that nation who have passed their money formerly in this hôtel de Ville, orders having been given for paying them regularly as formerly The Duke of Mazarine is lately gone into Bretany, and is accompanied with 12 Jesuits; his zeal obligeth him to travaile through all the low parts of that country with a design to convert people by the assistance of those Fathers. There have been great intrigues on foot in the Court of Savoye since the marriage of that Duke. The credit of Madame Royall his mother diminisheth daily. The Abbe d'Estrales, this King's ambassador there, having desired leave to return, Mons^r. de Breteuil, who hath for some time been Envoyé of France in the Court of Mantua is design'd for his successor. We say here that the Prince of Orange will soon have a better understanding with the town of Amsterdam than he hath had formerly, and that his late reception in his passage thro' it to an hunting house, which he hath in those quarters, by the magistrates at the gate of the town, and the other civilities which were paid him there upon that occasion give great hopes to his friends of a speedy accommodation. It is also said that Mons^r. d'Avaux did return not at all satisfied from his last voyage to that place, but of this your lordship will be better informed from other hands.

1684, Oct. 21st, s. n., Fontainebleau.—The same to the same.—Since my arrival here I have seen Mons^r. de Croissy, and have communicated to him what I have in command from his Majesty relating to the affairs of Flanders. To-morrow I shall have audience of his most Christian Majesty upon the same subject, and I shall be enabled by the next post to convey his answer to your lordship. Mons^r. de Croissy told me that Mons^r. de Barillon had written upon the same business by the last post, and that he should by this let him know his most Christian Majesty's resolutions concerning it, so that your lordship will know the substance of what I can impart to you before my letter will arrive. The Pope's Nonce hath had audience here upon Sunday last of this King upon the affair of Genoa; he hath not found him at all inclinable to favour that Republic: his most Christian Majesty having declared to him (tho' the audience was private) with a voice more than ordinarily elevated, and audible by those who were at the greatest distance, that he was absolutely resolved that that Doge should come, and in his person make the satisfaction which he required and demanded. The Nonce beginning to reply and offering to reason upon the matter, and to renew his instances in favour of the Genoese, this King told him with a smiling countenance that if they did not find their account in this they might let it alone and rely upon the protection of the Spaniards, but that he should not change his sentiments, and that he would admit of no temperament. For what relateth to the Marquis de Manin Envoyé of Genoa, and at present prisoner in the Bastile, it only now dependeth upon him to have his liberty immediately, giving a writing signed by himself into the Pope's Nonce's hands, by which he shall engage himself not to go 15 leagues from Paris without the permission of this King. It is expected here by the Italian ministers and affirmed confidently that his Majesty shall interpose his offices with the most Christian King in favour of the Genoese; but I suppose he will not think it fit to expose himself to the hazard of a refusal upon their account We have yet no account here of the taking the town of Buda, on the contrary, it is feared that the season being so much advanced the siege may be raised; the Duke of Loraine is said to be in want of everything. The conduct of the Comte de Staremberg before Buda is much reprehended, he having done several things contrary to the advice and content of the Duke of Loraine: it is said here that he hath been accused of ignorance of his charge, and of brutality in his behaviour, and that if it had not been in consideration of his merit for defending of Vienna he had certainly been arrested for his miscarriages and ill conduct. Monseign^r. le Dauphin having been yesterday hunting the wild boar in this forest several persons run great risk of being wounded; eight horses are wounded, that of the Prince de la Roche sur von very sorely, and that of the Comte de Roussy had his leg quite taken away by the tusk of one of those boars; four were killed, 3 of which were of an extraordinary greatness.

1684, Oct. 25th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I am to acknowledge your lordship's letter of the 8th instant from Newmarket, which conveyeth to me his Majesty's commands concerning Mons^r. Pigou; I shall not fail to execute them with the first convenience. This King gave me audience at Fontainebleau upon Sunday last, when I acquainted him that Don Pedro Ronquillo, the ambassador of Spain in the Court of England, having lately by a memorial represented to the King my master the deplorable condition of the inhabitants of the Spanish low countries which rendereth it impossible for them to pay the great sums demanded by his most Christian Majesty for the arrears of contributions within the time prefixed for it, tho' the Marquis de Grana had consented to it by an inevitable necessity, and to oblige the French troops to go sooner out of the said provinces, the King my master had commanded me to communicate to his most Christian Majesty what had been represented to him by the said ambassador, and at the same time to intreat him instantly in his name to consent to a prolongation of the term, that so the said provinces might find means to satisfy the demands of his most Christian Majesty by the payment of the sums agreed upon; and also that nothing might arrive on that side to discompose the peace of Europe, which was of late so happily re-established by the conclusion of the late truce. He answered that the Spaniards made it their business to cry out against him and to represent his proceedings all ill and unjust in all the Courts of Christendom; that they had done it more in England than in any other place, and had never ceased to importune the King my master with their ill grounded complaints; that he had already enough showed his bounty and charity to the subjects of Spain in the Low countries by having remitted to them 3 millions of livres and more due to him, which example he believed was very rare and had scarce been practised, but that nothing would content them, and that they were not to be dealt with by any other way than that of constraint; that in this case he found himself in prudence obliged to hold them to what was agreed upon, and that he could not consent to any delay of the time of payment. I took the liberty to reinforce what I had before said to his most Christian Majesty by telling him that besides the obligation which the King my master would have to him if he should consent to the prolongation of the term at his request it would be an action worthy of his glory and of his generosity to have compassion upon so many unhappy persons and their families who were not at all responsible for the conduct of their Prince or his ministers, if it had not been such as it ought to have been towards his most Christian Majesty, and I did humbly intreat him to consider that as it was glorious to him to have consented to the re-establishing of the peace and repose of Christendom in a conjuncture when he was in a condition to have carried on the war with success so it would be no less to him to lighten the burden under which so many unfortunate persons must unavoidably sink if they did not soon feel the effects of his generosity and compassion. He replied that those people had already felt, and to a considerable degree, the effects of both, and that his generosity might go too far, that he was never more satisfied than when he could do a pleasure to the King my master, but that in this case he thought it prudence not to pass from what had been agreed upon, because the Spaniards would never be weary of asking graces if they found them to come readily, nor cease to importune both the King my master and himself, tho' they had dealt well neither with the one nor the other. I have had some discourse also with Mons^r. de Croissy upon this subject, tho' not much, because he is extremely ill of the gout . . . A part of those troops which were in Flanders (as I advertised your lordship before) is march'd into Franche Comté, from whence they may pass into Italy if the affair of Genoa be not soon accommodated; that Envoyé continueth still in the Bastille, the Pope's Nonce making difficulty to warrant the writing which the said Envoyé is to put into his hand, because he hath no order to receive it . . . Mons^r. du Quesne is said to be also arrived at Toulon with the men of war, where they also soon expect the Chevalier de Tourville, and orders are sent thither for disarming. The last letters from thence of the 17th instant say that the powder house, at the distance of about 2 leagues from Toulon, had taken fire by accident and was blown up, there being in it 1,800 quintals of powder; the effect of the blow was felt at Toulon, it having violently shaken the whole town . . . The Ambassadors of Siam do not yet appear nor will have their audience till the return of this Court to Versailles. I cannot accompany my letter by this post with any thing out of Germany; they discourse here so differently of the affair of Buda that one doth not know what to believe of it. It is reported here that the Serasquier Bassa did, at the time that he was engaged by the Duke of Lorraine, send by a private a strong body of horse towards Buda, and that 14,000 of them had entered the town, having forced their way into the town and cut to pieces 2 regiments of Infanterie which opposed them in the trenches; if this be so the siege of that place is undoubtedly raised. The Baron Delval is expected here within few days to endeavour to remove the difficulties concerning the rend'ring of Courtray and of Dixmude. It hath been lately insinuated by Mons^r. de Croissy to the Nonce that the King his master expects that the Genoese should satisfy the Comte de Fiesque upon the pretension which he hath upon that Republic, he told him also that the affair might be terminated by judges, provided that they would in the mean time give to him an 100,000 crowns.

1684, Oct. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Grahme.—I have enclosed letters for the Duke, Lord Chief Justice, H. Thynne, Mr. Scrimshire and Mr. Jackson, all which I have sent unsealed that you may dispose of them after you have read and sealed them. I have also this day sent an admirable manuscript concerning the laws of France as a present to my Lord Keeper, with a letter to him by a particular hand, because you have told me before that he hath been kind to me.

(1684), Oct. 28th, Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Chief Justice.—. . . I received a letter lately from one Mr. Foster, a justice of peace in Cumberland, and a neighbour and tenant of mine. I do not know the particulars of his case, but he saith he hath been misrepresented to your lordship; if he hath been any way wanting in his duty to the King, or hath not executed the laws against dissenters or other delinquents as he ought to have done, I do not pretend to intercede for him, but if there be nothing of this, and if there be any room for the showing to him favour, I do humbly recommend him it.

s. d., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Thynne.—Complimentary and congratulations on his Majesty's late favour

s. d., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Gwynne.—. . . We are all surprised at the daily alterations in our Court, and with the noise of more expected; if all turn to the advantage of the King's affairs particular men's interests are less to be considered. I assure you I drink my dear Lord Dartmouth's health and yours as often as you can drink mine, but I hope the time will come when we may drink it together in England.

1684, Oct. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The letters from England which should have arrived here yesterday are still owing. Mons^r. de Louvois is now at Versailles to hasten the repairs there; after his return to Fontainebleau the day of this King's departure will be fixed, for yet there is nothing certain concerning it. In the mean time his most Christian Majesty diverteth himself much there, passing a great part of the day in hunting and the evening at play at the Comedie or at balls . . . Mons^r. de Quesne the younger hath taken a Felucca upon the coast of Genoa, and with it a courier of that Republic with the dispatches of that Senate to the King of Spain. They were sent to Fontainebleau upon Wednesday last, and the contents of them are yet kept private . . . The news of the entrée of a considerable succour of men and of amunitions into Buda is confirmed from all hands. The Duke of Lorraine hath been of opinion to raise the siege, but the Elector of Bavaria is obstinate to continue it, which hath made the counsel of the Emperor resolve to send a reinforcement of 6,000 men to please that Prince, tho' the hopes of taking the place are lessened. This is what is said at this Court, but the truth is that the reports are so various here concerning that affair that we do not well know what to believe. The account which I enclose from Vienna of the 12th instant seemeth not to make the matter so desperate . . . I enclose, my lord, a copy of the arrest for the condemnation of the merchandizes in a vessel taken off of Ostend belonging to his Majesty's subjects by a privateer of Dunkirk. I have some time since written to your lordship upon this subject. You will observe that the ship is ordered to be restored to the owner, but the cargo is condemned notwithstanding the clear proofs that all belonged to his Majesty's subjects. I have done what possibly I could do in this matter; I moved this King himself in it upon Sunday last, and delivered the petition of the owners to him for a revision of the sentence, but I have yet had no answer. I do assure your lordship that the injustice is manifest and crying, and the case is very worthy of his Majesty's consideration and resentment, the poor owners relying now wholly upon his assistance. I hope your lordship will have orders to speak home to Mons^r. Barillon upon this subject, that he may represent it hither, and your lordship may assure him that there have been very foul practises by some in this Court relating to this affair, which may, if it be thought fit, laid open.

(Autograph.) 1684, Oct. 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Keeper North.—The bearer hereof, Mr. Gosnald, being to pass into England, I think fit to take that opportunity of conveying safely by him a manuscript to your lordship, which is much esteemed here, and very difficultly to be obtained. It is a proces verbal of a conference betwixt that King's Commissioners and the Deputies of the Parliament of Paris, for the examination of titles proposed for the composition of an ordinance for proceeding in criminal causes. It is a very delicate part of the law of that nation which maketh me believe that the communications of it may not be disagreeable to your lordship who is so knowing in that of your own. Your lordship will, I hope, be pleased to give it a place in your cabinet, and I shall only beg at my return into England the liberty of taking a copy of it to remain my own. I have collected several other pieces here which regard the finances, the policy, and the laws of this nation which are not easily to be come by, of which, if your lordship pleaseth to have copies, you shall most freely take them at my return home. I send to your lordship the printed ordinance also, which was the product of the abovesaid conference. . . .

1684, Nov. 1st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. Being just returned from Fontainebleau, I have only time by reason of the departure of the post to acquaint your lordship that this King doth now make several additional demands to his former from the Republic of Genoa. The first is that it shall disarm those 6 gallees the arming of which hath given so much cause of complaint to this Court. The next is that it shall dismiss the Spanish garrison at present within the city; and the last is that it should positively restore the Comte de Fargus to his estate situated in its territories if he can make out his title well to it; but that since it is an affair which will require much discussion, the Republic shall pay him down (as I intimated to your lordship before) the sum of 100,000 crowns. This King hath also ordered Mons^r. de Croissy to acquaint the Pope's Nuncio that if the Doge and four of the principal senators of Genoa do not come soon hither, that he shall prefix a time for their coming. . . .

Lord Preston to Sir N. Butler.—I shall not fail to do all that lieth in my power in the affair of Mr. Bankes, for besides the commands of the King and the justice of the cause, your recommendation of it must work much with me. I intend to go the next week to Fontainebleau, where I shall press the ministers upon it, and I shall endeavour to obtain as speedy an answer as I can. (Note by Lord Preston.) This was copied by Mr. Wake, my chaplain at Paris, now Dr. of Divinity, &c.

1684, Nov. 4th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. (Note in margin in Lord Preston's hand, "This is the hand of my Bror. Fargus Grahme.")—This King may continue all this month at Fontainebleau, because of the repairs that are making at Versailles. Monsieur de Louvois is gone thither again to hasten them. . . . The truce being at present established, this King doth not think fit to pay the same subsidies to his allies which he paid in the time of action. Those which the King of Denmark drew from hence are reduced to the half, so that instead of 400,000 of crowns he will now receive but 200 thousand, which is the occasion of the reforming of his troops. They seem, however, to be well satisfied with that King here, and are resolved to entertain amitie with him because the alliance is concluded for 10 years, and because they have always found him ready to second the design of France. They are not upon the same foot with the Elector of Brandebourg and the princes of the House of Lunenburg. . . . There are some advises from Poland, as if the Tartars had designed to make an irruption whilst the army of that crown was out of the kingdom; this may oblige the King of Poland to a speedy return. The accounts from Buda continue still to be uncertain; it was resolved to give a general assault to the place, since the entry of those 12 or 1,400 men mentioned in one of mine of which we are to expect the success till this time. They have had no other advice at this Court; the last letters from Vienna say that the Marquis of Baden was sent from the Emperor in diligence to the camp before Buda. It is believed here that he is to command in the place of the Duke of Lorraine, who is again indisposed, or at least, as they interpret here, feigneth to be so. I enclose a relation of what hath of late passed before Buda, which came to my hands but late the last night; it hath been copied in haste, so that I believe there may be many faults in it, tho' I hope they are only literal ones. It is ample and very authentique, coming from Mons^r. Bielke, who was ambassador of Sweden in this Court at my first arrival here, and who is at present a volunteer before Buda; if there be any suite of it I shall not fail to transport it to your lordship. The English letters which should have arrived yesterday are still due. P.S. I enclose a billet which is come to my hands just as I am closing my packet, so that I have not time to have what is material in it copied fair; I transmit it to your lordship full as it is, because of the accounts in it from Toulon and from Canada.

1684, Nov. 8th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. The great snows which have fallen here lately, and the likelihood of the continuance of the ill season, have obliged this King to shorten his stay at Fontainebleau, so that we are now to expect him upon the 15th instant at Versailles, tho' that place is at present not fit to receive him. Since the reform of the land forces a resolution hath been taken here of reforming those also of the sea, it being now no more necessary to entertain so great fleets. . . . A project of a ligue of association and of garantie upon the subject of the late truce lately proposed to the Estates General of the United Provinces by the House of Austria hath given some alarm here, but I perceive that Mons^r. d'Anaux doth give hopes that these estates will not hearken to it. . . . I enclose the freshest accounts from Germany, from Hungary, and from Venice. They seem yet to give hopes of the taking of Buda, tho' they say here that the illnesses of the season and the obstinacy of the defenders may yet break the measures of the Elector of Bavaria and of the Duke of Lorraine for the taking of that place. Mons^r. de Cressy, governor of the French colonie of St. Domingo, hath advised by his letter dated the later end of June last, that he had had advise about a month before by 3 Frenchmen who had passed to Jamaica that the English to the number of 500 were gone from thence to make a descente upon Panuco, which province covereth New Biscaye on the side of the Golfe of Mexico, and upon some part of the country lying upon the Rio Bravo, which is in Florida; if there be anything of this your lordship will have had an account of it from Sir Thomas Linch before this time. The English letters which should have arrived on Monday are not yet come in.

1684, Nov. 11th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The Pope's Nuncio hath again passed offices in favour of those of Genoa, but this King continueth resolved that their Doge shall come hither accompanied with 4 senators, and that they shall agree to his other propositions, and hath given them till the last day of the year to consider of them. We shall soon see what end this affair may have. The Spaniards use all endeavours to persuade that Republic not to submit itself to France; on the other hand, people being wearied with the interruption of their commerce and with the stay of the Spanish troops amongst them, maketh great complaints, and it is likely that if they were not disarmed they might oblige the senate by giving satisfaction to the demands of this King to put an end to their misery. . . . The dispute which the Duke d'Estrees hath lately had concerning a printer arrested within his quarter is not yet accommodated, his most Christian Majesty resolving not to yield at all in what relateth to the honours, franchises, and prerogatives of which his ambassadours have once been in possession, nor to consent to any change in the ceremoniale. . . . This King cometh on Wednesday to Versailles, Mons^r. de Louvois having been there since Tuesday to put all things in condition for his reception. The mists and the great snows which are fallen here have rendered Fontainebleau insupportable. The Regiment du Roy, which hath been encamped and which hath wrought all this summer till now at Versailles for the removing of an hill which offendeth the prospect of that castle, is decamped, and those of Dauphine, of La Ferté, and of Languedoc have relieved it. As they are at present ingenious here in finding out all ways to increase the finances, so amongst the rest one hath been proposed which will bring in considerable sums; it is that all officers of justice of this kingdom shall be admitted to the payment of the annual duty of the paulette as it is termed here, and by this means they shall assure their charges to their heirs. The paulette is the 60th part of the price of his office if it were to be sold, which every officer of justice in this Parliament and of the finances pay to this King at the beginning of every year, upon the consideration that within the year, he shall have liberty to dispose of his office. This duty was called la paulette, from one Paulet, a Secrétaire de la chambre du Roy, who about the beginning of this century invented and first proposed it, and it was authorised by an arrest of this Privy Council in the year 1604, and declared by the said arrêt that if any officer dieth without paying the paulette his office shall be lost to his heirs and forfeited to this crown. There arrived here some days since a French gentleman called Marlot, from Holland, who hath been long in the service of the Prince of Orange; he was sent to the Bastile on Wednesday last. The reason of his imprisonment is not yet known, but since he is a person who was 3 years since banished this kingdom and conducted to the frontier of it by one of this King's footmen, with defense never to return, it is probable that being come hither without permission he hath drawn this ill treatment upon himself. He is of Poitou, and one who is said to be very well qualified and to have long entertained great correspondence in this kingdom. I enclose the copy of another letter of the 9th of Oct., from Mons^r. Bielke, from before Buda, and another of the 24th of the same month, which I have just received, which your lordship will find giveth hopes of the taking of the place. I hope by the next post to send to your lordship a plan of the place. Our English letters which were expected yesterday fail again. P.S. I am told that the Baron Delval is coming to reside as Minister of Spain in this Court.

1684, Nov. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir John Worden.—I received yours yesterday with one inclosed for [from?] the Duke to the Duke of Mazarin. I have enquired after him, and I can find nobody that knoweth where he is. Some say he is preaching in Brittany and converting the Bas Bretons; others tell me he is gone towards Naples, but the Duchesse of Barillon hath addressed me to one who I believe will convey the letter safe. I shall not fail to take all imaginable care of it.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1684, Nov. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of London.—I have received your lordship's with one enclosed for Mons^r. Alix, which hath been delivered safely. I beg of your lordship to make no apology to me for any commands which you lay upon me, for there is no man upon earth who will execute them more readily than I shall. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Robson.—I have sent inclosed my bill of extraordinaries which you will deliver with the letter to my Lord of Sunderland after you have sealed it. I have also written to Sir S. Fox about the Duke of Northumberland's being with me so long, and for which the King promised to consider me, but as yet I have had nothing. I pray seal the letter and deliver it to him, and press the matter a little home.

[1684, Nov. 15.] Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have very little to communicate to your lordship by this post; however, I would not omit to impart what I have. The English letters which I expected on Friday last arrived not here till late yesterday, and the letters of Monday are still owing. I have received your lordship's of Octr. the 27th, and am glad to find by it that your lordship hath had orders to speak to Mons^r. Barillon concerning the English vessel lately condemned here. I shall not fail to second your lordship by my offices with these ministers for the obtaining of a revision of the sentence. A courier arrived here the day before yesterday from Rome, with a dispatch for the Pope's Nuncio; he keepeth the subject of it secret, because he hath not seen this King since, and all that is yet known of it is that it relateth to the affair of Genoa. The Spaniards are now marched out of that city, and out of all the places belonging to that Republic where they had any troops; some say that those people are not yet disposed to give satisfaction to France, and that they expect the success of the siege of Buda, which they may know before the end of the term given by this King, which ends with this current year inclusively, as I informed your lordship in my last letter; yet I am of opinion that this courier may have brought advice of some accommodating resolution which may have been taken at Genoa, for he had the Pope's order to pass through that place in his way hither, and according as he found matters disposed there he was either to return with his dispatches to Rome, or to continue his way to this place. He hath brought letters also from the Republic to the Envoyé of Genoa, who is still in the Bastille, because these ministers have disapproved of the several draughts which he hath made of that writing which he is to put into the Nuncio's hand before he can have his liberty. Mons^r. de Relingue is arrived at Toulon with a flute charged with the equestrial statue of this King, done by the hand of the Cavalier Bernini at Rome; he is to convey it to Havre de Grace accompanied with the Comte de Bethune, Chef d'Escadre, with 6 men-of-war which he hath brought from before Genoa . . . His most Christian Majesty will arrive this night at Versailles. The Comte de Roze arrived here yesterday from the Court of Denmark, and goeth this day to Versailles. This King hath named the Chevalier de Chaumont, a man of quality and a Captain of a man-of-war, for his ambassador to the King of Siam; he hath assigned him a vessel to transport himself and the ambassador of Siam thither with very considerable presents. Those ambassadors have not yet had audience, but they have been highly treated by Mons^r. at St. Cloud, and by the Prince of Condé at Chantilly, and by this Premier President at dinner, after they had assisted the other day at the opening of this Parliament.

1684, Nov. 16th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to his Royal Highness.—Mr. Aikeman, the bearer, will have the honour to communicate to your Highness two memorials upon the subject of the Scotch privileges in this kingdom, one of which I have already presented to the King, and I am resolved to present the other so soon as I can find a fit opportunity. Mr. Aikeman came here a little too late, for this Court was just removing to Chambort when he arrived, where very little business could be done. I expect that many difficulties will be made as to the confirmation of the privileges, but I shall omit nothing which may depend on me towards the obtaining of what is desired. I shall presume to give your Highness an account of what passeth in relation to this affair.

1684, Nov. 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir G. Drummond, Lord Provost of Edinburgh.—I received yours by the hand of Mr. Aikeman, which was extremely welcome to me, because it gave me an occasion of shewing my zeal and readiness to render any service to the Scotch nation. Mr. Aikeman will acquaint you with the progress which is already made in the affair which you were pleased to recommend to me in the name of the royal bourroughs of Scotland, and concerning which I have received his Majesty's commands. He will also communicate to you two memorials, one of which I have already presented upon that subject to the most Christian King, and the other I shall present upon the first occasion. I was in hopes to have given you a further account of this business before this time, but the absence of this Court from this place and the late voyages which this King hath made have put a stop to almost all business here. I could have wished that Mr. Aikeman had arrived a little sooner than he did, but tho' his arrival was something late, yet I assure you, sir, his industry and his care of this affair have been very great, which testimony in justice I am obliged to render of him. I am very sensible of the honour which the royal bourroughs have done me by the confidence which they seem to repose in me, and which they signified by your hand. . . .

1684, Nov. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Marquis of Huntley . . . The small services which I have been able to render to Mr. Innis, and to that college of which he is the rector, do not deserve so great a return as your lordship is pleased to make and of which I am extremely sensible. Mr. Innis' merits are very great, and I am very glad that he hath the honour of so good a patron as your lordship is. . . .

1684, Nov. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.— . . . The Protestants have lately here demanded by Mons^r. de Ruvigny, their Deputy-General, permission to hold a Synod, as they have usually done, which hath been refused. It is now certain that the negotiation of Mons^r. de St. R main in Portugal hath failed, and he only stayeth there this winter to endeavour to give the exclusion to the Prince of Newbourg, whose pretensions are supported by the House of Austria, they liking rather the alliance with Tuscany than that with the above-mentioned Prince. The Envoyés of Siam had audience upon Thursday last of Mons^r. de Seignelay; he received from them the presents destined for the late Mons^r. Colbert, his father; they consisted in a cabinet of china, two skreens of Japan, and in several vases of philigraine work in gold and in silver. They are soon to see his most Christian Majesty, and are to return home in the month of February. His most Christian Majesty designeth to send this year some vessels into China, Japan, and other Islands of the East with intelligent persons, who shall draw observations and remarks from the several countries where they are to go, which may be useful towards augmenting commerce, the art, sciences, and manufactures within this kingdom, that so he may render it more flourishing and take the advantage which the long truce may afford to him for doing it. The merchants of St. Malo and of other places in France, who by reason of the sudden departure of the Spanish fleet could not embark their merchandises upon it which they had designed for the Indies, propose to themselves to carry them upon their own vessels to Peru. The Conseil for sea affairs are going to deliberate upon this matter, it being not without difficulty, because the Spaniards and the Portuguese have long been masters of the commerce of that country; besides, the French masters of ships are not over expert in the navigation of those seas. For the greater advancement and utility of trade it is proposed to this King to make the River of Loire navigable much higher than it is at present, which proposal is now under his consideration.

1684, Nov. 22nd, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —We have now been 14 days without receiving one letter from England. . . The most Christian King having known some time since that the Prince of Carignan of Savoye had an intention to marry, gave him to understand by the Abbe d'Estrades, his ambassador at Turin, that his Majesty did desire for several weighty reasons that he would make choice of a wife no where but in France, pretending that in this he should follow the example of the Dukes of Savoye, who for a long time had married in this kingdom; but since it being known that notwithstanding what had been remonstrated to the said Prince by the said ambassador, and also some menaces which had been made, he continued to treat of his marriage with the Princess of Este, cozen to the Duke of Modena, and sister to Prince Cæsar of Este, his most Christian Majesty let him know a second time that if he did not comply with his intentions in what related to his marriage that he should highly resent it; and to the end that if possible the conclusion of the marriage might be prevented and hindered. Mons^r. de Croissy, by the order of the King his master, writ a letter to the Abbe Rizzini, Envoyé of Modena in this Court, dated of the 6th current, by which he acquainted him that his most Christian Majesty did desire that the Duke of Modena would reject all manner of propositions relating to that marriage. The said Abbe in his answer assured Mons^r. de Croissy that the Duke of Modena his master would absolutely hinder the marriage, provided that he knew the intentions of the most Christian King before he had engaged himself so far that he could not retreat, which yet he hoped that he had not done, because that he had had no account from Modena of any thing relating to this affair. The copies of the letter and answer I send to your lordship; whilst this was passing, and about 8 or 10 days after that the letter of Mons^r. de Croissy was written, a courier arrived here from Turin with advice that the marriage had been consummated upon the 10th or 11th of this month at Reconigi, a house belonging to the Prince of Carignan at the distance of some miles from Turin, and that the matter had been done so privately that the Duke of Savoy knew nothing of it, and that the Princess of Este had arrived at Reconigi in a post caleche accompanied only with one woman, her escuyer and her page. This King believing himself offended by those who have had any hand in conducting this affair, as principally by the Princess of Carignan, and by the Princess of Bade, her daughter, he sent Mons^r. de Croissy on Sunday last to this place to denounce in his name an exile to the Princess of Bade, and to let her know that he had relegated her to Nantes in Brittany, and to order the Princess of Carignan to appear no more before him at Court. That Princess told Mons^r. de Croissy that since his most Christian Majesty had given Nantes for a prison to her daughter she hoped she might have liberty to accompany her thither, and farther also; but it is believed they will not be suffered to go out of the kingdom. The same night Mons^r. de Croissy sent for the Abbe Rizzini, and declared to him that the King his master would have no more to do with the Duke of Modena, and that he, his minister, was to retire himself with all haste out of the kingdom. He hath endeavoured to obtain some time for putting his affairs here in order, and for advising the Duke of Modena of what hath happened, but they have only given him till Thursday to continue here. He resolveth I hear to go from hence into England, he is a person for whom this King hath had an esteem, and indeed every body else, he having behaved himself with a great deal of prudence during his ministry here. I am obliged to give his Majesty an account of the reasons which some Italians give of the great endeavours which this King hath used to hinder the conclusion of this match, tho' I will not undertake to say how well they may be grounded. These people being naturally suspicious and fin which giveth them a belief often that they see deeper into things than really they do The Duke of Savoy hath declared by his letter to the most Christian King that the whole business hath passed without his knowledge, and that he was ready to disgrace the Prince of Carignan if his most Christian Majesty think it fit; but they will not be paid with that coin here, &c. . . . This affair will, without doubt, have unhappy consequences; for the marriage being certainly consummated, tho' the Duke of Savoy would endeavour to break it, the Pope most assuredly will never agree to it. This Nonce having again received a courier from the Pope with order to renew his instances in favour of the Genoese, and to endeavour to obtain some moderation of the demands of this King, he had audience upon Monday last; his most Christian Majesty having heard him quietly, as he useth to do, aswered with a kind of an indifference that if the Genoese did not resolve within the term of the delay that he had granted, which ended with the year, to give him that satisfaction which he expected, he would attack them and make them pay the expenses of the war; so that the Pope's courier having been sent back with that answer, which I take to be final, it resteth upon the Republic of Genoa to take its measures upon it The raising of the siege of Buda is now confirmed from all hands, and it is said that the Emperor hath resolved to treat of a peace with the Turks. It only resteth now that we should know the truth of the particulars; there being some letters which say that it was raised with confusion, and that the horsemen took every one a booty behind him; however the action hath passed, it is rather a great weakness in the two Empires, that one could not with all its forces take the town of Buda, and that the other could not with all its troops raise the siege . . . The Comte de Refuge and his wife have both made abjuration of the Protestant religion, and by that means have saved their lives, having been convicted of coining, which this King seldom pardoneth. P.S.—The enclosed letter for the Duchess is from the Envoyé of Modena, to which he hath desired me to give a cover.

1684, Nov. 22, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to her Royal Highness.—I presume to give your Royal Highness the trouble of this address at the request of the Abbe Rizzini, Envoyé of Modena in this Court, to give a cover to the inclosed letter. By it your Highness will perceive that a misunderstanding is unhappily arrived betwixt this King and the Duke of Modena, and that the Abbe Rizzini hath received orders to quit this kingdom, no longer time having been allowed than to-morrow to put his affairs here in order. I have in my letter to my Lord of Sunderland by this post represented the affair at large, so his Majesty may be fully informed of it. I have also already, in pursuance of an original instruction which I have from the King, to support the interests of the Duke of Modena in this Court passed some offices in favour of the Abbe Rizzini, but I am afraid that this case will require more particular orders, which I suppose the King will not refuse to the request of your Highness. I shall be ready to execute them here with all diligence and readiness, and I should esteem it extremely glorious for me to be able to render service to a Prince so nearly related to your Highness.

1684, Nov. 25th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—Upon Wednesday last an extraordinary Envoyé arrived here from Savoy, he having been admitted to the audience of this King the next day, when he assured his most Christian Majesty that the Duke his master had not counselled the Prince of Carignan to marry, nor had permitted the marriage to be performed at Thurin, but that the thing having been done he could not hinder himself from approving of it, believing that in this he should not displease his most Christian Majesty, since in consideration of this request he had approved the marriage of the Comte de Soissons which was altogether unequal, whilst this of the Prince de Carignan was by no means so. The answer which hath been given by this King to the said Envoyé is not yet known. It is further observable that the Nonce of the Pope residing now in the Court of Savoy did perform himself the ceremony of the marriage of the said Prince, after which there is no cause to doubt but that the Pope will confirm it . . . They say that nothing could have hindered the Comte de Soissons from attaining to the succession of Savoy but this match, because they are assured here that the Duke of Savoy will have no children because of a sickness which he brought into the world with him, and of which he was ill cured, as also that the sterility of the Duchess of Savoy is believed, as well as that of the Queen of Spaine; other things of this nature are said, which I pass by because I do not know how well they may be grounded. Prince Philip of Soissons having retired hither after the affair which he hath lately had at London hath not at all found his account here; he hath been threatened that if he did present himself at this Court, or did appear, that his proces should be made, and that all his abbies should be taken from him, which is all that he hath, and amount to 50 thousand francs of revenue, so that to avoid this treatment he hath again left this kingdom, being gone as it is said towards Savoy. The edict which this King hath made against duels, and which he hath sworn to observe inviolably, is so severe that it giveth defence to all his subjects to fight duels either within or out of his dominions; therefore Prince Philip, finding himself within the comprehension of the edict, may be questioned as well as if he had fought in France. By the death of Mons^r. Barriere there will return to this King a pension of 10 thousand francs which this King paid him yearly in consideration of the abjuration which he made in France of his religion, he having been before a Lutheran . . . The ill success of the siege of Buda giveth no great occasion of discontent here, because that enterprise hath put the Emperor in such a condition as is pretended that he shall not be able to re-establish in a long time his forces even tho' he should make a peace with the Ottoman Porte . . . P. S. In Lord Preston's hand.—I was just now informed that the last night an expresse passed by this place into England from Thurin. Carew died the last week at Dunkirke.

1684, Nov. 29th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I am to acknowledge your lordship's letter of the 13th instant, s. v., which brought inclosed another order of his Majesty in Council relating to the affair of Mons^r. Duarte of Antwerp; I shall in obedience to it renew my endeavours for the obtaining justice for him, but I foresee that the answer will be the same which I have formerly received and imparted to your lordship, vizt., that the jewels were seized in the time of war as the goods of an enemy; that as such the King had given them to the Major of Cambray, and that the malefactor who stole them had been condemned to die, and had been executed. I have yesterday received an answer to the memorial which I have lately presented concerning the Scotch privileges here from Mons^r. de Croissy, which is that he had laid before the King his master my memorial, and that he hath represented to him at length the reasons which I had offered to him for the confirmation of the said privileges, and particularly for the taking the 50 sols per tun imposed some time since upon the Scotch merchandises imported into this kingdom, but that he could now return me no other answer than what had been formerly given to the several instances which I had made upon this subject, to wit, that what was demanded would be more easily regulated by a Treaty of Commerce than by any other way, that what was demanded particularly relating to the exempting the Scotch nation from the duty of 50 sols per tun would naturally fall within the bounds of such a Treaty, and that in fine it was impossible to regulate this matter by any other means. In answer to what I had represented to him concerning the revision of the sentence, which I was ordered to demand, given against the English vessel taken by the privateers of Dunkirk, he told me that the sentence upon which a revision was demanded had been given after that the affair had been examined by the Chancellor, two Secretaries of State, and by the Contrôleur General of the finances, which was looked upon to be so solemn and so great a tribunal that no revision of their sentence could be reasonably expected. . . . It is the Comte de Pertingue who was in England who hath been sent hither extraordinary upon the affair of the Prince of Carignan. He is said to have spoken very well, and with much firmness to this King, and to the purpose which I mentioned in my last. The answer which he received is kept yet very privately, but the ambassadour of Savoye in his discourses seemeth to hint that he believeth that his most Christian Majesty will be appeased, and that the matter will be accommodated. The affairs of Genoa seemeth still to be in the same condition. This Nonce is always making instances concerning it; but I do not find that he obtaineth any thing; he hath lately said that he hath great hopes that those people will send their Doge hither, but there are other advises from Italy which say that they do not seem at all disposed to submit themselves, and that they are fortifying their places and ports. In the mean time the term allowed to them by this King runneth on; . . . The mandarines of Siam saw the day before yesterday, in passing by, his most Christian Majesty in the gallery of Versailles. When he was about 10 paces from them they threw themselves upon the floor, and covered their faces, and being bid three or four times to rise they would scarce do it. . . . The Emperor hath lost at the siege of Buda 360 officers, which is a great loss, and not reparable in a long time. Notwithstanding all this, the Council at Vienna never seemed to carry it higher, and the partisans of the house of Austria at Ratisbone have proposed to the Diette that France ought to restore their privileges to the 10 towns of the Prevosté of Alsace. One may conclude from this that anger unarmed is extremely vain. The Chevallier Balatti, Envoyé of Hanover, receiveth this day his audience of Congé at Versailles; he goeth into Spaine to solicit the arrears of subsidies which are due from that crown to his master.

1684, Dec. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Huntingdon.—The person who will have the honour of presenting this to your lordship is Mons^r. de Feuquieres, who because of his religion hath been obliged to quit France and to seek a retreat and an establishment for himself and his family in England; he is in order to that extremely desirous to serve as a gentleman pensioner in the band which your lordship commands, and only wants your lordship's permission to treat for a place in it. He cometh so well recommended to me by persons of quality and of condition here that I cannot refuse humbly to recommend him to your lordship's favour and protection. . . .

1684, Dec. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—Since my last to your lordship the reports have been so various here concerning the affair of the Prince of Carignan that I can at present say nothing certainly of it. On one hand it is said that since the audience of the Comte Pertingue orders have been sent to the Abbe d'Estrades to moderate his demands, and not to press the Duke of Savoy to the rupture of the marriage. On the other hand it is assured from Versailles that a courier arrived yesterday morning there from Turin with advise that the Prince de Carignan was disgraced and banished from that Court, and that the Princess of Carignan had been placed in a convent. If the Pope persisteth to refuse bulls to those prelates of the last assemble of this clergy who have been named by his most Christian Majesty to archbishopricks and bishopricks, it is resolved to push affairs yet further at the next assemble, which is to be held here in the month of March next. A book written by the Abbe Maimbourg, which hath appeared here within these 10 days under the title of a "Traité Historique de l'agrandissement de l'Eglise de Rome et de ses Evêques" is the forerunner of this. All the advices from Germany and Hungary by this last post confirm that the Serasquier Bassa did not at all attack the Imperial Army in the retreat which it made from before Buda. The Aga who commanded in that place hath been declared Bassa of Caramania. The Grand Seigneur hath also recompensed the principal officers and augmented the pay of those Janissaries who were within Buda during the siege. Prince Adolphe of Sweden hath lately sent an agent hither to solicit his pretensions concerning the Dutchy of Deux Ponts; he brought me a letter from that Prince, in which he intreateth me to pass offices in his favour pursuant to the instructions which I received when I was last in England to recommend his affair in the name of the King to his most Christian Majesty. I, remembering well what your lordship said to me in relation to the intentions of his Majesty concerning this matter, have told the person who gave me the letter that I remembered well that his Majesty had given me his orders to support the interests of Prince Adolphe in this Court, and that I knew that his Majesty had a great deal of consideration for his merit and his quality, but that since I received those orders the affairs of Europe have been very much altered, and the conjuncture is wholly changed, so that not knowing what the intentions of his Majesty may be at present in relation to the affair of Deux Ponts, I durst not, upon the foot of my old instructions, presume to meddle in a matter so delicate and of such consequence, that the pretensions of both the Crowns of France and of Sweden are to be considered in it. I treated him civilly, and since have heard nothing of him. The letters which should have arrived yesterday are still owing.

1684, Dec. 6th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir D. English.—I have instructions and order from his Majesty relating to your affairs and pretensions the most favourable that can be, but such are the difficulties which they make in this Court towards the granting of what is justly demanded on your behalf, that I almost despair of doing anything. . . . My Lord of Sunderland hath of late conveyed his Majesty's orders to me in your favour, by which I am commanded to support your interests upon all occasions, as also to endeavour to see you righted by the authority of this Court if any injury or injustice have been offered to you. My Secretary being out of the way I cannot by this post return those papers which you sent me, but he shall look them out, and I shall convey them to you.

1684, Dec. 6th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I received your lordship's of the 17th of the last month, s. v., which should have arrived here upon Friday last, but late upon Monday. The Spanish ambassador's late memorial requesting his Majesty's arbitrage in several matters, as also the answer return'd to it by your lordship, were enclosed. I communicated the chief article of the said memorial to Mons^r. de Croissy, tho' not the memorial itself; and I imparted to him what had been given in answer to it. At the same time I told him that his Majesty, continuing his care and zeal for the preservation of the peace of Europe so lately and so happily re-established by the conclusion of the truce, doth hope that all care will be taken here that nothing may happen which may disturb or interrupt it. I added that I had his Majesty's particular command to recommend this to his most Christian Majesty in his name, and that I hoped he would exactly represent it to him; he promised me to do it, but at the same time told me that the Spanish ambassador's memorial consisted of several points; the only question now was about the sufficiency of the cautions, the sum for the arrears of contributions demanded, the time and the places of payment being agreed of, and hostages being given; that the King his Master had been always ready to submit all his pretensions to the arbitrage of his Majesty of Great Britain; that he is now, &c., &c. . . . I replied that the most Christian King could not have so much right to retain Contray and Dixmude as the Spaniards had on their side, because he was obliged to restore them after the ratifications of the Treaty were exchanged, otherwise that he would make a formal contravention to it, but that the Spaniards were not obliged to pay the money before the time agreed upon for the payment, and that this King, having taken cautions and received hostages, had nothing to demand of Spaine till the expiration of the term. I added that, as to the expedient which he proposed of the re-entry of the French troops into the Spanish territories, it was such as neither I believed, the King of Spaine nor his neighbours could approve of; he said it had been practised before, and therefore might not unreasonably be proposed now. In relation to the affair of Genoa, I told him that his Majesty was much concern'd to hear that it was in so ill a posture, that he apprehended that it might occasion new differences, the effects and consequences of which nobody could divine, and that his Majesty hoped that some temperament might be found to adjust the matters in dispute, and to prevent the dangers which seem to threaten the quiet of Christendome. He answered that the King his master and that Republique were upon a different foot, and that it was very fit that an ample satisfaction should be made, to which I did agree, but told him that I hoped that, in consideration of the instances of the King my master and for the establishing of the quiet of Europe, his most Christian Majesty would think fit to lessen his demands. He then made excursions concerning the passage of salt at Savona, the arming of the gallies, and the Genoese being supported under hand by Spaine, and in the end told me that, whereas it had been given out that the King his master designed the re-establishment of the Comte de Fiesque in all his lands within the territories of Genoa, that he could assure me that it was only intended that 100,000 crowns should be paid to him for all his pretensions, and that this was only demanded because he could not leave that Comte unprovided for whose family had been ruined for his affections to France. He promised me to represent also to the King his master what I had said to him upon this subject. If I may offer my belief to your lordship, I must tell you that I believe the Genoese will never submit but at the last extremity to the sending hither their Doge. If I did not before mention it to you, I must acquaint your lordship now that when the Nonce represented to the King that the Doge, when he should be here, would not be Doge of Genoa because, by a fundamental constitution of that estate, so soon as he set his foot out of the territories of that Republique he was no more to be reputed their Prince, His most Christian Majesty answered that he would have him come hither Doge, and that, notwithstanding their laws, he should return so. They seem much to wonder here that the Genoese should deliberate so long about their submission to the King, since so many Sovereign Princes have come in person to excuse themselves here; as the Duke of Savoye in the time of Henry the 4th, the Duke of Lorraine in the time of Louis 13th, and Pope Alexander the 7th, by the Cardinal Chigi, his nephew and his legat a latere in the reign of this present King. Since this King hath taken a resolution to oblige by all sorts of means his subjects of the reform'd religion to embrace the Catholique, Mons^r. de Louvois, who accommodateth himself in all things to his pleasure, hath proposed for the doing of the King at once, the cassation of the Edict of Nantes which is the only bulwarke of those of the religion; but Mons^r. le Chancelier, who foreseeeth better the consequence of it, is of a contrary opinion, so that this matter is not to be executed at present. In the mean time the Spaniards, who seem to take advantage of all things, seem by a new pragmatique sanction published lately at Madrid, to invite the French Huguenots to take refuge in Spain, because by one of the articles of it, it is permitted to strangers of whatsoever religion to go and inhabit in Spayne without danger of being questioned by the Inquisition for their private worship. The Prince of Carignan is banished Savoye and is arrived at Bologne. The Duke of Savoy hath answered that as to the demand of breaking the marriage it was not his affair, it being in the hands of the Pope, but that he would make the affair be examined by his Divines.

1684, Dec. 9th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Grahme.—I received, dear brother; one from you after we had been 15 days without letters from England. In it you tell me that the King hath re-assumed his thoughts of sending the Duke of St. Albans hither, and you also desire to know what convenience I can afford him in my house. You may acquaint his Majesty that I am ready to do my Lord Duke any service which may lie in my power, and that if he be sent hither during my stay here I shall take all imaginable care of him, being obliged to pay all manner of service to one in whom his Majesty is so much concerned. The house in which I am at present is too little to afford his Grace any convenience, because it doth but just hold my own family, tho' I am lodged very much at my ease. The last year I was in the Hotel de la Tremouille, which was much bigger, and which I took by the King's command on purpose to receive the Duke of St. Albans, but his Grace not coming, I thought fit to put it off again, because it was too big for me. I should be glad to know his Majesty's intentions as to this matter, because I am at liberty to leave this house in which I am at Easter next. I took it till that term only, not knowing how his Majesty may dispose of me then at the expiration of my 3 years residence here. When you know his pleasure I pray let me hear from you, that I may be able to take some measures in relation to my affairs in England, which are in disorder enough (as you know), occasioned by the expense which I am forced to make here, and which almost weighs me down. . . .

1684, Dec. 9th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to her Royal Highness.—I have received the honour of your Royal Highnesses letter of the 20th of the last month. My Lord of Sunderland conveyed to me his Majesty's farther and more particular orders concerning the Duke of Modena's affair by the last post. Your Highness, I am sure, will be so just as to believe that I will execute them with all imaginable care and diligence, yet nothing can be done here very effectually till the return of the courier from Modena, whom the Abbé Rizzini dispatched before he left this place. He will, I suppose, return very speedily, and I shall not fail to transmit the dispatches which he will bring into England by the first opportunity. I hope before this time the Abbé hath had the honour of kissing your Highnesses hand. I am sure he deserveth all the favour which can be shewn him in England, there being no person more beloved and esteemed here than he is by all who know him. . . .

1684, Dec. 9th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have received your Lordship's letter of the 20th of Nov., s. v., and I shall not fail, according to the orders in it, upon all fit occasions, to support the interests of the Duke of Modena and of his family. Nothing as yet can be effectually done in that affair till it be known how that Duke will excuse himself, which will not be till the return of the courier whom the Abbé Rizzini hath dispatched to Modena. I shall also communicate the contents of Sir Thomas Linch's letter to Mons^r. de Croissy, and endeavour that orders may be sent to the Governor of Petit Guanes such as are desired. (The demand which this King hath made to Madame de Montespan of her apartment gives occasion to several reflexions, especially since Mademoiselle de Levinstin is for the most part of her time lockt up in her chamber, sometimes upon one pretext and sometimes upon another. Madame de Maintenon begins to work at her seminary at Noisy, of which she is to have the direction.) There passeth already a secret correspondence, by letters, betwixt this King and the King of Poland, and it is not doubted but that the amity will be renewed betwixt them more strongly than ever.—He mentions the conditions which are to cement it They make every day here some attack upon the Protestants. The temple of Sommieres in Languedoc hath been razed, and that of Nismes is shut up. Within these 3 days a new declaration of this King's hath been published which imports that for the future they shall hold their consistorys only every fortnight, and that in the presence of the Judge Royal of the place. This declaration seemeth to be the forerunner of the abrogation of the Edict of Nantes. This King hath the other day given a sum of 80,000 francs to be distributed amongst the hospitals and the poor of Paris, who are ashamed to beg, of which there is a great number

1684, Dec. 13th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.— . . . The truce having been published in all the Spanish dominions in Europe, they are using all endeavours in Spaine to make their traffique flourish more than ever it did. In order to this they are resolved to receive the Jews and Mahometans, who offer great sums to be admitted, and to have the protection of the King of Spaine. It is the Marquis de Los Balbases who proposeth the thing, together with a Jewish merchant who is extremely knowing in the affairs of commerce The King seemeth satisfied with the excuses which the Duke of Savoye hath made upon the late marriage. I doubt not but that he will receive also the excuses of the Duke of Modena, and that the business will be accommodated by the banishing of Prince Caesar of Este for some time out of that Duke's estates . . . The disputes with Rome seem to be in a better way than before; this King having remitted something of his demands in the affair of the printer since the receiving of a bull from the Pope. This maketh it believe that the other differences which depend at present may also be accommodated. The divisions at Genoa are very great, the people wishing an accommodation with France, and the nobility opposing the making of it upon the conditions proposed by this King. The last advises from Milan says that the Genoese having entered into a deliberation whether or not they should send their Doge hither as the most Christian King demands, it had been unanimously concluded in the negative: whether they know this certainly or not here I cannot tell, but they at present making great preparations for the attacking of Genoa, both by sea and by land, and if something be not done soon and some interposition be not offered speedily in favour of that Republic they will begin very early with them . . . The affair of the passage of the salt at Savona being laid aside, the demands of this King from the Genoese are four. 1st, that they shall send their Doge hither to ask pardon, accompanied with four of the principal senators. 2ndly, that they shall disarm their six supernumerary galleys. 3rdly, that they shall dismiss the Spanish troops at present in Genoa; and lastly, that they shall renounce their alliance with Spaine . . . Mons^r. de Croissy telleth me that Mons^r. Barillon hath orders to speak to his Majesty upon this affair and also that of Flanders, of which I have already spoken to Mons^r. de Croissy. I shall only now observe to your lordship that they are a little surprised here that his Majesty should appear in behalf of the Genoese, and that they are a little startled at what Mons^r. Barillon hath written from England, and at what I have said here upon that affair. I should have mentioned above that in order to the chastising of these people they are preparing of bombes of a new invention, which they pretend shall carry yet 400 toises farther than those which they made use of the last year . . . Madame de Montespan hath already quitted her apartment at Versailles, being gone down to that of the Baths. There are great reasonings and descants upon this change at this Court, as your lordship may easily imagine . . .

1684, Dec. 16th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received your lordship's of the 1st instant, s. v., in which you are pleased to let me know that his Majesty cannot acquiesce in the answer which I have received to my memorial upon the subject of the Scotch privileges, and that he doth not think it satisfactory: his Majesty doth judge very rightly of it; for it is by no means conformable to the Treaty which subsists at present betwixt the two Crowns. I shall, in obedience to his Majesty's commands, continue my endeavours for the obtaining of a just settlement in this matter, which is indeed of great importance to the Scotch subjects, and I wish with all my heart that they may have success. I shall also, as your lordship directeth, prepare a memorial forthwith upon what the Hudson's Bay Company have represented to the King in their petition, a copy of which I have received, and I shall demand reparation against the persons named in it . . . Since the raising of the siege of Buda the Tartars who are in the army commanded by the Serasquier Bassa have made great incursions and have carried into captivity several Chistians out of the hereditary countries of the Emperor. Mr. Robson hath acquainted me that your lordship hath been pleased to pass my bill of extraordinaryes, for which I humbly thank your lordship. P.S.—I beg of your lordship to send the enclosed to Mons^r. Rizzini.

1684, Dec. 20th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—I have received the honour of your lordship's of the 1st instant, s. v. I have had so often reason to suspect that my letters have been opened both in coming and going that I am very cautious of what I hazard by the post . . . The late misunderstanding with Savoye being accommodated nothing now seemeth more to threaten a rupture and the disturbance of the peace of Christendom than the affair of Genoa. I shall not here repeat the demands of this King from that Republic, because I have mentioned them in some of mine to my Lord of Sunderland, but I must observe to your lordship that this King seemeth very firm yet in his resolution of having that Doge and Senators to come hither, and the Genoese seem as resolute never to agree to that, saying that if he were at their gates he could demand no more, and that it would be time enough to ask that then. If his Majesty hath any consideration for those people it is high time to interpose his offices. The enclosed relation of the estate of Genoa appeared in public the other day, and was presented to this King on Monday last. It hath been written by order by Mons^r. le Noble, Procureur General of the Parliament of Metz, who is the famous person who hath mesnaged the reunion of the dependancies of the three bishopricks of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and other places to the obedience of this King, which has brought so great an addition of territory to France, and which hath ruined so many great families, who have enjoyed for hundreds of years the estates which by the Arrêts of the Chambre Royale established at Metz are now ravished from them. I enclose also the famous Almanack of Milan, whose prophecies are much taken notice of here, tho' I think sometimes the prophet speaketh too much French. The calling of a Parliament in Scotland, and the noise of one to be in Ireland, maketh it believed here that one may be soon assembled in England. I shall take liberty to let your lordship know by my next how it relisheth here . . .

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1684, Dec. 20th, s. t., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The Pope's Nuncio hath demanded an audience of this King, and it is feared that the news which he is to relate from Genoa is not too good, since by advises from other places it is known that those people have taken their resolution rather to perish than to send hither their Doge. However this King, having it in his head that this action will not only embellish his history but make also one of the most glorious parts of it, is said to be resolved not to recede from this article of his demand, and in order to execute his resolution he intends to make his troops to the number of 25 thousand foot and of 8,000 horse, to pass into Italy, without counting the troops of the Duke of Savoye, whom they will easily engage in this war by giving him a share of the conquest; besides that it is believed that there is a Treaty already concluded to this effect. The Genoese have already demanded more troops from the Spaniards for the augmenting and better providing for their garri-sons. I enclose a relation of the estate of Genoa which appeared in public the other day, and was presented to this King upon Monday last . . . I enclose also two of the Almanacks of Milan, one of which is for his Majesty. The young du Quesne, who commands a man-of-war of 36 pieces of cannon, having met at sea eight galleys of Genoa, he hath treated them very ill and hath given them the chase . . . The Emperor having communicated to the Pope the reasons which carry him to an accommodation with the Ottoman Porte, the Pope did immediately assemble all the cardinals of the Austrian faction to take their advises upon it; but the result of that council is not yet known . . .

1684, Dec. 20th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Dartmouth.—I am intreated by the poor owners of the vessel which was taken by a privateer of Dunkirke, and hath since been condemned, to address once more to your lordship. The case is now referred by order of King and council to Sir Thomas Exton, and they humbly desire your lordship to move him to report their affairs as speedily and as favourably as he can. I have wrote to him to this purpose this day that I am convinced that the goods belong only to them: they are infinitely obliged to your lordship for the countenance you have already given to them, the continuance of which I beg of you on their behalf . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir Th. Exton.—Having had advise from Lord Sunderland that the King had recommended to you the consideration of the case of Mr. Allen and Mr. Stritch, two of his subjects whose goods have been lately condemn'd at Dunkirke. I think myself obliged to inform you that the marchandises condemn'd do certainly belong to no other person than Allen and Stritch, a quantity of brandy only which was aboard, which belongs to the English consul at the Groyne in Gallicia, excepted; this appears by very authentic papers, and also by a letter addressed from the said consul to me, and by the quality of the goods themselves. The sentence of condemnation hath been the more unjust because it appears, by the attestation of several of the parties concerned in the Armateur before a public notary at Dunkirke, that they were so well satisfied that the goods were English that they were willing to quit their share in them; the said Allen who is here at present hath also offered to make oath that the said goods belong only to himself and Stritch, but I not being qualified to administer oaths here must remit him to do it elsewhere.

1684, Dec. 20th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Frowd. The enclosed packet is from the Court of Modena to Mons^r. de Rizzini, who is now at London. It is of great consequence to the Duke of Modena, therefore I pray you deliver it to Mons^r. de Rizzini, and also acquaint the Dutchesse that you have received it. I could not send it in my packet to my Lord of Sunderland because that is already too big. There is another packet of this day to the Duke, which I pray you to deliver to him . . .

1684, Dec. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The Pope's Nonce is to have audience very soon upon the affair of Genoa, which goeth very ill as your lordship may perceive by my last. The Court of Rome is said to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the Nonce here, because he doth not appear to be vigorous and resolved enough in the business of the Genoese, and he is there thought to be rather the Nonce of this King than of the Pope, as Pasquin hath expressed himself upon the occasion; but I must confess that I do not see any reason for its entertaining this opinion of him, since he hath ever seemed to act fairly and concernedly enough in the affair of Genoa, and in all others with which he hath been charg'd. The affair at present which giveth the greatest variety of matter for discourse and reasoning here is that of the war against the Turks. The question is now whether the great ligue betwixt the Emperor, Poland, and the Venetians shall subsist, or whether a pence will be concluded. Whatever may ensue the preparations are great which are made on both sides against the next campagne . . . There are at this time several intrigues in this Court, which furnish subject of discourse enough to this city. The affair of the Marquis de Termes, who going some nights since from this King's supper to his own lodging at Versailles, was taken out of his chair by a good number of persons in disguise, and was very well beaten, as they told him for a song which he had lately made, to the tune of which they said that they would make him dance, is but one of the least of those subjects. There are several young men of the first quality extremely dissolute and free in their expressions. His most Christian Majesty is informed and may for a time dissemble his resentment, but in the end it must break out, and according to all appearance we shall soon hear of some people banished from this Court. Madame de Montespan receiveth every day some new mortification, she being scarce any more considered. She found great difficulty some days since to get a place in the lower chapel of Versailles to hear the sermon, no person offering to remove for her, whereas before it was otherwise. Great endeavours is used by several persons to be admitted into the communauté, which is now establishing at Noisy le Secq, under the direction of Madame de Maintenon. Besides that nobody is to be received who is above the age of 15 years; by another constitution those who enter are to produce the proofs of their nobility as the Knights of Malta are obliged to do . . .

1684, Dec. 27th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir St. Fox.—Having received his Majesty's orders to pass into England, I design God willing to set out from hence on Saturday next, so that I shall defer to give an answer to your letter from hence, hoping to have the honour of seeing you so soon. We may then fully discourse the affair of the Duke of St. Alban's for whose service I am ready to do anything.

s. d. Lord Preston to Coll. Grahme. I have received the King's permission, dear brother, by my Lord of Sunderland, to go over, and resolved to set out soon on Saturday next, and to pass the Friday after in the packet boat, so that I hope on Sunday or Monday come seven night to be with you at London. I should have set out sooner but that I am detained by the affair of the Duke of Modena, which I hope to settle before I come away, being to have audience of this King upon it either to-morrow or Friday. I pray take me a lodging as near St. James as can be, either in the Pall Mall, or in St. James's Street, but rather in the latter.

1684, Dec. 27th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir C. Musgrave.—I am very well pleased with the honour that his Majesty hath done me in making me Recorder of Carlisle. I intreat you to make my compliments to my Lord Keeper, and to my Lord Chief Justice for their favour to me. I must also own your kindness in it, because I know very well how much you have been concerned for me. I am very willing to make Mr. Aglinby my Deputy, and therefore you may be pleased to let him know so much, and that I shall be ready to sign a deputation when it shall be offered to me. I shall say no more at present, because I hope to have the happiness of seeing you soon at London . . . P.S. Tell my cousin Musgrave that my Lord Irwin sets out on Saturday also; but he goeth post.

1684, Dec. 27th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have received your lordship's letter of the 8th instant, o. s., which bringeth me the King's permission to make a short turn into England for my own affairs, for which I return my most humble thanks to his Majesty, and I shall prepare accordingly to leave this place on Saturday next. Your lordship's of the 11th current is also come to my hands, with copies of the Spanish ambassador's late memorial and letter, and of your lordship's answer to his letter, for all which I return my humble acknowledgments. The Abbé Melani, who in the absence of the Abbé Rizzini correspondeth with the Court of Modena, hath received a dispatch from Prince Cæsar d'Esté, which containeth a justification of the procedure of the Duke of Modena, in the affair of the marriage of the Prince of Carignan. He hath communicated the contents of it to me, and they import &c., . . . All this in pursuance of his Majesty's orders, I represented yesterday to Mons^r. de Croissy, who received it well, and told me that he would represent it to the King his master, but he seemed to insinuate that he was much offended with Prince Cæsar of Esté, and I believe it will be required that he should be banished. I have also, that I may do the thing effectually before I leave this place, demanded audience of this King, in which I shall at length expose the Duke of Modena's justification to him, and just as I am writing I have advise from Mons^r. de Croissy that to-morrow morning is appointed for it. I hope all will go very well, and that by Saturday's post, before I leave this place, I may give your lordship a good account of this affair. The Pope's Nonce having again demanded in the name of the Pope that his most Christian Majesty would moderate the satisfaction which he demandeth from the Genoese, and that he would grant to them a new delay, the one and the other hath been refused to him, and this King hath ordered since 30,000 bombes to be ready to be used against the city of Genoa. The Pope is extremely enraged against a book lately published here by Mons^r. Maimbourg, an account of which I have given to your lordship in a former letter, and he is going to censure it . . . Orders are given to all the ports of France not to permit traffique with the ships of Rotterdam. The reason of this is not yet published, but it is certain that this hath theady been executed at Rouen, where some of the said ships having begun to unload their merchandises, were obliged to recharge them. The people of Amsterdam guard with the great care all the avenues of the Pampus, and are fixing pallisades all bout their own; we seem here to be ignorant of all this. The discourse hath been lately reassumed of the marriage of this King with the Infanta of Portugal, and there are letters from Lisbon which assure that the affair is much advanced.

1684, Dec. 30th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I received yesterday your lordship's of the 15th instant, s. v., and being just now leaving this place myself, I shall leave the necessary instructions with my secretary for the obtaining of his most Christian Majesty's order to the magistrate of Dunkirque to deliver up Mr. Carew's letters patents and his other papers sealed, and now in the custody of the said magistrate, in order to their being sent to England, as his Majesty directs. I had upon Thursday last a very favourable audience from the most Christian King upon the affair of the Duke of Modena. In it I represented to him the reasons which that Duke allegeth for the justification of his conduct in what relateth to the marriage of the Prince de Carignan, and which I mentioned to your lordship in my last. I also presented to him the enclosed memorial upon that subject, which he received very well. It is drawn almost word for word from the dispatch of Prince Cæsar of Esté to the Abbé Melani, of which I also advised your lordship in the same letter. The answer which I received was to this effect, that whatever came recommended to him, either from the King my master or from the Duke or Duchess of Yorke, was very agreeable to him, that their intercession should be ever prevalent and powerful with him; that he saw that I endeavoured to justify the conduct of the Duke, and of the house of Modena upon their conduct in the affair of the Prince of Carignan's marriage, and that I had explained the whole matter very well to him; that he would make the dates of the letters and memoires which I had mentioned be confronted, and my memorial be examined, and that he would order answer to be given to it. I then did humbly desire him that if it were possible he would be pleased to let me know the answer before my departure, that I might be the carrier of it to the King my master, and to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Yorke; he replied that he doubted that could not be, but that if I were not here it should be given by his ambassador in England. I added, that I had great hopes that it would be favourable, since the sincerity of the Duke of Modena's intention could not but plainly appear to his Majesty; to which he made little answer, but seemed very well pleased. I am to remark to your lordship that the night before my audience his most Christian Majesty said to the Cardinal Bouillon, and several others who were present, that he was resolved to receive no justification from the Duke of Modena without the banishment of Prince Cæsar of Esté, and that he did not doubt but that I had orders to offer him that; but after he had heard the reasons of the Duke of Modena he mentioned nothing of that to me, so that I hope his anger against him is disarmed, and that his resentments are appeased, and that this affair will soon have a very good end. A courier arrived the day before yesterday here from Genoa with a dispatch for the Pope's Nuncio, upon which he hath demanded audience; he bringeth advise that the Genoese have taken the resolution to send hither instead of their Doge a solemn embassy of 4 of their principal senators, who shall be charged to give the satisfaction demanded, if this King will accept of it, and that they resettle all their affairs upon the foot which they were upon the first day of January 1683, which was before the arming of their galleys, and before they had made any alliance with France against Spaine, or received any Spanish troops. . . . The interdiction of commerce, which is made to these of Rotterdam in the ports of France, proceedeth from no other thing than the resentment which they have against them, because they are not so good Frenchmen as their neighbours of Amsterdam. The Baron de Stenkalefeldt, Envoyé of the Elector Palatin, is arrived here the other day, and hath demanded audience. P.S. I hope to pass with the packet boat on Friday next, and to be at London upon Sunday or Monday.

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1684, Dec. 30th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mons^r. L'Abbé Rizzini (French). Says it would be useless for him to speak of the success of his late audience on the subject of the affairs of the Duke of Modena, as he forwards a letter from the Abbé Melani, which will instruct him in all that has taken place. He hopes that he has given satisfaction to the Duke and Duchess of York, and also to the Duke of Modena. In a postscript he says that the Abbé may be surprised to find his letter open, that it was the result of an accident, for he (Preston) not observing the address opened it. Excuses himself, and says that Mons^r. L'Abbé Melani calling upon him had previously read him the letter before closing it.

1685, April 28th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I have yet had no audience of this King, but I suppose it may be designed for Monday or Tuesday, so that by the next post I may give your lordship an account of my reception. This King having had advise that the King of Spaine designed to yield the sovereignty of the Low countries belonging to him to the Duke of Bavaria, or at least the government of them, when he shall have married the Arch-Duchess, Mons^r. de Ferquiers did by order present the enclosed memorial to his Catholic Majesty, and had the subjoined answer to that, and to his letter written to Don Pedro d'Arragon upon the same subject, both of which were brought hither by a courier who arrived from Madrid upon Wednesday last. Mons^r. de Fenquieres had orders also to declare to that King that the King his master should take the least innovation which should be made in regard of the commerce which is now carried on betwixt the subjects of both Crowns as a rupture and a formal contravention to the truce, which he hath done, and hath received for answer that his Catholic Majesty doth design to make no alterations in what relateth to the commerce betwixt the Spanish and French subjects. These answers to what relateth to the pretended donation of the Low countries of Flanders to the Duke of Bavaria in favour of his marriage, as also to the affair of commerce, have produced directions to Mons^r. de Boufflers to return, who marched actually with a body of near 12,000 men towards the frontiers of Spaine, and to which those troops which were in quarters in Guienne, Lanquedoc, and the other neighbouring provinces were to have joined. The Doge of Genoa hath not appeared nor received any visits since his arrival here. He and the four senators who accompany him are lodged at the Hostel de Beauvais in this Fauxbourg. They are making a very magnificent equipage for their appearance, and will have as it is said to the number of 150 very rich liveries. The Doge will not be ready to see his most Christian Majesty till the 12th or 14th of the next month. He is to be covered, and is only to make a compliment, and not to ask pardon. His stay here after the performance of this will be very short. The presents of a chaise of a rock chrystal and of a service of gold plate, &c., which he is said to have brought for this King, are a pure invention, he having only brought with him 100,000 crowns for the Comte de Fiesque. The carousal which should have been performed for the entertainment of the Doge will be deferred till the month of June, but it is thought that indeed it will be wholly laid aside. And tho' they pretend to give other reasons for it, yet the true one is, that those who were to have appeared and acted in it are found to do it with so little address that his most Christian Majesty is rather willing to lay aside the thought of it than to expose so many young men of quality. Mons^r. de la Salle, who parted from France upon the 1st day of August of the last year with four ships, and one of this King's frigates mounted with 36 pieces of cannon, named le Joye did arrive at St. Domingo the 27th of September following. . . . This la Salle who goes to discover by sea the mouth of the river of Mesisipeque, which he had before discovered by land to the westward of Canada at the distance of more than 700 leagues from Kebecque, (Quebec), parted from St. Domingo for that expedition upon the 15th of January last with his three remaining vessels, upon which were 200 soldiers, and near 300 persons more, as well volunteers as others with arms, ammunition, cannon and equipage, to make considerable establishments upon the banks of that river, whose entry into the sea is not, by estimation, distant above 70 or 80 leagues from Penuco, the last of the Spanish towns of Mexico lying towards Florida. The Marquis de Maintenon going with his wife and family to the Isles of America upon a French vessel belonging to Dunkirque, was taken upon the 7th day of February last at the distance of about 6 leagues from Martinigo by an English corsaire, who robs all nations, even his own, and is said for some time to have very much infested those seas. He throws the men which he taketh without mercy into the sea, and was doing the same thing to the Marquis de Maintenon and to his wife and attendants, when three or four of his own seamen, who had served before a Boucaniers under the said Marquis for seven or eight years, when he was of that profession, did obtain by great intreaties that they should be set on shore at Martinigoe, which was done after that they had robbed them of all that belonged them. This King hath given orders to arm out 2 frigates to go in quest of this pirate. . . . They begin now to find difficulties which were not foreseen in bringing of the Eure from Chartres to Versailles, the success of the enterprize seems now something doubtful; however, 10,000 men are constantly at work at it, and now instead of 6 months, which they proposed at first for the finishing of it, they allot 8 years, and a vast sum of money besides. I enclose 2 letters from the Duke of Mantua for the King and the Queen, to notify the death of his mother. They were delivered to me by the Envoy of Mantua here, he having kept them some time in his hands in expectation of my return. The other for his Majesty is from Prince Adolphe of Sweden, and was put into my hands yesterday by his agent here. Mons^r. Richard, the director of the English post here, was with me the other day, and told me that he was afraid that his Majesty had conceived a hard opinion of him, by reason of what had passed betwixt him and Mr. Frowd lately upon occasion of the Spanish letters, and intreated me to inform his Majesty that what he did as to that affair was done without design of giving any offence to his Majesty, and that he always was and shall ever be ready to receive his commands, and to promote his service in whatever may lie in his power, and within the sphere of his employment. I promised him to represent this to his Majesty, and shall humbly intreat your lordship to acquaint him with it.

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

A private advice to the King.

1685, April 28th, s. n., Paris.—Your Majesty may be pleased to remember that some weeks since I acquainted you with an advise which I had received that a considerable sum of money was returned from hence into England immediately after the death of the late King. I am now, sir, assured of the truth of it, and that it was remitted by the Court banquier, Mons^r. Gruslé. I cannot possibly assign the sum to your Majesty; but by conjectures which are something probable it should have been about a million of this money, which is about 80 or 80,000 pounds of ours. I know also that one of Mons^r de Croissy's servants went about that time into England, he being not willing as it is likely to have trusted such an affair to the ordinary post. That I might have better grounds for what I inform your Majesty of, I have privately informed myself by some bankers how the Exchange went about that time betwixt London and this place; and they all agree that some weeks after the King's death the Exchange fell considerably, because that the great need which they who remitted the money had of bills obliged them to take them at any rate, but the remitting was quickly at a stop, and in 8 or 10 days the Exchange mounted to its ordinary train. I will not presume to write my conjectures to your Majesty for what use this money may be designed, and I wish and hope with all my heart that my jealousies may be in vain. But perhaps your Majesty will think fit to have an eye that no practices may be set on foot with our new members of Parliament. I hope, however, no great ill of that kind can be done, since by good fortune we shall have very few of their old pensioners amongst us.

SIR
F. GRAHAM

1685, April 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Gwynne.—Dear Franke, I must beg of you to deliver the enclosed with as much secrecy as you can to the King, and to choose your time when neither of the secretaries are by. I beg your pardon for the trouble, but one can trust few in this world. It relateth to his Majesty's own affairs.

Addition to the last letter to my Lord Sunderland. I find not that the negotiation of the marriage with Portugal is more advanced than it was a year since. The squadron which is to be commanded by the Mareschall d'Estrees is ready to set sail. Some painters and gravers were sent the other day to the Bastile for having made a ridiculous picture in which the Doge of Genoa was represented upon an ass, with a house of which the 4 senators held the 4 corners. . . . The Abbé Roussel, who was lately sent to make the compliments of Mons^r. de Bouillon to the King our master, doth extremely value himself upon the honours which he received in our Court, and giveth out that they were such as he pretended to. Being pressed, however, by one of my acquaintance to explain himself, he said he had been conducted to audience as the Envoyé of the Prince of Orange was, and with the same honours. Inasmuch that having spoken to several persons upon this subject, who do not understand the ceremonial of England, it is generally believed that he hath received all the honours due to the Envoyés of Sovereign Princes. But I knowing this to be false have already taken care and shall take more to disabuse all people who may be possessed with the belief of it.

1685, April 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mons^r. de Rizzini, the Envoyé from Modena to the French Court.—(In French.)—My voyage has been long, and I have only been here 3 or 4 days, and I shall not have my audience before Tuesday or Wednesday in the next week. This is why I cannot yet tell you anything regarding the Duke of Modena. You shall hear all in good time, for I shall not fail to speak of it and to do all that I ought in the matter.—Please acquaint the Queen with what has taken place.

1685, April 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Spanish ambassador, Don Pedro Ronquillo Marquis de la Fuente.

1685, May 2nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. Upon Monday I had audience of his most Christian Majesty at Versailles, when I presented my credentials to him, at the same time assuring him of his Majesty's royal amity, and of the desire which he hath to establish a firm intelligence and good correspondence with his most Christian Majesty which is so useful and necessary to the interests of both kingdoms, and which will be so disadvantageous to the designs of the enemies of both crowns. I added that the King my master desired nothing with more passion than the firm establishment of the peace and repose of Christendom, and that he was ready to do all which might depend of him, and to take all measures as the late King his brother had done, with his most Christian Majesty which might conduce to so good and glorious an end; his Majesty not doubting but that he on his side would contribute all his endeavours and designs as well towards the attaining of that as to the settling of that good correspondence which his Majesty so much desired. This being the sum of what I then said, the most Christian King received all with much civility, and told me that all his measures had ever tended to the establishment of the peace of Europe, and that they should always do so which should appear upon all occasions, that he desired nothing more than to have not only a good understanding but a true amity with the King my master; that he on his side should cultivate it, and that he hoped the King my master had the same good intentions and sentiments, and that his inclinations had been always kind to the person of his Majesty; he would endeavour that they should ever be so. To myself he was pleased to say that he was very glad to see me sent back with a new letter of credence; that I was very agreeable to him, and to add some other things with which it is not very material to charge this letter. I made his Majesty's compliments also to Monseigneur le Dauphin, Madame la Dauphine, to the Dukes of Burgundy and Anjou, and also to Mons^r. and to Madame, who all received them with great civility and respect. . . . It is here pretended that since the signing of the Treaty with the Genese, those people have taken several French ships, which if true may have ill consequences, especially since the most Christian King hath their Doge in his hands. The day is not yet named for the Doge's audience, but the Envoyé of Genoa is to have audience of this King upon Thursday next to acquaint him that the Doge will in a few days be ready for it, so that it is believed it may be about the 12th or 13th of this month. . . . Mons^r. de Croissy told me that a courier had been dispatched to Mons^r. Barillon with orders to acquaint his Majesty with what I mentioned in my last relating to the late memorial of Mons^r. de Feuquieres at Madrid.

1685, May 2nd, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to l'Abbé Rizzini (French). I had my audience of the most Christian King the day before yesterday, but I had so many things to say to him relating to the interests of the King my master that I could not speak of those of the Duke of Modena as I had proposed. I have asked for an audience expressly for this, which I shall have immediately; I hope to let you know soon that things passed there in a manner to give all kind of satisfaction to the Queen and to the Duke of Modena; for I ought to tell you that, having had an interview with Mons^r. de Croissy on this affair at the conclusion of my audience, I learnt from him that his most Christian Majesty was as well disposed as we could wish to terminate it, altho' he was very displeased at the conduct of Mons^r. le Prince Cæsar, whose banishment he wished; but out of the particular consideration that he has for the Queen he is willing to overlook this, to make her mistress of all things. I have stated to Mons^r. de Croissy that the Queen would take no part as regards Prince Cæsar, so that need not give any trouble to his Majesty.—This is why this difficulty being got over I do not see any others which can stay the good tendencies in which on this point Mons^r. de C. told me the King his master found himself. I hope then that all will go according to our wishes. You can assure yourself at least that it rests not with me, for I will not lose any time nor fail to tell you of all that passes. For what affects you personally, Mons^r. de C. has expressed to me that the King his master entertains sentiments of esteem and consideration for you, and that if you have received marks to the contrary, it was not from any dislike that his Majesty had for you personally, nor that he attributed to you any share in the non-fulfilment of the engagements which were entered into for M^{te}. de Bouillon, but only on account of the proceeding and conduct of Prince Cæsar.—This is all that I can say to you on these two matters.

1685, May 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir E. Sutton.—I have his Majesty's commands to return to the Parliament, when I hope I may be able to serve you more effectually than hitherto I have been able to do. I know the King hath a very good opinion of you, and believe that I will not fail to employ what interest I may have to do you service.

1685, May 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Peterborough.—I have received the honour of your lordship's of the 17th of last month, containing his Majesty's command to procure here some roots and seeds of flowers mentioned in M^{te}. de Vaur's letter enclosed, which I shall not fail to obey with as much care and diligence as I can, and I shall be careful to have them chosen by some persons knowing in things of that nature.

1685, May 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland. The day is not yet fixed for the audience of the Doge of Genoa, he being ill of the gout, but I believe it may be about 15th of this month. The M^{te}. de Marmi, Envoyé of Genoa, here addressed a letter the other day to Mons^r. de Croissy, which was intercepted and occasioned a message to be sent to him from this Court with a demand whether or no there were another Doge of Genoa than he who was at Paris, and to let him know if there were another he must come hither in pursuance of the Treaty. The Marquis de Marini answered that he knew of no other Doge than he who was now in Paris, and that for what related to the address of his dispatch, it was according to the ancient style of the Republic, and that he could not alter it. It is said here that Mons^r. de Guilleragues, this King's ambassador at Constantinople, is lately dead of an apoplexy. Affairs in Poland seem not to go to the satisfaction of this Court, the instances of the Pope having been better received of late than they have been formerly there, and the Diette of that kingdom continuing to prosecute the late treasurer Morstein with all severity, notwithstanding this King's letters to the contrary, signifying his high indignation at such a proceeding against a person whom he honoureth with his protection. The Doge hath paid upon Wednesday last an 100,000 crowns to the Comte de Fiesque, as it was stipulated by the late Treaty.

1685, May 9th, s. n. A private advice to the King.—I do not know, sir, if what I am to acquaint your Majesty with may have come to the notice of Mr. Skelton in Holland, and that so by that way you may have been informed of it, but if Mr. Skelton hath had no advice of it, it is very fit that your Majesty should know it, that you may make your use of it. I am certainly informed, and from hands who cannot be deceived or mistaken in this matter, that the Hollanders are resolved to put an end to the affair of Bantam, and as they perceive well that it will cost them something, they are resolved to sacrifice a sum of money, which shall not be great, towards the accommodating of it, but fearing that it may mount too high if your Majesty and this King jointly demand a satisfaction, they intend to use their endeavours to content and satisfy your Majesty separately and apart, which if they can bring about they will not trouble themselves much for satisfying of France. But if they find that they cannot agree with your Majesty upon this foot, they will try to make up the business with this King, being not willing to satisfy both. They think themselves strong enough in the Indies for their own defence (as I think indeed they are), but it is necessary for them to be assured of one of your Majestys for their interests and affairs in Europe, they preferring however your Majesty's amity to that of the most Christian King. As to the King of Denmark, who hath also an interest in this affair, they make no manner of reflection upon him, nor seem to consider him as to the satisfaction he may demand, but the Danish minister here is using all his endeavours to engage France in the affair for the King his master. Your Majesty may rely upon it that this is the secret of this affair, and if the Dutch commissioners who are to treat of this affair are arrived yet in England, I am persuaded that your Majesty may soon see the truth of this by their way of negotiating. I have been informed of this in very great confidence, and also been intreated to impart it immediately to your Majesty, and to no other person. Upon Saturday was a seven night another great sum of money was remitted by Mons^r. Gruslé to England, amounting to it may be near 100 thousand crowns, and I am told that on Saturday last another great sum was, or was to be, returned. I forgot before to acquaint your Majesty that the Dutch ambassador here hath, as I have great reasons to believe, received orders, already to feel the pulse of this Court in this affair, but he is to press nothing till it be known how the commissioners may succeed in England. The late memorial delivered by Mons^r. de Fenquieres at Madrid concerning the cession of the Spanish low countries to the Elector of Bavaria is not approved of by all the ministers of this King, his most Christian Majesty having only followed the advice of one or two in it. They say they think the mask is pulled off a little too soon, and that he had better have taken Navarre, or what he had a mind to on that side, upon any other pretence than to have declared himself so freely in a conjuncture which is so delicate as the present one.

1685, May 9th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—The time of the Doge of Genoa's audience doth now approach, tho' I do not hear that the day is yet named, but it is concluded that it will be some time of the next week; he hath received several little mortifications since his arrival here, and particularly the other day it was intimated to him that he should order the pulling out the great nails which went round the upper part of his coach of state, because it was permitted only to those of this royal family to have them so here . . . Letters of the 10th and of the 12th of March do confirm the news of the death of Mons^r. de Guilleragues, this King's ambassador at Constantinople, upon the 8th of the same month . . . The Chimean hath since his death complimented Madame de Guilleragues in the name of the Grand Vizir, and hath assured her that she and those of the French nation shall be considered as much as they were during the life of Mons^r. de Guilleragues. This King hath named Mons^r. de St. Amant, who was lately his ambassador in Morocco, to go in the same quality to Constantinople . . . The enclosed letters for the Queen are sent to me by the Envoyé of Mantua.

1685, May 16th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—Mons^r. de Croissy was advertised the last week by Mons^r. de Marini, Envoyé of Genoa in this Court, that the Doge of that Republic was ready to receive audience of his most Christian Majesty when he should be pleased to admit him to it. At the same time Mons^r. de Marini was instructed to enquire after what manner the Doge's reception should be; it was answered to him generally that he should be received as the ambassadors were who were sent from those who were not crowned heads. That the Doge when he made his harangue should be covered, and that he should be conducted to audience in the King's and Madame la Dauphin's coaches by the Mareschal d'Humieres, who should go to receive him at his own house. The Marquis de Marini remonstrated then that if the Mareschal d'Humieres did go to receive the Doge at his hôtel he could not give him the right hand there, because that he gave it to nobody at Genoa, not even to the Pope's Nonce; that lately he had not given it to the Prince de Monaco there, and that besides he had particular orders from his Republic not to yield it to any person here. The said Envoyé also pressed much that the 4 senators might be covered before his most Christian Majesty. Mons^r. de Croissy replied that he wondered that the Doge and senators should start so many difficulties as they daily did about the manner of their reception, but that however he would acquaint the King his master with what Mons^r. de Marini had represented to him, and that he should speedily know his Majesty's pleasure. This he performed, and the answer was to this effect, that since the Doge made a difficulty to give the right hand to the Mareschal in his own house, that he did resolve that he should not be conducted by a Mareschal of France, but only by the ordinary introducers of ambassadors, and that the senators should not be covered before him. These preliminaries being adjusted, tho' not to the satisfaction of the Genoese, his most Christian Majesty appointed yesterday at 11 of the clock for the audience of the Doge, but at the same time sent Mons^r. de Boneuil to him for a copy of the speech which he intended to make, because he would know before hand if it were conformable to the Treaty. Accordingly the Envoyé of Genoa carried a copy of it upon Monday last, which was perused and approved of in this counsel; matters being thus settled the Doge with 4 senators arrived at Versailles about a quarter before 11 of the clock in one of this King's coaches, which held 6 persons, the 6th being Mons^r. de Boneuil. The Envoyé of Genoa and Mons^r. Girault followed in the coach of Madame la Dauphine. These were followed by 4 coaches belonging to the Doge, and by one belonging to the Envoyé of Genoa, there being a considerable cortège besides. The equipage of the Doge was extremely magnificent. His coach of state was richly gilded and curiously carved and painted, lined with rich brocard, and the curtains cloth of gold with the fringe of gold. There was no Imperiale of velvet, as it is called here, because he was ordered to take out the nails, the carrying of which is permitted to no one below Mons^r. and Madame here. It was drawn by 8 horses richly harnessed. The other coaches were proportionably rich. He had 48 laquais and 12 pages on horseback, which with his other liveries, which were all very rich, amounted to the number of one hundred. His other attendants were numerous. Being arrived in this manner about 12 o'clock he was ordered to audience, thro' a prodigious crowd of people from the Salle des Ambassadeurs, where he had reposed himself, to this King's great apartment. When he arrived, and when he crossed the court he did not find the French and Suisse Guards standing to their arms, with their drums beating and colours flying, as they do when ambassadors from Kings are received. In ascending the great stairs, he only found the Cent Suisses in order, tho' without their habit of ceremony, and in the Salle des Gardes he found the Guardes du Corps in rank, and the Duc de Duras, captain of that Guard then in waiting, ready at the door to receive him. He passed thro' all the greatest apartment, which was magnificently furnished and adorned with a prodigious quantity of vases and other ornaments of silver and of marble, to the long gallery, in which all the conquests and triumphs of this King are represented in painting. At the end of the gallery his most Christian Majesty appeared, surrounded by Monseign^r. le Dauphin, Mons^r. le Duc d'Orleans, and several other princes and noblemen standing before his throne, all of massive silver, elevated upon an estrade. He was uncovered whilst the Doge was approaching him, and so soon as he began to speak they were both covered. The speech your lordship will see, I suppose, in the next Gazette of Paris. It was only a civil compliment without asking pardon, and this King made as civil a return to it. After which each of the senators made his compliment in particular. The habit of the Doge was a robe of crimson velvet, with a bonnet of the same, and a ruffe about his neck. The senators had robes and bonnets of black velvet after the same fashion. At his return from audience a dinner was prepared for the Doge and his company, which, being ended, he was obliged to compliment every one of the royal family in particular, tho' no foreign minister in this Court ever saluteth any of them below those of the family of Monsieur. Before the Duc de Chartres and Mademoiselle, the Prince of Condé, the Duke and Duchesse of Engueen, the Princess of Conti, and Mademoiselle de Montpensier, and Madame de Guise the 4 senators were covered. The Court seemeth to have been very well satisfied with the behaviour of the Doge, which was indeed easy and free, and yet very honourable and decent, and agreeing with his character. He is to have a private audience without ceremony with this King upon Friday or Saturday, and he prepareth himself within a few days to take leave. Thus, my lord, this affair which hath entertained the world so long is passed, and the Genoese may (I suppose) at least for the present enjoy that peace and repose which they have purchased at so great a rate. I am to inform your lordship that the Duke of St. Albans being at this audience, it was insinuated to him by the order of this King that he might be covered when the Doge and other Princes put on their hats, which he was. I being in the Salle des Ambassadeurs when the Doge and the senators returned from their audience, and they being told who I was, received a compliment from each of them severally, in which they acknowledged in very obliging terms his late Majesty's favour and kindness to the Republic. Mons^r. de Palavicino is expected here every day on his way to England, he being going to compliment his Majesty in the name of the Republic of Genoa The Protestant cantons of Switzerland have lately written to this King to desire him at their instance to suspend for some time the execution of his late edicts against the Huguenots of France, which he hath taken very ill from them, and hath testified his displeasure to them for having presumed to concern themselves in an affair of that nature. A Muscovite ambassador is now at St. Denis, and is to make his entry into this city on Thursday; I am afraid you will be troubled with him in England. P.S. The Envoyé of Mantua gave me the enclosed letter for the Queen.

Mem. I sent the speech of the Doge by the post which arrived after my paquet was sealed from the Envoyé of Genoa.

1685, May 16th, Paris.—Lord Preston to l'Abbé Rizzini (in French). Complimentary.—I have had the honour of an interview with his most Christian Majesty about the affairs of the Duke of Modena upon an occasion which offered itself quite à propos. The following is what occurred.—I informed the most Christian King that the Queen was extremely grieved that her brother, the Duke of Modena, had so behaved as to render his conduct disagreeable to and suspected by his most Christian Majesty; but that she could assure him that the Prince had been thus unfortunate rather thro' the advice of certain ill regulated persons than by his own inclinations; as she did not think him capable of doing of his own accord anything displeasing to his most Christian Majesty, &c. . . . The King answered me upon this that in truth the conduct of the Duke of Modena had much displeased him, not only in this affair of Prince Caesar, but also for what had passed concerning Mlle. Bouillon, but that he had so much regard for the Queen that he would always willingly make her the mistress of his feelings, being persuaded of the good intentions she had and still has to bring Monsieur de Modena to a better train of conduct; but nevertheless he pressed for the exile of Prince Caesar. I told him that the Queen took no side with regard to the fall of that Prince, and that she would do all she could to obtain from his Majesty all the submission that he could pretend to in the matter. In a word the King was firm, and insists on his exile. This is the substance of what passed on that matter. In other respects his most Christian Majesty expressed all kinds of regard for the Queen and very good intentions towards the Duke of Modena, &c.

1685, May 19th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—Since the disgrace of the Duke of Medina Celi all public affairs seem to be at a stand in the Court of Spain; tho' that King hath declared that he will govern himself and have no more a chief minister, it is yet feared that he is scarce capable of supporting so great a weight as is that of the government, and especially in a conjuncture so delicate, in regard of Spaine at least, as the present is. . . . The Doge of Genoa had yesterday a private audience of his most Christian Majesty, and I think he was at his leveé. He saw the waters, they having lately finished one of the best fountains on purpose to be shown to him. He goeth to-morrow to St. Germain, and afterwards to St. Cloud, to see the beauties of that place. It is not Mons^r. de St. Amant who goeth to Constantinople, but it is said to be one Mons^r. de Bruauté. . . . The deputies are now arrived from almost all parts for the assembly of the clergy, which is to begin the 22nd of this month at St. Germain en laye, where the archbishop of Paris will reside; the assembly will be held within the castle. The Muscovite ambassador made his entry from St. Denis accompanied by the Marescal d'Humieres upon Thursday. He sayeth that he is come on purpose to offer the amity of the Czars his masters to France, and that for that reason he is to go to no other place, so that for this time you will not be troubled with him in England. They think of sending an ambassador into Muscovy so soon as this ambassador shall leave this place. He is to have his first audience on Monday at Versailles. The Englishmen who have with great success raised the water of the river of Seine and brought it into the gardens of the Cardinal de Bouillon at the Abbaye de St. Martin near to Pontoise have desired me to transmit to your lordship the description of a new engine which they have invented for the security of ships against the accidents of leakage or of fire. Your lordship will be pleased to shew it to his Majesty, and if he doth approve of it, the persons are ready to attend his pleasure.

1685, May 23rd, st. no., Paris. The same to the same.—I received your lordship's of the 7th instant yesterday, with Mons^r. Barillon's memorial concerning the Hudson's Bay Company, and also the answer to it enclosed. I shall take effectual care to execute his Majesty's commands concerning this affair before I leave this place. I have yesterday spoken to Mr. Arthur concerning the business of Father Patrick's estate, and I shall take care in it to-morrow at Versailles. I hope upon Saturday to leave this place. There hath been some disorder at Genoa upon a report which the Spaniards had spread amongst the people that the Doge and the senators had not received the honours which they hoped for. A great many ridiculous stories run at Genoa upon this occasion, and the partie which opposed the accommodation insult over the others, and exhort them not to disarm; that the Doge will not be suffered to leave this place till the galleys of Spaine, which are now in the Darse, have left that station. Notwithstanding this, he and the senators are to take leave upon Friday or Saturday next, and they are only to visit his most Christian Majesty, Monsign^r. Le Dauphin, and Madame La Dauphine, and not all the other Princes whom they saluted at their arrival. They are invited this day to Versailles to see the waters, and there is to be a great ball there this night for their entertainment; they leave this place within a few days. The Prince of Carignan, by the intercession of this King, is to be recalled from his banishment, and the Princess of Bade is to return from Rennes, to which place she was relegated. The Cardinal Homodii being lately dead at Rome, there are at present 26 caps void. The Muscovite ambassador had audience of this King upon Monday at Versailles, and made his usual present of furs, &c. The subject of his commission is not yet certainly known. The ouverture of the assembly of the clergy is to be upon Friday next at this archbishop's palace, and will be continued on Tuesday at St. Germain en laye. There have lately been embarked at Calais great quantity of ammunition to be transported to Bayonne, as if there were a design to make war towards those frontiers.

1685, Aug. 22nd, s. n. Paris.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Sunderland.—I received by the last post your lordship's of the 6th instant, accompanied with 2 orders of council, the one relating to an English ship lately carried into Port Louis and detained there, the other to some pieces of damaske made at Genoa by order of an English merchant seized at Thoulon and detained by the intendant there. I have passed offices in both these affairs yesterday, with Mons^r. de Croissy, and I hope we shall obtain justice for the parties concerned The accounts from Spaine are still very dissatisfactory to this Court, which I suppose your lordship will receive more early by another way than I can communicate them from hence to you. The apprehensions of all people are great for the Queen of Spaine, and indeed not without cause, for tho' by examination of all the persons accused her innocence doth appear, yet the manner of treating her giveth great reason to herself and to others to suspect that her life may not long be secure from some attempt, either by poison or some other way; she hath written to this purpose to Mons^r. and Madame, which hath given to both of them great occasion of disquiet. I suppose to-morrow or Friday I shall have my audience of congé, and I am preparing to leave this place the next week.

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. 6.

Letter Book.

1682, May 30, n. s.—1685, May 23. (149 pp.)

These letters are all in French, except when stated to be in English.

1682, May 30, n., Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy, Sécretaire d'état pour les affaires étrangères.—Complimentary on succeeding Mr. Savile.—Asks for a passport for the baggage of the Duchess of Monmouth who is leaving.

1682, June 10, n. s., Paris. The same to the same.—Thanks for sending the King of France's orders to give Lord P. satisfaction for the insults to his servants. Requests that a day in the following week may be fixed for him to have an audience of the K. of France. Asks for a passport for 6 horses and some books which are coming to him from England.

1682, June 13, n. s., Paris. The same to M. Giraud. Is sorry that the passport for the Duchess of Monmouth has come so late, for she has gone; so he sends it back as useless.

1682, June 14, n. s., Paris. The same to Mrs. Sydrophen (Siderfin) at Calais.—He has heard from Col. Riche and from Secretary Jenkins of the insult to her. M. de Ruvigny's son has told him that his father had received letters that a lady and 4 gentlemen had had protection in his house for 4 days, and that they had removed thence, and that the lady was in the hands of the magistrates of Calais, and that the men who called themselves Capt. Clifford and Capt. Sarsfield had escaped. Says that he will solicit her release and receive her into his house if she should come to Paris, and that if she returns to England she shall be protected there. Says he is known to Col. Riche and Dr. Hooper.

1682, June 16, Paris. The same to the Duchess of Portsmouth. Regrets he did not arrive at Paris soon enough to kiss her hands, but as he hears of her intentions of being soon there will not fail to visit her. The last letters from England give news of the King's perfect recovery. Sends some letters for her and Lady Pembroke, which he received in his last packet, on to Bourbon, in hopes they may reach her before she leaves.

1682, June 21, Paris. The same to M. de Croissy.—A sudden indisposition prevents him going to Versailles to speak with M. de Croissy on the subject of orders from England to obtain compliance with the memorial which he encloses, and on which he begs M. de Croissy to obtain the French King's orders.

(Enclosure.) Lord Preston's memorial to the K. of France, asking that he will give orders to the governor and magistrates of Calais to have Captains Clifford and Sarsfield arrested, and direct that Mrs. Siderfin may be delivered to those who are coming for her, so that she may be taken to England in one of the King of England's yachts.

1682, June 16. Copy of Lord Preston's harangue (at his audience) to the King of France.—Compliments from King Charles, and letters from him and his Queen and the Duke of York.

Same day. His harangue to the Queen of France.

Same day. His harangue to the Dauphin.

Same day. His harangue to the Dauphiness.

June 23. His harangue to Monsieur at St. Cloud.

Same day. His harangue to Madame.

Same day. His harangue to Mademoiselle.

1682, July 7. Memorial presented to the King at Versailles about Mr. Bedford Whiting's complaint of his daughter being carried off to a convent in order to make her change her religion. Whiting was an English merchant residing at Lisle, in Flanders. He contends that the ordinance of June 1681, that the parents of children of the reformed religion should give pensions proportioned to their means to such of their children as should be converted, only applies to French subjects, and does not apply to non-naturalized strangers. Prays that Whiting may be discharged from the pension imposed on him, and that the garrison put in his house may be withdrawn, &c. (4 pp.)

1682, July 7. Memorial presented by Lord Preston to the King at Versailles: For the expediting justice in the case of James Monro, W. Ranger, and others English merchants whose ships were taken in 1676 by Cherbourg privateers, the cargoes pillaged, and the masters and sailors treated with great cruelty.

1682, July 12, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Says that he has received letters from the Secretary of State in England telling that the King of England is urgent about Whiting's affair.

1682, July 21. Memorial by Lord Preston to M. de Croissy for a passport for the Marquis of Winchester to return to England, which should include also the silver plate which the Marquis brought from England. (Tempest writes in the margin, "Not signed by my Lord.")

1682, July 23. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Asks for the passport in conformity with the above memorial.

1682, July 28. Lord Preston's memorial presented to the King at Versailles. About the insults offered more than 2 months ago to his servants by the Count of Nassau's livery servants.

1682, Aug. 5. Memorial to M. de Croissy asking for a passport for the wife of Viscount Hyde, first minister of State to the K. of England (and his horses, goods, and equipage), she intending to go to Bourbon to drink the waters.

Same date. Memorial to the King to the same effect.

1682, Aug. 5, Paris. Lord Preston to Madame le Jeune, at Dieppe. Asking her to deliver the passport into Lady Hyde's hands as soon as she arrives, and to render her all the assistance possible.

1682, Aug. 6, Paris. Lord Preston to M. Bonceil, Introducteur des Ambassadeurs.—Congratulations on the accouchement of the Dauphiness, and begging him to procure an audience of the King of France if any other foreign ambassador asked for me.

1682, Aug. 11. Memorial not signed, presented by Lord Preston's order to M. de Croissy, asking justice for an insult to M. Godet, one of Lord P.'s servants in his house, who, on pretext of small debt owing, was on the 10th assaulted in the street by one Cabot, aided by 15 or 16 men armed with swords and pistols, and grievously wounded in the hand, and dragged prisoner to St. Martin des Champs.

1682, Aug. 19, n. s., at Versailles. Copies of Lord P.'s compliments to the King, the Queen, and Monseigneur on the occasion of the accouchement of the Dauphiness.

On the same day he notes that he had audience of the Duke of Burgundy, of Monsieur and Madame, but that they were much to the same purpose, and extempore; that Madame la Marechâle de la Motte, governess of the young Duke, answered for him; and that he (Lord P.) complimented Monsieur and Madame only upon the birth of the Duke and the increase of the Royal family, and not upon the accouchement of the Dauphiness.

1682, Aug. 22, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy.—Hears that it is intended to print Primi's book at Geneva, and that one of them has been sent (et qu'on en a envoyé un) to a printer. As the matter concerns the King of England, he asks that a royal order may be sent to the French resident at Geneva to speak to the magistrates of that town, so that the book may not be printed.

at Versailles. Asking for justice on the assailants of M. Godet. (Sent with the next letter.)

Same date. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Encloses the memorial about Godet, his French secretary. At the instance of the Duke of Ormond, Viceroy of Ireland, he asks permission for the Sieur Bachelier to go to England with his family into the Duke's service.—Hears, while he is writing, of the death of the Countess of Salisbury, which obliges the Earl to return into England.—Asks for a passport for the Earl, his equipage, and silver plate, &c.—Knows that M. de Croissy has given orders for his satisfaction in the matter of the Count of Nassau, but thinks they are a little neglected.

Same date. Memorial to M. de Croissy for a passport for the Sieur Bachelier.

Same date. The like for the Earl of Salisbury.

1682, Sept. 25. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Has received letters by the Duke of York to be presented to the King, Queen, Dauphin and Dauphiness, and asks him to learn the King's pleasure how they shall be presented.

Same date. Lord Preston to M. Boneuil. Asks him to give the enclosed to M. de Croissy, and ascertain the King's orders regarding the presentation of the letters.

1682, Sept. 17, Paris.—Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. The gout has confined him to his room, so he is obliged to write.—The Dutch have asked the King of England's good offices to obtain the removal of the French troops placed in the town and principality of Orange, and the reimbursement of the losses to the Prince of Orange and the burgesses and inhabitants. It is considered a contravention of the Treaty of Nimègue. Asks an answer from the King of France, so that it may be remitted to the King of England. Again presses the business of Bedford Whiting, who is still harassed.

1682, Sept. 26, Paris. Lord Preston to Mons^r. de Verthament, Conseiller des Roy en ses conseils, et Maître de Requetes ordinaires en son hostel.—In behalf of Mr. Monroe and his associates.

1682, Oct. 10. Lord Preston to Mr. Colbert, Ministre et Secrétaire d'Etat.—Complimentary, and asking a passport on behalf of the Duke of York for 50 tuns of wine of Cahors which he had purchased.

1682, Nov. 2, Paris. Lord Preston to the President of Calais.—Thanks for what the president had done for Mrs. Siderfin. Asks favour for Hendry Tailleur, a Scotchman, who had been imprisoned, and whom the president had released. Tailleur has been recommended to Lord Preston by persons for whom he has great regard, who say he is incapable of the action whereof he is accused. Tailleur's partner Thody left England ten or twelve years ago on account of some rascality. Asks the president to extend his protection to Tailleur as far as justice allows.

1682, Nov. 2, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. The Chevalier Morland,* an English gentleman of rare merit, who has an admirable genius and consummate experience in water-works, has come express to offer his services to the King of France, and to receive orders from de Croissy's brother. Lord Preston asks favour and protection for him.

1682, Nov. 9, Paris. Lord Preston to —, merchant, at Rouen. About passing through the Custom house of Rochefort a barrel of bottles of Spanish wine, a barrel of Rhine wine, a barrel of cheese, and a box of tobacco pipes, which he had ordered for himself.

1682, Nov. 11, Paris. Lord Preston to M. Le Bel, concierge du Chateau de Versailles.—Asks when the waters and apartments of Versailles can be seen, and if he can go on Saturday to see all their beauties, in accordance with the permission which he has asked from M. Bontemps by M. Geraud.

1682, Nov. 17. Memorial by Lord Preston, presented by order of King Charles, that the King of France will permit Robert Lang to be English Consul in the town and port of Marseilles in the place of Sir Richard Colston, who was long resident there. King Charles hopes that the King of France will not delay the necessary confirmation.

1682, Nov. 17. Another memorial by Lord Preston about Bedford Whiting, who is still harassed.

1682, Dec. 25, presented at Versailles.—Lord Preston to M. de Croissy for justice in regard to Mr. Monroe's merchandize.—The bearer will speak on Lord Preston's part regarding a passport for Lady Hyde.

1682, Dec. 25, presented at Versailles.—Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Wishes to know what the King has answered on the matter about which Lord P. asked de Croissy to speak.

n. d. Lord Preston to Mons^r. Foscari, the Venetian ambassador.—Sends the memorial which he promised yesterday. Has not received a copy of the other, which King Charles's envoy has presented at the Hague.

1682, Dec. 15, Paris. Lord Preston to Col. Lacy, at Roussillon. Thanks for the box of eau de cette sent from Montpellier . . . At Versailles nothing is thought of but divertissements, and they will be continued all the winter. Nothing in the world is finer or more agreeable than what is seen there. The illuminations, the decorations, the music, the comedy, the opera, the fêtes all conspire to feast and surprise the senses.

1682, Dec. 18, Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Ferrers, at Marseilles (in English) . . . Every post brings us an account of the good estate of his Majesty's affairs in England, and of the advantages which he gains daily over the disaffected party there.

1682, Dec. 6, Paris. Lord Preston to M. Boucherat, Conseiller du Roy és les conseils d'Etat.—The King of France has favourably received Lord P.'s applications for justice to Mr. Munro and his associates. He asks M. Boucherat to contribute his assistance.

1682, Dec. 15. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King of France for permission to the Sieur François Amonet (Ammonet in the margin) to reside (with his wife and family) in England, in the service of King Charles, as one of the gentlemen in ordinary of his Privy Chamber.

1682, Dec. 15, Paris. Memorial by Lord Preston, accompanying the demand (see next paper) of some merchants of the Isle of Jersey for mainlevée and restitution of some coined money seized by the receiver of the bureau of Coutances, in Normandy, under pretext of the transport of gold and silver out of the kingdom being forbidden. He refers to the last Treaty of Commerce between the two Crowns in February 1677.

1682, Dec. 15, presented. The request of the Jersey merchants mentioned in the foregoing memorial. (3¼ pp.) The remonstrants were David Patriarche, Abraham Aubin, Michel du Pré, Rachel de Carteret, Henry Salenoue, and George du Maresq. From time immemorial they have traded in France with stockings and other goods of wool and silk made in the Island, and have always brought back their money earned without interruption. But, in November last, on their return they put into the boat at the port of Containville divers bags of money, with their respective marks, containing in all 5,200 livres, for transport to Jersey; the King of France's receiver at Coutance seized them. The remonstrants say it is in contravention of the Treaty of 1677, the fourth clause of which declares gold and silver, coined and uncoined, not to be contraband. They pray restoration.

1682, Dec. 16, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy.—Again, on behalf of Monroe, at King Charles's instance.

1682, Dec. 19, Paris. Lord Preston to M. le Camus, lieutenant civil.—Asks him to attend to the cause of Mr. King, an English gentleman, against one Chapolle.

1682, Dec. 22, Paris. Lord Preston to Mons^r. le Chancelier. Complains of the inattention of M. de Verthement to his applications in the affair of the English merchants [Monro and others]. They are now reduced to present a placet to the Chancellor. He requests the Chancellor's favour for it.

1682, Dec. 24, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy.—He returned yesterday well satisfied with the way in which the King received his representations about the Jersey merchants.—Hears that the Marquis de Bligni has complained to the King that he (Lord P.) has given asylum to the Marquise de Bligni in his house. He does not know either the Marquis or his wife; but hears that the Marquis has been making enquiries of his (Lord P.'s) servants, and offering them money to make them say she is there. Asks de Croissy to disabuse the Marquis, and to justify him (Lord P.) to the King.

1683, Feb. 5, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Bernard Howard. Sorry not to see him the other day at Versailles; hopes to meet him there on Tuesday. Sends 100 louis d'ors by the bearer, Lord Drumlanrick, son of the Marquis of Queenborow, Lord High Treasurer of Scotland. Asks Mr. Howard to endeavour by the favour of the Marechal de Belfond, or some other friend, to get him (Drumlanrick) into the appartement at the ball, and also to see the opera.

1683, Jan. 28. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy.—Remonstrance against a second insult, M. Godet having been taken out of his coach, while on Lord Preston's affairs, and taken to prison.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1683, Jan. 30. Lord Preston to M. de Pierceville, Gouverneur de Dieppe.—Asks care for Lady Preston if she should land at Dieppe.

1683, Jan. 30. Lord Preston to Le President de Calais.—Thanks for the politeness shewn to Lady Preston while she was at Calais.

1683, Jan. 30. Lord Preston to Madame le Jeune, at Dieppe. Thanks for her care at the landing of his goods.

1683, Feb. 5. Lord Preston to M. de Bonneuil. Asks him to allow the bearer his (Lord Preston's) relation to see the beauties of Versailles.

1683, Feb. 8. Memorial by Lord Preston (not addressed directly to the King). Asks the King to procure satisfaction to be given to Mr. Doughty (an Englishman) in his claim against Mr. Napier, an Englishman naturalized in France, in the assembly of the Marshal's of France. King Charles is convinced that Mr. Doughty's conduct is honourable and Mr. Napier's the reverse.

1683, Feb. 17. Lord Preston to M. Bouchard. Thanks for attention to his recommendations in the matter of Mr. Munro and his associates.

1683, Feb. 19. Lord Preston to M. le Chancelier. Thanks for the like attention of the Chancellor. Hopes that the Chancellor will enable him to give King Charles an account of the favourable termination of the affair.

1683, Feb. 19, n. s. Lord Preston to M. Colbert. In favour of Mr. Munro and his associates, and complaining of the chicanery of their adversaries in the law courts.

1683, March 26, presented at Versailles. Lord Preston's memorial to the King, asking him to give orders to the Marshals of France to take cognizance of the dispute between Mr. Doughty and Mr. Napier.

1683, April 6, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy.—Asks satisfaction for violence committed in an English lady's house. Asks for permission for certain persons to remain in England in King Charles's service. (In the margin "the 2 memorials for Lady Harvey's coachman and Mr. Guil's Congé.")

1683, April 5, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Asks for orders to facilitate the transmission of wines, liqueurs, and other things, which King Charles had commissioned M. Cottureau to procure for him.

1683, April 6, presented at Versailles. Lord Preston's memorial to the King, asking justice for the insult to Lady Hervey by priests of the parish of St. Roch and others forcing themselves into the room of her English coachman who was at the point of death.

1683, April 14, n. s. Lord Preston to Mr. Lang, consul at Marseilles. (English.) Telling what he has done in the matter of the detention of Mr. Ellyot; and telling Lang to endeavour to procure the release of certain Englishmen, who were then slaves at Marseilles, they having served above the time for which they were condemned to the galleys.

1683, April 2. Lord Preston to the Mayor of Dieppe. Assures him that Mr. Forrest, a Scotch gentleman, who has been arrested on suspicion of being a Frenchman, is a subject of King Charles, and begging that he may be allowed to go to England.

1683, April 12. Lord Preston to M. le Doux, conseiller en Parlement à Paris. Earnestly asking him to expedite the affairs of M. Deyos de la Mellville, the justice of whose cause the Presidial of Angers had recognized.

1683, April 12. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. I am informed that the officers of Marseilles have kept back Mr. Ellyot, an English gentleman, who was dispatched in a vessel sent express by Vice-Admiral Herbert, commanding a squadron of King Charles's ships before Algiers, with a packet of importance which he had orders to carry with all speed to his Majesty as soon as he landed. The pretext was that he came from a place where there was a contagious disease. He has not put foot in the land of the Algerians, who are the common enemies of both Crowns.—Asks that orders for Mr. Ellyot's release may be procured.

1683, April 16, n. s. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Requests him to get the King's permission for his Italian comedians to spend some time at the Court of King Charles.—Asks for the packet addressed to the King, taken from Ellyot, at Marseilles.

1683, June 27, n. s. Lord Preston to Mr. Bridgman, at Marseilles.—Has written to M. de Croissy to get the King's order to procure Bridgman's release.

1683, June 27, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy. Would not have troubled him, but that he had been informed that M. le Comte de Broille, Governor of Avennes, had arrested Mr. Bridgman for having walked on the ramparts, thinking him to be a spy: but Bridgman was ignorant of the regulations regarding fortified places.

1683, June 27, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to M. le Comte de Broille, Lieutenant-General des armées du Roy et Gouverneur d'Avennes.—Is going to meet the King in Alsace in 2 or 3 days, and to speak to him on the subject of Mr. Bridgman. In the meantime begs favourable treatment for Mr. Bridgman.

[1683], July 24, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Ruigny. Begs that he will not trouble the Marquis d'Estrades to come and see him, as he (Preston) is quite satisfied with the disavowal which Ruigny says the Marquis's son has made on the subject of Preston's complaint.

Letter to the Envoy of Genoa, detailing M. de Croissy's answer.

That the Republic of Genoa, in order to put itself on a good footing with the King of France, had only to alter its conduct and behave respectfully in future. That the King of France had reason to be displeased with that Republic for increasing the number of its galleys and having recourse to other powers; but that he was ready to sacrifice his resentments in consideration of his (Preston's) master's representations in favour of the Republic, and would not do anything to stay the negotiations on the tapis for establishing the peace of Christendom.

n. d. Lord Preston to M. le Chineye. On Tuesday he presented to M. de Croissy, at Versailles, a memorial for a passport for Lord Northumberland.

Tuesday morning. Lord Preston to M. l'Ambassadeur d'Espagne. Introduces Lord Douglas, who has come from King Charles to condole with King of France on the death of his Queen.—Asks for a copy that day of the letter which M. de Staremberg has written to his Highness of Lorraine.

n. d. Lord Preston to M. de Boneuille. Will communicate to Lord Douglas what B. has written touching the audience, and Lord Douglas will wait the King's orders. Thinks it will not be necessary for himself to appear at Fontainebleau to introduce the English envoys, since he has not had the honour to receive permission to make his condolences, altho' other foreign ministers have had that honour, to his exclusion.

1683, Dec. 1, Paris. Lord Preston to M. Bomeney. Thinks that Bomeney has already received a letter from Secretary Jenkins requesting him to go immediately to London on King Charles's private business. Bomeney will be well contented for his pains. If he wants money for the journey Preston will supply him.

On application made to the King and council by Lord Preston for a mainlevée from the goods of the deceased Lady Alice Bankes, widow of the late Sir John Borlase, Bt., seized at the request of the farmer-general of the domains on pretext of droit d'aubaine, Lord P. applied to the Marquis de Croissy, and after telling him that there could be no difficulty about the mainlevée on the terms of the Treaties he put into his hands.

A memorial to the King referring to Treaties between the two Crowns, dated 1606, 1625, 1629, 1632, 1644, and 1655, which declared that the droit d'aubaine should not apply to English merchants and other subjects of the K. of England living in France, and citing decisions by the Council of State in conformity, and praying a mainlevée. He appended copies of the decisions above-mentioned. M. de Croissy neglected to move the matter in Council, so Lord Preston conferred with him; when M. de Croissy said that the Treaties were not then observed in that point, because Frenchmen got naturalized in England, and Englishmen got naturalized in France, which would not be necessary if the Treaties were in force. Lord Preston insisted that they were observed, citing the decrees in council, the latest being in 1676, ordering mainlevées. M. de Croissy said the council would not give a general decision on the point, but would only make an order for a mainlevée. This Lord Preston thinks to show that they intend to make a favour of it every time the case arrives. On another occasion M. de Croissy said that the English council avoided the advances made by the French for a new Treaty of Commerce, in which the difficulties in the old Treaties would be removed, and that the French council had or seemed to have reasons for not determining the point of exemption by the decree which had been issued about the goods of Lady Borlase.—Then come extracts from the registers of the Council of State; comprising the decree for the mainlevée, the royal warrant of 21st Dec. 1683, and extracts from divers Treaties.

n. d. Lord Preston to Le President de Calais. Hendry, the Scotch tailor, who in his process against Thandé Colman had been obliged to deposit money in order to be released from custody, but had procured a mainlevée, found difficulty in recovering the money. Lord Preston prays the president's favour for the man.

n. d. Lord Preston's memorial to the King about the affair of Canada. The Hudson's Bay Company had complained to King Charles about cruelties of the French at the river in Port of Nelson, where the company have had an establishment by virtue of letters patent under the great seal for more than 60 years since the said river was discovered by Sir Thomas Button. The assault by the French Canadians is thus described: they burnt the company's house, took prisoners the Commandant John Bridger, and the servants of the company, and planted the King of France's standard there, saying they did all by order of the Canadian Government; and they changed the names of the two branches of the river, calling one Port Bourbon and the other Port Louis. In August following they seized an English ship called the Batchelor's Delight, &c., &c. Lord Preston prays satisfaction.

n. d. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King of France for justice against Radison, the leader of the assailants at Port Nelson.

n. d. Lord Preston to M. de Seignelay, recommending his attention to the preceding memorial.

n. d. The like to M. de Croissy.

n. d. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King about the droit d'ambrière.

n. d. Memorial of Lord Preston to the King against the making the Scotch pay new imports in the French ports; it being in contravention of privileges given and confirmed by divers French kings, particularly by Louis XIII. in 1613; and citing two arrêts of 1659 and 1663 in conformity.

n. d. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King on the subject of an Irish vessel taken by a Calais privateer.

n. d. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King on the subject of an outrage by the Sieur de Tranquay, the King's Lieutenant-General in Little Guiana (Petites Guanes), by seizing the ship of John Banks and other English merchants.

1684, June 24, Paris. Lord Preston to M. de Seignelay, requesting him to present to the King two memorials enclosed.

Memorial by Lord Preston to the King in favour of William Allen and Stephen Stritch, merchants of Limerick, owners of the ship James and John of London, laden with goods belonging to the English Consul at Corunna, and bound for Ostend, which at a mile and a half from port was seized by Jean Doublet, captain of an armed Duakirker: he prays justice.

Memorial by Lord Preston to the King (nearly 5 pp.). In 1627, Thomas Marteau and Pierre Cadeau, bourgeois of Paris and André Launay, bourgeois of Rouen, got letters of marque against the English to make reprisals on sea and land for vessels taken by the English; they attached amongst other things a sum of 22,000 livres in the hands of Louis Wescomb (deceased), agent of some English merchants at Bayonne, and other sums belonging to other English merchants, in the hands of Humphrey Wilet (deceased), an English merchant at Rouen. These proceedings were annulled by the Treaty of peace of 24th April 1629, confirmed by one of 29th March 1632. Nevertheless, Marteau and the other two continued the processes against Wescomb and Wilet; Sir Isaac Wake, then the English ambassador in France, complained to the King of France, and obtained an arrêt declaring that their processes were comprised in the revocation and Treaty of 1632. The English ambassadors and residents obtained other arrêts annulling the proceedings which Marteau and the other two or their heirs still continued. At length Lord Montagu in 1671 obtained an arrêt that the decree of 1632 should be observed and executed, and a mainlevée was ordered, and Marteau and the others were prohibited from proceedings, and were condemned to restitution and costs. But in 1683, Jean Gouault, bourgeois of Paris, and Marianne Treflé, his wife, daughter of Nicolas de Treflé, and Anne Marteau, calling themselves heirs of Pierre Marteau, who was heir of Thomas Marteau, snatched a decree for the said goods. John Wescomb, English consul at Bayonne, son and heir of the said Louis Wescomb, insisted on the arrêt of 1671; the Lieut.-General of Bayonne remitted the affair to the King and council, and divers proceedings being had, King Charles directed his Envoy, Lord Preston, to demand that the arrêt of 4th Feb. 1671 should be carried out. (This memorial was later than 24th Feb. 1684, a proceeding of that date being mentioned.)

1684, Sept. 23rd, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to M. Roux. Yesterday I received your letter from Calais, and at the same time another sent by the Countess of Carlisle. I have written to the Governor of Luxembourg, who will have that letter delivered to you; I am sure you will need it. I am sorry for the sad occasion of your journey. I will do all I can for the success of what you have undertaken. The King has gone to Chambort, three good days' journey from here; and this is the reason I have not sent the passport; but that of the Marquis of Lambert will do as well.

n. d. Lord Preston to M. Talon, Advocat General. Has called on him to recommend the business of Mr. Courten against George Carew. Since the process was commenced at the Chatelet I have sent Mr. Courten to England with letters for the King my master. He has obtained directions for me to support his right. It is about a remission to our English judges of a cause which you will see is entirely within their jurisdiction. I shall be obliged if you will get it adjudged before the vacation.

1684, Sept. 15th, presented.—Memorial by Lord Preston to the King in the matter of Frederick, Monro, and others whose 6 ships were pillaged by Cherbourg privateers in 1676. The King ordered M. Dreux, Intendant de la Generalité de Caen, to proceed against and try the criminals, and in Aug. 1676 the Sieurs de Beaumont in contumacy were ordered to be decapitated; Pantonnier to be broken alive; and Jacques de la Fontaine, bailli de la haute justice de Cherbourg, to be hung. On the 3rd of Sept. 1676 the merchants obtained a mainlevée; but the greater part of the goods had been pillaged. In August 1677 they obtained from the King's council an arrêt, whereby M. Meliand, the then Intendant of Caen, was to proceed against any who had taken, sold, or kept any of the goods. In consequence, information was taken, and although by the depositions of 91 witnesses, Rene de St. Germain, Procureur du Roy de l'Amirauté de Chertney, Jean Bernard, greffier of the said Admiralty, Guillaume de Seelliere, vicomte of the said town, Philipps Lohier, Etienne Languevin, Louis Bondet, merchants of the said town, and Marie La Moyne, widow of the de la Fontaine who was hung, were proved to have kept, sold, and disposed of the goods in question, without legal authority, and without its being known how much each had, yet after a five years' process M. Meliand in the last of March 1681 discharged some of the accused, condemned others personally in trifling sums not amounting to 600 livres for principal and costs, and threw the remainder on the 4 captains condemned to death and fled, altho' by the sea laws, ancient and modern, he ought to have condemned the accused jointly and severally (solidairement) to restitution of the goods and in costs. Against that decision the merchants appealed, but are so unfortunate as to find it confirmed by an arrêt of March 1683. Lord Preston says that his master tells him to ask for a review of the business.

1684, Sept. 7th, presented. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King. As the truce between France and Spain is now determined on at Ratisbon on the footing of that concluded a short time ago at the Hague, where it was agreed that if Spain ratified the truce the French troops should retire from the Low countries, King Charles has sent word that he hopes the King of France will remove the troops as soon as possible.

1684, Sept. 5th, presented. Lord Preston's memorial to the King. Jacques Duarté, jeweller to King Charles, was robbed by his valet, named Keyndrick, of sums of money of which a list is appended; the valet was arrested at Cambrai, and on the prosecution of the jeweller the judges condemned the valet to be, and he was, hung. Duarté's jewels and money found on the valet are detained by the King's officers of justice, notwithstanding that the Marquis de Louvris has declared them to be exempt by 2 orders. Lord Preston asks for an order that the jewels and money may be delivered to Duarté.—A list of the jewels, comprising 6 jewels, with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds (for each particularly described); a double gold chain, with a medal of the Duc de Neubourg, weighing 2 ounces; a medal on the peace between Spain and Holland, 4 ounces; a Louis d'or of Louis XIII., 2½ oz.; a gold sovereign, worth 60 guilders or 5½ pounds sterling; a piece of gold of Charles II., King of England, weighing 1 oz., and some other Spanish, Portuguese, and English gold coins.

[1684] Oct. 17, Fontainebleau. Lord Preston to M. de Louvois. Sends the request of an English gentleman, whose affair is known to M. de Louvois; M. de Barillon having written to him about it at King Charles's request. Hopes that he will attend to it, out of regard to King Charles, and also to the Duke of York, who has written about it.

SIR

—M. Illini has given him (Lord P.) the letter which the Prince has written touching the succession of the Duchy of Deux-Ponts. Lord P. will do all he can to forward the directions which King Charles has sent. Illini says that the Prince's affair has been put into the hands of M. de Louvois.

n. d. Lord Preston to M. de Croissy.—The bearer, Mr. Temple, has informed Lord P. that M. le premier President has said that before a definitive sentence can be given in his (Temple's) affair the King's pleasure must be known. As King Charles is much interested in Mr. Temple's favour, Lord P. prays M. de Croissy's exertions.

Lord Preston's speech to the King at Versailles on the death of King Charles II., and the accession of King James II., and the desire of the latter for the continuance of good relations between the two crowns; and presenting a letter of credence. (2 pp.)

1685, May 7, presented. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King; in favour of Allen and Stritch, whose ship had been taken by a Dunkirker. The ship's papers shewed that the ship and its contents, except a little brandy, belonged to English subjects, and the majority of the owners of the Dunkirker had by a signed instrument agreed that it should be restored to the English owners; but the French Commissioners condemned the cargo as a good prize, and by the same sentence acquitted the ship. King Charles (having taken the opinion of his Advocate-General, which is appended) asks a revocation of the sentence.

n. d. [Lord Preston] to the King. Memorial pressing the case of John Bankes and other English merchants whose ship had been unjustly seized by the Sieur de Frenqueray, Lieutenant of the King of France in the Little Guiana.

1685, May 23, presented. Memorial by Lord Preston to the King; on the outrage to the Hudson's Bay Company. (See above.)

1685, Aug. 22. Versailles. Autograph note by M. Bonneuil, saying that the King had appointed the morrow morning for Lord Preston to have his audience de Congé.

1685, August 23, s. v. Harangue au Roy tres Chretien en prenant mon audience de Congé a Versailles. (2 pp. entirely in Lord Preston's handwriting.)

Loose in the volume are (on one sheet of paper) drafts of the following undated memorials by Lord Preston to the King.

I. The ship content of Brighthampton going from Charente to London was obliged by stress of weather to put up in Croy roads, near Port Louis, whose Governor took the ship into port, pretending that there were passengers on board. The master obtained the King's order for the Governor to release the ship, but the Governor would not obey, and demanded a large sum of money. Lord Preston asks for a summary order to the Governor.

II. A London merchant, named Mascall, gave orders to his correspondent at Leghorn to have some mixed damask made for him at Genoa. Three pieces were put on board The Mary, commanded by Capt. Walle, and on its way to Leghorn the ship was seized by the French and taken into Toulon, where the damask is detained by the King's intendant. Lord Preston prays relief, and appends the proof of the English ownership of the damask.

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. 7.

1682, May $\frac{17}{27}$, Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness (the Duke of York). After a tedious journey I arrived at this place upon Monday last, where I received the unwelcome news of your Highnesses misfortune at sea, tho' the same post brought an account of your happy escape, which gave great joy and comfort to all your servants here, amongst whom no one can wish your health and prosperity with more truth and sincerity than myself. I find myself very well received here, and also infinitely obliged to your Highness for those recommendations which you have been pleased to give me, which are the greatest advantage that can be to me here. I cannot give your Highness so perfect an account of affairs here at present as I hope to do hereafter.—Promises to write constantly, and for the future will not subscribe his name.—Every day since my arrival here there hath been variety of reports as to the designs of this King relating to peace or war; but it is most likely that at present he is inclined to the former, notwithstanding his new levies of men, and that he is only resolved to be upon the defensive. I am informed that the Marquis de Boufflers, who is general of all the dragoons here, has ordered his equipage of 60 horse to be ready to go this day from this place, but whether towards the frontiers of Germany or Flanders is not known. The Marshal de la Feuillade is said to be going to a country house of his in Poitou for 12 days or a fortnight; but, doubtless, he hath other orders and another design than that of taking the air at this busy time. The Prince of Condé has appeared at Court of late more frequently than he used to do, so it is thought he will be general of the army in Germany, and that the Marshal de Crequi is to command under him. The Duchess of Monmouth begins her journey for England on Tuesday next, and the Duchess of Portsmouth is expected here in 10 or 12 days, and designs after a very short stay at this place for England, tho' yesterday it was reported she would continue this summer here or at Aubigny, and take the advantage of drinking the Bourbon waters in September again, not having found any considerable effects now. P.S. Mons^r. Courtin hath been just now to visit me.

1682, June 16th, n. s., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have received the honour of your Highness's letter. This day a courier arrived from Vienna, and brought the news that the Empress was brought to bed of a son. It is also advised from Vienna that the Emperor hath 60,000 effective men of his own troops, and that 30,000 are now upon their march toward the Rhine; before this time they must be near it. Their rendezvous is at Treves. It is reported this day that 15,000 more of the Imperialists are to march into Italy to be ready to assist the Spaniards to preserve the Milanais if there be occasion, but this wants confirmation. A thousand Swiss, 15,000 French foot and 500 horse are ordered to go with those 6,000 men already commanded into Italy. All the troops are commanded from Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné thither also, and in all they make 9,000 men; those troops of the King's household which were quartered in Lorraine are all upon their march towards Strasbourg. The Emperor it is said hath ordered some of his troops to march towards Brisgow and the forest towns. Several of the new raised companies have already been mustered, but Mons^r. de Louvois is not pleased with them, for they are generally ill-mounted and ill-clothed. It begins now to be whispered at Court that there may be war, but it cannot be imagined that any great thing should be done this campaign, because all necessary orders have been given from this place to prevent the designs of their enemies. It is believed that if there should be war it will begin in Italy. Tho' the clergy hath been forbid to assemble here by the King yet notwithstanding they meet, tho' not so frequently as they used to do.

1682, July 18th, Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I must with all imaginable gratitude acknowledge the favour of your last, in which you are pleased with so much kindness to shew me my mistakes, and also how I may avoid them for the future. I must confess that some of the objections occurred to me before I presented the memorial. At first the length of it, and then the matter of argument in it, and next the particular presentment of Mr. Whiting upon Mons^r. Pelletier, which I did think not proper to be inserted; but the haste I was in, and the opinion I had that by saying so much upon the subject I might sooner have a position, and also the importunity of Mr. Whiting did make me pass this memorial without the consideration which I shall always use in matters of consequence hereafter. I am also at the same time to own the great obligation which you lay upon me in concealing my errors by not having shewn the memorial to the King.

1682, July 28th, s. n., Paris. —Lord Preston to the Earl of Halifax. Thanks for his last letter and for past favours.—so I do with much resignation submit to those reasons which your lordship was pleased to give against what I propose to you, and shall move no more in that affair. All things seem to go very smoothly here, the ministers and all other people declaring the King's great inclinations towards peace, and his resolutions not to disturb any of his neighbours, if he be not attacked, but if that should happen he doth certainly put himself into a very good posture of defence. In my last to Mr. Secretary I told him of a discourse we had here of a league concluded betwixt the Kings of Sweden and Poland for the defence of their frontiers, but I am assured this day that it is not perfected, tho' at this time the negotiation is a going on. I did also give him an account of a most scandalous book printed here by Mons^r. l'Abbe Primi, which doth reflect highly upon our English councils. I find several copies of it are now abroad. I am endeavouring to get one to transmit to your lordship. I suppose since it is gotten abroad the King will take some notice of it, and I doubt not your lordship hath had a fuller account of this matter in my letter to Mr. Secretary. Madame la Dauphine is not yet in earnest, tho' she hath given several alarms to the Court, but she cannot go many days.

1682, Aug. 12th, st. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the King.—I have given to Mr. Secretary Jenkins an account of an information lately given me which if true is of the greatest concern to your Majesty. I will not undertake for it, but it is brought to me with those circumstances which make me believe that it is not to be slighted. Some considerable men of Ireland are accused to me by name, but they are none of those whom your Majesty is pleased to honour with any employment of any kind in that kingdom. If your Majesty thinks fit to take any notice of the matter . . . and if you command it, the person shall with all secrecy be sent over to you, provided that he may be assured of your Majesty's protection.

1682, Aug. 12th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, sent express by Mr. Deanes with the letter above to the King.—I am so fearful of giving alarms and so cautious of sending expresses that if I had thought I could with any safety to the King's affairs and myself have dispensed with doing it I had not done it now. Within these few hours a person well esteemed of here, whom I have known before, came to me and desired to speak with me in private. When we were withdrawn he told me that he had an affair of the greatest concern that could be to the King my master to discover to me; but that I must assure him of secrecy, and that I would communicate what he should say to me to nobody but to the King or to the minister with whom I correspond. I did assure him of both, but withall told him that so many people of late had pretended to make discoveries in England that I knew the King my master would require very good grounds for what he believed, and therefore if he were not well assured of the truth of what he was about to tell me, I desired him not to go any further, for it would prejudice both himself and me, if he should say, or I should write, anything which could not clearly be proved. He gave me the greatest assurances that could be given that he would not impose upon me, and particularly he said that if there were a God in heaven what he should say was true, and that he would make it out by undeniable proof to the King. He began then to tell me that this King had been long weary of being forced to court the King of England, who was alone able to oppose his designs and that he was now resolved as soon as possible to send to put himself into a condition that he should not need to do it; and in order to that he had a design to possess himself of Ireland, by which he should curb England, and make it subservient to his ends. That he had already formed the design, and that he was resolved to begin by sending 10 or 12 ships of war provided of all sorts of arms, of workpieces and engines of war to the coast of Ireland, that upon the first appearance of them there, great numbers of the natives were to rise, and to be armed from those ships, and to join with the French forces and to possess themselves of Cork, Limrick, and Galloway, and this to be done upon a Sunday or market day, if possible, when people are most busy or most secure, and that no quarter is to be given to anybody who will not join with them in destroying the English government and setting up the French. He says that many great men of that nation are engaged in this conspiracy, some he hath named to me, but he hath engaged me not to name them till I have a return from England. There is no person who is now concerned in the government or in the King's service in that kingdom named or accused by him. He says that this is to be executed soon, and that the blow will be given speedily if not prevented, and that the business is now very nobly solicited and that some persons are now in London who are the most deeply concerned in it. I asked him how he came to be informed of this, and I must confess he hath given me such accounts of this, and he tells me circumstances which, being compared with the observations I have made of the carriage of some people since my arrival, makes me believe that that information is by no means to be slighted. If the King doth think this account worthy of notice or consideration I do not doubt but to have the person safely and secretly conveyed to England, provided care may be taken of him there. One thing I must add that he is not a person inaccessible, but able to live here comfortably enough. I am bound up by him not to write more, particularly at this time. I must desire you, sir, if you think that there is any weight in the business, that nothing relating to it may be written by the post, for I know most letters are opened here, and even the most difficult cyphers decyphered. I must also desire that no person at present may be acquainted with the subject of this letter but the King . . . P.S. The gentleman whom I have sent is very faithful and honest, and will obey any command you may have for him upon this occasion with great secrecy and trust.

1682, Aug. 27th, st. no., Paris.—The same to the same. (Sent express by Mr. Tempest, my secretary, Aug. 28th, 1682), with the following informations concerning Ireland enclosed in the same packet.—I received yours of the 12th current, o. s., yesterday morning about 8 of the clock, and in it his Majesty's reflexion upon the late information given into me here, and his orders concerning it, which I shall punctually obey. I have made inquiry of the country, course of life and habits of the informer, and of all things concerning him as nearly as I can, and the best account that I can have of him is this: he is of Ireland, where his father lives at this time, his name is Roger Tilly alias Shelton; he hath heretofore been page to the present Earl of Denbigh, and when he left his service he put himself into the French Army, where he served for some time very well and received several rewards; at length he came to be captain of horse in the regiment of bivouac, but he was some time since reformed and hath ever since in consideration of his services had 5th per diem paid to him, which is yet continued, upon which he lives very well and hath admittance to the Court, and to Mons^r. de Louvois. His allowance is more than is generally given to reformed captains of horse as I am told. I cannot learn if he hath been any way blemished, but that he hath behaved himself fairly and well. I asked him how he came to go by two names since that might occasion some suspicion of him, and he told me that he only fancied his mother's name, which was Shelton, to be better than his father's, and that therefore he took it upon him when he came into France. I cannot find by any inquiry that he had any other reason or occasion to conceal or change his name. His original information I have inclosed, which I must desire you to keep safe, because it is acknowledged and signed by himself, as you will find when you have perused it . . . I was forced to take it in haste as he dictated it to me, and so had not time either to methodize it or to write it fair; I keep a copy of it by me. I have also sent two informations which he hath given me since, but they are not signed by him, but when he comes next to me I will make him sign them. I am of his Majesty's opinion that at present he may do him more service here than he can do by going over; but after some time, if what he says be found to be true, I believe it will necessary that he should be sent for. I cannot answer for the truth of the information. I shall not move in the matter but as the King shall send me his orders, which I shall observe. I confess after some late pretended discoveries in England men cannot be too cautious in what they believe; but whether that be true or false it cannot hurt his Majesty to be upon his guard at sea, and to secure the places mentioned, and to search all people at their landing, either in England or Ireland, of whom there may be any cause of suspicion, or who cannot give a very good account of themselves. The King I doubt not will be very much surprised to find the names of some people in this information, I am sure I was. One of them not long ago had a falling out with Mons^r. de Louvois here, as you may have heard, but some people say that the quarrel was not altogether so hearty as it seemed to be. I write not that upon my own knowledge. I am told that there is to be an extraordinary council that night, but the King is not to be there; the gentlemen thinks it may be about that business; he hath promised to let me know to-morrow at Versailles what he can learn, where I am to go with my Lord Feversham to audience. You will find in that information which he hath given to me this day the name of one Everard, a priest, whom he saith he believes his Majesty hath heard of; he is to go over into England and so into Ireland under the disguise of a merchant, and that as such, he saith, he will desire a passport of me. If he comes, if you think fit, I will grant him one, and give you notice when he gets out that he may be seized at landing. It may so happen that I may give you notice of his going to ward by the post; and if I do this . . . shall be the cypher for his name. I shall make all possibly inquiry after the march of the forces and the preparations of that King for sea, and with the first give you an account of them, tho' I believe you may have notice of that better from the coasts. I am very glad, sir, that you have made no entry of my letters. I have taken care that my secretary nor any other should not know of the matter, for I have with my own hand written and copied everything relating to it. I have been forced to send Mr. Tempest, because I could not well trust any other person, with these papers. I was apprehensive that his going might give some alarm, but I have ordered him so to disguise his errand that I hope it will not be much taken notice of. Here hath been a little fellow, one Murray, an agent of my Lord of Shaftesbury's, for some time about the town; and I am certainly informed that he is come with some instructions, and hath something to do here. I hear that he talks very freely against the Duke and the administration of affairs in England, and that he endeavours to blow up the Protestants here, and to assure them that nothing is to be expected by them from thence, and that nothing is designed there but the introducing of Popery. He hath been once or twice at my house, and I have used him something civilly in hopes to have gotten something out of him, but in vain, tho' I am well informed by others of his practises. I hear he goes for England soon, and if at his landing he were searched, I fancy something might be found about him which might give some light to the affairs and intrigues of that party, which most assuredly are not confined to England. P.S. I must humbly desire that the person who informs may not be named whilst he is here, for he certainly dies if he be known.

These following informations I sent with the above written letter to Mr. Secretary Jenkins by Mr. Tempest, my secretary, from Paris, Aug. 28th, 1682, st. n.

Captain Roger Tilly, alias Shelton, doth inform that one Richard Bourke, of the County of Tipperary, now married to the daughter of Sir Tho. Orby, and Mr. Harvey lately accused by Mr. Oates, and himself, did go to the Cardinal de Bouillon to propose to him their design of putting Ireland into the French King's hands, which they made appear to him a very easy thing, they being furnished only from hence with ammunition, arms, and some men of experience and understanding to manage their business and to conduct them, and one to command in chief, they desiring to have the D. of Luxembourg the person, which proposition was received very well by the said Cardinal, who told them that he would acquaint the King with it, and if he would not accept of it, he would acquaint the Pope with the easiness of bringing about the design and that he would employ all his interest and fortune in it, and so he dismissed the said gentlemen for three days; when that time was expired he sent for them to meet him at a place called Trap, 4 leagues from Versailles, where he received them with much joy, and treated them very well, and told them that all things went as he could desire, provided that they were assured of able men in the country, that would undertake to have men in readiness to join with them, and provided also that they could give him any just account and propose to him any reasonable method by which they could bring about their design. The first person whom they named to him, and of whom they told him they were sure, was the Earl of Clanrickard for the county of Galloway. The next whom they named was Coll. Maccarty for the county of Cork, and they told the Cardinal that he himself should give him an assurance of his readiness, and accordingly he went to him the next day, which was a few days before he went for England. The next person whom they named for the county of Limerick was one Mr. Lacy, father to Lieutenant-Colonel Lacy, who was Lieut.-Coll. to Sir George Hamilton's regiment when his brother commanded it, and is now lately made so to Count Coningsmarke. He went over immediately upon that to England to endeavour to persuade his father to undertake this business, who was there in prison in London. All this was transacted about the time that the King went to Strasbourg the last year, since which time they had considered of the matter otherwise, and did send one Captain Kennedy, who commands the English company in Conismarke's regiment, into Ireland to visit the towns of Galloway, Cork, and Limerick, and several other places upon the coast, and also to endeavour to make sure of my Lord of Clanrickard and Mr. Lacy, and to engage them to be in readiness at all times till they should hear from him, he being appointed to give you the signal. He told you that they need only to provide men; and for arms, ammunition, and money they need not to trouble themselves, for all that should be taken care for. The Lord Kennedy is returned within these 2 days, and is this day gone to his regiment, which is now in Catalonia, whither 3 other regiments of foot are now marching, and also two others of horse, and one Monsr. Cameline, the chief engineer and contriver of the new invented fireworks, is sent thither, and hath been gone near a fortnight. The way proposed to the King of bringing that about by Coll. Lacy was to seize upon the 3 towns of Galloway, Limerick, and Cork, at the same time upon a Sunday, when the people are at church and most secure, and to seize upon the ports, and that no quarter should be given to anyone who would not join with them. And that the castle of Limerick was to be surprized by persons who should go in one by one pretending a design only of seeing it, and that when their number was come in they should seize upon the officers and soldiers and kill them. That a number of men-of-war on whom the arms and provisions were to be sent were to come to the coast, but to keep off at sea until they saw their opportunity. And they were to send in a ship laden with merchandise, which was to lie at the mouth of the river of Limerick, and when the searchers were to come on board they were to be clapped under deck, and 3 cannons, one after another, were to be shot off to advertize their party that it was time to fall on, and that the ships were near to assist them. The ships of war are to carry the King of England's colours, and the Irish forces which have been in the French service are to be on board ready to enter when they have their signal given. The said regiment is to be broken soon, and that is to serve as a pretext for their going in so great a number home. He says that the King will pretend to know nothing of it, but that it is to be managed by the Pope and the Cardinal de Bouillon, but notwithstanding the King furnished all the provisions, and if the affair succeeds he will find his time to own it. "I have given this information to my Lord Preston, your Majesty's Envoyé in this country, the which I am ready to depose upon oath when your Majesty commands me." Versailles, August the 15th, st. no., 1682.

"Roger Tilly alias Shelton."

1682, Aug. 24th, st. no., Paris.--Captain Roger Tilly, alias Shelton, further informs that Mr. Bourke, son to the Lord Castleconnel, is appointed to manage the business for France in the county of Limerick; that Boark's brother to Ricard Bourke, mentioned in my other information, is designed to carry on the affair in the county of Clare with his uncle Mr. Magra, who lives at a place called Jersymore in the said county. One O'Shannasse and Macnemarra of Donymulmichel, and another whose name at present he cannot remember, with several others, are appointed to have men in readiness in the said county of Clare, to be armed from the ships when they arrive. He says farther that several arms were already landed somewhere in the county of Kerry or Limerick, but in which he cannot say.

1682, Aug. 27, st. no., Versailles. One Glesam, a priest, formerly chaplain to Sir George Hamilton's regiment, and since to Coll. Maccarty (which priest hath 800 crowns pension from the King) is the common conveyor of intelligence and messenger of the correspondence betwixt this Court and Ireland. He hath a letter which he hath seen from the Pope, and another signed by the Cardinal de Bouillon, and the Archbishop of Paris to recommend him to all persons of quality and others for their charity, for the carrying on of a work of great consequence to the church, all which money is to be employed this way. One Everard, a priest, formerly mentioned in the Gazetts of England, and for the discovery of whom money was offered, is ready now to go over into England as a merchant, and from thence into Ireland to preach to the people, and to put them in mind of what they ought to do upon that occasion.

This following information was not sent by the last express, with the 3 others above written, because it was given in to me after the departure of Mr. Tempest.

1682, Aug. 31, st. no., Paris. Captain Roger Tilly, alias Shelton, further informs that immediately after he had parted with me at Versailles, upon the 27th current, he and Everard and Glesam went to the Cardinal de Bouillon, who was then there, and he ordered them to be to his house at Pontoise on Saturday, whither they went, and there Everard assured him that all people in Ireland were very well disposed to the business, and ready to rise when they should be ordered. The Cardinal on his part assured them of all readiness in the matter, and of all assistance from hence; he further told them that they had but two little things to do, in which if they succeeded, and were favoured by the weather and the sea, they would immediately go about this work, which if they could compass they would have but very little consideration for England. He said that the Cardinal said these things which they were to do were to surprise Luxembourg and Nieuport. He saith it was then pressed that either the Duke de Bouillon (for they had laid aside the thoughts of the Duke of Luxembourg) should command, or a German officer whose name he hath forgotten, but he remembers that the Cardinal named him, and that he is one who hath been disobliged in his own country. He further saith that Everard for this service is already made titular Bishop of Waterford by the Pope. That he speaks very good Spanish, and that he will pass for a Spanish merchant, and will be much at the Spanish ambassador's chapel.

1682, Sept. 9th, st. no., Paris.—Capt. Roger Tilly, alias Shelton, informeth that he asked Glesam what they would do with that great number of fireworks which was prepared. He answered that they would be useful for taking of places, or for defending them if they should happen to take them, for they were resolved to lay hold of the first opportunity, and not to stay for the landing of the French; for if they were once possessed of any considerable places they had men enough to maintain them till the French succours came, who would be sure to lose no time when they heard of their success. He saith further that M. Bourke, son to the Lord of Castleconnel, settled in Ireland lately, upon the account of carrying on this business, which he hath not been for a considerable time before, and that Coll. Maccarty and Mr. Bourkes and Mr. Kerney desire to do the same. He saith that several arms are to be sent over in the ballast of ships; and that one O'Brian of the county of Limrick did lately come over hither, and that he had an audience of the Cardinal Bouillon; that he went upon the 8th of the month to Nancy upon something relating to that design, and that from thence he was to go in diligence for Ireland, but hath orders to come back hither soon. He saith he hopes that at his return he shall have a list of the names of all those who are concerned thro' the whole nation.

Paris, Sept. 1682.

These following names Captain Sheldon delivered to me written with his own hand. Following are some of those who are these persons engaged to carry on the business in the counties of Wickloe and Wexford.

James Birne, John Birne, William Birne, John Lotrel, Alexander Lovel, John Coussey, William Hussey, John Hussey, Edward Nagh, Luke White, Richard Botter.

Versailles, Sept. 15th, 1682, st. no.

He saith that 6,000 arms are sent to Nantes in Bretagne, and are now upon the road to be shipped off for Ireland, and to be conveyed in the ballast of ships, and that Everard is to go over soon, whom he brought with him to demand a passport of me.

"Versailles, Sept. 15th, 1682, st. no.

"I have delivered in these above written informations "to my Lord Preston, your Majesty's Envoyé in this "country, and am ready to tell his lordship the rest as "soon as occasion serveth, and am also ready to justify "it when your Majesty pleaseth.—Roger Tilly, alias "Sheldon."

1682, Sept. 15th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, sent by Mr. Lamb, the Queen's book-keeper, Sept. 16th, st. no., 1682.—Yesterday at 10 of the clock in the morning Mr. Tempest arrived here from London, and delivered me your dispatch. I shall within very few days give you answers to those several things of which you desire to be informed, and of some other particularities, I shall charge my brother with the letter, who leaves this place on Monday or Tuesday next. I am just now come from Versailles, where I met with the person you know of; and he brought Everard to me (or at least one whom he called so), he is a little withered old fellow, and speaks English very ill, and with the tone of the common people of Ireland. He desired a passport of me by the name of John Browne, merchant of Waterford in Ireland, and I promised him one if he would call of me to-morrow at Paris where I expect him. The person who brought him assures me that he goes away that week, and that he hath sent his things to Roan, so that doubtless he goes to Diepe, and in all likelihood may land at Rye, but I doubt not care is taken both there and at Dover, and all other places upon the coast, for the securing of him. He saith he doth not know that any letters will be found about him, but he questions not but that he will confess if he be secured and pressed hard. I hope care will be taken not to name the person to him, if he should be taken, nor to give him any cause to suspect him, for if he hath any light concerning him it will soon be known here, and prove very fatal to him. One thing I am to advertise you of, that the person told me that day that he is pressed hard to go to the army, and that he shall find it very difficult to excuse himself fairly any longer; if he doth go, I can expect to have no more correspondence with him, nor information from him; but he hath promised me to stay till I have a return out of England. You may be pleased to acquaint his Majesty with this, and to let me have his orders as soon as you can upon this head. Murray is gone from hence a week since. You shall hear from me more at large by my brother.

1682, Sept. 20th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins (sent by my brother Coll. Graham, Sept. 21st, st. no., 82, when he went with Lord Feversham for England).—I hope my letter was safely delivered to you by Mr. Lamb, in which I acquainted you that Everard (or one who personated him) had demanded a passport from me, I expected that he would have come the next day for it, but he did not. On Thursday, Capt. Shelton was here, and asked me if he had yet been with me? I told him no, and with all that it gave me some cause of suspicion that I was not well dealt with; he said he would go and inquire after him, but I have not heard of either of them since. He told me that Everard was certainly to go within very few days, and as soon as I know any thing certainly concerning him, I shall not fail to acquaint you with it. If he should go over and be known at his landing, I shall humbly propose to you, whether it would not be the best way to not to seize him immediately, but to order some person to observe him well, and (if possible) to accompany him to London, without giving him cause of suspicion, and to take notice where he goes, and to whom he applies himself first at his arrival, and then to take him into custody. I offer this, because I do not think that he will dare to charge himself with many letters; and because by this means judgment may be made of the truth of the information, if it be found that he goes to any one mentioned in it. But if his Majesty thinketh it fit that he should be apprehended at his landing, I believe it would not be amiss to have notice taken whether he yields himself with any willingness, or shews any forwardness to give up himself (he being one so criminal as I am told, and so obnoxious to the laws of England); it may give some reason to suspect that there may be a contrivance amongst these men to get money or pardons by informing, tho' I must confess that if this information should not prove true, I cannot think it unlikely that this King should have a design upon that kingdom, considering the great advantage which he might reap by being master of it, for he having at present so great a number of ships which he cannot at this time use in these seas, and that island affording so many good ports, if he once became possessed of it, he would think to have the absolute empire of the sea, and consequently that of commerce, which would also facilitate to him the conquest of the West Indies, which is no modern project of that Court. I have (according to his Majesty's commands) assured the captain that all care is taken for the concealing of his name; and for his going over, neither he, or I, think of it till his Majesty shall think fit to order it. I have sent you 3 several informations which have been given in to me since my last dispatch to you, viz., one of Aug. 31st, st. no., another of Sept. the 9th, and the last of Sept. the 15th, all which (with the 2 former which I sent you) are signed by Capt. Sheldon's own hand, whom I sent for the other day in order to the giving satisfaction to his Majesty in the several points which you were pleased to propose in your last.

1. I asked him what inducements he had to suppose that the extraordinary council, which was called at Versailles on the 27th of August last, might be about the business? and whither it was called upon the return of Kennedy out of Ireland, and his communicating with the cardinal or other great men?—He saith he was induced to believe that the council was called upon this affair, because Kennedy told him that it was to meet. And afterwards meeting him in a room not far from the council chamber, he told him that he was to go in with the Chancellour, which he saw him do. He says it was after the return of Kennedy out of Ireland, and that he knew that he was with the Cardinal till 12 of the clock the night before.

2. I asked him why the plotters proposed the Duke of Luxembourg to be their leader? (and I informed myself by other hands whether he was restored at that time to the King's favour, and I find he was not) but his answer was that they, viz., himself, K. Bourk, Kerney, and the Lord of Castleconnel's son proposed him, because they

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

F. GRAHAM,

knew that he was exiled from the King's graces, and that he was one that could then be spared.

3. I asked whither Coll. Maccarty was proposed by the plotters to the Cardinal by any commission from himself? and whither he went by their advice and consent to England so soon after he had spoken to the Cardinal? and whither they, or any of them, heard from him or spoke with him since he spoke with the Cardinal?

He saith that he was not so intimate with Coll. Maccarty as to know much of what he designed then; for all that was done or is now doing did pass betwixt him and Mr. Lacy, jun., who received all letters from him. This is the only answer which I can get from him to that head.

4. I asked him whither he had any account from the younger Lacy of his father having embraced that proposition which he made to him? He assures me that he heard from Lacy, jun., that his father had accepted of it, and that the father had a pension now paid to him in England.

5. I told him that he in his first information had said that since the voyage of Stratzbourg they had considered of it otherwise. I asked him who they were? whether it was formed before Kennedy went for Ireland, or since his return? whether the Cardinal was privy to this new plan? And now that Kennedy is gone to Catalonia and not like to return in haste whether any body be intrusted to give the signal that he hath given?

He saith that it was Mr. Lacy by letters from Coll. Maccarty and his father who considered of it otherwise. That the Cardinal did know of it. He saith further that it was formed before Kennedy went to Ireland. And to the last question he answereth that he doth not yet know whether anybody be appointed to give the signal or not.

6. I told him that he had declared that the way proposed to the King of bringing this about by Coll. Lacy was to seize upon the 3 towns, &c. I asked him then whether Lt.-Coll. Lacy himself proposed it to the French King or else to the Cardinal or to the plotters?

He saith that Lt.-Coll. Lacy proposed the seizing of the 3 towns to the Cardinal, for that it was but of late that he had access to the King. And he remembers that about 3 weeks since, he standing accidentally in a place by which the King passed to mass, he heard him say to Lt.-Coll. Lacy I am very sorry that I have not found an occasion before of being kind to you.

7. I asked him if he had heard anything of late concerning the breaking of the Irish regiments. He said he had not, nor doth he know whether it would be broken or not, but that he was very sure that it was proposed. But if this happens I shall not fail to advise his Majesty with all speed and secrecy when and where it is to be done, and also how the officers and soldiers do upon their reducing dispose of themselves, according to the best informations which I can have.—I have endeavoured to inform myself as exactly as I can of all the circumstances of Gleson, and I have this account from one whom the King knoweth very well, and who I know he will trust of him that he is a very extraordinary rogue, and one that is fit to undertake any mischief in the world. I cannot find that any other chaplains in other regiments in French service have such pensions when they are reformed, nor is it to be imagined they should have so good payment for doing no service, when (according to my best information) few of them have above an 100 crowns a year besides meat and drink when they are actually attending upon their regiments. Capt. Sheldon saith that before this business Gleson never had any acquaintance with the Cardinal; but that now he is very often with him. He is looked upon to be a very cunning fellow by all, and not to want wit. I find he is very well known here; he hath been concerned in business of Sir G. Hamilton's since his death, and that he, upon that account, hath had occasion to address to my lady, who is now married to Coll. Talbot. He converseth most now with one Dr. Smith, an English physician here, who lived formerly with Dr. Tabor. Much of this account of him I have from another hand, but Capt. Sheldon tells me that his chief correspondent is Coll. Maccarty, that he entertains a correspondence also with Mr. Lacy, senr., and the Lord Castleconnell's son with Richard Borck's brother, with Macnemarra and O'Shainesse, mentioned in the informations, and with several others; he tells me that he is assured that Coll. Maccarty hath his pension yet continued to him; and that this was told him by one Mons^r. Fleurus, cousin to Mons^r. Fremont. I find there is one Mons^r. Fremont, who is father-in-law to the Mareschal de l'Orge and one of the General Fermers, and I have ordered one to inquire whither or not he hath any such cousin; which I will not fail to let you know, for in a thing of this nature we cannot be too exact in looking in to the least circumstances which may give any light.

1682, Sept. 20th, st. no., Paris. Lord Preston to his Royal Highness the Duke (of York) sent by my brother.—Compliments and expressions of devotion to the Duke for kindness to himself and his brother.—I did deliver your letters to the King, Queen, the Dauphin, Monsieur, and Madame, from some of whom I return inclosed the answers. I could not deliver that to Madam la Dauphine, because she hath been very ill, but I shall do it as soon as possible. . . .

1682, Sept. 20th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Marquesse of Halifax (sent by my brother).—Congratulations on his new accession of honour.—I have given to Mr. Secretary a full account of what informations I have received since concerning the affair of Ireland; I cannot answer for the truth of anything which I have transmitted; I have only endeavoured to do my duty to the King, and what may be safe to myself. I must confess I believe this King would be very glad to possess himself of a country so advantageously situated for his designs, but whether or no he will endeavour to do it so hastily is what is to be considered. . . . I have sent your lordship some paper by my brother; it is such as is used here by the men of business; it is better than that which is gilded; if you like it, I will send more.

1682, Sept. 20th, st. no., Paris. Lord Preston to Lord Viscount Hyde (sent by my brother). I hope your lordship hath received all the letters which I have sent to you from my lady; I have taken care to transmit all yours to her with all diligence.—I have enclosed to Mr. Secretary Jenkins some other informations relating to the Irish affair . . . I have sent by my brother an account of my extraordinaries for 6 months. I am none of those who will ever importune your lordship; you may do with me what you please. The place I must say is expensive, but I will not complain, but endeavour to serve the King as faithfully and honourably as I can, and I know your lordship will think upon me when you see your time. . . .

Inclosed in cypher is a letter to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, in a paper by itself, and sent it by the post. Sept. 26th, st. no., 1682, Paris.

Everard on Thursday last came to me for a passeport; he told me that he was to go away within 8 or 10 days; he goes by Roan, and so I believe may land at Rye.

All these following informations relating to Ireland were given me by Capt. Sheldon, &c.

Paris, Oct. 7th, 1682, s. n.—In cypher to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I send you an account which was given me the other day; of what weight it may be I cannot tell, but that the thing happened is most certain. Four or five days since a priest, accompanied with two or three seculars, came into a merchant's shop in the Rue St. Honoré, to buy a quantity of cloathes and stuffs more proper for the man of the world than for those of his character, which was wondered at, but one of his company told another, whom he knew and found by chance in the shop, that these merchandizes were bought to clothe several priests and monks who were to pass disguised into England, and that above 150 of them were to go over very suddenly. He bought above 300 ells of stuff. I received the cypher which you were pleased to enclose in your last. Everard is not yet gone. I saw him yesterday and asked him when he went; he told me he was detained by some business, and designed soon to go by Roan. One White, who goes by the name of Comte D'Alby, brother to the Baron de Wite, and brother-in-law to Sir Robert Walsh, well known in England, was some years since clapped up in the Bastile as a spy for the King of Spain; I am told he is come out soon as a proper instrument to be employed in the affair of Ireland. But I have made a private enquiry yesterday, and find he is still in the Bastile. If he doth come out I shall have notice; I believe he is a proper instrument for the business.

I having by haste mistaken something in my cypher, Mr. Secretary writ me word they understood not which was the street. I returned the following answer in cypher:—

Sir,—Perhaps being in haste I might mistake in my cypher concerning the priest who was said to be designed for England. The great emplette of clothes was in the Rue St. Honoré, to make them secular habits. The person to whom the information was given is my domestique, for whom I will answer, and neither he nor the person who told him of it knoweth that I have given any account into England of it, or that I have at all regarded it, so that their lord-ships and yourself may be assured that neither a reward was, or is hoped for, nor any trick designed in it by the informer.

Paris, Oct. 10th, 1692. st. novo. (In cypher.) Everard is still here; I was in great hopes to have the other day a letter which is, as I am informed, lately written by the Pope to the clergy of Ireland, and in his custody. His pockets were picked for it, but by mistake of the seal we only got the original of this paper, which was a licence from the superior of his order to go as a missionary into England, of which I send you a copy. The original itself shall be sent you by the first safe hand. By this you may see how he hath been employed. I will once more try for the other paper. I should be glad to know if you have any light out of Ireland. I am pressed by the informer to know if the King resolves any thing concerning him, for I find he hath thoughts of leaving Paris.

Paris, Nov. 11th, st. no., 1682. Written in cypher to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. I have every day accounts from Capt. Shelton, who doth still give me the greatest assurances that can be of the truth of his information. I taxed him with Everard's not going over. He saith that measures have been altered, and he cannot help it. He gave me early notice that Glesam was preferred to a priory within 15 leagues of this place, worth 2,500 livres per annum, and his pension he saith is continued. I have enquired of this, and I am certainly informed, by one whom I know the King trusts, but who knows nothing of the affair, that it is true, and further that all people wonder how he should have it from those who are not very kind to strangers. Doubtless this fellow is mesnaging some design at home, for he hath not this for nothing. He saith that so late propositions have been made by him to the King (which I shall insert in French below), the 24th of October last, who received them very well, and that the King hath promised a considerable sum of money. He saith that ships are lading with arms in Brittany, and he could show them to anybody. The accounts which I have given you of great preparations to have two fleets at sea for next season, and of fortifying their coasts, must portend something. I shall write to you more particularly by the next safe occasion, for I avoid as much as I can the putting of his Majesty to the expense of expresses.

What followeth hath not been sent. Capt. Shelton, alias Tilly, further informs me that 11 propositions have been made to the French King the 24th of Oct. 1682, by Colls. Talbot and Glesau. They are as followeth:—

1682, Sept. 7th, st. no., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. . . . I am forced to give you this trouble by reason of a report which hath long been spread here, and having grown much hotter, that I am to be suddenly recalled and sent elsewhere to make room for my Lord Sunderland, or for some other person who may be more grateful to this Court If, sir, his Majesty hath any thoughts of this, I shall intreat the favour of you not to oppose it, for I am ready to serve his Majesty in any capacity and in any station which he shall think most proper for his service, &c. All, sir, that I desire, if anything of this kind be designed, is that you would let me know as early as you can because I would order my affairs in England accordingly, and also save the expense which I should be at in the bringing over my wife and my family this winter as I designed. . . .

1682, Oct. 18th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness the Duke (of York). I have received the honour of your Highness's of the 28th of last month, and should sooner have acknowledged it if your Highness in it had not told me that you were going to Newmarket; and if I had not been also called upon his Majesty's business to Fontainebleau, from whence I am but newly returned. I shall not fail, sir, to take all possible care of that business which your Highness is pleased to recommend to me relating to Mrs. Fairfax, as I shall be of all the commands which you are pleased to lay upon me. I think she hath a great deal of justice on her side, and that it will be impossible for my Lord of Abergavenny to avoid the contract. As soon as I receive the King's orders, which I expect by every post, I shall move in it. I received from Mons^r. de Croissy at Fontainebleau a passport for 50 tons of Canary wine for your Highness's use, which I have delivered to Mons^r. du Pins to send to Mons^r. Labaddy, who is now upon the place If his Majesty thinks it for his service I am willing to remove from hence, and to go into any part of the world where he shall send me It is very certain that great preparations are making for a fleet to be put out to sea the next summer, and the treasurer de la Marine hath an order already upon the Treasury Royal for 800,000*l.*, and great funds are preparing for that purpose. The King also designs to make another attempt upon Algiers with the first of the season, they attributing the ill success of Mons^r. du Quesne to his going out too late. There is lately made in the Isle of Rhé a new citadel, and other considerable fortifications are also carried on there, as well as at Bayonne and Rochefort, and the late design of making a harbour near Calais, which most people thought was abandoned, is now resumed. A ligue is lately concluded betwixt the King and the Duke of Savoye, for the defence of Pignerol and Cassal, which was declared at Fontainebleau by the Duke's ambassador the other day. The last letters from Rome say that the Pope persisteth to demand of the most Christian King that what relateth to the regale may be settled upon its ancient foot, and that all the acts of the late assembly of the clergy may be abolished. We daily expect Mons^r. Heinsius who comes Envoyé Extraordinary from the States General expressly upon the affairs of Orange. But I must needs say to your Highness that I am afraid his success will not be great here, for I doubt that this King hath great prejudices against the Prince. Matters betwixt this Court and Sweden go ill, for Mons^r. Bassa the French ambassador there hath left Stockholm without having an audience, and it is reported here that the Elector of Saxony hath promised to enter into the ligue of association and guaranty with Sweden.

1682, Nov., st. no., Paris.—The same to the same.—I received the honour of your Highness's of Oct. 26th, o. s., yesterday, because the packet boat hath been stopped by contrary winds for some days. The news which you were pleased to send of the election of Sir Wm. Pritchard is very acceptable to all those who wish well to his Majesty's affairs. I wish he may have the same success against all those who design to trouble him and them. I gave his Majesty some posts since an account of the proceedings here against the Prince of Orange in the affair relating to that principality. Since I hear that by the order of this King an instruction of the whole matter with the genealogy of the Dukes of Longueville is sent to him. They have drawn up an arrest, but they have deferred to publish it till they may receive his Majesty's answer. I am very much afraid that they design to push the matter to extremity against the Prince. That which your Highness writes concerning the great preparations for war at Constantinople we have been assured of here this good while, and it is confirmed by every courier that comes from thence. The horse tails (which are the usual signals for war) have been set up before the seraglio, and in the quarters of the principal bassas this long time. The affairs of the Emperor were certainly never in so ill a condition both at home and abroad as they are now. But whoever may at present reap an advantage by the Turks pressing the Emperor at this time, it will doubtless sooner be found necessary for all the Powers of Europe to endeavour to arrest the progress of his arms; for they are strange advances which he maketh daily, and such as may within a little while bring him into the heart of Germany, if he doth not meet with more opposition than he hath hitherto done. The Court will be at Versailles upon Monday next; then I may be able to give your Highness some more particular accounts. I am, &c.

1682, Dec. 4th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Legge.—I have received yours of the 20th of November, s. v., which was very welcome to me The honour which his Majesty designs me in putting my Lord Burford into my hands, I receive with all the gratitude and submission in the world, and I assure you I am extremely sensible of his favour in reposing so great a trust in me. I shall endeavour to the best of my knowledge to serve my lord, and to acquit myself with all faithfulness in everything relating to him, if his Majesty will be pleased to give me his commands and instructions how I shall govern myself and what methods shall be taken in his education as well in his learning as his exercises. I shall immediately take a house and furnish an apartment which may be fit to receive him; as for those people which are to be about him, I shall not presume to name them, because I hope care will be taken that they may be such as are fit to be about him, and as may be easy in an house, and I hope whoever they are his Majesty will give me leave to remove them, and change them if there be occasion: and also that they may know so much before they come, otherwise I shall scarce be able to give so good an account of him as I desire and hope to do. I shall take care that the best masters of all sorts be provided for him here, and I shall particularly so that they do their duties. I must also desire to know what equipage and number of servants his Majesty will be pleased to order for him, that I may take my measures in providing for him accordingly against his arrival. My wife thinks of coming soon, and I believe she is in readiness for her journey; but if his Majesty designs my lord shall come over with her she will observe his time. As for what you write me about Sir R. Carre, I am very well satisfied with what his Majesty hath done and shall never dispute his pleasure; he hath already done for me beyond what I could ever merit from him, and if I can by my service deserve more, I know he will not forget me when he hath an opportunity . . . P.S. I have just received a letter from Sr. Henry Goodrick, by a carrier from Tangier who is going with an express to the King, to let him know that the Emperor of Morocco refuseth to sign the last Treaty concluded with his ambassador at London. Sir Henry hath been very ill used, and I am afraid is so that I cannot hear from any hand but he hath done what became him.

1682, Dec. 4th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to the King.—I have received a letter by the last post from Colonel Legge, in which he acquaints me with the honour which your Majesty designs me, in intrusting me with the education of my Lord Burford, which I receive with all submission and acknowledgement imaginable, I shall endeavour to do him the best service I can, and to acquit myself with all faithfulness in everything which relates to him and to give your Majesty a good account of him. I have written to Coll. Legge more fully; and have offered some things to him with which I will not trouble your Majesty, because I presume he will impart them to you. I shall only desire to receive your Majesty's commands how I shall govern myself in what relates to the education of my lord, and what methods you will have taken in instructing him as well in his learning as his exercises, and whatsoever your Majesty is please to order shall be exactly observed.—Expresses his devotion to the King.

1682, Dec. 4th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Duke.—I have received from my brother an account of your Highnesses care of me upon the death of Sir R. Carre; though your endeavours have not succeeded, yet my obligations are as great as if they had, and I am as true and humbly thankful. The employment would have been convenient enough for me as laying in the north, but I am very well satisfied with what his Majesty hath been pleased to do, and shall never dispute his pleasure.

1682, Dec. 12th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I have taken the confidence humbly to recommend the bearer himself, Mr. Deanes, to your Highness's favour, He is one, sir, of whom I suppose you may have taken notice of when you were in Scotland; and who hath ever been very affectionate to your interests . . . If his Majesty is at any time pleased to alter my character here, I should be very glad if he might be thought upon as secretary of the embassy, for which employ I know him to be very well qualified, as being able to speak and write in the French language perfectly well, and also very knowing in affairs here. Sir And. Forrester I know will also give your Highness the same account of him and confirm everything I have said of him.

1682, Dec. 12th, st. no., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes. Encloses the above letter and acquaints him with the contents of it.—This is the substance of what I have written, which you may communicate to Sir Andrew; but by no means deliver till you find whether my business will do or not, and I pray you be very secret to all. I have not thought fit to write to Mr. Secretary yet till I have some light how I shall succeed in what I am pushing; but I tell you plainly (as I told you here) I will not stay long if I am refused it, for I am resolved to take the first occasion of quitting. I pray deliver this enclosed to Dr. Turner.

1682, Dec. 12th, s. n. Paris. Lord Preston Mr. Secretary Jenkins (in cypher).—I pray, sir, be pleased to ask the King privately if he remembers one Capt. Mortimer, who hath heretofore had some command in his fleet, but being a R. Catholick was forced to quit the service, and had the King's recommendation to the King of Denmark. When I have that answer you shall know why I ask this. I do not know how it happens, but I making a visit yesterday to a foreign minister, I found that notice of the memorial which you were pleased to write me word Mr. Chudleigh is to present, hath been given here some days since, and I have been asked about it, but seemed to know nothing of it.

1683, Jan. 27th, st. no., Paris.—The same to the same (in cypher).—I have enquired about the Prince of Saxe Bysnach, and have endeavoured to inform myself of him with all secrecy and exactness possible; and I am sure nobody can suspect anything of the reason of my enquiry. I find from those who knew him here, and also from the academy where he learnt his exercises, the character which you have had of him, and which you inclosed to me, confirmed. All agree that great care hath been taken of his education, and that he hath extraordinary qualifications. This King had great consideration for him in the time which he stayed here, which I believe was about two years. He was almost always at Court, and much with the Dauphin . . . I do not find that he is very considerable at home, for his fortune or his interest. The forces which his father is able to maintain I am told are some few regiments, and his revenues are not esteemed by his countrymen here to be above a 100,000 crowns per annum. Yet notwithstanding this he is the eldest branch of that Electoral House, and how his predecessor was put by his right, I think in the time of Charles the 5th, the history of that time will inform. The two cadets are but lately gone from hence. I met the eldest of those once at a place where I made a visit; he is but little, but well qualified also, and is very well esteemed of by all people. The youngest I have not seen, but I do not hear so good a character of him. They have a sister who is handsome, and whom the Elector of Bavaria would have lately married if she would have changed her religion. I believe it will be necessary to use another cypher sometimes, and not always one, and therefore I shall send you one soon by a very trusty hand, and you will be pleased to let me know if you approve of it. It is much shorter than this, and I think very difficult to be found out.

1683, Feb. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the King.—I have according to your Majesty's command sent over Captain Shelton, and I do not question but when your Majesty hath once spoken with him that the bottom of this business will appear, I was surprised by the notice which I had from Mr. Secretary that Stepkins was in England; he is a very notorious knave, and by no means to be credited. Captain Shelton for these two or three months hath upon several occasions addressed himself to me, and still pretended to give in new informations, and to make farther discoveries, but I never thought fit to trouble your Majesty with anything that he hath said, because I have found him in so many several stories, and so often to contradict himself that I am apt to believe that the whole matter is a fiction. Some parts of his story your Majesty will find to have been well enough contrived, which makes me believe that other heads then his own have been employed about it. I writ by the last post to Mr. Secretary Jenkins more at large concerning this affair, in which whatever it may prove I hope your Majesty will believe that I have acted only as my duty obligeth me.

1683, Feb. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness.—Mentions Shelton, alias Tilly's discovery of the French King's designs upon Ireland.—I believe the whole thing will be found to be a trick to get money and a mere fiction. However, I would not be wanting to acquaint your Highness with it.

1683, Feb. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—I writ to you at large the last post concerning Captain Shelton, alias Tilly. I have very little to add to that by this: I have acquainted his Majesty that he hath several times applied himself to me within this 2 or 3 months, and pretended still to make new and considerable discoveries, but I have never thought fit to impart anything from him to you, because I have found him so often tripping, and so egregiously in the matter of Everard's pretended voyage. He delivered me a paper of propositions from the conspirators of Ireland to this King, and which he pretended were presented to him at Fontainebleau in August last; I suppose he will not fail to deliver them to you, either with his own hand or by Mr. Stepkins, but lest he should not I have sent you them, as he delivered them to me, the handwriting is his own. I have been forced to give him very good words, and he doth promise me to go directly for England. I have put him into the hands of a very honest gentleman, the bearer, who will have a strict eye upon him, but I have some apprehensions that he may

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

play him a trick; however. I have taken all possible caution to prevent it. Mr. Deanes will give you some account of what his reputation is here. I have given him a letter to you, which I suppose he will give you at his arrival; you will be pleased not to own to him that I have written any other to you; this gentleman being obliged to come post upon this affair, I have thought fit to give him an allowance for it, though his own occasions have called him to London. I question not but that the bottom of this affair will soon be found.

1683, Feb. 15th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same. —In obedience to the King's command, the bearer hereof, Captain Shelton, hath undertaken a voyage to England, and is ready to give to his Majesty what farther satisfaction he shall require in what relates to the late information which he gave into me here, and of which I have some time since given you an account. I have assured him of his Majesty's protection and favour if he merits them, which he saith he shall endeavour to do.

Same date.—The same to the same.—I know very well that I shall pass my time very uneasily in this Court, when it is known that I have appeared in such an affair as this is. I hope, sir, you can bear me witness that I have done no more than what I was obliged to by my duty to his Majesty, to whose service I hope I shall never be wanting; if they go well I am satisfied.

A letter of the same date from Lord Preston to the Earl of Rochester, telling him about the coming to England of Captain Shelton, and adding that "your lordship will I hope easily believe that the necessary expenses of this place are great, and that the extraordinary ones also are not small, which makes me hope that you will not forget me. I shall make no complaints to your lordship of any kind, nor will I ever trouble you with many requests; if my own estate could longer supply me, I should not apply to your lordship, but I have so long relied upon that, that I must own without your assistance it will be impossible for me to subsist longer here; I doubt not of your lordship's kindness, and I hope you never will of the service and affection of him who is, &c.

1683, Feb. 10th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same (in cypher).—Having received yours on Tuesday by Capt. Mathewes, I dispatched away one very early the next morning to find out Captain Shelton, but he could not be found till I sent another messenger the next day who knew his haunts and brought him with him. The messenger told me he made several excuses that he could not come then, but would be with me the next day, and when he pressed his accompanying him he seemed so much disturbed that tears came into his eyes. However, about 5 of the clock on Thursday night he came to me. I received him well, and acquainted him with the contents of the letter which you writ with your own hand, and to work upon him more, I showed it to him, and finding that it took with him kept up the letter which you writ to himself, not knowing what use he might make of it, and shall send it to you by the next opportunity. When I broke the business of his going over to him, he said he was willing to obey his Majesty, but he could not go yet, and he must endeavour to get leave for so long a voyage; I told him if he did not go immediately hereafter it would signify nothing to the King's affairs, and for the matter of leave if it were necessary he might do as he pleased, but for so short a time as he was like to stay I thought he need not much trouble himself. In short he promised me to go, and that he would certainly be with me yesterday about 11 of the clock, but that he was to go to Versailles that night. I had him dog'd from my house by Luxembourg as far as the Louvre, where I believe he went to a blind lodging that he hath there about, but it growing dark, he could be observed no farther. The next day betwixt 12 and 1 a clock he came to me; he told me he had got leave from Mons^r. de Louvois to go to Calais to meet some horses that he had to come over, that he would take that pretext and go into England, and that he would be ready when I pleased, I told him I was glad that he was so ready to obey the King's commands, and also to justify himself, and gave him many fair words, as I am forced to do yet; he then took occasion to tell me that his loyalty was so great, and his affection also to his Prince, that nothing could discourage him to take this journey, though he did foresee that he might run hazards. And told me farther that his confidence was so great in me that he would shew me a letter which he received the day before by a particular hand from Mr. Stepkins, which I read, in which he told him that he was arrived at London, and had applied himself to his Majesty, but that he had found no great encouragement; that he had believed before that letter could reach him that he would have an invitation into England, but he advised him to consider well whether or no it would be for his interest and his safety to go thither. To be short after much discourse upon this he promised me to go, and is to be with me this day again. I hope to get him away upon Monday or Tuesday next. I told him if he wanted money I would furnish him for his journey, so I intend to let him have 8l. or 10l. here, and to give him a bill for 20l. more at Dover, for too much must not be put into his hands at one time. The gentleman who first carried over the letters concerning this in the month of August having occasion to go for England, I have engaged him to accompany him, and also to observe him, and his discourses upon the road. I shall write more at large to you concerning him by that gentleman. He hath been several times with me for these 2 or 3 months last past, and hath pretended to discover several things more relating to this business, and particularly gave propositions pretended to be presented; but since the business of not going, and other things which I have observed of him, I have not heeded much what he said, nor troubled the King with any thing concerning him. I am forced to watch him, for I apprehend that we may yet have difficulties before that be done. As for Stepkins I know him to be a great knave, and to have an ill-reputation every where; he left England for some notorious cheat as I am told, and with money which he got that way he bought horses, and brought hither to sell: for some time he hath driven a trade here, having a stable upon the Plain de Granville. I never spake with him but once, which was upon this occasion; Capt. Shelton having desired me if I had any occasion to send an express into England to employ this man, I told him I never employed any upon those occasions but those I could well trust, that I had heard a very ill character of him, and therefore would have nothing to do with him, nor have him come near my house; upon this, one day after sermons, Stepkin spoke to me as I passed by him, and desired me not to have so hard an opinion of him as he heard I had, that he was a gentleman, and his family had suffered for the King. I told him I did not meddle with his pedigree, but his reputation was very ill, and therefore I desired to have no concern with him. I never heard of him since till you mentioned him in your letter; he is by no means (in my opinion) to be trusted.

1683, Feb. 17th, st. no., Paris.—The same to the same. —My letters have been ready ever since yesterday morning to be sent with Mr. Deanes, who was to have accompanied Capt. Shelton; the Capt. hath delayed till now and is just now to tell me that he will go, but that he cannot go post, and therefore he will go easily on towards Calais, and be there on Saturday night, to be ready to go over with the next packet boat. Mr. Deanes follows him post to-morrow, and will go over with him. I cannot tell what to say, I am apprehensive he may play a trick, but I have taken all imaginable caution to prevent it. I cannot force him here to go any other way than what he proposes. I have given him but 5 pistoles here for his journey, and told him that at Dover I had ordered Mr. Deanes to furnish him as far as 20 pistoles goes. I have written more at large by Mr. Deanes, who I hope will be with you on Monday or Tuesday. I do not at all like the business, but I hope his Majesty will now see the bottom of it.

1683, Feb. 22nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to my Lord Halifax. Alludes to the great expense of his position.—I have been here now almost 10 months without having received one farthing, either for that or for my extraordinaries, the greatest part of which are allowed of Mr. Secretary, and have been for some months before the Lords of the Treasury, and my other bills are ready to be delivered in. I do not form this as a complaint to your lordship, I only represent it to you that your lordship may see that I have some thoughts of returning home with the permission of his Majesty. . . . I shall before I go farther humbly desire your lordship's advice in it, and also to know if your lordship doth not think fit that I acquaint the Duke with this, who is very kind to me upon all occasions, and who hath ever given me his protection. Your lordship would very much oblige me if I might receive the honour of a lien or two from you upon this subject as soon as your great affairs would permit. I have often wished for an opportunity of entertaining your lordship for an hour upon the affairs of this place; some particulars are to be observed here which cannot so well be taken notice of at a distance, it is neither easy nor pleasant to put down in writing what is thought and said of us by this Court, and how perhaps we shall be used by it, when we can be no more useful.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1683, March 6th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to his aunt, Mrs. Graham, Family matters.—I received letters yesterday from Madrid, which tell me that the 28 of January last my Lady Goodrick left Madrid and joined Sir Henry upon the road some ten leagues from thence, and continued their journey together homewards. I expect them here in a few days, having yesterday received a packet of letters for Sir Henry from Spain.

1683, March 10th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Secretary Jenkins.—Asking for leave of absence for a week or 10 days from the King, to arrange some of his private affairs which have been long out of order.

A letter of the same date addressed to the Earl of Rochester, asking his lordship's favour and assistance towards the procuring his Majesty's permission for leave of absence to go over to England.

1683, March 10th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—I received yesterday the honour of your Lordship's letter of Feb. 22nd, s. v., for which I am to return my most humble acknowledgments, for nothing can be more obliging than it is; I am also to acknowledge your lordship's kindness in resolving to keep the subject of my last secret till I have the honour to see you, which I am in hopes may be soon, for I have his post by a letter to Mr. Secretary Jenkins begged his Majesty's permission to go over into England for a week or 10 days upon the occasion of my private affairs, I must also beg your lordship's favour and assistance in this.

1683, March 24th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to the Marquis of Halifax.—I did by the last post receive his Majesty's answer to my request of going into England, which was that he did not think it fit that I should be absent at this time when this Court is in motion, and giveth allarms to all its neighbours, but as soon as it was settled in any place his Majesty would willingly grant what I desired. I guess from whence this proceeds; however, I shall attend the King's pleasure and observe his time as to this matter, tho' it confirmeth me in what I proposed to your lordship some time since; I had some thing to have said to your lordship if I had had the good fortune to have obtained his Majesty's leave for a week, but since I am disappointed of that I shall rather defer it, since it is not very pressing, than hazard it by the post. Some thing I must communicate to you, and I have adventured to hazard this letter under an other cover in hopes that it may get safely to your hands. The grand prier leaveth this place to go for England within a day or two. He quits the Court seemingly in disgrace for a folly that he committed some weeks since in the apartment at Versailles; some people say that he is sent for, you will imagine by whom; others whom I have found very often to guess right say that he doth not go over without a commission, and that he is ordered to give some measures from hence, and some hints concerning our affairs to some people who have a great power with our master. I have some reason to believe that they are not designed either in favour of your lordship or of Mr. Secretary Jenkins; you have both of you the misfortune not to be too much in the good graces of this Court, I would not write this to your lordship if I had not some grounds for it, and am mighty sorry that I dare not be more full and plain with you now; it can do your lordship no harm to be upon your guard, and to keep your eyes open for a while, and I hope your lordship will endeavour to keep your ground for the good of England, tho' it be to your own loss. I am a stranger to many things which pass in England at present, but I am very well satisfied of your lordship's care of us all, and I wish your designs success. If this reacheth you I hope your lordship will let it pass no farther.

1683, Aug. 14th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—I have been thus long silent, because I have not had the opportunity of such an hand as I liked of conveying a letter to your lordship; and I will not by the post write to your lordship some things which are very fit to be communicated to you, but I rather choose to attend some more sure conveyance. I have found a great deal of that true which your lordship was pleased to advertise me of concerning a certain person at my departure. The advise of caution was as necessary as it was kind, for if your lordship had not given it to me I had not been (I must own) so much upon my guard to that person as I have been since I had it; and I do assure your lordship that he will have nothing from me which will help him much in making his Court to those persons who (I have some reason to believe it) had an hand in sending him. I must beg of your lordship to let me know soon if there be any hopes of a fair occasion of calling me home. I did, when I last had the honour of seeing your lordship, endoctrine you upon that subject, and did also leave the management of it entirely with your lordship. I have now more reason to press my return than ever, because I think few have been used so ill as I am. I have been here 16 months and have not received one farthing of the King's money since I came hither. The Treasury, indeed, when I first came away gave me 950*l.*, which did not pay for my equipage, and since that time I have an arrear of above 4,000*l.*, of which I have received nothing. When I last left London the Lords of the Treasury desired me to go to Paris, and to continue my voyage towards the King, and they assured me that before the end of June they would order me 1,800*l.*, but there is not yet any of it paid in. I have written this day to them, and if they do not deal better with me I must make more noise and move the King in it. For that reason, unless my character may be changed, or some other way found out, I must beg of your lordship to endeavour my recalling from hence if it may be done fairly and without offending the King . . . I should be very glad to know if your lordship moved the King as to the reception of the Chancellorship of the Duchy.

1683, Sept. 15th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Deanes.—I have received your last kind letter when I was at Fontainebleau, for which I heartily thank you. . . . The thing which I told you of is granted to me, I mean the reversion of the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster. I had notice of it 3 days ago, and I shall not fail if it happens to take care of you to your wishes and advantage as I promised. I pray you inquire privately and as if you knew not me and as if nothing were, what age Sir T. Chicheley is off, who is the present chancellor, and how he is in health, and let me know by the first occasion; but be sure it be betwixt you and me.

1683, Oct. 5th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to the Lord Marquis of Halifax.—I did receive the honour of your lordship's of Aug. 5th, s. v., from Mr. Goslin, and I had sooner returned an answer to it if I had not attended the opportunity of my Lord of Dumbarton's departure for the conveyance of it. I should oftener impart things which are observable and of consequence to be remarked here if I had not found that advices of this kind are not agreeable at home, and that I have suffered by sometimes giving of them, so that I may freely say to your lordship I am often more solicitous what to suppress than what to write, therefore nothing but your lordship's commands (to whom I have so many obligations) could have drawn from me at this time some things which will make the subject of this letter . . . The first notice which I had, my lord, of the late conspiracy in England met me upon the road in my return from the camp of Bouquenon. The next day I had occasion to have an audience of his most Christian Majesty at Metz; he asked me concerning some particulars of it which were not clearly enough expressed in the accounts which he had had of it. I recounted to him all that my letters mentioned of the discovery, and of the conspirators. I must say to your lordship that I thought that I observed a sudden alteration in his look, which expressed a more than usual concern. I took notice of this to a friend (whom I dare trust) when I came out of his bedchamber, and who I am sure will remember it. But this might only be my fancy or mistake; and therefore though I design to proceed sincerely with your lordship, and to recount to you even the smallest circumstances and accidents from which I may imagine that any light may be drawn, I would by no means urge this or lay any stress upon it; yet some things which are come to my knowledge since make me believe that the notice of so fatal a blow to the factious party amongst us as that discovery gave was not too agreeable news to this Court at that time. Your lordship (and indeed every man who pretends to think or know) cannot much doubt of the encouragement and support which these people have received from France upon many occasions, and it hath been more than evident that they have been supported (to say no more) from hence upon this, tho' perhaps the business went farther than they designed it should. Some of the knowing men here do sometimes let fall expressions by which one may make judgments. By one of them it hath been said in confidence that if this King had not had as much fear of a Republic at least as of the King our master's peaceable power, he might have caused the rebels to have proceeded more swiftly, and his Majesty might have been cut off before the discovery of the design was made; but that being afraid of a Republic, as was said, and, perhaps, having some remains of respect for the King's person and dignity, and some horror of so execrable and lamentable a fact, he caused them to drive slowly, which he thought would put them under a necessity of being discovered, and give the King and nation occasion enough, by the breach which such a discovery would make, to do the business of France, and which would be more safe to him than the cutting off the Royal line, and the totally overthrowing of the Government; but, however, said he, to provide against all hazards, and least some hot spirits might have driven faster and further than he wished they might do, he had forces ready, in case that they had cut off the King, to have seized upon England during that confusion. And by way of prevention he had instruments amongst the rebels to keep them in dissention, and from coming to any sort of resolution upon a certain form of Government which might put the nation into a condition to resist a sudden and well mesnaged invasion. It is the ordinary language of this place, that if the King our master would be in no danger of plots he must be firm to France, for since he had embraced other interests he hath been ever embroiled, and ever would be so notwithstanding the endeavours of the loyal party, unless he would resolve to keep close to that measure: tho' it doth seem invidious to say that the most Christian King hath been privy to the practises of the ill people amongst us, yet it doth not seem unreasonable to judge it, since nobody hath intrigued and corresponded more with them than his ambassador hath, as your lordship and others very well know. We have some of the disaffected party here, and those none of the least busy, English and Scotch, are constantly passing and repassing betwixt this place, Holland and England; some of whose names I know, others I cannot learn. The handful of them who are here (and whose motions I watch narrowly) seem to be as confidant of their cause as ever, which confidence must be grounded upon encouragement given to them. They make no difficulty to say that new businesses may be cut out soon for the King in England, and when some people would have deterred them from those thoughts by mentioning the death of my Lord Russel, they said they knew that some men's lives must be spent before the good cause can take effect; and they are so impudent as to laugh at all the proceedings of the King and his ministers, and to say that a day will come when they shall pay all. I am thoroughly persuaded that there are agents here from the faction party of England and from Argile, who (if I am rightly informed) after having had a consult with some of his friends in Holland is gone back into Scotland, and is about taking of new measures there; and some of his friends do not stick to say that they hope to see him here soon. I do not despair of knowing who the persons said above to be employed are in a little time. I find that some who are here have great correspondence at Geneva, at Montauban, at Basil in Switzerland, as likewise at Hambour and other Republican towns, from which places I am apt to believe that they draw money and transmit it to their friends in England. . . . The factious English here continue their own arts of making false reports to run, as that a ligue offensive and defensive is made betwixt the King our master and this King: That Monsieur Telladet had lately offered in England the assistance of France to his Majesty by men, or money, or both towards the making of him absolute; but I need mention no more of these because they harp upon the old thing of fomenting jealousies and fears which have been the chief ferment all along of our unhappy disturbances. . . . Monsieur de Croissy congratulating with me one day the discovery of it (the conspiracy), told me that the King my master had a very fair opportunity now of establishing his authority and of increasing of it; I told him that the authority of a King of England by our laws was so great as that I was sure the King my master would desire it to be no greater; that having peace and war and all other prerogatives necessary to royalty in his hands, and also the purses of his subjects in his power, as his Majesty had, having the hearts of the best of them, which I thanked God was much the greater number, no Prince in Europe could be more absolute than he was. I said further what your lordship may imagine one might say upon this subject, and I found more and more that it was the hopes of this Court that his Majesty would attempt something at this time upon the liberties of the people which might put within that breach what would be a great measure made, and through which it hopes one day to attempt upon us. Another minister upon the same occasion at another time said that the King my master had a fair opportunity now of establishing his authority, and since he could not trust to his own subjects, he would do well to call in foreigners and to establish a guard of Swisses, who are faithful and trusty, and would stand by him, and keep his subjects in order. Your lordship may imagine that I told him that the King had faithful subjects enough to whom he durst confide his person, that foreigners would not pass their time well in England, and that I added some other things to that purpose: by these discourses your lordship may guess at something, and may (tho' darkly) perceive what kind of advices are given and insinuated for the embroiling of us. By what hath happened it appeareth that your lordship hath judged very justly that in likelihood France would fall upon Flanders this year: this King hath chosen his time well, when the Emperor and his allies (tho' the siege of Vienna be raised) are in no condition to assist the Spaniards. He hath also reaped the harvest of that country, and with the corn filled his magazines too, that he is able to make his troops to subsist there, where no other troops can, and by hindring the people from sowing this season he will make it impossible for any assistance to be given it the next year. He attacketh those countries because there will be no corn nor other provision for men or horse to live upon, so that the damage which he hath done by sending his army thither now is greater than if he had taken 2 or 3 of their best towns; and after all this it is pretended that no acts of hostility are committed, nor that any contravention hath been made to the Treaty of Nimegue. The arbitration, be assured my Lord, is the last thing that will go down with the Spaniards, because Luxembourg, which they think must be sacrificed by it, is the last place that they will yield. The reason which Spain giveth for it is shortly this, that if the King continue in possession of Strasbourg, and maketh himself master of Luxembourg, or causeth it to be raised, he will to curb the three Ecclesiastical Electors, and the Elector Palatine, that they shall not be able to move any way; as is evident, for it is all a plain and open country from Luxembourg to Cologne, and he who is master of four of the seven Electors will have a very fair pretension when a King of the Romans cometh to be elected. It is thought here that if the French troops do anything this year in Flanders they may have in their eye to surprise Newport or Ostend, or both, to which places they have a great desire; for then, say some here, we shall not need to care for the mediation of the English, nor for their enmity if they should break with us upon this occasion; this design is thought here feasible if well managed by reason of the present posture of affairs in England, and if it be not executed this year it may be another. Your lordship knoweth the importance of these two place as to us, and I wish an eye may be had to them. I believe they press it more at present by reason of a report which is here that the Spaniards would be willing if we give them assistance to put them into the King our master's hands; but your lordship knoweth if there be any trust in this or not. Yet after all this, my lord, it is very certain that his most Christian Majesty dreads nothing more than a war at this time, and tho' the vast levy of 40,000 men is talked of, with a design if possible to fright the Spaniard to a compliance, it is impossible for him to raise them, for the finances are drained, credit is broken, and the people of the provinces are in so miserable a condition that they have scarce meat or clothes. The next voitures of silver and gold which go almost weekly into Italy, Germany, and into other countries, and which come slowly back, hath in some measure cleared the country even of the species of money. The shutting up of the Caisse des Emprunts hath occasioned the breaking of several of the farmers, and tho' it hath been open for some days no body is paid, tho' most people press hard for their money. And the last arrêt which declareth that this King will settle the fonds of the Caisse des Emprunts to the 20 millions hath given great frights here, because that sum is to lie as dead there, and never to be drawn out, the interests being only to be paid so long as his most Christian Majesty pleaseth; this your lordship will find to be true. I think all danger of a war in the north is blown over at this time; the King of Dannemarke dare certainly not move, having the house of Lunenbourg so powerfully armed before him. The King of Sweden having a good army in Schonen, and a considerable fleet at Carlskrona, and that Holland is having new another at sea; and I believe that Danmarke will have difficulty against the next year to make preparations equal to those of this, for French money will not flow in upon him again with so mighty a tide as it hath done.—Comments on the raising of the siege of Vienna.—They are much disturbed at this Court about some papers and letters which have been taken in the Grand Vizir's tent. them what most people suspected doth now clearly appear, which is that this King hath all along fomented the rebellion in Hungary and the proceedings of Tekeli. The instructions have been seen, and the commissions which were given to Mons^r. de Vernay (some of whose letters were intercepted in Poland some 7 or 8 months since, as your lordship may perhaps remember that I writ), who lately parted from Dantzick, having been a commander amongst them for that effect. I am pretty well assured that Tekeli had an agent here just at the time when this Queen died, who carried away with him in specie to Hungary 8,000 louis d'ors and bills of exchange for much a greater sum. Your lordship will hardly imagine what methods have been taken for diverting the succors of Vienna. If that place had been taken, say they here, Germany would have been forced to have chosen the most Christian King for their Emperor, as the only person able to defend them. This certainly was the design, in vindication of which they say, when it is urged that it is ill done of Christians, and chiefly of the most Christian King, to contribute to the increase of Turks in Christendom, that a great good cannot be effected without suffering some ill, and that an universal monarchy is the greatest good that can happen to Europe, as being the only thing which can put the Christians in a condition to destroy the Turks. This is their just and honest way of reasoning here upon this subject I hope the King our master will think of some effectual and speedy means for settling the peace of Christendom, which doth expect such a settlement by no other means than that of his Majesty's interposition and travail. If a war breaketh out the effects of it must be fatal to most parties, and I must confess I am amazed to find that any one amongst us can imagine that if that happens England can be a quiet spectator without bearing a share in so universal a calamity. I wish that such men may not broach and insinuate such opinions with a design that we may be found unaimed and unprovided when that day cometh The acts which are set on foot here to avoid the prejudice which France may receive by our being too much united at home are many and various; nor are those instruments few which they employ to mesnage the ill-humours of England, and to work them to a crises, that they may be ready to be made use of by them as the King our master shall give them occasion. They do upon every opportunity endeavour to improve the little dissatisfactions which are betwixt Spain and us, and they would have the public believe that no less effect can be produced from thence than a ligue offensive and defensive betwixt us and them. They say that the King our master ought openly to demand satisfaction of the Hollanders for the affront done to his subjects at Bantom, and that it is dishonourable for him to sit down with it. I am sorry that the Duke thinketh that France is firm to him. If I see anything, notwithstanding all promises, the old rancour against him remaineth; still I know that Mons^r. Courtine and the Mareschall de Humieres and some others have licence to correspond with him, and to talk for his interests here; but the bottom is French and consequently unsound. I wonder that the practices about the bill of exclusion can so soon be forgotten, and other marks also of kindness which he received from hence in his distress—but of this enough—Mr. Montague continued not here long; but by what I learnt, I believe he was glad to be on this side the water. He came to see me, and I returned his visit; but did not find him at home. If he had commerce here with the Court (as I verily believe he did not come without some errand) it was very secret, for I had him observed as much as could be, but I could never discover any thing material. He commended Mons^r. de Croissy very much to me; and his sister, my Lady Hervey, when she was here was almost constantly at his house and table, both here and at Versailles. Mr. Hampden had certainly negotiations here, whether it is believed in England or not. Mr. Algernon Sidney is much admired and spoken of by the French. Doctor Burnet is already as busy and as well acquainted here as in England, and hath been extremely well received at this Court, and every where. I wish his Majesty had not permitted him to come out of England, for he is certainly more capable of doing mischief here than there. I hear that he doth insinuate every where that he is very well with the King our master, and that it is only the Duke who oppreseth him. I met him at Fontainebleau, where he had been some days. He told me that he was to go away the next day, but I left him there two days after. I was surprised at an audience which I happened to have there to see him in the King's bedchamber, and within two or three persons of him. That day he went to the Archbishop of Rheims and after an extraordinary reception he was with him for about two hours. I have had an esteem for Doctor Burnet heretofore, nor would I now prejudice him; but I would have your lordship judge if all this carressing of a stranger in a Court which naturally hateth and despiseth us doth not speak something. Here is one Fletcher, Laird of Salton, lately come from Scotland, he is an ingenious but a violent fanatick, and doubtless hath some commission, for I hear he is very busy and very virulent. I have some grounds to believe that Messieurs de Ruviguy, the father and son, are deputed to treat with these people, and to mesnage our turbulent and mercenary spirits. They are chosen as having habitudes in England, and knowledge of our English affairs, but concerning this I hope soon to have more light. This King desireth nothing with greater earnestness than to prevent the calling of a Parliament in England, and, doubtless, all his usual instruments will be set on work for the end; but if they should not prevail they are prepared as to the measures which they are to take: for words to the following effect have been let fall lately by a person of account here: That nothing but the King our master's good stars could effect the assembling of a good Parliament, and being asked why he thought so, he replied that France had instruments amongst us who, notwithstanding the King's advantages will prevail for a considerable number of contrary elections; that it hath others who in all these commotions have seemed firm to the King's interests only to give notice hither of the Courts measures, that they may the better countermine them. He continued that the King our master was persuaded of this, and that therefore he was afraid to call a Parliament yet, though there be great necessity for it, and tho' the people's affections be so warm towards him that it seemeth to be the critical minute for it. He said further that if a Parliament should be now called tho' of never so loyal men, before the examinations of the persons concerned in this plot should be done, they would so mesnage them with specious pretences, that they should be pressing to have the examination of that affair, which whether granted or denied would do the business of France. But I believe the other game of hindring the assembling of a Parliament is better liked here at present, because the people's affections towards the King may cool, and timely it may be given to malicious spirits to work them to another temper. They are very solicitous at this time to know whether one will be called soon or not, and they are very much surprised that his Majesty hath been able, without one, to arm out so considerable a fleet at sea, as is that under the command of my Lord Dartmouth. Thus they reason, thus they design, and thus they argue here against us; may God direct the King and his ministers to the best means for our safety and preservation. I cannot observe that the French clergy trouble themselves much about this business of the conspiracy, or that they seem to aim at any advantage by it for their religion in England; they are not so much concerned for religion as men generally imagine that they are; they make it truckle to their King's will and subservient to their temporal ends, making more account of one of his edicts (by which generally they steer their consciences) than of the Pope's Bulls; we have a company of ignorant poor English clergymen here in convents, and in other places, who are foolish enough in their wishes and discourses upon this subject; but they are extremely illiterate, and inconsiderable, and what they say is not worthy to be mentioned. The reconciliation of the Duke of Buckingham, by what I hear, netleth them a little at this Court, as fearing that he may discover some of their intrigues, but yet they seem to slight it. Since I have gone thus far with my letter, there is a report begun (and believe that it may be true) that this King hath recalled his troops from Flanders. By conversation which I have had since with some persons, I have had some greater lights concerning that design than I had before. It is certain that what was done in sending the French troops thither, and in giving them orders to raise contributions, and to make military executions there, was in the view that Vienna would be lost, and that England and Holland would be under an impossibility of being able to oppose this King's designs powerfully, or in time enough upon so sudden a disorder as would have followed thence in the empire; but the sudden relief of Vienna hath disappointed them strangely; An accommodation I may almost assure your lordship is desired here now more than it seemeth to be, and the King our master cannot have a better opportunity to press it than this. Mons^r. de Louvois who before pressed a war, as much out of pique to Mons^r. Colbert as in consideration of his master's interests, would now, since the finances, buildings, and all other affairs of this King's are in his hands, and in those of his creatures, be extremely glad to bring off this King handsomely in this business of Flanders. I have already touched to Mr. Secretary Jenkins upon a report that hath run here of a ligue offensive and defensive concluded betwixt England and France. It is now discoursed of with all the confidence in the world, insomuch that I begin to fear it; and I should be obliged to your lordship if it be not so, to put me out of my pain. It is said that Monsieur de Barillon (who is a favourite and a kind of a relation to Mons^r. de Louvois, and a most intimate friend to Madame de Maintenon, as having known her in her younger days) hath mesnaged this ligue, and that Danemarke is also come into it. The method is said to have been this, that he hath had orders to induce the King our master to favour the French pretensions about the dependencies of Alost, and so to oblige the Spaniard either to that cession or to refuse the mediation of England, and so by degrees to some little piques against the English which might give occasion to his Majesty to depart from his ligue with them, and to desist from his mediation, and in fine to enter into a new ligue with the French. To this end, it is said, Mons^r. Barillon had orders to promise that nothing should be done against any maritime town; and the proposal of this ligue was to be but an amusement, if Vienna had been taken, but to be really concluded if it were relieved as now it is said to be. And Mons^r. Barillon, by the credit of Mons^r. de Louvois and Madame de Maintenon, is to have Mons^r. de Croissy's charge in reward of that service. This I write to your lordship as the discourse of this place, hoping to hear something from you by the first opportunity upon this subject. I find that your lordship lies still under the same misfortune of being no favourite to this Court, and Mons^r. Barillon dare not do you the honour to shine upon you, since his master frowneth. They know very well your lordship's qualifications, which make them fear, and consequently hate you. And be assured, my lord, if all their strength can send you to Rufford it shall be employed for that end. Two things I hear they particularly object against you, your secrecy and your being incapable of being corrupted. Against these two things I know they have declared. My Lord of Sunderland's being for them they openly avow, and their relying upon him; but believe it, there is another of our ministers who maketh much Court at the end of the gallery for whom they have no great veneration; believe my lord that I speak these things knowingly. I am to add that Mons^r. de St. Romain's negotiation in Portugal will be to demand the Infanta for this King in marriage; an express is gone to him lately upon this subject to meet him there at his arrival.

1683, Oct. 16th, s. n., Paris.—The same to (the same). Having the opportunity of conveying this safely to your lordship by the hands of Mr. Forbes, son to my Lord of Grenard in Ireland, I was very willing to embrace it, and to give you some informations which I am not willing to adventure to send by the post. Upon Thursday or Friday last Doctor Burnett went to Versailles (as I believe by invitation) where he had the greatest reception imaginable; the King took very great notice of him; he was presented to the Dauphin, caressed by people of quantity of both sexes to the greatest degree that could be. The waters played for him through all the gardens, and there was one of the Dauphin's coaches ready to carry him to see them, and he made use of it. Monsieur l'Angeau accompanied him thro' all places. The apartments and cabinets were open to him, and nothing was left undone by which any civility could be expressed to him; care was taken also to intimate that the King had not ordered more to be done to the Prince Borghese when he went some months since to see Versailles than was done for him. This particular circumstance I had from one that was with him, and who heard it. Whatever use this Court may have of him, I do not think this conduct at all prudent. I have not failed whenever an occasion hath offered to give the character of the doctor and to let all people know upon what terms he is with his Majesty; the Marschal de Belfond hath often been to visit him, and to carry him abroad in his coach. It hath been also told him that this King hath a great regard for him upon the account of his History of the Reformation, and he is generally complimented upon that subject, which maketh me believe that they may have some design by it to give a little ombre to the Nonce, that he may take notice of it to the Pope, who is too firm to the general Catholick interest to be well here. I thought fit to give your lordship notice of these particulars that you may at your leisure make your reflections upon them. I shall only add that no minister of the King's hath had, that I hear of such a reception. I was told upon Sunday last by a minister, that they have had accounts from England that upon a consultation whether the King should at this time call a Parliament or not, your Lordship and Secretary Jenkins were for it, and that my Lords of Sunderland and Rochester opposed it, which method I assure your Lordship is making of Court here. The Laird of Salton, who I mentioned in my last to you, is gone to make a little tour, but I hear he is to return soon. Doctor Burnet talks of going into England suddenly. I am extremely loth to name any persons to their prejudice, if it be not very clear to me that they are faulty. I mentioned in my last to you Monsieur de Rauvigni and his son as two with whom those of the party here treat; I am again assured of it, tho' upon my own knowledge I can say nothing, and that Mons^r. Justel is also a little busy in England, and corresponds much with him; but I am also told that he never writes himself any letters wherein is the least mention of State matters, but only takes notice of curiosities of nature and new inventions, managing his correspondence by less suspected hands. I know that my Lord of Essex was his great patron. I tell your lordship what I hear, and from some hands who have no interest to lie to me. It can do the King no harm to have eyes upon foreigners who must naturally have a love for their own country. Some of our fanatics here I find are a little troubled at the raising of the siege of Vienna, and speak in the language of this Court that the Turks will certainly return in the spring time with a very formidable army. I am told that very lately persons have been secretly dispatched to hinder Tecklies (Tekeli) submission to the Emperor if possible, and to endeavour to keep the Turks in heart. Mons^r. de Vergy who negotiated heretofore in Poland is returned to Court as being too much known there to do any more business; but others are said to be sent thither, with instructions to promote jealousies in that kingdom, in the absence of the King, by insinuating to the Republic and people that his design in this war is onely to make himself absolute, and to make the Crown hereditary to his family. I have inclosed a little book which is very authentic, and makes out clearly the intrigues of this King's former agents and ministers in Poland. I have great fears that there is a design to excite troubles in England, and particularly in London, because I am assured that good sums of money will be returned over soon, and some of it I believe may be for Argile. I mentioned in my last the correspondence of some of the disaffected English here, at Basil, Hamburg, and Dantzick, and in Holland I have reason to believe that the return of the money may be made from those places to avoid the suspicion of its being sent from hence; it is impossible for me to write positively to your lordship of these things, and to assure you that they are true, but I have very reasonable grounds for some of them. Very extraordinary means are used at present to procure money, and all preparations are making as if a war were certainly to be; the proceedings of the Spanish in Flanders alarmeth them much here, and continue a little longer may insensibly engage Europe in a war.

1684, Feb. 19th, st. no., Paris.—Lord Preston to Lord Privy Seal.—My last indisposition hath hindered me from having the honour of writing to you so often as I should have done if I had been well, but I thank God I am now in a better condition of health, and I shall not fail so often as anything happens worthy of your lordship's remarks here to inform you of it. The bearer hereof, Mr. Innis, is a person in whom I very much confide as to my affairs here; and have ordered him to acquaint your lordship with some things relating to myself which are too long for a letter.—Says that his great expenses will oblige him to beg the King's leave to return home . . . It may be of importance to your lordship to have a person in this post in whom you may confide, and who may give you true and perfect accounts of what passeth here. And if I might take the liberty of naming one to your lordship who I think is very well qualified for the affair, and who I am sure hath abilities for it, and will make them appear whenever he shall be employed, it should be my Lord Eland; I should not, as well for the King's sake as for your lordship's and his own (for both whom I have so great an honour) offer this, if I did not know that he would acquit himself every way well, and besides his other qualifications, bring industry and application with him . . .

1684, Dec. 13th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to his Royal Highness. I, having been here for almost 3 years, and being now sinking under the expense which I have been obliged to make, believe it may not be improper to inform His Majesty of my condition, and humbly to make a proposal to him, which, if he resolveth to continue me in his service here, I hope he will not think unreasonable. I have sent it by this post to my brother who will have the honour to communicate it to your Highness. I do most humbly beg of your Highness to consider of it, and to further it with his Majesty. I am extremely willing to serve his Majesty here or in any other place of Europe, where he shall think fit, and I know he intends that those who have the honour to serve him should have an easy subsistence, without which it is impossible to serve him well. If what I offer may be countenanced by your Highness and approved of without my stirring from hence I should be very well satisfied, but if it be otherwise, I shall humbly beg of your Highness to obtain leave for me from his Majesty to make a short voyage into England, upon the account of my private affairs, which are at present in some disorder, upon the assurance that I shall be ready to return hither after a very short stay there. Expresses his gratitude and devotion to his Highness.

1684, Dec. 13th, Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Grahme.—I have inclosed a letter, dear brother, for the Duke, which I pray you to read and afterwards to seal up. I enclosed a proposal to the King, if he intends I should stay here, I hope he will not think it unreasonable. I pray you communicate it to the Duke, and do what you can for me. If it be granted, I shall be able to live comfortably and do the King's business, I hope to his contentment, and I shall be in a condition to receive the Duke of St. Alban's as he desireth I should; but if it be rejected it will be impossible for me to continue longer here. By the proposal his Majesty will see that I only desire to subsist honourably and not to get much; I beg of you to push this affair with the Duke, and if you find it absolutely necessary that I should go over, I hope the Duke will ask leave of the King for me. If any difficulty be made as to the having an ambassador here upon the ceremonial account (as perhaps there may), and upon the precedence of the coaches of these Princes of the blood at his entry, I will engage to shew expedients for the regulating of all that with all safety to the honour of his Majesty . . . P.S. I pray let none but the Duke or King see this enclosed proposal.

Memd. that this was added to the foregoing letter to the colonel.

You will observe that if the King approveth of this proposal that it is to be understood that I must have advance money for my equipage, the allowance of extraordinary expenses as I have now, and that also I must have plate and those other things which are given to other ambassadors; but you need not to mention this to the King at first, afterwards we can demand them of right.

The Lord Preston, the King's Envoyé Extraordinary to the most Christian King, doth most humbly represent to his Majesty (after alluding to his great expenses), that whereas his Majesty heretofore hath always allowed to his ambassadors who have resided in this Court the sum of 100*l.* per week, which in the year doth amount to 5,200*l.* sterling. If his Majesty will double his ordinary allowance paid to him as Envoyé of 5*l.* per diem, which in the week will amount to 70*l.*, and in the year to 3,640*l.* sterling, and which will save his Majesty the sum of 1,560*l.* in the year, the said Lord Preston will serve in this Court as his ambassador in ordinary.

LORD PRESTON'S LETTER BOOKS.

Vol. 8.

Letters from Paris to Foreign Ministers, 1682—1684, and letters to Lord Lieutenants in 1688.

1682, May 29th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode, at Brussels.—I have received the honour of yours and shall be very glad to hear from you as often as occasions will permit, because I know it will be for the advantage of our master's affairs that we should frequently correspond. I shall not fail to give you particular notices and accounts of all that passeth here, and shall be ready to do you any service in this place which you shall command me. . . .

1682, June 12th, Paris. The same to the same. . . . This Court at present seems to be in a settled tranquillity, they speak more of peace than of war, for they persuade themselves that their enemies are not in a condition to enterprise any thing upon them, nevertheless they act as if they did apprehend something. . . .

1682, July 6th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Monsr. Petit, secretary to Mr. Skelton, at Hamburgh.—I have received both your letters I have given Mr. Skelton an account of what is worth sending from this place. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Capt. Skelton. The King's Envoyé Extraordinary to several Princes in Germany, he residing at Hamburgh.—I have received your honour of the 16th of June We hear yet nothing in particular of what hath passed betwixt the King of Denmark and the Elector of Brandenburg, but the general discourse of this Court is, that the resolutions which they have taken are very advantageous for France, &c. They talk of an accommodation betwixt the Pope and this King, the Pope being to send hither the Cardinal Rospighiosi to adjust all matters in dispute.

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir Rich. Bulstrode. We begin to talk very hotly of war here, the preparations for it having been made before. The voyage of Monsr. de Louvois hath also occasioned variety of conjectures and discourse. People imagining that he is not gone upon any slight errand.

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Poley, the King's resident at Hamburgh It will be very acceptable to me to hear from you what passes at Franckfort, and in return I shall not fail to transmit to you what is worthy of your knowledge here.

1682, July 27th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.

1682, July 27th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Poley.—I am extremely obliged to you for the favour you do me in giving me an account of what passeth with you at Franckfort, I shall not fail to give you notice of what is done here with all exactness. At present there seems a very great inclination to peace at this Court, and it is my opinion that there will be no war, at least this year, if France be not attacked, for without doubt a little breathing time is very necessary at present for this King's affairs. . . .

n. d. Lord Preston to Sir Rich. Bulstrode.—I have received the favour of your last, and had sooner made a return to it but that I have been extremely busy in passing betwixt this place and Versailles upon business of concern almost ever since.

1682, July 27th, st. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Petit.—This place at this time is very barren of news; but what there is worth writing I have communicated to Mr. Skelton, who I know will impart it to you. . . .

1682, Aug. 2nd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir Henry Goodrick, Envoyé Extraordinary at Madrid.

1682, Aug. 31st, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—I have received both yours, and had sooner answered them if I had not been taken up most part of the last week by performing of ceremonies to the King, Queen, &c. upon the birth of the Duke of Burgoyne, and in presenting my Lord Feversham and my brother, who are come from the King and Duke to make their compliment upon the same subject. I have not yet spoken to Monsr. de Croissy about the Duke of Holstein's affair, but I intend to do it on Wednesday, and by my next you shall have an account of it. I yesterday imparted the contents of your last letter to the Envoyé of Holstein and made him sensible first how zealously you had endeavoured to serve his master, and that your orders which I had received were (as Mr. Secretary Jenkins had written to me) obtained purely by your just means, and therefore you were a little surprised at the Duke's late carriage towards you, the particulars of which I mentioned to him in as soft and smooth a way as the business required; he seemed very much surprised at it, and spoke with much kindness and respect of you; he said he would not fail to represent the matter to his master as from himself, and he did not doubt but you would receive all civility and satisfaction from him.

1682, Oct. 16th, s. n. Paris.—The same to the same— The Envoyé of Holstein was several times to see me when I was ill, but my condition was such that I could see nobody. . . . The Duke of Savoy we hear recovers, and begins to disengage himself from the government of his mother, who is wholly supported by this Court The differences betwixt this Court and Rome seem to be much heightened of late; the Pope having declared that if the late propositions of the clergy here be not abolished, and affairs settled upon the old foot, he will proceed to censure them, and some say he threatens excommunication. The great expectation of all people now is what the Spaniards will do in the affair of the mediation offered by our master. The French are ready to begin with them if the time given them should be lapsed before they accept it. For their late prohibiting of provisions to be carried into Luxembourg is a kind of a beginning of a blockade, and doubtless the first moment they are at liberty by the Spaniards' refusal they will besiege it.

(Autograph.) This day I writ also to Mr. Poley, the King's resident at Frankfort, in the same words that I did to Mr. Skelton, except the matter relating to Holstein.

1682, Oct. 16th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode. I am extremely sorry to hear of your late accident, tho' I am glad at the same time to have occasion to congratulate with you your recovery. . . .

1682, Nov. 20th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—The Court arrived at Versailles from Fountainbleau upon Monday night. I went thither on Tuesday, and I find that the Court hath yet had no account of any resolutions taken in Spain concerning the late proposition made there by the King our master; nor do I expect at present that any very direct answer is expected, so that I question not but that measures are taken against the expiration of the term lately limited. The ministers here declare the great inclinations which their master hath for establishing of a lasting peace upon all occasions, and say that for a very small consideration he is ready to quit all pretensions which he may have upon the Spaniards. What the consideration expected may be it is hard yet to know, but I am sure peace is the interest of our master at least, and I wish with all my heart he may succeed in his endeavours for it. . . . The affairs betwixt this Court and Rome seem at present to be in a little better posture than lately. Its said that the Pope intends to send the Langes Benites with a magnificent present to the Duke de Bourgogne, and that the Nonce who brings them shall reside here. . . .

1682, Dec. 7th, s. n., Paris.—The same to the same.—I have deferred to answer your very obliging letter till this time, because I had nothing worth troubling you with, for this Court seems now to mind nothing less than business. Operas and comedies are the great divertisement of it, and a continued rejouissance is designed the whole winter. But you will imagine very easily that business goes on too, and that there is a mixture of utile and dulce. . . . The Spa Ambassador (as I know you have heard), presenting lately a memorial to the King our master, by which he desired his Majesty to interpose his offices with the most Christian King for the prolongation of the term limited (though in terms something too fine, according to his custom) his Majesty was pleased to acquaint Mons^r. de Barillon with it, and also to desire him to intimate his desires to his master that he would yet accord a delay. At the same time also he commanded me to do offices in this Court, and to let the King know that the great passion he had always testified to see the peace of Christendom upon a sure foot did oblige him to demand it of him. The instances which were made were very well received, and accordingly (as I know you have heard) the term is prolonged till the 15th of Jan. next. Mons^r. le Baron Delvall was the other day with me before I sealed my packet, by the order of Mons^r. de la Fuentes, to let me know that Mons^r. de Croissy had made upon Friday last a visit to him the ambassador, and did by the order of his master acquaint him that he was very much surprised with the late answer which he had given to the letter which Mons^r. de Croissy had written to him by his order. That he had given notice of it to all the Courts of Europe, and also ordered his officers in those parts of Flanders to resist the march of any troops through his countries, and to repell them by force who-soever they were. The answer of the ambassador was in short this, that whereas he had been pleased to let him know that his Majesty was much surprised with what he had written in answer to the letter which he had been pleased to write to him, he was no ways surprised with those menaces nor with the resolution he had taken. The ambassador not proceeding, and Mons^r. de Croissy expecting that more should have been said, he went away in some heat. . . .

1682, Jan. 4th, n. s., Paris.—Lord Preston to Coll. Kirke, Governor of Tangier. Captain Nicholson having some time since put into my hands the favour of your letter from Tanger, I take the liberty of charging him with this to return you my hearty thanks for it. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir H. Goodricke, at Madrid. I had not so long been wanting to write to you if I could have believed that my letter would have come safe to your hands. I was extremely glad to receive yours by Captain Nicholson, and was preparing to have answered it when the account of your late barbarous treatment arrived here. All the world is amazed at it, and can look upon it as no other than an open breach of the law of nations, of which the privileges and rights of ambassadors make a considerable part, and have always been extremely sacred even amongst the most barbarous nations. I was apprehensive that after so great a violence they might not suffer you to write, or at least to convey to his Majesty our master an account of it. I have, therefore, some time since written the exact narrative of their proceedings to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, which will not be much to their advantage. One thing ought to support you much in this affair, which is that by all my letters I find the king and the ministers not at all dissatisfied with your proceedings, and you may be assured that in this place, or wherever else I am, I will take care that justice shall be done you in representing your proceedings and carriage in it. . . .

1682, Feb. 7th, n. s., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—Things in this Court continue in the same posture that they have been in for some time, and it is the opinion of most people that there shall be no great action this year, but that if any happen to be it will rather be on the side of Italy than Flanders, and 'tis thought that under the pretext of Algiers Genoa is aimed at. . . . Monsieur Haythausen is returned from our Court, and much satisfied with the kind reception which he met with there, as well from the King our master as from the ministers. The answer which was given him I know you have, and you will perceive that besides a wall of assistance (which you know cannot well be given at this time) nothing more could have been done in that affair. . . .

1682, Feb. 6th, st. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Poley.—I have received yours from Ratisbone. . . . I was very glad by it to find that you were safely arrived there, where I wish you all success in your negotiations, and that they may be for the King our master's service and satisfaction (as I am sure you will endeavour they shall be), and also for your own advantage. This Court seems to be persuaded that a treaty doth advance a pace where you are, and that the proposal of France will be accepted. On the other hand, the Imperial and Spanish ministers sustain that the Emperor will hold firm, and not treat but in conjunction with his allies; but a little time will clear this matter. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode.—. . . Things in this Court continue in the same posture. . . . (Gives the same news as in the two previous letters to Mr. Skelton and Mr. Poley.)—Mons^r. Delval (as I believe you may have heard), applying the other day to Mons^r. de Louvois by the order of the Marquis de Grana, to complain of some new pretensions to several places in the county of Nanur, and set on foot by a French intendant in those parts, was answered that the Marquis de Grana ought not to believe rumours and reports, for that the King his master was resolved to observe the declaration which he made at the raising the Blocus of Luxembourg, which was that he would keep what he then possessed but that he would attempt nothing anew till all differences betwixt him and the Crown of Spain were terminated either by the arbitrage of the King our master or by some other mean. . . . I will very speedily send you both sand and wax as you desire, and as soon as I can get them bound I will send you the works of Pere Maimbourg.

1683, April 11th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Fanshaw, Envoyé Extraordinary in Portugal.—. . . The great discourse of this Court at this time is of war. Great preparations are making for it. Five campements are to be made; one upon the Saone, commanded by Mons^r. de Boufflars; another upon the Saar, where the Duke de Villeroi commands; a third is to be betwixt the Sambre and the Meuse, where Mons^r. de Mondar is to command; and one is to be in Alsace, and another in Flanders, where Mons^r. de Sourdes and Mons^r. de Montbrun command. Some people think the design is upon Genoa, others upon Luxembourg, which I confess is my opinion, if the Turks enter Hungary, which in all appearance they will do.

1683, April 22nd, n. s.—Lord Preston to Coll. Kirke.—I have lately received two of your favours, one by the post and another by Captain Nicholson, and I take the opportunity of this gentleman's passing your way the more willingly because he is very particularly recommended to me as one who, being sent express from this Court to Portugal, has a curiosity to see Tangier in his voyage, and will deserve the honour of your acquaintance. His name is Mons^r. de la Neuville, and is of a very good family, so if any occasion offer wherein your countenance and protection may stand him in stead, I beg you will honour him with it. . . .

1683, Aug. 23rd, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Poley.—Whilst you travail for peace at Ratisbone we are here giving the signal of war, for which now nobody doubts since the Duke de Ville Roy and Mons^r. de Boufflars are marching towards Flanders with the troops which were this summer encamped upon the Saar and the Saone. . . . The squadron which the King our master hath lately put to sea under the command of my Lord Dartmouth occasions much discourse in Europe, and particularly here. Some people think that it is gone to the Baltique to assist and join the French and Danish fleets there; others it is gone into the Mediterranean to watch the motions of the Spanish fleet there, which I look upon as more probable, because we believe that those people will lose no advantage which by any means they can gain upon us, since they have been industrious upon all occasions to treat us with indignity. Witness the affair of Sir Henry Goodricke, and in a late rencontre where the Spanish Admiral at his coming out of Cadiz obliged one of the King's ships to strike to him. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir Rich. Bulstrode.—Giving the same news as in the letter to Mr. Poley.

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—Containing the French news as above.

1683, Sept. 27th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Poley. I arrived late the last night from Fountainbleau, where I have been obliged to continue for some days. At my return I received yours of the 16th current. . . . The account in it concerning Vienna was very acceptable to me. On Tuesday last the news of the raising of the siege arrived at Fountainbleau, but the particulars of the action were very obscurely and uncertainly related by Mons^r. de Seppeville.—Gives the names of the Lieutenant Generals of the French King's army. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—A short letter giving the same news as in the foregoing letter.

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode.—Nearly the same as the above.—. . . I shall not fail to send you with the first some of the Queen of Hungary's water. If you could procure me a little chocolate you would oblige me, for we have none here.

1683, Nov. 8th, s. n., Paris. The same to the same.—Mons^r. de Croissy, by order of the King, told me the other day that the small inclination which Spain shewed to an accommodation had obliged the King his master to send orders to the Mareschal de Humieres to besiege Courtray, but that so soon as it was taken he was resolved to submit that, and all his pretensions which he might have upon Spayne to the disposition and determination of the King our master; that he had acquainted Mons^r. Barillon with this resolution and the reasons of it by a courier express, which he was to impart to his Majesty; that he had also done the same to Mons^r. d'Avaux, and sent him this King's order to notify it to the States General at the Hague. And to make his great design which he hath to establish the peace of Christendom appear to the whole world, the King his master had ordered him further to declare to me, that if Spayne would give him any equivalent for the just pretensions which he hath upon the Pais d'Alost and the Vieux bourg de Gand that he was willing to accept it, and that he would propose 3 ways for it, that Spayne might choose that which should be least inconvenient to itself. The first is, that he will be willing to take Luxembourg with the walls and fortifications razed, with 12 or 13 villages about it such as he shall name; or in the next place he will take Courtray and Dixmude, with some villages which depend upon them; or if the King of Spayne be not willing to give him an equivalent in Flanders, he will accept of Puicerda in Catalogne, with that part of the county of Cerdagne which yet remaineth to the Spaniard. And to make it also appear that he hath no design to attack the empire, when he shall have adjusted differences with Spayne, he is willing to grant a truce to it for 30, 25, or 20 years, as the matter shall be regulated by the Diete at Ratisbone. This is what Mons^r. de Croissy told me, but whether Spayne will hearken to it or not you are better able to judge than I.

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—Almost word for word as the preceding letter, but at the end he writes—This, sir, is in effect what he [Croissy] told me, but what resolutions the Spaniards will take upon it cannot yet be known. For my part I think it impossible to avoid a war, if the King our master doth not interpose very powerfully and very soon. I hear he doth design to send a minister soon into Spayne, but I do not yet know who it is.

On Monday the 6th of February his lordship writ a letter to Mr. Fanshaw, Envoyé Extraordinary in Portugal, in behalf of Monsieur Genderaud, who accompanied the Marquis de Torsy to that Court, but there was not time to copy it.

1684, March 27th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode. . . . Great preparations are now making here for war both by land and sea. . . . The Nuncio had an audience at Versailles upon Wednesday last, in which he represented the desire of the Pope to this King that he would retard his voyage for some days because the Emperor had sent one express to the King of Spayne to endeavour to persuade to accept of a truce as proposed by France. His most Christian Majesty answered that he had already taken his measures, and that it was impossible to do it, so that I believe he may give you soon a visit in Flanders.

s. d. Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—Great preparations are making here as well by sea as by land, the King resolving to have a fleet of 40 men-of-war, and of 30 galleys in readiness for action before the beginning of May; accordingly, Mons^r. de Seignelay immediately after Easter goeth in post to Thoulon, where, as also at Marseilles and at Brest they are using all diligence in preparing what will be necessary for putting the fleet to sea. Commissions are given for buying great quantities of beef and other provisions in all places, and particularly orders are sent to Dunkerque for buying 8,000 barrels of beef, which will make well for Ireland. Nothing can be more relished here than the late proposition made by Mons^r. Van Citters to the King. This King saying that he took his memorial for a second declaration of war, and that the confederates treated him as if they had won a hundred battles against him. . . . I hear Sir Wm. Waller governeth highly at Bremen, and that he hath given retreat to Sir Thomas Armstrong and Fergusson and the rest of that loyal society. I should be glad, sir, to hear some particulars of this from you. I am also told that you are marked out by them for a sacrifice when opportunity serveth. I know this will make you more active and vigorous in pursuing such bloody villains, whom the justice of God will pursue and overtake in time.

1684, April 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Sir R. Bulstrode.—I have endeavoured several times to meet with Mons^r. de Louvois to have spoken to him about the business you were pleased to recommend to me but could never yet have an opportunity of finding him at home, either at Versailles or here, his business having been extraordinary for these 3 weeks past, but I shall not fail upon the voyage to speak to him, and to recommend your affair. . . . I have received the King's commands to follow this King into Flanders, and I design to leave this place in order to it to-morrow, and if there be any possibility of corresponding with you there I should be extremely happy to hear from you.

1684, April 28th, s. n., Paris.—Lord Preston to Mr. Poley.—. . . This King on Saturday last began his voyage towards Flanders, which hath occasioned a great scarcity of news here. . . . The designs of this King are yet very mysterious, but it is not doubted but that he designeth to attack some place, and I have reasons to believe that it will be Luxembourg, but a few days will decipher the secret. The Spaniards still continue obstinate, and by all the advices which we have here from Madrid I cannot perceive that the council there hath made any step there towards the accepting of a truce as proposed by France.

1684, April 28th, s. n., Paris. Lord Preston to Mr. Skelton.—A short letter containing the same news as the above.

Dispatches to Lords Lieutenants in 1688, Lord Preston being Home Secretary.

1688, Nov. 5th, London. Lord Preston to the Duke of Norfolk.—The bearer, Mr. Chappell, was formerly concerned in drawing the leases of her Majesty the Queen Dowager's jointure, in which employment he acquitted himself very well, and for his health is removed to Norwich where, at the expense of 500*l*. he was settled in the town clerk's place, and, upon the restoration of its charter to that ancient city Mr. Chappell is apprehensive of some difficulties that he may meet with from some who may have an eye upon his place unless he have the continuance of your grace's favour. I know him to be an honest and a loyal man, and therefore take the liberty to recommend him to your grace.

1688, Nov. 6th, London. Lord Preston to the Duke of Beaufort.—I have received the honour of your grace's letter of the 3rd instant. . . . I am to acquaint your grace that I did, immediately upon the receipt of it, lay the contents of your letter before his Majesty, and he hath commanded me to let you know that he did very well remember his promise to your grace concerning Sir Henry Chancey, and that he hath now performed it; Sir Henry having kissed his hand for the employment to which you recommended him within an hour after the arrival of your letter. I am sorry that it doth not fall out so at present, as I might be serviceable to Mr. Rumsey for whom I have a very great esteem, but whenever any occasion shall offer itself he shall find me very ready to serve him. It hath not yet pleased his Majesty to declare his pleasure concerning Mr. Serjeant Geeres, nor Mr. Hopson, but I shall take the first good opportunity of knowing it, and shall not fail to impart it to your grace. I am farther to acquaint your grace in answer to what you write concerning Sir Robert Owen that I found his Majesty very ready to have complied with your request concerning him if he had not some time before the arrival of your letter had advice of the death of my Lord Bulkeley, and also disposed of the Vice-Admiralship of North Wales to Sir Wm. Williams his lordship's son-in-law. His Majesty hath also commanded me to let your grace know that he doth receive very kindly the expression which Sir Robert Owen makes of his duty and loyalty to him in his offer of raising £00 men for his service in this hazardous and troublesome conjuncture, and tho' at present he doth design to make no more levies, yet he shall not fail upon the first opportunity to let Sir Robert find the effects of his favour and kindness. He doth order your grace to give him thanks in his name, as also to Mr. Pugh and Mr. Mostin, whose seasonable and dutiful offers, tho' at present he doth not accept them, his Majesty will by no means forget. I have acquainted the King with what your grace writeth concerning Coll. Carne, and his Majesty ordereth me to let you know that he would not have him proceed in his levies till his further order be signified to him. The King is very sorry to have so ill an account of the inclinations of some of his subjects in those countries where your grace at present is, but he commands me to let you know that he is very well pleased with your grace's care of his concerns there, and that he doth not doubt of your continuing it, he having an entire confidence in you, and tho' he should be very glad to have you with him if he goeth into the field, yet your presence where you are is so absolutely necessary to the welfare of his affairs in those countries that he cannot think of removing you. My Lord Stowell is made Lord Lieutenant of Somersetshire in the place of my Lord Walgrave, and I believe there will be an alteration speedily in Wiltshire. My Lord Delaware is Lord Lieutenant of Hampshire in the place of the Duke of Berwick. We have this afternoon advice that the Prince of Orange hath been seen with his fleet upon the coast of Devonshire, and his Majesty hath commanded me to let your grace know that he is sending troops towards you at Bristol, which are now upon their march.

1688, Nov. 6th, London. Lord Preston to Sir Robert Holmes, Governor of the Isle of Wight.—I received yours of the 4th instant, which I immediately laid before his Majesty. We were in great apprehensions for you lest they might have made some attempt upon your island, but this afternoon we have had advice that the Dutch fleet did appear yesterday near Torrebay, so that we do not doubt, but that they land upon that coast, and that their first attempt will be either upon Plymouth or Exeter. If you have any further notice or account of that fleet it will be very satisfactory to his Majesty that you impart it with all diligence.

s. d. Lord Preston to Lord Langdale, Governor of Hull, at Hull.—I am commanded by his Majesty to let you know that it is his pleasure that if any of the militia forces of Yorkshire be marched into Hull your lordship should immediately dismiss them, or if they be not yet with you that you should take care that notice be given through the East Riding that there will be no present occasion for their service in that garrison.

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir John Reresby, Bart., at York. I received the favour of yours of the 3rd instant and did lay it before his Majesty in Council, who is very well pleased with the account you give of the affairs in Yorkshire, and is extremely satisfied with the care you have of what relateth to him in the absence of the Duke of Newcastle (to whom I have written by his Majesty's order this night) which he doth not doubt but you will continue. As to the orders which you mention to have been sent to the Duke of Newcastle concerning some of the militia troops to be marched into Hull, I am to acquaint you that they are superseded this night by his Majesty's commands signified by me to his Grace the Duke of Newcastle and to my Lord Langdale, the safety of that place being otherwise provided for.

1688, Nov. 8th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—I have received your letter of the 5th instant, and have laid it before the King, who is very well satisfied with your care and diligence in his service, and does not doubt but you will continue the same for the future. I must desire that you will still let us hear from you as often as anything happens fit to be communicated to his Majesty.

s. d. Whitehall. Lord Preston to Sir Robert Holms.—I have received one letter from you of the 5th and two of the 6th of this month, and have laid them all before his Majesty, who having considered what you write concerning that island and the defence of it commands me to tell you that you shall very speedily receive his orders in this matter by Mr. Blathwayte.

1688, Nov. 13th, London. Lord Preston to the Duke of Newcastle.—I have obeyed your grace's commands in acquainting his Majesty with your grace's humble suit to him that you may be employed where there is action. He hath commanded me to assure you that he confideth in the fidelity of no person more than your grace's, and that tho' he could be extremely glad to have your grace with him in this expedition, yet your presence is so absolutely necessary to his service in those countries where you are that he must deny to himself the satisfaction of having you to accompany him.

1688, Nov. 15th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to the Chancellor of the Duchy.—Recommending to him Mr. Thomas Eyre, one of the Queen Dowager's tenants, who, as he is informed, has been at great expense in maintaining her Majesty's right and title.

1688, Nov. 16th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to Sir Edward Hales.—The King having been moved upon the enclosed petition of George Vanderstraten, commands me transmit the same to you, and to acquaint you that his Majesty has granted unto the petitioner the Dutch fisher boat mentioned in the petition, and would therefore have you give orders for delivering the same with her furniture too to him.

1688, Nov. 17th, London. Lord Preston to Lord Dartmouth.—I have received your lordship's very kind letter of the 15th instant. . . . I wish you all the success that may be in whatsoever you undertake, and I must assure you that notwithstanding the malice of a party at Court, which hath already almost wrought our destruction, your lordship is extremely safe and happy in the King's justice to you, who knoweth and hath declared publicly and privately that it was impossible for you to take other measures than you did when the Dutch passed by you. He is this afternoon gone for Windsor, and hath taken the Prince with him in order to leave him at Portsmouth. The Queen stayeth here for some time. God give him good success and grant him a safe return. God of heaven send us a good meeting and preserve you. You may be assured that I shall be watchful over whatever concerns you.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Duke of Beaufort.—I am commanded by his Majesty to transmit to your grace the enclosed extract of a letter which I have received from the Marquis d'Albeville. Your grace will observe the importance of the advise if it be true. His Majesty's direction therefore upon it to you is that your grace take care that Sir Hugh Owen, whom we believe to live in Pembrokeshire, be strictly observed, and that if he be found to act any way contrary to his duty your grace would be pleased to give notice of it to his Majesty either by my Lord Middleton or myself.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Duke of Newcastle.—So soon as I did receive the honour of your grace's letter concerning Mr. Dand, who was appointed sheriff of Nottinghamshire, I did lay the contents of it before his Majesty, who hath been graciously pleased to excuse Mr. Dand at your grace's request, and to appoint another person to execute that office.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Lord Aston.—Relating to his lieutenancy and the militia of Staffordshire.

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir John Reresby.—Upon the receipt of your letter I did lay the contents of it before his Majesty, who is very well pleased with the account which you give of the readiness which the gentry of our country show towards the carrying on of his service. He hath commanded me to signify to you his pleasure to let them know that he doth receive this expression of their duty and loyalty with great satisfaction, and that he will be ready to acknowledge it to them upon any occasion which shall offer itself. I have further in charge to let you know that what hath been done in relation to the commission of the peace of the West Riding hath been by mistake, for the rectifying of which order was immediately given. His Majesty knows nothing of it, but it was done according to the late scheme, which hath had the effects of which you have heard through the whole nation. His Majesty hath not yet given me a positive answer to what you have written concerning your son, but I shall desire me Lord Middleton who attends the King in this voyage to put his Majesty in mind of it, and I shall not fail to give you an account of what may be done in it.

1688, Nov. 18th, London.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Middleton.—I hope this will find his Majesty safely arrived at Salisbury. I hope God will protect him and give him good success, and to all you a happy and safe return. All things passed here yesterday with great quietness, there having been no disorder that I have heard of in any part of the city. There were very good guards posted in all the quarters of it, and the officers civil and military were very watchful in their several stations. . . . I did last night send to Mr. Frowde a packet to be sent to Windsor, in which was enclosed a letter from the Marquis d'Albyville to his Majesty, and also that which he writ to me. My Lord Godolphin tells me that they were not received before the King left Windsor, which I wonder at, but I hope they were conveyed after him.

1688, Nov. 19th, London.—The same to the same.—I can repeat to your lordship the assurance of all things being very quiet in the city of London at this time, and of the great likelihood of their continuing so. The magistrates are very watchful in their several charges, and keep very good guards in every place. This morning we had advice by the post that my Lord Delamere had declared for the Prince of Orange by assembling of all his tenants and others who had any dependance upon him at a certain place of rendezvous, where he made to them a speech upon the subject of the Prince's intentions in landing in England. This advice was confirmed this night by one Mr. Gorman, lieutenant to Captain Lee of the Earl of Montgomery's regiment, who arrived by post about 5 of the clock and came directly to me. His information I transmit to your lordship to be laid before his Majesty, by which he will see that this design is laid deeper than at first could be imagined. I have acquainted my Lords of the Committee for Foreign Affairs with the substance of it, and they have thought it fit that I should this night write down to my Lord of Derby, the Lord Lieutenant of Cheshire, to use what means he can for the suppression of this rebellion, tho' we hope he hath already done what he can towards it, as also to the Duke of Newcastle and the Duke of Beaufort, with copies enclosed in their several letters of those accounts which we have received, which I have accordingly done; and also directed Mr. Frowde to give notice to all the post-masters upon that road where we are sure they are to pass, and also upon those roads where in likelihood they will cross the country in order to their joining the Prince of Orange to let him have an account of their motions, that so his Majesty may be informed how to take his measures in order to their apprehension, which I should think might not be difficult by sending some bodies of horse upon those ways where they are most likely. I send enclosed to your lordship the information of Lieutenant Gorman as also the copy of a letter which I have just now received from my Lord Chancellor, which was written to a gentleman of Gray's Inn from a tenant of my Lord Delamere. My Lord Thomas Howard arrived here yesterday, and has this day taken post for Salisbury. Coll. Nicholas hath desired me to intreat your lordship to acquaint the King that 7 companies of the Regiment of Cornwall, which his Majesty hath now been pleased to bestow upon him, are arrived here this night, but are in so ill a condition by their long march and the illness of the ways, and loss of men in the journey, that he doth believe they are in a very ill condition for service. He begs of your lordship that he may receive the King's order concerning them by Mr. Blathwayte. I enclose a petition said to be that of the bishop's and some temporal lords to his Majesty which hath appeared this day in print. I send the enclosed letter which I have just now received from Sir John Talbot, which your lordship will be pleased to lay before the King, and to know his pleasure in it.

1688, Nov. 19th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to the Duke of Newcastle.—My lords of the council having this afternoon received advise that the Lord Delamere is raising forces to go to the Prince of Orange, as your grace will see by the enclosed copies their lordships have thought it requisite to advertise you thereof that you may give the necessary orders within your lieutenancy as well for the stopping and opposing the said Lord Delamere if he attempt to come away as for securing the peace of those parts and preventing any persons from joining with him.

The like letter at the same time sent to the Duke of Beaufort at Bristol.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Earl of Derby.—A similar letter to the two last asking him to endeavour with the assistance of the militia to suppress the said insurrection if possible.

1688, Nov. 20th, London. Lord Preston to Lord Middleton.—Since my last to your lordship I have received no letters from abroad or from any home parts, every thing yet continues quiet here and I hope will do so. Mr. Musgrave hath this night attended the lords of the committee, and hath acquainted us that Sir Edward Hales has demanded from the officers of his Majesty's ordnance two mortar pieces of ten inches diameter to be mounted upon two platforms towards the city, with 100 grenado-shells, and as many carcasses, for which he allegeth his Majesty's verbal order. The mortar pieces, granado-shells and carcasses are in readiness in the magazine for his Majesty's service; but the officers of the ordnance are enjoined by his Majesty's instructions under his sign manual not to issue any guns, mortars, stores, ammunition or habiliments of war but by warrant from himself, or the lords of the privy council, lord high admiral, or commissioners of the admiralty for the time being, so that they think themselves not sufficiently warranted to comply with the demand of Sir Edward Hales, unless his Majesty will be pleased to send his order in form to them. I will presume also to add that there being no absolute necessity for planting of these mortar pieces, which may be mounted in three or four hours' time, I hope his Majesty will consider whether it be fit to give such an allarm as this may do to the city of London at this time. Your lordship, however, will be pleased to transmit his Majesty's orders by the first occasion, which I shall convey to the officers of the ordnance. I send your lordship enclosed the copy of the Bishop of Bristol's letter to me, which you will be pleased to lay before his Majesty. I also send a letter which was directed to the Bishop of Chester from York, which will give his Majesty some account of the temper of that country. But I must acquaint your lordship that I am informed this day that a petition for a Parliament is forming there, and that perhaps it will be perfected at the meeting mentioned in the letter to be designed at York on Thursday next . . .

1688, Nov. 21st, London.—The same to the same.—I have received your lordship's of the 20th instant, which giveth the good account of his Majesty's safe arrival at Salisbury; may God give him a safe and a happy return hither. I dined this day with my lord mayor, who assureth me that all things are in a good posture in the city, and that there seems to be no tendency or inclination in any one towards a disturbance. I wish with all my heart that I could give you the same account from other parts of the kingdom, but you will find by the enclosed letters that in some counties 'tis much otherwise. Mr. Lob was with me this morning and desired me to write to your lordship, and to desire you to put the King in mind of one Mr. Isaac Polewhele whom he recommended to his Majesty to succeed the Archbishop of York in the deanery of Burvian in Cornwall, which his grace held in commendam. Your lordship will be pleased to know his Majesty's pleasure concerning him, that it may be declared to Mr. Lob.

1688, Nov. 22nd, London. The same to the same.—Your lordship's of the 21st instant I received this morning, and am very glad to find by it that his Majesty is so well after his bleeding at the nose. God continue his health to him, and may the war end as prosperously as it is begun. I enclose the several accounts which Mr. Frowde hath transmitted to me from Coventry, Derby, and other places. I wish his Majesty could spare troops to put a stop to the progress of my Lord Delamere, and of those who join with him. I am afraid that the troops which my Lord Deputy of Ireland is ordered to send into this kingdom may be intercepted in their passage hither, if the news be true which is reported confidently here this day, that the Prince of Orange hath sent some of his frigates into the Irish Seas to hinder the transport of any more forces into England. Mr. Hall, the late sheriff of Gloucestershire, did write the enclosed letter to your lordship, which my lords of the committee did take the liberty to open, because the messenger who brought it did tell us that it did relate to the business of my Lord Lovelace. Your lordship will be pleased to let us know his Majesty's pleasure upon it. . . . P.S. The petition of the bishops with the King's answer I enclose to your lordship. It is printed with allowance, but of whom I know not.

SIR

BART.

1688, Nov. 23rd, London.—The same to the same.—I am to acknowledge the favour of your lordship's of the 22nd instant, which I have this night laid before my lords of the committee. We have thought fit to desire to speak with Sir Edward Hales, and to acquaint him with his Majesty's pleasure in relation to his designs of mounting the mortar pieces at the tower, and therefore have given him notice to attend at your office to-morrow night. I must acquaint your lordship that since my last to you Mr. Musgrave has been over-ruled as to the delivery of them, with the bombes and carcasses, they having been ordered out of the stores by a warrant signed by Sir Henry Tichburne and Sir Edward Sherburne into the hands of Sir Edward Hales. But no progress is yet made towards the mounting of them so that there is time enough to prevent it. Orders are given for the publishing of the pardon in the English and French Gazettes to-morrow, as also for reprinting the petition of the lords, with his Majesty's answer as you have sent it to me. All I thank God as yet is quiet here, and no appearance of any disturbance. I enclose to your lordship the accounts which we have received from all parts since my last.

1688, Nov. 24th, London. Lord Preston to the Lady Marchioness of Powis.—I presume to give your ladyship the trouble of this only to give a cover to the enclosed from her Majesty. We are rejoiced here with the accounts we have of the continuance of the Prince's good health, tho' the air is not so good as that which he used to breath. His Majesty is returning with his army from Salisbury, and is expected here the beginning of the next week. I pray God to give a good and speedy end to all these troubles.

1688, Nov. 24th, London.—Lord Preston to the Earl of Middleton.—This is only to acknowledge the receipt of your lordship's of the 23rd current, and to give a cover to the enclosed letter to his Majesty; for since his return is like to be so sudden I shall defer to give your lordship any further accounts from hence. We are in hopes to see the King here about Tuesday. God send him a safe journey and his troops well back. I shall add nothing, but only enclose a letter which I have received from Sir Richard Grahme, the high-sheriff of York-shire, by which you will see what passed upon Thursday last at York.

1688, Nov. 25th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench.—The King having received an account that my Lord Churchill, captain of one of the troops of his Majesty's guards, Mr. Rogers and Mr. Cole, 2 lieutenants of grendeeers in the horse guards, are gone over to the Prince of Orange, his Majesty has thought fit that the goods belonging to the said persons should be forthwith seized for the security of the pay of those troops remaining in their hands. And my lords of the council have therefore desired me to acquaint your lordship with it that you may cause such writs to be issued to the sheriffs of Middlesex as shall be necessary for seizing the goods of the said Mr. Rogers and Mr. Cole; and likewise for seizing the goods of Mr. Chudleigh, clerk of my Lord Churchill's troop, for securing the pay remaining in his hands, and that your lordship will issue a like writ to the sheriff of Hertfordshire for seizing my Lord Churchill's goods at St. Alban's. My lords do likewise desire that you will give order to Mr. Grahme and Mr. Burton to take care that the said writs be duly and effectually executed.

1688, Nov. 27th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of London.—The bearer hereof having a son James Ellis, who was taken prisoner by a Sally man-of-war above three years since, and hath ever since remained in captivity at Makennis in South Barbary, and being informed that there is a sum of money designed for the redemption of poor captives, whereof your lordship hath the disposal, I beg leave to recommend it to you that such part of that money may be applied to the redemption of the said James Ellis as you shall think fit.

1688, Nov. 29th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to the Bailiff and Magistrates of Andover.—The King commands me to acquaint you that he has received your letter of the 27th instant, and that he is very well pleased with the expressions in it of your duty and loyalty, and with the signal proof you have given of both in suppressing the late disorder and tumult in your town . . .

1688, Nov. 30th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to the Mayor and Justices of Northampton.—A similar letter to the last.

1688, Dec. 1st, London. Lord Preston to the Duke of Newcastle.—I am to acknowledge the honour of your grace's letters. That in which your grace is pleased to transmit to me the copies of your letters to the Earl of Devonshire and my lord Fairfax, I laid before his Majesty as I had done your former, which required no particular orders from him. He doth very well approve of your grace's actings upon the occasion, knowing that it was impossible for you to dissipate those numbers who had assembled themselves in your lieutenancies without more forces than you could then draw together. I am further to acquaint your grace in relation to the proposal which you make of constituting the D. of Norfolk lord lieutenant of all the ridings of Yorkshire in your place, that his Majesty will by no means hear of it, and that he hath more confidence in your grace than to believe that at this time you will quit his service. His Majesty hath appointed the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Godolphin his commissioners to treat with the Prince of Orange upon the present unhappy occasion of his invasion. They go to-morrow towards Redding (Reading) to attend the Prince of Orange's passport for the continuing of their journey towards him.

1688, Dec. 1st, London. Lord Preston to the Duke of Beaufort.—I am to acknowledge your grace's last letter to me, and also to acquaint you that I have just now received a petition signed by your grace and several other persons of quality of the county of Gloucester to his Majesty for the speedy calling of a Parliament which I did present to him, tho' thanks be to God he hath anticipated the answer by ordering writs to be issued out upon Friday last, which will certainly be sealed upon Monday; however, he took it in very good part and commanded me to let your grace know so much. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir Geo. Fletcher, at Hutton.—You will have notice from all hands by this post that the King hath ordered writs to be issued out for a Parliament, which are to be sealed upon Monday next, and that to be assembled upon the 15th of Jan. next. I hope you will be mindful of my brother James as to Carlisle; he hath written to you, to Sir Christopher, and to the city by this post, and I have written to Sir Christopher. . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to Sir Chris. Musgrave, at Eden Hall.—Mentions the proposed assembling of Parliament and asks assistance towards the electing of his (Preston's) brother James for one of the citizens of Carlisle.

1688, Dec. 4th. Lord Preston to the Earl of Dunbarton.—I am commanded by his Majesty to enclose a passport to your lordship which hath been demanded by the Prince of Orange for a person whom he intends to send into Holland. Your lordship will be pleased immediately upon the receipt of it to dispatch it to my lord the King's commissioners, either by a trompette or by any other messenger who will convey it safe and may return to give you an account of the delivery of it, which your lordship will take care to signify to me.

1688, Dec. 4th, Whitehall.—Lord Preston to Mr. Harbord.—I have just now received your letter of the second instant, enclosed in my Lord of Dunbarton's packet to my Lord Middleton. I am sorry to return to you the enclosed for Mad^e. Benting, because 'tis near 7 or 8 days that we have had notice from the Hague of her death. I have sent yours to Mrs. Harbord this night for Holland, and I have recommended it so that I hope it will safely reach her hands.

s. d. Lord Preston to the Earl of Dunbarton.—I received a letter in your lordship's packet from Mr. Harbord, who is now with the Prince of Orange, with two letters inclosed, the one for Madame Bentincke, and the other for his wife. I have shewed them all to the King, and he hath given me leave to write back to Mr. Harbord. I must therefore entreat you upon the first occasion which you shall have to enclose the letter to one of my Lords Commissioners to be delivered to Mr. Harbord.

1688, Dec. 10th, London.—Lord Preston to the Bishop of Exon. I writ to my Lord Middleton at Salisbury to acquaint his Majesty with your request concerning the living which the Archbishop of York held in commendam with the Bishopric of Exon. His lordship returned for answer that the King would consider of it. But upon your lordship's last letter to me I have again moved his Majesty, who hath very readily granted your request, and accordingly the warrant is drawn, and shall be signed forthwith . . .

s. d. Lord Preston to the Earl of Feversham.—I am commanded by his Majesty to acquaint your lordship that he hath thought fit for the safety of the Queen and Prince to send them beyond the seas, and that accordingly they are this night gone from hence, which giveth him more liberty to look after his troops. He therefore designeth to-morrow about eleven of the clock to be at Uxbridge, where he would have your lordship and as many more of the general officers as are within distance to be there to meet him, his Majesty being determined to take then his resolution concerning what is to be done relating to his army in this unhappy conjuncture.

LETTERS OFFICIAL FROM ENGLAND.

1682, March 22nd, Whitehall.—H. Ball to Lord Preston.— There is very little news stirring here at present, by reason of the retirement of the Court to Newmarket, from whence they return the next week; and after a short stay here go to New Windsor for 3 months. Yesterday my Lord of Rochester returned from thence, and to-morrow the Treasury are to meet, but I do not hear of any money preparing for the foreign ministers, who are not now paid so well as heretofore, of which I hear your lordship hath had some experience, but we hope much amendment in a little time, if the two great bidders for the farm of his Majesty's whole revenue succeed, who they say offer his Majesty 105,000*l.* per mensem for the same, to advance 600,000*l.* at 6*l.* per cent. to pay of debts and contingencies, and to make the chequer the bank for the same. This is said to be the Lord Privy Seal's friends proffer, and they give out my Lord of Rochester's friends go higher, but to what particulars we hear not. That which pleases the Court is his Majesty's declaration (to the aldermen and commoners at Newmarket, when they presented him with their late address) that he was well assured he had very many loyal citizens in London, of which they were reckoned among the chief, but that he was sorry to find a report spread cunningly abroad, as if his Majesty designed to slacken the laws against Dissenters, which he assured them he had no thoughts of, nor would do in the least; they also say the address was not so welcome as they expected, by reason lawful heirs were not more largely explained, and that his Majesty knighted none of them, which some expected would have been done. The Scotch letters speak of our being likely to be troubled with some of their zealots, who are weary of their own country through the briskness wherewith the laws are put in force against them; and that 12 guns heretofore lent the Earl of Argyle against the Macklands are not to be found, nor do his tenants discover the intrigue, but those matters I cannot but think are better told your lordship by other hands. The council sat yesterday, and by reason Thompson the news printer hath not abstained from the same tho' in prison for it, they have ordered him to be brought next council day to answer the matter further to the board, their lordships resolving to silence him if possible. Some fresh complaints were brought in for misdemeanours of the Governor of Barbadoes, which his friends fear may out him. My Lord Duke of Somerset's young son is christened and called Charles after his Majesty, but the godfathers were the Earl of Essex and the Countess of Northumberland godmother P.S. My Lord Duke of Bucks is said to be restored into his Majesty's favour.

1682, March 26th. The same to the same.—My last gave your lordship the best account I could of all that passed here, and since that we have had the ill news from Newmarket of the fire (which broke out there on Thursday night and burnt down in 7 hours the north side of the town, and the King on that resolved to go forthwith to Cambridge and so return hither; but the King's house being saved and the flames ceased, his Majesty stayed there till this day, and about 2 this day came hither with his Royal Highness, and the Queen and Duchess not long after; and after a fortnight's stay here they say the Court will remove to Windsor. They say that the Lady Herbert (daughter of the Lord Chandois) was absent from her house on Sunday night, but is since returned; its said is married to an Irish gent, which she yet does not publicly own. But the Dissenters are much ashamed of the trick put on them by Mr. Dangerfield, who has stolen and married Mrs. Onslowe (the famous preacher's daughter) who is a very considerable fortune. They say his Majesty refused to let the excise at Newmarket to the citizens that went thither and proffered very considerably for it, declaring he could at his return let it publicly in council, but its said to be only a delay till he sees what the general proposition, which my last mentioned, will come to. All this week the town has been filled with a report that two tradesmen were gone down to Newmarket to swear treason against the Lord of Clare (which they supposed to be the Earl of that name, but its now said to be against the Irish viscount of that title,) and that they are two of his tenants, but are not credited. The Dutch have sent to their ambassador an account of the taking of Bantam, with a command that he should wait on his Majesty therewith, and which would clear them from the imputation of any design therein, and with a proffer of restoring us to the moiety of the trade there, which raised the actions to 160*l.* per cent., but now they are at a stand, and its thought may fall by reason one of their factors (called Vincent), whom the company sent for in custody, stands on his own defence and will not restore the fort he commanded, which may be of dangerous consequence.

1682, May 10th, London. Hen. Savile to Lord Preston.—I should of myself have endeavoured to have been one of the first to bid you welcome to Paris, but that I may the better justify my haste I send you the enclosed as I received it last night from Mr. Chiffinche, who your lordship knows to be a man of so absolute authority that foreign as well as domestic ministers are to obey his commands. You will hear from all hands the danger his Royal Highness has escaped; his ship (the Gloucester, a good third rate) struck upon the Lemmon and Ore, 16 leagues off of the mouth of Humber, on Friday night; she did not leak till Saturday morning at 6, which makes us hope that all the passengers are safe; but we have yet no certainty but that the Duke himself is well and sailed in his yacht towards Scotland on Saturday at 10 in the morning; this account comes straight from Hull; we have yet none by sea of it, and you may easily imagine our impatience to know more perfect circumstances, which if they come before to-morrow night I presume you will have them from the office; but I am to go with the rest of the Admiralty to attend his Majesty to-morrow about the Algerine Treaty, so that I shall not be here to give you a further account of it myself. The Ambassador of Bantam is to have audience on Saturday next. Suffolke, Harry Howard's wife, is dead. Cradock has obtained in Westminster Hall to day that the jury that tries the cause betwixt him and my Lord Shaftesbury shall be chosen of men inhabiting twenty miles from this town. My Lord Duke of Ormond arrives here this night.

1682, May 15th, London.—The same to the same.— There is no part of human commerce more depraved than that of certificates; every knave thinks he has a right to be recommended as an honest man, and it is thought either ill manners or ill nature to refuse it. I am so pressed to give you a good character of a man who has a very ill one, that intending by the next post to write to you in his favour, I give you beforehand the truth as it is. I never had anybody that I called my secretary, but one Gaudet sometimes called himself so, because I sent him upon some errands, and had done more for him had not I found him tripping in many cases. 1st, I found (tho' late) that he gave an account to other ministers of all that was done in my house. 2. I heard that old Ruvigny had threatened some years since to have him cudgelled for having cheated some English gentlemen that had trusted him. 3. Several people had bid me have a care of him in all kinds. 4. Every 3 or 4 months he was put in jail for debt, and I was forced to give him great advances to get him out of it; all this I could the better suffer because I trusted him accordingly, but your lordship, who will be a little new at first, and must therefore put yourself more in his hands. I confess I never had the force to recommend him to you, for the truth is I can not answer for him, tho' I intend to tell you that I can in my letter by him, which is forced from me by some people who look upon him only as a Protestant, and forget he is a knave; so that if your lordship think fit to take him, remember I am not his caution; if you do not take him you may excuse it upon your being otherwise provided, and I shall neither hurt you nor disoblige those who press me upon this occasion, but do my duty to both.

1682, May 15th, London. The same to the same. (In French.) This letter will be given to you, my lord, by Mons^r. Gaudet, by whom I have been very usefully served in many things. He will be wanting in nothing where he is to work for your service, and where fidelity and industry are necessary you can hardly choose better. He wishes to enter into your service, and if you have a vacancy which he could fill, I think myself obliged for many reasons to earnestly recommend him.

1682, May 15th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—(Partly autograph and partly cipher deciphered.)—Just as I was going to put a pen to this paper I had the honour to receive your lordship's letter from Dieppe, which gives me occasion to congratulate, as I do with all my heart, your safe arrival in France. I have nothing particular relating to your province; the question here is whether the King of Spain will compromise the matters in difference between him and 'he Crown of France into the King our master's hands, as the most Christian King is willing to do. We have no light out of Spain upon this point; however, all that can be is to be done in the court where you are that they do not take any delays that the Spaniards may be guilty of, for a refusal of the King's offices, and consequently begin again par les voyes de fait. It is advisable that your lordship decline the use of the word arbitrator or arbitrage in all you conversations on that side. His Majesty will do his mediatory offices most readily, but to take upon him the figure of an arbitrator will be of such consequence as to embarrass him very much. His Majesty hath last night and this evening declared publicly a particular resentment against the Duke of Monmouth. It seems there came some overture from him that he would make his submissions to his Majesty, (if he should so please), but would make none to his Royal Highness. This offering to capitulate his Majesty took in great indignation, and hath declared that he will take it as a great offence done to himself for any that hath dependance upon him in any kind to have commerce with the Duke of Monmouth.

n. d. (Indorsed, Mr. Secretary Jenkins cypher.) Cipher deciphered.

1682, May 18th, Whitehall. O. Wynne to Lord Preston. This is only to give your lordship notice that the Court of King's Bench has resolved in the case between my Lord of Shaftesbury and Mr. Graham that the Venue must come out of an indifferent county, and not out of London or Middlesex; this is matter of great consolation to the King's loyal subjects, and something of reputation to the amending of affairs here, which your lordship will take some pains to make them understand of that side, and to render this judgment at this time not only just but necessary. There were two verdicts given by an ignoramus jury at Guildhall upon two indictments against a couple of Whiggs, that all the standers by stood amazed to see, that upon the fullest and clearest proofs imaginable the jury brought them in not guilty. What may add vigour to the King's cause is, that we hope to have one if not two good sheriffs for this next year. My Lord Mayor having this day drunk to Mr. North, which according to custom is the nominating of him to be one of them, tho' the fanatics will oppose and decry even law as well as custom when it makes against them. The enclosed I received just now from Windsor. I hope it will find your lordship arrived in good health at Paris.

1682, May 22nd, Whitehall.—Sir L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—Acknowledges his of the 17–27th instant.—Sir Henry Goodrick writes on the 4–14th that there was no resolution taken at Madrid whether they should accept or refuse the French proposal, and that there would be none in all likelihood, unless notice were first given in form of such a proposal made; and that they did not own to have had any such proposal, either from Mons^r. de la Fuente, or any else. The King as I may tell your lordship did communicate to the Spanish ambassador the notice that he had had from Mons^r. Barillon of the most Christian King's offer to compromise the difference into his Majesty's hands. That ambassador did it without any memorial or other form than making a relation of his master's resolution, and at the same time giving in copies of two letters, the one from the most Christian King to the Marchal de Crequi, the other from Mons^r. de Louvois to Mons^r. de Croissy, both purporting the resolution of that King to withdraw his troops from before Luxemburg, and to compromise all matters in difference, and especially of arbitrating an equivalent to his Majesty's hands. His Majesty having done this in the most free and ample manner to Don Pedro Ronquillo, and Sir Hen. Goodrick having orders to communicate the copies of those two letters and the overture of Mons^r. Barillon upon them to the ministers of Madrid, it is not easy to conceive what else may be done by way of formal notice of the French proposition from his Majesty; 'tis true his Majesty is most ready to enter upon any office that tends to heal and to accommodate, but possibly as he cannot erect himself to be a judge between two so potent monarchs, so perhaps he doth not think it decent for him to ask either party to make him a judge, for so an arbiter is in effect, tho' the other hath shewed a mind to defer to him. This your lordship may please to make the subject matter of a conversation with Mons^r. Fuentes there, and to assure him that his Majesty is ready to enter upon any offices that shall contribute to the preventing of all breaches and all further misunderstandings between those two Kings.

1682, May 25th, Whitehall. The same to the same. (Holograph.) I am sorry you have so soon met with the lot of foreign ministers, which is to have scuffles with punctilious great men, but I am glad to find there was none killed outright; and that your lordship did so prudently put the affair into the hands of the proper officers. Immediately upon the receipt of your letter I sent an extract of it to the King; I have no answer upon it. I suppose there will be some kind of submission or asking pardon offered; your own generosity will not suffer you to be difficult as to your own share in the injury; but you will easily judge that the first thing that is to be provided for is, que la dignité du Roy soit mise à couvert. You will not do amiss if you receive visits or even messages of civility, if any be made or sent you in order to make up the matter, but your lordship will be pleased at the same time to declare.—1. That your part is nothing but what they may dispose of as they please. 2. That you not daring to determine what shall amount to a satisfaction to the King's honour in the point, all that you can do is to lay it fairly before his Majesty, and to wait to know his pleasure; thus a door will be left open for the wrong-doers to make their peace. When you have anything certain of Arnaud's book I'll endeavour to get you his Majesty's directions upon it; in the meantime 'tis very well done of your lordship to have an eye to such things. I have often heard that the late Earl of Leicester was very much to blame for that he being ambassador there when the book of Messrs. Dupuis, called Traitéz des droicts du Roy tres Chretien, &c. came out, he did not complain of it. Since it pretends to give that King title to this Crown, and baffles (as 'tis pretended) all that hath been said of the title of our King to the crown of France and to so many provinces.

1682, May 22nd, Whitehall. Jo. Cook to Lord Preston. We are this day full of dispatches for the streights, ratifications, recommendations, and recredentials, and such things as are to pass his Majesty's hand tomorrow at a special council summoned to meet at Hampton Court, whereby as the time affords little, so our leisure admits less of news. All that we look after and by anticipation talk of, is the safe arrival of their Royal Highnesses, who we have embarked upon his Majesty's ship the Happy Return this day sennight in Leith Road; but the wind was not then so favourable as to bring them out of sight of that port the next day, nor has it yet been so kind to us as to bring us any news of their approach to our river or to our coast. Which yet, the weather being fair, we hope will be the more secure and acceptable by being a little delayed. There are some stories brewing about the Duke of Monmouth, but because they are yet neither well boiled in the fat nor ripe enough to be broached out of the vessel, I shall forebear giving your lordship a muddy taste of them at present.

1682, May 25th. Ascension day with us. Whitehall.—Jo. Cooke to Lord Preston.—If I had not been provoked and rather commanded by your lordship's of May 30th, st. n., I should hardly have written this day.—Says their Royal Highness have not yet arrived.—That they came well from Leith 11 days since we are assured, that 4 days after that Col. Legg was set ashore from his Royal Highnesses ship upon Holy Island we are well satisfied, but from that time they having taken the German shore, and no account come from thence, we are in pain till we hear something from them or see them here. This is so great a point with us as all other things seem nothing, even what Mr. Secretary may, and I hope will tell your lordship, of a late rencontre between the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Halifax. . . .

1682, May 29th, Windsor.—Hen. Savile to Lord Preston.—I have the honour of your lordship's letter from Paris where I am glad you are so safely arrived. As for your dispute with the Comte de Nassau, I do so little doubt of your being fully satisfied with the behaviour of the Court towards you that I am not at all in pain concerning it. I should have dilated more upon other matters, but that we are here in such an alarm about the King's indisposition that we can think of nothing else; he found himself chill yesterday morning at church; he went immediately to bed, but had not signs enough of an ague to declare it one; he continues yet a little feverish, but more hearty than he formerly did on the like occasion. . . .

1682, May 29th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (Holograph).—I have not had the opportunity to lay before his Majesty the reparation offered you by the Count de Nassau, because of the indisposition that took him yesterday before the hours of the Committee of Foreign Affairs. The matter, to my thinking, is in as good a way as can be wished; you are but to expect his Majesty's allowing and accepting of what is done, laying all the stress upon the concern that the kingly honour hath in such incidents, and that you must not take upon you to determine what amounts to satisfaction; but expect to know the King's pleasure, making little or nothing of your own share in it. Your lordship may rely upon the account enclosed of the King's state of health

SIR

n. d. Colbert de Croissy to Lord Preston (French).—He has heard with much joy by the letter which Lord Preston wrote to him of his (Preston's) arrival in Paris, and he will be pleased on all occasions to merit his favour.—Mentions the insult offered to Lord Preston's servants, which, when he gets the particulars from the officers of justice, he will report to his Majesty, and will inform Lord Preston of the result.

1682, May 31st, Windsor. The Earl of Conway to Lord Preston.—His Majesty being informed of a very great violence committed upon a young lady, tho' a widow, of a very considerable fortune both in money and land of inheritance, who going to London in her coach was met upon Hownslo heath by one Capt. Clifford and twelve others, and by them violently carried a ship board and landed at Calais, of which you will see a more particular narrative in this enclosed, which is writ by Coll. Rich, a very worthy person, to Will Leg; His Majesty hath thereupon commanded me to write to your lordship to desire you to use your endeavours to rescue this lady, Mrs. Sydrofen, from the violence which is upon her. Mons^r. Barillon hath also written to the Governor of Calais upon his Majesty's request to the same effect. Some of the complices are apprehended here, and are under the prosecution of the law, but I have no order to say anything to you concerning those that are in France; but if your lordship finds the lady to be forcibly detained, that you would be pleased to get her delivered from it and sent safe into England.—Is glad to be the first conveyer of the joyful news of his Majesty's perfect recovery, who this morning received the compliments of all men upon that occasion, and was dressed and walked out of his chamber, and looks and is as well as ever he was in his life.

1682, June 1st. (Coll.) P. Rich to Lord Preston.—Wrote last post about a distressed lady, Madam Silderfin, who has been most barbarously used by Capt. Fra. Clifford, Capt. Sarsfeild, and other his accomplices, exposing the poor lady in an open shallop belonging to the Lord Mordant unto the sea, and carried her to Calais. This is by an express who has letters of recommendation from Lord Conway by his Majesty's command and from honest Capt. Legg 1682, June 1st, Whitehall. O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—I acknowledge, with all humble thanks the honour of your lordship's letter of the 2^d, and can add to it the good news of his Majesty's being now in perfect health. Their Royal Highnesses are gone this evening for Windsor to pass there till the Duchess be brought to bed about the beginning of August. This morning Mr. Smyth went hence express in quest of the rich young widow that is spirited away. My lady Ogle was married two days ago to the Duke of Somerset, to the disappointment of C. Konnigsmark and others, as much as the stealing of Mrs. Syderfin was of Capt. Legg. Best, the Protestant hop merchant, was condemned in 20*l*. for striking one that refused pious Colleges health; there is since an indictment found against him (and that at Guildhall) for so zealously adoring the memory and actions of an executed traitor. There happened this morning an ill favoured incident, which is, that the Duke of Albemarle and Sir Walter Clarges fought in duel against Lord Grey and Captain Godfrey. Clarges wounded Godfrey in two places, but was disarmed, and then Lord Grey, as his second, turned points against the Duke, which, according to the custom (it seems) of duelling, obliged his grace to deliver his sword. We know not yet how his Majesty will resent this, nor what the ground of the quarrel was, tho' it's said the Duke challenged. P.S.—I send the ordinary prints to Mr. Tempest, and will continue if your lordship thinks fit.

1682, June 1st, Whitehall. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston. This bearer goes first to Calais in pursuit of a young widow of fortune that hath been taken up by force out of her coach between London and Windsor. I need not tell you the particulars, because he will do it at large. Having hazarded the life of this poor lady in carrying her over sea to Calais, in an open chaloupe, your lordship will imagine that if the ravisher have not his will there he will go on to further extremities, and in all probability carry her to Paris. It is there (or, indeed, any where else in France) that her relations do implore your lordship's protection to this widow in so great a distress. I think no justice (especially not Messrs. du Chastelet) will refuse to arrest the man and sequester the woman, so as to put her under the protection of justice, till she and her relations be heard in full freedom, and in the way of justice and judgment, whatever pretence he may have of consent (which cannot be as long as she is in the same clutches that were first violently laid on her) or of marriage, which your lordship will find cannot be solemnised between strangers in that country without such requisites as they (tho' she were willing) can perform either in the reformed or Roman Communion. More of this your lordship will find upon your first looking into it than I am able to discourse by letter. You have the King's pleasure already by my Lord Conway, so that I have nothing to add.

s. d. The same to the same.—I know you cannot but have a great anguish of mind in reference to his Majesty's health, which my letter on Monday told you was in some danger, but, blessed be God, all the fears we were in are fully over; 'twas dreaded it might prove an ague, but it was no more but a great cold taken on the water. His Majesty was let blood on Tuesday morning, but had nothing like a fit or grudging towards it that day, which, had it been an ague, would have then appeared, it being the third day; this day was the next alternate, but his Majesty was perfectly well at the hour of the fit coming on, if any fit had been to come.

1682, June 8th, Whitehall. The same to the same (but written by Mr. Wynne, and only the ending in Mr. Secretary Jenkins' hand).—His Majesty, finding that the insult upon your lordship's servants is directed by the most Christian King to be prosecuted in good earnest, is pleased to direct that your lordship would forbear all rigours and pursuits on your part, and gives you leave to be as gentle and generous as you would be in your own case when you were satisfied that the party offending is either mortified or penitent to the full. I am commanded to transmit the memorial that goes herewith to your lordship's hands; I can say no more of its merits than the paper itself speaks, but certainly the party concerned, which is Mr. Whiting, a merchant stranger in Lille, is one that hath done no act that should subject him to the French laws relating to religion any further than not to give offence. The memorial is a little too sharp, it being of Mr. Whiting's own drawing, to be put in that Court; therefore I would humbly offer my thoughts that you would be pleased to write to him at Lille, whither he is returned but a few days since; you'll have thereby this advantage as to know Mr. Whiting's present circumstances, and consequently to suit your addresses there to the exigencies of them. The news from Spain is still the same; that is, no resolution is declared whether that King will accept or refuse the arbitrage; if you have not letters constantly from Sir Henry Goodrick and Mr. Chudleigh, I will get you all the copies I can of Mr. Chudleigh's to my Lord of Conway, and will give extracts of Sir H. Goodrick's to me.

1682, June 15th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—Encloses a petition from Sir John Frederick and Company, persons of the chiefest rank and wealth in London, as well as of a general credit all Europe over. It is his Majesty's pleasure that Lord Preston afford them and their agents his best assistance to the procuring them satisfaction for the ship Green Dragon and its lading (which was unjustly taken and even by torture inhumanly wrested from them) after so tedious and chargeable a delay in the courts of justice there. They have some hopes that, by his lordship's warm applications, their proceedings will be quickened and the case brought to some good issue Says that Sir John Frederick and Company supplied him with large credit for several years in his Majesty's service abroad.

1682, June 15th, Whitehall. (Holograph.) L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.— We have no news but that the confederates are strong, and that France watches upon the defensive, but intends not long to do so, but either to come to a good understanding in all things or else to make a rupture; but more of this by the next.

1682, June 15th, London.—The Earl of Halifax to Lord Preston.—Complimentary.—The Court of France doth wisely to wish peace, and at the same time to prepare for war.

1682, June 15th, London.—Hen. Savile to Lord Preston.—Coming late last night from Harry Coventrye's lodge, where I had staid three days, I found your lordship's letter of the 16th . . . I will only beg the enclosed may be sent to Sir Richard Mason. I hear not one word of the ultra-marine you sent me word I might expect by some of the Duchess of Monmouth's servants Mons^r. Verio presses me daily for it, so that your lordship would do me a favour to tell me some tidings of it. I never doubted but all imaginable satisfaction would be given you in your dispute with the Comte de Nassau, and now that he has made his submission, I presume your orders from hence will be to shew mercy on your side.

1682, June 19th, London. Leyenburgh (L'Envoyé de Suede) to Lord Preston.—Complimentary.—We have no news to entertain your lordship with, having been these four or five days absent from Court. All the other publique ministers are here also, and I think will continue so till the next Monday, since no foreign news obligeth any of us to make any haste for Windsor; and we being all credibly informed that the King intends to be here next Friday morning, and to continue till Monday next following.

1682, June 19th, Whitehall. Jo. Cooke to Lord Preston.—His Majesty will be here on Friday next the 23rd instant, and the Queen the day before. The cause of his Majesty's coming is this; on Saturday last, the 17th instant, a council being held at Hampton Court, the Duke of Ormonde presented a paper there to his Majesty, setting forth certain scandalous and injurious reflexions, which he thinks the Earl of Anglesey hath made upon the late King, and upon his grace the said Duke of Ormonde, with divers other loyal persons, in a little book the said Earl hath not long since published by way of animadversion upon the Earl of Castlehaven's memoirs concerning the wars in Ireland. Your lordship, I suppose, may have seen a letter from the Duke of Ormonde to the Earl of Anglesey upon that subject, and the Earl's answer to his grace, which have both served to enflame the mutual disgusts, so that now those matters are to be brought to examination and debate in a full council on Friday next, his Majesty being present, who will continue here till Monday . . .

1682, June 25. Tho. Jackson to Lord Preston.—I left my lady and children very well at Nunnington Sunday last; her ladyship intending for the north next week. (The rest of the letter is about private business.)

1682, June 26th, Whitehall.—William Blathwayt to Lord Preston.— . . . I have sent the enclosed relation of Saturday's adventures, to which I have to add that the King, taking great offence at those tumultuous proceedings, commanded my Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, and Aldermen to attend him this morning in council, which was extraordinarily called for that purpose, whereupon several witnesses were examined and plainly proved the riotous behaviour of the sheriffs, and it being further made out that the sheriffs have no right to call or adjourn a common hall without the directions of the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, much less to continue an assembly contrary to their order, and even after they had dissolved it; upon these grounds a warrant was signed in council for the committing of the two sheriffs to the Tower of London for promoting and encouraging a riot to the endangering the public peace; and it is further ordered that Mr. Attorney General exhibit an information in the King's Bench against the sheriffs and such others as he shall think fit for this riot. It was observed at the Hall that my Lord Gray, Lord Stamford, Sir T. Armstrong, and others of that gang were very busy with the sheriffs, and taken into council by them, so that perhaps they may be found to have participated of the riot. This business has hindered the King's going to see the ship launch at Chat-tam, and delayed his return to Windsor. My Lord Scarsdale has surrendered his captainship of the band of pensioners to my Lord Huntingdon.

1682, June 26th, Whitehall. Sir L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—I have two letters of your lordship's of the 24th June and 1st July, n. s., now before me; in the first, his Majesty having it read to him, finds an account of your audience, wherewith he is very well pleased . . . I shall not fail to write to Sir Hen. Goodriq and Mr. Chudleigh to correspond with your lordship with all exactness, it being the custom of all ministers belonging to one and the same Prince, as well as the instruction of all his Majesty's ministers that are now abroad. I send your lordship two papers that the Spanish ambassador put into my hands containing matter of complaint and infractions of the treaty of peace at Nymeguen in the neighbourhood of Namur. I give copies of the same to the French ambassador here with his Majesty's desire by word of mouth to the most Christian King, that Mons^r. Barillon would inform the most Christian King of it, and desire his most Christian Majesty to give his orders that no such infractions as are complained of in that paper, or innovations of any kind be suffered, much less authorised, to the prejudice of the Crown or subjects of Spain. Your lordship may please to do the like offices with Mons^r. de Croissy, and leave with him copies of the papers I now send you relating to this subject. We having had no memorial from the Spanish ambassador on this side, but myself a letter only, I cannot say before I have his Majesty's direction that they need accompany these papers with a memorial there. I send your lordship likewise a copy of a letter to Mr. Vice-Chamberlain from poor Mr. White, of Lille; I pity his case with all my heart, and the more in that upon my frequent speaking, which I did this day and yesterday with all earnestness, to the French ambassador, I can have no reason from him, but he will needs have it, that it is Mr. Whiting's only way to come off for one certain sum with those people; he insists upon the law of the place, by which he would have alimony payable unavoidably to any child, tho' it be a disobedient one. I insist upon the law of nations, and upon the Treaties between the two Crowns, whereby merchant strangers are to be free, and to have nothing imposed upon them in relation to religion; 'tis in vain with him to urge any thing of very evil example that this will give not only in Mr. Whiting's family, but in the family of any other merchant stranger in his circumstances. Your lordship will do well and agreeably to his Majesty's sense if you use the best and most officacious offices you can with Mons^r. de Croissy in this business. Mr. Saville was fortunate in 2 or 3 instances to get some kind of declaration, or rather an owning that the King's subjects are exempt from having any part of the Popish religion imposed upon them; nor is it material to say that this girl was born at Lille, for she was born under the roof of her father to whom these exemptions do belong, and to all that being born the King's subjects are of his family. I have not leasure now to look into Cromwell's Treaty of '54 with France, the equity of which Treaty I take to be still in force where the benefit is mutual in favour of commerce. The French ambassador gave me an item as if your lordship had desired that the accomplices of Clifford (who stole away Mrs. Sydderfin) might be delivered up and sent over into England; this possibly may be asked because of the hainousnesse of the fact of the likelihood of its going unpunished in a strange country; but I do humbly conceive it will be to no purpose to press it, because it will never be granted, the law of nations being otherwise practised than it anciently was, and all countries proving places of refuge to stranger criminals. So that you may let that sleep until you have further orders, this having nothing in it of a crime of state, and the lady being safe, you may please to let the friends take the remedy at law either in that country or this, as they find their conveniency. P.S. (Autograph.) The two sheriffs of London have been this day committed to the Tower for carrying on the poll of the new sheriffs after that the Lord Mayor had adjourned the Court.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1682, July 3rd, Whitehall. The same to the same.—(Part in cipher deciphered.)—I have the favour of your lordship's letter of the 8th, new style, and therein a copy of your memorial touching Mr. Whiting; I gave his Majesty an account of it, but have not read it over to him. If I may offer your lordship my private opinion upon it, I must take leave to tell you that I think it much too long according to the usual style of that Court; in such cases of complaint it is sufficient that the matter of fact be as briefly couched as may be in the memorial, closing it with a desire to be redressed; the argument of every part is not so advantageous and proper to be enlarged upon, it is best done en passant to the secretary. I must beg leave to take notice to your lordship that the word Majesté britannique is a style the King's ministers do avoid; usually mentioning his Majesty by le Roy son, or mon Maistre. Scarce any thing in matter of right, precedence, and courtesy mixed together, but is capable of an answer that will have some colour of reason in it. Besides, in most matters of agreement, if they find a handle to reply upon, they will do it in writing, and 'tis great odds if ever they will depart from their own reckoning, which, if we be forced to quit the point, will lie by them as a record all future times to be produced against us. The memorial takes notice of a pretension that Mr. Whiting hath upon the Intendant Polletier; I suppose that hath been inserted upon the importunity of Mr. Whiting it would have been better omitted, being a personal and a private thing, and strictly speaking not worthy the honour of your memorial. The mentioning the words Spanish Inquisition and L'Empire seems too obvious an aggravation, and your lordship will always endeavour to decline such sharp expressions, they have aigreux in them at all times; but at the first beginning of a negotiation they must be construed to be designed as provoking; 'tis true there will be some difficulty when the memorial is long to bring in le dit Roy son maistre, but S. M. B. must not be mentioned where King of France is treated vostre Majesté. 'Tis true this memorial required haste, so that you could not without great prejudice to Mr. Whyting take advice hence upon it, but when things will bear it you cannot do amiss to send the minutes of your memorial hither to take the King's directions upon it, especially in weighty matters of state, as this is not.

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1682, July 5th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—Writes by his Majesty's special command to accompany those two noble Counts' sons to his Excellency the Count de Konigseck, Vice-Chancellor of the Empire. His Majesty hath a particular esteem for the Count their father, both from the personal knowledge he hath of his merits and for the rank and place he hath in his Imperial Majesty's councils and favour.—Recommends them to him (Preston) during their sojourn in Paris for his countenance and assistance in the best and most effectual manner.

1682, July 6, Whitehall. Fra. Gwyn to Lord Preston. I hear that Lord Feversham and Jemmy Grimis will be with you at Paris very shortly, to congratulate from the King and the Duke the King of France being a grandfather. The great disorder of the present sheriffs of London in the election of two for the succeeding year like themselves at present takes up a great part of his Majesty's times of business.

1682, July 10th. Sir L. Jenkins to L^d. Preston (holograph). I had the favour of a letter from your lordship (last night) of the 15th current, n. st. I sent it straight to Windsor, where his Majesty went on Saturday afternoon. I did not observe anything in it that required an answer hence; his Majesty will be here again on Thursday, and then I shall have the letter back again and the directions necessary, if any be to be given. Here goes enclosed a memorial that M. v. Beunninghen gave in to his Majesty three or four days ago. I was commanded to transmit it to your lordship in order to have you pass the convenient offices upon it in that Court; but there are in my Lord of Conway's hands, who is now at Windsor, other papers that are necessary for the instructing of such a case as it ought to be; as soon as I have them I will be sure to transmit them to your lordship.

1682, July 17th, Whitehall.—The same to the same (holograph). I most humbly thank your lordship for your large and accurate letter of the 22nd current. I have not had time to shew it to his Majesty, for it came just to hand as he was going for Windsor. To the Spanish memorial enclosed his Majesty hath directed an answer to be given to this effect:—1. That he does thank the Marquis de Grana for communicating to him his design of reprizing upon the French. 2. That his Majesty not knowing the sentiments of the Cath. King upon the overture come from France to refer all matters in difference to his Majesty he cannot well tell what to advise M. de Grana upon the point he consults him. 3. That he hopes the Marquis will do nothing that may diminish the hopes that are generally conceived of an accommodation. This answer he shall have in writing within a day or two.

1682, July 20th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—Having a request to make to your lordship in the behalf of a French Protestant, who hath a desire to settle himself and his family in England, I thought it the most compendious way to send his memorial (as I do here enclosed), which will at once both inform your lordship of the man's condition and desire, and also furnish you with some precedents of the like . . . wherein your predecessor Mr. Saville hath been successful with the ministers in the French Court. I hope your lordship will as easily obtain the like for the person now recommended, and therefore shall add no more but that whereas it is said in the memorial, that he is to be employed in his Majesty's service, I can say that he is actually sworn into the place of his Majesty's apothecary, for which he hath a certificate under my Lord Chamberlain's hand and seal, as I doubt not that he will show to your lordship when he waits upon you at Paris.

1682, July 24th, Whitehall.—The same to the same (holograph). I have now three letters from your lordship of the 2nd, 25th, and 29th current: the two first were read yesterday before his Majesty at a committee of foreign affairs (tho' I had acquainted his Majesty with the contents of that of the 22nd before); the last of all I find here this evening at my return from Windsor. In answer to yours of the 22nd, his Majesty hath commanded me to let your lordship know that he resolved to speak to the French ambassador very home in the behalf of Mr. Whiting, which cannot be sufficiently considered, nor, as it now stands, lamented. I think the strength of our case lies in this single point, that the King our master's subjects were always exempt from those ordonnances and reglements that related to the Protestant religion there. That this hath been allowed to Mr. Saville in several cases that became controverted in his time; that the ordonnance allowing the children of Protestants to choose their own religion, and obliging their parents to afford them maintenance and portions is a new law, and cannot in good reason be intended to oblige foreigners who ought in matters of religion be as free as the French subjects. I pray, my lord, enquire if the daughter, for instance, of a R. Catholic do upon pretence of too much severity in her parents fly to a convent, shall the parents be bound to maintain her there, whether they will or not? I think the jus commune is not so, and we are under that law and no other, for that was the law in force when our capitulations were made, and the subsequent reglements calculated only for the subjects of France do not bind us. One question I think we must avoid to enter into, it is about the—Libre Exercice de la Religion Reformée, for I think it was only connived at in the Spanish Netherlands. Our contention must be about the immunity and exemption of merchant strangers, who are not to be oppressed and rifled upon pretence of religion. The Italian Book his Majesty so despises that he would not have your lordship (since the author smarts already for his insolency) to concern yourself any further about it; that of making Zealand a place of retreat for his Majesty in case of troubles here renders the author very ridiculous to his Majesty and to my Lords. I take leave to enclose to your lordship another memorial touching the Prince of Orange and the Prince d'Ysanguien, but without any direction to move upon it, or that former one I sent you, His Majesty having taken that matter into his hands, and to press the French ambassador upon it. This you will please to say to the Dutch ambassador there if he happen to demand your offices jointly or severally with himself. You will see enclosed the answer to the Spanish memorial that I sent you by my last.

1682, July 31st, Whitehall.—The same to the same (holograph). Your letter of the 1st Aug., n. st., was produced yesterday before his Majesty at the Committee, it had nothing in it that required directions from hence. His Majesty is moved by the Duke of Holstein to interpose his offices in the Court of France so as to dispose the most Christian King to prevail with his ally the King of Denmark not to impose any hard terms upon the Duke in the Duchy of Holstein Gottorp, which the King of Denmark and he do possess in common; but that that King should treat the Duke as a Prince of the same house with himself, and one that is married to his sister. Your lordship knows, I doubt not, the penchant that this Duke hath had these many years for Sweden, and that the ill blood arises thence. His Majesty hath, notwithstanding, carried himself with great affection to those two Princes, as being of the same nearness to him in blood, and with hearty endeavours as well as good wishes for their accommodation. Your lordship will have some application I doubt not made to you from a minister of the Duke's: you will let such a one know you are (upon representations made by Mr. Skelton) directed from hence to give the Holstein minister there your assistance by any reasonable offices. Your lordship will find that there have been books written upon the controversies between these two Princes, therefore in the application you will be desired to make to Mons^r. de Croissy you will decline to do it by writing, and you will have a due regard to what may be said on the other side by the King of Denmark, for whom his Majesty will always have just regard. Your lordship's letter of the 5th is come to hand this day, but not time enough to show it to his Majesty. His Majesty told me this morning that he had pressed home the business of Mr. Whiting to the French ambassador; what the success will be a little time will show.

1682, Aug. 7th, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—(Holograph.) I received your lordship's letter of the 12th by a gent. that delivered it me on Saturday night at Windsor. I shall answer it to-morrow morning. In the meantime I have nothing but to thank your lordship for it, as his Majesty directs me. I showed Mr. Barillon what was in my Gazette à la main of your doing respect to the public joys there; he saw the same in other letters, which obliged him to acknowledge in as he hath done, to his Majesty. M. V. Beuninghee hath made his complaint to his Majesty of the demolishing of the wall that the Prince of Orange hath caused to be built about his own town of Orange. This M. V. B. told me, and that his Majesty had been pleased to charge himself to speak of it to the French ambassador, but I have nothing given me in command towards your lordship relating to that affair, but I suppose shall have it against next post. The enclosed for my Lady Hyde I receiye just now.

1682, Aug. 10th. London. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—I stay only here for the secretary's letters; he went this morning to Windsor, and I am obliged to stay till he comes back. Your lordship shall not fail to hear from me every post, but what other information I can give you than what is public I delay, yet hoping in two or three days to part and to be with you before your brother, who goes from this to-morrow morning, and says that as soon as he is arrived on French ground you may expect to hear from him. This night there is extraordinary doings at the French ambassador's house upon the account of the birth of the Duke of Burgundy. I hope in a short while your lordship may have occasion to make as joyful an appearance, the Duchess being now very near her time, and bigger of this child than ever she has been of any before.

1682, Aug. 10th. O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary commands me to enclose these packets to your lordship, and to excuse his not writing by this post. Last night the Earl of Anglesey delivered up the Privy Seal by a command; who succeeds him in that place is not yet known, tho' Mr. Seymour be generally discoursed of. 'Tis old news to tell your lordship that the Earl of Halifax is made Marquis of that name, and two nights ago my Lord Vaughan took out a licence to marry the lady his daughter. This night the French ambassador rejoiceth and treats in a manner all the great ones beneath the royal blood, upon occasion of the young Duke of Burgundy, tho' the Spanish ambassador will hardly be there, or compliment his Excellency upon that account, till he receives first the orders of his Court about the title. Yesterday the apprentices' feast was kept at the charge of 16 stewards, who contributed each his 50*l.*; those chosen for next year are the Duke of Ormonde, Duke Albemarle, and others of the highest quality. The next post may bring your lordship news of some changes at Court besides that of a Privy Seal. We do not yet know what employment Earl of Sunderland will fill next, but several penetrating men give out his lordship would rather be secretary again than Pr. Seal. My Lord Feversham and Mr. Greyne sail this night.

1682, Aug. 14th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (holograph).—Your letters of the 15th and 18th n. st., were produced and read yesterday before his Majesty; there was nothing found to be in them that required any directions hence. We have nothing in the Spanish letters by the last ordinary touching the accepting of the reference offered by the most Christian King; the truth is, I have no letters by this post from Sir H. Goodrick, he being (it seems) not well, and the Spanish ambassador told me this day that all that is sent him from his Court is the copy of a memorial that M. Burgomaine gave in to the Emperor, but nothing of this Emperor's answer to that memorial. I have taken the boldness to address to your lordship three of my countrymen for your protection, one of them is Mr. Morgan, son and heir to Mr. Morgan, a very worthy member of the House of Commons, now with God; the other two are my kinsmen, the only son and the grandson of Judge Jenkins, a loyal sufferer in the late troubles

1682, Aug. 17th, Whitehall. O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—On Tuesday morning about six the Duchess was brought to bed of a young Princess. I know the news of a Prince would have been more acceptable, but we hope it may be ere a twelvemonth be about. Yesterday his Majesty visited the Duchess, and in the afternoon the young Princess was christened by the name of Charlotte Maria. Mr. Secretary doth not trouble your lordship this night; I know not how to avoid doing of it with these large packets that are sent to Mr. Secretary and recommended to your lordship. The King hath not been pleased to declare as yet who is to be Lord Privy Seal, tho' it be not much doubted but that Mr. Seymour will be, and that he is to be made a Baron, if not a viscount. Some say they saw a blazing star last night about 10, but the skies are this night so covered that an ordinary one cannot be seen.

1682, Aug. 21st, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—I congratulate with you with all my heart that you have gained your point in the ceremony of your last audience. His Majesty when I read your letter to him was very well satisfied, and my lords of the committee do all look upon it as very honourable to yourself. I am sorry you had occasion of a particular resentment against M. de C., but the height of that gentleman hath been much complained of by other ministers. The last letters bring us no news from Spain, but that Mons^r. de Burgomeine had written to that Court that he had presented a memorial to the Emperor in order to have his advice about referring the differences between France and Spain to the arbitration of the King our master, but nothing is yet said of the Emperor's answer upon that memorial, only we are bid to hope that we may have his answer communicated to us here before the end of the next month of September. I wish these procrastinations (for I know not how to call them otherwise, tho' in the figure of a mediation that we are entering into we ought to abstain from words tending to partiality,) may not bring the French to some peremptory and brisk demand; not that they will lose any thing in shewing more and more longanimity; and I think your lordship may, as occasion offers, commend that conduct, not only as the more Christian, but also as the more safe, and that which will at last prove most effectual.

1682, Aug. 22nd, Whitehall, past one o'clock. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston. (Holograph.) . . . On Sunday last his Majesty giving me the honour of a private audience in his closet, he was pleased first to hear that letter read over to him that your lordship had writ to me of the 12th, then he read over your letter addressed to himself. He went over both letters a second time, and his Majesty's first conclusion was that he concurred fully with your lordship on this point, that the information is not in the least to be slighted, but by all means to be enquired into, and the bottom of it, if possible, to be penetrated. But his Majesty did not think it convenient that the gent. that gives this notice should himself make a journey over at this juncture of time, for that he is more safe and undiscovered there than he can be here at this time, because the secret as yet lies between you and him alone on that side, and a new face cannot show itself here without being suspected by those of that country to be come on a new errand. But that which moves his Majesty principally at this time is, that this gent. having the thread of this important affair now in his hand he is much more useful there than he can be here, for his Majesty presumes that he watches every turn and motion made on that side; and is in a way to acquaint your lordship with every particular tho' never so minute just in the nick of time that it comes to his knowledge. The losing of this benefit (which must be done if he do now come over) is of mighty weight with his Majesty, insomuch that he reckons it to be a loss not to be compensated by any way that he can foresee. One thing his Majesty further added, that the gent. ought in all reason to give you leave to send his Majesty the names of those great men of that nation that are concerned, since his Majesty cannot be so well upon his guard unless he be forewarned who they are that do design him mischief; therefore he desires to have their names with the soonest possible, for in that will consist under God a part of his safety. This was his Majesty's first reflexion upon this whole matter. When I waited on him on Monday morning to receive his final commands what to write to your lordship, he was pleased to tell me he was still of the same mind both as to the gentleman's not coming over at this time till we hear more, and as to the necessity of knowing those great men's names with the soonest possible. For that reason he desires you to send those names and whatever else you have relating to this affair by expresses, and it shall be allowed for upon your extraordinaries, as shall all other charges and gratifications incident to this business. I send several ways to see what troops are upon the coasts of ———, and what ships are ready or preparing. Your lordship upon this occasion will do the like on your side, and you shall hear from me speedily what occurs. There is no entry made of this letter, nor no clerk knows anything of the contents. His Majesty hath given me your letter to him to keep for fear of accidents.—P.S. His Majesty would have from your lordship some character of this gent., as to his country, course of life, talent, habitudes, prospect, &c.

SIR
F. GRAHAM

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1682, Aug. 24th, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—(Holograph.) Besides your letter by Mr. Tempest (who arrived here on Tuesday about six in the afternoon), I have the favour of two from your lordship of the 26th and 29th current n. style . . . That by Mr. Tempest was read yesterday before his Majesty who happened to take a turn hither to see a new yacht launched; the other letters are to be produced on Sunday at the Committee of Foreign Affairs. Mr. Tempest will be returning with the mail on Monday. We have not one word more of the arbitrage; the Spanish ambassador hopes that within the month of September we may hear of the resolutions of the Courts of Vienna and Madrid. I must confess I have the same fears that your lordship hath the French may and will push on, unless the consideration of incidents in Italy do retard them, I mean engage their application on that side . . .

1682, Aug. 28th, London.—The Earl of Halifax to Lord Preston.—Complimentary.—The last information you sent over is considerable, and your care in it is approved; means will be used to pursue the enquiry according to the hints that are given, and after all if it should at last prove to be less material than it seemeth at first appearance, your lordship's part in it is such as must recommend you to his Majesty's good opinion. We are of your judgment here, that France doth not intend a war, if they can get their pretensions yielded to them without it, in which the likelihood of war in Hungary giveth them great advantage, besides that they receive from the disjointed condition of those Princes and states whose interest it is to oppose them; what is lately done at Orange either sheweth great anger to the Prince or a mind to mortify him into more compliance. Our home affairs always seem calm in a long vacation, but by Michaelmas term I suppose the noise and clamour against the government will be revived.—Thanks Lord Preston for the prints and asks him by the first good opportunity to send a small parcel of French paper.

1682, Aug. 31st, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—(Holograph.) When I dispatched away Mr. Tempest (which I could not possibly do before last night) I put into his hands a proces verbal from Orange touching the demolition of the wall of that town, as also the article of the peace of Nimeguen whereby the Prince of Orange is restored to all that he was dispossessed of by reason of the last war. His Majesty is heartily sorry for this incident; he was pleased to command me on Sunday to go to Mr. Barillon and to desire him to employ his best offices to prevent violences. M. de Barillon's answer to me was que c'estoit une affaire finie, for that the inhabitants themselves (as his letters of the 28th Aug. n. st., purported) had begun to demolish their wall, so that his offices would come too late. However he promised to write. His Majesty commanded me to transmit the same papers to your lordship to the end you may do the proper offices for his Highness the Prince in case you find that your offices do not come too late. I am extremely troubled to see this harshness used towards his Highness, for how much soever the French have reason of their side, yet the Prince should have been first heard. Poor Mr. Whiting of Lisle apprehends he will be fallen upon afresh this next month. He desires to be respite for some while, and that we may be heard in his behalf. I pray my lord try what you can do in prevailing with M. de Croissy to write to the intendant to that effect.

1682, Sept. 1st, Whitehall.—The same to the same. (Holograph.) It would be a great solecism in me if I should take upon me to recommend my Lord Ferrars to your lordship's acquaintance; you know I doubt not how firm he is to the church and the crown, and how particular an esteem the King our master hath of his lordship's affection and services to him. My lord intends to go southerly for his better health, which I wish him with all my soul. I doubt not your lordship will accompany him with your good offices as far as he shall have occasion for any.

1682, Sept. 4th, Whitehall.—The same to the same. (Partly in cipher, deciphered, signed only by Mr. Secretary Jenkins.) I come too late from Windsor to write to your lordship as fully as I am commanded to do in relation to the principality of Orange. I have it in charge to transmit to your lordship a second proces verbal of what hath been done in that city by way of military execution for several days; this verbal was introduced last night by the Dutch ambassador and Envoyé with a memorial accompanied with a letter of the Raedt Pensioner Fagel to Mon^r. van Beuningen. It is his Majesty's pleasure that you should do offices thereupon; his Majesty believes the rigorous treatments in matter of fact to be now over, and consequently that what is done in fact tho' never so fortious can never be undone; it is possible we may be better instructed by the next post in what may be proper for your lordship to insist on. To be sure that which is certain to be denied here is not so proper to be demanded without special order, such as I have not yet to give your lordship. His Majesty cannot deny his offices for the removing of all violences and the ceasing of the voyes de fait till the question be at least better understood; therefore your lordship may please to let Mon^r. de Croissy know that you have orders to pass offices upon this occasion, and that you will do it with the soonest possible. The Dutch minister here would (as I am told) have his Majesty to order your lordship to join with the Dutch ambassador on that side in these offices. I have no such order to give your lordship, and if I had, I could not promise myself any great good effect of it. I think we ought to distinguish accurately between the matter of right pretended to by the Prince of Orange, in which we are not yet instructed, and the matter of fact consisting in those violences and rigors acted upon the city and the subjects of the Prince; in this last point offices cannot come unseasonably if violences be not ceased, but whatever offices you do, you may please to do them (till you have orders to the contrary) by parole and not by writing. His Majesty hath spoken with very much concern to the French ambassador last night about poor Mr. Whiting. I waited on his Excellency this morning upon the same errand; that which will be proper for us to do will be to endeavour all that we can possibly (and the ambassador hath promised to do his part) to prevent the taxing of the father a second time, and consequently to take away the occasion of military executions.

1682, Sept. 7th, Whitehall. The same to the same. (Holograph.) I did myself the honour on Monday last to write to your lordship upon the business of the city of Orange, I now send you the papers that I could not possibly get transcribed time enough by that ordinary. I now received the favour of two of yours of the 9th and the 12th, and have just time enough to give an account of them to Windsor. I do not expect to have any answer upon them till his Majesty returns hither, which will be on Sunday next. The news from Hungary is very sad; at home we are pretty quiet.

1682, Sept. 11th, Whitehall. The same to the same. (Holograph.) It hath been my ill fortune not to prevail for your leave of absence thence for three weeks or a month. His Majesty looks upon the business of Orange as a thing will require your presence and application; it is still depending and in a very untoward manner. His Majesty heard it last night and hath commanded two verbeaux more to be sent you together with two extracts that will let you into the whole matter as it lies before the States. His Majesty directs your lordship still to continue your offices there, and to do it heartily so as thereby to come to the truth of the fact.—P.S. M. van Beuningen would feign have you to co-operate with their minister; but they understand the matter and we do not.

1682, Sept. 18th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—(L. S.) I am to acknowledge the favour of your lordship's of the 24th n. s., and therein Mon^r. de Croissy's answer to the Dutch ambassador about Orange, which hath been read before his Majesty at a Committee of Foreign Affairs. All that I have in command is to let your lordship know that whereas you expect further orders before you do any offices in the affair of Orange, in regard that it is now at an end, his Majesty expects to receive from you an account of the matter of fact and of the pretensions of the most Christian King as they are represented on that side, before you do embark in new offices, his Majesty being zealous to do what he can for the Prince his nephew, but not so forward to allege positively any matter of fact or point of right before he receives the state of the case from your lordship. Mary Cardin, a French Protestant, having been lately sworn and admitted laundress of his Majesty's table linen, 'tis his Majesty's pleasure that your lordship employ your good offices for leave of the most Christian King for her family to come over hither; a draft of such a passport (as her friends conceive fit to be desired from that King) goes herewith enclosed. His Majesty is graciously pleased likewise that your lordship employ the like offices in behalf of the Sieur Rambort, a painter, that he may have leave likewise with his family to pass into England. His Majesty being informed of the ability of the said Sieur Rambort in his art, and not knowing as yet but that his skill and judgment may be useful towards the adorning and finishing of his royal palace at Windsor. I hope your lordship will easily prevail in favour of the said persons; for tho' the ordonnance of the 14th July last (granted upon that of Aug. 1669) forbids all subjects of France to depart that kingdom and to settle elsewhere, yet the clause of sans nostre permission in it is a sufficient foundation for your lordship to move in their behalf.

1682, Sept. 21st, Whitehall. The same to the same. (Holograph.) Yesterday brought me the favour of yours of the 26th n. st. I wish it had given me the welcome news of your lordship being perfectly restored in point of health. It is not to be expected, as you observe, that the Prince of Orange and the States General will acquiesce in the answer that hath been given the Dutch ambassador on that side, and they will without doubt press to have offices on his Majesty's part performed about the business of Orange. You may please to assure the Dutch ambassador that his Majesty hath done his part with M. de Barillon and will do everything that can be reasonably expected from an uncle most affectionate to the Prince, and an ally very just to his obligations to the State. Yet I dare* not say that his Majesty will give in to their measures so far as to direct you to make joint offices with the Dutch ambassador, I mean that you should join with him in the same memorial as your predecessor Mr. Savile hath sometimes done in the case of our joint engagements to prevent a rupture betwixt France and Spain.* The French ambassador delivered in a memorial this day to let the world know that the most Christian King will hold to the terms he hath offered to Spain for an accommodation no longer than till the end of November next. To-morrow I intend to look over your bill of extraordinaries.

1682, Sept. 28th, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary having been all this day in the city, and returning very late, hopes your lordship will excuse his not writing by this post. He commands me to send you the enclosed paper, being his Majesty's answer to the Spanish ambassador's memorial, whereby he pretends to declare his King's accepting of his Majesty's arbitration or rather mediation. He sent it away to his Court on the 26th by express, as Mr. Secretary did it by the same conveyance to Sir Henry Goodrick, and (if he should be retired out of Madrid upon the late offense he is said to have given) to the Dutch ambassador there, who in that case is to pass offices upon it in the King's name. The Spanish ambassador's own memorial is not communicated to anybody by particular direction, for that there are some expressions in it which would not please every place. Here is a report in town as if the Dutch ministers had another memorial upon the anvil, whereby they intend to desire his Majesty to name plenipotentiaries for a congress before the end of November, but this I cannot affirm to be true. Mr. North and Rich were this day sworn sheriffs for this next year, to the great joy of the loyal, and mortification of the disaffected party, who mustered up all the rabble to above 3,000, and would in all probability have encouraged a squabble had they not met (which they did not expect) a company of the militia placed in Guildhall, and another at the door, which surprised and bridled them for this time; yet Papillon had the confidence to call his party to witness he had done all that he could to serve them, and offered to lay his hand with the other two upon the Book, till he was turned off the hustings for a rioter.

The memorial enclosed is endorsed, The answer given by the Earl of Sunderland to the Spanish Ambassador's Memorial, and left by his lordship with him in writing.

Le Roy m'a commandé de dire a V. E. qu'il ne luy convient pas d'accepter l'arbitrage, mais qu'il est et sera toujours prest a rendre tous les offices qu'il pourra pour accorder les differences qui restent entre les deux Couronnes.

1682, Oct. 2, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—I am again commanded to excuse Mr. Secretary to your lordship, who hath been all this day in the city to attend the poll which was adjourned from Friday last, nor is it yet declared, but we hope it may by to-morrow night, and advantageously for his Majesty's service. Those that are for the Government poll for Sir Wm. Prichard, the others for Cornish and Gold. Our new sheriffs behave themselves most briskly, and have in great measure damp't the insolency of the common people, who are animated by others to lay hold of any occasion to raise tumults and disorder. His Majesty granted lately a new charter (upon the surrender of the old one) to the city of Nottingham; when the charter came down and the mayor began to swear those to be members of the corporation that the charter directed, the fanatic party (encouraged by Mr. Secheverel and others who thought themselves disobliged by it) began to mutiny and to oppose the charter, and chose another mayor and officers of their own. The informations are a taking in order to bring them to punishment, and the Lord Lieutenant is desired to remove for some days into that town and to quell the rioters. The Court removes to-morrow for Newmarket, tho' I cannot think his Majesty will go before he hath approved of a Lord Mayor.

1682, Oct. 4th, Newmarket. William Blathwayt to Lord Preston. . . . It hap'ning by my Lord of Conway's attendance on the King here that I may be able to give your lordship the first and most immediate notice of what passes at Court, I will not fail to trouble your lordship by every post as anything extraordinary shall happen. At present I can only acquaint your lordship that the Court arrived here yesterday in very good health, and are entertained with very good weather and the sports of the place. The great success of the King's affairs in the city by the choice of good sheriffs and, as we have reason to hope, of a good Lord Mayor may, if the weather permit, occasion his Majesty's stay here till the first day of the form, when the Duke of Monmouth is obliged to make his appearance at the King's Bench bar, and we may hope for justice in other things which by the iniquity of the late sheriffs has been denied.

1682, Oct. 5th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—I have now before me three of your lordship's letters which I am to acknowledge. . . . They are those of the 3rd, 7th, and the 10th current, n. s. Upon your letter of the 3rd, which contains all that was then come to your lordship's knowledge of the violences acted upon the city and principality of Orange, the only reflection that was made was that the Dutch ambassador not stirring further in that affair, and your lordship having passed the necessary offices on your part, it was but reasonable to observe what step the Dutch ambassador should make next. . . . The letters of the 7th and the 10th were humbly laid before his Majesty; they contained matter of news only, and produced nothing of direction from his Majesty.

1682, Oct. 5th, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—(Holograph.) Having accounted to your lordship for your more public letters of the 7th and 10th current, I am to thank you for the great honour of your more private one of the 7th. I must crave some respite to answer it, being desirous to take in his R. Highness's sentiments, indeed his protection in this matter; not that I know anything of the Earl intended (as you say) to succeed you, but that I think myself extremely obliged to serve you, or rather the Crown, which I do, when I am successful in your lordship's service. The two papers in cypher I will stand accountable for by the next; the lords you wot of could not be got together.

1682, Oct. 9th, Whitehall.—The same to the same. (Holograph.) The last I have from your lordship is of the 14th current. . . . I have ready prepared an answer to two letters in cypher, and two private letters from your lordship, but I cannot possibly put them into cypher with my own hand till next post. I send your lordship a memorial that I received just now from M. v. Beuninghen; you will easily perceive in comparing it with his Majesty's answer to Don P. Ronquillo's last memorial, that our end here is to prevent that the war break not out at the end of November, and therefore we press for such a clear answer as may tie up the most Christian King's hands by accepting the arbitrage as 'tis offered. But here a place for a general congress is the thing pressed for, which France may make so much the more difficulty to grant, in that the Spaniards have not yet so explicitly declared the acceptance of the French offer; and I send you likewise a memorial of M. le Comte de Thun, that you may see the sentiments of the Emperor. I moved his Majesty most humbly upon the desires of M. Faubert and M. Justell, and his Majesty is pleased to allow of their suits, and of your intercession for them. You know how incomparable a person M. Justell is, and how we should covet to have him in our country. You see likewise how modest his petition is; he desires to sell but part of his estate for Madame de la Barr. I have no other orders but those I had the honour to give you as I received them by word of mouth. I wish I were enabled to repeat them in writing, I mean in such authentic form as the lady tells me you desire; but I think you have an article in your instructions that enables you very fully to appear in such a case as this is, but I think the application is not to be made directly to the King, because he may pretend to many edicts and ordonnances against our prayer, but you being upon the place you will be best able to judge what can be done for the service of these good Protestants.

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1682, Oct. 12th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—(Partly in cipher.)—I have before me two letters of yours in cypher, and two private letters; both the private ones and the first of those in cypher are of the 7th current, the other came in your dispatch of the 10th. Those in cypher were read to Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl of Halifax, and Lord Hyde. Their lordships knew not what to make of the emplette in Rue St. Ce, but have given orders that the ports and the French ambassador's house be looked to, for such a shoal of travestis cannot easily pass unobserved; but their lordships would have you consider exactly the circumstances of that man that brought your lordship that news, lest he have a design to impose upon us in order to a reward, or else would affect the King and his ministers with having been acquainted with such a plot and not to make any more diligences to find out the bottom of it. Count Dalby is known to be the man you describe him; if he should happen to be, we should be obliged to look over him narrowly. I can go no further, having been interrupted all this day.

1682, Oct. 14, J. Tucker to Wm. Blathwayt, Secretary to the Earl of Conway, Principal Secretary of State, &c., at Newmarket.—Gives a copy of a presentment of the grand jury for Middlesex at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, held at Hicks's Hall, in St. John's Street, by adjournment, 11 Oct. 1682.—They condemn persons, not being magistrates authorised by the King's Commission who intermeddle with matters of Government and the administration of the laws. Also a paper presented to the Lord Mayor and Court of Alderman relating to the choosing of sheriffs. They say that persons making proposals for the advantage of the public should first present them through the representatives of the county, the grand jury, or the quarter sessions.—14 Oct. They present that associations, conventicles, and libels are destructive to the public peace, &c., and that the persons who signed the paper presented to the Lord Mayor and Alderman are seditious persons, and ought to be enquired after, &c.

1682, Oct. 16th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston. (Holograph partly in cipher deciphered by Lord Preston.) I shall now, with your Lordship's leave take up where I was forced to mine of Thursday the 12th current to break off. Count D'alby is known to all my lords to be the man you describe him. If he should happen to be, we should be obliged to look after him narrowly. In answer to your other cypher of the 10th, my lords do look upon the paper you have been able to compass from Everard as a great instance of your being most intent upon this business. Lord Lieutenant of Ireland hath not yet any light of Ireland, Colonel Masti is here at this time; there hath been enquiry made after the landing of arms, and a view hath been taken of the present condition of those that were pointed at by the captain, and nothing as yet appears of a tendency to a disturbance or insurrection. The King did not before he went to Newmarket come to any resolution touching the captain; he did expect that Everard should ere this have been met, or else to have heard something material of Ireland. In either of which the King expected some light how to employ the captain more usefully in this service. My lords have recommended it to me to entreat your lordship to make him a present of 20 pistoles, but by all means as from yourself as a gratuity, and not by order; and you are to entreat him, if he go to the army or out of town, to leave with yourself such addresses as that the King's command by your lordship may find him at any time your lordship may please to desire him to correspond with you, in what relates to the reforming of the Irish regiments in that service. As to your being recalled from the place where you now are, I cannot discover any the least tendency to it. I have gone so far as to sound the Earl of Halifax and Lord Hyde. They profess to know nothing of it; the latter finds fault that so much credit is given to this flame as to think it worth the enquiring after; however the resignation where-with your lordship treats this rumour is not only the truly christian but the much more prudent and decent part. On the other side I know nothing in the least that should induce your Lordship to any resolution that you may have taken as to the sending for your lady and family. I have spoken very fully with the Duke on this subject; he very much like himself watches the business, but does not find any tendency to a removal. Your two bills of extraordinaries are under consideration; every style, as that of your servants being here (after you have taken leave of the King) a charge upon you, must be justified by a precedent, which Mr. Cook and I are looking after.

1682, Oct. 23rd, Whitehall.—The same to the same. (Partly in cipher deciphered by Lord Preston.) I had the honour to send your letter of the 24th to his Majesty at Newmarket, and to read to him that of the 28th, yesterday, at the Committee of Foreign Affairs. Your answer to Mons^r. de Croissy's compliment, as far as I am able to judge of it, for it did not come before the Committee of Foreign Affairs, was firm as well as apposite, and such as became an English minister; it went no further in the matter of compliment than was suitable with the figure that his Majesty bears, and in that your (lordship I speak my own sense) will do very well to preserve the dignity of the King, and consequently the value due to his friendship; for this will be a check to those diminutions that the vanity of that nation or the prejudice of our other neighbours may be apt to put upon us. Your lordship knows that the motto of "cui adhereo præest" will become a King of England whenever he shall please to take it up. The King was extremely satisfied with your reasoning so clear and so just in the case of M. Justell, and he hath commanded me to acquaint him with it in order to take him off from importuning the King or your lordship to make further instances; in the interim you may please to forbear all further offices to him.

1682, Oct. 26th, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—I return you my most humble thanks for the honour of your lordship's letter of the 28th, which I laid before Mr. Secretary together with what was enclosed in it. Mr. Secretary having writ to your lordship last post hath nothing to trouble you with this night. These two days past have been spent in rejoicings upon the victory we obtained over the Whigs in the choice of an honest Lord Mayor, Sir Wm. Prichard, who carried it from Gold by 14, and from Cornish by 45 voices, which is reckoned a great advantage, considering we lost it 14 months ago by 1,200. The term began on Monday with a motion on the behalf of Duboise and Papillon for a mandamus to swear them sheriffs; the Court hath given the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen a week's time to show cause why such a mandamus ought not to be granted. Duke of Monmouth appeared according to his reconnaissance, but having not thought fit to consult the Attorney General (as he ought regularly to have done) he was not discharged. The old London sheriffs appear in the head of several other rioters who are to attend de die in diem till they come to their trial. A large information hath been exhibited in the King's Bench against Lord Grey for debauching and concealing his fair sister-in-law, and his lordship is to plead to it, and to have a trial at bar upon it this term. The Londoners have given in their replication about the quo warranto, signed by Williams, Winnington, and six other true Protestant lawyers; it is more in the nature of a manifesto, or one of the last Westminster Parliament addresses, than a loyal instrument. I seldom fail my lord, of sending your lordship one or two bulky packets filled with letters, some to English gentlemen, others only covered (as far as I can guess) to your lordship. I would gladly receive your directions touching them, especially how to distinguish those I ought not to trouble your lordship's packet with. Herewith go two delivered by Mr. Graham, one from his R. H., and a packet recommended by my Lord Hyde. His Majesty was pleased last night to declare the Marquis of Halifax Lord Privy Seal.

1682, Oct. 26th, Newmarket.—William Blathwayt to Lord Preston.—Your lordship has only this assurance by my being here that nothing of any moment can pass without your immediate knowledge, but we are indeed so barren of news that I can hardly find matter for this letter. On Saturday night his Royal Highness arrived here and the streets were all filled with bonfires upon the occasion of his birthday. The weather continues fair enough after some rain, which has very much favoured the King's divertisements, and would invite his Majesty to stay longer than Saturday next if it were not necessary for him to be at London on the Monday following, being the first day of term when the Duke of Monmouth is to answer for the late riot at the King's Bench bar

1682, Oct. 30th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (holograph). My last was of this day seven-nights. I have since the honour of yours of the 4th Nov., n. s., which was read last night before his Majesty at the committee, but produced nothing of direction to me upon any part of it. I was glad to find in it so exact an account of the pretensions of the House of Longueville to the principality of Orange, because it is one of the many evidences of your application to render yourself master of everything that would become your lordship to know and give an account of as belonging to your post; but I am heartily sorry to see a suit of that nature commenced at this time, when the Prince will not be able to make his defence but with great disadvantage, and that a seizure once made is not easily taken off. As you come to be informed my lord, in the progress of this business of the merits of the cause, you will, I doubt not, take along with you for your private satisfaction all that Mess^r. Dupuis in their folio Traite des droits du Roy tres Chretien, have deduced of this title, tho' that be a book that we English cannot take the least notice of without prejudice to that which concerns us much nearer. I take leave to send your lordship Count Than's and M. van Beuninghen's last memorial. His Majesty having not yet directed any answer to be given to it, I shall not presume to give my own reflections upon it, but as soon as his Majesty directs anything to be done upon it you may be sure of my diligence in giving you notice of it.

1682, Nov. 2nd, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary commands me to tell your lordship that he hath nothing worth the troubling you with this night . . . All things are very quiet in the city and under God likely to continue so, and the rather for that the bouteux do vanish daily. We are in quest at present of Sir Thom. Blayer, who hath been summoned above a week to attend the council but hath not yet appeared; he is summoned again for to-morrow, his Majesty being concerned lest he should withdraw before he begins an account of 16,000*l*. he received as collection money for the redemption of poor captives. Whitaker was found guilty by a Somerset jury in Westminster Hall for words spoken two years ago in that county, tending to justify the late rebellion, saying 'twas a legal war and the late King was not murdered but legally put to death by a court of judicature; his bail is but 200*l*.; he himself is fled and did not appear. We know not yet what his fine will be. The next famous trial of this term will be the late sheriffs and the London riotters.—P.S. The Earl of Sunderland is admitted to the Committee of Foreign Affairs.

1682, Nov. 6th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (holograph partly cipher deciphered by Lord Preston). I have the favour of yours of the 7th and 11th. The first was produced yesterday before the King at the committee; the other is but just now come to hand, so that I have not had time to uncipher that large cipher that was in it apart. As far as I can guess by the Spanish letters just come in, there's here no likelihood that the King of Spain will accept of the King's arbitrage. Sir H. Goodrick was not restored when the letters came away. Capt. O'Connor would have had his Majesty's letter to the most Christian King upon the subject matter of the petition enclosed, but his Majesty was pleased to direct no more than that you should do offices as far as the suggestion will bear in his behalf. The enclosed is a copy of a memorial given in at Madrid by Mons^r. de Hemskirk, ambassador of Holland.

1682, Nov. 9th, Whitehall.—Two letters, one holograph from Mr. Secretary Jenkins to Lord Preston, recommending a petition by M. Francis Ammonet, a French protestant and merchant, lately come into England for his religion's sake, a copy of which he encloses.—P.S. I sent your lordship last post the petition of Capt. O'Connor; I am commanded to repeat to your lordship his Majesty's pleasure that you do all convenient offices upon the same, the subject matter thereof seeming here very reasonable.

1682, Nov. 13th, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—(Partly in cipher deciphered by Lord Preston.) The Spanish ambassador gave in a memorial yesterday to his Majesty, but it was so fine spun it signified little, the thing intended by it was to intreat his Majesty to desire a prolongation of the term, and the ambassador expresses as much fully enough by word of mouth; but in his memorial he supposes there may be such hostilities committed as may cause all our hopes of a peace to vanish, then he leaves to his Majesty's high wisdom to make use of the most efficacious means (best known to himself) to prevent those hostilities. His Majesty was so little edified with this matter of negotiating, that tho' he resolved to demand of the most Christian King to have the term prolonged for a competent time, yet he thought fit to do it by word of mouth to the French ambassador (as he did the last night), but with (without?) grounding what he asked upon the Spanish memorial or the application of the Spanish ambassador to him, making the concern he hath for the peace of Christendom to be the motive to this request. His Majesty being thus coldly applied to hath not thought fit to charge you with any constraint in this case, yet it is his pleasure that with giving you any copy of the said memorial I should acquaint your lordship with what hath passed, that you may know how to govern yourself in your conversation with M. de Crossy; in case he should take any notice to your lordship of the overture that M. Barillon is to make by an express of this day, you may let him see you are not unacquainted with the thing, and tho' you are not commanded to pass offices, yet you are to support the reasonableness of the King's demand from the great topic of the peace of Christendom. It was once intended by the French Ambassador to send an express, but he hath since contented himself to send by the ordinary.

1682, Nov. 20th, Whitehall.—The same to the same (holograph). The last I troubled your lordship with was of Thursday last. I have since, that is yesterday, proposed to his Majesty the difficulty, or rather oppression, that the inhabitants of Jersey begin to labour under. His Majesty and my lords approved very well of your reasonings upon that subject, and his Majesty commanded me not only to recommend it to your lordship to pass offices with M. de Croissy upon this occasion, but to give me in charge to wait on the French ambassador (as I have done this morning) to recommend the same affair to his Excellency. His Majesty is content that way be made for the young gentlemen you wot of, to come by the means you shall think most probable.

1682, Nov. 23rd, Whitehall.—The same to the same (in cipher deciphered by Lord Preston).—My last was of Monday the 23rd, since which I have none from your lordship. His Majesty hath ordered an answer to be given to M. van Beuninghen's last memorial, it turns principally upon these two heads, first, that the accepting of the arbitration is the most probable means to prevent a new and general rupture. Secondly, that 'tis not proper at this time that none of the parties have'n (?) into the arbitration to ask a place for a general congress; these points your lordship will be pleased to support with your own reasons (which I am sure will be very good), at least till I shall be able to send you a copy of the memorial that Mr. Chudleigh is to give in. The reason why I do not now send it is that his Majesty would not have it yet imparted to any of the foreign ministers in this Court; but the truth that we are concerned that it should be taken notice of by the allies is, that his Majesty will not suffer himself to be entrainé by the allies into the war against his will.

1682, Nov. 27th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—Your letters of the 28th Nov. and 2nd Dec., n. st., were read yesterday before his Majesty at the committee. His Majesty likes very well of the exactness of that deduction that you make to him touching Orange. I have not had anything of late written hither about it from Holland, tho' the letters of the 2nd Dec. came to hand yesterday from France, yet I do not hear any thing from M. Barillon about the prolongation of the term; how his courier comes to be behind the mail so long I do not yet hear. I do by his Majesty's allowance transmit to your lordship Don P. Ronquillo's memorial that he gave in on Saturday last. If his Majesty directs nothing as yet to be said or done upon it, he reserves himself till he hears what France will do about the prolongation of the term. His Majesty directs you to hearken after the merits of Mr. Charlton's cause, that he may upon notice of the charge against him be better able to judge what is best to be done in order to protect and preserve him.

1682, Dec. 4th London (holograph). Lord Halifax to Lord Preston.— . . . The prolongation of the term lately obtained from France by our master is the likeliest means to keep the world in peace; but it is not yet known how it will work in Spain and Holland, where there is at the same time a fear of a war, and yet a great slowness to use the most probable methods to prevent it; a little more time must needs open the scene, and the world will at least be put out of the suspense it is now in for the event of things, the spring being so critical a time, that we shall be able then to guess what weather will be for the rest of the year. Your lordship hath a difficult province enough, which I am not sorry for, because you will have so much the more credit by acquitting yourself so well. . . .

1682, Dec. 12th. H. [Henry Compton, Bishop of] London, to Lord Preston.—Acknowledges his letter. Understands that Lord Preston has put new life to the hopes of Madam de Regné, who presents her most passionate thanks in a matter that concerns her poor Protestant relations.—The bearer of the letter Mr. Coke (for whom he begs Lord Preston's protection) is a gentleman of a fair estate, loyal, and a thorough Protestant.

1682, Dec. 21st, o. s., Piccadilly. Henry Coventry to Lord Preston.—Thanks for Lord Preston's letter of the 26th of Dec., and apologises for troubling him about so mean a concern; he (Coventry) must charge a very considerable part of the blame to his good friend James Graham to whom he spoke about Melon seeds, thinking he would have employed some of his lordship's family and not have troubled Lord Preston himself. Thanks him.

1682, Dec. 7th, Whitehall. William Blathwayt to Lord Preston.—Having no other opportunity of serving your lordship, I take leave to entertain you with something that has passed here, and may probably afford matter of discourse at Paris. One Falaisean, a French Protestant, and secretary to Mr. Mountagu during his embassy in France, was taken into custody by an order of council at the same time when Mr. Mountagu's papers were seized, and it did then appear that this man was extremely busy in matters of state, by the letters and papers that were found in his scribittore. However, upon his producing a protection from this French ambassador he was then released without more notice taken of him. Since which time it is said by those that have reason to know it that he has kept unjustifiable correspondencies with foreign courts, and more especially with that of the Elector of Brandenburg, whither he has sent divers libels, as that of the black box, and others translated into French. And having by these means and by the recommendation of Mons^r. Spanheim, now at Paris, introduced himself into the confidence of the ministers of that Court, he obtains credentials from the elector to his resident; whereupon he begun to take upon him the part of a minister, and pressed for an audience from the King, but instead of having a day appointed for it, he was given to understand that his Majesty would not admit of him, and had signified the reasons of his refusal to the elector by the enclosed letter. Some time after his Majesty receives the answer (which I likewise send your lordship here enclosed) written in such terms that his Majesty thought he had great reason to express his resentment of it, and immediately gave orders to the master of the ceremonies to signify his pleasure to Falaiseau that he should forthwith depart the kingdom, with which he has promised to comply. This information I thought might not be unuseful to your lordship, having also reason to believe that Mons^r. Spanheim will appear to your lordship very forward and active in excusing his master the elector as well as his friend Mons^r. Falaiseau. Mons^r. Haxhausen, the Duke of Holstein's envoy, is to have his first audience to-morrow. Your lordship knows his only business is to solicit the King to interpose his good offices in behalf of that Duke upon the differences he has depending with the King of Denmark.

1682, December 7th, London. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—Dr. Turner gives you by this post a particular account of your affair, so that I have only to say that the Duke has undertaken it and thinks it very well timed. I have desired the doctor, after the arguments of the necessity of it for the King's better service and honour to lay before his Highness the promises were made to you before your parting from this place, to inform him of the assurances you lately had from several hands of the King's kind intentions towards you, and to shew him that you expected it in nothing more during your stay abroad than in the advancement of your character. I have advised him also to let the Duke know that I am here from your lordship, to give you an account of what resolutions may be taken in it; by this means I may have a greater freedom to speak to the Duke of your business. I received your lordship's letter with the inclosed for his Royal Highness.

1682, Dec. 14th, London. The same to the same. I can give you no better account of your business than Dr. Turner has by the two last posts. Neither do I see ground to hope it may succeed unless your lordship would think it fit to ask leave to come over here for some little time yourself; you could I am sure do more in it in one day than all your friends here are like to do for you; if this be refused you, and that you continue in your former resolutions of quitting if not advanced, it will be absolutely necessary to make them known here. I must confess I think it strange that you should be delayed at a time when they are so prodigal of honours to others. Pray be pleased to let me know your lordship's intentions. I waited the other morning with Mr. Tufton on the Duke, before we heard that Mr. Charlton was at liberty, to give him an account of the character he had in the world and what you lordship believed him to be, having been informed that he was mightily misrepresented to his Highness; I told him that you had no particular acquaintance with him, but that those that had represented him to you as a very worthy gentleman, and that it was the general belief of the world that he was so.

1682, Dec. 18th, Whitehall. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (holograph).—Having spent all this day in dispatching an express for Tanger (the Emperor there demurring to ratify the peace by sea and land, that his ambassador concluded here) I have just time left to tell your lordship that the enclosed is a memorial of the States of Holland, by way of advice to the States general; I had it from a friend there. M. de Citters is newly arrived here but hath not seen the King, his Majesty going early this morning for Windsor to return on Wednesday evening. He brings with him an answer to Mr. Chudleigh's memorial, but 'tis in very tame terms, in a manner as we are told that this of Holland is. The other paper is a letter that D. P. Ronquillo writ to me; I have not yet had any direction to answer it, but we are threatend to have it printed upon us in Holland. My lord chancellor hath been agonizing these 24 hours; his Majesty will lose a very good servant and a very great man.

1682, Dec. 21st, Whitehall.—The same to the same (holograph).—I have two from your lordship of the 23rd and another of the 26th. I have not yet produced them before his Majesty, but I see we must look about us in what concerns the islands. I'll speak with as many merchants as I can upon the question started on that side, and then inform your lordship of what shall occur, that we may make our case as strong as we can. M. Citters, if he be arrived, is yet incognito, but the memorial he brings begins to appear. Sir H. Goodrick hath been forced in a manner out of Madrid, the Spaniards bringing a coach and obliging him to go in it a mile out of town; the treatment is so rude that his Majesty cannot choose but take notice of it and resent it. We have this day an excellent lord keeper in my Lord Chief Justice North. My Lord Pemerton succeeds him in the common pleas, Mr. Saunders will be Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

1682, Christmas Day, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—(Holograph).—Your letter of the 30th was produced last night at the committee; it being a great vigil the consideration of the Jersey business was adjourned to another day. We have no letters from Sir Hen. Goodrick himself, but what your lordship writes of the indignities done him is confirmed on all hands. His Majesty says not much upon this matter, yet I cannot think but that he resents it in proportion to the strangeness of their proceedings. There cannot be an indication more convincing than this unparalleled rudeness of their resolution in Spair to refuse his Majesty's arbitrage; but for the other point that they reckon with themselves as gained, to wit, that they can draw England into the war as soon as they themselves are involved in it, I have often wondered with myself what should be the grounds of their confidence, but of this that I intended to say, it being impossible to put it into cypher. I'll stand indebted to your lordship till the first convenience.

(1682), Dec. 25th. H. [Compton, Bishop of] London to Lord Preston.—Complimentary.

1682, Dec. 26th, London. (Holograph.) Lord Halifax to Lord Preston. It seemeth the ministers of Spain now in Paris were rightly informed of the intentions of their own Court when they expressed such an aversion to the arbitrage, for by what we hear from Madrid, as well as by their extraordinary proceeding towards Sir Harry Goodrick, it appeareth they are resolved not to agree to it, and yet at the same time are sufficiently apprehensive of the ill consequences a war may bring upon them. And now they would fain put it upon the King my master (to whom it least belongeth) to find out some other expedient after they have rejected that which he offered them. I read your letter to his Majesty, who very well approveth your lordship's answer to the proposal made to you of calling a Parliament. He resolveth to keep that entirely in his own power, and to choose his own time without consulting either any foreign princes or their ministers in a thing of which he conceiveth himself to be much a more proper judge than they can pretend to be; and as for the King's asking a further delay from the King of France, he is not satisfied it would be of much use, and therefore, I believe, will be very slow in doing anything of that kind except he should have more reason to hope than he hath had yet that in case it was granted it might produce a good effect

1682, Dec. 20. W. Blaythwayt to Lord Preston.—From the news from Madrid he thinks Spain will not agree to the mediation.

1683, Jan. 15, Whitehall.—William Blathwayt to Lord Preston.—Having formerly sent your lordship all that had passed in the business of Falaiseau, and your lordship by your letter of the 23rd of the last month having been pleased to express your satisfaction in the account I gave, I am encouraged to send your lordship his Majesty's reply to the Elector of Brandenburg on that subject, which I doubt not will very much raise his El. Highnesses passion. But his Majesty will as certainly be justified to the world for the resentments he has shown at such a choice. Falaiseau, I hear, is gone into Holland, and whether he will steer his course from thence your lordship will best understand from Mons^r. Spanheim.

1683, Jan. 29th, Whitehall. William Bridgeman to Lord Preston.—My Lord of Sunderland succeeding the Earl of Conway (who yesterday resigned his place of Secretary of State and delivered the seals to his Majesty), I would not omit acquainting your lordship therewith, and the rather because my lord not being sworn yet in Council will not till the next post signify it himself to you P.S. I beg your lordship will direct your secretary to send us the Gazettes from time to time. I trouble your lordship with the enclosed, because it comes from my Lady Sunderland.

1683, Feb. 1st, Whitehall.—The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston.—Mr. Bridgeman tells me he acquainted your lordship by the last post that his Majesty had been graciously pleased to confer on me the place of one of his principal Secretaries of State, vacant by the resignation of the Earl of Conway. I was accordingly sworn yesterday, and would not omit by the first to let you know it from myself, and to assure you lordship that I shall be very ready upon all occasions to serve you in my station in anything that may offer here.

1683th, Feb. 15. G. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary being obliged to go towards the city, commands me to beg your lordship's excuse that he doth not write to you this night, and to send your lordship a copy of his Majesty's letter to the Pr. of Portugal upon a late scurvy incident befallen our merchants at Lisbon, a great many of them having been imprisoned upon a discovery made of money that had been shipped to the value of about 15,000*l*. We have not any news from abroad, nor do the last letters say anything of the Treaty of Association which is said to be now carrying on between the high allies at the Hague. Letters of the 5th instant, st. n., from Madrid say that Mr. Hemeskirk had again received another answer touching the arbitrage, which was no more than a referring of him to the answer given the 1st of December, as he was then to the first given the 22nd of Oct., so that the business of the arbitrage is quite off. We are told Don Pedro Ronquillo is to be recalled hence, and that the Court of Spain is not well pleased with him for being too zealous in the promoting of and arguing for the arbitrage. Our term is now over, and nothing done besides the arguing of a few points in the quo warranto. Tomorrow the city Midsummer riotters are to be tried, and 'tis hoped some of them may be pinched for it. The Earl of Danby's indisposition hindered his lordship from being brought to Westminster by habeas corpus to move for his being bailed. Mr. Clifford, that spirited away the widow, is fined a 1,000*l*. to the King, and his accomplices in 500*l*. each; she is to sue them again for her own damage. An indictment of perjury is filed up against Sir Patience Ward, the late Lord Mayor. 'Tis thought that my Lord Grey's business is made up, otherwise he would have been fined this last term. 'Tis said my Lord Shaftesbury's corpse is landed at Poole, in Dorsetshire.

1683, Feb. 19th, Whitehall.—The same to the same. Your lordship may have heard of a sharp contest lately begun in the Treasury by way of accusing the menagers of the harth money for compounding the surplusage of that farm, much to the King's prejudice; the charge was first started by Mr. Shales, who pretended to make out the King was wronged 50,000*l*.; but after several hearings I am well informed that his Majesty, and my lords that attended him at the Treasury Chambers this night, have declared that Mr. Shales hath not fully made out and proved any fraud, that consequently the contract stands with the farmers, and this is looked upon by the lords of the Treasury, especially by the commissioners and farmers of the revenue of hearth money, who were thus attacked to be a considerable victory; as my Lord of Rochester and his con-commissioners were to maintain the composition made with the farmers, so there were great lords, particularly my Lord Privy Seal that backed the charge of Capt. Shales. As this matter might have grown to great heats, if any but those prudent lords had been engaged in it, so it hath of late been the theme of our town.

1683, Feb. 22nd, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (in cipher deciphered by Lord Preston).—His Majesty hath commanded me to give your lordship an account of what hath passed here in the business of Capt. Shelton. On Saturday last he gave an information to the King, being admitted to the honour of appearing before him in my office, by word of mouth, much to the same purpose with that which your lordship took from him in writing in August and September last; some things he added of more arms, in all to the number of 15,000 muskets sent into Ireland, and two millions of money that were already in Cardinal of Bouillon's hands to be sent thither in specie. This information I and Mr. Wynne took from his mouth in writing on Saturday evening and Sunday morning last. His Majesty had not leisure to enter into a consideration of all the particulars he informed of till yesterday at 9 o'clock, when he was called a second time before his Majesty, my Lord Keeper, Lord Privy Seal, and several other Lords of the Council attending; my Lord Keeper by his Majesty's order represented to him several things contradictory and indeed impossible to be true in his information, exhorted him to confess ingeniously to the King the ends he had in his own thoughts, or else the invitation and encouragement he had had from others to make such a fiction; he was conjured very earnestly to consider of his error and to retract it while it was yet time; he persisting confidently in his affirmations was bid to withdraw for some time, and being called in again, and still persisting in his assertions, my Lord Keeper told him it was his Majesty's pleasure that he should out of hand get him gone out of his royal presence and of the kingdom too, his Majesty looking upon him as a dangerous lyer and a great fourbe; 'twas further added that himself having confessed matters of high treason acted by himself, his Majesty might have justly proceeded against him capitally, but that he would not meddle with him, he having been invited over by his Majesty's direction; his complice Stepkins had orders immediately after to withdraw from Whitehall, where he had sheltered himself by reason of his debts. I was not wanting at all the times that this matter was had in debate before his Majesty to represent to him the inconveniency and indeed the uneasiness that the publishing of this thing might bring upon your lordship; then it was answered by the King, and resolved by all my lords that you had done no other then what was indispensably your duty, and his Majesty, tho' he would exagitat his whole scheme as ridiculous and absurd to the French ambassador and others as occasion did offer, yet he was resolved to justify you in the part you had had in transmitting over the information of this fellow. Your own letter to his Majesty shewing plainly that you gave no credit to what he said.

1683, Feb. 29th, Whitehall.—T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—I dare not adventure to write to you with that freedom that I could have done had I met Mr. Howart here, and so got the Chifre which you intended I should have; he was gone to York three days before I arrived, so that I must omit some things which I should have been willing to inform your lordship of. As to the gentleman whom you gave me in charge, he came safe hither with me on Friday last, and that night I carried him to the secretary's who desired me to bring him before the King in the cabinet council next day, where after he was examined I was called in and delivered your letter; they asked many questions about him and of the character he had in the world, which I answered as your lordship had ordered me. What may be clearly made out of his assertions I do not know. Mr. Secretary has spent these two days past almost in examining him, ment every particular. I received last night your lordship's letter with the enclosed copy of the memorial concerning the Scotch affair, which I showed to the Duke this morning; as to the note which I had also, Sir Andrew Forrester and I think that what you desire will be very necessary for the advancement of the business, and so we resolve to propose it. I shall not fail to let Sir James Dick know the progress you have made in it. News there are none, but we have had a report that my Lord Churchill was to be Secretary of State; they say it is grounded upon his having been learning to write lately; the King when he heard it said he was not resolved to have two idle secretaries. If I durst take upon me to advise I would say that your presence was never more for your interest here than now it would be; it is what most of your friends say 1683, April 2nd, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary is commanded upon a little service that hinders his writing to your lordship this night as he designed, nor doth he charge me with anything besides this one particular towards your lordship, viz., that my Lord of Rochester designed this night to have moved his Majesty that your lordship might have leave to come over hither for ten days about your private affairs. But so it happened that his Majesty did not come down where my lords used to meet as was expected, but that the next first opportunity will be laid hold of to move in your lordship's behalf. We know nothing as yet of the manner or degree that his Majesty intends to resent the late action of the Dutch at Bantam, which they it seems are refined enough to excuse as intended for a piece of friendship to prevent a worse thing that the young Sultan designed against the English, &c. We talk much here of the Earl of Castlehaven, Lord Lansdown, and some other lords, besides many gentlemen that intend to go as volunteers to the holy war in Hungary. Upon the death of the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Lichfield is admitted in ordinary a gentleman of the bedchamber, and the Earl of Shrewsbury and Lord Lansdown in extraordinary. Two ensigns of the guards quarrelling upon a slight occasion, the one was left dead upon the place, the other has very desperate wounds. Three idle persons vowing by way of frolic to kill the first man they met did so, and are now in Newgate. The Spaniards give out here that there is but little likelihood of their resisting the arbitrage, since M. van Benningen, who (as first burgomaster of Amsterdam) leads Holland in a string, presses it, and will gain all the states to be of his opinion; but they (the Spaniards) to save appearances would have the Pope or some other potentate to press and prevail with them at the same time.

1683, April 5th, Whitehall.—The Earl of Rochester to Lord Preston . . . I could not that evening get the opportunity of knowing the King's mind concerning your following that Court, which since his Majesty hath been pleased to command Mr. Secretary Jenkins to signify to you, and I suppose your lordship will not be troubled that you have leave first to make a step over hither, which I would advice you to lose no time in doing . . .

1683, April 12th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—I should not have troubled your lordship this night but that the Countess of Drogheda presses it very much; it is to signify to your lordship his Majesty's pleasure that you should get the privy seal that is gone out to be served upon the Lord Baron Slane of Ireland, and his brother and sister, who are now in the hands of one Morus, an Irishman in the College de Grassins at Paris. The lady is confident of your care and favour as soon as you have any signification of his Majesty's pleasure. His Majesty is likewise content that you pass an office for leave to one Petitost that works (as I remember) in enamel, to come over to England where he hath been sworn servant to our late King of blessed memory above 50 years ago.

1683, n. d. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—We have now after a great many false at last come to the knowledge of a true plot, which I here give your lordship what account I can of, fearing that from the secretary's office by reason of their great business you may have but little written by this post. Council being held at Hampton Court on Saturday last there appeared before them an oilman, whose name, as I am informed, is Kiline [Keeling]; he gave an information of a design that has been a long time on foot by the dissenting party of murdering the King and the Duke; this was first resolved by them to be executed at their coming from Newmarket, but the fire that happened there obliged the King to come away sooner than was intended, and so for that time was the great instrument of his preservation. It was to be done by a great many armed men who were to be mounted on fine horses, and all together to shout (shoot) onto the King's coach from behind a hedge; that being done, to ride straight into London where the phanaticks were ready to rise, and whither the guards could not be able to follow them closely, their horses being presumed to be almost weary before the attack; the murder was immediately to be thrown upon the Papists, and under that name most of the King's best subjects put to the sword. These designs having taken no effect at the first intended place, they have since been consulting where to effectuate them would be most convenient; they found some difficulty in their not knowing when they they should find the King and the Duke travelling together again in the same coach. This Kiline told the names of nine persons of whom he said if any could be apprehended they were able to give better information of the plot than he; but they were all fled before the messengers could be sent to apprehend them, yet there is now two of them come in by name, the one West, a counsellor at law, the other is Colonel Rumsey, formerly collector of the Customs of Bristol, and since Lieutenant Colonel to Sir Harry Goodright's regiment at its first going over to Flanders; they have all this day been giving informations, but it is not yet known who they have accused, only Algernon Sidney is one, and is just now sent to the Tower. Major Wildman is another, and is in custody. They had at the same time a design laid for seizing the Tower and several other places of strength. This conspiracy is so clearly made out that the King thinks it better for him to leave the country, and so with the Court is expected here to-morrow, it is not doubted but there will be found many great men concerned in the affair.

1683, June 21st. to Lord Preston.—On Tuesday night a horrid plot was discovered some Whigs had against the lives of the King and Duke, and two persons, one an instrument maker, the other an oilman, were seized, as also a rope maker at Wapping, and that some or one of them have confessed that a plot was laid in last March to murder the King and Duke as they came from Newmarket; that a house was hired for that purpose near Hogsdon, that the blunderbusses were prepared, and that his Majesty coming away sooner than was expected by reason of the fire there prevented it; that one Goodenough, the late Whig under-sheriff, and West, of the Temple (Colledge's lawyer) were concerned in it, who upon search, fled upon Monday night and carried away most of their precious papers, leaving for haste all their trunks and other places open: that one Col. Rumsey, an intimate of Shaftesburys, is not to be found, nor one Nelthrope and some others who were principals in it; that when they had perpetrated this most horrid deed they were to report that the Papists had done it because the Duke was coming about, and then have set on the throne whom they had a mind. This is what is commonly discoursed, for the matter being before a committee of the council, who meet constantly about it every day, is by that means kept very private. Orders have been sent to the ports for seizing the several persons fled and others suspected, and strict guard ordered to be kept here and at Windsor to prevent any danger; papers of moment (are said) also to be taken, and that the matter will be undeniably made out, which all honest men greedily wish. Yesterday the common council met, where report was made by my Lord Mayor of his Majesty's gracious reception of him and those that went with him at the presenting their petition, and how far his Majesty had condescended to them as to be willing to pardon their offence, and confirmed their charter under the restrictions then mentioned; whereupon it was proposed that his Majesty should be most humbly thanked for his gracious favour, and that they should willingly and gratefully accept thereof. This the Whigs had the impudence to oppose, but, though they strove hard, could not carry their design of destroying the charter before provision had been made for their lands, for upon the question it was carried by a majority of 18, besides the aldermen (who upon occasion pole amongst them), and of them there were 16, that would have joyfully have been for the acceptance; so it was ordered to be done, and that his lordship should with what others he should please attend his Majesty, or such as his Majesty should appoint, with this their act of acceptance, which they hope will put an end to that matter. They say the Archbishop of York is dead, that Dr. Turner, the Duke's chaplain, is made Dean of Windsor, and Judge Raymond on the mending hand, so as to be able to be on the bench. They say the French ships in the Straits have sent into Tholone and Marseills 16,000 Turks taken on board by them on board a Caricke coming from Egypt to join that Emperor's forces, but may possibly be released again, the captain that brought them in having no orders for it. Its still thought Sir Tho. Joanes will be Lord Chief Justice, tho' some yet think Sir George Jefferys.

SIR

1683, June 28th. (The same) to the same.—On Tuesday night about 10 the Lord Grey was committed to the charge of Sergeant Derham, with order forthwith to carry him to the Tower, but he (whether through simplicity or design is not yet known) let him go to a tavern, and staid with him there till next morning at 6 o'clock, then to go to bed there and speak with his friends, when carrying him in a coach (having before dismissed the guards he had ordered him for the more safe conveyance) with only himself and his lordship's servant, and falling asleep by the way, his lordship a little before he got to the Tower stepped out of the coach, and finding his guard continue in a dead sleep left him, and being pursued by a soldier seduced him and took him away with him; when the sergeant awaked he went to deliver his prisoner to the lieutenant, who finding him escaped secured the sergeant and sent him under a strong guard to Whitehall, where his Majesty, who was much vexed, sent him forth back thither again a prisoner for high treason, ordering that he should be put into the dungeon, with a resolution to punish him very severely for this dangerous neglect. The watermen that carried his lordship away and his lordship's servants were soon after taken, but his lordship's not heard of, tho' every house in London hath been searched for him. Yesterday one Major Holmes, a correspondent of Argiles, was taken, as also one Bayly, another of his creatures, as also one Sir George and Sir Alexander Campbell his relations; and this day one Monroe, and with them papers of great moment, plainly shewing the great correspondency those rebels held with ours here. The committee sat most part of yesterday and this day and examined those persons, as also Wildman, Romsey, and West, and sent the Scotch men to several prisons; and information being given last night that the Duke of Monmouth laid hid in the house of the doorkeeper of the House of Lords, a guard were sent to seize his grace (he not rendering himself as was hoped), and they raised him but very narrowly, forcing him to quit his bed and to get away over the tiles; and letters are said to be intercepted directed to Argile, who therefore seems to be in town, whereupon strict search is made after him; and this morning at a council a proclamation was ordered to issue forthwith, and will be out this evening requiring the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and Mr. Ferguson, the Scotch Anabaptist parson, who lately stole hither from Holland, forthwith to render themselves to justice, and in default thereof requiring all persons to apprehend them, with the proffer of a reward of 500*l.* for each of them whom any person shall seize, and they say that Argile will be added. This morning Trenchard, recorder of Taunton, and the chairman of the King's Head club, and as it since appears treasurer to the plotters, was taken and sent to the Tower, and this afternoon the secretary went thither to examine Coll. Sydney, to whom Argile's letters since Shaftesbury's death were directed, as also the Lord Russell, and to-morrow morning is to be another general council. Mead, the preacher in London, is fled, as also Dr. Owen, and divers others can't be heard of. All the riotters who appeared in Court have paid their fines and are discharged. Strict guards are kept at Whitehall to prevent any attempt of these villains, and all agree that never a horrid conspiracy was ever hatched or so plainly made out . . .

1683, June 28th, Whitehall.—T. Deanes to Lord Preston.— . . . Two days ago my Lord Russel was sent to the Tower. My Lord Gray was brought from the country by a messenger, and after examination, finding things clearly made out against him, and being ordered to close prison in the Tower, he made his escape on his way thither by the rogueishness of the serjeant, whose name is Dirum, and who lays now in the dungeon upon bread and water. I need write nothing of the Duke of Monmouth, the printed proclamation which no doubt will be sent you from the secretaries will inform you sufficiently about him. This I can only tell you, that these lords are not accused of the design that was now on foot of killing the King, but of an old one which was some months ago to seize him, and was rendered ineffectual by Mr. Trincard not being able to raise the 10,000 men he had promised them from the west. The gentleman is now apprehended, but it is not known what he confesseth. There is likewise a discovery made of the correspondency that is betwixt the fanatics here and them in Scotland. The great agent of the Scotch party here was one Baily, of Gerardswood [Jervis wood]; he had his credentials, and was ordered to treat with none but Algernon Sidney. He is in custody, but, after my country fanatic way, obstinate to that degree that he told the King that all the tortures that could be invented should not draw one word of a confession from him. Sir Hewh Cambel of Cesnok and his son are taken too. Commissary Munroe was just now brought in, and there is a warrant for taking Sir John Coghron, but he is not yet found. Amongst their papers there are found letters of the late Earl of Argile, wherein he gives advice that he had proposed to the brethren in England that if they would advance him 10,000*l.* sterling money he would go into Scotland and there begin the rebellion, and that they had relished the proposition so well that the money was to be paid to him before the beginning of July next. It is certainly known that Algernon Sidney sent one express to Scotland for Sir John Coghron before his coming hither last, and that there was a general rebellion agreed upon by the Whigs of both nations. I had almost forget to tell you that Mr. Hone, the joiner, is apprehended at Cambridge, and it is thought will be here this night; if he confess as it is expected it will be of great advantage, for Mr. West is so far from telling all that he knows that it is said he repents of what he has said, and thinks the name of an informer worse than of a traitor. . . .

1683, June 28th, Whitehall.—John Mounsteven to (Mr. Tempest). A short letter conveying the same news about the conspiracy as in the previous letters.

1683, June 14th, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—I am commanded by Mr. Secretary to excuse his not writing to your lordship this night, being engaged in taking certain informations which are given in to him by some of the godly party, that strive to come in to accuse their brethren, which may be reckoned one good effect of his Majesty's having judgment given for him in the quo warranto, which was done by Mr. Justice Jones on Tuesday last, my Lord Chief Justice himself being still weak and confined to his bed. I take leave to send your lordship a copy of what he spoke when he pronounced the judgment. The Common Council met this day and agreed upon an address to his Majesty, or rather a petition, wherein they do in a very humble and dejected style acknowledge their guilt and their grief for having misgoverned the city for these late years. They thank the King for his grace and mercy to them in their distressed condition for not commanding the judgment against the charter to be entered, and do make the most solemn promise of behaving themselves as they ought for the future, in case his Majesty shall be graciously pleased to take them one more into his royal favour; and a committee of above 14 aldermen and commoners are to present it to his Majesty. To-morrow the London rioters come to be fined in Westminster Hall; some of them are said to be withdrawn, and to be content to forfeit their recognoizances of 500*l.* My Lord Gray comes amongst the rest. We hear no further of Prince George; the yachts are fallen down the river this day and are to sail to Gluckstadt. The Earls of Arundel and Feversham and Lord Churchill are said to be on board to receive the Prince from their Majesties and his Royal Highness. The confederate ministers have given in to his Majesty a second set of memorials, pressing his Majesty in something clearer terms to accept of the mediation. They were given in at Windsor, and Mr. Secretary hath not yet received any copies of them.

1683, June 28th, Whitehall. Sam. de Paz and E. Chute to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary has commanded us to write to your lordship and give you the best account we can of what has passed here since the last your lordship had from his hand. Coll. Algernon Sydney, my Lord Russell, and Major Wildman are all committed to the Tower, and some Scotchmen to the Gatehouse, for high treason. My Lord Grey was committed, but he made his escape out of the hands of a serjeant-at-arms at the Tower gate before he had delivered him to the lieutenant. The serjeant was found to be in fault, and was committed in his place. A proclamation is coming out for the apprehending of the Duke of Monmouth, my Lord Grey, Sir Thomas Armstrong, and Mr. Ferguson, with offer of 500*l.* for each. They are said to be fled northward in order to get into Scotland if they can. There are none of those mentioned in the proclamation before taken but Hone the joiner. Mr. Attorney General has order from his Majesty to prepare the evidence for the bringing of the persons charged to a speedy trial; what will be the issue we shall be very glad to acquaint your lordship if Mr. Secretary's pleasure be to confer that honour on yours, &c.

1683, July 2nd, Whitehall. S. de Paz to Lord Preston. Mr. Secretary commands me to give your lordship his most humble service, and to tell you that the continual toil about the further examining into this horrid conspiracy still disenables him from writing this post to your lordship. God be thanked, the pains which his Majesty and his ministers have taken have succeeded so well in the discovery of the whole matter that his Majesty is now out of danger. The day appointed for trials is next Wednesday comes sennight. West the lawyer was sent yesterday to Newgate; he hath been so busy a manager of the villainy that I believe he will not escape justice. There have been a couple of little field guns found in Major Wildman's house, which would have been of good use to scour the streets in case of resistance. 'Tis said the 4 great conspirators made their escape in a small vessel from Sussex.

1683, July 9th, Whitehall. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—. . . It so happened that the last week was altogether taken up with the examinations of people of lesser note, of which there are a great many committed, whose names I need not give you the trouble of now matters begin to rise again. A little after the account came of the taking of Rumbold. Mr. Walcot was taken here; the former was at Exeter and is not yet brought to town, but Walcot has been before the counsel, and tho' he there owned in general the design of murdering the King, he could not be prevailed upon to name anybody concerned in it, saying that he was satisfied to die for it himself but would never be brought to be an accuser; yet after he was ordered to be committed he desired to speak to the King in private. It is thought that it is upon what discovery he made in secret that this morning my Lord Howard, of Elserick, was apprehended, who has been most part of this day before the counsel giving informations, as we conjecture, thinking that way to save himself; and it is generally believed that he is the accuser of my Lord Brandon, who is committed to the Tower, and at the same time with him Mr. Hamden. There are warrants out for several other great men, but their names are as yet concealed. Mr. Dupas has promised me that he will write as far of them as the Secretary will venture to tell him by this night's post to Mr. Tempest. . . .

1683, July 19th, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Having made an excursion to wait of my Lord Churchill as far as Holstein, I know not with what countenance I can after such an omission presume now to write to excuse Mr. Secretary to your lordship; and in truth he never wanted your lordship's favour and forbearance as much as at this time that this horrid plot hath found all the King's ministers work more than enough, tho' it's to be feared they have not yet crushed it, tho' my Lord Russell is to be beheaded the 21st in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and Captain Walcott, Rouze, and Hone are to die at Tiburne to-morrow. There is no tidings as yet of the Duke of Monmouth or those mentioned in the same proclamation. There are about 150 warrants already issued out, tho' not a third part yet taken; the King's serjeants and messengers are scarce competent for the work, and every day produceth still new matters. You lordship will expect I should give you some account of the Prince and his voyage, which was of seven days, and somewhat stormy. There passed all the demonstrations of affection between the King his brother and him at their departure, the King having accompanied him to Gluckstadt, whence he returned in all haste to view the French squadron which arrived in the Z . . . The next day after that the Court departed from Copenhagen. There comes over with the Prince three councillors, the Sieur Buckwald (who hath also the character of ambassador, tho' he'll avoid the making use of it), Gersdorff, the master of ceremonies, and one Schael, who will go nigh to work out Mr. Leuthe, the now Danish Envoyé here, and to continue in his stead. By the next your lordship may possibly receive the sentiments of our Court touching the Prince, but I think nobody could please better and more universally in one afternoon than he hath done. There were several councils of war held during may Lord Churchill's stay in the Court of Denmark (especially upon the surprising news which came from Vienna), and the Comte de Roy assisted at them; tho' no perfect account can be had of their resolutions, yet Major General Duncan was commanded away this day sennight to draw a body of foot together as if there were a design of possessing themselves of Lubeck, Wismar, or some such place. Tho' the Dane hath 20 or 25,000 men good troops, yet the irresolution of Brandenburg and the forces of the Princes of Lunenburg are most certainly a great check to their designs.—P.S. Lord Churchill's present from the King of Denmark is a sword set with diamonds and a ring of about 5 or 600*l.* in all.

1683, Aug. 6th, Whitehall.—The same to the same.—

Mr. Secretary being not returned this evening from Windsor, I dare not promise that he will write to your lordship. I take leave to send your lordship the trials as Mr. Tempest directed, tho' the postage will be considerable. I send your Lordship also two answers to my Lord Russell's pretended paper; one is L'Estrange's, and the other supposed to be Dr. Brady's; there are some others come out; these are reputed the most solid. Charlton and Casteers mentioned in the King's declaration are taken; the first would become an informer to save his own hide, yet he confessed but trifles hitherto (as that he paid Oates 80*l.* per quarter, knew of contributions, &c.), but he hath time to recollect himself and to give in his ultimate confession. Casteers is not yet examined. We do not expect any more trials till the judges be returned from their circuit. My Lord Dartmouth is gone down to Portsmouth to command his Majesty's squadron now designed out for the Mediterranean. There are those among us that form to themselves several surmises from his expedition, and have no ground for them; but because his lordship goes not, and the Duke of Grafton, who is come back from the Downs, and that it appears by the number of ships and provisions on board that he goes to Tanger at least, and not to survey the western coast and the isles of Jersey and Guernsey, as was given out. We are here in expectation of the fate of Vienna and of what the Emperor will resolve upon M. de Crecy's last manifesto and his proposal of concluding a 30 years' cessation before the end of August.

1683, Aug. 13th, Windsor.—W. Bridgeman to Lord Preston.—The Imperial Minister here having received an express from his master with a letter to his Majesty, I send your lordship enclosed a copy of the same and of the King's answer. The States General have empowered their ambassador, Mons^r. Citters, to adjust the Bantam affair, but though they pretend to be ready to agree to what his Majesty can reasonably expect, I do not find he has orders yet to consent to the demand of yielding the fort at Bantam and putting it in our possession, without which the King has declared he will not be satisfied, nor consent that our company should proceed to adjust the point of the damages they have sustained by the Dutch when they took Bantam and obliged the English factors to leave the place with all the effects of the company. I do believe the Dutch will not be brought easily to consent the fort should be put into our hands, but the King positively insists upon it, and the company are fitting a considerable fleet, which will consist of 9 good men-of-war besides several smaller frigates to assist the old King of Bantam against his son and the Dutch, and endeavour to drive them out of the place if they will not fairly restore it.

1683, Aug. 27th, Whitehall. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—The reason why I write so seldom to your lordship is that I am unwilling to trouble you either with trifles or such news as I can easily imagine you may have a fuller and truer account of from Mr. Secretary's office. But now that there is something relating to the affairs of Scotland worthy of your knowledge I thought it my duty to give your lordship what information I can of them; and though I am not to beg of you to make the King's proclamation which is here enclosed a secret, yet I shall entreat that the reasons for it may not be known as coming from me. Your lordship will think it strange that by this proclamation, bearing date the 16th of Aug., a Parliament should be adjourned (for we have no such term as prorogation) which was to have met on the 10th of July last, and to have been then or before that time adjourned. To give your lordship a full account of this business I must tell you that my Lord Chancellor, some months ago, wrote to the Duke desiring that he would obtain his Majesty's order for a proclamation to adjourn the Parliament, but did not write to either of the secretaries to desire them to put his Highness in mind of it (neglecting them in this as he does in all other things). The Duke (as it was almost impossible it should be otherways), having so much business wholly forgot the thing, so that the time for the adjournment was elapsed before it was thought of; upon which my Lord Chancellor and the Lords of the Privy Council wrote up to the King telling him that since the Parliament had not met on the appointed day, nor had been adjourned by proclamation before the time prefixed for their meeting, it was of itself dissolved. When this letter came to his Majesty and that the business was advised here with the secretaries, it was thought very strange that my Lord Chancellor and the other able lawyers who are of the Privy Council should have been of this opinion, seeing there is no statute relating to the case; neither is it known that ever there was any precedent for it: especially it was wondered that they, upon small or no grounds, would advance an opinion so very destructive of the King's prerogative, whose positive order only and not any neglect of his can dissolve a Parliament. This was used as an argument against the Lords of the Privy Council, that if the not adjourning the Parliament at the ordinary times did ipso facto dissolve it, then it would at any time be in the power of a faction to dissolve a loyal Parliament by seizing the packet or messenger by whom the King sends his orders for the adjournment. These reasons were thought so strong that the King ordered this enclosed proclamation; but it is thoroughly believed that when they are once met that discontented people may have nothing to object; they will be then dissolved and another called 1683, Oct. 1st, Whitehall. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—This cypher enclosed should have gone away on Thursday, but I was hindered to finish it. Your letter of the 2nd current came not to hand till yesterday. You will be abundantly justified by his Majesty in that you combat and confute the surmise that is set on foot there of a ligue, offensive and defensive, betwixt this Crown and France. His Majesty finds it will be for his service that Bomenie I writ you off be lookt out and sent over hither, therefore it is my humble request to your lordship that you spare no reasonable costs to find him out and send him over. I send your lordship a transcript of the Spanish ambassador's memorials which were given in at Winchester; his Excellency hath not yet any answer upon them.

SIR
F. GRAHAM

1683, Oct. 1. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—I shewed your separate letter of the 29th, as soon as I had decyphered it, to his Majesty alone (the rest of the letter is in cypher, but on the other half of the paper is—"The effect of the foregoing cypher.") He commanded me to return you this answer, that it is a mistake if any hath said that he hath written into Portugal in favour of the young Prince of Parma's interests, and his Majesty gives you leave to assure the Prince of Condé that his Majesty is not capable of doing a thing disobliging or prejudicial to the Prince's house, having always retained a just sense of the friendship and respect that the Prince hath always had for his Majesty. I may add of my own knowledge that Mr. Fanshaw hath the King's command (for I conveyed it to him) to be assistant what he could to M. de St. Romain when he should come thither in favour of his applications for the Prince de la Roche sur yon; and I find by the last letters from Lisbon that Mr. Fanshawe had already received that direction of his Majesty.

1683, Oct. 4th, Whitehall. O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary being confined to his chamber all this day, and not able to write by reason of an indisposition that seizeth him this time a year, hath commanded me to beg your lordship's excuse and to let you know that the letters which should have come yesterday are not yet arrived. On Tuesday there was a Common Council in the city, which sat very late, and the question of surrendering up their charter being put, it was carried in the negative by near 80 voices; this was matter of great triumph to the Whigs, who upon this occasion shewed themselves in as great numbers and as insolent as they have done any time these three years; and, to add to their insolence, would have had Sir James Edwards and some of the King's best friends to carry up the result of the Common Council to his Majesty, but that these gentlemen had courage and loyalty enough to refuse them. Next morning, that is yesterday, his Majesty ordered Mr. Attorney General to enter up the judgment which was given last term against the charter, which was done accordingly; and this day his Majesty in Council was pleased to cause the same Lord Mayor to be new sworn with the title by commission, as also the two sheriffs and a new recorder, who is Sir Thomas Jenner, a councillor and an exchequer practitioner, who is a very loyal zealous gentleman. The city is now to be governed by the Lord Mayor, 2 sheriffs, recorder, and such justices of the peace as my Lord Keeper shall think fit, whereof all the judges and King's council, and several of the old aldermen, are to become. All this change is so far from disheartening the Whigs that they seem to reckon it a victory in that they have been able to force the King.

1683, Oct. 4, Whitehall. The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston.—The King being given to understand that Dr. Burnet is very busy in France, and introduced in all companys, his Majesty believes it is not understood upon what terms he was here, when he went away, and how factious he is; and therefore his Majesty would have your discomfite him all you can, by letting the ministers and others as occasion may offer know that his Majesty looks upon him as a very ill man, and of very dangerous principles to his Government; and that therefore his Majesty cannot take it well to have any countenance of favour shown him, but, on the contrary, is persuaded that when the character of the man is known he will be treated as he deserves. The King has caused judgment to be entered this day against the charter of London, and by his commission constituted Sir William Pritchard to be Lord Mayor, and Mr. Daniell and Mr. Dashwood sheriffs, intending likewise to appoint the judges and several citizens to be justices of the peace within the districts of the libertys of the city to preserve all things in quiet.

1683, Oct. 8th, Whitehall. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—I have endeavoured to find out Sir Thomas Chicheley's age and to know the condition of his health, as your lordship had ordered me, and am now certainly informed that he is threescore and ten years old, but as vigorous and healthy as most men of his age, only sometimes troubled with the gout I can give your lordship no other news from Scotland, but that there are here at present seven or eight and twenty Earls and Lords from thence, besides the King's Advocate and the Treasurer Depute, most of them with horrid complaints against the Chancellor, and now his Court begins so much to decay that already many things are carried here against him; he hopes to save himself by my Lord Huntley's interest, and for that end is gone to engage him to make a journey hither, which it is thought he will begin as soon as his lady is brought to bed, that is about two months hence. My Lord, the business of the Scotch privileges is again set on foot here, partly upon the account of poor Mrs. Colvil (whom I hope your lordship will mind as soon as you have the King's order); it is already come so great a length that the King's Advocate has drawn a memorial, which was read two days ago in the Scotch council (for there are eleven of their number here), the King being present, by which his Majesty was humbly desired to give power to your lordship to treat in this affair; it was approved of in Council, and ordered, with his Majesty's commands, to be transmitted to you. I read it last night, but durst say nothing against it here, yet to your lordship I may venture to say that I was ashamed that such a piece of nonsense should have passed in such an assembly. Your lordship will see how little any of them understood the Droit D'Aubaine. I intend to wait upon the Advocate the morrow, to let him know that your lordship wants neither power nor will to act in the business of privileges in general, having that amongst your instructions, and having already gone so far in our privileges as to give in a memorial about them; but that they can expect no success unless they endeavour to obtain a letter from the King to the French King concerning that business, and follow the methods which your lordship has already laid down, which they cannot but approve of as the most rational. P.S. My Lord Drum Lenerick [Drumlanrig] and his brother are just come into my chamber, and desire me to present their humble service to your lordship.

1683, Oct. 8th, Whitehall. Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston.—(L.S.) The French letters of the 9th and the 13th came not till late yesterday to hand, tho' my Lord of Dunbarton hath been arrived here these five or six days, having passed from Calais to Greenwich in 12 hours; he brought us the news of the King of Portugal's death, and yesterday the Portugal letters of the 3rd Sept, confirmed it. The measures here for going into mourning for that King and brother-in-law are under consideration. His Majesty is gone this morning very early for Newmarket, having settled a new Lord Mayor by his Commission, I mean Sir William Pritchard, who was the old Lord Mayor as long as the old Corporation subsisted; he settled, likewise, the sheriffs that were elected about a month ago by his Royal Commission. He made one Mr. Jenner Recorder, and has given his Royal Commission to 18 of the old aldermen to be Justices of the Peace, Administrators of the London Hospitals, and Governors of the Court of Orphans. There being by this new constitution eight of the aldermen set aside (they being perfect Whigs), there are eight of the most substantial and honest commoners chosen to supply their place. This has been done with all the easiness and smoothness in the world, and the Londoners do find—sol occubuit nos nulla secuta est. As this affair does, by God's blessing, give great ease and security to the Government, so it puts it out of a great pain to find (at least so we hope it) that there is a disposition in Flanders, on the French side, to withdraw from the tendency they were in to hostilities, but the confirmation of this we must expect from your lordship, which I pray God to send, and that right may be done to our master as to the share he hath in these pacific motions.

GRAHAM,
BART.

1683, Oct. 11th, Whitehall. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston.—I have been all this evening taken up with letters from Tanger, where my Lord Dartmouth arrived the 14th of the last month. His fleet is in very good health, and the garrison in very good heart. My business was this evening to transmit an account of both to his Majesty at Newmarket. The business of the city goes on as calmly and orderly as can be wished. The Spanish ambassador, before his Majesty went, desired that the exactions of the French might be represented unto him as they lie in those taxation rolls that he gave in; he likewise desired that the King would give him an answer to several memorials (three in all) of his about the invasions of the French; this being pressed just as his Majesty was taking his journey, the ambassador had no answer but that he was straightened in time to enter into any deliberation of that matter for the present. I must beg leave to mind your lordship still of Bomenie.

1683, Oct. 15th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston. (Holograph.) 'Tis not yet certain what day his Majesty will leave Newmarket upon, but Saturday next is talked on. We are four ordinary's behind from Flanders, and your Wednesday letters, which were due on Saturday, are not yet come to hand. We have no more yet of my Lord Dartmouth than that he arrived safely before Tanger the $\frac{1}{4}$ of the last month. Sir Andrew Forster brought me the enclosed by the Duke's command to have it transmitted to your lordship. I suppose your lordship hath it from a better hand than mine how to enter upon the offices that you are to pass in pursuance of this memorial. I must take leave to insert the name Bomenie into this close.

1683, Oct. 22nd, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary being very much indisposed of late and not able to write this day hath commanded me to return your lordship thanks for the honour of your letter of the $\frac{1}{7}$, which was read last night at the Committee of Foreign Affairs . . . We are extremely alarmed here at the proceedings in Flanders lest those sharp skirmishes which pass by way of reprisals between both parties should break out into open war. The Flanders letters come in this day say they are renewed again by Mons^r. de Humieres upon new orders he lately received, and that he was bid to expect yet further orders when Mons^r. Tilladet should return from England. We hear nothing as yet of his arrival nor of the commission he is to come upon. The Spanish ambassador gives in fresh complaints every post; his papers are very large, and but duplicates of what Mr. Secretary doubts not your lordship meets with there, and therefore gives me no orders to trouble your lordship with any but his two letters which go here enclosed. There seems to be a very great struggle at this time in the Councils of Holland, Amsterdam (it seems) opposing the new levies of 16,000 men, and being against the sending of any more troops or the employing of any at all in Flanders; it cannot be long ere they come to some formal resolution. The Court went yesterday into deep mourning for King Alphonso, and is to continue so (they say) three months, and as long in second mourning.

1683, Oct. 22nd, Whitehall.—The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston.—I have received your lordship's letter of the 20th of this month, s. n., in answer to mine I sent you by his Majesty's command concerning Doctor Burnett, which I have acquainted his Majesty with, who approves of what you have done therein, and (in case D. Burnett makes any longer stay in France) would have you continue to discountenance him as much as in you lies.

1683, Oct. 25th, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston. (In cipher, deciphered by Lord Preston.) All the accounts I can get of Bomeny is that some months ago there came one of that name of France, and left his horses at Diep, whence he took a companion over with him that had lodged at Madame La Brier, near the French ordinary mentioned in your lordship's letter of the $\frac{1}{7}$ instant, and departed hence about three months ago, ordering his horse to meet him at Calais; that he was said to be the only surviving son of a considerable family in France, of what province is not known, and that he is a handsome man; his landlord says there were letters came for him by the score about 10 days ago, but they were returned to the post; his companion's name is not known.

1683, Oct. 29th, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord

Preston.—Mr. Secretary continueth still indisposed, and hath not been out of his chamber, scarce out of his bed, these 8 days; nor will the doctor suffer him to come abroad so soon, tho' we hope he is upon the recovering hand; he commands me to return your lordship his most humble service and thanks for your three letters of the $\frac{30}{10}$, which came to hand on Friday night, two of them (your public and private one about the extraordinaries) were put into my Lord Sunderland's hands and read, the third Mr. Secretary pockets till he can be able to come abroad, which we hope may be in two days' time; however, the report about the turn is that whether he recovers or no he is not long to be Secretary, but that Mr. Godolphin is to be. His Majesty was as well pleased with this day as he hath been with any Lord Mayor's day of a good while, and tho' his Majesty did not think fit to be present at the city entertainment, yet he was pleased to give his lordship and all the city companies particular marks of his satisfaction (by waving his hat) as they passed by, and tho' they had but short time for preparing, yet they seemed in all things to exceed rather than come short of former years. Aron Smith was fined 500*l.*, and is to be stand in the pillory to-morrow at Westminster, and next week at the Exchange; he is also to suffer imprisonment till his fine be paid, and to be a year of the good behaviour, and this for a seditious paper of instructions which he put into College's hand at Oxford. Several of our great men in the Tower for this last plot have moved and entered their prayer to be bailed or tried; some of them (as Algernon Sidney) were taken at their word and bid to prepare for their trial. The Spanish ambassador presseth very hard for an answer to the memorials he gave in lately touching his Majesty's executing his Treaty, or, in their meaning, his actual entering into the war; but he hath as yet received no other answer than that the letters he writes are read to his Majesty, tho' his Majesty hath not thought fit to give any answer upon them at present. He attacks Mr. Secretary daily with his billets, the rather for that, being indisposed as he is, he hopes to draw something from him in writing.

1683, Oct. 29th, Whitehall.—Jo. Cooke to Mr. Tempest.—You will excuse my brevity, not only because I have very little news to write, but because I am this day engaged to see my Lord Mayor's show, for you must know that altho' the city's charter be forfeited, yet his Majesty by his royal power keeps up the forms and supports the strength of the authority and ancient usages of London. Sir Henry Tulse (the next man to the chair, as they phrase it,) is by commission under the Great Seal made Lord Mayor for the ensuing year, comes to Westminster Hall to be sworn at the Exchequer Bar, treats the Lords of the Privy Council, the Aldermen, his brethren, &c., and does all other things as splendidly and magnificently as any of his predecessors have done. It is said Col. Algernon Sidney will be speedily brought to his trial at the King's Bench bar; but what will be done with the other prisoners, or when they shall be tried, I hear not. P.S. I pray present the enclosed paper for M. le Vasseur to my Lord Preston, and tell his lordship that the Queen will take his lordship's good offices for the doctor as a service done to her Majesty . . .

1683, Oct. 29th. O. Wynne to Mr. (Tempest).— . . . You have all the news from Mr. Cooke, at least more than I know, unless I should give you a description of my Lord Mayor's day, which I think was not inferior to that of any former year; tho' they had not competent time to provide a Guildhall dinner, there was none, but the companies at their respective halls feasted exceedingly, and have scarce yet finished, and a great many Whigs rather than lose the share of a good dinner put in to. Aron Smith shews upon the pillory to-morrow before Westminster Hall, and next week at the Old Exchange; he is fined also 500*l.*, and imprisonment till paid, with a year's good behaviour, and all this for the paper he put into his Christ College's hand at Oxon. The Whigs in the Tower move for their trial or to be bailed; his Majesty gave some of them notice to prepare for the first; Algernon Sidney will be one of the first.

1683, Nov. 5th, Whitehall.—O. Wynne to Lord Preston.—Mr. Secretary commands me to return his humble thanks for your lordship's letter of the 10th, n. st., which came this evening, and was read at the committee . . . We are three posts wanting from Flanders, and have no account of the proceedings there since the taking of Courtray. The Spanish ambassador hath been very pressing for an answer to his memorials, and yesterday he gave in another of an odd tenor, which will procure him an answer; such as it is it will be delivered him by word of mouth to-morrow; it will be mixt with something of reprimand for his unmannerlyness in pressing the King at this juncture to enter into a foreign war when there is a dangerous conspiracy against him at home, and will bear upon him particularly for the harshness of his memorial of yesterday, which I am apt to think will not be published, at least till it be answered. There lies an indictment before the grand jury against Algernon Sidney, and they deliver in their verdict to-morrow. All the Scotch that have been yet depreheended to be concerned in this plot are shipped away for Scotland in order to be tried there, tho' they would have rather undergone it anywhere else. 'Tis begun to be discoursed again that your lordship is to be removed thence and to go into Spain with the same character. I do not find your successor named, nor do I think there is any ground for the surmise, since Mr Secretary told me he new nothing of it, yet several have asked me about it, and among others Coll. Graham. . . .

1683, Nov. 12th, Whitehall. The same to the same.—Mr. Secretary had nothing worth the sending your lordship this night, yet he would have writ to acknowledge your lordship's letter of the 7th, but that he hath been all this evening upon a long dispatch to Tanger, and another to Portugal. On the 10th arrived here Dr. Trumball from my Lord Dartmouth with letters of the 19th past, which speak of the readiness all matters were in for the blowing up that place, all the mines and founaux being laid and prepared; that there was an universal joy among all the inhabitants, as well as soldiers, for his Majesty's seasonable resolution and care of them in their persons and properties; but that the Moors, having smelt somewhat of the design, were drawing down in great bodies, yet my Lord Dartmouth was in good hopes of being able to secure his retreat, as well as to execute his design. We have two ships already arrived in the Downs with the testes in the garrison. Your lordship will hear from others hands I doubt not of the Grand Prior's being banished the Court by his Majesty's command; he was sent to depart the kingdom in twice 24 hours; he knew no better way than to obey, tho' 'tis said he would have had W. W. [William Williams] his opinion in the point, who told him he knew nothing in law that hindered the King from expelling a Frenchman. And applying himself to the Spanish ambassador for his pass, had it, and is crossed over to the Brill in Holland. What his misdemeanour was your lordship will know from better hands, but it is said to be not for his modesty, but for a little freedom he would have used in his maniere d'agir at the end of the gallery, and that it was at the complaint of a great lady.

1683, Nov. 28th, London (holograph).—Lord Halifax to Lord Preston.—If Mr. Tempest had given me longer warning I should have enlarged myself more and made the full use of so good an opportunity. I agree with your lordship by my observation that France hath really no mind to the war, and will never forgive the Prince of Orange for doing that which they call forcing them into it . . . the thing I would be informed of by your lordship in this case is, whether by your observations of the temper of that Court they might not be prevailed with to restore what they have taken, and to quit their groundless claims in Flanders, provided it be done at our King's importunity, for the better grace and to save the appearances. This would go very much against the stomach of such a mighty conqueror, and yet if the effect of doing it might be the making Spain and Holland less warm in pursuing the interests of Germany when their own were provided for, and by that means let France be at more liberty to make their party good in that part of the world, it would perhaps be no ill bargain to them. Pray let me know your private opinion, whether such a thing is possible in the case above mentioned. Your lordship hath, I suppose, had an account of the late disorders in the lower end of the gallery from those who have more skill than I have in things of that kind. I lament that so much noise was made in the manner of it, and wonder the great men who had a part in managing that matter did not use more dexterity to have things done with tenderness and silence, and to avoid the occasion of all the indecent discourses the world is full of upon this subject, which would have lasted much longer if a few things had not happened that draweth every body's thoughts towards it; it is the Duke of Monmouth's being received again and pardoned. You may imagine what oppositions must be made to it before it was done, and what inferences drawn from it afterwards; things of this kind are ever thought mysteries, and deep reasons must be assigned for that which was so little expected;

but I believe there is no more in it than this, that nature hath prevailed, and the father forgot what he had committed against the King, by a distinction between his natural and his politique capacity: he hath made an entire submission, and to the Duke too, and it is to be presumed that after having recovered such a fall he will no more put himself in the danger of a relapse, for which no cure can reasonably be expected. As this is sufficiently talked of here I do not doubt but reflections are made upon it at Paris. I desire therefore your nicest observation of all the discourses relating to this business, since they may be of great use to yourself as well as a satisfaction to me; these collateral things may give great lights to the main business, and the disturbance they may receive by any considerable alteration in our Court may perhaps, in spite of their secrecy, give you a window into their scheme, so that you may gather by rational inferences more than they would ever think fit to impart to you. This may be an occasion for your lordship to talk with all your French acquaintance round as soon as you can, that you may have their first reflections, and not give them time to consider what they should tell and what they should conceal from you. My curiosity to be informed in this or any thing else is not so great as to desire an account except it be conveyed by a safe hand. (7 pp.)

1683, Nov. 29, Whitehall. The Earl of Rochester to Lord Preston . . . We are at this time making a new provision for your entertainment, and will from time to time do all that is possible to preserve your credit in the King's service.

1683, December 10th, Whitehall. L. Jenkins to Lord Preston. In my last I promised your lordship some account of our great domestic incident then depending; you will easily call to mind what account the Gazette of this day fortnight gave of the Duke of Monmouth's being received by his Majesty into grace and favour again; which was no sooner done, but the party made it their business to expose what was said in that Gazette as false, and the Duke of Monmouth himself treated it as injurious to him. Though what is in the Gazette was first read to and approved of by his Majesty and the Lords, the decrying of the Gazette and indeed of the conspiracy itself was so openly done that the King thought it necessary that the Duke of Monmouth should give some public testimony against it, by letter to his Majesty declaring that he did not go about to discredit the evidence against those that have died for the conspiracy, but should so far own his guilt in the conspiracy as to say expressly he was sorry for his having had any share in it, not that he was charged with any part of the conspiracy which concerned his Majesty's life, but in the other part of it, that is, the insurrection. His Majesty endeavoured to win the Duke of Monmouth to own thus much to the world since he had owned much more in private to him and the Duke. But his Majesty not prevailing upon him, he sent Mr. Vice-Chamberlain to him on Friday morning to forbid him his presence and to command him out of the Court. The single thing that I would observe to your lordship is this, that we owe this resolution to no man's counsels, but to his Majesty's own firmness, and tho' his tenderness was very great, yet he suffered it not to prevail against what he owes to his lawful successors and his dutiful subjects.* Sir Sam. Bernardiston and his apprentice were taken up this evening and examined for writing seditious false news to Ipswich about this business of the Duke of Monmouth. He may chance to have a sound fine set upon his head. He is at present in custody, but a hab corpus will fetch him out. He was the cause that I had not time to write what is above with my own hand.

1683, Dec. 17, Whitehall. W. Blathwayt to Lord P. Says that the King had made him Sec^y. at War. Asks Lord P. to send over any printed books and MSS. Orders, Rules, Discipline, Fortifications, Plans of Towns, &c.

1683, January 21st, Whitehall.—L. Jenkins to Lord Preston (holograph). At the Committee of Foreign Affairs of yesterday I had no letter from within my department to produce, the great frost was the cause of it. What they say here of a flake of ice now floating in the Downs, that is seven miles long and one mile over, is not called to question, his Majesty and H.R.H. admitting it for a truth. The first expectation from the Hague is to see the conferences intended once formed, the second is to see the effects of them. We hear nothing still from my Lord of Dartmouth, the victualling ships are long since come to him.

* The remainder of the letter is in Jenkins' own hand.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

SIR
GRAHAM,
BART.

1683, Feb. 11th, Whitehall.—The same to the same. On Saturday the ninth about 2 o'clock came in from your lordship no fewer than seven packets, you will easily imagine they were after so long an interruption very welcome. They were of the 22nd, 26th, 29th, 30th Jan., and of the 2nd, 5th, and 12th current, n. s. They were all read last night at the committee; I have observed in them two or three things whereof I am to give you an account. In the Hudson's Bay business your diligence is very well approved of, and his Royal Highness being governor of the company does concern himself in the affair, yet all that was resolved last night was that [a] copy should be given to Sir James Hayes (the deputy governor) of the Boston man's petition to De la Barre. Secondly, a copy of your memorial. Thirdly, an extract out of your letters of those answers that Mons^r. de Seignelay gave upon your several instances. You may please in your next to let me know how authentic you judge the copy of Gillain's petition to be, for his Majesty considers not only the several violences as are alleged in fact, but the restitution awarded him of his ship, &c. by De la Barre; therefore I offer it to your lordship's consideration to inform yourself as particular as you can what the law is in those French territories, and whether by those laws De la Barre could have given the master his liberty and his ship too, after he had built a house and a fort upon a territory of the French, if the possession of it had been quiet, and not acquired by the surprise and force mentioned in the petition. Methinks the restitution made by De la Barre makes for us, but how to put it into argument, and consequently to cut off the delays intended by the answers given you, must be left to your lordship's prudence in applying the law of the plantations (as you shall find it to be there) to this fact of De la Barre in the case of Gillain; more of this you will receive the next post from Sir James Hayes.—(The rest of the letter is in cipher, the last few lines of which only are deciphered.) I thought to have told you something of Mr. Chudleigh's negotiation, but his Majesty doth me the honour to tell me just now that France doth offer the truce to Spain that it hath already offered to the Empire. His Majesty looks upon this as an overture of great moderation from the most Christian King, and the Spaniards will be very much wanting to themselves if they do not close with it.

1683, Feb. 11th, London.—The Earl of Carlisle to Lord Preston. . . . P.S. The only news here is that this day the Lord Danby, Lord Bellasis, Lord Powes, and Lord Arundale of Warder was bailed at King's Bench bar, and Mr. Hamblen being convicted for misdemeanor is fined 40,000*l*.

1683, Feb. 11th, Tang^{er}. Roads.—Lord Dartmouth to Lord Preston (holograph). I have been in these parts near this five months upon a toilsome work in destroying of Tangeire, which is now, God be thanked, fully performed, in so much that I am sure none can make it useful to them, at least in our age; and, indeed, the King hath been these many years deceived, for the place neither was nor could be ever made considerable. I am now preparing to go home with all the speed I can, and I hope to receive your commands next at London; as to all the particulars of this transaction I refer myself to Mr. Nicholson, who pray do me the favour to hasten forward all that possibly you can.

1683, Feb. 18th, Whitehall.—H. Bulstrode to Lord Preston.—He asks Lord Preston to permit the bearer, his relation and friend, to accompany him to see the French Court.

1683, Feb. 25th, London (holograph). The Marquis of Halifax to Lord Preston.—I have yours by Mr. Innis, and lost no time in obeying the first part of your directions to me, which was to press the payment of what is due to you. The King seemed very sensible of it, and promised to speak effectually, which I hear since hath had a good effect I must tell you there were such frequent discourses of recalling you that I myself was so far alarmed at it as to sound the King, who I found had not the least thought of it, but I will not answer for others, that they might not have it in their mind, and perhaps still keep it there; report having named your successor, viz., Mr. Soames, who is well with those that have credit, &c., but if I mistake not will hardly be able with all the interest he can make to supplant you otherwise than by your own desire.

1683, March 10th, Whitehall.—Sir L. Jenkins to L^d. Preston.—(1 p. of cipher deciphered by Mr. Tempest.) I have nothing to trouble you with this post, for we know little of what is done in Holland, since Mr. Chudleigh's letter thence goes straight to Newmarket.

and no duplicates are sent hither to be communicated to my Lords that are stayed behind. We find by Sir Rich. Bulstrode's letter that the Marq. of Grana doth promise to himself very great succours from Holland, and that the Prince will be in the head of those forces if the war doth go on, and in Flanders they further report that Amsterdam will come at last to the bent of the Prince.—His Majesty and the Duke continue to enjoy their healths perfectly well at Newmarket, tho' the weather be very cold. We still want your Wednesday mail. Sir James Hayes is with me often for an answer from that side to your lordship's memorial.

1683, March 24th, Whitehall.—The same to the same. I have yours of the 13th and 19th to acknowledge; they were both produced, the one yesterday and the other this day, before his Majesty in the committee, and it was no unwelcome news that there was a courier gone from the Emperor to Madrid upon so good an errand; that news came from several hands, and even the Nuncio at Lintz is said to have writ it to him at Paris, yet Mons^r. de Barillon doth not own any such news in his letters. Your lordship doth a great charity to appear for the poor Irishman who is brought up from Ramsgate. We have heard here of the violence used upon him, but have had no depositions from him, nor other materials to furnish to a memorial; nor is that the least needful to be had from hence, where your general instructions and the King's honour and interest is concerned. You'll receive here enclosed a petition of Hudson's Bay Company; the King recommends it earnestly to your Lordship, and you'll easily believe his Royal Highness, both as governor of the company and well-wisher to our national interest there, doth the same. You'll please to consider the prayer in the petition, which is that the most Christian King would give his orders to his subjects to withdraw from those places they have usurped upon us, and to give the governor of Canada strict orders that all violences and royes de fait be abstained from as contrary to the meaning of the two Kings and to the strict amity that is between them. You will please to offer that the company will charge themselves with conveying and delivering such orders to the governors in those parts, if our friends may be entrusted with them. Mons^r. Citters delivered late on Sunday night a very long memorial by way of reply to his Majesty's answer to a former memorial of his about the truce. . . .

1683, March 29th, Whitehall.—The same to the same. (1½ pp. of cipher deciphered).—I received yours of the 1st of April, wherein you point the precise day of that King's moving towards the campaign. I do not know what your thoughts are of following him, but I am still firmly of the same belief that whatever the coffee houses and Gazeites do say of your lordship's revocation there is nothing true in it. I send you by this post the last memorial of Mons^r. Van Citters, which you will find to be of some length; the answer my lord of Sunderland hath directed me to give. It was given by word of mouth on Tuesday last, the memorial being given in on Sunday. All the news we have of my Lord Dartmouth is that he was in the Bay of Bulls near Cadiz on the 25th of Feb. our style; and was, when the letter of that date came away, weighing anchor to come for England; the winds have been very cross, otherwise we might reasonably expect to have heard from him long ere this. P.S. Touching Sir S^t. Morland, his Majesty's pleasure is that you should speak to Mons^r. de Louvois in his behalf, and use the best arguments that Sir Samuel shall furnish you with for his fair treatment and satisfaction. His Majesty doth not think fit to write himself, it being not proper for him in matters of contract and account between the ministers of that King and those they have to do with in that way, tho' they should be the subjects of the King our master.

1684, April 21st, Arlington House.—Lord Arlington to (). (Copy).—When I was applying myself to procure you the 200*l*. which you seem to desire of his Majesty in yours to me of the 1st April, I found the matter so well advanced (it seems by my lord Preston's mediation) that hearing from Mr. Secretary Godolphin that the thing was in effect settled, I forbore writing to his Majesty as I intended to do, my ill legs not suffering me to follow him to Windsor, which I hope will qualify me to serve you with more success in your next desires; the occasion of which I shall most readily embrace, as all others wherein I may let you know how much I am yours, &c. . . .

1684, April 22nd, Windsor. The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston. I have yours of the 13th instant to M^r. Secretary Jenkins, upon which his Majesty commands me to tell you that as to the vessel lately brought into Calais by a privateer of that place from Ramsgate road, he has directed me to give the French ambassador a memorial of it, to the intent he may write to the King his master for the restitution of the same, with its lading, which his Majesty would have you also insist upon and because it is very likely (if the war go on) we shall have frequent complaints of this kind, he would have you effectually represent to the most Christian King and his ministers the inconveniences and prejudice the like proceedings will occasion to his Majesty's subjects; and that therefore his Majesty desires and hopes the said King will forthwith give strict orders to the commanders of his men-of-war, the captains of privateers, and the officers of the respective admiralties, to abstain from all violences of that kind, and from any other way of molesting or interrupting his Majesty's subjects in their trade and commerce contrary to the Treaties between the two crowns, which expressly say that the ship being free all the goods except contraband shall be so likewise. This his Majesty commands me to recommend most earnestly to your care. His Majesty would also have you endeavour to obtain an order from the most Christian King that my Lord of Ossory's horses, being 48 in number, and my Lord Cornbury's, being 30, may be exempted from paying any duties at their landing, which Mons^r. Barillon has also charged himself to write about. The enclosed letter from the French ambassador's secretary will inform you what will be necessary in that behalf.

1684, May 12, Whitehall. Jo. Cook to Mr. Tempest. Yesterday I received two of yours of May 13 and 15, both from Valenciennes. I find your expectations are wavering between the answer of the States General to Mons^r. D'Avaux's last memorial and the proceeding of the French army before Luxembourg. But I hear some sanguine men amongst us say, let the most Christian monarch look well about him, lest he pull (as the saying is) an old house about his ears. Peace we desire, and I think he ought to do so too; but if he inflames too much, perchance it may not be in his power to extinguish when he would. Yet I am far from being a politician, being content to be only as I am. P.S. The King has superseded the commission given to certain persons for executing the office of lord high admiral of England, which his Majesty takes upon himself and will perform it with the advice and assistance of his Royal Highness.

1684, May 19th, Windsor. The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston. Since my last I have your letters of the 1st 1/2, as also one of the 11th by the master of the ship of Corke, which was some weeks since taken out of Ramsgate Road by a privateer of Calais; and having acquainted his Majesty with the account you give of that matter; he commands me to tell you that he would have you continue your endeavours for the immediate restitution of the said ship and lading, and that the party may be indemnified for the loss he has sustained by so unjust a proceeding. The last Treaty in 1674 is so clear in the point that there is not the least reasonable pretence for the capture of or detaining the said ship, much less its condemnation, and therefore you are to press the dispatch of this affair, notwithstanding Mons^r. de Salignel's absence, it being a matter which may have consequences very prejudicial to our merchants. I am likewise commanded by his Majesty to send you the enclosed Order of Council, concerning the taking of a pink, called St. George of London, by the French in the West Indies, which you are to demand the restitution of as the said order directs. The memorial and directions concerning the privileges of the King's subjects in France, which I mentioned in last, are not ready yet, but by the next you may expect them.

1684, May 26, Windsor. The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston. He notifies the King's orders that Lord Preston should give 2 memorials to the French King, one concerning the droit d'aubeyne, and the other about the privileges of the Scotch nation. As to the 1st he is to urge the exemption of the subjects of H. M. by virtue of the Treaties of 1606 and 1655. He is to argue against the insertion of the words "sans tirer en consequence" in the mains levées; mentioning several arrêts by the French King's council of state, and specifying those of the 23 July 1661, 12 Oct. 1675, and 17 Oct. 1676, where mains levées were ordered without any such limitation. As to the Scotch, he is to urge their exemption from the droit d'aubeyne by virtue of ancient Treaties, and by confirmations, particularly one by Louis 13th, confirming all these privileges and adding a new exemption from all sorts of droits d'aubeyne by letters patent of July 1613, confirmed by others dated in August following. Also that the Scotch had been exempted from new droits by several arrêts of the Council of state and other Courts of France, particularly in the exemption of the 50 sols by the tun upon all strangers, of which 2 Scotch merchants named Blackburne and Pringle were discharged by two arrêts, one of the court des aydes of Normandy in July 1659, and the other of the Parliament of Normandy in June 1663; that besides their exemption from the droit d'aubeyne in common with the King's other subjects by virtue of the 20th Article of the Treaty of 1606 and the 12th Article of the Treaty of 1655, the Scotch have particular privileges for that exemption by ancient Treaties, and more particularly by solemn letters patent of naturalization, granted to the whole Scottish nation by Charles 5th, confirmed with all other privileges by Louis 13th in 1613. (5 1/2 pp.)

1684, June 30th, Windsor. The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston.—I acknowledged last week the receipt of your letters of the 1st 1/2, wherein you give an account that Mons^r. de Croissy had by way of answer to your two memorials about the privileges of his Majesty's subjects in France, told you that the most Christian King thought those privileges might be best settled by a new Treaty of Commerce, wherein he would be ready to comply with any thing which could be reasonably demanded in favour of his Majesty's subjects, which seemed the more necessary because there were several articles in the old Treaty which ought either to be altered or taken away, not being consistent with the present time. His Majesty having taken this matter into consideration, commands me to tell you that he remembers very well the progress which was made in the years 1670 and 1671 in such a Treaty, that he would have been very glad it had gone on then, and will be at any time ready to agree to such conditions as may be for the advantage of both kingdoms. However, his Majesty sees no reason why his subjects should in the mean time be deprived of the privileges which they ought to enjoy according to former Treaties, and especially those which have been made since the union of the two kingdoms by King James, which are still practicable, and particularly that of the droit d'aubeyne, and therefore his Majesty wonders the more at the pretensions of Mons^r. Fauconnett, of whose petition you send me a copy in yours of the 4th instant, s. v., and that such practices whereby the arrests made by the most Christian King in the most solemn manner are endeavoured to be evaded should be allowed of; and his Majesty directs me to tell you that he would have you speak effectually about it to that King and his ministers, and has commanded me to let Mons^r. Barillon know how much he resents this kind of proceeding, which his Majesty persuades himself will never be countenanced when complained of. I have also orders to recommend to Mons^r. Barillon the business of M^r. Banks's ship taken at Petit Graves, and the revision desired in the case of Mr. Monro. As to the business of Carew, the King will make no agreement with him; but if he will submit to his Majesty and deliver up his pretended commission you may receive it.

LETTERS (not official) FROM ENGLAND.

1673, July 31st. E. C[arlton] to Ranald Grahme, Esq^r., at Nunington, York.—This day I received yours which brought me the joyful news of your safe arrival at York . . . We are for Portsmouth to-morrow, and the King comes the latter end of next week. This morning the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Feversham are gone for the French camp. The Duke of Buckingham is out for a time; some say he is to be Lord High Steward. My master continues his frowns still, and as unkind as ever. We stay not long at Portsmouth. . . .

1677, July 23rd, London. Coll Grace to . . . Thanks for recommending his kinsman effectually to my Lord of Carlisle. One thing more I am to acquaint you with, that yesterday I found his Royal Highness and my Lord of Ormond were resolved to use their full power with the King that I may have the benefit of recommending a lord of Scotland or Ireland to his Majesty; this I thought fit to acquaint you, to know what is the most your friend will give if I can get it done. There are others that offers very fair for it, yet I would not hearken to it before I had your answer, which I desire by the next, for I shall know by the latter end of this week what will be done in the matter.

1680, Jan. 23, Cockermouth. Wm. Benson and nine other burgesses of Cockermouth to Sir Richard Graham. They assure him that the bailiff and burgesses will chose him for one of their representatives in the ensuing Parliament. They will support him and Mr. Gee.

1681, March 21st, Norton[Connyers]. Richard Grahme to his nephew Sir Richard Grahme, Bart., M.P., at Oxford.—. . . I was mightily obliged to all my neighbours in the country; they all did me the honour to meet me with the judges, and I had 250 odd liveries to attend me besides Sir Thomas Slingsbies' troop. It has been the best show since the King came in; but I shall be quite broken unless you get the King to continue me sheriff the next year. My friends who I would have you advise withall, that will give you their assistance, is Mr. Greenville of the bedchamber, Sir John Reasby (Reresby), and George Leg; so pray do what you can, for I only confide in you.

1681, Jan. 27. Jo. Oxon (John Fell, Bishop of Oxford) to Lord Preston. Congratulating on hearing of Lord Preston's expected appointment for France.

1682, April 24th, London.—Sir John Chardin to Messrs. Le Vasseur pere e fils, at Dieppe. (French.) He says that the letter will be delivered by Lord Preston, envoy extraordinary from England to France. He requests them to render any services and supply any money that Lord Preston might require. The receipt for money advanced, which they are to take from Lord Preston, is to be sent to Mr. Jaques Aleaume, at Rouen, who will reimburse them.

1682, April 24, London. (French.) Sir J. Chardin to M. Jaques, Aleaume, a Rouen. Requesting him to do all services and advance any money that Lord Preston might require.

1682, April 29, Thursday.—W. Innis to Lord Preston (Decayed.) . . . There hath this week been some misunderstandings and some blows given betwixt the Duchess of Portsmouth's footmen and my Lord Stafford's, which may have made a noise, not worth (as I hear) the relation; I will not trouble your lordship with it. Her Grace and the Duke of Richmond, after receiving all the civilities from this Court since she has been here, goes this morning for Aubigny, and from thence to Bourbon to the waters. The Court continues at St. Cloue all next week. I hear of no great progress this year, but Fontainebleau, where Madame la Daupine is to be . . . All knights and gentlemen of my acquaintance that I have been to see comes again to congratulate with your lordship's coming to this Court, for their visits cannot be to me but in your lordship's favour. . . .

1682, May 2nd, Sanqehar.—The Earl of Queensberry to Sir Richard Graham.—. . . I shall take occasion to give his Royal Highness account of the just sense ye have of his favours, and your readiness to serve his interest, whereof its not amiss ye write to himself, for I do assure you ye owe him a great deal, not only for what he writ to the King in your favour but the kindness and trust he frequently expresses for you to me.

1682, May 8th, Windsor.—Will. Chiffinch to Henry Savill, Vice-Chamberlain at my Lord Hollifex's house in St. James' Square.—The King commanded mee to write to you, to send this ulte maryne to my Ld. Preston for him to buy halfe a pound of each collar upon his Majesties accounte, and to send it heather with all speed.

1682, May 25, London. J. R. de Rosemond to Lord Preston. I beg one favour at your hands, especially having received assurances from Dr. Burnet that your lordship hath already consented to it.—I have undertaken the putting into French the History of the Reformation of the Church of England, and being forced to send over the sheets, Mr. Savil, your lordship's predecessor, had been pleased to give me leave to send over every post some few sheets of the said history.—Asks Lord Preston's leave to do the same.

1682, June 1st, St. James's. (Sir) John Worden to Lord Preston. . . . Since my last we have heard the King is perfectly well, and so find that little indisposition he laboured under Sunday last was only the effect of a cold and not an ague. The Duke and Duchess lodge this night at Richmond, and to-morrow night will be at Windsor to stay at least 2 months there. On Tuesday night the Duke of Somerset and Lady Ogle were wedded. Yesterday a duel was fought 'twixt Duke of Albemarle and Lord Gray, principals, and Sir—Clerges and Capt. Godfrey, seconds. Godfrey disarmed Clerges, and so Duke Albemarle was obliged to yield; and after all Lord Gray assured him he had not spoke any of those words which had occasioned the quarrel. I think Sir—Clerges [is] wounded a little. If your lordship know anything of the case of Mrs. Siderfin

(the widow of a gentleman that was my particular friend) . . . I beg of you all the just countenance she shall need to obtain her liberty. P.S. This day Mr. Graham hath sold his bedchamber place to Mr. Finch, a son of the Earl of Winchelsey. To-morrow I follow to Windsor, but shall be in town every week.

1682, June 18th, Calais.—Anne Siderfin to Lord Preston. . . . That which you heard of my being kept 2 days in Mr. de Ravigny's house was very true. From thence I was fetched on Thursday last by Mr. de Tasse, President of Calais, who came thither by 4 o'clock in the morning, he having just then received a letter from Mr. Secretary Jenkins, desiring him to enquire after me and to take me into his protection if he found me, which he did accordingly.—Has sent by last Friday's packet to her friends for a yacht to fetch her home to England.—Three of the men that were at M. de Ravigny's house, Clifford, Sarsfield, and Dorneson, have made their escape. It was reported that Clifford and Dorneson were gone for England.—She thinks that they are concealed in this country. Sarsfield, they say, is at Graving.—Asks Lord Preston's assistance for their being apprehended, as while they have their liberty she cannot think herself secure, since they have been so bold as to threaten even the President himself.

1682. Two papers in French on the status of children (of Protestants) converted to the Roman Catholic faith; and six letters by Bedford Whiting, an Englishman, at Lille, whose daughter had seceded to Romanism, complaining of the steps taken by the French authorities to compel payment by him of money for her support.—A statement in French of Lord Preston's interference thereon; and a copy of Monsr. de Croissy's answer to Lord Preston's memorial.

1682, June 12th, Sommersett House.—Earl of Clarendon to Lord Preston. Has received his lordship's letter. . . . And now to shew your lordship that I shall make no scruple to trouble you, I do already begin to give you some, which is to recommend my son to your favour. By the last letters I had from Lyons I suppose he may by this time be at Paris, where I do not intend he shall pass many weeks, and whilst he is there I wish he may be in good company; he can be in none more to my satisfaction than in your lordship's. I find the young man has made himself master of the French and Italian languages. . . .

1682, June 23rd, Bromley. John Roffen (John Dolben, Bishop of Rochester) to Lord Preston.—Has received Lord Preston's of June 16th, and forbore writing till he should hear from his son of his arrival, who triumphs in his lordship's favour, especially in the honour he (Preston) did him at the audience.

1682, July 11th, Chelsey.—Edward Chamberlayne to Lord Preston.—Both parts of my little Treatise of the Present State of England (whereof one part is humbly dedicated to your lordship) being newly finished, I have taken order to have one book neatly bound and to be speedily transmitted to your lordship at Paris, begging your acceptance thereof, wherein are some hundreds of alterations and additions since the last impression. . . .

1682, Aug. 3rd. Fran. Sandford to Lord Preston.—Has received several letters from his (Sandford's) son Charles, who was in Lord Preston's service, whom he thanks for his favours, and would like to hear from Lord Preston's own hand that these favours flowed rather as the encouragement of his son's diligence and observance of his lordship than the performance of his (Preston's) gracious promise to Sandford.—His Royal Highness, with the Duchess (our Dauphiness), came late to St. James's last night; we may about three weeks hence expect her delivery (of a Duke of Cambridge, I hope), whose birth may prove as auspicious to England as that of your Duc de Burgoyne may to the realm of France.

1682, Aug. 3rd and Aug. 31st, London.—Two letters from Tho. Robson to Lord Preston on private business. In the first he says he is told that Lord Preston's brother will be sent by the Duke to congratulate the Dauphin on the birth of his son.

1682, Aug. 7th, Windsor.—Verrio to Lord Preston (in French).—Asks him to remember to send him the thousand jonquils that he so kindly promised. The great passion that he has for gardening makes him thus importunate.

n. d. The same to the same.—Tells Lord Preston that he can send the double jonquils by M. Roman, Mastre d'Ostel of the Duchess of Porsemus (Portsmouth), who will bring them to him in good condition.

1682, Aug. 7th, London.—Sir William Galloway to Lord Preston. . . . I send your lordship an account as near as I can of what passed here since your departure; as for what happened the Duke going for Scotland I will not trouble you. . . . The 10th of May the great case between the Earl of Shaftesbury and Mr. Cradock came on in the King's Bench about changing the venue out of London; it underwent great arguing by council on both sides, the Earl being present, and upon the whole matter the Court was unanimously of an opinion that it was not likely to be an indifferent trial in the city, and therefore left it to his lordship to lay his action in any other county, who thereupon declared that so many counties having reflected upon him in their addresses, he could not expect any justice from them, and that he would withdraw his action. Upon which the Lord Chief Justice declared his lordship's resolution did greatly confirm the opinion of the Court that it ought not to be tried in London, seeing his lordship would not trust any other jury in England with his cause. The sheriffs of London were likewise this day very much reproved for making an insufficient return in the case of Wilmore, against whom a writ De homine replegiando was brought, for stealing away a young boy and sending him to Jamaica, and an attachment was ordered to bring them into the Court, but were dismissed upon their submission and assurance of behaving themselves better for the future. On Thursday the Earl of Danby appearing by his habeas corpus: Mr. Powis, of his lordship's counsel, first moved that the habeas corpus might be read, which with the commitment from the House of Lords was accordingly done. The Earl of Danby continued speaking about an hour. The Lord Chief Justice then in a short answer to the said Earl said that his opinion was the same as formerly, that they could not bail his lordship. The Earl then desired that the rest of the judges on the bench might give their several opinions, which they did accordingly one after another, confirming the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, that the Court could not bail him; soon after which his lordship was remanded to the Tower.—(The writer then gives an account of the proceedings against the Sheriffs, Pilkington and Shute, for complicity in the riot in the Guildhall, and of their being admitted to bail; and of the meetings in the city in Common Hall on the 15th of July, and in the Council Chamber on the 27th of July, with regard to city affairs.)—My Lord of Sunderland has kissed the King's hand, and is like to be preferred at Court. There was the last council day a great trial between my Lord of Anglesey and my Lord Duke of Ormond about a book my Lord of Anglesey writ, in answer to a book of my Lord of Castlehaven's, where there was some reflection on my Lord of Ormond. The book was voted by the council to be a scandalous, seditious libel against the old King, this King, and the present Government. My Lord of Castlehaven's book is also declared a libel. My Lord of Ossory is married unto my Lord Hyde's daughter. Sheriff Beatell [Bethell] he is fled for Hamborough, I believe; a great many more will follow him now that they have not sheriffs of their own faction. . . . P.S. The Duchess of York is come to St. James's.

1682, St. Stephen's Day, Amen Corner.—(Dr.) Fran. Turner to Lord Preston. . . . Give me leave to acquaint you that a special friend of yours, I mean honest Du Puy, does you all the justice to his master with a zeal for your own interest, and he pleases himself and me with the belief that his coming has put new life into that business.

1682, Aug. 10th, London. The Earl of Middleton to Lord Preston.—Sir Pat. Lyon having informed him of Lord Preston's kindness to his nephew Lord Glammis (who has settled at Paris), he writes to thank him.

1682, Aug. 10th, Whitehall. (Sir) Rich. Mason to Lord Preston. . . . The next day after my arrival at Court I was upon an inevitable and important occasion necessitated to hurry to the assize at York (where I met many of your relations, friends, and servants). . . . I shall be in waiting all the next month, and then I shall have the opportunity to salute your lordship both from Windsor and Newmarket.

1682, Aug. 10th, Thursday, St. James Square.—Sir Cyrill Wich to Lord Preston. We find the pressures upon the Hugonots are so great in France that multitudes of them are every day looking out whether and how they may make their retreat; among the rest one Mons^r. Philip Guide, a Dr. of Physic, and considerably eminent for his profession for some time in Paris, has made his application to my Lord Duke of Ormond, and is received by him as his physician, and hopes in that relation both to find means of escaping the present storm with what he has, and of subsisting in Ireland afterwards. But without your assistance it may be impossible for him to get off with his effects, and therefore must have recourse to your protection. I am commanded by my Lord Lieutenant to recommend him to your favour.

1682, Aug. 11th, Henderskelfe.—The Earl of Carlisle to Lord Preston.

1682, Aug. 12th, London.—J. Ellis to Lord Preston.—I waited upon Coll. Graham this morning to kiss hands before his departure for France. The Coll. desired me to acquaint you that he feared he should not have time to write to-night, intending to post home to-morrow morning, as I am told the Earl of Feversham does too. The Colonel desires you to give order for a lodging for him. Dr. Turner, his Royal Highnesses chaplain, goes to Paris with him, and he prays Mr. Wiggan to do him the kindness as to provide him a lodging. I saw Mr. Deanes at Windsor on Sunday, and last night here. He intends to be gone suddenly. I know not whether he has spoken with Mr. Secretary Jenkins since that; if he have not, and that he must have despatches from him, 'tis likely he cannot go till to-morrow, for the secretary is gone hastily to Windsor to-day to carry the privy seal to His Majesty. My Lord Marquis of Halifax's patent is almost passed. 'Tis said the Lord Privy Seal will suddenly deliver up the seal. His Royal Highness came hither last night from Windsor. To-night the French ambassador makes great fireworks in St. James Square for the birth of the Duke of Burgundy. The Spaniards here seem to resent much his having that title given him.

1682, Aug. 24th, Sommersett House.—The Earl of Clarendon to Lord Preston. . . . I doubt your lordship will make so much of Mr. Grahme and Dr. Turner that they will forget the ties they have at home and be desirous to continue with you. I have written to the latter not to stay too long at this time abroad, because I believe his being here would be convenient. . . . The King and Duke went yesterday to Greenwich to see the launching of a new yacht and returned again to Windsor in the evening. . . . P.S. If it be not unreasonable I would beg your lordship to do me the favour to send me by Mr. Grahme the little book which your lordship has with so good success got to be suppressed, and the author of it punished.

1682, Aug. 31, London. Monsieur de L'Ortie to Lord Preston. (French.) He requests Lord Preston to procure a congé for Madame du Chail, whom the King had appointed laundress of his table linen. He says that Jenkins had promised to write to Lord Preston on the subject.

[1682.] Sept. 9th. H. [Compton, Bishop of] London, to Lord Preston.—Asking him if he can assist in procuring leave for the coming hither of a family of the name of La Bar, it will be a service exceedingly for his service, and so accepted by all the considerable French who are already come over.

1682, Sept. 13th, London. Edmund Prideaux to Lord Preston. Asks him to procure a pass from the French King for Mr. Bachelier to bring over his wife and family for England. He (Bachelior) has lately taken a farm of Prideaux's, in Kent, where he intended to settle.

1682, Sept. 14th. H. [Compton, Bishop of] London, to Lord Preston. Renews his solicitations on behalf of the La Bar family.

1682, Sept. 14th, st. v., Bromley.—John Roffen (John Dolben, Bishop of Rochester) to Lord Preston.—Complimentary. My son tells me in a letter which came last night that your lordship intends to take the opportunity of the French King's absence to step over hither and fetch your lady.

1682, Sept. 14th, St. James.—Sir John Worden to Lord Preston.—Last night I delivered to the Duke Madame's letter which I had enclosed from your lordship in one of the 16th, st. no. The King and Duke have spent these three last days in the rivers of Thames and Medway, to visit the new great ship Brittannia, and try the sailing of the new yacht with ketch (that is square) sailed and two masts, which they say outailed all the yachts every where, tho' not so nimble at tacking as they are, and requiring more men. The King last night declared that he will not go to Newmarket till after Michaelmas, partly because the first match is set for 6th Oct., but we imagine a better reason is, that the election of Lord Mayor may be over first, wherein ('tis said) the phanaticks mean to exercise their wonted spleen all the ways they can.

1682, Sept. 18th, London. The Countess of Portland to Lord Preston. About some goods which she had sent to Rouen.

1682, Sept. 24th, London.—Edward Carleton to Lord Preston.—Thanks for his kindness to Carleton's kinsman, Lord Preston's page.—Reminds him of his promise that at Michaelmas he (Preston) would admit Carleton's brother into his service.

1682, Sept. 29th.—Whetton, My Lord Bellasis house by Twitnam.—(Sir) Ellis Leighton to Lord Preston.—I writ to your lordship from Deipe, and was resolved, so soon as my Lord Marquis of Winchester had seen the King and Duke and ministers, to have given your lordship from myself a familiar account of things.—He was seized with a violent fever, and there was report of his death, he is recovering but slowly.—As soon as I am well I will conjure up M. Barillon about this passe, for it is a plain affront, and like a studied one, and I know how, preserving all respect for the alliance, to vex them in the little matters of the Customs, and I am ashamed and sorry I should have spoken to your lordship in a thing that hath had so small success . . .

1682, Sept. 29th, London. The Marquis of Winchester to Lord Preston.—I did desire Sir Ellis Leighton to write to your lordship from Dieppe to let you know in what an ambiguous condition I was in order to the passe for my plate . . . I did desire your lordship not to make any request in the matter, but to know from Mons^r. Colbert what their sense was in the matter. I am in some constraint about seeing Mons^r. Barillon, because I do not know in what style to speak to him. If my health give me leave to attend the council, I shall have divers occasions to meet with them in their affairs, that are of the same nature . . . The reception I have had from the King and Duke and from the ministers here does give me a great desire to obtain my health that I may employ it in the service of the crown, in concurrence with such worthy men as have the present management of it.

1682, Oct. 5th, London. The Earl of Clarendon to Lord Preston.—Acknowledges Lord Preston's letter of the 20th past. 'Tis but just I should pay you my thanks for the book your lordship was pleased to send me; in another age one might have admired that such a piece should be licensed by a Prince in amity with his neighbour, who was so concerned; but in the time we live nothing is to be wondered at. I find by a late discourse I had with Mr. Grahme that your lordship was under some apprehension of being undermined by some contrivances here, which I shall always think myself obliged to watch as much as I am able. I have discoursed the whole matter with my brother, and he assures me positively that there is not the least ground for your jealousy, and I am sure they could not be concealed from him . . . Their Majesties and the Duke went on Tuesday to Newmarkett, but his Royal Highness is come back this evening to visit the Duchess in her affliction, for the Lady Charlotte who for these three days has been continually visited with convulsion fits, the doctors despair of her recovery, and all that I can say is that she's yet alive.

1682, Nov. 1st. Jo. Oxon (John Fell, Bishop of Oxford) to Lord Preston.—The bearer hereof, Mr. Dicree, being a singing man of this college, and going to Paris to conduct a young nobleman of Ireland to be settled in an academy, I have ordered him to attend upon your lordship and present you with my faithful service . . .

1682, Nov. 4th, Leachlade.—(Sir) Thomas Cutler to Lord Preston.—Has heard of him from his friend Sir Robert Atkins, at Cirencester, who acquainted him with Lord Preston's place of residence . . . Tho' I paid my fees within two days, yet the heralds coming their visitation into this country shewed me a proclamation, whereby it is required that a certificate should be given into their office signed by two witnesses, or some person of honour at least who saw it done, and therefore I desire, as I have been only obliged to your lordship in this matter, that you would be pleased to send me such a one, the time being the 28th of Feb. . . . by way of letter to Leachlade in Gloucestershire . . .

1682, Nov. 6th. Jo. Roffen (John Dolben, Bishop of Rochester) to Lord Preston.—About his son, of whom he seems to have heard bad reports.

1682, Nov. 9th, London.—Capt. O'Connor to Lord Preston.— . . . Sir Lionel Ginkins told me yesterday that he sent your lordship by the last post a copy of a petition I gave his Majesty, with orders that you should act for me with Mons^r. de Louvoy and Mons^r. de Croisy Colbert as to my preferment there . . . besides this order Sir Lyonell Ginkins sent by his Majesty's command to your lordship, I am to have his Majesty's letter to the French King, and his Royal Highnesses letter to Mons^r. de Louvoy and Mons^r. le Marechall de Crequi, wherefore I think it fit to let your lordship know that you may be pleased to do me the favour not speak in my behalf till I come thither myself . . . P.S. I lodge at my Lady Saint Legers at the two marble poasts in the Pell Mell.

1682, Nov. 13th, London.—Thos. Robson to Lord Preston.—About the bills of extraordinaries . . .

1682, Nov. 20th.—G. Legge to Lord Preston.— . . . His Majesty is extremely fond of my Lord Burforde, and seems much concerned in his education, and he being now of an age fit to be bred in the world hath resolved to trust him wholly in your hands; no impertinent body shall be troublesome to you, nor any body but whom you approve of to wait on him. I am to be your solicitor for providing money and all things necessary for him, and I hope by it to establish your other payments better than otherways we could have compassed. I told his Majesty you would be forced to take a larger house, and your expense must needs be much increased by this; he acknowledged it, and bid me take care that my Lord Burforde should have an apartment ready provided by you in your own house, so that I hope you may compass your own rent free, if your house already will accommodate it, or else that you take a better upon this occasion; masters must be provided for him, the best can be got of all sorts, but more particularly the King would have him study mathematics, and in that fortification, and that when the King of France moves in any progresses he constantly go with you to view all places in France, &c. My lord you see by this I am going to breed a bird to pick out my own (sic) eyes, but I owe his Majesty all I have in gratitude, and will by the help of God study all the ways I am able to make him all the returns imaginable. Pray fail not to write to the King by the next post . . . My Lady Ann intends to stay here till the return of this post, and his Majesty intends to send the little lord with her, when you direct her coming to you . . . P.S. Sir Robert Carr is dead, and Sir Tho. Chichlye by my Lord Hallifax's means is made Chancellor of the Duchy; Sir Tho. is an old man, and I do not doubt but to see you once in that employment, if not before it falls.

1682, Dec. 26th, Greenwich. G. Legge (Lord Dartmouth) to Lord Preston.—You will wonder at last to see your lady come without my Lord Burforde, but he will not be long after her, for his Majesty intends my brother Will shall bring him to you, and Nelly desiring he should be delayed for a little time in hopes of some settlement to be made upon him; it was neither reasonable to delay my lady longer nor to hasten him away so soon. His Majesty is extremely satisfied with your readiness to take his child into your care, and it must be my business to see he is provided for so that no charge may be brought upon your lordship by it. Mr. Digby comes with my lady.

1683, Feb. 26th, Whitehall. The Earl of Conway to Lord Preston.— . . . I need not say anything to your lordship of the ground of my removal; his Majesty hath said sufficiently to justify me in those particulars which I was most concerned for; as to the rest, if they are not better known to your lordship than to me, you are defective in that part of your employment. I have also good reason to believe your lordship will in a short time find considerations of the same nature extend to your particular concerns. I am going into Warwickshire with the same inclinations and affection to the King's service which I brought with me from thence when I came into Court. I never designed to be a gainer by my employment, and it is the King's favour only in giving me 2,500*l*. which makes me go home a saver. But I must likewise acknowledge that his Majesty gives me a pension, and other promises, which I am confident he will perform, and continues me in all his councils as I was before, which will oblige me to be often at Court, where I see all the letters you transmit and the accounts you give of affairs there . . .

1683, March 22nd. Francis North (Lord Keeper) to Lord Preston.—Thanks for Lord Preston's congratulations.

1683, March 29th, London.—The Duke of Ormonde to Lord Preston.—The bearer, Mons^r. des Fontaines Votron, having been physician general of his Majesty's army in Ireland, under my command, passes now into France to settle some affairs of his own and his family's.—Asks L^d. Preston's assistance for him.

1683, June 14. H. Ball to Lord Preston. Telling of a common council held that day, where it was resolved to surrender the city charter and ask a new one.

1683, July 23rd. (H. Ball) to Lord Preston . . . We have little stirring here since the deaths of Walcot, Hone, and Rouse on Friday, and of my Lord Russell on Saturday, which last has left behind him, or Dr. Burnet for him, such a bitter invective speech as shews but little charity at the time of its making. They say my lord had courage enough, but refusing to have his eyes covered, as it's supposed, shrunk at the blow, and by that means so removed himself that the executioner's first blow was too nigh the shoulder to do the feat, so as the body had rose again, its probable, had not the axe by fastening itself in the blow hindred it, but with another stroke and a scrape of the axe it was severed in two pieces, and the head held up to the people, and was afterwards put with the body into an hearse and conveyed away by his servants to be privately interred that night. No news yet of the Lord Grey, Duke of Monmouth, &c., but the master of the vessel that carried the first over was taken on Friday and confessed he did it; that my lord, his mistress, her husband, the soldier that went away with him, and the turned-out officer of the customs went with him to Holland, where he left them; and since they say the lady is left at Brussels very ill, and the lord and the rest gone into Germany. This day stood in the pillory at Charing Cross one Culleford, an oilman, for having in his custody a great quantity of a horrid libel, called the Third part of the growth of popery, and refusing to discover the author. They say the marriage between the Lady Anne and Prince George will be privately solemnized, and that in a day or two after his Majesty and the whole Court will remove to Windsor for a little time, where the Prince will be installed Knight of the Garter. Your lordship (as my cousin informed me) was pleased to favour me with the profer of a few books. Those I would be glad to have are any genealogical or heraldic books of late date, viz., since 70, especially l'Estate d'Europe or de France, if its reprinted with additions since, for I would inform myself of the genealogies of foreign families; any books of ceremonies of the coronation, installation, &c.

1683, Aug. 9th, London. Thomas Goddard to Lord Preston.—Having now finished and fairly transcribed my answer to Plato Red [Redivivus] I have committed the examination of it to some friends, who I think are no ill judges, and it having received their approbation, I take the liberty to acquaint your lordship that it is ready for the press. I am sufficiently sensible how justly the whole thing is due to your lordship, and have taken notice of the encouragement received, and my obligation due to your lordship for whatsoever shall be found good in it, but am generally advised to make the dedication to his Royal Highness the Duke of York. This my lord I cannot resolve upon without your direction and permission, for I must ever acknowledge your lordship my patron, and cannot give that to any man without your leave which is so justly your own. In this therefore I humbly beg your lordship's commands. I have not had the honour as yet to have seen Mr. Secretary Jenkins If your lordship commands it I shall send you a copy of the preface which gives a general account of the points controverted.

1683, Aug. 13th. Spring Garden, near Charing Cross. Francis Gwyn to Lord Preston.— . . . On Saturday last my poor Lord Conway died, which is one of the greatest losses that ever yet befell me. The Thursday before his death he made his will, and disposed of all his money, which was 33,000*l*, and all his other personal estate to his lady and her heirs &c., and likewise gave her ladyship her life in his whole estate, both in England and Ireland, which is about 7,000*l*. per annum. The remainder after my lady's life of his whole estate he hath settled upon my cousin Seymere's eldest son by this lady, and his two brothers successively, upon the condition they take the name of Conway; he hath left directions his great house at Rayley should be finished according to the discretion of Mr. Seymere and myself, out of his Irish estate during my lady's life, by so much annually as we shall think fit. I waited yesterday on his Majesty at Windsor and delivered your lordship's letters, which when he had read he asked me if I had those things there, I told his Majesty they were ready, and he commanded me to bring them in the afternoon, which I did, and there being company he carried them into his closet, where I believed he perused them, for at night in the bedchamber some of the servants happening to talk of fortification, he commended the fortification of some [of] those towns extremely. I waited and put him into bed that night, and when I was alone I asked him how he liked them; he appeared extremely well pleased, and commanded me to write your lordship thanks for them, and to desire you would go on and procure as many as you could and send them over to him.

1683, Aug. 13th, Windsor.—Leyonbergh to Lord Preston.—There is an English gentleman, and his Majesty's of Great Britain's limmener (limner), called Mr. Dixon, who hath made the finest collection of several rare pieces in water colours of his own drawing, the like never hath been seen in all Europe. Some urgent occasion obliges him to go for France, and therefore resolves to take a dozen or two of them with him to give the Court of France a view of them, for to learn its humour and opinion of such rarities. But whereas it is sufficiently known what a rigour there is used by the farmers of the Customs of France, he most humbly begs your kindness and protection, and that by me He carryeth also with him one great piece of Von Dyke, sold here once for 300*l*. sterling, worth to be seen by all Princes in the world.—He goeth over Diepen; if your lordship's secretary would direct a line or two for his direction to Mad^r. Le Jeune, that he may know your pleasure, you will highly oblige him.

1683, Aug. 27, London. Margaret Hay to Lord Preston. I do, in behalf of my Lord Marquis of Montrose, the Earl of Marshall (Marischal?) and all the relations of our family which have persuaded me to come to this kingdom, render your lordship their sense of your generous owning the Earl of Kinnoul in the desolate condition he is in by the death of his mother, and their uncle the Earl of Salbery (Salisbury?) and the desertion of all their mother's relations, on the account that the children are in a Jesuit college and a nunnery, where they judge they shall ever be made useless to their King and country and their own interest; and all the relatives in both kingdoms desire that all means may be used to recover them, which by their advice has made me give a caveat against Mr. Hay being an administrator, because he being a Roman Catholic will endeavour to keep them out of England lest they may change their persuasion, which he doth acknowledge he is engaged to keep them in; and the Earl of Middleton only being prevailed to accept of being administrator too, one should come upon the place that would undertake it, and having the right in blood, and as we have reason to believe by the witness of them that writ the Countess Kinnoul's will, and by her putting me in trust of her affairs when she went from this kingdom, that my Lord Marquis of Montrose and I are guardians to the children. The Earl of Middleton has resigned his right of administration, but Mr. Hay doth refuse to do it, and so hindreth the raising of money for the supply of the children, and for the bringing them home, which design I do, my lord, most earnestly beg you would advance, &c. &c. P.S. My sister the Countess Kinnoul's will being sent to France in a trunk, we cannot come at it, but the lawyers tell us of a very arbitrary power in children to choose their guardians; so we hope much of your lordship's persuading and commands to them.

[1683]. Sept. 6, Sept. 17, Sept. 24. The same to the same. Three more short letters on the subject of her nephew Lord Kinnoul and the other children.

1683, Aug. 20th, London. M. Viridet to [Lord Preston].—(French.) He has been for some years the Duke of Ormond's chaplain.—His duties in the French Church of Dublin will not permit his going to Paris, he therefore begs Lord Preston to use his influence to obtain permission for him to sell the goods that he has in France, as he is resolved to spend the rest of his life under the dominion of the best of kings.—He sends attested copies of the most Christian King's brevet which he had obtained in 1676, and of the patent appointing him chaplain to the Duke of Ormond.

1683, Aug. 22nd. Cranston Makgill. [the Earl of] Oxford to Lord Preston.—Complimentary.

1683, Sept. 3rd, London. Hen. Guy to Lord Preston.

1683, Sept. 6th. Tho. Goddard to Lord Preston.—I have received your lordship's of Aug. 28th, s. n. . . . and have taken the liberty to enlose a copy of the epistle to his Royal Highness, which if your lordship approves I intend shall pass without any other alteration than such as your lordship shall think fit to command. I have not sent the preface because it is something long, and is chiefly a summary of those pernicious principles, which Plato Redivivus hath dispersed in his book, and are very well known to your lordship (Enclosed is a copy of the dedication of the book to James Duke of York.)

1683, Sept. 11th. Tho. Jackson to Lord Preston.— . . . The Lord Marquis of Winchester dined in your house at Nunnington the last week. I was with him at Malton in his journey from Scarborough on the Saturday, and he desired he might dine there on Wednesday after, and thence he would go to Thirsk. I told him we had no accommodation but bare walls, he said he needed only a room to dine in and a kitchen, and he would send his provisions; so we got him your low dining room clean and a fire in it, and fires in the kitchens; but he wanted table linen and pewthar, his being sent away to Thirske, so I was forced to furnish him; he dined and walked in your garden, and what little fruit there was he had it

1683, Sept. 17th, London.—Sir Chris. Musgrave to Lord Preston.—My attendance of his Majesty at Portsmouth and Winchester prevented me acknowledging the honour of yours, which gave so exact account of the salt petre and powder P.S.—No news of my Lord Dartmouth since his being at the Lands End.—On the back of this letter are several memoranda by Lord Preston.

1683, Sept. 17th, London. Tho. Robson to Lord Preston.—(About Ld. Preston's pay.)

1683, Sept. 24th, s. v., London. Tho. Goddard to Lord Preston. Thanks for his lordship's letter of the 22nd instant.—I have here enclosed sent your lordship a copy of the preface, in which if you please to make any alteration it will be yet time enough, for altho' the book itself be already in the press, and some sheets finished, I have still reserved the epistle and preface unto the last, or at least until they be both communicated unto his Royal Highness, supposing it to be my duty and good manners to know his Highnesses pleasure before I obtrude a patronage upon him. Some friends have recommended me to Sir John Worden, others to my Lord Churchill, to do this good office for me, but being rather ambitious that all my obligation might be due to your lordship, I shall resolve upon nothing, nor make any application, until I receive your lordship's directions

1683, Oct. 1st, London.—De Labadie to Lord Preston. (French.) His Royal Highness having commanded him to procure some Caors wine, he asks Lord Preston to obtain a passport for it as he did last year.

1683, Oct. 1. Tho. Knipe to Lord Preston.—Has spoken to Dr. Barby and Mr. Brisband about M. de Malnoe's son, who was [at Westminster School] in the 3rd form, and about 15 years old, and who, Knipe says, is backward, and not likely to pass as King's scholar to the University.—He says that Dr. Spratt, Dean of Westminster, was installed on St. Matthew's day.

1685, Oct. 7, London. Alison Colvill to Lord Preston. . . . There are papers sent over to your lordship this post concerning the liberties and privileges of the Scots in France, wherein I am particularly recommended; as your lordship did desire

1683, Oct. 29th, Whitehall.—John Mounsteven to Mr. Tempest.—This being the usual day for swearing the Lord Mayor of the city of London for the year ensuing, Sir Henry Tulse, a very able and loyal citizen, was this morning accordingly sworn Lord Mayor at Westminster, and is to act as such by virtue of his Majesty's commission. The whole ceremony, both by land and water, was performed with greater splendour, and more order than is usual on such occasions

1683, Nov. 26th. (H. Ball) to Lord Preston After the whispers of favours designed by his Majesty for the Duke of Monmouth in case of his contrition all last week, on Saturday last it revealed itself, for the Duke having writ the day before very submissively to his Majesty, and sent to entreat the Duke's pardon, they both permitted him personally to do it on Saturday at Whitehall, whither he came about 5 in the evening in his lady's chair, and with her attendance, and lighted at Mr. Secretary's office door, and went directly to the secretary who attended for him, as also the sergeant-at-arms, and the King being immediately acquainted with his grace's coming, whispered his Royal Highness and they both came privately to the secretary's office, and went into the Duke, who fell down at his Majesty's feet, beseeching his pardon, owning his great error; the like he did to the Duke, and received from them his pardon, but was for form's sake committed to the sergeant's custody, and went with him to the Duchesses, where he lay all night without any restraint, save in a little outward appearance. And yesterday his Majesty acquainted the council forthwith, and with his resolutions to pardon him; and forthwith the sergeant was discharged, and he carried last night to kiss the Queen and Duchesses hands, and the Princesses of Denmark, and to-day his grace appears publicly abroad and with the King as usual. His Royal Highness went this day a hunting and seems very well pleased with the Duke's return to his duty; but the people at a great loss what to think or say, but all agree it's upon an ample confession of all matters within his grace's knowledge, which the dissenters will not readily believe.

My last told your lordship how imprudently Mr. Sydney carried himself at his trial on Wednesday, and this day he exceeded the same, for being brought to receive his sentence he would not own the fact proved against him to be treason, but called it destructive treason; and being told by the judge that he was in hopes to have found his temper altered, and he another man, and to prepare for his end; but he said he was the same man, and bid my Lord Chief Justice to feel his pulse to see if there were any alteration, and indeed I hear he showed no concern at all, and so was remanded to prison, and I hear will certainly die (tho' some think otherwise), and they say that the rest in the Tower will be bailed out if no bills are preferred against them to-morrow. The Lady Mary Gerard has, I hear, had the misfortune the other night to be in the company with another woman in man's apparel a serenading, and at last falling out with the fiddlers, and being all merry, and some words coming from the fiddlers requiring their pay, a quarrel happened in which one of the fiddlers was killed and the other mortally wounded, and the woman and some gentlemen concerned in it taken, but the lady escaped, and it's hoped will not be found any otherwise criminal than in being in the frolic. We talk now very much of a Parliament and hope it will be a healing one, and that all our late animosities will be composed. . . .

1683, Nov. 28th, London.—Lord Dunbarton to Lord Preston.—A long and angry letter denying that he had spoken ill of Lord Preston on his return to London.

n. y., Dec. 4th, London. T. Deanes to Lord Preston.—Your business here meets with the usual delays of this Court, yet I am hopeful that since Dr. Turner is here (who came to town yesterday morning) that your lordship may in a few days know the resolutions of the King by the Duke whom the Dr. intends to move very strongly this night or to-morrow morning in your affair. Since I do not doubt in the least but the character will be granted, finding all people here so generally satisfied with your lordship, I shall intreat that you would be pleased to let me have the letter in readiness which you was pleased to promise me. As for English news your lordship's ordinary correspondents cannot but give you a better account than I, but for Scotch, what I can write to you is that my Lord Chancellor is made Earl of Aberdine, Sir George Kinnaird Lord Rossy, and Colonel Churchill Lord Heymouth. The process against the present Lord Lauderdale is not only going on, but all the officers of the Mint are included in it, and the Warden has lately hanged himself; so the friends of the Earl expects he may have a better sentence since now the great witness against him is dead

1683, Dec. 10th. (H. Ball) to Lord Preston.—On Friday last Mr. Sydney was brought to the scaffold at Tower hill, and being asked by the sheriff if he had anything to say, and desired him not to reflect on the Government, he replied he was a gentleman born and bred and so should die, and that he came thither only for that end, and not to make speeches; and then after 6 minutes of prayer he rose up and gave the sheriff a paper which he desired the King might see, and being asked if he had anything therein concerning his trial, &c., he bid him give it him again, if he liked it not; and so laid him on the block, and the executioner taking aim two or three times at last gave the blow and severed his head from his body, which was taken and with the body given to his friends. His speech was presently brought to his Majesty, and they say was very venomous and full of assertion of the good old cause, which I suppose will hinder it being printed. That night they say the King sent Mr. Saville to the Duke of Monmouth to forbid him and the Duchess the Court, and according they say they left the same forthwith, and went to lodgings in Holburne till preparations can be made at Moore Park to receive him. It was occasioned, its said, by his grace's refusing to sign an acknowledgment of what he told the King at his return to Court relating to the plot. The proclamation of war in Flanders very much amazes the merchants here fearing it may concequence; but on the draw ill the Whigs seem very joyful of it, and pretend to assist considerably in case we engage on the Spanish side.

1683, Dec. 13th, Wellbeck.—H. (Duke of) Newcastle to Lord Preston (holograph). Gives a good character to Mr. Holdford, who he hears is to attend upon Lord Preston. Says that he has desired Sir Stephen Fox, and other friends at Court, to be pleased to employ Holdford.

1683, Dec. 19, London, Haymarket, corner of Panton Street. (French.) B. Berenclo to (Lord Preston.) Recommends his daughter to Lord Preston's care.

1683. Dec. 25th. London. Thos. Goddard to Mr. Tempest. Would not have troubled him with a letter so soon, but sends him a relation of an unfortunate rencontre which has made a great noise in town.—Mr. Foster, brother and son to Sir Humphrey Foster, Mr. Cory, son to Major Cory, and Mr. Terwit being great friends, the latter by the assistance of the two former had lately married a woman of a considerable fortune, but it seems of small reputation; about a month after marriage the two first require of Mr. Terwit the reimbursement of some money with which they had supplied him in the time of his courtship, as also the performance of some other conditions, which it seems were thought hard by Terwit and denied; this occasioned the quarrel. These three meeting at the St. Alban's Tavern, where were also one Dean, Crofts, and Capt. O'Brian, after some words, Foster and Terwit went into St. James's Square, the rest following some very little time after. There were not many passes (which were at a half sword's distance) between the two first before Foster dropped. Terwit applies himself to Cory, who was engaged with Crofts, and after a pass or two falls also dead upon the place, having, as is supposed, received his mortal wound from Foster. Cory disarms Crofts and is wounded in the breast but not mortally. Dean is much wounded and 'tis said will hardly recover. Crofts and O'Brian escaped; Cory is under custody, and 'tis thought will escape at his trial or be pardoned, for my Lords of Oxford and Lord Privy Seal, who saw the action, have given a favourable account of Cory to the King, affirming that he was engaged with two and behaved himself well This next week my book will be printed and I hope presented, after which I shall take the liberty to send one to his lordship.

1683, Jan. 2nd, London.—Andr. Birche to Lord Preston.—Together with the unfortunate news of my nephew, Capt. Rigbys, being killed before Luxembourg, Mr. Cresset, his friend, sent advice that what money, papers, or other matters found with him were ordered by the General, Mons^r. Crequi, to be delivered to your excellency.—He (Birche) asks (being engaged by Mr. Rigby of London, his other uncle) that Lord Preston will deliver what things are sent to the bearer 1683, Jan. 11th, Edinburgh. J. Dauk to Lord Preston.—He had been searching records in support of the exemption of Scotch vessels from the French impost of 50 sols per tun. That State [the royal boroughs] have had frequent meetings. They are thankful to Lord Preston for his efforts, and have made a decret that on his procuring them the exemption there is a suitable compliment designed for him. Recommends Robert Pringle, a Scotchman at Rouen, who may prove helpful to Lord P. for giving further information therein.

1683, Jan. 31, Edinburgh. The Earl of Perth to Lord Preston. Recommends Lady Ann Gordone, who is just upon parting for France.

1683, Feb. 25th. (H. Ball) to Mr. Tempest, his cousin.—I have had none from you since the breaking up of the frost You may, if you think worth his lordship's while, acquaint him that on Thursday the Prince and the Dukes of Somerset and Northumberland are to be privately installed at Windsor, if the latter comes time enough from France, at which his Majesty will be present, but incognito: That on Saturday all the Court remove to Newmarket till Easter: That on Saturday the Lord Mayor and aldermen attended the King with a petition, setting forth that they heard that a patent was passing to one Cradocke for the collection of the tolls of the Marcatts, and to account for the same to the treasury, which they prayed might be stopped, in regard that the same belonged to them; and I do not hear what answer they had; but that they have been much divided in the Court of Aldermen about the satisfaction of the orphans: That they give out that the Earl of Danby and divers other lords prefer to farm all his Majesty's revenue at a great rent yearly, and half a million advanced: That divers lords design to attend his Majesty at Newmarket, to give him account of their respective charges: That it was said the Duke of Buckingham shall go into the West Indies as Vice Roy, and divers other stories which I do not credit. On Friday at the council his Majesty ordered none of his subjects should upon any pretence plant on the isle of Tobago (which is at present under the government of the Duke of Courland), by reason of the prejudice it will do Barbadoes and other his Majesty's islands thereabouts: That Mr. Powney, of Windsor, treating on Saturday his officers and friends upon his purchase of Captain Sutherland's company, a quarrel happened between his Ensign, one Flower, and Captain Potts, which he, Mr. Powney, thinking to compose, was run through the body (as he went to part them) by Mr. Flower and soon died. Here is a discourse spread that my lord is recalled from France to be sent to Spain, and that Mr. Soames shall succeed him; if it be with his lordship's good liking I shall be glad.

1683, Feb. 25, London. The Earl of Carlisle to Lord Preston.—About 14 days ago I was alarmed with a discourse of another being sent in your place By all that I can find you are well in the esteem of the King and Duke, and all the ministers, therefore I would not have you by any means be the occasion of being called home, lest you lose the recompence you may reasonably expect by staying out your time

1683, March 10th, Windsor. (H. Ball) to Lord Preston.—Alludes to the sudden death of Lord Bodmin.—The absence of the Court makes the town of London very melancholy. This morning I came from thence and left it without any news, except the death of the Earl of Thanet, who died yesterday morning about one, leaving his brother Thomas his successor and heir. The Duke of Ormond has been very ill, but it is hope recovered again, tho' not past danger. Its said a bargain is made between Sir Robert Holmes and the Duke of Grafton for the government of the Isle of Wight, and that his grace will be suddenly invested in it. The Earl of Danby is retired to Wimbledon, not being able to make his marquise pass; and his interest seems to lessen much, for they say the Earl of Plymouth will lose his government of Hull, which will be restored to my Lord Mulgrave. Madame Crofts is out of favour, and to quit the Court, and the Lady Mary Tudor is taken out of her charge and given to the governance of my Lady Mareshall. His Majesty has had no sport at Newmarket by reason of the drought, which has caused his Royal Highness to resolve to return to town about Thursday next. The treasury they say are adjourning till after Easter, which will retard your lordship's pay, and I fear the Lord Dartmouth's fleet will take up so much money that it will be further postponed, which I should be very sorry for; his lordship is daily expected. The Ensign that killed Mr. Powney was not able to get any reprieve, so was hanged on Saturday last at Reading: but his place given to Mr. Eton, and the company to Mr. Progers the Lieutenant, upon his promising to pay the widow 1,100*l*., which he gave. My Lord Brounker is not well; his lordship is master of St. Catherine's by the Tower, a place in disposal of the Queens of England, worth 1,500*l*. per annum. If your lordship could get the reversion thereof it would be worth the acceptance. If the Duke of Ormond should die, they say the Duke of Norfolk would have either the garter or the staff.

1684, May 8th, Whitehall.—R. Yard to Lord Preston.—The Duchess having been taken ill some days ago, the Duke came to town on Monday, and on Tuesday night her Royal Highness miscarried as they say of a boy Last Tuesday some words happening at the Tennis Court at Windsor between Coll. Orpe one of the lieutenants of the horse guards, and Mr. Trelawney, brother to Sir Jonathan Trelawney, the latter challenged the other by a whisper in the ear, and so they both went into the park where Coll. Orpe was unwilling to draw, thinking it not becoming him in that place, but was pressed to it by Mr. Trelawney. They fought, and Coll. Orpe received a wound, and so they were parted. Coll. Orpe's wound its hoped is not dangerous, and Mr. Trelawney is in custody. There has not passed anything of moment at Westminster Hall this week, unless it be that Mr. Attorney moved yesterday for judgment against Mr. Sacheverell, and the other rioters at Nottingham; and upon Cawdron, the Earl of Clare's steward, upon whom Mr. Attorney likewise prayed that considering the heinousness of his offence, which came very near to treason, some corporal punishment may be inflicted; and the Court have appointed to give judgment against the said persons on Saturday next.

1684, Aug. 25th. (H. and the Earl of Middleton made Secretary of State; and who is to be Secretary of Scotland I do not yet hear, being but just come to town.

1684, Sept. 15th, London. to my Lord (Preston). I doubt not but you have had an account of my Lord Argyle's letter, but possibly I can be more particular about it. It was addressed to Major Holmes, with whom my Lord Argyle expostulates that Broun (the dissenting lords) should reject the conditions of a proposal which it seems he had made of making a rebellion in Brand (Scotland), provided Birch (England) would advance 30,000*l.* English and 1,000 horse, which he says would be fitter for a brush in the beginning (whereupon he adds much depended) then a rabble of foot; however he seems to be contented, since he can do no better, with the offers they make of 10,000*l.* and 600 or 700 horse; he gives an account of the standing forces, the militia, and the heritors of Scotland which would be obliged to appear for the King, which he says might make a body of 50,000 men, but whereof he adds the half would not fight; he says his party wants only money and arms; they would have men enough but, he adds, arms must be provided in good time, for they cannot be remitted as letters of exchange; he refers much to other letters, and says that he had not time to write fully that post; matters appear not then to have been adjusted betwixt him and Broun, for he speaks not of anything as concluded on, but on the contrary seems much dissatisfied with Broun, and says whether he meddle himself or not in the business, so he desires Major Holmes to communicate himself fully to Mr. Rid (Carstairs as Spence says), or any other who should be sent to Holland. The letter is close and pertinent, and such a contrivance against Cromwell might have made him as famous as the same against his Majesty makes him infamous. His lady and his son my Lord Lorne have (being obliged to declare the truth) acknowledged that it seems to them to be his handwriting. The cypher is mighty curious; it is double, he makes use of borrowed words, and none of them are in their places, but to some two words that make to the purpose one must pass over 100 or 228 words, yet none of these intervening words are useless, but all to the purpose when put in their own places. I hear that Major Holmes understood only the first cypher, and Spence only the second, so that neither of them alone understood the letter. Thus Mr. Spence must have learned the first cypher from Major Holmes, or what has been since discovered of the plot must help him to find it out by the sense of what is clear in the letter, yet he cannot tell who M. L. is, who is only named in the letter with MS. (one Mrs. Smith who my lord lodged where he was at London, as Spence conjectures) and Mr. Rid. He ends the letter thus: (The total sum is 128 guilders and 3 stuivers) which is the key of the second cypher, the guilders signify so many lines, and the stuivers so many columns; such a letter must be written twice; this is the manner how it was written first, and must be written in the same manner by him to whom it is addressed, before he can understand it; but the letter that is sent is written as letters ordinarily are, only no sense appears. My Lord Argyle in the first place had joined as many sheets lengthwise as was necessary to make 128 lines in one page, then by folding the paper he makes 8 columns in it, and in writing a line puts but one word in each of them, so that there are only 8 words in every line, thus if you count from the left to the right hand there are 128 lines with 8 words in each of them; but if you count from the top to the foot there are 8 lines and 128 words in each of them; having done thus my lord takes new paper and writes after the ordinary manner, only he copies from top to foot, which makes all in appearance unintelligible; but least I do not express myself clearly, I shall suppose that the key had been 4 guilders and 4 stuivers, the first draught is thus:—

The	Archbp	of	Glasgow
is	made	Archbp	St. Andrews
bp	Brechin	bp	Glasgow
Drummond	bp	of	Brechin

Then I write the letter which is to be sent thus. I forgot to mention that the first line is from top to foot, and the second from foot to top, and so forth. The is bp. Drummond bp. Brechin made Archbp. of Archbp. by of Brechin Glasgow St. Andrews Glasgow. The Archbp. is unknown to me, but phanaticks say that if he is not so fortunate as to have the character of a primitive bp, he is so fortunate as not to be in primitive times; the other two are like known. Lundy succeeds to Middleton, another I hear was designed to succeed Godolphin, and I believe would have had it but that Middleton, whom his patron would not oppose, happened to be first named. I am told that one stood fair to succeed to Middleton in whom your lordship is too much concerned not to know the truth of it, for I have it not from very good hands. One Carstairs has had his thumb squeezed, but I do not hear that he has confessed any thing. Baillie of Jerviswood, one of the prisoners sent from this place for the plot, had a copy of his indictment on the 2nd of this month, for conspiring the King's death and to make a rebellion, conversing with intercommuned persons, corresponding with my Lord Argyle and Russell, Col. Sydney, &c.: there were no proofs, so all was referred to his oath; on the 4th a committee of the council was sent to him in prison, but he refused to swear, demanding a delay that he might consider his libel, and because of his indisposition, for he was dying, and so thought to have escaped, but he was fined the same day in 6,000*l.* English; he became speechless on Saturday after, being the 6th, and is now, I suppose, dead; his estate is worth 10,000*l.*, but to raise that money out of it will ruin it; the other prisoners will be proceeded against in the same manner. That Baillie was brother-in-law to Gen. Lieutenant Drummond, who I perceive lies under the unhappy character of a trimmer. Many of the gentry of Teviotdale have petitioned the council; their late chief has fined them in 250,000*l.* Scots, that is 21,000*l.* English, more or less. I know not if my author mistakes but I do not; they offer to swear that their ladys went to church ordinarily, and that they had not been at meetings since the last indemnity, but they could not swear that they had been precisely at church once 2 or 3 weeks; there is horning against several of them, but the council will no doubt put a stop to it, for gentlemen are oft absent from home, and unless they kept a register to mark down every time their ladys goes to church, it could not be expected that they should swear such an oath. One would have thought that the treasurer should not have been for making Lundy secretary; but hitherto the understanding betwixt him and the chancellor is so good that he does not provide against the time it may become bad. There is a general mistake that the late chancellor was the Duke's creation, he was raised by my Lord Queensberry in hopes he would always remember it, and was turned out by him for not doing it. . . .

1684, Sept. 25th, London.—The same to the same.—I can give you but a bad account of the discoveries in Scotland. I have no letters myself, and matters are kept mighty close, but if you will allow me I shall give you my conjectures what may have rendered so many of the best of the gentry obnoxious to the law. After the rebellion at Bothwell bridge an indemnity was granted, but out of it were excepted all heritors or men having land estates in the west where that rebellion was; all the tenants that have got a little money buy a few acres with it, so that there were more than 1,800 excepted, but it was thought such an exception was only designed to keep them in fear and not to be executed; they lived peaceably at home, every man denying his own guilt, till several years after, the judges on a sudden declared that every man that had conversed with them were guilty of treason.—Comments on the injustice of this.—The Duchess of Lawderdale being ready to go to Scotland to see my Lord Lawderdale is advertised that she is named in the plot, whereupon to colour her not going she has let blood and has got the gout. My Lord Maitland has made his peace, for it appears my Lord Argyle never trusted him. My Lord Lauderdale is coming up I suppose to get a gift of her forfeiture; this is very private but I believe it is true, it is like. Spence has told that there passed letters betwixt her and Argyle. Your lordship must allow me to tell you, tho' it be not proper here, my Lord Lawderdale's last words; I am sure of the truth of it. Doctor Needham I think it was who, desiring him to take what proved his last dose, he answered that he would take it tho' it were a turd, and never spoke after; and truly it was a suitable end for a man whose memory will stink. Your lordship will pardon such an expression and what I am going to add. I hear my Lord Dundonald is like to be brought to trouble for conversing, tho' only by the breach, with an unnamed rebel, for he gave his lordship a clystero. Now if his lordship shall pay 10,000*l.* for that clystero, which may happen, then, &c. . . .

1684, Oct. 16th, London. The same to the same.— . . . There is a rumour that the Earls of Haddington, Crauford, and Sutherland are imprisoned. Some companies of the standing forces are quartered in the town of Edinburgh. Every ship is searched that comes from abroad, and those that let lodgings at Edinburgh are obliged to give up the names of their lodgers. No man without permission is to go 20 miles from his own house. If these things be true (which I know not), either those who govern do really apprehend a rebellion, or are desirous to make people believe that they do so. It is also said that the Council begins to think that Mr. Munroe has put a trick on them, in telling more than is true, so to invalidate his own evidence, his design being only to escape torture. My Lord Tarras is said to cast himself on the King's mercy, but there are such uncertain reports that I am ashamed to write them; but what was said of the Duchess of Lauderdale is truer, for she is still sick; but it will be hard to prove that she sent money to my Lord Argyle, for no doubt she did it cunningly enough, and can for a shift turn it over on my Lady Lorne, who can hardly be troubled for it. Thus they will be necessitated to refer all to the Duchesses oath, in which case one would think she is in no great danger. Shall an estate acquired without conscience be lost by it? but she is as mean spirited in adversity as she was insolent in prosperity; I remember she cried like a child when D. Ham. (Duke Hamilton), appeared first against her husband, tho' the event proved there was no cause for it. Some say that D. Hamiltoun, General Dalziel, and some others, are making a party, and that the advocate is not well with the treasurer, nor with the chancellor. I hear he is bail for a prisoner; it seems his credit would rise no higher. I have been told that once the last summer he was in his raptures; he inclines that way in vacation time; but business ordinarily brings him down from these third heavens. I hear of one of his letters that begins, Sir good God, as if he only worried his Highness to hear him speak to God; if it had been to hear God speak to him it might be pardoned him. He goes on informing God how blessed a thing torture is; how happy the people of Scotland are in it, and how unhappy England is without it, and how that it is impossible to imagine that any government can subsist without it, and so on with his necessities for it and impossibilities without it, tho' Spence is the first, if I remember right, was told anything for torture now these 100 years. If torture could make men speak sense as well as truth he might be more particularly concerned to praise it, and have shunned what happened here in the cabinet council when some such letter of his being read, wherein he ridiculed the English laws and the constitution of the government, such offense was taken that notwithstanding the apologies were made for him because of his zeal, an order was made that no letters should be brought there but such as were examined by the committee of secrecy in Scotland. It is surmised that there will be a Parliament in Scotland this winter. Sir Samuel Bernardiston's estate is seized on for his fine, and all the furniture of his house. His lady would needs go there to look on, and so lost her coach and horses. Sheriff Bethell's estate is also seized, and the writ is sealed for Mr. Hampden's estate.

n. y., Nov. 6th.—This is my third since I had the favour to hear from your lordship. I have Spence's confession; I do not believe it is an entire copy. He says he believes there was a design of an insurrection, but he pretends to know nothing particular about it. He says my Lord Loudoun and the late President Stairs were with my Lord Argyle in Holland. This is the only passage by which any person can suffer except my Lord Argyle, of whose guilt nobody doubts: He being desired to explicate what is the meaning of these words mercy tale betwixt Butler and his landlord, which are in one of the letters, he answers that his landlord (so it seems he was Mr. Butler) said to the best of his understanding (for his landlord was a Dutchman, and Spence says he knew little of the language), that the people of England were so dissatisfied with the King that if they could not do it otherwise they would, crossing his neck, as they had done to his father (these are his words), and that he replied, people ought not to speak so of kings. All this is obscure, however it may be reasonably concluded that my Lord Argyle's design (if he be the author of the letter, which I know not) was to excite Mr. Butler to put in practice the Dutchman's conjectures. I am the more inclined to think the copy I have seen is not full enough, since Mr. Spence is not further questioned on so ticklish a point, for if the letter was addressed to him (as in all probability it was since he explicates the landlord's discourse) no doubt he could tell what was the design of the writer in mentioning such a thing to him, if it was only to put him in mind of some other thing, or if it was on a worse design. The bond for which D. Hamiltoun and others came to London to complain is now imposed; the late plots do alter the scene. The Earl of Cassells is prisoner for refusing it. Sir G. Lockart is said to have refused it, but I doubt of it . . . My Lord Rochester is to be Deputy of Ireland if my Lord Ormond die, or if he consent to it, or if it be found necessary to remove him from that employment; however, it is believed my Lord Rochester will be sent thither, notwithstanding all these conditions; and it is a pity he should not, for both his friends and enemies solicit for him, as I am told they did to get him made president of the council, for it was his own, tho' not deliberate demand; but many call this a supplanting of my Lord Ormond; for they say that the inequality of the match betwixt the two families was balanced by the expectation my Lord Ormond had of dying Deputy of Ireland, having so great a supporter. My Lord Halifax goes not often to Court, and is not thought to be much in favour, but on the other hand it is not believed his credit will grow less, no more than that of the Prince of Orange, who it seems would rather have England enter into a bargain with France than continue neutral; the first is as probable as the latter . . . I hear of a new project of making my Lord Rochester secretary, and my Lord Sunderland treasurer, but its thought the treasury will be still kept in commission. If my Lord Queensbury knew how much my Lord Perth is in favour it might create jealousy betwixt them. The trimmer clergy have yesterday fallen severely on popery, even to repeat K. James his imprecation on any of his posterity that should be popishly affected, upon the pains of worse than death. Some vacancies being supplied, it is like those that are disappointed take their revenges . . .

1684, Dec. 1st, London.—The same to the same.—This is my fourth letter since I had the honour to hear from you. I am still ignorant of the nature of the Scotch plot, if it was an association to take effect after his Majesty's death or at present. It is surmised that there is some difference betwixt the Treasurer and the Chancellor, but I know no particulars since they came from the circuits. My Lord Melville and my Lord Lowdown (who is now dead) are declared fugitives. Polwart and Saltoun are indicted of treason, the former I think for an association, Saltoun for his contrivances with my Lord Argyle in Holland, in order to the carrying on of the English plot. I believe only Carstairs witnesses against him, and I am told that he, before he would make any discovery, got an Act of Council to be made, securing him from the necessity of being an evidence. Sir John Cunningham is dead. The methods taken at the circuits were these, the conformist clergy with their consistorys were obliged to give on oath lists of the dissenters, who were fined and did engage to live regularly, those who refused were banished. The test was presented to none but those whose names were in the roll of persons outlawed, upon the taking of which they were absolved. This was all was done in the southern counties where the judges did not meddle with the gentry, they being already fined by Gordoun and Mel-drum (who died lately on a sudden) the sheriff deputies. In the west, besides what is already mentioned, a bond was put to all heritors, that is freeholders, and the test to as many as those deputed by the council thought convenient. The gentlemen that refused either of them or opposed the supply are imprisoned, or at least have found bail that they shall present themselves at Edinburgh to his Majesty's council; those of the meaner sort, among whom are many merchants in Glasgow, are banished. Sir George Lockart is either confined to his house or in prison, so are my Lord Cassells, my Lord Carmichael, the Baron of Carstairs, who is brother-in-law to the Treasurer, and many others . . . The Duke goes to Scotland on the 15th of February to hold a Parliament. A Parliament is necessary to ratify what has been done, and to forfeit absent traitors, for those that have not been in actual rebellion, tho' guilty of treason, can be outlawed if they be absent, and their estates sequestrated, but they cannot be forfeited without a Parliament, but all that seems not tanti to make the Duke go to Scotland. It is whispered here about town that there has been a proposition made for a declaration to soften the execution of the laws against papists, which disaffected people call a tolerance of popery. Whigs say that my Lord Sunderland did second it, and that my Lord Keeper and my Lord Halifax (who some think will go to the country in the spring) did oppose it. I wish every peaceable man was let stand and fall to his own master; it is in the next world only that men can be judged for their religion, so that it seems preposterous to punish them in this . . . We have had rumours of the D. of Monmouth being here, there is some ground for such reports, but yet they may be false . . . (Seal, a heart with an eye in the centre on a wreath. The motto encircling it is broken, the last letter is O.)

1684, Dec. 29th. Sir Sam. Morland to Lord Preston.—What my behaviour has been since my coming into this country your lordship very well knows, and what my present condition is the enclosed papers will inform you. When I go from hence, if I return into England, there I shall find myself and children after me by the great severity of the Lords of the Treasury defeated of the 400*l.* per annum land of inheritance out of the Lancaster Duchy rents, of which his Majesty made me so absolute a promise about 12 years since. Besides an arrear of 14 or 1,500*l.* due to the poor workmen for the engine at Windsor, for which they look upon me as responsible, and accordingly threaten me. My lord, these are but uncomfortable reflections for the latter end of my life.—Asks Lord Preston for his mediation with his most sacred Majesty that when he goes from this place his way may be made more easy into his own country.—If the King has no service for me, then I would willingly repair into the North, and there take my chance among the coal mines, &c. If my way may not be cleared into England, in regard of the fore-mentioned difficulties, then I humbly beg your lordship to move the King that he would please to give me his letters, recommendatory to the Great Duke of Florence, who perhaps may give me bread that little time I am like to live. Probably I may die by the way, and then my prayer shall be, that his Majesty would be pleased in remembrance of old services and promises to provide for my son, who is now a student in the Temple, according to his quality, and to continue my pension till such time as they shall have satisfied my private debts.

1685, April 5th. At my Lord Feversham's at Whitehall.—To Monseigneur Colbert de Croissy (in French much decayed and the signature torn off). The writer says that he was known to Lord Preston, having been brought up "dans le College Royal dont je suis un de la fondation." He says that he is not wholly unknown to Colbert, and that for the last 24 years all the nobility who have come into England have found him ready to serve them. He asks to be allowed to come into France and dispose of his property.

1685, April 6th, Carlisle.—James Nicholson to Lord Preston, at Mr. Graham's house in Soho Square.—Tells him of his being unanimously elected one of the knights for this county to serve in the next Parliament.

1685, April 30th, London.—Pulleyn to Lord Preston).—Acknowledges the receipt of some money for things bought at Rome.—We hear your lordship will be here at the Parliament, but no news of Sir John Borlase. All the difficult part of the marriage between Lord Irvine and Lord Sherrard's daughter is over and concluded: . . . Lord Grey is gone with Lord Manchester to Lees; some will have him espouse Lord Hatton's daughter suddenly, which I heartily wish. The Quakers' address to his Majesty runs thus: We condole with thee the death of our friend Charles; we are glad thou art come to be our ruler; we hear that thou art a dissenter from the Church of England, and so are we; we hope thou wilt allow us the liberty thou takest thyself; and so wish thee well. This puts me in mind of the Recorder's blunder to the Queen, who condoled with sorrow in one hand, and grief in the other, which is put into verse thus:

Madam, we bring you, to be very brief,
In this hand sorrow, and in that hand grief,
And we'll be sure to come again to-morrow,
With grief in this hand, and in that hand sorrow.

1685, May 16th. Sir Sam. Morland to Lord Preston.—Has made all inquiries concerning the enclosed paper (it contains list of flowers, jonquils, tuberoses, &c.), and the florists tell him the proper time for planting is at the end of February or beginning of March; he sends the names of the most eminent florists in Paris. (Enclosed are the names of these florists.)

1685, July 11th, Edinburgh. William Aikman to Lord Preston.—A formal letter, saying that the answer is herewith enclosed from the royal burroughs to his lordship, wherein they do most justly acknowledge how much they owe him.—He will see by their letter that the troubles here have been such that they have minded no business but his Majesty's, and they doubt not but upon application his Majesty will be mindful of them, and will from time to time assist their privileges both in France and elsewhere, and will instruct his ambassadors for that effect.

(On the other side of the page Mr. Aikman writes.—Things are here again perfectly settled. Sir John Cochran and his son are in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, waiting a return from his Majesty to Sir John's offer to discover some thing of great importance which he thinks may save his life. To be short, each blames other for the mismanagement, and Rombolt blamed all. Mr. Charles Campbell, one of my late Lord Argyle's sons, is taken in a wood near his father's house, and is to be here this night or to-morrow; the other son has escaped with Sir Pat. Hume, of Polwort, but cannot continue long undiscovered. Coll. Ailiff and two preachers were brought in from Glasgow yesterday, and many of the Highland prisoners daily, whereof my Lord Atholl has hanged several upon the place. Coll. Ailiffe is civilly used upon my Lord Dumbarton's acquaintance, and is thought may be saved upon his lordship's intercession. Rombolt the malster, his head and quarters are boxed up for England by order from Court after they were set up here. Argyle's head is upon the west end of the Tolbooth, and all his arms and amunition put in the castle. All this day we have had firing of guns and ringing of bells, upon report of the rebels being beat in England, and Gray and Holmes taken, the news whereof came first from my Lord Dumbarton's camp, near Dumfries, whence they were marching towards England; and Coll. Douglas's regiment of guards and three troops of horse were called up, but God be thanked there's no need of them . . .

1685, Oct. 25th, Whitehall.—The Earl of Sunderland to Lord Preston.—The King commands me to acquaint your lordship that he would have you attend him at Mr. Chiffinch's lodgings to-morrow, being Monday, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

1685, Feb. 15th. Sir Thomas Chicheley to Lord Preston.—Asks him to lay his commands on Mr. Aulsworth for a copy of his patent for the auditors of the Duchy. They have been to him (Chicheley) several times to make complaint, and he is sure it is prejudicial to the King's revenue, which is like to suffer very much by it.

1686, Aug. 5th. Tho. Robson to Lord Preston.—I had answered your lordship's of 24th July sooner could I have had an opportunity of seeing Lord Feversham sooner; but it was Tuesday last ere I had the good fortune of meeting with his lordship. He being a great officer in the camp, spent much of his time there, but it's now decamping. The dragoons are already marched to their quarters, and I think both horse and foot will follow this week. But I am now to acquaint your lordship that my Lord Feversham had your letter with the enclosed, and communicated the contents to the Queen, who was well satisfied with it; and his lordship begs a thousand pardons that he hath not yet answered it . . . He desires your lordship will be so kind as to give account of the Queen's affairs, as any shall occur to your lordship. . . .

n. y. Feb. 15th. H. [Countess of] Rochester to Lord Preston, at Paris. Complimentary; and thanks for Lord Preston's civilities to her while in France.

n. d. (Dr.) W. Levett to Lord Preston.—I made your lordship's compliments in the same manner you directed me to both the ladies last night. My Lady Hyde is under the physician's hands, and does not stir out in the morning. My Lady Thanet, I find by her, designs to come and wait on your lordship at prayers and sermon, but is obliged to return home to dinner, she and my Lady Hyde having invited my Lady Berkely and Mr. Povey to dine with them. . . .

n. y. Jan. 7th, London.—Lord Morpeth to (Lord Preston).—Condoles with Lord Preston on his illness . . . My Lord Duke of Norfolk is adying, which is the only news I know. . . .

n. y. Jan. 15th. Jo. (Fell, Bishop of) Oxford, to Lord Preston, at Paris.—Condolences on his illness.

[1683.] Aug. 16th, London.—(Sir) Christopher Musgrave to Lord Preston.— . . . My Lord Dartmouth rides Admiral in St. Hellen's Point, waiting a fair wind. God send him a prosperous voyage and a safe return. His Majesty designs buying all the saltpetre imported; and we in the Ordnance must labour that his Majesty may reap an advantage by it, which must be by supplying his subjects at home and foreign parts. And by your lordship's favour may understand whether the King of France makes all his own powder; if he does not, from whence he is furnished, and what he gives a barrel . . . My Lord Conway died on Saturday, leaving 32,000*l.* in money, and all his personal estate to his Lady, and his real estate to her during her life, and after her death to Mr. Edw. Seymoore's son by the second venture. Not one farthing to poor Frank Gwin, which occasions great admiration.

n. y., August 27th. Covent Garden.—John Baber to Lord Preston, at Paris. From the late fresh alarms of the French King's great revolutions are generally expected, yet I who can brag of nothing but being a true English man think my country safe, and as secure under your lordship's ministry as the French do theirs under their Barillon's. If England falls out with France, amongst other felicities, we may expect that of your lordship's return.

LETTERS FROM FRANCE.

1682, Jan. 24th, Paris.—Hen. Savile to Lord Preston.—You must give me leave to give myself joy of having your lordship for my successor For a secretary, I brought one out of England when I came first, but soon found I could do very well without one, and have during my whole time made my own memorials and delivered them written in my own hand; if your lordship find want of the habit of writing French has put your hand a little out for the present, it were advisable to bring one with you out of England, nay it will be some ease to have one always. The method of memorials you will easily see by reading a few at the secretary's office, either such as have been given in here by your predecessors, or such as are daily presented to the King which are in the same style, so that you will have no difficulty in that particular

1682, Feb. 4, n. s., Paris. (French.) Dan. Skinner to Lord Preston. "The recollection which I have of beginning my studies with your Excellency at the famous school of Westminster makes me take the liberty of sending you my compliments on the preference which the King of Great Britain has shown to your person in making you his ambassador at the Court of France." After some compliments he says that as a long residence (habitude) in France has given him a perfect knowledge of the language and of the practice of that Court he offers his services to Lord Preston. (Holograph.)

1682, Feb. 11th, Paris. Hen. Savile to the same.—. . . . Mons^r. Laisné stands fair to be your lordship's secretary: it is impossible for me not to give him my good word, which truly I think he does well deserve, besides that his being naturalised, being a Protestant, and having his little fortune in England takes away all the arguments that could most probably be urged to his prejudice, nor has it been unusual to our ministers here to have had French secretaries. I should humbly advise you to make use in money matters of one Mr. Ord, the only banquier I know here of his Majesty's subjects His correspondent at London is one Mr. Fowles, easily found upon the Change.

1682, March 24th, Paris. Hen. Savile to

—I am just taking coach for England and deferred writing till this moment in hopes of giving you some good account of your business; but I perceive my successor, Lord Preston, must finish it when he comes. I have brought it so near an issue that you may reasonably hope for a good one, and for my justification do send you the copy of the memorial I presented to this King, which now lies before Mons^r. de Seignelay. P.S. I never received any orders from England what to do in the business of the tin.

1682, July 1st, Dunkerk. J. Ellis to Lord Preston.—I doubt not but your lordship will be much surprised to find that I write this from Dunkerk and not from Callis. Gives an account of a severe storm at sea, the master of the vessel finding that he could not put back to Calais aimed for Dunkerk, where they arrived that morning.—. . . . I am not a little concerned at this accident, as your lordship may imagine, for what concerns your service; but the seamen have a saying that they fling in my teeth when I seem impatient, Go, says the King, and stay says the wind; and this will be obeyed.

1682, Oct. 21st, n. s., Paris. R. Tempest to Lord Preston.—Count Masfieldt is yet only expected, and yet they in his house say they expect him every minute.

1682, Thursday, Nov. 19th, Paris. (French.) D. Skinner to Lord Preston.—This is the second time that I address your Excellency in French. The first was to offer my services. This is to thank you for "all the kindnesses you have been pleased to shew me, 'alto' my hopes have failed" He says he will not reproach Lord Preston for so little recollecting his promise, but only fears that some one has maliciously turned Ld. Preston from his penchan to him; he puts Lord P. in mind that he had voluntarily promised his friendship to him (Skinner). He asks an audience of Lord Preston. Fragment of seal. A Viscount's coronet above a cypher. The writing is not Skinners.

1683, May 29th, n. s., Paris.—R. Tempest to Lord Preston.—They have it confirmed here for certain that the King of Spain is dangerously ill and has been blooded 5 times; however, the Spanish ambassador says it is only a slight indisposition and nothing to be feared from it. . . .

1683, June 16th, n. s., Paris. The same to the same.—'Tis now almost a fortnight since every body assured me so confidently of your lordship's being either upon the road or just ready to set out, that I concluded it unnecessary to write any more; but since I find now that your departure is yet uncertain I beg leave to trouble your lordship with an account of what passes here. The King took a general review of his camp upon the Saone the 8th instant, &c. The enclosed is for Mr. Carlton, come from Mrs. Heron. I have besides sent Mr. Secretary a extract of several letters which I had yesterday from the Abbé, which I could not think fit to trouble your lordship with.

1683, July 5th, n. s., Paris. The same to the same.—The 3 enclosed letters are all which I have received for your lordship since Saturday, when I gave your lordships' paquet to Mons^r. Godet, as I do this, that he may recommend it as he says he will where it shall most certainly meet your lordship. I have also humbly taken leave to add the city petition in print, and Mr. Mount-steven's letter, which contain all the news I had from England, having made an extract of them for the person your lordship always orders me to communicate them to. . . .

1683, July 12th, n. s., Paris.—The same to the same.—All letters from England of this day are full of nothing, but new circumstances of this lately discovered plot; I send your lordship enclosed these two of mine which are the most particular, and Mr. Innis has added another I also send your lordship the proclamation that has issued for the apprehending the D. of Monmouth, &c., as I made bold to do in my last, another for the seizing of several other persons.

1683, July 20th, n. s., Mons. Fr. Bridgeman to Lord Preston.—I had my liberty at the end of 3 weeks imprisonment by a letter from M. de Louvois to M. D'Amours, the King's Lieutenant in the Government of Avenas; I find myself, therefore, under as great a necessity of troubling your Excellency again with my most humble thanks 1683, Nov. 1st, Chantilly. Louis de Bourbon (Prince de Condé) to the Abbé Renandot. (French).—Says, in answer to a letter from Renandot, that he knows nothing of Dr. Burnet but from seeing some books written by him; that M. de Ruigny brought Burnet to him (the Prince) some time previously; but he (the Prince) shewed him no civilities, and that if he comes again he will be ill received.

1683, Nov. 9th, n. s., Tuesday, Calais.—The same to the same.—We are still wind bound here, and the master of the boat makes us fear we shall not soon get loose. The news here is the certainty of the taking of Courtray (as well the citadel as the town), with the loss of some hundreds of the French, and they say here the Pr. of Conti amongst them, but this I know your lordship will have from better hands and sooner. The mayor of this place, being told I belonged to your lordship, made me a very civil compliment, would take nothing for my pass, and ordered the gates to be open for me at what hour I would 1684, May 24th. From the camp at Luxembourg.—T. Burnet to Lord Preston.—We came to the camp at Luxembourg this morning, and there being an unhappy accident just before our arrival, my Lord Ossory being much troubled at it, thought your lordship the most proper person to be made first acquainted with it. About 10 o'clock Mr. Howard went into the trenches, and there unfortunately received a musket shot in his right shoulder, which went downwards, and so near through his body that upon an incision they took out the bullet at his back. I shall give your lordship a further account of it by the next post. My Lord Ossory hath an extraordinary concern for Mr. Howard (so indeed have all the English here). Marshal Créquien sent him the surgeon and offered him the command of his house, and whatsoever accommodation or conveniences can be had in this place he will be sure to have. Mons^r. Parel was with him in the trenches, and brought him off to my lord's tent, where he is yet.

bourg.—The same to the same.—Not having had yet any instructions from your lordship concerning Mr. Howard's affairs since the time I first writ to your lordship of May 24th, we thought it most convenient to follow the directions which he left himself in writing in the nature of a will, a copy whereof I have sent here enclosed. And accordingly my Lord Ossory hath delivered all the diamonds to Mr. Parel (who left us this day), which he is to deliver to my Lord and Lady Carlisle, and a pair of diamond buttons to your lordship. My lord hath also delivered to him the girdle of Louis d'ors, which Mr. Howard wore, the surgeons and apothecary being paid out of them.

1686, Jan. the —, Paris. (Sir) Will. Trumbull to Lord Preston Thanks for yours of the 11th, s. v., of the last month The extremity that things are in here, in relation to the poor Protestants, and the resolution that is taken to go on in the same way makes a cessation of all other news, of commerce and of all kind of liberty in conversation and acquaintance. I would beg your lordship to give me a particular account of Mons^r. Bon-repos' negotiation in England. I know it is given out here that he went to our Court in order to settle some matters relating to commerce, and to regulate some differences upon that subject between England and France and also the Dutch, and that he is thereupon to pass into Holland. But I am well assured that his business is to give an account of the 18 passengers that were taken out of the Nieuport packet boat, and the other fishermen (belonging to Rye) which were seized and brought into France. I have not yet been able (what instances soever I have repeated) to obtain a satisfactory answer of this matter from England, and am still in the dark what steps I ought to make, having been assured by Mons^r. de Croissy that the King my master is fully satisfied in this business. In the affair of the principality of Orange, after the utmost violences committed by the dragoons, I find they are resolved here not to give the least satisfaction. It is to no purpose to insist upon the Treaty of Nimeguen (to which all these proceedings are the clearest contraventions imaginable), for Mons^r. de Croissy says that the King has now done all that he thought himself obliged to do in justice and conscience for the salvation of the inhabitants of that town, and so the business is at an end. Only I must acquaint your lordship with an extraordinary distinction that he made to me: That in regard of the spiritual, the King had indeed taken care to reduce them all into the bosom of the church; but as to the temporal there was no innovation at all, but all things were left in the same condition they were before. And on Tuesday last when I gave in another memorial about this matter, he said he wondered the King my master would trouble himself about a thing in which he had no interest at all, but that he ought to leave this King to do what he thought good in his dominions, as he would leave our King to do in his. I cannot conclude this trouble without my very particular acknowledgements for your giving Mons^r. d'Ayrolle to me . . . he is so diligent and useful to me, that together with the help of my nephew (who serves to copy and translate into French any ordinary things), and my own long custom of drudging at business, I make a shift to be without any other secretary, and think I shall be able to hold out, at least as well I have begun. I have not failed to assure to Mr. Conne of my readiness to serve him in any thing, and how ready I will be on all occasions to do any good office I can to the Comte Bartolin Compliments.

n. d. (Endorsed, Mr. Fleetwood Shephard) to Lord Preston at Paris.—To avoid the impertinency of sending a Gazet with an epistle to the reader, I am only to let your lordship know that, Scotland, Wednesday the 10.—There is a flying report that according to the civility of the northern nations they are prepared to entertain his Royal Highness with a rebellion. London.—The bill of mortality. Harry Howard's wife, my Lord Suffolk's brother, and Sir Thomas Bludder, that new built London, the latter will occasion an extraordinary trial of skill betwixt Whig and Tory about a successor. The Bantam ambassador made his entry on Tuesday with all the foppery of his country as we thought, and was received with as much of ours as he thought it. Your lordship will be pleased to let this gentleman have the maiden-head of your employment by procuring him your pass for the wine, horse, and the box of books I formerly mentioned. the quickness of his dispatch will infinitely increase the obligation. To-morrow there will be a most learned cavalcade from Northumberland House to Abermarle, to make his grace the chiefest scholar in Cambridge On a slip enclosed is a list of persons forming the embassy from Bantam.

1684, July 1, de l'hermitage de bonne Esperance. Ph. De la Taste to [Lord Preston]. Thanks for past favours. (French.)

16 , May 22, Couber. Le Mareschal de Schonberg to [] Sends the two letters according to the address in request.—I doubt not that the King recollects that when the King, his brother, gave me the patent of peer of England, I was in very good favour with the Prince of Orange, and that I drew money and aid from the Prince of Orange for the King and the Queen-Mother of England, when it had been referred to Lord St. Alban's and others who had been often sent to ask for money, which the whole Court of England needed for their subsistence, specially when there was civil war in France. I ask pardon for this long story, to which I would add, in case you judge fit to mention it in your letter to Lord Rochester, that, if it is necessary that my son, who has lately arrived from Tours d'Allemagne, should go there, he will go there to obtain a favour and an honour from the King, which I wish very much [to be] in my family (French.)

n. d. Tuesday evening. to Lord Preston. I have just learned that the vessel has arrived at Dieppe. I entreat you my lord that this young gentleman may have your protection for the voyage which he is about to make M. de Schomberg and I will be truly obliged to you; you know how we both honour you. La Maréchale de Schomberg permits me to add here my very humble compliments to Madame your wife.

n. d. Friday morning. De Lange Montmiras to [Lord Preston]. Sends the arrêt and précis which his lordship asked for. Has done the like for M. Spanheim. (French.)

n. d., Sunday, Calais. (R. Tempest) to Lord Preston. —I came to Bologne last night about 7 o'clock, where I met some gentlemen who came from hence that day; and they assuring me the packet boat which should have gone on Friday was not like to part till this morning, I lay there, and this morning about 4 o'clock came hither, where I find the same packet boat still wind bound, but hoping to go off this afternoon. If the wind serve I hope to be at London in good time, for I find riding post agrees very well with me.

1685, July 31, Versailles. Le Mareschal de Schonberg to [Lord Preston]. Hearing of the entire defeat of the rebels he sends congratulations, and requests that his rejoicings may be made known to the King, and also his desire to serve the King. He sends to Marshal d'Humieres the commission which the King has sent for the purpose of expressing his compliments. Hopes soon to see Lord P. back in France. (French.)

n. d. to [Lord Preston]. I thank you for the memoirs which you have communicated to me. I will send to-morrow the Emperor's letter on the release of the Sieur Fayet. I have learned the death of the Lord Chancellor of England (French, not signed, and not addressed.)

n. d. J. Bemde to Lord Preston. I can give your lordship no other knowledge of his name than that he is of the family of the rich Courtine of England, which I suppose to be spelt as your lordship has written it; to endeavour a speedy trial by your interest is concluded on by all to be the greatest favour your lordship can do him. I shall also endeavour to give you a further account of it some time to day, being put into a fair way to give myself some light into this affair.

n. d. Terr. O'Brien to Captain Sheldon at Paris.—I could not in honour forbear to give you an item of what passed amongst us on Saturday night about your being absent, every one giving his verdict against you, in so much that the Cardinal was at first much displeased, until such time as I spoke and told them that you were not able to stir by reason of a pain that you had in your leg, the which the Cardinal presently believed and was well satisfied, knowing that you were hitherto the most readiest person upon all occasions to forward this business, and presently appointed you to be the only man to over see the shipping of all our necessities, and also to have a care of all other affairs in Glessane's absence, since that he is now the only person that they have pitched on to go to England, finding him more abler than Evverard to go on with those affairs, and that he will do it with more speed, so that I hope to see you at Nant before I part, for I am sure and do believe that you will receive your orders before you receive this letter.

LETTERS FROM ENGLISH MINISTERS ABROAD.

BRUSSELS.

1682, June 18th, Bruxelles. Sir R. Bulstrode to Lord Preston We are here much pleased that Baron d'Hostel is gotten into Luxemburg with his regiment of 800 men, not having staid above 4 hours within the French territories to refresh his men, and reached Luxemburg before the French could draw together to hinder him There hath been some disorder at Gaunt upon renewing their magistrates, but his Excellency hath adjusted that matter and placed them according to their nobility and antiquity, and hath settled all matters to his great satisfaction The French continue very quiet in their new conquests, but the confiscations still continue, and they are not content to let the rents be sequestered in the receiver's hands, but have ordered their being paid to their several intendants. Our last Spanish letters tell us the ministers of that Court are more inclined for war than peace, from the encouragements they have received from hence, from Holland, and from the Emperor, whom they are resolved to assist with considerable sums Mr. Howard is by this time returned very well satisfied into England, his Excellency having presented him with a ring which cost 3,500 florins.

1682, July 2nd, Bruxelles. The same to the same.—Our last Spanish letters told us his Cath. Majesty had received the Emperor's resolutions of not receding from the peace of Nimegue, and was resolved to take the same measures, and not to consent to any Treaty unless that peace be entirely made good However, no doubt is made of a war, unless France will resign what hath been taken from the empire and these countries since the peace I am afraid a war in this conjuncture on this side would a little entangle our master, and perhaps one of the motives for beginning it is to that end, and tho' the allies do not believe the King will call a Parliament, yet we say here their ministers are doing what they can to oblige his Majesty to declare one way or other. The Prince of Orange is at this time visiting the States garrisons in Flanders, and his Excellency intends the next week to see Aeth, Mons. Charle Roy, and Namur. Mons^r. Bedmar is expected here within a day or two from Luxemburg, having left it in good condition, sufficiently provided with men, money, and all things needful; he hath brought back the four Italian regiments from thence to Gueldres.

1682, Dec. 3rd, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.—Acknowledges Lord Preston's of the 20th of Nov.—The most considerable (news) we had from Frankfort of the French ambassador's preparations to depart, but we seem not here much surprised at it, and look upon his most Christian Majesty giving them the prolongation of two months to be a bounty, they neither desired nor asked, and his Excellency declares that for his part he hath never desired neither in France nor England a prolongation, and having heard that Don P. Ronquillos desired by a memorial (tho' in indirect terms) his Majesty's interposition for prolonging the term, he says he did it upon his own head, and without orders. What hath been done upon it there we know not, our last letters being the day after the presentation of it, and we now want two posts from thence, but since his Christian Majesty hath been so kind to the Emperor and empire, we doubt not but he will give the same prolongation to Spain, for accepting the arbitrage; tho' our last letters from Madrid say that orders are sent to Don P. Ronquillo to repeat to our master his Cath. Majesty's former resolutions of not separating from the Emperor, the empire, and their allies, nor to consent to any Treaty except jointly with them, in which case his Cath. Majesty would accept of our master's mediation, not arbitrage; which procedure is much approved here, his Excellency believing the most Christian King will be contented with it, and will very unwillingly come to a rupture, finding the Emperor and Catholic King so firm in their resolutions. We are told likewise from Madrid that those ministers seem not inclined to moderate their resentments against Sir H. G. [Goodricke], refusing still to own him under his public character, or to hold any Treaty or communication with him, so that in effect we have no minister there, which falls out very unluckily for his Majesties service in this conjuncture.

1682, Dec. 20th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— The strange reservedness of his Excellency may excuse me for not writing so often as otherwise I ought. I doubt not but your lordship hath seen Mr. Chudleigh's late memorial, which hath made a mighty noise in this Court, being much dissatisfied with it, and impatiently expect the States resolutions upon it. I know not what effect it may have there, but we are here in great hopes the States will not be prevailed with. Dr. B. F. Mayer is said to have answered it, but I do not well understand how it could become him to do it, neither have I ever seen anything from his pen, that he hath much strength of reason, but only words, and those most commonly very shocking. This Court is of opinion that, tho' the States should be induced by our master's persuasions to press the arbitrage to Spain, yet their joint efforts will not be able to shake his Cath. Majesty's resolution, who, his Excellency says, will rather lose what is left of this country by a war than make a separate peace, and adds further that if a war follow our master shall not escape being engaged therein. I heartily wish his Majesty's endeavours for a peace may be successful; but if this Court have any influence upon the Spanish Councils the arbitration will hardly be accepted, his Excellency being a zealous opposer of it, and besides his Cath. Majesty seems to be of a much differing opinion from our master as to the means of obtaining a peace I much doubt the next year will be more troublesome, unless your and Mr. Chudleigh's negotiations prove successful.

1683, April 11th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— The several encampments which are intended by his Christian Majesty giving us here some apprehension, insomuch that his Excellency told me the other day there was much appearance of a war, and therefore desired (which he never did before) that I would let his Majesty know the true state of these countries, and that they were not able to maintain any more troops than they had, which were not half enough to defend these territories, and hoped his Majesty would assist him in this conjuncture, and that he would desire only 2,000 men of him, and added unless my master prevented the war there would be no possibility to avoid it, and that he would be involved in it as well as his neighbours; whereupon I told him, seeing they were so ill prepared for a war, which was likely to be fatal to them, I wondered they had not prevented it by accepting the arbitrage; to which he briskly replied, it was a remedy worse than the disease, and so brake off the discourse. But it is the opinion of the wisest men in this Court that the French preparations on all sides will oblige Spain to accept the arbitrage, and the Emperor to treat upon the French propositions My Lord Carlingford came hither some days since to meet his brother Taafe from Germany, whom our master hath made an Irish Viscount; they have been both very well treated by his Excellency and the nobles here, and will part to-morrow, it being high time, they having changed their fasting here into feasting, and would have been very ill company for the holy week. I cannot omit to tell your lordship for your diversion that the Spaniards thought they had mighty debauches in drinking so high with my Lord Carlingford, and did this last night make excuses to his lordship that they had committed so great excesses; but his lordship told them they need not make any such excuse, for he used to drink more in one night in England than he had done all the time he was here, which put the grandes much out of countenance; and his lordship had with him in these rencontres James Porter, who is a reasonable good second upon such an occasion.

1683, Aug. 12th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— This Court is highly incensed (as we hear the Emperor is also) at his most Christian Majesty's answer given by M. Cressy at Ratisbon, upon the Emperor's desire of peace with France; the resolution which will be taken upon it will, in all appearance, depend upon the good or bad success of the siege of Vienna, concerning which our relations have been very different, and we were in much fear of it till our yesterday's letters told us the Duke of Lorrain, with the conjunction of the Bavarian and some other auxiliary forces, was advanced on this side the Danube betwixt Vienna and Presburg, and hath given a great defeat to Tekeley's army. . . .

1683, Aug. 29th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— The account your lordship was pleased to give me in yours of the 23rd will I fear prove too true,

SIR
F. GRAHAM
BART.

SIR
GRAHAM,
BART.

we being warmly alarmed from all parts of the new conquests with the extraordinary number of troops which descend daily thither; and the vas[t] magazines prepared at Maubeuge, Philipville, Charlemont, and Dinnant shew us they have some great design in prospect on this side; but their preparations are so great on all sides that we are in equal fear in every place, and therefore the provinces have orders to be upon their guard. The sluices are opened at Neaport, and all laid under water for security of that important place, the French troops being very numerous at Ypres and Dunkirk. For the frontier garrisons on this side, his Excellency hath reinforced them as much as he can, and hath sent an express to the Prince of Orange and the States to desire some of their troops. And his Excellency hath desired me to represent to his Majesty the fears he hath of being attacked; he told me his Majesty knew very well how much his own interest would suffer in the loss of these countries; that for his own particular he lay under an indispensable obligation of defending these provinces, but that the great inequality betwixt his troops and those of the French rendered him incapable of doing it without the assistance of his master's allies, and therefore hoped his Majesty would take such measures therein as might prevent this storm from falling upon them, which would be a fatal blow. I told him he might be assured of his Majesty's good intentions for them, and that if he had not improved his interest and good offices by your lordship's applications to the most Christian King this country had not so long continued in repose; that what was now falling upon them was long since foreseen and foretold them by the King my master when they refused the arbitrage. I likewise added I should be very glad if I could in my station be instrumental to do these countries any service or his Excellency in particular, and that I would not fail in that part of my duty faithfully to represent to his Majesty the true condition of these countries, which I may tell your lordship is very sad, and if the French King should fall upon them in this conjuncture I know not where it would stop, and am sure it would soon put an end to this government. His Excellency hath also desired the Spanish ambassador to make his applications to his Majesty therein, and what resolutions will be taken upon it your lordship will know Our great discourse here is that Vienna is in good condition, that the Governour hath sent to the Duke of Lorrain to desire he would not precipitate their succours, but let all matters be well concerted and true measures taken before they attempted to relieve them, for that he wanted nothing and could well defend the place for 3 weeks longer; this is told us by our last letters of the 18th from Passau. But I have seen two private letters which came at the same time of the 12th and 15th from the Duke of Lorrain's camp near Mercke within 2 leagues of Vienna, which say notwithstanding the Turks had been twice beaten out from the Counterscarp after the 9th instant, when they took it by a most furious assault, yet they had in the end, by the multitude of men, made good their logement in the Fosseé and raised their batteries so that the place was in imminent danger, and that they were so fatigued with continued action, and had so much ground to defend, that it was much feared the succours would come too late, and that they should be soon reduced to extremities; and when an enemy is once lodged in the Fosseé there are not usually many days without a great assault; and we may believe the Turks, not being ignorant of the preparations to relieve it, will use their utmost efforts for carrying it. This account came from so good a hand that the truth of it is not doubted, but it is not here divulged, not to dishearten the people, whose only hopes depend upon saving Vienna, and upon the success of the Emperor's armies.

1683, Sept 6th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.—Since my last M. del Val is returned to Paris, who will give you a more exact account of the condition of these countries than I am able to tell in a letter, and he can likewise inform your lordship upon what errand Co. Valsasqu is gone hence in post to Madrid. I dare say their resolution will be conformable to their proceedings hitherto, for my last letters from thence tell me the Spaniards at this time desire above all things a war with France, and I think it is the only thing they ought to fear, being less and worse provided for a war than the poorest Prince in Christendom, and I doubt they will pay dear for slighting the repeated advice of our master. As for assistance, I know not where they can expect any in this conjuncture unless from Holland; the Emperor and Princes of the empire will scarce have leisure to look this way, and I believe when France begins with us here, Denmark will begin with Sweden, and then we must expect nothing from the Princes in the north. And the Elector of Cologne being chosen Bishop of Munster hath much surprised this Court, being now one of the most puissant electors and of a contrary interest to the Spaniard. His Excellency expects great matters from England, and is impatient to know his Majesty's resolutions, and if it be not according to their expectations I shall not pass my time with much satisfaction, and I much fear they will scarce have anything but his Majesty's good wishes, considering the present condition of his affairs at home. So soon as the States General had notice from his Excellency of the French moving this way, they ordered 30,000 men to advance into their frontier garrisons of Brabant and Flanders for their greater security; but we fancy here the Prince of Orange will come in person with that army. But I am told the people's opinions there are much divided about the succours to be sent hither, and that it is believed they will only give the 8,000 men, which is their quota, and the doing it at this time will be a bold thing in them, considering they are like to bear all the burthen of this war alone. The French have summoned all the country round both in Flanders and here, even the suburbs on all sides of this city, to pay a tax they have imposed upon them within 8 or 10 days, upon pain of military execution in default of payment, and the sums demanded are so exorbitant that it is impossible to be paid. What they have taxed upon this province amounts to betwixt 3 and 4 millions of florins, and is more than 4 times the subsidy they usually pay. His Excellency hath defended the country from paying any money, and that each burgh and village make the best defence they can, and give notice upon the first approach of the French by ringing of bells that the alarm may go round the country. The magistrates and councils of this city have undertaken to raise and pay 3,000 men for 3 months, and they are now upon modelling them. His Excellency is also putting this place in the best posture he can by repairing the fortifications and planting the cannon upon their ramparts, and the Maistre de Camp General is at Gaunt to take care of Flanders. We were in great hopes the late misfortunes happened to his most Christian Majesty would have deferred, if not changed, the design of the French troops entering in these provinces. But we have this day advice from all parts that the French are not only entered into the Châtelleries of Aeth, Courtray, and Audenard, but that they ravage all the country round, and drive away great quantity of cattle and horses, and have put such a consternation into the country that it is a sight to move pity to see the poor country people fly into the towns from all parts Asks Lord Preston to send him the plan of Vienna, which is lately printed at Paris, according to the present fortifications, it is not so big as half a sheet of paper, and may be very well put up in a letter.

1683, Sept. 19th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.—The regiment of 2,000 men raised by this city is now complete, hath passed muster, and is daily in action to fit them for service. This place is now put in a reasonable condition of defence, the fortifications repaired, the palisades got up, the cannon planted, and all the lower side of the town laid under water. Last night his Excellency returned hither from his conference with the Prince of Orange extremely satisfied with his Highness's zealous concerns for assisting those provinces. The 8,000 men are now near Malines, 2,000 of the foot will be sent to Gaunt under Mons^r. l'Acerque; the rest of the infantry will be placed in our garrisons in this province, and the horse continue encamped till we see what the French will do. Mons^r. Alway commands the foot in chief, and Mons^r. Ginckle the horse. The French have yet forborne to put any place under military execution, and have enlarged the time of paying the contribution till towards the end of this month, that the final resolution of Spain may be known before they proceed to extremities. This prolongation of theirs being unasked is judged here the effect of the States readiness to succour these countries, but I do not find their coming will the sooner bring matters to a crisis. However, we think, having the States assistance, we shall be able to secure these countries, and if Co. Valsasqu bring orders from Spain to yield nothing, but defend these territories to the last, then we shall soon fall into an open war, which his Excellency seems to desire with the same passion he ought to fear it. The French have quitted Walcourt, Beaumont, and Bovignies, and restored the Spanish officers of the customs, and the free execution of their employments, and they now keep much better orders, M. d'Humierès punishing the least insolency of the soldiers with great severity. They likewise promise payment for what they take from the country: so that we judge their intention is not to break into open war but to eat up and ruin the countries, rendering it unable to pay any further subsidies to Spain, and then the army will quickly moulder away. We heard yesterday that M. d'Humieres had caused 3 bridges to be made over the river before his camp with intention of moving suddenly, and we are told this evening that he is this day marched into the Pays d'Alost, but I cannot affirm this with certainty till the return of the parties which are sent out. Mons^r. Montall continues still encamped at La Bassion, upon the Sambre, unless he be marched this day.

1683, Sept. 30th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.—Acknowledges Lord Preston's of the 27th. . . The French continue in their several encampments, from whence they have sent detachments round the country to fetch in provisions and contributions, with a new order that for non-payment they shall not burn (which would make too great noise in the country), but to beat down their houses, which they do in a most dextrous manner, first sapping them, and sawing in two the principal pieces of timber, and then with ropes by force of horses pull down the houses. They have raised a vast sum of money, most people having paid their contribution rather than have their houses demolished. It is really a sad spectacle, and would move pity in the hardest hearts to see the poor people (who are fled from their houses) lie here in the streets and under the walls with their cattle and children The visit your lordship mentions would be very unwelcome here, and if his most Christian Majesty comes, an immediate war will follow; and truly in the condition they are here, and what they now suffer is much worse than a war, for in that there would be some endeavours on this side to make reprisals, whereas now all is destroyed, and neither soldiers nor people make any defence. And tho' we have a considerable number of the States troops here, as you will see by the enclosed list, yet they are no advantage, but rather a prejudice, if we make not use of them; neither are they well satisfied with their treatment, having been at their first coming three nights without the least manner of covert or straw, and forbidden upon pain of death to cut wood or fetch straw, which was at last permitted. Their cavalry were 24 hours without forage, and that which is now given them is so bad that they make great complaints against it. By this it may be seen in what condition they are here to receive succours, when the first comers are so ill used; and it is a strange opiniatreté in the Spaniards that being in no condition to make war they will not hearken to our master, who would compose matters for them, but endeavour to embroil us with them in a war which I fear will be fatal to all who assist them. Some negotiation is assuredly in hand from hence, by M. Carneros and M. Del Vals being at your Court According as it succeeds M. Carnero is either to return hither or go forward for Spain We are told this evening that all the small camp volants and the several detachments are called to the great camp at Lessines by M. d'Humieres, which is a sign either that they are about to retire altogether or else to advance, which we shall soon know

1683, Oct. 4th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.—I doubt not but your lordship hath seen M. Del Val, if not M. Carnero, our Viadore General, since their being at Paris; their journey hath occasioned much discourse here, and if M. Carnero continues on his voyage to Madrid it is suspected it may be with relation to England, to persuade a prohibition of commerce with us, since they say we will not maintain our treaty with them. 'Tis very certain that they are much unsatisfied with the proceedings of our master and his ministers, and M. Carnero is one of the warmest Spaniards in that point, and is very intimate and close with his Majesty. Your lordship will be best able to judge of this matter by seeing the measures he takes at the French Court, for 'tis said here he was to make some representation to that King, and according as it succeeded or was rejected he was either to go forward for Spain or return hither. I am told from the Hague that the States have been something alarmed at the King our master's having told Mons^r. Citters very plainly his dislike of some proceedings of the States, as if they were driving on too fast to a war, and did let M. Citters know they should miss of their aim if they thought by any means whatever to draw him into it; whereupon the States to testify their desire of peace (besides receiving their protestation of it) do earnestly desire the King to employ his best offices in order to prevent the rupture, and do require it in virtue of his and their Treaty with Spain, where there is an article that appoints 3 months time for the allies to use all good offices to endeavour at accommodation of differences; and herein the States offer themselves ready to join with his Majesty; what the issue of it will be your lordship is like to know best, whose hands it must pass. In the interim a resolution is taken in the Council of State for making new levies, and they have communicated it to the States General to be sent to the several provinces, which 'tis yet uncertain what success it may have, tho' most are of opinion that it will be agreed to; the proposition is for 16,000 men, consisting of 10,000 foot, 4,500 horse, and 1,500 dragoons to be maintained by the States for 4 months only. The French continue pulling down the houses, and in some places burning, which they have done to 4 or 5 towns of Count Egmond's at Gauré, and have pillaged 9 or 10 villages for non-payment of contribution 1683, Oct. 25th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— Prince Vaudemont and the other generals, after 8 days absence with all the cavalry, are returned hither, having put 2 regiments of horse and 2 of dragoons into Aeth, and one of dragoons and 2 of horse into Mons, which is all the exploit they performed, except marching 36 hours together with all the horse without drawing bit. That small number the Prince brought back hither are encamped in our counterscarp till his Excellency see what measures the French will take. Yesterday Mons^r. Del Val returned hither from Paris, the cause of which was kept as a great secret till we soon knew that M. Louvoy had by the French King's order commanded his departure. Prince Vaudemont tells us that M. d'Humieres declares he hath yet received no orders from Court upon this late incident, nor expects any till the return of M. Tilladet from England, which makes this Court judge that France is wholly influenced by our master, and make not one step in this country without his advice and consent; and the account they had yesterday from the Hague concerning the warm conference which Mr. Chudleigh had with the States this last week about these countries, by His Majesty's command, confirms them in their former belief, and there is nothing which can be written from England or said by me which can change their opinion. I believe his Excellency is much embarrassed at what hath passed in Luxemburg, in taking the Castles of Bertrange, Ausfeld, and Berburg; he seems now to disown it, and that he gave no such orders, tho' we are well assured that the Prince de Chimay had the first orders of any governor to commit acts of hostility; and we were in mighty expectation to hear what he had done, and it was highly applauded by all at the first notice of it. The States troops continue still encamped near Malines, but complain heavily they are not put into quarters or recalled home; but I think they will be soon put into quarters. Yesterday Mons^r. Battix came hither from the Duke of Zell, his stay here will be very short; his errand they say is rather to excuse his master from sending troops than to give any hopes of them; all the Princes of Lunenburg being they say inclined to peace, and labour to maintain it in the north.

1683, Nov. 21st, Bruxelles.—The same to the same. Acknowledges Lord Preston's of the 8th. Our last advices from Amsterdam tell us that the town [of Amsterdam] would not give the deputation (from the States of Holland) any direct and final answer there upon the place, but would reserve themselves to return their answer at the Hague in the full assembly of the States of Holland at their re-meeting, which will be to-morrow or Tuesday. In the mean time it hath happened very unluckily that so many of the States fleet returned from Gottenburg perished in the late storm on Monday and Tuesday last upon their own coast. It is generally reported that 8 men-of-war are cast away, of some whereof not a man saved. A great many merchant ships are likewise lost, amongst which a Smyrna ship, with its cargo valued at 4 millions, which occasions great murmurings and dissatisfactions at Amsterdam, and is like to have much influence upon their present debates. The men-of-war they say were wilfully lost, being sent so late in the year upon an April errand. As to our affairs here, his Excellency hath this last week by an express from Madrid received bills for 600,000 crowns, as also the approbation both of his Cath. Majesty and the Council of State of his Excellency's proceedings here, particularly in relation to his circular letters sent to all the governors. His Excellency hath also received assurance that Spain will never be induced, either by persuasion of their allies, or the menaces of France, to give any equivalent for their pretensions in these countries, and that his Cath. jesty is firmly resolved to hazard the loss of all by a war rather than to yield one spot of ground in lieu of their pretensions, and that his Excellency had received orders to govern himself accordingly, and to make the best defence he can without being amused by any Treaty, assuring him of constant supplies both for recruits and levies; M. Carnero, the Veedor General (whom his Excellency sent lately for Spain) having fully informed both his Majesty and Council of the present state of these provinces, and of the necessity of having an army of 40,000 foot and 7,000 horse for their defence (of which I do not see any great likelihood). His Excellency told me farther that when the King his master should know the taking of Courtruy, and the French possessing Dixmude, and of their propositions by M. d'Avaux, his Majesty would be more confirmed in the resolution he had taken, since his Excellency's orders from that Court were so positive, when matters were not come to that extremity as they now are. This being declared here as their fixed resolution, I do not see which way a peace can be procured from France, nor how Spain can make a war, for reasons which need not be repeated. His Excellency hath published several severe placards, one for confiscating the estates of all the French within the Spanish territories, another for re-calling all his Cath. Majesty's subjects from their residences within the French dominions, upon penalty of being prosecuted as guilty of Crimen læsæ Majestatis; a third forbidding all the subjects of Spain from paying contribution to France, or making any composition for it upon any pretence whatsoever, upon penalty, if noblemen or gentlemen, to be degraded of their honours and gentility, and all others to be punished with utmost rigour. His Excellency hath also ordered all French passengers to be arrested in all places within the Spanish jurisdiction, without distinction of quality, and hath defended giving any passports to French; and yesterday 36 vessels laden with corn from Holland, and going into the French quarters, were arrested at Gaunt by his Excellency's command; so that I much doubt whether these proceedings will not anticipate the war before the end of the year. Prince Vandemont hath been with the Dutch cavalry as far as Ostend, and would [have] marched with them into the French territories to take reprisals upon them, but Lt.-General Ginckle and M. Scravenmore, who commanded them, refused to march upon such employment. However, the Prince went with some Spanish troops and plundered a village or two, and brought away some cattle and horses. . . . I think chocolate is the best thing I can send from hence, of which you shall have what quantity you please, and as good as can be made, for I do furnish the King with what he takes, which he always likes very well.—Bulstrode asks Lord Preston to send from Paris two perukes of light hair with buckles for his children, aged 5 and 4 years, which are worn at Brussels, and some things for his wife, and Mr. Tempest is to buy for Bulstrode La description de l'Univers en cinq tomes, in quarto, and two pounds of the best sealing wax.—At this moment that I am writing the Duchess Dowager of Arschot is come hither from Enghien, while the French are plundering that town, and will they say demolish the walls of the park and garden, to be revenged of Prince Vaudemonts having plundered the other day the village of . . . belonging to the prince of that name, who married the Mareschal Humieres daughter . . .

1683, Jan. 28th. Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— . . . We believe we shall still continue quiet, which we attribute to the vigorous resolution of the Spanish Court in refusing to accept our master's arbitrage, which is supposed here will frighten the French to a compliance, and to be contented to adjust their pretensions by a general Treaty, in the manner proposed by Spain and their allies. But we are told from Ratisbon that the Emperor hath consented to renew and adjust the Treaty with France at that diet, and hath particularly recommended to them the carrying it on with speed. But this Court seems not to believe it, at least are not pleased with it, and whether they will change their sentiments upon it I know not; however, they continue their usual fierté in their discourses, and will lay all the blame of what misfortunes they shall draw upon themselves at our door. We hear that Count Mansfeldt hath orders to stay some time at the French Court, with the character of the Emperor's minister, before he proceeds upon his embassy to Madrid, which may be upon occasion of the Treaties going on at Ratisbon, tho' the Emperor's minister at the Hague hath by a memorial disavowed the Emperor's accepting to renew the Treaty with France. In the mean time we are here so confident of peace that his Excellency hath given leave to all the governors of provinces of the several garrisons and most colonels of the army to continue here, which they intend to do till the spring, unless disturbed by some action from that side . . . The Marquis de Mazarin and his lady are returned hither since their marriage at Loire, they are at present with the Countess of Soissons, but intend they say to part suddenly for England . . .

1683, Feb. 18th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.— I was very glad to see by yours of the 6th the safe arrival of your lady after so dangerous a passage, Col. Porter, who came hither about the same time, was 12 days at sea in a yacht coming to Ostend, and ran a very great risk likewise . . . In the absence of the Court (which is now at Antwerp) and in the height of the carnival, no account can be given from hence but of masquerades and balls, and the young gallants and ladies are much beholding to the Countess of Soissons, where there is a great Court every night, and much playing and dancing. His Excellency will not return hither till the beginning of Lent; he is very intent upon adjusting some matters at Antwerp relating to commerce, continuing his usual zeal and application for the public, and upon that account intends to take a turn in Flanders before he will come hither. I am told from a good [hand] that an interview is intended betwixt the Prince of Orange and his Excellency, when the Emperors and Spanish minister are to be from the Hague, to concert some matters relating to the common interest. The people here in general seem much dissatisfied that the customs are farmed for 200,000 florins less than was offered, and great endeavours have been used to induce his Excellency to accept of the more advantageous bargain for the public; but having given his word, his Excellency would not break it, and much blames these undertakers for not bidding in time before the blow was struck. The farming of the Domeins is now also under consideration, and I am assured from knowing persons that when that is farmed the present revenues of these provinces will be about 7 millions yearly, besides the supplies coming from Spain, and many other advantages which often happens tho' they are accidental. It is scarce credible that so small a remnant as is left of these countries should yield so great a revenue, but it is easy to be demonstrated, and certainly if it be well managed with the advantage of two or three years' peace this country would be in another condition than it now is. Tho' we are here in great quiet, and our neighbours also, yet the continuance of it is much doubted, and we cannot expect to rest long in this uncertainty betwixt peace and war, especially being told that the Emperor's consent to the Treaty at Ratisbon is only to gain time to see the effect of the Diet in Poland, and whether that Crown will engage with the Emperor in the war against the Turks, and if that league be made it is believed the Turks will prolong the Truce rather than begin the war, and then the whole force of the Emperor will bend towards the Rhine, and the same reason that induces the Emperor to prolong the Treaty will oblige France to quicken it, so that we believe here that we shall soon see either a foundation laid for a firm solid peace or else the beginning of a new war. His Excellency hath commanded all officers to be at their garrisons the 20th instant, and forbidden all Governors to give permission to any officers to leave his garrison. Our new Viador General hath made a very strict muster of the troops at Mons, where 500 men less were found in 3 regiments than were in the King's books; and he is now gone into Flanders, where he will use the same severity. We talk much here that D. P. Ronquillo will be recalled, which is retarded only by the great debt he owes, which must be paid before he can remove. Count d'Arquinto and Co. de Prador are the persons they say in nominations for that ministry; but the first is most likely to go for England, and the other to the Northern Kings; but these are yet only conjectures nothing being yet resolved.

1683, March 7th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.—The French King's coming to Compiègne does not much alarm us, as the account we have this day received from Lille [is] that the King is expected there the 15th instant, and that orders are sent to the French intending there to secure all forage round the country, which makes us doubt the scene may be changed this way. His Excellency upon this news will hasten into Flanders, and hath ordered several regiments of horse and foot to draw to Neaport, for which place his Excellency is much concerned, it lying open, and we believe his Christian Majesty (being now at liberty by refusal of our master's arbitrage) will not make much scruple of entering if he find a door open. And if the least insult be made by the French on any side of these territories, I can assure your lordship his Excellency will return it home, and the war will begin without any farther ceremony. We hear also that the French King will go to Maubeuge, which makes us fear for Liege; and if those people do not comply with their Prince, 'tis likely his Christian Majesty will be their arbitrator, tho' unasked, and inter duos litigantes gaudebit tertius; a few week's patience will shew us more. A Germain captain in the regiment of Wagensael, in garrison at Mons, is brought hither prisoner for holding correspondence with some at Valenchians. It seems he is nephew to M. Calvo, who was governor of Maestricht, who hath interceded in his behalf, but his Excellency will have him prosecuted with utmost vigour, the rather because a person of the garrison of Mons, who was always employed about the sluices, is lately run away to Valenchians, which hath occasioned the Prince de Rasch, fearing some treachery upon his garrison, to let open the sluices, and hath laid all the lower part under water, and his Excellency hath reinforced that garrison, and also Namur, for their security, and is doing the like to Aeth, Ondenard, and Courtray. This evening M. Contelmo is come hither with his Italian regiment from Guelders, and his Excellency hath ordered all his troops into the frontier garrisons 1684, January 24th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same. —Being now returned after my absence for some time in Flanders I can entertain you with nothing but sad relations of burning villages, even to the suburbs of this city, which this last week felt the same fate; and tho' 3,000 men were here in garrison, and that the enemy staid from midnight till 5 in the morning, yet they neither prevented their burning nor sallied out to disturb them in it, who were a very inconsiderable party, not above 50 horse men, who did the execution, who were sustained only by 3 or 400 more, which makes much murmuring, and occasions many reflective discourses upon his Excellency and generals. The next night Prince Vaudemont went out with 5,000 men to attack the French in Hall, and to cut off their parties that were abroad in burning the country, and had orders to return thither, and the design had certainly succeeded if the Prince had not made so many halts by the way, whereby the French had notice enough to retire, and in their retreat burnt several villages in sight of our troops. The prince had with him all the Dutch troops from Malines, Louvain, and this place, and was accompanied with M. Ayluu and the Dutch generals, and likewise the regiments of the Lord Ossory and Col. Douglas, and all in general complained extremely of the ill conduct of that design; and I believe the account they have given the Prince of Orange of the proceedings of the Spaniards here will, I presume, abate somewhat of the zeal of their partisans at the Hague, who have been most eager for carrying on the war; his Excellency was also so much troubled at what passed, that he declared he would go in person upon the next occasion. We have likewise sad relations from all the Spanish garrisons, where the soldiers suffer as great misery with want and cold as the country people by their houses being burnt; this is the 5th month that the soldiers have had no hay, and instead of recruits against the spring we shall neither have infantry nor cavalry, except those of our allies; and if they were no better fed nor paid than the Spaniards their number would be soon lessened, the Spanish soldiers deserting furiously upon all occasions of escape, so that their officers dare not send them out in parties, the one half never returning tho' they met no enemy. Tho' M. Boufflers be now retired with his troops from Enghien, yet those of M. Moutall are betwixt Louvain and Terlemont committing the same cruelties on that side to the utter ruin of the poor inhabitants, who fly to the adjacent wood for shelter, and to the towns for succour, and many perish daily with hunger and cold; assuredly the rashness and opiniatreté of the Spaniards hath drawn this misery upon the country; but is ever to be wished that the poor innocent people might not suffer for the follies of those above them. The French intendant from Lille hath summoned Gaunt and Bruges to pay each 800 crowns, or to expect the same treatment with Luxemburg; the same message hath been sent to the other garrisons both in that and their province; and the people begin now to be so sensible of their condition, seeing no course taken for their protection, that it is much to be feared they will rather desire to change masters than to continue in this slavery and fear of being destroyed and burned in their beds, and the magistrates both of Gaunt and Bruges have sent hither to his Excellency very sharp representations of their grievances, which they are no longer able to endure. We say here that all will now depend upon the conferences at the Hague, where Prince Waldec is now arrived with full powers from the Emperor and several Princes of the empire, and according to their resolutions measures will be taken here. We are in hopes of great remises from Spain, but I think all the money of their fleet will not supply the necessities of this government, which was never so much out of order as now. At this moment we have our Spanish letters of the 6th, which say, &c.

1684, March 13th, Bruxelles. The same to the same.

— Yesterday his Excellency received an express from the Prince of Orange, with these following particulars; that the ministers of the allies had in the late conferences concerted a project of the forces wherewith the allies should assist each other, in case the conditions they have proposed should not be accepted, and that the States deputies have promised the levies should be made and a fleet set out of 40 sail. And that for the present supply of these countries being in such eminent danger the States agreed the 11th instant, by plurality of voices, that 8,000 more men should forthwith be sent hither for our present assistance, and that 10,000 more shall follow them, if there be not a sudden cessation of arms. The 8,000 men will certainly be here before this week be ended, and the Prince intends to make a step hither within ten days to concert matters with his Excellency for the ensuing campaign; his Excellency intending to go in person, and hath prepared a very splendid equipage. This resolution of the Prince you may believe is very agreeable to this Court, whatever it will be to others. But we are told by those who have reason to know that all this hath been only carried by the deputies of 5 provinces only, and that of their own heads without consulting their principals, and that the deputies of Frize and Groningue did not concur, nor were present at what the others transacted, and have protested against all that is done. I wish their resolutions may tend to the advancement of peace, but much fear this sudden sending of more forces will be looked upon as a great step towards war, rather than peace, the effect of which will be soon seen. The truth is the sending of these forces is absolutely necessary, most of the principal garrisons here being destitute of soldiers, the Spanish troops being diminished at least a third part within six months past, and I dare boldly affirm that all the troops at present in the Spanish service excepting the Hollanders do not in the whole amount to above 15,000 effective men, and those in a miserable starving condition, neither is there yet a sum of money come for their subsistence; besides there is no garrison whose fortifications are in good condition, or that is provided with corn magazines or any necessities for a siege; and how 'tis possible to think of making war in that condition I leave you to judge; but our great dependence is upon the Prince of Orange's assistance, believing he will draw all the States array hither for defence of the territories. We are told this day by the minister of the Elector of Cologne that his master's levies go on successfully, and that he will have 20,000 effective men by the end of this month; but his Excellency says the chapter of Munster will not own the Elector for their bishop without the Pope's Bull, nor suffer their troops to be at his command or to march out of their territories, and without them his electoral Highness cannot have such an army. M. Choyseul is highly treated and carressed there, and this Court rails bitterly against the Elector for choosing a French man to command his army. We hear likewise that the affairs of Cologne are in great disorder, that the commonalty are upon chasing away the Emperor's commissaries, and have torn the Emperor's mandate in pieces, and declare they will not submit to any decree of the Emperor which may be of any ill consequence in this conjuncture. I am told by Mr. Skelton that Sir Wm. Waller plays the devill at Bremen, which is like to be the nest of all those persons accused of the last conspiracy, that my Lord Melvin, and many more of that stamp, are there, as also Armstrong and Ferguson, and that they expect the Duke of Monmouth there very speedily; they speak most scandalously of the King and Duke, and style Waller a second Cromwell by way of commendation; and they threaten to pull Mr. Skelton in pieces if ever they light upon him, and are upon publishing an infamous print against him.

1685, Nov. 16th, Bruxelles.—The same to the same.

—The enclosed relation contains all we have from abroad, and after so great a success, 'tis time for the Emperor's army to retire into winter quarters, whereby I presume I shall not have much to trouble your

LETTERS FROM COPENHAGEN, FRANKFORT, AND HAMBURG.

1683, March 9th. n. s. Copenhagen. Copy of letter from the States Minister to Greffier Fagel.—On the 6th it was thought that de Bierman, the Envoy Extr. of the Ct., who started this morning would first to Berlin, but he will go first to the Dukes of Brunswick and Lunenburg to conclude an alliance. He being a cunning man, and one of the first Princes of the kingdom, who knows all secrets, and who was regalé by the K. of F. with a fine piece of tapestry for the alliance made with that Crown, will not fail to endeavour to draw in the Dukes.

1682, June $\frac{23}{3}$, Frankfort.—Edmond Poley to Lord Preston.—Having tho' but very lately been informed of your lordship's been safely arrived at Paris, I would not omit upon the first occasion I could of the offering you my service, and most particularly in letting you know what passes here, because that the resolutions which shall be taken here being looked upon to be of great consequence to the quiet or disturbance of the rest of Europe . . . The dispute concerning the language in which the empire and France are to treat hath hitherto put a stop for this great while to the proceedings here, the empire pretending that all Princes are obliged to treat in Latin with them, and that the Kings of England and Spain have ever done it, but the French doth say that there is no obligation in it at all, and that they will treat in their own language, and have hitherto refused to give any Acts in Latin, but only as translations of what they had first delivered in French. The Emperor's ambassador and the deputies of the empire have hitherto refused to accept of such copies as authentic, and consequently to answer the last reply of the French, by which they demand to retain Strasbourg and the rest of the Reunions which they have seized and been in possession of to the time that their ambassador left Paris, in order to their coming to this place. But at length, that the proceedings may not perfectly be stopped, they have resolved to deliberate upon and give an answer to the above-mentioned reply, with a reservation that what they do in it shall not prejudice the rights and privileges of the empire as to the language . . . It is said that the Turks have a body of men in Hungary, and that the Emperor is not out of danger of a war on that side.

1682, Aug. $\frac{3}{3}$, Frankfort. Edm. Poley to Lord Preston.—I have received yours of the 27th.—Every thing here remains in the same state . . . the news from Hungary is not at all to the advantage of the Emperor, the last letters from thence brought the news of the town of Caschau, the capital in upper Hungary, being taken by the rebels . . . On the $\frac{1}{1}$ instant arrived here a courier to the French ambassador's with the news of Madame la Dauphine's being safely delivered of a Prince, who is called the duke of Burgundy . . . P.S. The letters just arrived from Vienna say that the citadel of Coschau is taken, but not the town, tho' it is in danger.

1682, Sept. 24th, Frankfort.—The same to the same.— . . . The enclosed paper is a copy of a declaration which the French have made here, not to expect, any longer than the last of November, the answer from the Empire either as to accepting or refusing their proposals for a Treaty . . .

1682, June 16th, Hambourg. B. Skelton to Lord Preston.—Congratulations. I doubt not but you will expect considerable news from these parts since the late interview between the King of Denmark and the Elector of Bradenbourg, but their conferences were so private, and so few persons admitted to them, that as yet no man knows what to judge, tho' I believe that at the Court where you are it will be far easier to learn what resolutions were taken than it is possible for us here. The Elector seems very peaceably inclined, for he told me he would use his utmost endeavours to preserve the empire in peace, to which end he was sending Mons^r. Cracow to the Emperor and his Chancellor, Mons^r. Brands, to the King of Sweden, to persuade them to peaceable inclinations, to which Court the King of Denmark would dispatch ministers also at the same time, whose errands will I fear be rather like threatenings than persuasions, tho' I look upon their measures to be quite broken, for the King of Denmark being come the length of Gluckstadt, in his way to Oldenburg, returned unexpectedly to Izeho, and hath with his Queen taken the route of Copenhagen, where he will be in a few days, but returns some time the next month into these parts. This sudden resolution, I am told, was taken upon the notice which that King had of the Swedes' fleet being at sea. Here is also a report as if the Emperor had made an alliance with the Poles, the latter being to assist with 10,000 men in case of a war, which, if true, will be as unwelcome news in France as it is to Denmark and Brandenburg . . .

1682, June 23rd, Hambourg.—Dan. Petit to Lord Preston.—There has been but little news stirring since my last to you of this day sevennight, when there was also one from Mr. Skelton . . . Foreign news.—I will not forget to acquaint you with a quarrel as happened at Izeho whilst the King of Denmark and the Elector of Brandenburg were there. The was between Messieurs Guldenlew, the Danish Premier Minister, and Mons^r. Rebenac, the French Envoyé with the said Elector, who pretended to receive the first visit from the Danish Ministers, which Guldenlew and the rest of them thought very strange, so that during his stay there they scarcely spoke to each other, until at last Rebenac went one day to Guldenlew, and found him at table, and very near drunk, and was received by him very rudely, seeming to make a jest of the great honour he received from the minister of so great a King, and wondered that he should demean himself so far as to come to a miserable canaille as himself; but the other did not seem to take notice thereof, entered into discourse with him, and offered 8,000 crowns to be his master's friend, which the other disdainfully refusing, told him that the King his master gave him sufficiently to maintain him and that he did not stand in need of such a sum, but that if Mons^r. de Rebenac wanted it himself, that he had it at his service, bidding him not to think that the French should give laws to their Court, they being yet far from the thoughts of receiving them, neither were they so much at their command as he perhaps imagined; whereupon Rebenac went away . . .

1682, Aug. $\frac{4}{4}$, Hambourg. D. Petit to Lord Preston.—Contrary to what was believed by every body, the King of Denmark returned to Coldinghen on the 28th of July, and has since reviewed his troops, and will be in a few days back again at Copenhagen, but Count Guldenlew is still in the county of Oldenbourg, where the fortifications of Varel are vigorously carried. I believe we have told your lordship that the King of Denmark, as well as Brandenburg, not finding that they are like to succeed in the engagements they have made with France, are altering their measures, and that they incline to change sides; wherefore the King of Denmark hath ordered Mons^r. Lillien Crone, his Envoyé at Vienna, to remain there, and hath sent him new instructions, and 'tis said he is to renew his instances about the toll of G[lu]ckstadt . . . Count Berka is expected here daily, having been dispatched by the Emperor with new instructions to the Court of Denmark. From Stockholm we hear that Mons^r. Feuquieres, at his taking leave of the King of Sweden, had only a private audience, refusing to have it public, since the same honours were refused him which he had at his first audience, where he was fetched by two senators and in the King's coach, whereas now they have resolved for the future to send but one senator, and the ambassador is to come in his own coach, none of the King's being to be sent any more, and it is questioned whether Mons^r. Basin, the new ambassador from France, will submit to this new order. It is said that the marriage of the Princess of Cell with the Prince of Frise is broke off, and that the Duke of Hanover's second son, Prince August, is to marry her.— . . . News from Ratibon and Vienna.— . . . The Princess Ragotzi, who was lately married to Teckelej, has changed the Catholic religion, and is become of the Protestant, of which her husband also is; she has already chased all the priests out of her principality. General Lesly has left Tyrol, and is gone to view Costnitz, Villingen, Rhinfelden, Offenbourg, and Philipsbourg; the regiments that were lodged in that county are to be quartered in those places. The Emperor has made Staremborg general of the artillery, Arasoldo and Dunewald field martial lieutenants, Counts of Sereni, Palfi, Gondola, Caraffa, Taff, and Baron de Mercy major-generals.

1682, Aug. 11th, Hamb. B. Skelton to Lord Preston.—I am very impatient to know what success your lordship hath had in the Duke of Holsteyn's affairs, being it was upon my solicitation that his Majesty directed Mr. Secretary Jenkins to write to you about it, which that Duke thought the only way whereby he might be eased of those hardships the King of Denmark makes him suffer. I question not but that his minister at Paris doth often wait upon your lordship, to whom I beseech you to let fall some words whereby he may know with what zeal I have solicited this affair, for his master hath not in the least expressed any sense he hath of his obligation to his Majesty, and hath since I gave him notice that his Majesty had given your lordship orders to recommend his concerns to the Court of France, used me very coarsely, being gone from hence without so much as giving me notice of it, or ever having been to see me, which honour he has often done heretofore to Sir Wm. Swann, who was but a resident; and having acquainted his favourite, the marshal of his Court with my desire of having liberty to hunt in his territories, which join to this city, could never obtain any answer, which is a very ill return for the service I have endeavoured to do him, for the King was at first very unwilling to concern himself in his affairs, but my importuning and the justice of the cause did at last prevail; all which, if your lordship think fit, I am desirous his Envoyé should be made acquainted with. We have an account from Coldinghem, where the King of Denmark mustered his troops, that there were but 3,500 ill equipped men as appeared, which inconsiderable number hath sufficiently frightened us here, and all the neighbourhood, it being reported that they were above 10,000, to which as many of the Brandenburgish and 5,000 French under the command of the Comte de Roze were to be joined, but now we are told that the King of Denmark hath not only given the Emperor encouragement to believe that he will quit the French interests to embrace those of the Empire, but hath also refused to receive the French money as is remitted for him to this place; but I can scarcely give credit to the letter, knowing how scarce a commodity money is at the Court of Denmark. We are daily more and more alarmed with the plague, which spreads extremely 1682, Sept. 2nd, Hambourg.—The same to the same. —Thanks for the news you were pleased to communicate in yours of the 21st of the last, and that you have given yourself the trouble to represent to the Duke of Holstein's minister the service I have done his master, tho' I cannot expect, after his late rudeness to me, that he will in the least shew himself sensible thereof, notwithstanding the great need which he hath at present of his Majesty's good offices, for the King of Denmark begins now to play his game, and to give him more disquiet than ever; insomuch that he will be forced to return back hither, being he will not be safe at Gottorp where he was going; indeed the poor Prince is to be pitied, being a very weak man, and most of those about him are suspected to be in the Danish interest, and pensioners to the King, so that nothing is said or done in his Court which is not forthwith sent to that of Denmark; wherefore it is not much to be wondered at if those persons make it their business to create differences between him and those who wish him well; and, notwithstanding his incivility to me, I heartily wish your lordship may succeed in your undertakings for him. The loss of Cashaw and Eperies will without doubt be very agreeable news where you are, each of which places have agreed with Teckely for 50,000 crowns to be preserved from plunder. Several places have since then surrendered themselves also to the rebels, who are marched towards the Berg towns where the Emperor's gold mines are, and will certainly render themselves to them. These are joined with the rebels, and have assisted in the taking of Cashaw, they do nevertheless flatter themselves at Vienna that they shall have no war with the Turk, but that matters will be speedily accommodated between them. General Caprara hath been at last dispatched to the army in Hungary, and 40,000 crowns given him for their supply, which will not go far amongst men who are in a great arrear of pay and want all manner of necessaries. Desires his service to Lord Feversham and Lord Preston's brother, if still with him.

1682, Sept. 2nd, Hambourg. — Dan. Petit to Lord Preston.— . . . We have at present with us Monsr. Feuquieres and Monsr. Bicke, both ambassadors; one comes from Sweden and the other from Paris, and both are returning to their own countries. Prince Casimir, of Friesland, his marriage with the beautiful Princess of Cellesenbourg is quite broke, and the elder Prince of Hannover, who was sometime since in England, marries her. It is believed by everybody that the Prince of Orange seeing the great alliance which Prince Casimir was entering by consummating that match broke it. Our last letters from Stockholm say that Count Althem, the Emperor's Envoy's audience and harangue to the King of Sweden, hath so alarmed the French ambassador, Monsr. Basin, that tho' he had resolved no audience till he had an answer to his point d'honneur about his reception at his public entry, yet on a sudden, tho' his equipage was not arrived, desired a private audience of his Majesty, which he had, and also of the two Queens, by virtue of which he had legitimated himself to business, by which irregular proceeding from his first resolutions people are so much possessed to believe that he has propositions to make, or at least to endeavour to thwart the Count Althem's negotiations if possible; but it is believed also by everybody that the King of Sweden will stand firm to the empire, and endeavour to maintain the peace of Christendom according to the Munster and Nimegue Treaties, so that neither the allurements or threatenings of France will be able to make an alteration in that Court. The Swedish fleet, which lies about Carelsocrone, will be laid up in a short time, and the Danish will do the same not long after, so that nothing will be expected between these two Northern Princes this year. From Vienna we hear that they are very much dissatisfied with Prince Herman of Baden, President of the Council of War. A foundation was laid for a rebellion in Tyroll by the French, but was discovered and prevented by 5,000 men which the Emperor sent hither. The Bassa of Erla was arrived in Tekely's camp before Cashaw, and the Vizier of Buda, with 20,000, was expected every day. Several places of Hungary have surrendered to him, and Eperies, a considerable one in the upper bendes; several more have sent deputies to Tekely to treat with him about their surrender. It is above a week since we have seen at Hambourg a new blazing star; it appears between 9 and 10 in the evening. P.S. The Envoy Extraordinary presents his service.

1682, Sept. 4th, Hamb. B. Skelton to Lord Preston. —Since my last of the 1st inst. the Duke of Holsteyn is come to town, and will remain here this winter. . . . and I understand that he hath been informed by his minister at Paris of that passed betwixt your lordship and him, and it is given out by some of his people that they have the copy of that letter I writ you, wherein I complained of their master's incivility towards me, whereat I am told that the Duke is much offended, tho' what I writ is most true, besides many other little rudenesses which I did not think fit to trouble your lordship withall. I question not but that by this ordinary the Duke's Envoy will receive instructions what to say to you upon this subject. When the Duke went hence he had newly received assurances that the Emperor and King of Sweden would admit him into their Treaty of Alliance, which was then upon the point of concluding, which made him so high as to slight our master's offices, depending wholly upon the Emperor's protection; but now that affairs go so ill in Hungary, and that the alliance with Sweden is not like to come to anything, I do not question but that the Duke of Holsteyn will do what he can to preserve his Majesty's friendship, which in all likelihood will be more advantageous to him than that of the Emperor or Sweden, and your lordship will have application made to you for your favour and assistance; and I hope that you will meet with a better return from him than I have done, which I am well assured is not the poor Duke's fault, but those ill men as are about him. He hath not as yet given me notice of his arrival, neither shall I visit him until he shall have advertised me thereof. I thought fit to give you this information that you may be prepared against Monsr. Haxhausen shall wait upon you, desiring you will be pleased to assure him that, notwithstanding all this unkindness proceeding towards me, I have a great respect for the Duke his master, whose prosperity and welfare I most heartily wish, well knowing that what hath been done hath been through the instigation of those who have as little respect for the Duke as they have kindness for me. —News from Vienna.

On the back of the above letter in Lord Preston's hand is the following:— 1682, Sept. 21st, st. no., Paris.— C. S. informs that Brian, who went to France, was sent for back, and C. told him that his business was not delayed, but that the King, as soon as he had humbled the Protestants a little, was resolved to go on with it.

1682, Oct. 7th, Hambourg. B. Skelton to [Lord Preston]. He tells Ld. Preston (in French) that the Baron Francois Maximilian de Zeirotin, nephew of his (Skelton's) friend, the Count de Galle, an Irish lord, but established in the Emperor's territories, is about to make the grand tour of France, and then apply himself to the Court of France at Paris. Asks Lord Preston's countenance for the young man.

1682, Dec. 1st, Hambourg.—(Dan. Petit) to Lord Preston.—We do not doubt but you have heard with how little ceremony the Prince of Hanover's marriage was consummated at Cell on the 21st past at night; since which the Duke his father is returned to his usual residence, where he intends to give out commissions for the raising of 6,000 men, which we suppose the Emperor is to give money for, and are to be employed by him; that Duke is also sending Mons^r. Wizendorff, one of his Privy Council, to the States of Holland, where he is only to prepare the way for another who is very speedily to follow him, and thence to go over into England. From Copenhagen we hear of the 24th past that the King's intending to give the order of the Elephant to the Prince of Ostfrist causes great discourses, his Majesty beginning to claim Aurick and several other places of that Prince's country as dependencies of the county of Oldenbourg. There is a report as if that Prince intended to put himself under the King of Denmark's protection against the States of Holland From Vienna we hear of the 24th November that a party of Hussars, having made an excursion into the tributary countries, had taken prisoner a Chaous coming with letters from the Porte to the Vizir of Buda, who says that a Capuchi Basia is upon the way to that Vizir with a cord from the Grand Signor to strangle him, for having separated himself from Tekely before he was desired to the contrary, and for the disputes which arose about the putting of a garrison into Filleck, which occasioned the demolishing of that place

SIR
G. GRAHAM,

168³, Jan. $\frac{1}{2}$, Hamb. (Dan. Petit) to Mr. Tempest. — I told you in my last that the Danish post had the mail taken from him near this place, which hath been since restored by an unknown person to the postilion as followeth, and very few of the letters were missing, and it is suspected here to have been done by the Danes themselves, that they may have a just pretence to intercept the letters as come from Sweden. From Vienna it is writ that Prince Herman of Baden is to be removed from being President of the Council of War, as being found to be unfit for that employment, and is to be made Lord Steward of the Emperor's Court, now vacant by the death of Count Lamberg, and that the Marquis de Grana is to succeed him in the presidentship, to which he hath the government of Warradin added, which is the best in the Emperor's gift, and so will quit the government of the Spanish Netherlands. Baron Abelé, the Emperor's treasurer, is also to resign and Chancellor Hocher also retires. The Emperor hath writ to the Senate here to be assisting to the Duke of Saxe Lawenbourg and Count Dawn's officers in raising of both their regiments, which they intend to do in this place. I send you herewith the articles of a false and malicious Treaty between England and France; it was sent hither out of Holland, and is pretended to be an old alliance which has been lately renewed and confirmed by both the parties. The Danes do still carry on their preparations for a war with all vigour the letters of Vienna speak of Tekeli being dead, to which we give no credit yet.

168³, Jan. 26th, st. v. (The same) to the same. — Count Tekely had made complaints at Vienna that the R. Catholics take the churches from the Protestants in the Berg towns, which is contrary to the agreement made upon the cessation of arms, which he will therefore continue no longer, and hath declared that since the truce hath been broken on the Emperor's side he doth not think himself obliged to maintain any of the conditions it was made upon, and therefore will not permit the Emperor according to the said capitulations to provide those places as remain in his hands in Upper Hungary with any sort of provisions or necessities, but Genl. Capvera hath sent an officer to him with excuses and some proposals which they hope will be accepted by him From Sweden it is writ that the incision had been made in that King's leg, which is in a very bad condition, and another incision is to be made which, by reason of the unskillfulness of his chirurgion, may cost him his life, and no persuasions have hitherto prevailed upon that King to send for some able man out of any other country. — The Duke de Croy, one of the Emperor's generals, came to this place the last week, thinking to raise some men to complete the regiment of foot was lately given him, but it was altogether impossible for him to get any, so that he is forced to go elsewhere to make his levies. This morning we had the news of my Lord Shaftesbury's death.

168³, Feb. 2nd, Hambourg. (The same) to the same. — They write from Copenhagen of the 25th January that the Duke of Cell's minister at that Court was returned from the Queen Mother from Nicoping, where he had made new propositions relating to the business of Holsteyn. That King has given out several commissions for the speedy levying of some new regiments, and the preparations of war do still continue at Gluckstadt, and it is remarkable that they are making ready things which will not keep a twelve-month. Lieutenant-General Duniam has mustered the Danish troops in Holsteyn, where the King himself is expected in March next. We hear from Berlin that Mons^r. Rebenac, the French Envoy, begins to be jealous of that Court, as if they had a design to change sides, but that the electoral ministers give him all assurances of the elector's perseverance in the French interest. Mons^r. d'Amerong is expected back there, and it is believed that at his arrival some change will happen The King of Sweden is out of all danger since the last incision made into his leg. Your last is of the 31st 168³, Feb. $\frac{9}{15}$, Hambourg. — B. Skelton to Lord Preston. — Acknowledges his of the 7th, s. n. — All the news we have here is that the Elector of Brandenburg is inclined to desert the French interest, being tempted thereto by the offers made him by the Emperor of the three dukedoms of Brig, Lignier, and Olan, in Silesia, which fell to the Emperor about five years since by the death of the last Duke of Brig; but the elector, fearing that when the Emperor shall have no further occasion for his assistance, may retake those dukedoms from him, being there is not one place of strength in them whereby they can be defended, hath desired that either Ratisbor or Opsten, two fortified places lying upon their borders, may be put into his hands, which is believed will not be refused him. And should he change sides, 'tis not to be doubted but that Denmark will be necessitated to do the same, who is already unsatisfied with France, who besides refusing the augmentation of subsidies, hath at three payments paid only 50,000 crowns of those already agreed for, which hath not a little disgusted that Court, which nevertheless proceeds vigorously in making levies. A courier from Paris arrived here on Tuesday morning last, and at three in the afternoon the French resident here dispatched away two others, the one to Copenhagen, the other to Berlin, but what they carry with them is unknown. — Sends copies of what he (Skelton) received from the Hague by the last ordinary, believing there are some particulars in them which may not be come to Lord Preston's correspondent's knowledge.

168³, March 2nd, Hambourg. — Dan Petit to Mr. Tempest. The French ambassador at Copenhagen hath sent his nephew post this week to acquaint the King his master that he is come to an agreement with the King of Denmark for the subsidies, which are to be 800,000 crowns a year besides a present of 100,000 crowns more for that King himself; and immediately after this was concluded, the King of Denmark dispatched away Mons^r. Bierman, one of his principal ministers to the Court of Berlin, which he will find very firm to the French interest: he is also to call in with the Dukes of Brunswick to persuade them if it be possible to enter into the alliance with France, or at least to accept of one for themselves and the Duchy of Bremen, but we are almost assured he will have little success with the Princes What the Swedes have promised. — Danes and Brandenburg. — The Governor is robbed of his letters yesterday by two troopers within a league of this place, and newly before belonging to the Duke of Holsteyn, fishing in the river Alster, took up in their nets a valise with letters, which is the same was taken some time since from the Danish postilion, and which the King of Denmark was so much concerned at; the letters are sealed, as they were at first, and no hurt come to them, and are by the Duke of Holsteyn sent to the Danish post office. We are informed by a very good hand that the Danes demand a great deal of money from the King of Sweden, which he doth really intend to assist the Duke of Holsteyn in sending him soldiers, but we cannot hear yet that any answer hath been given upon it. We have letters from Hannover which assure us that the marriage between their Princess and the Elector of Bavaria, and that he is to come incognito to see her. It is also writ from Berlin that the Elector of Brandenburg is very ill of the gout in his neck, and that a white ghost which usually appears before the death of any of the electoral family hath been seen there of late

168³, March 9th, Hamburg. (The same) to the same. — Monsieur Bierman, the Danish minister, is this day gone towards Cell, and thence to the Court, if it be possible, Mons^r. Welling in his negotiation there, who, as we are told, hath assured those Princes that the King of Sweden his master will certainly send forces into Germany before the end of the next month, and it is believed that the alliance between that house and the crown of Sweden is very near concluded; but Mons^r. Bierman hath orders to offer them the sharing of the Duchy of Bremen with the Danes, if they will enter into the alliance with them and France; and the Queen Mother of Denmark, who is sister to those Dukes, hath writ very pressingly to them that they would accept of the conditions proposed them by the King her son; but we are too well assured that nothing will tempt the Duke of Hanover to enter into any engagements with France. Mons^r. Bierman says that he is resolved to return back to this place before he goes to Berlin, and to stay some days here, so that we may hope to learn what success he hath had at those Courts. The King of Denmark and Elector of Brandenburg design very suddenly to have six frigates in the Elbe, but to what intent we cannot learn. A discovery hath been made of those that robbed the Vienna post, they being Danish dragoons, and have carried the letters to Copenhagen.

1683, April 6th, Hamburgh. News letter (by D. Petit, unsigned) to Mr. Tempest . . . Mons^r. Bierman is at Berlin, and is expected here within a fortnight, where he is to meet the principal ministers belonging to the Dukes of Brunswick, who are to acquaint him with their master's answer to his late proposals, which it is thought will not be much to his liking . . .

1683, Sept. 7th, Hamburg.—Dan Petit to Mr. Tempest.—This city is in great apprehensions that the King of Denmark will possess himself of the Fourlands, and quarter some of his troops there without meeting with any opposition from the Lunenbourghers. The King of Denmark is still at Rensbourg, whence we had yesterday a letter, an abstract of which goes here enclosed.—Says that the Envoy Extraordinary, being weary with his late voyage down the river, is not able to write to Lord Preston.

1683, Sept. 28th, Hamburg.—B. Skelton to Lord Preston.— . . . Thanks for yours of the 17th . . . The King of Denmark left Renesbourg yesterday, and is on his way to Copenhagen, where, 'tis said, his stay will be short, his design being to return speedily into Holstein, his principal officers and all his troops remaining behind in their old quarters . . . Mons^r. Bierman, the King of Denmark's secretary, and Mons^r. Meinders, one of the Elector of Brandenburg's principal ministers, are at Epsdorff with the Dukes of Cell and Hannover treating about some matter of grave importance, but all their rhetoric will never persuade those Princes to change their measures, or conclude any thing without the Emperor's approbation. The ships which were seen off from Gottenberg and reported to be the Holland's fleet, were only Dutch merchantmen, but they are in expectation of having there very speedily some part of the Holland fleet, which is to take on board 6,000 men, that are to be transported into Flanders. . . . The French fleet is ordered to remove, and not to continue beyond the 10th of the next in the Baltic Sea. . . .

1683, Oct. 5th, Hamburgh.—The same to the same.—In my last I acquainted you that the Holland fleet was arrived at Gottenbourg, but by a letter which I received from thence of the 21st past I am informed that the King of Sweden arrived there the Friday before, and intended to stay there until Monday next. That on the Monday before there arrived a Holland's man-of-war of 40 guns, with an ambassador, who had complimented the King, and told him that there were 16 frigates more before the river ready to obey his Majesty's commands. Since that time we have had no further news of any more Dutch frigates being arrived there; but from Copenhagen it is writ that the French fleet hath received orders to winter there.—Denmark news.—Saxony news.—Two days since a letter was shewed me written by Queen Christina of Sweden to her resident here, wherein she says that the Pope is so well pleased with the King of Poland for the late victory he had obtained against the Turks that he is resolved to allow him 40,000 crowns monthly as long as the war shall last with those infidels, and cause his statue to be erected in Rome, and will give him the title of the Defender of the Church. The Duke of Saxon Lawenbourg is expected daily here, it being reported that he is also come away disgusted from the Emperor's army. I send you here enclosed the copy of a letter received this day from the Hague . . .

1683, Oct. 12th, Hambourg. Dan Petit to Mr. Tempest. — . . . The French fleet is now actually returned home, and the King of Denmark is at his usual residence at Copenhagen, where he will pass this winter, having before he left these parts ordered most of his troops into quarters, which they take in Holsteyn. We hear from Berlin that several princesses are proposed as matches to the electoral Prince, and that she of Hannover is like to be the bride. Our Austrian letters give an account of a new victory obtained lately near Gran, where 10,000 Turks have been killed, amongst which are the new Bassa, of Buda, and that of Aleppo, and that of Silistria, with several hundred Turks were taken prisoners . . . Our lost letters from Bruxelles of the 7th tell us that the Spaniards have begun the hostilities on their side, when the French troops were retiring towards Lisle . . . P.S. Just now we received letters from Berlin of the 9th, which say that the Elector of Saxony was expected the next day, with the Elector of Brandenb., at Potsdam.

1683, Nov. 16th, Hambourg.—B. Skelton to Lord Preston.—You will ere this have heard what great loss the Hollanders have sustained by the late storms, 8 of their men-of-war, besides many very rich merchant ships, having perished . . . and without doubt it will very much lessen the Prince of Orange's credit, and make Amsterdam still obstinate in refusing their consent to the new levies. Here is a rumour as though some French money had been remitted into Sweden, and had been the cause why the 11,000 men heretofore spoken of were not transported into Flanders and Bremen, but what ground there is for it I know not. The King of Denmark taxeth his subjects most grievously, &c., which causeth great outcries in Holsteyn, &c., and the poor Duke [of Holsteyn] is like in a very short time to be reduced to that extremity that he will scarcely have bread to eat, for all his subjects are forbid to advance him any monies. The Duke of Wolfembutell, who went hence this morning to his residence at Brunswyck told me that Mons^r. del Vall, the Spanish minister at his Court, will not succeed in his negotiation, being that the Princes of Brunswyck dare not part with any of their forces in this conjuncture; neither do I find by this Duke that their treaty with Sweden is like to come to a speedy conclusion . . .

1683, Nov. 23rd, Hamburg. The same to the same.—By letters from Copenhagen we are informed that the Swedes have been as unfortunate with their fleet as the Hollanders, having lost four of their best frigates in their way from Carelscon to Calmar. Mons^r. del Val, the Spanish minister at the Courts of Brunswyck, doth, notwithstanding that those Princes have excused themselves from lending any of these troops for the defence of the Spanish Netherlands (by reason of the King of Denmark's and Elector of Collen's being so well armed, and oblige them thereby to be upon their guards) still press them with all possible earnestness to dispatch him with a better answer; and, like Don Pedro Ronquillo, will take nothing for answer that doth not agree with his desires. From Berlin it is writ that it is no more to be doubted but that the Elector of Brandenburg will firmly adhere to the French interest, and I am told that besides the subsidies which he receives from that Crown very considerable presents are often made from thence to the Electrice and the ministers, and at this time there are bills come to this place for Mons^r. de Rebenac, to the value of 100,000 florins, to be distributed by him; and in the last storm a French ship was cast away near the mouth of this river coming from Roan, which had on board her a rich toilet with all necessary plate, a suite of rich hangings, a bed and pictures to a considerable value, which the King of France designed for the Electrice, all which is gone ashore without having received much damage; but the King of Sweden's officers have seized upon the goods, being that the ship was wrackt upon the coasts of the Duchy of Bremen, and will not restore them without orders from Court.—News from Dresden, and has enclosed a list of the winter quarters into which the Emperor's Poles and Bavarian forces are disposed of.—Has not received any letters since the 8th, s. n.

1683, Hamburg, Feb. 15th.—D. Petit to Mr. Tempest.—We have letters from Copenhagen which say that Mons^r. Joel, whom the King of Denmark had some time since named to go ambassador into Sweden, hath now received orders to go to the conferences at the Hague. From Stockholm we hear that the King of Sweden went on the 30th January to Kongsor, and thence to Vormeland, to muster some troops there, which will be that King's divertisement in other places too, and then will return to Kongsor, where the officers of his Treasury are now making the State, as they term it, for the year. This place is still filled up with Danish

LETTERS FROM THE HAGUE.

1685, Oct. 23 (sic), Hague. B. Skelton to Ld. Preston. Complimentary.

1686, January 11th, Hague. B. Skelton to Lord Preston.—I no sooner received your lordship's commands of the 29th past, but without expecting further orders from Court, I spoke to the Prince of Orange in the behalf of Mr. Graham, fearing lest some other might get a promise of Stuart's company, which is already known to be vacant. His Highness did at first seem unwilling to advance him as yet, saying that he was young enough, and might very well have somewhat longer patience; but I pressed it so home and shewed his Highness what your lordship had writ to me upon that subject, that he consented to it, but said withal that he will put him into a Scotch regiment, and take some other captain who is not of the nation, as English or Irish, of which there are some in the Scotch regiment, and give Stewart's company to one of them; and that is very reasonable, for as yet the Scotch colonels have been unwilling to admit of any English in their regiment, and the Prince himself dislikes the mixture, and it will be the same thing to Mr. Graham, which of the 6 regiments he have a company in; but it will be necessary that I have a letter from my Lord of Middleton to recommend Mr. Graham to the Prince. I acquainted Sir Charles Graham with that part of your letter which concerned him.—Hopes his Majesty has consented to his desire of coming into England, and that a yacht is on its way to fetch him.—His affairs are in great disorder.

LETTERS FROM LISBON AND MADRID.

1683, March 2nd, n. s., Lisbon.—Charles Fanshaw to Lord [Preston].—I understood lately from my secretary that your lordship had not received any letter from me since your arrival in France, which I was extremely sorry to hear, because it might look not only like a neglect of my duty in paying the common respect to his Majesty's minister, but a particular transgression in me who have had the honour so long to be acquainted with your person and merit.—Compliments.—I believe your Court is endeavouring to furnish us an husband for our Infanta, tho' I cannot learn that their hopes ripen much yet.

1683, January 27th, Madrid. Peter Levet to Lord [Preston].—Having the honour to be agent and secretary for the most part of these 3 years unto Sir Henry Goodricke, I presume this title, together with the inscription of the enclosed, will merit your lordship's censure for giving you the trouble of forwarding the same. Sir Henry is at a league's distance from this Court, and is positively denied permission (as he requested) to come to his house for some few days privately to put his papers and other affairs in some order towards his return; a rigidity much blamed by all people. He intends homewards by that Court, and to begin his way by the midst of the next month through Catalonia, this being the pleasantest travelling, tho' not the shortest cut. This goeth by a French express lately come from Portugal. Here are letters come from hence on the 25th by express also from St. Sebastian; but we can learn nothing of their purport. From Tanger they advise of a most considerable defeat given to the Morocco Emperor by his nephew with the slaughter of (they relate thus) of 24,000 men, and that they expect great advantages from this accident. The country carried in lately thither above 50 heads of cattle.

1683, Feb. 25th, Madrid. The same to the same.—He sent by the last general post a packet for Sir Henry Goodricke; this he sends by the Italian post under Lord Preston's cover and protection.—Capt. Matthews delivered yesterday by my means De la Fuente's letter to this Privado Medina Celi, and is set forth this morning for Tanger. His Catholic Majesty is abroad a hunting. Our new Spain fleet is to set sail by the latter end of this month. Many ports and places in the Indies are sold and turned to money. Our greatest care here at present is to know his Christian Majesty's intentions against spring, and whether the Emperor adjusts and defers to our King his differences with that Crown, for we have here some jealousies upon this account. We expect Count Mansfelt by the midst of the next. Here is an express these 12 days from his Imperial Majesty, demanding money or an answer, but is not likely to return in some days.

LETTERS FROM RATISBON.

1683, July 16, Ratisbone.—Edm. Poley to Lord Preston.—I hope this will find you returned from your journey with the Court The Emperor did not long since make a proposal to the Diett of some offers to be made to France, which did consist in re-demanding all that hath been taken against the Treaty of Munster, and in some expressions besides which seemed more resolute than the ill condition in which his affairs are would reasonably allow of; and seeing they are since fallen into a much worse condition than before, I cannot tell whether he may not be necessitated to desist from those proposals.—Poley then tells of the siege of Vienna by the Turks. He says that all communication with the town is cut off. He praises the ability of the Count de Staremberg, who commanded the Emperor's troops, and mentions that the Electors of Bavaria, Saxony, and Brandenburg are going to send relief to the town.

1683, July 23rd, o. s., Ratisbone.—The same to the same.—I have lately given your lordship an account of the applications made here from the Emperor's ministers to the Comte de Crecy to desire that his most Christian Majesty would be pleased not to attack the Empire during the misery and disorder it is in from the war with the Turks; and that he will be pleased not to hinder the Princes of the Empire from assisting the Emperor against the Turks. I have now enclosed the answer which Mons^r. de Crecy hath given to those applications. The news from Vienna is uncertain, but there is great probability that the town is in great danger. The Comte de Staremberg who is governor of it is said to have acquainted the Duke of Lorraine that he wants ammunition, and that he desires as speedy relief towards raising the siege as is possible. The Turks are said to attack it very resolutely and to be lodged not far from the contrescarpe. There is arrived at the Emperor's Court a gentleman for the King of Poland, to let him know that King was not informed that Vienna was in so great danger, but that now he knew it he would hasten to relieve it with his army as soon as he possibly could. It is thought he can scarce be there before the 16th instant, n. s. The success of the Comte de Crecy's proposals will depend much upon Vienna.

1683, Aug. 16, Ratisbone.—The same to the same.—In my last I sent your lordship the memorial given here by Mons^r. le Comte de Crecy to propose a truce of 30 years upon the same conditions which were proposed at Frankfurt for a Treaty; and I have now enclosed a commission's-decree given here from the Emperor's commissioner, in which you will find that Mons^r. de Crecy is blamed for having penned his memorial in so reflecting terms. He intends to give in a new memorial for his justification, as having received from Court the expressions which they impute to his own inclination, your lordship will easily imagine that he is not well pleased with this commission's decree. He hath sent it to Court by Mons^r. Cauley, the most considerable gentleman who he hath with him.—The Turks have sprung two mines before Vienna; the first being countermined from the town did the Turks more hurt [them] than the troops of the garrison. The second succeeded better, and the Turks lodged themselves in the counterscarpe by the help of it, but were beaten off again, so that the town having yet lost no ground, there is much hope it may hold out till the relief arrives.—The King of Poland is marching with his army, and the troops of the Empire are hastening to join the Emperor's army as fast as generally things are done in the Empire, so that the hopes that the Turks by want of forage will be forced to quit the siege when the army of Poland approaches is as yet the most visible assurance of the safety of the town.

1683, Aug. 27, Ratisbone.—The same to the same. I received yesterday yours of the 23rd, n. s. . . . I have here inclosed the conclusion of the Diet upon the proposal of an armistice, which is penned obscurely, but by which it is to be seen that the Empire doth accept an armistice, but neither upon the condition nor for so long a time as is proposed by France. After it was concluded notice was given of it to Mons^r. de Crecy by the Emperor's con-commissary by appointment to the Diet, and your lordship may see what passed in that visit from the enclosed account which Mons^r. de Crecy hath written of it himself by way of a letter to the Minister of the Elector of Mayence. The Empire and France have now their hands free again as to this Treaty, and, for ought I see, France is much more able to make use of that liberty than the Empire is; for that besides the disunion which is still in the Empire, I do not see that the town of Vienna is yet out of danger. Governor doth solicit his being relieved with all the earnestness imaginable In a P.S. of his last letter to the Duke of Lorraine he tells him that the miners brought him word that that minute they heard the enemies at work under the Court Bastion, so that there is no time to lose. This letter was of the 27th Aug., and since that time we know no further news from the town. But letters say that the King of Poland hath actually joined the Emperor's army with 20,000 men 1683, Oct. $\frac{1}{11}$, Ratisbone.—The same to the same.— The Comte de Windischgratz is at last legitimated, and hath taken the character of the Emperor's principal commissary, and hath at the same delivered to the Diet the Emperor's answer to the resolution taken in the Diet on the 31 Aug., n.s., by which answer the Emperor doth approve their having accepted a truce with France, and their having resolved to treat of the conditions and time of it as soon as may be, and at the same time to set forth the final treaty with as much diligence. This answer hath not been yet taken into consideration in the colleges, which are now employed for nominating a deputation to congratulate the Comte de Windischgratz in his new employment, which is the custom upon the arrival of a new commissary; but there do arise so many disputes and difficulties concerning the reception which the Elector's ministers do pretend from the Comte de Windischgratz, that the effect and success of this deputation may be disappointed for a great while, and consequently the progress in affairs be delayed upon that account. Some letters do say that Neuhausel is actually invested, but many are of opinion that the Emperor's chief design for this winter is only to block it up from receiving any more troops or provisions, which if he can do, it is thought that in the spring it will cost him but very little trouble to gain the town. The Elector of Bavaria is said to have recalled his horse from the Emperor's army, and to have left the foot there, and that the allies of the circle of Franconia intend to do the same thing. The bloody flux increases very much at the army and at Vienna, and it is apprehended that it may at last improve to a more dangerous distemper. The Comte de Zinzendorf, Grand Maitre de la Maison to the Emperor, is dead of it at Linz.

1683, Oct. $\frac{11}{21}$, Ratisbone.—The same to the same.— We have here received an account of a battle between the Christians and Turks near Baracan, which covers the bridge of Gran.—Gives an account of the battle.— All things else continue here in the same state, and there are but few steps made towards concluding a Treaty. The Emperor hath approved the resolution of the Diet for accepting a truce with France, but there is as yet not any step made towards adjusting the time and conditions of it. The allies seem still to have their view upon a general Treaty, but as yet we see no proposals made towards bringing it to a point. The good success in Hungary doth very much help to continue the Emperor's Court in the measures it hath taken.

1683, Jan. $\frac{8}{18}$, Ratisbone.—The same to the same.— I did find at my coming hither a letter from your lordship The Emperor doth now seem very willing to continue the Treaty here, and the States have agreed to it also, and did on the $\frac{1}{15}$ send him their opinion that it should be continued in this place with the Comte de Crecy, so that the next thing will be to see what shall be the conditions upon which it is to be continued. The letters from Vienna do say that the Emperor doth still continue in the resolution to be here the next month. The Electors have written to him a very pressing letter to persuade him to make an end of the Treaty with France, and it is said they do intend to write him another concerning the honours which he refused to give their ambassadors at Frankfort, and which they received from others.

1683, Feb. $\frac{1}{1}$, Ratisbone.—The same to the same.— The Electors do continue in the former resolution of treating upon the conditions offered by France, and the Princes do still insist upon beginning the Treaty by a discussion of the Treaties of Munster and Nimuegen, and seem either of them but little disposed to recede anything from their opinions. Meanwhile Mons^r. Verjus hath insinuated to the Diet that his power to treat is continued, but that the King doth not hold himself any longer obliged to the proposals he hath made; but shall take such measures as he sees convenient. There is a Treaty concluded and ratified between the Emperor and Elector of Bavaria, by which the Elector doth oblige himself to furnish the Emperor with 8,000, and some say 13,000 men for which the Elector receives 300,000 florins.

LETTERS BY THE ABBÉ RENAUDOT.

SIR
F. GRAHAM
BART.

Eighty-eight letters by the Abbé Renaudot, nearly all to Lord Preston, but some to Mr. Tempest; one is to M. du Puy, and one is by M. du Puy. Only one of Renaudot's has the year dated (1685), some have the day of the week or day of the month, or both, some have no date at all. He seems to have been employed by Lord Preston to collect and send news from all quarters, and these letters are the result.

The absence of dates has prevented any arrangement of the letters. The following notes are extracted. He could write very good English.

n. d. Our news from Rome is that Madame Martinozzi, grandmother of Madame the Duchess of York, is cured of a dangerous malady. I have not been able to have any answer of the States to M. Van Dutt.

In one letter to Tempest he recommends Lord Preston to have a couple of fine horses for his own use when he followed the King. He says that Lord Berkeley and the Earl of Arundell had much credit for their fine horses.

n. d. By the last letters from Madrid of the 22nd July we learn that the fleet left Cadiz the 13th. On leaving the port it met an English ship coming from Tanjier, and the Count of Aguilar, who was in command, ordered him to dip his flag and salute the royal standard. The captain refused, and he was told that if he did not obey in six hours they would sink him. He afterwards did as he was ordered, and the English consul at Cadiz protested against it, and thought that the captain would be punished. Within the last week there has arrived a ship despatched by M. de la Basse, Governor of Canada, by which we learn that the English of the colony of Boston, &c., had great quarrels with the French colonies as to boundaries, and that it was complained that the English favoured, and furnished arms and powder to the Iroquois, who are beginning to make war on the French.

In one letter he thanks Lord Preston for some tea and chocolate which his lordship had sent. (Bulstrode used to send chocolate from Brussels to Lord Preston at Paris.)

Twenty-six letters to Lord Preston from a spy, some sealed with a red seal of a heart with flowers springing from it and the initials I. D., some with a red seal bearing the letters A. D. S. interlaced, surmounted by a Viscount's coronet, and one sealed with a coin; the letters are signed R.T. (Roger Tilley).

The other letters are by another spy employed by Lord Preston, but they have no signature, and are mostly undated.

n. d. The last night being a night of great joy and mirth here in this city with all sort of people I took my opportunity to get the old father in my company, and gave him a supper, but never could I put him in the humour as to get what I wished, for tho' I made him as drunk as any thing, I was not myself much less, in so much that I repent what I have done, for seeing that the old thief did quite deny me in saying that he had not it about him, I gave orders to my man that as soon as the old man would fall asleep to pick his pocket, and to find out such a paper, and to copy it out with all speed, and to put the paper in the old man's pocket, which he did, but indeed I am sorry for it, by reason my man is a Frenchman, for I am much afraid; but, however, we must make the best of the worst, and keep him in a good humour in making much of him, and as he knows the commerce that is between your lordship and I, therefore I desire that you would be pleased to flatter and make much of him. I am obliged all this day to be about sending away what I told you yesterday, by reason the armoury could not furnish me with all the arms

n. d. Asks Lord Preston for a passport for a young Englishman to return into England. He has served in the English horse for 4 years, and afterwards was incorporated into a French regiment, as the rest was, and lost his hand in the service.

n. d. That your lordship may write into England that they watch whether old Lacy goes into the county of Clare, or any that belongs to him, that all persons that come from Ireland to England may be searched, from the highest to the lowest, and then the King cannot miss to find out the correspondence betwixt Macarty and Lacy. This is very necessary, for I do promise your lordship that the matter goes on very hot now.

n. d. . . . I forgot to tell you yesterday that Baron White is out and already gone somewhere; I believe your lordship would not do amiss to let the King know of it, and that in case he should be in England or Ireland to watch well his motions. I cannot tell who Glissane meant on Saturday last when we were together, amongst several other discourses and talking of able men, Glissane said as followeth, Thanks be to God we have at present found out a man that is able enough for our affairs. I asked him at the same time where he was; he answered me that it was not necessary that I should know that at present, but that in time I should know of it.

SIR
GRAHAM,
BART.

n. d. I am obliged to wait on the Prince Melkinbourg this morning to sell him a horse, and being afraid I could not wait on you time enough before you would send away your letters, I made bold to send your honour my petition, in hopes you will be pleased to enclose it in one of your letters, and also to desire a speedy answer.

n. d. Monday morning.—I could not wait on your lordship yesterday according to your orders, but will this day.—I beseech your honour to consider what a condition I am since Father Glisane and Mr. Lacy found out a way to betray me, they both suspecting that I had correspondence with you was resolved to find out the truth by Father Everard's intrigues. Your lordship knows the day that I told you that I was to conduct this old devil, but alas it is a conduction to my ruin, for the old rogue was here before me, and is here at this present, for yesterday I saw him, and he was so impudent in Glisan's presence to give me a rub, for it is true that he had reason, for I blushed when I saw him.

n. d. I have received a letter this morning to meet the Cardinal at a place called Au brie, betwixt this and Pontearse, so that I am obliged to be there this night.—Be pleased to send those articles, for I shall want them, and if you have not copied them you shall have it to-morrow at Versaile, or on Tuesday, at your own house.—Asks Lord Preston to lend him a horse, he cannot get any commodity to go thither, and a coach will have 12 crowns to go there, and from thence to Versailles.

n. d. I have just now received a letter from Fontainebleau, and since I received the said letter, Mr. Creagh came to me and told me that the Cardinal has ordered me to meet him at Fontainebleau on Wednesday next.

1682. Sept. 1st. I will not be seen any more at your lordship's house, for a reason that I will tell you when I meet you. I am arrived here this morning at 4 o'clock, by reason that M. de Louvois is going. Asks Lord Preston to take a hackney coach, without any liveries, and to meet him at this end of the pont [pont] rouge, exactly at 9 o'clock.

1682, Sept. 6th, Sunday, from Versailles.—This is to desire your lordship to come hither to-morrow, if you can possibly, and I will let you know something that may surprise you; also I will show you the party that is come about the said business, for he and the old merchant that you know are to dine with me to-morrow at your lordship's lodgings. I have invited them there purposely that you may see them; the said party has got his audience from C. B., yesterday in the afternoon, and is to part hence to-morrow at 12 o'clock for Paris, and from thence about his affairs

1682, Sept. 24th. Supposes Mr. Browne, the marchand from Waterford, has been already to wait on Lord Preston for his passport.

(1682) Oct. 6th. From my lodging at the Raquette Rue St. Jean Denis, this Tuesday, the 6th of Oct., at 3 of the clock.—Just now came a letter to Glissane from the Cardinal to meet him at St. Denise, upon which Glissane has sent for me as well as for the rest to be at St. Denise at 5 o'clock, so that if your lordship was in a capacity to walk thither you would have the pleasure to see the whole congregation.

1682, Nov. 2. Monday.—I am just now ready to part for Fontainebleau, and from thence, I believe, I will be sent to Forest Joinie about the arms. This is to let you know that Father Glissane is set at liberty a Sunday night, and that the King gave him by the Cardinal's means a benefice of 2,500 livres a year, which is a priory within 12 leagues of Paris; this is true, and it is much taken notice of by the French that a stranger is made a prior, so that there must be something extraordinary in the business that I do not as yet know. It is also said that the Bishop Mallowne is to be made a bishop as soon as there is any vacancy, and that in the mean time he is to have a great pension over and above what he has.

1682, Nov. 5th, Fontainebleau.—He dares not write anything, but on Sunday or Monday at farthest will wait on his lordship.—If in case he cannot be at Paris then he'll send his man with a letter.—He shall be with Lord Preston time enough before he sends away his letters.

1682, Dec. 23rd, Wednesday.—I was last night to wait on your honour about what I told you, touching the gentleman that was with me, he can do much in this business, for he has been secret to all this 13 months, being always at bed and board with me when here, by reason that I received several kindnesses of him when I was in England; he knows the 4 persons who are spies, Father Creagh, Mr. Dwyer, Mr. Synod, and Mr. Magrath, for he was with me in their company very often, so that he being going to England may discover them as well as I can; he has business of his own in England, and I have proposed this to him, which he embraced with all his heart, saying that he would hazard his life and fortune to serve the King his master.—I have been these 3 days desiring of him to undertake the journey into England, and to find out these 4 persons or either of them.—Has promised him protection and assistance, and that Lord Preston should send him with an express into England.—He is a gentleman and a Protestant, tho' the writer is none. To-morrow he believes he goes for Pontoise.

1682, Saturday the 30th.—I cannot for shame look on your honour in the face until such time as I bring your lordship what I owe you, tho' you were pleased to appoint me to be with you this day; and if I be not to-morrow at the King's rising at Fontainebleau I may miss to have my orders signed until to-morrow sennight, so that if your lordship pleases to do me the favour as to send me 30 crowns, which will be to give the under clerks, I will part within this hour to the end that I may be there to-morrow early.

Feb. 7th. I have considered since I quitted your honour that if I had left this boy at my lodging people may be examining of him, so that I told him that I am only gone but to Versaile, and that your lordship desired me to lend him to you for some few days, so that I beseech you to let him stay in your house until I return; he is a good honest lad, and will do anything very willing. P.S. I am just now got a horseback.

n. d. Just now Mr. Brien sent me this letter, and has appointed me to meet him at 8 of the clock at an auberge, called the Lisle d'amour; you will be pleased to peruse it, and copy it with all speed, and deliver it to the bearer, my footman, because that I may have it when I meet Mr. Brien. You may assure yourself that the clause signifies the party I spoke to your honour of this day, if not I shall without doubt know to-night where the party is.

(On a small page loose, not sealed.) At a little French ordinary, near Mons^r. la Bader valet, near St. James, in the Pelmeil, several French valet de chambres eats; if there be inquiry made for Mons^r. Bomeny, valet de chambre to the late Earl of Essex, no doubt but some of those that knew him know of what province of France, and of what city or village; if this can be found the rest will not be hard to find.

n. d. Knowing the folly I have done in discovering this business to your lordship, being satisfied at present of what I told you yesterday to be true, makes me repent much my folly, but seeing no better remedy I am resolved with the assistance of my friends in Court to submit myself to the Cardinal, hoping that I may come off, but if your honour had been in a condition to go to Court, I would rather draw my passe with your assistance than to run the hazard of telling them what I discovered your lordship; besides, I understanding by a person of quality this very day that your lordship is called for into England for to go ambassador into Spain; I do really believe it, for the knowing of this matter is enough to call you from hence and to send you further. I intend to write to Father Everard this night to Rean for to return hither. I make no doubt but the person that I employ to speak to the Cardinal will bring me off, if not I'll secure myself in taking to my heels. I will either to-morrow or Monday sell one of my horses to Prince of Meckinbourg, who has already offered me money for both, but I am resolved to keep one to be in a readiness to fly for it if the Cardinal takes ill what I have done, and with the money that I sell the other for I will wait on your lordship to give you thanks, and to pay you what I borrowed.

UNSIGNED LETTERS BY A S.Y.

1684, Jan. 12, Wednesday.—To Lord Preston.—. . . They imagine their measures in England are well enough taken to keep our King at least from venturing into action, or if he should dare so far, at least too on

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

the other side to raise new commotions, and on new pretensions sufficient to divert him from it, or defeat him in it if he should attempt any They would put themselves in hopes here that the Duchess of Portsmouth is in as great favour as ever, and that her disgrace is only a stratagem, managed by intelligence with the grand prior to take off all suspicion of correspondence with France by her, and so to wheedle the Parliament to be called. Your lordship easily sees the malicious drift of this rumour.—Asks Lord Preston that he may receive a bill for his supplies by the hands of Mr. Innis or Mr. Carlton.

1684, Jan. 15th, Saturday. . . . Tho' the negotiation of marriage be off with Portugal, and that Monsieur St. Romain be coming home, yet they say another will be sent speedily about other negotiations, and particularly about Tangier

1684, Jan. 22nd. . . . It is reported that the Duke of Monmouth is again received and it is beaten generally into the English heads here for a certain truth, that the King of France by a new Treaty is to give our King 6 French millions a year, and that there is a great banquer in Paris employed by the French King to pass over vast sums into England, and that he has already been with all the banquers that use most the English commerce to beg of them to turn over all the bills they receive from England, to be paid by him to the respective gentlemen and other parties here, and to let him in exchange draw all the bills they have to draw in English, offering besides advantage in the case beyond the regular and ordinary gain, and all this money they voice to be intended for our King, and for some of the chief ministers and members of the Privy Council; tho' I am afraid it is either a feigned offer of a thing not intended, only to raise jealousies in the people, and against the King and his most faithful, and therefore most envied servants, for designs too well known, but not so easily avoided, or else that what they voice intended for the King, &c. is designed to be dispersed to create him enemies, and traverse his designs. Your lordship, in my judgment, will do well to give a caution to our Court, against what mischiefs may arise by such practises whether real or dissembled. The same persons give out now there will be no Parliament in England, the French money having blown away all intentions that way

1684, Jan. 31st. . . . It is reported confidently by the French and some Scotch here that the Duke of Monmouth is fled into Flanders to the Marquess of Grana. . . . They still affect to persuade the world that their monies have stopped the calling of a Parliament in England this year, and that consequently they shall obtain the rest of the Spanish Netherlands this summer. . . . They continue to report that our King will assist them in this war, and that they shall persuade him by their monies, by exaggerating some disputes some time since past, both between us and Holland, as well as between us and Spain, and by the hopes they shall give him of making him absolute afterward, to make him engage against both those people to that end; they mightily set forth the preparations, they say, we are making to assist their ally of Denmark

1684, Feb. 2nd. . . . It is reported much that my Lord Dumbarton is coming hither with a regiment, and that several more are following into this service, and that we shall have a war with the Spaniard and league with the French. The French courtisans, however, secretly vex much that we did not rather sell Tangier to them than demolish it The news of no Parliament in England by means of French money gets more ground daily among the mobile of both nations

1684, Feb. 18th, Tuesday (imperfect at the end).— What I said lately of the sums transmitted hence into England is more and more confirmed, and there is a person that lives with a banker of this town that saith that they take up bills for England all over the town, at any rate the several persons concerned are pleased to demand, and that according to the supputation he has made of what bills he has seen taken up or registered in those banker's book of his acquaintance that there has been already transmitted more than the value of 600,000*l.* sterling, that other considerable sums have been transmitted both into England and Scotland from other parts of this kingdom, as also by the way of Amsterdam, Dantzick, Basil, Francfort, Cologne, Hambourg, &c.; some part of this is said to be designed for our King and some of his chief ministers, and particularly my Lord Rochester for one, to endeavour to stave off as much as may be a Parliament, whilst the far greater part is to be dispersed among the contrary party to keep them up, and cause them, like spiders that convert the best aliment into poison, to make the most innocent wise, politic, or even absolutely necessary civilities, complaisances, or temporizing of our Court with the French the subject and ground of calumniating and rendering odious all his Majesty's proceedings, his ministers, his very person and monarchy itself A great part of the English, even of those that would not pass for Whigs, are already persuaded obstinately that whatever sums pass hence go only to the King or my Lord Rochester, to whom for the Duke's sake the Whigs bear particular hate, and the others little or no respect but from the teeth outward. These are the private discourses, and seem to be the sentiments of those that sit at the helm, or that are employed to carry on intrigues, or make news They voice about that the King of England is hired by France against Spain and the Prince of Orange, that all those monies are designed for him, and that after this war the French King is to make him absolute, and install Prince George for his successor, and put off the Prince of Orange only with some small principality; that the 8,000 men pretended to be raised for Spain shall be employed either against them, or at least only to help subdue all in England that stand for the liberties of the people and to bring in popery and absolute monarchy; that monies are to be privately given out by our King to certain persons that are to seem discontented at all these things to raise men, buy arms and carbines and pistols once more, as 'twere to destroy King and Government, and so make a new plot again and decoy and entrap all that may be most able and zealous to stickle for the ancient and native freedom of the subject and the conservation of the Protestant religion. Their ministers are seemingly confident they shall by these arts prevail either with our Court and ministers not to call a Parliament nor make any significant opposition in favour of Flanders, and then afterwards make such malicious use of that easiness, as I have said They are something concerned at the orders lately said to be given out for numbering the Londoners, and taking account of every man's religion, &c., and seem to fear they may proceed to examine each one's estate, monies, debts, is all correspondences of commerce, all banquers books, and which they would look upon as very prejudicial to them in respect of one of the main points their agents have instructions to oppose in time of a Parliament.

1684, March 18. — He has been ill; but having studied physick has cured himself As for England they are now more confident than ever to keep us off from meddling or else to set us together by the ears as they see occasion or as we give it.

1684, July 31st. I was on Saturday, according to your order, to wait on you, knowing not that you had given general ones to see nobody that afternoon, and so meeting accidentally Mr. Chevalier, not having met with your Suisse, I sent up to you by him; unless your lordship had appointed me so to do by your own mouth, whatever my private occasions could have been, I should not have appealed so often in one day I write to let you know I have received letters and papers from Mr. Carew this day, which require I should have personal audience; I should be glad to know your sense upon some particulars of my last memorial too, I being to go this week again to wait on the Bishop of St. Malo

1684, Sept. 9th. . . . I was much surprised at the orders given me (on Friday fortnight) not to come any more till your lordship should signify there were occasion for me; I should not have broke silence now, but upon occasion of the enclosed letters and paper from Mr. Carew All my letters to Mr. Carew have, it seems, miscarried, because he gave me an ill direction I never received any letter or paper from Mr. Carew but what I have shown your lordship, and particularly I shewed you the procuracy I had to deal with the Holland merchants at Amsterdam, in which I never acted, and the orders I had to go and take up the papers at Mr. Arthur's and deliver them to Carew's proctor; your lordship did not forbid me thereupon to do it, and if you had, he would not have failed to have writ post to another, who would have pushed on the lawyer, which I did not, but from that very time neglected purposely to go to him till Mr. Foster desired me, and then I went to bid him desist; after I had writ to Carew and spoke to Father Clare to exhort him to send a desistment under his hand and seal, Mr. Touret, Mr. Charlton's lawyer, told me thereupon that Mr. Foster was not wise in desiring me to go at all to the other lawyer, because it was, to speak in his own terms reveiller un chat qui dort, and that it was not to be imagined he would desist without the hand and seal of the other, but that rather my desiring him to desist would increase suspicion in him, and make him push as it did. How then I have been close in that business to your lordship I do not understand, and to be thought more wedded to Carew's interest than to yours I must be thought to have lost common sense as well as honesty. I never had in my life above 4 crowns of his money, refusing expressly all things of that nature, &c.

1685, June 13th, n. st. at Paris.—. . . It will be convenient to press his Majesty to give a speedy and positive answer to our English engineers, they being much pressed to accept service here, and being ordered to make a model which they delay till answer. They have procured very curious and particular instructions from England and Holland in all these things in which those nations exceed them in sea affairs for fight or storm, and arm very considerably, tho' under pretence of backing only some pretensions they would have the world believe they still have on the Spaniards. As for our rebels, some of their gang here, which are lately come, murmur among the French, where they are well received, that notwithstanding the good beginning of the Parliament, that they questioned not but that they should find means to sow division among them, by throwing on bills about either liberties, prerogatives, charters, religion, a new examination of the 2 plots, &c. of which they questioned not but that some one, especially the last, would take, and that was that the rebels relied on more than on any foreign aid. That several of their party were gone to London for that purpose, and among other things, that there were several lusty desperate ruffians there ready, if all failed, to do their business at one stroke by dispatching the King's person, and that some of them the better to succeed would take the habit of the King's guards, and that the better to escape suspicion they were in all companies to cry down Monmouth and preach loyalty, which those of their gang here whispering among the French as only reports they hear which they are sorry for, but fear too true, makes the French affirm that 'tis impossible but our King must come to a mischance among so many Ravilliaes; but I hope his Majesty will have a care of himself. It is reported that Monmouth is privately in London, and that he and some others are waiting occasion upon the least difference arising in Parliament to appear, and demand first provision against pretended packt juries, and demand the Parliaments examination of the whole cause . . . I find that here in Court they are very shy on the point of the present occurrences, disclaiming all imputations laid to their charge, and alledging that if anything encouraged the rebels to take arms, it was because they saw he hufft the King of France, his best friend, and refused his assistance, which was the only thing that awed them, as thinking themselves well enough able to deal with him and his party alone, that his Parliaments and councils were full of that party, and had made those specious declarations of loyalty and zeal for him, only to embolden him to slight and quit the interest and assistance of so powerful and true a friend, that so having once disobliged him, they might have liew to pull off the vizard and fall off to the rebels upon their least appearance in arms, upon pretence they themselves would start to colour their defection, they having done what they have done for him only for fear of his calling his said potent friend's assistance upon them in case of resistance. That the money and great supplies said to have been given the rebels had been collected partly among Protestant States and powers, and partly among their gang and abettors in Holland, and that a great part of it had been furnished by those very men that, tho' they now offer him their lives and fortunes against a rebellion they have secretly promoted themselves, they will abandon him the next day after they shall be convinced he has abandoned great Louis, and is abandoned by them; that this artifice is the rebel's greatest encouragement, and that they laugh in their sleeves to see it take such effect; that their Prince is sorry a few false friends and treacherous Hollanders that concert with the rebels should make him slight his interest and only support, and that he will see too late that as distempers now reign in the crazy bodies of our kingdoms, 'tis impossible a King of England should reign secure without the assistance of the French monarch; but that he cannot help him against his will. These are the specious discourses of the politicians here to discuple themselves as they term it, but when I ask what means them that some of our suspicious persons, and especially Mr. Burnet was so well received and caressed here, it is answered that it is only with desire to serve our King, by penetrating into his enemies' designs, which cannot be without caressing. But after all they are much surprised and disconcerted to see so much union in both our Parliaments, and if that union continues against all artifices to the contrary, and that this rebellion instead of reducing the King to crave foreign aid, and to buy that, to quit his ancient sovereignty of the seas, and be constrained to dance after the French fiddle, tend rather to fortify and establish his authority, increase and settle his revenue and make him terrible abroad, whatever private succours they may have given them, they will then not only abandon them, but abuse them as they did the Messinesses, when they could do no more good with them, and then court our King in good earnest for his friendship.

n. d. (A long letter of 14 pp.)—Foreign affairs.—As for our affairs in England they seem a little disconcerted by the Duke of Monmouth's sudden submission, and as hasty reception, and are much concerned lest some particulars he may have discovered may too nearly touch them. However, to palliate their sentiments they give out, it was their own counsel, &c., as I told you in another paper, and that they will make their advantage of that which at present seems their disadvantage; that their politicians have a secret beyond alchymists of turning the vilest metals into gold and ex quovis ligno faciendi mercurium. . . . These are their chief intrigues as to spread abroad that the Dukes of York and Monmouth are of the same religion, and so the nation sweetly brought abed; that the Duke of Monmouth was used only as a decoy; that the house of the Stuarts is a family fraught with dissimulation, undeserving of the loyalty of subjects; that as their grandfather invented a plot against the Gowries to destroy them, so these two brothers have done now, and made use of their bastard to ensnare them; that in this and all other things the French counsels have been followed; but that the Prince of Orange, tho' the first in blood next them, and true to them, yet because a friend, too, to the people and interest of England and of the Protestant religion, and an enemy to the beloved French could never be favoured, but to the teeth outward; since by his match he could not be gained to favour French popery and absolute power; that therefore to spite him and the people whose interest is to counterpoint the French because they durst not marry the Princess Anne to a Papist, they married her to a Lutheran, that is, one as like one as the devil is to the collier, they say, and a Prince, too, leagued with France, to sow the seeds of a civil war in the land; but yet that the Prince of Orange's interest was still valid, and therefore tho' Monmouth had left them, yet they should find another and worthier head for the cause, whose partakers would be rather exasperated than discouraged by this perfidiousness. That, therefore, it should be moved to the Parliament that the Prince of Orange's right might be declared valid, notwithstanding the Danish match, whose issue should not pretend but after his, and therefore that marriage or the articles thereof should not oblige England to any obligation with that nation prejudicial to itself, nor in favour of France, and therefore on the first news of that Crown's declaring war with Suedeland and Holland, all troops of the English obedience be recalled thence. That it may be proposed in the same Parliament that both these plots be examined, and all the proceedings of the judges against the pretended criminals, as also all their proceedings by virtue of quo warrantos, and that London and all other towns may be permitted anew to plead their privileges before the commons; that the proceedings of the two last mayors and sheriffs and others assisting them be examined, that after this examination his Majesty's last new raised addition of guards be disbanded as useless; that my Lord Dunbarton and my Lord Dartmouth, and several other persons suspected of popery and the French interest be forbidden Court and dismissed from the King and confined or else sent into the Emperor's service. That the business of Tangier be examined and all those punished that counselled its demolition. For the same ends the French still publish that, notwithstanding the triple league, and the King of England's temporizing with the Spaniard, that he is in league with the French, and will come out of the other for little insignificant disgusts taken against the Spaniard, and that in order to it 6,000 men are speedily coming in, and that therefore whoever pretence to be a friend by offering to give money of them, that he intends to employ it for the French and not the Spaniard, and least to establish his new acquired power, and that therefore no supplies be granted him till all those fears be removed by the examination of the fore-said points and by an actual declaration of war; that my Lord Hyde may be impeached, &c. These and other points they hope will be sufficient to employ the most loyal Parliament and hinder them from giving supply that may put the King in a condition to re-assert power fully or at least seasonably enough to restore peace to Christendom. Some are concerned here for the disgrace of the Duchess of Portsmouth, but the Whigs say that's an artifice as well as the rest to disguise the correspondence with France and feign a disgust against them the better to wheedle the Parliament out of money; by this it may be seen how unwearied they are in their practices; in case all which fail, say they, they have measures ready taken to act by open rebellion, and to force the King once more to disband or otherwise divert his army. To this end some French here talk of making some propositions privately to the Prince of Orange, which are to hinder the Holland levies and to countenance the discontented in England, in which case they will promise to assist to make him absolute Prince of the united Netherlands and King of Great Britain. But if he doth not accept them, say they, he is doubly to expect his ruin as aforesaid by the Louvesstein faction and the Danish match. They are endeavouring what they can to induce Portugal in this to profit of this conjuncture against the Spaniards, and to demand satisfaction of the English in the next Parliament for the demolition and loss of Tangier as a place, for want of heirs of the Queen's body, which ought to have reverted to them, and this the more to disgust the Parliament and people against the King, and make them more cross to him. These are the things, my Lord, worth notice. I have been able to learn these 2 or 3 days in some private assemblies, and of some very knowing persons among the French, among whom, even concerning the very English affairs, I find better intelligence generally than among English; they finding English that speak more freely to them than they would to me, or any English not well known to them, and they for the same reason speaking more freely to me . . . Since I saw your lordship an unhappy suit of law was raised against me by some painters concerning my wife's painting, from which they would hinder her.

n. d. . . . As for the report of 6,000 men coming hither into the French service, it is confidently reported by the French that it is not only credited by the Whigs but begins to get ground and cause discontent even among the most unwary loyalists themselves. I must not forget to tell your lordship that there are a different sort of Whigs, that contrary to the other brag and triumph at this reception of the D. of Monmouth, and say they shall not only now come out of danger, but mount again into places of trust and of Court, from whence, being once seated there, they will claw off all those that were so foolhardy to advance doubtful prerogatives against known privileges and bring the plot back on them; for both old Charles and old James, too, durst do no otherwise than make their peace with young James, say they, who has done well since it must be so, to let the old harmless man live a little longer and keep his animosities, and preserve his party entire and in power till his death, when the places his party shall then be in possession of may give him opportunity to have the other tug with his uncle James, and his cousin George, too, who shall be sent to reign over Greenland, where his brother has better pretensions than he is like to have over England.—Asks Lord Preston's appointment for a meeting either by Mr. Ennis or by Mr. Carleton.

n. d.—I have intelligence that a ship lately arrived at Hambourg, after having landed 3 or 4 rebels of note, viz., Mr. Ferguson, Sir Thomas Armstrong, my Lord Melvin, and some others, who took their way toward Mecklenbourg, sailed away again immediately without making any stay. That Argile, after having had a consult with those of his party in Holland is gone back privately into Scotland, from whence he intends to return with some instructions about new measures to be taken, and it is thought may take a small turn here, but will be gone. And before there is any more of this sort, it is to be feared, the Court of France, being, and as it well may be, what one to make of them, as attending what force the affairs of Europe will bear upon the good or bad success of the German affairs, which keep their council in suspense. There are persons much to be suspected that pass frequently to and from England that are supposed to be employed to keep up the old jealousies of an absolute power, and hinder a good Parliament. The Whigs have a club of 2 or 3 places, and one particularly at Mr.

Foster's. I am very near getting acquaintance with him whom we suspect for their great agent. The French show much dissatisfaction at our present ministers for 2 things, chiefly secrecy and incorruptibility.

n. d.—It is strongly reported among the French, as likewise among the English, that a league offensive and defensive has been not only proposed but concluded between England and France . . . this is certain that the French endeavour to make what advantage they can of the little dissatisfaction between Spain and us, and would have the public believe that nothing less than such a league can proceed from it. I shall not need to tell your lordship of the intended voyage to Chambort, and of the probability of its proving elsewhere; but I shall hint to you that there are secret whispers that there is some design on foot of surprising Ostend or Newport or both, for then, say their politicians, we shall not need care for the English mediation nor yet for their enmity, if they should break with us upon that occasion. They think this design very feasible at present if privately managed, by reason of the present posture of affairs in England. I was in company with a Maitre de la chambre des comptes yesterday, who has great correspondence at Court, and I shall endeavour to see him often; we were but 3 in company; after the character a French acquaintance of mine gave me that I was employed by the French, and was a friend of their interest, he began to discourse very freely, and upon occasion of a dissension we were talking of between an order of Friars who quarrelling, and thereupon dividing into two factions, one faction complained to the King by way of revenge against the other, that Father Caesar Confessor to Madam Montespan with their adverse party of which he was head had maintained that the King had fomented the rebellion of Hungary and Comte Tekeli's proceedings, I say this gentleman said thereupon that nothing was more certain for he had seen the instructions and commissions given to one Mons^r. de Vernay lately parted from Dantzick, and formerly commander among them, for that effect, and, says he, they were a long time wholly supported by money from hence, but this, says he, I would not say elsewhere. Our politicians, says he, think all things lawful against an enemy or a rival, according to that of Dolus an virtus, &c. I asked him thereupon what he thought of our troubles in England, whether he thought they were not fomented by instruments from hence too; he answered that was not to be questioned by any discerning spirit, and supposed could not be unknown to me, for, says he, 'tis our King's interest to do it, the advancement of his pretences in Flanders and elsewhere being inseparable from such practises, and there being no other way to keep the English King under a necessity of colloquing with him. And, says he, you may be sure these practises will never cease as long as the same interest holds. Ay, but, said I, suppose the King of England should prevail so far as to get the upper hand and get a good Parliament, then your measures would be broken. Oh, but says he, we have laid things so well that nothing but that King's good stars can effect that. How so, say I? Why says he, we have instruments that, notwithstanding the King's advantages, will prevail for a considerable number of contrary elections, and others we have that in all these commotions have seemed fast to the King's interests only to the give us notice of the Court measures that we may the better countermines them. And of this, says he, the King of England is so persuaded that he is afraid to call a Parliament yet, altho' there be great necessity of it, and that the people's affection be so much heated towards him that it seems to be the critical minute for it, because, says he, should he now call a Parliament, tho' of never so loyal men, before the examination of the persons concerned in this plot be done, we should tickle them so with specious pretences, that their fingers should soon be itching to have the examination of that affair which, whether granted or denied, should be our affair. And yet on the other side by hindering him from calling a Parliament at present we put him in danger of letting the people's affections cool too much, and give time to wicked spirits to work them to another temper. For a nation, if your King's good fortune may prevail and break all our measures, which truly, says he, I do not much pray against, as being really no great friend to our politicians' maxims, and wishing rather they would take measures more suitable to generosity and Christianity. Yet this I can say for them, which I impute wholly to our King's own sentiments, that had not he had as much fear of a Republic, at least as of the King of England's peaceable power, he might have caused the rebels to proceed more swiftly and more John like, and that the King might have been cut off before any discovery. But that being afraid of a Republic, and perhaps, says he, having some remains of respect for your King's person and dignity, and some horror of so execrable and lamentable a fact, he caused them to drive slowly, which he thought would put them in a kind of inevitable danger of being discovered; which discovery he thought would give the King and nation work enough to do his business, and be more safe than the cutting off the royal line and totally overthrowing the government. But yet, however, to provide against all hazards, and for fear some hot spirits might drive faster and further than he wished or thought they might do, he had forces ready in case they had cut off the King to seize on England during that confusion, and by way of prevention had instruments among the rebels to keep them in dissension, and from coming to any resolutions upon any certain form of government that might put the nation in a condition to resist a sudden and well managed invasion. This is the substance of a conference of about 2 hours: he told me in fine here were about 10 persons here that were employed in these things, and asked me whether I did not think so too. I told him yes, and I thought about 4 of them Scotch; yes, saith he, and 3 of them, with 2 English, lately come were gone to Fountainbleau; on like occasions I enquired afterwards about town, and found there were several English gone, and some Scotch, at the same time your lordship went; among which are 2 of those Scotch I suspect and 2 English knights lately come, that are very shy and shun almost all company; but we shall learn more in some time. It is reported by the French that the Duke of Monmouth has lately written a submissive letter to the King delivered by the Duchess his lady, to which the King should answer that he would do well to keep out of the way, for if he were catched it would not be in his own royal power to save him, and thereupon bid her also retire and come no more to Court. . . .

n. d.—. . . . After alluding to a person whom he employed among the Scotch and the Whigs, and whom he sometimes sent to the meetings instead of going himself, in order to get information with less suspicion, the writer says, The Scotch, whose acquaintance I so much pursue, are still at Fontainebleau. It is said by some Irish which are almost continually at Court that the King of France received some few days ago a packet of letters, at the contents of which he seemed very much nettled; and which is supposed to have troubled him more than anything, was that some papers of the Grand Vizier in which he may have some concern have fallen into the Imperial hands. He is raising, say they, 40 new regiments. What I told you last is certain about 2 Scotch envoys which are expected in November. The French and the Court Irish are very confident in the report of a league offensive and defensive on this side, it being the interest here to have such a thing believed, right or wrong. The Whigs report here that our King begins to be afraid of them, and that he will hardly dare prosecute the conspirators any further, finding their intrigues so deep, and apprehending by any more executions to provoke them to a general rising, against which, say they silently, he endeavours to fortify himself by a league here. Sir Henry Calverly is certainly a dangerous person, and all I told you of other persons is more and more confirmed. When our Scotch come home I shall be able to say something more considerable . . . My French maître de Comptes is too at Fontainebleau.

n. d.—It was impossible for me to get audience before Tuesday in the afternoon, so that I could not come back till last night late. I found them mighty busy, nay, so busy as I never saw them since I knew the Court. There is certainly some great design in hand. They speak of Flanders, but their chief design is chiefly on the Empire . . . He thinks they will do what they can to divert succour from Vienna, so that, the Turks getting a footing in Europe, the French King would have a better chance of being made universal Monarch in order to oppose the Turk . . . The words of the person I spoke of were these, Your King has a great chance in seeing the Turks would have taken on the one side or the other. On the latter occasion poured in his forces among them and reduced England before they could have recovered themselves into any form of government, he having forces ready posted for that, as fearing some mischief intended against his brother Charles, whose death he would have severely revenged; but he said if our King would be in no danger of plots he must be firm to Mr. Louis, for since he had espoused other interests he had been troubled with broils, and now would be, in twining the embayers of the loyal party, and now stuck to him. That he could do well to keep his mind his own and not be so much interested in the interests of his neighbours that he should let the King of France proceed and so that he might be quiet and secure at home. This was enough for a minister to speak: your lordship knows what construction to make of it. He said moreover, that their ministers knew very well how to manage the ill humours of England, and work them to what crisis they pleased, but that they should use them as our King should give them occasion. He received me very kindly, and gave me audience when above 500 could not have it, but I could not have so much discourse as I could have wished, because of his great business, by reason of the King's sudden intended departure; but he told me he should be glad to see me oftener. I perceived by him that he had frequent visits incognito from several English and Scotch discontented, and from some members of the late Parliament, for he is the chief minister of Mr. Louvois' own cabinet, commissary of all the dispatches, commissary interpreter for the English tongue in reference to troops and warlike affairs. As for our present ministers I find they relish them not, and that their rancour is still as great as ever against the Duke. The Duke of Buckingham's reconciliation, I perceive, nettles them, as fearing he may discover much of their intrigues, but yet they seem to slight it. I perceive one of their methods is to endeavour to keep up the courage of the dissenters, and to intimidate the King and his party, and work them to a diffidence of their own strength and bring them to have recourse to them. . . .

n. d. Since I last saw your lordship I have these advices, which I think considerable. About 8 days ago there was a person deputed into Holland, and sent to a certain place where it is certain that the D. of M. (Monmouth) and Argile met in consultation, carrying them some new instructions for some new measures to be taken for carrying on their design, in which their endeavours are unwearied, because their old ones are too much broken; and no doubt but this C. has much part in it. And I have great cause to suspect they are still together, but whether just in the same place is doubtful. The party is still in great heart, and encourage one another, which would hardly be unless they were secretly encouraged, perhaps by money, as well as by verbal promises.

1683, Aug. 3rd. . . . I have been as diligent as I could in my enquiries for this next ordinary, tho' the equipage I am now in suffers me not yet to go among the courtiers nor those great ones of my acquaintance, nor yet to frequent those other places which are most fertile of what I am to seek for. It is reported generally here by almost all persons, but chiefly by the French themselves, and by those whose interest it is to have such things believed, tho' not perhaps to have them really true, that Monsieur Tilladet, sent to compliment our King on occasion of the present conspiracy, has offered, or at least is to offer, among other things, his master's assistance by men or money, or both, upon occasion, which harping on the old string of fomenting jealousies and fears, the chief ferment all along of our disturbances, makes me imagine it is either not true but invented by those whose character I have already largely enough insisted on, or if it be true that it is a compliment that is tempered with at least as much gall as honey . . . I think I may confidently say that our Whigs have a more than ordinary correspondence with the Huguenots or Genevians here, and that there is some mystery between them that perhaps may concern the K. of France as well as ours. It is strongly to be suspected they have their agents here, who act both in this Court and among the Huguenots, and I think I have discovered some of them. . . .

n. d. I was yesterday at a meeting of news at a French house of one that is an antiquary and a great herald here, where there are 2 Scotch and one English gentleman that frequent constantly, and I find it was they that pushed me to go to the meeting. I was a little, because I intend to frequent that meeting and to make use of them to pick out the English and French mysteries. They meet every Thursday to the number of about 30 in all, and every one brings his advices and speaks his sense upon them afterward. There are many such here. I have great acquaintance among the universities and the clergymen here of the best quality, and for the courtiers now with them I shall be very

- diligent, but your lordship must be punctual in furnishing me news every post regularly by Mr. Ennis, whether I see you or no, for that point is more important than can be easily imagined It is reported that my Lord Grey is in the camp of Prince Charles of Lorrain, and that a servant of the Duke of Monmouth has been at a town called Chaalons-sur-Marne. The Whig party begin to grow weary of their idol Monmouth, and I perceive have a design for the future to make use of the name of the Prince of Orange because they find they are too weak, and by forming a faction under the name of the other, tho' with no affection for his person, they imagine they may draw a great part of the royal party to them, to fortify their tottering faction and weaken them that are for the true interest of the English Monarchy. For the Prince of Orange is now their theme; their discourses are composed all of the praises of his person and his parts above that of Prince George, and they say that our King is led by spleen, and that his spleen is governed by the French; by which it comes to pass, say they, that the King and those men that were so much against the Bill of Exclusion have been those that have made a match to exclude others nearer to, and more deserving of the Crown, than Prince George, and that this will cause bloodshed and divisions My Lord Russel is hotly and brazen-facedly maintained by Mr. Beal and others of that stamp.
- n. d. I have been a little too among the Whigs, and find there is a certain cabal here that endeavour in this conjuncture to render our King and his actions as odious as they can, and to sow dangerous seeds of jealousy; one Mr. Charlton, who has been a great traveller, is one of the chief, and by all that I can probably gather, is one of the agents of the malicious party, both at this Court and among the Huguenots here. Your lordship I suppose knows he was put a while ago in the Bastille for some criminal correspondence he was suspected to have held with the Huguenots in Lanquedoc, and tho' he was so cunning that they could find no evident proof against him sufficient to condemn him, yet it is no proof of his innocence, but may rather augment our suspicion, especially since it is certain that he is very virulent in his expressions, especially on occasion of the present conjuncture, and labours what he can to lessen the credit of the last conspiracy, and is bitter against monarchy in general he speaks one thing among the French Romans and other things among the reformed, so that it is not improbable that at his coming out of the Bastille he may have been gained by those of this Court too to make use of an occasion It is confidently reported here that our King, on the occasion of the plot, is so much displeased with the Protestant religion that he is going to declare himself openly a Papist, and that all his party now of the Church of England are prepared to follow him, having been always, but at best, private and church papists, and that in that case the succour of some powerful neighbour, a little nearer than the Indies, will not be refused in case of need.—Mentions one D'Allay as a great crony of Charlton's, who pretends to be a Huguenot, but by all report has the character of an atheistical enemy of monarchy
- n. d. I have discovered that the faction of the rebels is not yet out of heart, but as confident as ever, and therefore you may guess they must needs be encouraged by some great somebody on the side of the continent. They say if it be not true that there is an insurrection in England or elsewhere, that it may be, and perhaps will be before it be long, and when one would seem to deter them by the deaths of my Lord Russel, &c. they say they know some men's lives must be spent before the good cause can take effect. They are so impudent as to laugh at all the proceedings of the King and his friends, and say a reckoning will come when they shall pay all. It is certain that there is here not only agents, but a sort of envoys from Argyle, as head of the Scotch party, but of the Whig party in England. I have discovered the particular persons, but I shall tell you their names, and give you certain proofs of it I hope in 8 or 10 days. To-morrow I shall go to the meeting I spoke of; but for to deal with the French, 'tis highly important to furnish me with news to give them, which is not yet done, by which I can make them speak their minds, and without desiring any of them in exchange, discover their intrigues. If it be too great trouble to give me a copy of news every post be pleased but to order M. Ennis, if you cannot in person, to let me see but such a letter, for I have such a memory that I can write without seeing it any more all the articles of it. I would willingly have one to carry to Fountainbleau
- These agents here have great correspondence at Geneva, at Montauban in France, at Basil in Swisserland, as likewise at Hambourg and other Republic towns, from all which they pretend to draw money for their designs.
- n. d. The Whigs in England have by what they vent among themselves, and what I can learn from the French, received assurance from hence that whatever measures this monarchy be obliged to keep with that of England they shall be always kept up, and their pensions duly paid, and they shall be assured against any arbitrary power they may fear, and that they shall be maintained in a condition to act effectually on the first advantage, the conjuncture of time, the weakness of our ministers or the King's death may give them in order to the erecting of their beloved Babel and Republic. The Whigs have to keep themselves from suspicion of correspondence with France highly after their wonted mode cry out against the Duke of Y. (York) and my Lord Rochester, and the only persons bribed by this Court, and as the only obstructioners of a session of Parliament which, say they, they dread and durst not abide the test of. Great are their clamours too against my Lord Halifax and Danby for going about to enhance the King's revenue. Mr. Charlton has not lain at his lodging these 3 weeks, but yet comes frequently to Foster's; he causes himself to be denied to most people, but particularly to Mr. Carew or those that he sends.
- n. d.—The indisposition of Lord Preston, preventing the writer from seeing him, he thought good to return to Versailles; what he said before is most of it more and more confirmed, especially concerning the finances, the present ill disposition to disorders in the Kingdom, and the perplexity of their counsels in general, which if the business of the finances go not well will want much of their usual success They use their utmost endeavours to hinder the Hollanders from arming and those of Italy. Some of them seem much surprised at the Duke of Monmouth's coming in, but yet to cover with the best face they say 'tis their own doing, and that the King of England is beholding to them for so pacifying matters, that it had never been done, had not the King entered into engagements to favour their interests against Spain. But that if he should fail them they can stir up new parties, and perhaps more dangerous against them than ever. As for the English of the party, they complain very much; some of them of the King and Duke, and say that they have employed the D. of Monmouth to decoy them into a plot only to make himself absolute; that it was now visible that it was so, and that that would work no advantageous effect for the King in the hearts of the people, and that it would be cause, perhaps, that a Parliament will seek the deeper into things; but yet after all they much fear, both they and the French, that the King may be more than they or their malice in the next Parliament. However, the same and other arts will be still used to hinder the good effects expected thence; but if they succeed not, they will be forced to consent to some temporary accommodation to gain time to take new measures for disturbances. In case that Holland and England enter into the war it [is] the general sentiments of those that know the state of those provinces that Lanquedoc, Brittany, and most of the maritime provinces, and where the Huguenots are, may revolt It is much wondered that Trenchard and some others are out on bail. Some great actions are expected at the King's going to Compiègne.
- n. d. All things are said now on all sides to tend to a peace, and there are some who say with what design I know not, that when quiet shall be established in the rest of Christendom, that a pretext shall be sought to quarrel us and to invade our kingdoms, and that the better to colour and facilitate such an enterprise, they are to give out, right or wrong, that they are called in by our own King to his assistance, with much matter to the same purpose, all to maintain the old stratagem of jealousies and fears, and they brag they have the ministers of state and the chief commanders by sea and land at their devotion, who say they look on the King and Duke as setting stars, and look this way for the rising sun, and some are malicious enough to say that to favour these proceedings they have promised here to confer the kingdom of Scotland on the family of the Hamilton's; all which I believe invented on purpose to cause ill understanding between the King and his best subjects (On the back are a few memorandas by Lord Preston, but not on the subjects of the letter.)
- n. d.—I hope you received the paper I left with Mr. Sandford for you on Saturday.—I believe your lordship sees well enough that Italy is at present the main mark of the designs in mediation. They will shortly make some overtures to our Prince in order to some engagements, and at the same time they will make others to the Hollanders and their allies, as they did before the last war, and according as they shall find which of them are like to afford them the best bargain to that side they will stick. They are now for soothing up the differences between the Orangian and the Louvestein party with a palliative cure, that may last till their ends are served, that they make use of them both united, for maintaining of pretensions to keep up our differences in England without being at the charge they have been at for that end. And our dissenters put their chief trust at present in the fair correspondence they see between the French and Dutch, and hope the great Court that Monsieur D'Avaux makes to mynheers will produce some good to them. Nay, some of them are so elated as to promise themselves that they may once more join in a war against us, in favour of which some rebellion may be raised in Scotland to open the door to foreign troops. Those of that party, tho' in a hugger mugger terms, seem to threaten very dangerous tumults in London and some other parts about Easter or before, and whisper as if there were some secret designs, by help of some treacherous seamen and gunners they have gained, to set fire to some of the King's best ships and to the chief naval magazines; but I hope . . . that providence will direct our Prince too how to deal with the politicians on this side in reference to what interest England and its monarchy may have on the other disputes of Europe. . . .

n. d.—They discourse at present much of peace . . . Like therefore in the game of Put at cards, he that puts, tho' with bad cards, if he frights the other from playing that has better, wins the game, but if both play the first is lost, so is the present state of France and the rest of Christendom.—Mentions a design, if peace prevent not, to besiege Luxembourg.—Mr. Louvois is now in great perplexity for having warranted to the King the success of several intrigues which fadge not, and for having engaged the King in a labyrinth, out of which he can shew him no egress . . . and seem to be confident of embroiling England, betraying and exposing our King and his ministers, &c. They say they are cock sure we shall have no Parliament; but when I told them, to see what they would say, that it was reported our King had lived several years on 200,000*l.* sterling a year, and had saved up all the rest, and was supposed to have money enough in Bank to be able to nose them when they least thought it, and that without a Parliament, they said that was a fable only of the Tories, but that they and the Whigs knew he had no money but from them, and that but from hand to mouth, and that he must be either their parasite or expect to be the victim of their vengeance when they pleased . . .

n. d.—I thought good to let you have a sight of the letters and papers I gave you yesterday, because I would not, as near as I can, that you should be ignorant of anything that passes that may in any way concern the crown or interest of England. As for Mr. Carew, I perceive he is a very honest gentleman and a good subject, which makes Mr. Courten, that goes by the name of Charlton, very shy of him, tho' he has very great concern in the business moved. Mr. Carew knows not that I have communicated anything of his business moved to anybody but Mr. Colbert Croissy and Mr. Louvois' people. The copy of the protestation made before a notary, which I drew up for him, I have also brought with the memorial, which I also formed, upon which I desire your lordship's sense, and how you please I shall act in it, or any like business . . . Yesterday I was in a place at a table by myself, and overheard some persons discoursing about Mr. Charlton, saying of him that he had great correspondence with Rouvigni, with Mr. Justel, with one Mr. Salway, a great Whig, with Argyle, and several others, and that he had a pension from the French to those purposes; that he was a very wary cunning person, and carried himself so that he insinuated himself very far into the affections and bosom secrets of the Royal party, which he afterwards declared to the French and Whigs, and that particularly he came constantly twice a week to Mr. Foster's, where your lordship's secretaries also resorted, and that there Foster being employed to make them smoke and drink, by degrees engaged them to discourse, which when they began to be a little deep in, Mr. Charlton endeavours to wheedle on further by showing them news letters, &c., and so insensibly engaged them to discover much of your lordship's business, which afterwards come to the French ears. And the same persons affirmed they had heard some French brag of the advantage they gained by that weakness; they added that without doubt your people did it innocently, as not knowing what a seared conscienced person Foster is, and as thinking Charlton royal hearted, which was quite contrary; but that if an item were given them either not to frequent those persons, or at least to converse with them with great caution, it would be a thing that would turn to their advantage, and be highly important to your lordship and the public interest. This was in a French house near the Palais, but I saw not the persons, nor could not learn by the people of the house, that were French, who they were, saving only that they were English gentlemen that came there sometimes.—French news.—It is reported among the French by some Scotch Whigs that my Lord Danby is not only made a Marquis, but is suddenly to be made Minister of State, which they hope will give them a fair occasion to sow the seeds of new troubles. They still are daily plotting how to render the Duke's person odious, whom through my Lord Rochester's sides they use all endeavours to wound, accusing them both of the demolition of Tangier, and of hindring the calling of a Parliament, and of taking bribes both of the French for that purpose, and of the Dutch to defraud the merchants concerned in Bantam business. Notwithstanding all these armings the French intrigues by the revived party of Don John daily increases. They are about to offer another French Queen to Portugal, that they may have as many French Princesses as they can abroad.

n. d. I have used my utmost diligence at Versailles, where I found my friend at Mr. Louvois' besieged with a multitude of officers and people demanding employments in the troops. He told me that the King had been much disappointed in his new levies by reason there were a very great number of officers that had taken commissions, which have not been able to raise their men for want of money, &c. . . . He confirmed to me likewise that several of our people had privately taken commissions, here, and had raised their men very effectually; he added that if I would employ myself to procure them some sufficient persons of good security I should be rewarded, but that they would take no Catholics but what were Irish, in which nation they think they have some more particular interest than ordinary, because say they the English Catholics and all but 2 or 3 Irish or Whigs forsook them upon the K.'s proclamation to recall them on the instance of the Parliament. That they shall be unwilling to take any other that are known to be in the interest of the D. of York, whom they say they'll ne'er trust more; but that if I can procure any persons of the other faction, or that are indifferent, such as we call Trimmers, or any others that are loose in their principles, they should be well received. There is one Mr. Bradley, who is now about Callis, solicits for a commission, offering to raise a hundred men beforehand, provided he might have assurance of a commission; but because he has at the same time openly declared himself no Whig, I believe he'll hardly succeed. I shall by him, in a post or two, have an account of the names of some Whigs that solicit for commissions. I have advised him to desist from seeking employ here, and believe shall prevail. The same I shall do with all that shall apply themselves to me for that purpose, and counsel them rather to seek service in the Imperial, Polish, or Venetian armies. And if your Lordship would solicit the ministers of those powers here, privately to obtain orders to give good security to those persons that seek employ here of our country, much inconvenience might be avoided thereby. This Commis told me that an order was making to impose an oath upon all English or Scotch they should receive, engaging them not to quit the service without leave, whatever command of King or Parliament to the contrary should intervene, and those who should violate their oath should be treated as deserters, if taken. The resolutions for war or peace were not yet taken, he said, but would be within 15 days, and that he believed they would be for war, and that particularly there would [be] a campaign in Flanders by the King in person, he having no longer those measures to keep either with Holland or England to hinder him from it; and that they intended to take in that country with all speed . . . They are endeavouring to borrow in all the banks of Europe, and almost of all the considerable merchants where they can make any interest . . . They hope for the greatest supplies from those of the Louvestein faction in Holland, and from the merchants of the Whiggish faction in London, Bristol, and our other chief trading towns; and even from other particular and less ... Proceedings have been made by several persons of ... country to the same Court ... at a very cheap rate ... of victuals, but ... of assurance ... but they were made that no ... could be given, for fear of offending the King of England, but that if they venture to bring what they offered privately and without noise, they had reason to believe they would not return unsatisfied. Mr. Carew had answer that nothing could be done in his business, because it concerned the interests of several nations towards whom his Majesty would not as yet declare by any action of importance his inclinations, good or bad; but that when he should have made that declaration he should hear what might be done or not done in it. They speak very scandalously and slightly at Court of almost all our ministers, especially of my Lords Rochester and Sunderland, saying they are no men of business but only of pleasure, that their spirits are particular and not public, and that they are not good proof, and consequently they can do what they will with them, with abundance of stuff of the like nature, which they have from Whigs, and affect to repeat to all English, not without some particular drift and design. I am this week to wait on the Commis, my friend, by his especial desire.

n. d. I have used all diligence imaginable this week in sounding our malecontents, and I hope to some purpose. I saw a letter two days ago from that Mr. Smith, the chirurgian, that was here a while ago, and that was origined away, as I have already informed. He writes to one Mr. Thompson, his banker and correspondent here, wherein I find that himself and 2 others have a strict correspondence with Monmouth, Ferguson, Argyle, and other malecontents. This Smith is really named Smith, but it is Samuel Smith, and has been a known settled chirurgien in Southwark these many years; he has a wife and children, and is reported to have an estate of 500*l.* a year. He is, I believe, upwards of 50 years of age, and yet pretended to come over here to learn chirurgical operations and experiences; but it is certain he came about other business, and was an agent of the conspirators. He is gone now for Holland sooner than he intended, and writes that he and his dear friend Mr. Macguinni (another great rogue and an agent for the French among the party from the beginning, who, under pretence of dealing for horses, carries on their intrigues). I say he saith that he and his said dear friend parted at Dieppe, that he parted from him with much regret, but that the secret joy he ought to conceive for the glorious affairs he went about, much mitigated the motions of nature and passion on the subject of such a separation. He saith this Macguinni hired a shaloup or small vessel expressly for himself and to attend his motions, that he intended to touch in Holland, and from thence would make thence to Frife in Scotland, and that he would be back again here in 2 months, and that by that time he, the said Smith, would, after having done his business at Leiden, Dort, Delf, Rotterdam, and Amsterdam, be back too to meet him, when I hope, with good management, we shall be able to catch them. I hear from another lately come out of Flanders that Ferguson is certainly incognito with the Duke of Monmouth, and intends to follow his motions, and doth direct his councils, that that Duke doth flatter himself still with the hopes of royalty, and of the decrease of the King and Duke; there are certainly some dangerous practises now on foot in Scotland and in England; all those of our royal family must have special care of their persons. New and wittier heads are sought for to head anew the forsaken good old cause, and new pretences invented, of which you will certainly hear further in short time, especially if the truce come to be absolutely broken, as they say there is some probabilities; for then to keep England from meddling abroad, these rogues shall be powerfully assisted; but if the accommodation proceed, then all things will be more moderate.—Foreign News.—Our Whigs brag that their party is much increased lately, and that, tho' their meeting be blundered, that there are chamber meetings, and merry meetings, where on pretence of business or divertisement they meet not to preach or pray as formerly, but to read libels and other seditious papers, which so well detect, say they, the artifices of the King, Duke, and Pope, in order to the mining of the property and liberties of the freeborn subjects of England, and all the treacheries of their corrupted ministers, in order to the passing of the succession of our crown to a person, tho' allied by marriage to the royal line that shall, as I said before, be but as deputy of the French King, who is to protect against all attempts that may be made by the subjects to recover their royal rights, that they have already gained about half the hearts that were fallen off to the Tories, and that they defied and dared the King to call a Parliament, in whose election they were still sure to carry it above the Tories . . . This Macguinni goes, I suppose, to make propositions from hence to the malecontents in Scotland, and to bring back their's hither. Great endeavours will be made there to debauch what nobility they can from the royal party and to find out new heads . . .

n. d. . . . As to English affairs, I can tell you that Dr. Burnet is come to Paris, over whose actions, as likewise over those of others that may be worth the while, I shall have a strict eye. As for those Scotch formerly mentioned, they have not been at the assembly you know of since I frequented it; but I understand that they go every Wednesday to an Assembly much more considerable held at one M. Menage's, a person of note and a principal member of the Academy of the Virtuosi here, who lives hard at the Notre Dame Church, where most of those of the Assembly I have been at frequent. I am promised to be introduced there next week. They commend one of those Scotchmen extraordinarily for a man of great parts that reasons well, that is curious, et qui veut penetrer en toutes choses, say they, and that will, say the same, in a short time make himself fit to become ambassador. I am confident when I come to see him that he will prove the same that we have reason by other intelligence to suspect to be the envoy of Argile. They would fain have it believed here that the plot is now asleep in England, at least that the King is so, and minds it no more. As for French news, I understand that the Court here is much concerned that we have a council now that is so secret, which they thought had been peculiar to theirs; for this fleet under my Lord Dartmouth, it seems surprised them much, and it is said underhand that some of their ministers here are blamed for not being witty or diligent enough in penetrating into our councils, for hitherto they have thought 'twas impossible our K. should speak anything so much as in his bedchamber that they should not hear of. I perceive their measures are a little broken at present, but, however, that they are consulting about new means to keep on our divisions, &c. before they will venture on any great undertaking on the rest of Europe.—They know I was formally employed by French ministers, and think I am so still, and so are more open with me than they would be otherwise, knowing this Court to be none of their enemies, and so by seeming to be of as loose principles as they are that are employed by that party, I shall get within them, and by a word of pity now and then let fall without any criminal dissimulation I shall penetrate farther than they imagine.

n. d. . . . Says the Edict of Nantes will be revoked and something new accorded to those of the reformed religion by the authority of the present sovereign, that all they shall enjoy for the future may be an obligation only to the present Prince, for whatever show they make, their policy will never let them destroy those people.

n. d. Little is at present stirring here . . . The discourses about a cessation of arms are various . . . Some say they are secure on the side of England, and that the K. of England neither can nor dare stir against them, but that however, poor man, out of charity their King sends him some money to help him to pass the time, and maintain a figure of a French opera. Mr. Barillon, Mr. Rouvigni, and Mr. Justel, with whom correspond Mr. Charlton, Sir Henry Calverly, Argyle, and other of the Whigs both here and in our countries, labour much underhand, and wish success as is said, to get men out of our countries into this service, and that they make choice chiefly of Whigs and malecontents. The Whiggish party thinking thereby, in some time to train up a considerable number of men, and especially officers, in the experience of the modern way of fighting (which they take to be most perfect under the French, with whom they correspond), that may serve them upon occasion in prosecuting afresh the good old cause, which as they say they shall be able to do in little more than a year, and that at present they content themselves to be able to fright the King from calling a Parliament, which they say, he durst not do for his life, but for fear of them ventures rather to violate his own promise in his declaration, and the Act for Triennial Parliaments, which failure against law they will find time to bring against him, and that when they see occasion they will find him other work than to go to see horse races, or French operas, and bring him into a necessity of calling a Parliament that shall call him, his ministers and judges, all to an account for all their arbitrary proceedings, and that he will then find no friends, having taken such measures as to be infallibly hated by the Spaniards, detested by the Hollanders, choused by the French, slighted by the rest of the world, and abandoned by his own subjects, who will make a general defection when they shall see the fatal revolutions in Flanders, which they will make the world believe he, the D., and his ministers are cause of, and particularly they threaten more and more my Lord Rochester, and talk now more impudently, much than ever they have done since the loss of the city charter

n. d. Complaints of not having received any money for 3 weeks, which is a great inconvenience to him.—He has seen Mr. Ennis, but he saith he hath not yet any orders.— The discourse of our King's lately declaring himself a Roman with multitudes of others is so rife in town among the French that they are so positive in it that they are ready to quarrel a man that will not believe them. I met with a friend of mine who told me his landlord met with a Frenchman lately come from England who told him he had seen our King with his own eyes hear mass publicly. I desired him to enquire after that man, and offered him a reward. He promised to oblige me, but I know not yet what account I shall have from him One of my friends was particularly acquainted with that MacInnis that's lately gone for Scotland, and confirms that he was an agent of the Whigs.

n. d. He earnestly asks for an audience of Lord Preston, as he is in the dark and knows not what to do.—I sent you the last letters I received from Mr. Carew, with his letter of desistment to his lawyer, since which I saw another, of which I told Mr. Sandford the contents to tell your lordship. I entreat you to let me know what answer I shall make him for a final one, that I may be troubled no more with his letters, with which else I shall be perpetually tormented, to my great trouble and charge to no purpose. I have now suffered a month's banishment from your presence, which is so much greater grief to me, because do what I can it causes disadvantageous and dangerous reflections on me, especially among the French, who will certainly if I be not able to continue with them my usual correspondence, enter into such suspicion of me as will make my continuance in this country unsafe Mr. Sandford was pleased to recommend me to my Lord Arran about translating some papers relating to my Lord Arran's pretensions on the Duchy of Chastelleraut, which supposing to stand with your lordship's good liking I have undertaken There is a strong report here that your lordship is to go away 2 months hence, and that Mr. Savill is to come in your place

n. d. I called on your Suisse, but found your lordship had forgot to leave with him the paper you promised, as also orders to Mr. Ennis, which is much to my prejudice I therefore beseech that you would not let this day pass without leaving me that bill sealed up with the Suisse, with another general order to Mr. Ennis enclosed with it

n. d. Not being able to see his associates until the end of the week the writer will not be able to do much till the end of the week, but confirms what he had said about Denmark, Genoa, and the Princes of the north. (4 pp.)

n. d. I have been at this assembly, but I found no English or Scotch there at present. The French seem much perplexed in their councils about Flanders, their honour being engaged, say they, to maintain their violences there, a nicety with which they could wish they were not now troubled, they being otherwise willing enough to comply with the instances made by the K. of England and other mediating powers for a peace with the house of Austria, were it not for this point of honour, which how to bring off safe they know not. However, whether in jest or earnest, they give out that orders are given for raising the siege or blocus of Courtray. But to make all sure before they enter upon an absolute war they will see the effects of the mines they have laid to blow up our King's growing greatness, and with that the peace of England, the main security of that of Flanders and the rest of England. Of this they think themselves so secure, that by the apprehension of it they think they may intimidate our King, so far as to desist from his mediation, of which again they intend to make other advantages against him, or if they cannot frighten him from his mediation, they hope at least to reduce him to a necessity of calling [a Parliament?], of which they seem cock sure on the other side to make profit enough.

And if he call none, to take advantage thereby so to misrepresent his actions and intentions as to put the people into such a distemper as may highly promote a powerful rebellion to be managed, not tumultuously, but by wise heads and good fonds of treasure, which shall not fail them, if no other way can be found to divert the forces of England. Upon the occasion of speaking of Mr. Sydney's being in the Tower, one of the company, a Frenchman, said he wondered not at it, for he had particularly conversed with him when he was here, and had heard him often talking against the Royal prerogatives, and tacitly threatening the King with his father's fate for dissolving Parliament in that manner, &c. They still persist to express their hate against the D. of York, saying all this is come upon him for disobliging them, and that tho' he be now mounted again, that he must not think himself yet above the reach of their indignation, they having tricks enough to make him a Phaeton. They seem much to pity and think well of the D. of Monmouth's innocence, persuaded chiefly by Burnet's discourses. I hear by them too, that Burnet was very well received by father La Chaise and pere Maimbourg, P. I have made some acquaintance lately with my Lord Rosse, who I find is not a little Whiggish. He discourses freely with me as to a person employed by the French. I find their hopes are greater from the approaching trials, and that they confide much in living witnesses, and in endeavour to corrupt or baffle the judges, and above all the prisoners they expect most from the pretended courage and wit of Trenchard and Hambden. They are very busy now in possessing the people's heads with those specious pretences I mentioned, to reanimate and augment their cowed party, and hinder a good Parliament, the greatest bugbear both of them and the French. On the other hand, the French take wonderful pains to disguise and exterminate the actions of the Christians against the Turks, both by word and writing, &c.—Turkey, Tekeli, and Poland.—As for our King, they say he is a good Prince, and that they wish so well to him, that he would be so much a friend to himself as to be content to let theirs do what he please, tho' with some lessening of his own greatness, than by an indiscreet and dangerous opposition expose himself to be unkinged by his own subjects, which say they must needs be the sequel of meddling too much with the affairs of Flanders . . . 'Tis thought Bomini is placed there somewhere (Versailles) with some Grandee to engage him not to return to England, but as yet, which is strange, I can hear nothing certain of him.

n. d. . . . I understand that that Mr. Smith, who was suspected to be of the cabal, has lately been in Scotland, and is newly got back to Holland, and that he will make one turn more into France, tho' not to Paris presently; that Argyle's secretaries discoveries cause great consternation among the godly, and perhaps some little trouble nearer hand It is whispered that the Jews in several places and countries have several times made divers overtures to help the Republicans to considerable sums of money to carry on their designs, provided that for the present they might have lands or other things mortgaged and consigned to them or their trustees for security, and that the party would engage that as soon as they shall have effected the change of the government, the Jews might have full liberty, not only to exercise their religion and settle in England, but that they should enjoy all the liberties of natives, and trade, purchase lands, make deeds and legacies, and exercise any professions without control, and export and import what commodities they pleased, customs free, for some years, till they should be reimbursed their money; but that the party not being well agreed about these conditions, those proposals have as yet been without effect However, the Jews here do brag that secretly there is no small part of the native English that are already Jews or Jewishly inclined, which I believe is no great romance Some rambling discourse there is about the likelihood of a Parliament in England next spring

n. d. . . . I observe that those of the Whiggish party employed here have absented themselves lately, and are become more reserved than ordinary, expecting a new one and new orders when the motions of this Court and of the neighbouring powers shall be determined Mr. Carew is soliciting the Count Grammont to intercede in his business, and has desired me for that purpose to return him the original copy of the placet and memorial I drew up for him.—Has heard and also read in the Gazette that Lord Preston had desired leave to return for England: if it be true is sorry.—Asks to be remembered, and to have a settled provision made on him.

n. d. . . . Is glad Lord Preston is recovering.— . . . And as for the K. of England, they do intend too, in case of need, to make it a matter of calumny against him, that it is he by his emissaries that endeavoured to stir up factions against the Prince, his nephew, for having disoblged him, to make the Parliament believe when he shall ask money and fortify his mediation, and stand by his allies, that he acts with a double heart, and that he asks money against the French when he is secretly in league with them, and intends only to use what they shall give him to raise forces to inflame the nation. To this end too 'tis reported that the K. of England being informed that some people (upon occasion of the D. of Monmouth's so sudden appearance and coming into favour) had given out that the D. of Monmouth was only a decoy, and had been used by the King to ensnare the party that stood for their legal liberties, that I say, the King being informed of this report, had again disgraced the D. of Monmouth, only the better thereby to blind the people and the party he would destroy, and to invalidate the force of that report which might have had ill effects, whereas the D. of Monmouth was really and secretly as much in favour as ever; and that however those arts should not serve, but that it should be moved in Parliament that they might examine those matters themselves, with the proceedings of all the Court ministers therein; and that if all failed that way, there would be more plots than one in case of need to keep them in play. They are very confident, as they say that the K. will not be able by any arts to hinder great numbers of their party from entering into the next Parliament. What I have hinted concerning the intrigues in Portugal and in England about Tangier against next Parliament, as likewise all the other arts used to hinder its good issue, you will find true . . .

n. d. At the time when our Parliament voted a war against France, and that no peace should be hearkned to, till matters were reduced to the state they were in at the Pyrenean Treaty, the courtiers here scoffed at it, saying it was a mighty vote, but it should prove nothing but wind, for that very quickly there should arise a Babylonish confusion among the authors of it. When the Court of England seemed favourable to them they used to call the King's party their party, but after the King and Duke had openly quitted their interest, they used to style the opposite party by that name. When the Duke of Crequy was sent extraordinary, he was ordered as privately as he could to disperse considerable sums among all the several parties in England, to have friends at a dead lift among them all. As for Sir Elias Layton they used to speak of him in high terms, and say that their King esteemed [him] more than the ambassadors of our nation. That he had a most notable wit, and when I used to say sometimes I doubted he was a little atheistical, so much the better statesman, say they, we know well enough. An abbey will not choke him, and effectually afterward I understood he had privately a rich abbey given him by the King of France . . . As for the D. of B., their speeches were very mystical of him before me, as if they were afraid I should understand too much. They asked me what I heard abroad, and where people said he was (at the time he was here incognito), I answered, some people whispered that he was here, but that most thought him in England, at which they seemed pleased. But a good time after I found they esteemed him no more, saying he was a man lost to all parties, and had made use of his great abilities to no purpose. They used to say if the King of England declared war against them 't would be the worst thing he ever did in his life, that it was not for him to talk of war that had no money to maintain it without going to his Parliament, of which they were more masters than he, and by secret ressorts (that was their term) could turn it against him at pleasure. And when the K. and Duke had declared for the Spanish interest they said they were deceived by them and would never trust them more, and should find ways to make their own people trust them as little. There were 5 or 6 persons that used to come and go often to and from England, and that time and often frequent this Court, where they were welcome among the greatest; yet nobody knew what employ or estate they had; they were mighty talking fellows, and looked upon among the English as spreading of false news. One of them, as I take it, went by the name of Captain Scot, but the others I do not remember. There was one a little while ago, that pretending to come from Dunkirk, said he saw with his own eyes a vessel laden with money to be transported to the K. of England, whom I suppose one of their instruments, as likewise him that pretended lately to discover a new plot in Ireland; I question not but he was sent from hence, especially if it be true what I am told, that he is back again and welcome as ever at this Court. My Lord Shaftsbury was as much admired among them as among his own Whiggs. They were extraordinarily pleased to hear that Mr. Mountague, formerly ambassador here, had produced his Majesty's secret papers in Parliament.

n. d. I received the two Louis d'ors you were pleased to leave me with Mr. Sandford They say very little now of the last plot, but only mystically, and with a malicious irony say, it was a damned confounded plot, and by their silence and constrained grimaces give as much facility to judicious persons to read their thoughts and designs as they did before by their tattle. They say that time was when their party had money enough in the chamber of London to have made war on the King; but that their too timorous chiefs neglected the critical minute, and have since not only vainly spent that money, but run the party above 600,000*l.* sterling in debt, and almost crackt their credit in foreign parts. Their brethren of Holland they say are likewise poor, and cannot well retire the cash they have there in bank in any time but what will be too long, because, should that party take all their money out suddenly, the State being now much indebted would have very little left, and because such a sudden and general refunding doth not consist with policy, and would give too visible and apparent an alarm to the King of England. Therefore, it is probable they will only endeavour to raise money by degrees, and in length of time endeavour to foment jealousies and factions as near as they can among the King's friends, and invent from time to time some violent stratagems against the King's person and the rest of the Royal family. They say their party for the future will use as much circumspection and policy as in an army, that they will sometimes give false attacks and alarms, and sometimes true, that his Majesty shall not know where to have them, and to lull his Majesty and the people into a security, and neglecting all rumours of plots, when they shall have been wearied out with so much noise without effect, that they may afterwards surprise them when least dreaded. They report that our King has taken so much pains about this truce only to engage his most Christian Majesty to assist him with forces and money to beat down the laws and make himself absolute. That Portsmouth and Dover are to be given as caution towns, and that the King's guards in both England and Scotland shall be augmented with an addition of a like number of French, to be commanded all by a French Lieutenant-General, under Prince George, with many other things of the like malicious nature. They say all those of their party have consented by stratagem that all the towns of England shall voluntarily throw up their charters and make great profession of loyalty. That the King may be lulled thereby into security, and think his throne established, and be the less able to distinguish his enemies so disguised, that so they may have opportunity notwithstanding all his precautions to foist in men enough of their own stamp everywhere to thwart the King's interests, &c. I translated those papers of my Lord Arran, but he is very critical, and finds fault with words, which to my knowledge, and I can show by printed forms of the like nature, as well as MSS., are the proper terms in use here

n. d. Upon second thoughts I believe it will be best for me to set out to-day or to-morrow betimes than to stay until Monday, that I may do business more at leisure, and be at home at the time you expect. I hear many of the most Whiggish members of the late Parliament are coming over, which very likely may be some of the instruments, &c.—Asks Lord Preston to give the necessary orders to Mr. Ennis (Innes).

Saturday morning—To Monsieur Holles vis à vis l'Hostel de Moret proch la porte St. Michell.—I have this advice that the raising of 40,000 men are only to amuse the neighbouring Princes: commission may be given out; tho' but very few men raised. I am credibly informed that great means are used for creating and sowing of new differences in the kingdom of England, and that there (either) are or will be sent very speedily some proper instruments into England by way of Holland for the carrying on the said design. And that there are people here of the part of the Duke of Monmouth, and others of that party, that doth treat with Mons^r. Revignie and others appointed by the French King. But as for their names I am yet ignorant of.

n. d. . . . I have been since at Versailles, where I have conferred with the person I spoke of. He shewed me diverse letters from some of the party in England to put in French; none of them were subscribed, and they were superscribed to some supposed merchants in Paris, with a private mark, by which the postman [postmaster?] understands they are for Mr. Louvois. They were none of them in cypher, that being in little use among them since the secret of decyphering is grown in their opinion so common; but their sense is wrapt up in mystical expressions, for they call our Kings sometimes Jupiter, and sometimes old Saturn, &c., and the Duke is sometimes Neptune, and sometimes Jupiter, and sometimes the Pole Star, and the Dog Star that makes all the world mad. The cause is called sometimes Hydra, sometimes the Green Dragon, and the royalists comprised under the name of St. George. They call themselves sometimes the Titans, sometimes the true Britans, and sometimes again they call themselves Romanists, and those of the King's party Presbyterians, fanatics, and Republicans, which is to be understood by contraries. In general I find they are now much divided among themselves, for some of them demand roundly what assistance they may trust to from hence, &c. Others again only express themselves in lamentations that the Green Dragon has received her mortal wound by St. George, and the smell of the lilies will hardly be able to revive her, nor the laurels that encompass them protect her from the thunder of angry Jupiter; and these complain too of the Duke of Monmouth as a decoy, and blame him for hearkening to a composure; others again commend him for endeavouring to preserve himself and party for a better occasion, and applaud the French for giving that counsel and causing mediation to be made. But after all I find the French much perplexed at these diverse sentiments of the party, and jealous and suspicious of them all. They are much troubled too to hear it reported that Madam Portsmouth has not that influence as formerly, and much examined me about that business, but got nothing but insignificant answers. They are much concerned for Mr. Sidney, and fear he may blab something to their disadvantage. Those of the party here are much in consternation. The French are really much for peace; but yet they arm powerfully . . . They discourse of a plot lately discovered to betray Calais to the Spaniard, but whilst noise is made about that, let them look well to Ostend and Nieupoort. They will needs have it still that the King of England will arm for them. . . .

n. d. Polish, Turkish, and Dutch politics.—They are very doubtful yet of the success of their intrigues in the north, and among other Princes that way. But they seem confident of keeping England either idle or divided as they see occasion. For that end they still say they will leave no stone unmoved to gain our ministers to their interest, whatever money it cost to gain so much time, and then when they have gained time to advantage enough to have no need of them, to abandon and betray them and their intrigues to the knowledge of the people in the most malicious manner they can, especially my Lord Rochester, in respect of his relation to the Duke they so much hate, which they think will be ground sufficient to raise fresh animosities against the Duke, render the King odious, and raise the Whiggish faction once more into power enough to carry on the divisions long enough in England against the King, after they shall have no need to temporize any longer with him, that they shall have no more occasion to spend any more money either on the King, his ministers, or their factious opposites, but that they will be engaged deep enough to keep all the English force employed in home broils, where they will leave them, till at least such time as he having reduced all the neighbouring countries and outworks of England be at leisure to terminate their differences by force.

n. d. . . .—Our malecontents are in great consternation, and fear they shall now go down so much the wind that they shall not be able even after decease of his Majesty to trouble the succession, nor consequently see those glorious times they expected there, and fear their young Joshua will never conduct them into the promised land. . . .

n. d. About his private affairs and arrangements for the future.—He intends not to be long after the time that Lord Preston shall leave, and will be glad of his countenance and good word when the writer is in England,—will take a degree in physic and practise that, whilst something better may happen.—Upon the last report of a war with England, not only the Protestants, but great number of others in the maritime provinces, declared their minds so freely that it may cost them a scourging, and the loss of many of their privileges; many of their seamen are said to have deserted and left the kingdom . . . It is said the French intend to have a packet boat of their own to pass to and fro between England and France. They report we shall have a Parliament in England after that of Scotland, and that things may not succeed so quietly as our Prince may hope; but it may be their measures both in our kingdom and in Holland against us may fail them. The Duke of Monmouth is said to be in England, and according to the report of his own party to be privately reconciled to the King. I am much mistaken if there be not a spy of that party lately come hither from Holland.

n. d.—Their chief application now is to study out all means possible to raise monies, and to reduce their expences as low as they can . . . Their design is utterly to extirpate the Huguenots, and then to cry up their zeal all over Italy, thereby to make their court with the Pope, and persuade him to consent to some very considerable impositions on the revenues of religious houses, of which they say a survey is privately taking . . . The French courtiers seem a little startled at our King's late reviewing his forces, and seem to fear he will raise more, and get above their practices; and therefore they endeavour to alarm the dissenters as much as they can with the malicious jealousies I spoke of in my last. The enemies of the government still boast of the impossibility of the King's gaining his point in getting a good Parliament to settle the monarchy above their reach, and say that by outward conformity they'll still keep enough in office to cross all designs of that nature; and both the French and they report that our King receives hence more than he could expect from a Parliament; but they say a reckoning day will come when either a foreign or popular power shall call him to account for all . . .

n. d.—There is a report among the Parisians of a war intended against England, which I suppose is spread abroad to see what comments will be made on it. On Wednesday next I do not question but to have ample and certain matter to entertain you with.—Asks Lord Preston to get him some settled employment—he would like to obtain from his own Prince the character of agent there.—He knows that Princes and states of the reformed religion employ generals, officers, agents, spies, and even sometimes ambassadors, or at least envoys that are Huguenots, provided they are assured of their fidelity; why should not our Court make use of its Roman Catholic subjects in places of that communion with the same success?—He was thinking to endeavour to get in with Mr. Colbert Croissy, but knows not whether it may be convenient because of his obligations to the House of Louvois. Could serve the King very usefully in Holland, for there will be the scenes of most of the French practises that will most nearly concern our people.—Proposes some employment in the families either of the King, Duke, or Prince that are private; or else something about Lord Rochester when he goes for Ireland; or else in the navy, custom, post, or wine license office, where a person of his religion may be admitted.—Lastly, if he were concerned in some office levying what is levied upon the Catholics estates in England . . . He has written to his brother and some friends to give some account of what things might be obtained. Would like employment in some other of his Majesty's dominions, tho' it were in the plantations.

n. d. It is said that those of the Lovestein party in Holland are very hot in urging the arming out some vessels to encounter the English concerning Bantam, and that they are much against all overtures of a composure of that matter, as supposing the King of England will never dare to proceed to a war, as not having money enough, and not being willing for many reasons to call a Parliament, or trust their liberality; and that he will rather sit down in quiet, and tamely let his subjects suffer that wrong; but, however, they will endeavour by some presents to gain the Duchess of Portsmouth to their interest, and strongly solicit Mons^r D. Avaux's good offices, who is said to be designed to succeed Monsieur Barillon . . . The merchants in general, both here and in England, both English and Dutch, seem to be of opinion that the peevishness of that party, and their prevalence in the Dutch East India Company, is such that all the authority of the states will never be able to induce them to give any reasonable satisfaction to the English, but only spin out the time in fruitless wrangling and chicaning, which after all shall terminate in a scornful and contemptuous separation . . . I find the Jews both here and at London most malicious enemies to our monarchy, and daily wishing England were a commonwealth like Holland. Our Presbyterians seem more and more to despond, and even to despair of doing any good by a formal rebellion, which they reckon themselves now unable to raise or carry on during this reign, whatever some of them brag to the contrary. The strict and brisk justice used in Scotland much startles them. They still continue their reports of the King's design to give caution towns, and call in foreign forces, with many other malicious reflections upon with them. . . . I was much surprised to see in the Holland Gazette that my Lord Rochester is to succeed your lordship; it causes some discourse and reflections. . . . I hear that the Whigs in some of their cabals say 'tis the Duke now and not the King that reigns, and call him James the Second. . . . It is said that Edicts are preparing to oblige the Huguenots to bring their children to the parish churches to be baptized, and to celebrate their marriages by the ministry of their parish priests after the publishing of the banns in their temples, because they own the validity of both among the Roman Catholics. . . .

n. d. There is at present a particular council held once a week concerning the affairs of Italy. It is composed of some prelates and some others. The prelates are the Archbishop of Paris, who has an apartment at Versailles for that purpose. The Bishop of St. Malo, my particular friend by whom I have this knowledge, together with Father La chaise, and some other persons. The Bishop of St. Malo is esteemed here a great statesman and intriguer, and is very gracious at Court; he has had a very great part in the late transactions about the Regale. I was to wait on him, and he received me very well, and desired my oftener visits, in which I shall be very obsequious. . . . The Whigs begin to cry out against the French, and say this King was agreed with ours to sham them into a plot on purpose to destroy them, and to bring in Popery and absolute power, under a person that shall in effect, tho' not in name, be but the viceroy of the K. of France, at whose service his fleets and armies must ever be. They are much concerned for the calamities of their brethren here, there being 18 of their temples lately demolished. They report that the Bishop of London is not over well at Court, and here are some French Huguenots and English Whigs that whisper that he and Mr. Justel, with their correspondent here, have had deep concerns with the Monmouthians. It is reported too that our King will call a Parliament upon occasion of the truce, and to assure the succession of his Royal Highness, but this I have from Whigs. . . . The Moors they say repair Tangier, being assisted therein some say by our malcontents, who hope the re-establishing of those fortifications in infidels hands may. . . . put the next Parliament upon the old game instead of minding the king or kingdom's interest in the present conjuncture. . . .

Fifty-four letters of advice and news letters sent from Paris and Fontainebleau, and other places.

These are all in French, and range from 1682, July 3, to 1684, Jan'y. . . and contain Court news and gossip; news from other countries and much interesting information. Among them is a letter dated 1682, July 22, Paris. The Abbé Primi, a Florentine, who has been long in France and well known and esteemed at Court, and even by the King, being a man of much esprit, was arrested at Versailles last week by the King's orders and taken to the Bastille by an exempt of the corps du garde. It is for his having written too freely on very delicate matters in a little book which he has composed on the last war with Holland. It seems, however, that he did not think that his work would be ill received at this Court, since he had communicated it to the ministers, who did not then make any comment on it, perhaps because they did not examine it. However this may be, some things in the book are too bold, and cannot be credited by those who are persuaded of the good intentions of his Britannick Majesty to keep peace in his dominions, above all for the maintenance of religion. The Abbé says that the journey of the late Madame to Dover was to negotiate a treaty between his most Christian Majesty and his Britannick Majesty tending to make the Government of England more absolute than it is, and to introduce there the free exercise of the Roman religion. He adds that measures had been taken by the two Kings for the conquest of Holland, after which they were to divide the provinces at their disposition, and leave the rest to the P. of Orange. In short, he speaks as if this war had been undertaken in concert with his Britannick Majesty; whereas it is known over all Europe that he alone has saved Holland. He says also that his most Christian Majesty communicated his design to the Emperor, who approved it. By the King's order all copies of the book are seized, and it is thought that it will not appear.

1682. Another paper with the above is called a Mémoire touchant l'Abbé Primi. He is an Italian of Como, qui est venu à la Cour sans autre titre que de dire la bonne aventure; sous ce prétexte il s'insinua d'abord auprès de plusieurs dames, et particulièrement chez Madame la Comtesse de Soissons. With a view to make himself of consequence, he meditated a history of the King in his own tongue, with a view (as many other Italians had) of succeeding l'Abbé Siri as historiographer of the King for the Italian tongue, and still more for the pension of 100,000 crowns. As he is not master of belles lettres, and not learned in his language, he sought patrons; he got intimate with Mr. Rose, secretary of the Cabinet, and with M. d'Angeau, and the Abbé de Choisy. . . . which latter undertook to translate Primi's history into French. These got him a little gratuity from the King, which he pretended the King gave him for his work; with which he printed the books, and more than a year ago he shewed some portion to an Italian named Hadriani, but not the first two books, which have only appeared a few days since. The work created no sensation, and he managed to get license to print it, rather irregularly. A week ago he presented copies, French and English, to M. de Croissy and to the King; Croissy read the passage relating to England; he took the book to the Council, and the King ordered Primi to the Bastille and all his papers to be seized. That shews that what his book contains is not derived from communications from ministers.—Reasons why Primi thought true what he said of Madame's journey into England.

Advices (in French) from Ratisbon, indorsed sometimes by Rowland Tempest or Lord Preston "Private advice." The 3rd and 5th are by different hands, the others are by a third hand. The first contains also Vienna news of the 19th of June.

1682, June. Lord Preston has added a note at the end that M. de la Trousse had taken a house at Turin, and was carrying on some negotiations with the King there.

July 29. On the back of this Lord Preston has written a draft of a complimentary letter (partly in French and partly in English) to the Queen of France on the occasion of the birth of the Duke of Burgundy.

Advices from Vienna.—All except those in 1688 are by the same hands as those which wrote the Ratisbon news letters. Some have news from Ratisbon.

1682, July 10. On the back of this Lord Preston has written, "The printer hath all the copies seized, notwithstanding his privilege, and hath suffered severely. When l'Abbé Primi brought the book to be printed, the printer found fault with this passage "and some others, fearing they would give offence, and desired him not to bring him into trouble; he told him that he need not fear anything of it; so that "to shew him that he had the approbation of the Court "here pull'd out a precept of 100 pistoles for that "work."

Advices from Frankfort, the Hague, Constantinople, Genoa, and Lintz, &c.

NEWS LETTERS FROM LONDON.

1682, May 18th, Whitehall. On the 15th, upon hearing Sheriff Pilkington's case, the Court of King's Bench saw no cause to grant a new trial, so that judgement is to be entered against him. On the 16th, after 3 hours' arguing, the Court did the same justice to Mr. Graham as to Mr. Cradock, that his trial with the Earl of Shaftesbury should not be by a London or Middlesex jury, but in any other county where his lordship pleased. Our news from Windsor gives us an account of the arrival of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the 14th, and the gracious reception his Majesty gave him. He was attended thither by a great train of the nobility and gentry of kingdom, who were willing to pay their respects to a person of his character and merit. On the 15th the Bantam ambassador had audience. The King's presents were carried under canopies like pare-sols, and after the delivery of them with their letters in 2 purses of brocard, the ambassador and his comrades were pleased to sit down on the ground and make the harangue. After audience they were magnificently entertained in an apartment prepared for them on the Duke's side, and returned to London on the 15th. His Majesty, on the 14th, at night, and on the 15th declared publicly a particular resentment against the Duke of Monmouth. 'Tis said there came some overtures from him that he would make his submission to his Majesty (if hopeless), but not to his Royal Highness, which terms of capitulation his Majesty took in such great indignation that he declared he would take it as a great offence to himself from any that have dependence in him in any kind to have any commerce with the said Duke. On the 15th, the rough diamonds presented by the ambassador of Bantam, were valued by a French jeweller in his Majesty's presence, who gave the estimate of them to be 1,600*l*. On the 16th Sam. Harris and Richd. Jeune-way were tried upon information exhibited against them at Guild Hall, London, by a London Jury, the former for printing a treasonable book, the other for a passage in the pamphlet called the Impartial Protestant Intelligence, and were both brought in Not Guilty. His Majesty hath sent his orders for summoning the Lords of his most Honourable Privy Council to attend and meet him on the 19th at Windsor. There arrived on the 9th at Falmouth a vessel from Rochel, with 34 passengers, Protestants who left their country to preserve their religion, and complain still of persecution, the soldiers having the liberty to disturb them at pleasure, and their children taken away from them forcibly, to be brought up in the Popish religion. Capt. Harvey, with whom Mr. Bethel hath a trial upon words, hath obtained liberty to have it tried by a jury of another county. The Henry, a guard-ship at Chatham, was on the 15th, between 10 and 11, on fire, which burned so violently that before 12 she was consumed to the water; how it happened is not yet said. His Royal Highness is intended to take shipping on the 16th, in order to their return for England, so that we may expect them this week. Att Windsor the main discourse is how passionately his Majesty hath resented the business of the Duke of Monmouth, that he said this is still keeping the story of the black box on foot to make him perjured and to rebel when occasion presents, and therefore declared, as what he would have all to know, that who ever goes near him or his associates shall be no longer welcome at Court.

1682, May 29th, London. Giles Hancock to Lord Preston. Saturday their Royal Highnesses and Lady Ann arrived in safety at Whitehall, where they met their Majesties, who very early came to town for that purpose, and dined together at the Lord Arlingtons; the same evening their Majesties went for Windsor, but their Royal Highnesses reposed themselves at St. James. The next day we had the unhappy news of his Majesty's indisposition, being seized in the chapel with a shaking fit and symptoms of a fever, and was immediately carried to bed, but had not a physician at Windsor; the fit continued some time upon him; about 6 he arose and was pretty cheery; an express was immediately sent to the Lord Mayor, who sent his sword-bearer; at 2 of the clock this morning his Royal Highness, having likewise notice, immediately posted away thither, as did also many of the nobility, together with his physicians. They being come, found his Majesty somewhat amended, having had a pretty good night's rest. But his physicians advised bleeding, and took from him this morning about 7 o'clock 10 ounces of blood; his Majesty some hours walked about, and, through the blessing of God, we hear is in a hopeful way of recovery. One Mrs. Syderfin, a councillor's widow of the Middle Temple, having a very plentiful fortune, on Saturday, going to Windsor in her coach with some other ladies on Hounslow Heath, was met by 7 or 8 Irish persons on horseback, particularly one Captain Clifford and Sarsfield, &c., who in a most barbarous manner dragged her out of the coach, wounding some of the company, and hurried her away, 'tis thought with intent to force her to marry Clifford, and she is not yet heard of, but this day some of their retainers were seized and committed to Newgate. Yesterday the conventicles in this city were the first time disturbed. Several being taken and carried before justices of the peace, and were forced to pay the penalties enjoined by the Act in that behalf made. The Earl of Clarendon has brought an action of scandalum magnatum against Mr. The. Hooper of the Inner Temple for 10,000*l*., charging him with words spoken at Christchurch election the last Parliament, that he was a papist betrayer of the English liberties, and an enemy to the King and kingdom, or words to this effect, and prayed the King's Bench Court to have a trial at King's Bench bar next term, which was granted, but to have a Hampshire jury. Justice Wareys and other the Irish evidences whom the Lord Shaftesbury had arrested upon the Statute of Scandalum, prayed the Court to change the venue to another county, alleging that they could not have a fair trial in London, which the Court granted accordingly. On Thursday next the Lady Ogle is to be married to the Duke of Summerset, if nothing intervenes in that time. Yesterday in several churches of this city thanks was returned to God for the miraculous delivery of his Royal Highness from shipwreck when the Gloucester frigate was cast away on the Leaman Oare. I request your honour to be pleased to order your secretary, according to your kind promise before your departure, to transmit me some occurrences from your parts when material, and likewise to say your commands on me here in whatsoever occasion you shall be pleased to order me, and pray signify what number of prints I shall constantly send you, and the same shall be punctually performed (dated from "The Golden Cock," in Cannon Street).

1682, June 22nd, Whitehall. At a council held at Hampton Court, on the 17th, his Grace the Duke of Ormond made complaint against the Lord Privy Seal for writing a book entitled a Letter from a Person of honour in the Country to the Earl of Castle-Haven, being objections and reflections upon his lordship's memories concerning the wars of Ireland, which matter is appointed to be heard at a council to be held at Whitehall, on the 23rd. Sir Thomas Morgan having, by a letter from Jamaica, given notice of 4 persons being taken for committing piracy upon the Spaniards, of whom one was made use of for evidence, the other 3 condemned, 2 of which are represented as fit objects of his Majesty's mercy, the other a bloody fellow. His Majesty hath sent orders for one of them to be executed for example. Since his Royal Highness hath thought fit to call Sheriff Pilkinton to an account, he hath settled, and is not yet to be spoken with. Her Majesty comes to town this day, his Majesty and their Royal Highnesses to-morrow, and stay till Monday, 26, when they go to Chatham to see a ship launched. On the 20th Thompson, Farewell, and Payne were tried before the Lord Chief Justice at Guildhall, the first as the publisher, the others as the authors of 2 printed letters to Mr. Pearce, in which they endeavoured to make Sir Edmundbury Godfrey his own murderer; the matter was proved against them by their several confessions to the Lords of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council; the evidence which Farewell (who, being prisoner for want of bail, was the only person that appeared in Court) produced made rather against than for him, so that the jury were so well satisfied of the combination that, without stirring from the bar, they found the information against them. Their sentence we may suddenly expect. The coroner of London, whose office it is to serve the sheriffs of London (where any such occasion shall nappen), with a writ, pretends that he enquired and sought after him but cannot find him, and is returned non est inventus, but the Court of King's Bench, unsatisfied with it (as indeed well they may if as is said he lies under the same roof, being clerk of that hall, where he keeps his sheriffalty) ordered a typstaff to bring the coroner before them. The conventicles in town are drawn out to the very last dregs, there being only few of them left this last Sunday, which yet the magistrates took the pains to cleanse, so that now we expect to be little if at all annoyed with them.

1682, June 29th, London.—News letter.—The Morocco ambassador is now packing up his goods to go on board the "Woolwich" frigate, in order for Tangiere, and from thence to take his way for Fez, and a worthy Barbary merchant designs to accompany him thither: one of the ambassador's retinue, being the umkudum, a general of horse, has made such a difference in the family that he is parted from them, swearing by his wives and children that he will never more enter the house of the ambassador, and accordingly lodges at an apothecary's adjacent. Yesterday the two sheriffs of London and Middlesex were expected to have been brought up to the King's Bench bar, by habeas corpus granted them on Tuesday, in order to be bailed, but we understand that they will not be brought up till Friday, the lieutenant of the Tower not giving way thereto, claiming a liberty of three days from the test of the writ to make a return pursuant to the habeas corpus out Tuesday last his Majesty's first-rate ship, that only size of 30 sail, was launched at Chatham, but his Majesty, by reason of the transactions in the city, did not go down thither as was designed, and 'tis said she is named the Great Britain, and is larger and longer than the Royal Sovereign.—More city news.—This day the Earl of Danby was brought a second time to the King's Bench bar, a great many lords being present in Court, and his lordship made to the judges a very rhetorical speech of above an hour's continuance, and gave as much reason as his cause could possibly bear, and much insisted on the case of Fitz-harris, that they had as much power to admit him to bail as to try and condemn Fitz-harris, who was impeached by the House of Commons. The judges severally gave their opinions, three of them being positive in remanding, but Mr. Justice Raymond seemed to incline to bail him, Mr. Justice Dolben was pleased to acquit himself of answering that point of Fitz-harris, he having dissented therefrom, so his lordship was carried back to the Tower.

1682, August 17th, London. News letter. Yesterday his Majesty and Royal Highness returned from Windsor to St. James's to see the Duchess after her delivery, where they dined in the afternoon. His Majesty was pleased to be present at the baptizing of the infant by the Lord Bishop of London, the Duke of Ormond standing as godfather, and the Lady Clarendon, together with the Countess of Arundel, Lord Peterborough's daughter, as godmothers, and were pleased to name her Charlotte and Maria. Towards the evening his Majesty returned for Windsor. Advice from Bristol says that there are above 1,500 dissenters under prosecution in that city, and that by the next sessions, when process can come forward against them, about 500 families must desert their heresies, which many have done already, and meet together to hear preaching in the King's forest adjacent. This day several persons reported, if we may know what to believe, that last night between the hours of 10 and 11, they saw a blazing star, the tail of which pointed towards the north, about a yard long in appearance, but some think may be fancy only. This day is confirmed that the ship "Teressa Carden," 1,000 tons, is cast away in company of the Spanish galleons in the island of Cuba; had aboard her the value of 500,000*l.* in plate, which is irrecoverable, and three of the galleons had nigh participated in the same fate, but by Providence reached the port of Carthegena. This day the Turkey merchants received a letter by way of Marseilles from Constantinople, bearing date the 15th of June, which says that the Lord Shandoyes did behave himself extraordinary in his embassy at that Court, and that the French, notwithstanding all their hectoring the grand Signor, were at length constrained to make the Turks satisfaction for the damage they received by their cannon before Scio, and the Grand Signor, that the world might take notice of their submission, had the point performed in public view, the Grand Signor setting himself in a chair of state in an arbour to see the ceremony himself, a thing he never known to do before, and fifty men brought each four purses of money, &c. . . .

1682, December 11th, London, Purpl Lane, over against the Unicorn. Joshua Bowes to Lord Preston. . . . On Saturday last the sessions ended at the Old Bailey, where fifteen persons were condemned to die, most of them being highwaymen, except one Capt. Leisley, who killed one Mr. Glene in Convent Garden, but he hath obtained a reprieve for some time. Also 10 apprentices of this city were found guilty of a riot committed on the 6th of November last, for which they were fined 20 marks and sentenced to stand on the pillory, which was accordingly performed, but instead of having any abuse offered them (which is usual in such cases), they had wine, money, oranges, &c. thrown them during their stay on the same.—Account of the election of an alderman in the place of Mr. Pilkington.—One Capt. Sands, belonging to the Earl of Oxford's troop, and another person riding in the same troop (being in the country), drank a health to the Duke of Monmouth, and prosperity to the Whigs, whereupon notice being given thereof they are sent for to answer the same before the said Earl. The Lord Herbert is now admitted and made free of the East India Company. Mr. Brett, Usher of the Black Rod, is dangerously ill, and his recovery is very much doubted. His Majesty hath been pleased to give 2,000*l.*, a person of quality 500*l.*, and Madame Gwin 100*l.* toward the relief of the late dreadful fire which happened at Wapping. The Russian ambassador, as soon as he hath received his audience of Congée, departs hence for his own country. The gentleman who killed Mr. Godolphin (Governor of Scylli) is lately dead of the wounds which he received in that duel. One Mr. Dove, a minister, being seized by a messenger at the Spanish ambassador's at mass, he made his escape, but is since taken at Rochester and committed. A servant to a person of quality, having been seized in conveying a paper to the press, imparting a vindication of the association, upon his examination he confessed that one Mr. Furgison was the author, who is since fled for Holland.

1682, Dec. 14th, o. s. News letter to Right Hon. Lord Viscount Grahme. This weeke the Russia ambassador, having received a letter from his Majesty for his master, written in letters of gold, and wrapped up in green silk damask, embarques for his own country. Yesterday sat a committee of ecclesiastical affairs at the plantation office at Whitehall, and have disposed of a living in Suffolk called Cornell Parry. This morning sat a committee of trade, and another for managing the affairs of Tangier. Dr. Lake, chaplaine to his Royal Highness in Ordinary, and tutor to the Lady Ann, is made Bishop of Mann. Yesterday several arms were brought from the Tower, also from Windsor, which are placed in the horse guard-room, that place being to be an armoury. Sir Robert Atkins hath resigned up his place of Recorder of Bristol. His Majesty hath sent into Germany to acquaint the Palatinate of the death of Prince Rupert, and his effigy is ordered to be made in wax, and placed in Westminster Abbey. Sir Edward de Caterett lies dangerously ill, and 'tis thought in case he die Mr. D., one of his Majesty's ushers, will succeed him in his place of Knight of the Black Rod. A Court Verge for Whitehall is appointed to be on the 3rd of January next, at which time those persons which killed Mr. Cox will be tried, the fact being committed within the liberty of the same. Yesterday the poll was adjusted for the election of an alderman, in the room of Mr. Pilkington, and the choice fell upon Mr. North, the present sheriffe. Duke Hamilton is returned for Scotland. We hear that Sir Stephen Fox, Sir John Earnley, and Mr. Griffen, will be made Lords. At the sessions this week at Guildhall appeared the wife of Langley Curtiss, and one Croome, for publishing false and seditious pamphlets; and pleading guilty to their indictments, the former was fined twenty shillings, and to give security for their good behaviour, and not to print the like for the future. Also one Shadd, a printer, appeared for printing the Conventicle Courant, and it appearing he was a Roman Catholic, the oaths of allegiance and supremacy were tendered him, which he refusing he was committed.

1683, Jan. 25, Whitehall. On the 19th complaint was made in council of the ill-keeping of the streets, of which the Lord Keeper will give directions to the justices of the peace for preventing of the like inconveniences. From Rochester they write that on the 15th was carried into the river of Medway an engine worked by the help of horses, will tow up or down the river any ship the King hath, against wind or tide, or both. . . . Our churches are apparently more filled and the conventicles thinned, tho' not yet emptied; some in all places hang after them still, but they do no sooner meet than the magistrates meet with them, and now make thorough work. . . . On the 23rd the Lord Chief Justice Sanders was sworn and took his place in the King's Bench, having first taken the degree of a serjeant-of-law with all due ceremonies. At the sessions at Hick's Hall for the county of Middlesex and Westminster several of the nonconformists have been indicted and found according to law for unlawful conventicleing. Mr. Hunt, who first writ the Right and privileges of bishops to vote in capitale cases in Parliament, and afterward the postscript, and since a treatise in defence of churches, being amiss for some seditious passages in his writings, a warrant was issued out for his apprehension. I do not hear that he is willing to be found and abide by his arguments. . . .

n. y. Feb. 7th.—This morning came on the information preferred by Mr. Attorney-General against Braddon and Speak for conspiring to persuade the King's subjects that the late earl of Essex did not kill himself, but was murdered in the Tower; the proofs for the King were chiefly these, 1st, his mittimus whereby the Earl was sent to the Tower, then his murdering of himself proved by the inquisition taken before the coroner upon view of the body; for the witnesses vinâ voce first Evans and Edwards, father of the boy that raised the story, two persons belonging to the Custom House were sworn, who tho' both disposed to favour Braddon (being both of his gang) yet varied and thwarted one another in the testimony, for Evans swore that the morning the Earl killed himself he and Edwards and Braddon had a discourse concerning the report of a razor thrown out at the Earl's window, and that in the afternoon Edwards told him that he had been at home and there met with the confirmation of it, whereas Edwards swore he heard not the report till after he had been at home; Evans likewise attested that he and Braddon talked upon the same subject at Evans his house, and again at the coffee house. Then the little boy was produced, who confessed that he signed the paper, but that he first refused to sign it because it was not the truth.

This paper was in the nature of an information of Braddon's handwriting, purporting that the boy should give evidence that he saw a bloody razor flung out of the Earl's window, which he was about to take up, but a maid came out of the lodgings and first took it up.

Then Mr. Beech proved that Braddon, after he was discouraged in that idle prosecution and bound over to appear at the King's Bench, did still pursue the business and aimed into Wiltshire, attempting to get more evidence to prove that the Earl was murdered by others and not by himself, and was there taken with several pretended informations about him, of Wm. Edwards and his mother, of Ladman, and others, and a letter to one Burgess, of Froome, and likewise a letter from the defendant Speak to Sir Robt. Atkins, which contained a recommendation of Braddon to Sir Robert as a person of great honesty, zeal, and courage, in undertaking the prosecution of the Earl's murderers, whom, said he, we hope effectually to discover, or to that purpose, and in the letter called him Braddon, alias Johnson; this letter Mr. Blathwait swore he heard Speak own to be his handwriting, which was evidence enough to convict him. Then Dr. Hawkins, his son, was called to prove that he was under the Earl's window, before Wm. Edwards came and kept him company, all that morning, but saw no razor nor anything like it, and Edwards confessed that young Hawkins did then keep him company. Then Mr. Williams and Wallop, of Counsel with the defendants, preambled their defence with saying that if the defendants did not maliciously conspire to scandalise the government (as 'tis laid), but only out of officiousness or indiscreet zeal condemned themselves a little too much in this matter of the Earl of Essex, they could not be found guilty of the information, and pretended to call witnesses to that purpose; first, a fellow that swore he was told of a Friday upon the road that the Earl had cut his throat, but what Friday it was he could not remember; then another who took it upon his oath that 2 days before the Earl's death that was town talk in Andover. This Mr. Wallop would have pass for a probable testimony, and abetted it with mentioning a pretended report of that nature concerning Sir Edm. Godfrey's death; then to prove that Bradon did not concern himself till after the boy had invented the story of the razor, his father and mother were called, who both deposed that Bradon came not to their house till after that; several other witnesses were called to little purpose, only a girl gave a testimony almost the same with that in Braddon's paper (viz.), that she saw a bloody hand throw out a razor, and a soldier took it up, and presently after a woman in white hoods and shift clothes came out and took it from the soldier. This girl had the impudence to stand in, but besides the of it Mr. Glasbrook proved that the girl was used to tell lies, and was looked upon as notorious for it. The King's council, by way of , proved all the circumstances of the Earl's death both before and after, his precedent melancholy, his calling several times for a penknife, and afterwards saying a razor would do as well, the manner how he was found dead, the straightness of the place where, the nature of the wound, with the moral impossibility, as an inference from the whole that he could have received it from any but himself. I forgot to mention Sir H. Capell's testimony, who, being asked if he had employed Mr. Braddon in this prosecution, swore that Braddon came to him twice: the first time was so quickly after his brother's death, wherewith his mind was there so oppressed that he remembers nothing of what was said either by Braddon or himself, but the second time Braddon told him that he was able to make some discoveries concerning the manner of the Earl's death, and he (Sir Henry) bad him if he knew anything of that kind communicate it to a Secretary of State.

Dec. 11. William Penn, the Quaker, was last Sunday seized at a conventicle at Westminster, and discharged on paying 20l.

1684, Feb. 6th. This day Mr. Hampden was brought to his tryall upon an indictment of high misdemeanor for conspiring with the rest of the council of sic to raise a rebellion, &c. before the breaking out of the late plot. My Lord Howard, who was the onely positive evidence for the King, proved that there was a meeting of this council of six at Mr. Hampden's house, where it was agreed, among other things, that Aron Smyth should be sent into Scotland to conciliate and invite the disaffected of that kingdom; that money was given him accordingly, and he went, and the innkeeper where he lodged at Newcastle, as also his guide that lead him further, proved the same; that several Scotchmen came shortly after to London under the [pretence] or notion of going to Carolina, and were many of them taken here into custody. Mr. Hampden made no great defence, onely his council made several objections to the matter of the indictment, and he had many of the same witnesses that Mr. Sidney had to speake for him as to the point of his reputation, and my Lord Howard having denied to severall that he knew anything of a plott. The tryall was very long, and the defendant was brought in guilty; the sentence and judgement of the Court is not yet pronounced against him, which in cases of high misdemeanor is always deferred to the latter end of the terme.

MISCELLANEA AND POETRY.

Among the contents of this volume are the following:—1669, 1671, 1674, Stockholm. Three letters in French, by a lady signing herself Magdalen Sybilla, Princess Magdalen Sybill Dest (?), and Princess Magdalen Deste. The 1st and 3rd are addressed to the Countess of Howard; the 2nd is addressed to Madam Anne Graime at London; and in this she says "The Princess Juliana is afraid that you do not think of her, but to put you in mind of her she sends her compliments . . . The King and Queen salute you, and also your father and mother."

Relation de l'accommodement des Canonades de Chio avec la Porte de Constantinople, le 12 Juin 1682. (29 pp. 4to.) Begins, Après le depart de M. St. Amant pour retourner à son vaisseau auprès de M. du Quesne.

n. d. Copy in Latin of appointment by Charles 2nd of Lord Holles and Henry Coventry to be his ambassadors extraordinary to the United Provinces, for the purpose of concluding a Treaty of peace, with the mediation of the King of Sweden and the concurrence of the ministers of the Kings of France and Denmark.

Copy of inscription (in French) in the cathedral of Rouen, on the tomb of Jacques Turgis, Robert Talbot, and Charles le Brasseur, natives of Rouen, executed the 25 of Oct. 1625, for a pretended assassination of which they were falsely accused and afterwards declared innocent.

1683, Ascension day. Copy of the speech of M. de Colville to the Parliament of Rouen, on the occasion of a criminal obtaining the privilege of St. Romain by abjuration of his religion. (By grant from King Dagobert the chapter had the right to liberate a criminal on Ascension day. M. de Colville says that all that the Parliament had to do was to see that the crime was high treason, parricide, or assassination. He did not find that it was either; to the contention that he was worthy of the privilege because he has changed his religion, he could not agree, because he was (seemingly) a Protestant.

Copy by Lord Preston of a translation into French of a prayer said by a Janissary taken prisoner before Vienna, to be the daily prayer of the Turks.

Narrative of the Duke de Villa Hermosa, about the raising the siege of Charleroy, and why they fought not Luxemburgh's army. (4 pp. folio.)

1683, July 24. Translation of the order of the States of Holland and West Friesland, for seizing any of the conspirators against King Charles and the Duke of York, who should come into their territory.

Copy of that which passed between Captain Morals, a Portuguese, and 1 John Joyce, watchmaker, at Paris. (2 pp. folio. copy.) On 28 Nov., n. s., 1680, they met and talked; Morals declined the suggestion to bring in the D. of York with the Queen into the plot and the ambassador: because, he said, the Duke was going to Hambourg, and the Parliament would secure him. He declined to write to the Portuguese Jew in London, because he was such a damned rogue. It was the great thing to get the Queen away, for the King to marry another woman and have a child, as that would ruin the Duke of York. He said the Portuguese Jew was put on by the greatest Lords in England, whereof he named 5, my Lord Cavendish, Lord Shaftesbury, Lord Halifax, and two others, &c. &c. All this was said in my house, in a room where I lie, and in the presence of two English gentlemen who were hid and appointed by Mr. Savile to be witnesses. Dated 25 Nov. 1680, under y^e hands and seals of Mr. Polteney and Mr. Colbey, and John Joyce, in the presence of the express that Mr. Savile sent into England with it.

1684, Nov. 6, Fontainebleau. Colbert de Croissy to the Abbé Rizzini. (Copy.) The King of France objects to the Prince de Carignan marrying a Princess elsewhere than in France; but as he thinks of proposing to the Princess of Modena, a lady whom the King approves, the King will expect a communication from the Duke of Modena.

G. Rizzini to Colbert de Croissy. Copy answer (in Italian) in Lord Preston's writing. He says that he has heard nothing from Modena nor from the Duke about the intended proposal.

Copy of a letter, not signed and not addressed, on the above subject. It is from an ambassador to the King of France.

n. d. Copy of a letter by [Col.] Edm. Maine to Lord Churchill, giving an account of Sarsfield and his force going to Brewerstown, "a town eleven miles hence," and thence to Wincanton, and nearly surprised the enemy, who, however, managed to get out and line the hedges, when Luttrell and his dragoons, &c. attacked, and he and Sarsfield routed them.

1684. A liasse of papers (stamped) about the case of John Binford, captain of The Cork Merchant, against Matthew Cachelen of Calais, commander of the frigate The Town of Canais.

Particulars relating to the prisoners in the Tower, mentioned in the Order of Council dated the 13th of June 1689.—Orders relating to the prisoner's servants, visitors, and wives, &c., and form of oath to be taken by the servants.

The Duke of Lorraine's answer to the Queen concerning the removal of the Chevalier St. George (1 p. 4to.). The Duke refused to remove him.

Address (10 pp. 4to.) to the Duke of Ormond, exhorting him to popery, ending, "Your grace's most grateful affectionate kinsman and humble servant, D. B." A sentence of 6 lines next preceding, and also the initials D. B. have been cancelled, and a different conclusion to the letter has been added by the same writer.

That the Duke of Lauderdale concurred in the designe of bringing in of poperie may appear by these particulars. (3½ pp.) Ten instances are given, shewing the Duke's leanings to popery.

Considerations to be offered to the Lord Bishop of London to move him to bestow the Rectory of St. Ann's parish on Dr. Moore. 3 pp. folio.

The Bull in Cæna Domini. English brief translation.

Copy draft of a commission to Lord Bishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Rochester, and Lord Chief Justice Herbert, to execute ecclesiastical laws.

1687. Copy of address to the King sent by the Bishop of Oxford, to be subscribed by the clergy of his diocese.—Thanks for the King's declaration that he will protect and maintain, &c.—Two reasons for subscribing, several reasons against subscribing it. 3 pp. folio. This has been folded up in a letter and addressed to Lady Mary Fletcher, at Penrith. (She was the bishop's sister.)

Case as to the legality of King James the Second's mandate to the V.C. of the University of Cambridge to admit Alban Francis, a benedictine, to the degree of Master of Arts, without administering any oaths.—Below are the opinions of F. Pemberton and H. Finch against the mandate.

Considerations for the better regulation of the clergy of England, and for the quiet and care of the inhabitants. (3 pp. folio.) Parliament is asked to appoint a committee to take an account of livings in the gift of the King and bishops; and of tithes; every man to rent his own tithes. Complaint of the small stipends of some parsons. All tithes to be paid in money to the committee or their receivers. Complaints of pluralities. Four bishops would be enough instead of 26. The profits of 22, as they die off, are to be added to the benefit of the lesser clergy.

POETRY.

Mr. Cowley's monument. Burlesque.

Begins. Here lyes reduc't to ashes an l a cinder
Not St. Paul but St. Abraham Pindar.

50 lines: followed by an epitaph in 8 lines on Cowley, the last line commemorating his death on "August the third, one six six seven."

Lord Halifax and Wharton's meeting, 5 pp. 4to.

Begins, Satan.—Who's there?

Hal.— A Whig, and one of quality;
A garter'd Earl: a peer of great degree.

A conversation ensues between Wharton and Halifax, who has just arrived at Hell, in which Nottingham, Townsend, Stanhope, Walpole, William the 3rd, George the 1st, and Garth are sarcastically noticed, and Bishop Burnet reviled. The poem ends by Burnet saying (in answer to Satan's question, "Say, then, what hopes.")

One only hope I see,
'Tis for the Dutch: make them the guarantye
Against the Tories; when the treaty's done
You'll have sufficient force to keep your own."
The coffee women turned courtiers—an excellent new ballad; to the tune of The Commons and Peers.

Begins, For an apple of gold
To a shepherd of old
Three goddesses deigned to come down:
And now drabs as many,
Jenny Fenwick and Nanny
Demand a gold key of the crown.

Jenny says that she has the King's officers at her command. Fenwick offers her clans in the North if the King will counterfeit zeal for the church. Nanny offers to let the King have Rochfort, oysters, and his bottle. News comes that Stanhope has had a rebuke at Vienna.

"Is it so, then, cried Jenny,
Let's leave the sad Ninny
To dispose as he will of this key;
Whose price will be dear
In the space of a year
As a dish of our coffee or Thé."

King Saul.

Ten lines, against K. George the 1st.

Ending, For George in sin as far exceeded Saul
As Bishop Burnet did exceed St. Paul.

The three usurpers.
(Nol, William, and George 1st.)

Pasquin to the Queen's statue at St. Paul's during the procession, Jan. 20, 1714.

It is scurrilous against the Queen and Prince George. It is marked as "Printed."

Begins, Behold he comes to make the people groan.

A poetical laudatory letter (1 p. 4to.) to some nobleman, signed Tho. Otterburne.

Vienna, liberata, 1 p.

Begins, Austriaci caput Imperii, obsidione Viennam
Cinxerat, innumero milite Turca ferox.
Bout-rimés en Languedochien. (14 lines.)

Begins, Que lou mounde travaille a t'elena Lon—Pan.
A collection in 4 folio pages of satirical poetical epitaphs on Colbert (in French).

MISCELLANEA.

Parliamentary, Chamber of London. The Press, Hudson's Bay, New England. Tangier, Algiers.

Among these are.

Copies by Lord Preston of six speeches by him in Parliament, and of a proposal for raising money by confirming honours.

Three papers (temp. Jac. II.) about Jews, who had obtained letters of denization (temp. Car. II.), with a nonobstante clause.

Proposals to increase trade.

Reasons for an additional supply of wool to Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark.

Proposal to the King to make perpetual provision for timber and hemp.

Proposals about an excise in Ireland.

Address by the House of Commons to the King, praying him to recall his ambassador from Nimeguen, and send away the French ambassador.

Considerations to evince the necessity of passing a bill for the majority of creditors to conclude the minority in compositions.

Description, addressed to Lord Preston of an engine to extinguish fire in ships.

SIR

1677. Account of the 17 months' tax for the navy; 1 large page. Signed "Ro. Howard." Complaints about English pirates in the West Indies. Complaints of the high price of oysters in London; a barrel now 2s. and 2s. 6d. was formerly 10d. or 20d. at most.

Proposals for increasing the King's revenue by a re-valuation of ecclesiastical benefices.

Some papers about Parliamentary elections.

Copy patent (35 Car. II.) to Robert Fitzgerald and others, for the exclusive use of their discovery of a way to make salt and brackish water sweet and fit to drink.

Copies of King Charles the Second's declaration about the Duke of Monmouth and of the letter to be signed by the Duke.

1684, 1685. Copies of some council orders, and extracts from the Lords' journals.

Copy of Algernon Sidney's speech on the scaffold.

Copy of Mr. Ashton's paper delivered to the sheriff.

Copy by Lord Preston of King James (1st)'s Charge to the judges before they went their circuits.

The state of Samuel Storey's case. He paid 200*l.* to one Keightley, on condition of the latter procuring a pardon for him; but Keightley failed to do so.

Short memorial of Sir John Friend that there is necessity for calling out the two regiments of the militia of the Tower Hamlets; but the King's order is necessary; so he prays it.

Four papers about the Chamber of London. Printed proposals for the 2nd part of Rushworth's Historical Collections.—And a written form for subscription to it.

The form of a deputation to license a book.

Copy of a direction to Sir R. L'Estrange, surveyor of the press, to put in force the King's warrant of 21 May, 1685, concerning treasonable and seditious and scandalous papers.

Considerations about the press. 2 pp.

n. d. Draft of a letter to Lord . . . saying that one Moore, a surveyor of customs in the Isle of Wight, had been put in prison by Sir Robert Holmes, the governor, in order to prevent him joining the rebellion in the West; and asking that if Moore is removed Richard Graham may have the place.

n. d. Rob. Brent to Lord Preston. I pray be pleased to move the King to change the sheriff lately named for Worcestershire, viz., Richard Dowdeswell, Esq., whose father lately served that office. There are others more fit for the King's service, viz., Sir Henry Littleton, or Allen Cliffe, Esq., or Mr. Bromley.

n. d. If the King please to excuse Mr. Morgan from being sheriff of Monmouthshire, these following are well qualified:—John Williams, of Langibby, Esq.; Henry Probert, Esq., Henry Morgan, Esq., David Evans, Esq.

A. H. 1094. Certificate in Arabic, by the Cadi of Algiers, that Braham ben Abdall and Cassem Benserly, of Tunis, had sold to Lionel Croft, Englishman, for 800 dollars a pink, or vessel, with all its fittings, including 4 guns and six pedreras. At the foot is a translation into English, signed by P. Rycaut, consul, and sealed by him.

Translation of the above into French by Lord Preston.

Copy of some reasons for granting letters patent to a friendly society, which insured houses against damage by fire.—Every one insuring with the friendly society must covenant to contribute any sum not exceeding 30*s.* for 100*l.* secured to every single fire if occasion requires. So many have secured in the society already as will answer 12,000*l.* to every single fire, whereas the other office can answer but 12,000*l.* to all the fires which happen in 5 years; for their fund is but 60,000*l.* to answer for 5,650 houses already insured for 31 years . . . &c. &c. (1 p.) This is followed by parallel cases of a patent being granted notwithstanding the existence of a former patent for a similar object, instancing the Thomas Water Company, notwithstanding the New River Company's patent, and other cases ($\frac{1}{2}$ p.).

A list of the late deputy lieutenants and officers in the militia.

Dep. lieutenants, Sir Henry Every, Bart., and 5 others; officers in the militia for horse (2 regiment), Sir Hen. Every, capt., and 2 others; William Fitzherbert, Esq., capt., and 3 others.—Officers of foot (4 regiments), Sir R. Coke, Bart., capt., John Coke, Esq., capt., Thomas Gladwyn, Esq., capt., John Beresford, Esq., capt., the names of the lieutenants and ensigns are also given.

Manuscript map on paper, about 2 feet square, of Hudson's Bay and the adjacent Coast.

Thirty letters and papers relating to Hudson's Bay, New England, &c., and disputes with the French there. The present state of Algiers. (This account following was presented to the Duke of York by Henry Killigrew, Esq., captain of a man-of-war, out of which copy I transcribed it March the 5, 1677. R. G.)

Seven letters and papers about Tangier and Algiers.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS TO THE KING OF ENGLAND, AND TO THE KING OF FRANCE, AND TO LORD PRESTON WHILE IN FRANCE.

Captain Hugh O'Connor.—His father was captain in the Duke of Gloucester's regiment in Flanders. The Act of Settlement deprived the petitioner of his inheritance; he went into France, was captain in Count Hamilton's regiment and in Col. Durgan's; he raised a company in Ireland in Col. Durgan's regiment, that was disbanded; and he went to Paris. He asks for a letter to the French King, and also one to desire the French ambassador to write favourably to M. de Louvois.

Francis Commonet, Esq., one of the gentlemen of the King's Privy Chamber in ordinary.—By reason of his Protestantism he retired from France, and was made a free denizen of England; but he left certain property in France.—Asks for a letter to the King's minister in France to assist him in getting leave from the King of France to sell his real and personal estate there.

David Gansel, a French subject, a gentleman of King Charles' Privy Chamber in ordinary.—In 1681 he retired from France on account of his religion, and married a daughter of Sir Charles Marescoe, a London merchant. Asks the King to order his envoy extraordinary in France to obtain a Congé for him to go to France and dispose of his estate there and return to England.

Roger Tilley, captain of horse in the French King's service.—He discovered to Lord Preston a plot in Ireland, which is still in hand.—Asks the King to order Lord Preston to get the French King to give him a pass and to discharge him from his (the French King's) service.

Daniel de la Force.—Asks the King to order his minister in France to try to get leave for the petitioner's brother, a merchant in Caius, who desires to settle in England, to come to England with his effects.

John Dutton Colt.—Prays release from a judgment for 100,000*l.* recovered against him by the Duke of York on the statute of scandalum magnatum.

Captain John Dore.—Prays the King to give orders to Mr. Pepys to give the petitioner the command of one of the men-of-war "in this expedition."

The ancient licensed Hackney coachmen of London and Westminster.—Pray for incorporation; signed by 23.

M. Gideon Godet, advocate to the Parliament of Paris.—He has for eight years served the King's ministers in the Court of France.—Prays consideration of his extraordinary expenses in the service. (A letter by Godet to Lord Rochester, asking his assistance in the matter, is annexed.)

Patrick Mein, son of John Mein, late of Edinburgh.—He expended much money for Charles I. and Charles II., and in particular furnished the army under Montrose with arms.—Prays satisfaction out of the moneys due to the King from fines and forfeitures in Scotland. (Annexed are copies of his petitions to the Lord Commissioners and the Estates of Parliament; and favourable certificate thereon in 1662.)

Sir Edward Sutton.—He married the widow of Sir Thomas Lucas who owed a debt of 1,500*l.*, on which he (Sutton) has for 26 years paid interest at 10*l.* per cent. She is deceased; the petitioner has lost her income and cannot pay. Lords Ormond and Inchiquin, when with the army about Dublin and Drogheda, had of his wife's chattels to the value of 3,000*l.* In 1641, Charles I. gave him a warrant for an Irish Viscounty.

Henry Rumbould prays attention to his case.—He claims the credit of having been the means of getting Sir Henry Bennett (afterwards Earl of Arlington) being received in Spain as envoy of Charles II. in 1655. His brother William Rumbould was in Charles the 1st service as principal agent and secretary for all the King's affairs in England, and the petitioner lent and remitted to his brother 20,000*l.*, which sum was taken at sea by Prince Rupert in 1649. He also made suggestions for improving the returns from hearth money.

James Duarte. His letter of 28th March 1684 to Mr. Secretary about the robbery of jewels.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

Council Order, Hampton Court, 24 July 1684. James Duarte, one of the King's jewellers in ordinary, was robbed of certain jewels and money by his servant James Keyndrick who fled into France and was taken and executed. The officers in France detained the jewels, &c. The King recommended the case to Lord Preston, whose addresses had been ineffectual. Ordered that Lord Preston should renew them. (On the other side is a list of the jewels, &c.)—Also a Council Order of 7 Nov. 1684, directing Lord Sunderland to write again to Lord Preston about the matter.—Also a memorandum (in French) for the English ambassador about the affair.

John Mascall his case (1684) and other papers about 3 pieces of damask detained at Toulon, ending with an Order in Council that Mascall shall attend Lord Sunderland to shew his proofs.

Sir John Frederick and Joseph Herne of London, merchants, and Samuel Flexon, and other merchants of Limerick, owners of the ship "The Green Dragon," taken by a French privateer in 1676.—(1680.) They ask for a letter to the English ambassador to interfere in the matter.—Also letter to Lord Preston by Frederick and Herne.

Mr. Browne against Col. Vernon. (1680.) The case of Browne who had lent Col. Vernon 3,300*l.*, to be repaid in 1680. He objects to the Lord Treasurer's order that the Colonel should have 6 months time, and prays leave to proceed at law.

Captain John Grosvenor to the House of Commons. (1680.)—For payment of the troop raised by him in the Marquis of Miermont's late regiment of horse.

George, Earl of Dumbarton, to the House of Commons.—A standing regiment in France had been for some ages established in his family. His brother, the last commander, was killed at the head of the regiment. The petitioner, when he grew up, succeeded to the command; but on his King's command, he brought the regiment to England and did good service against the Dutch, and renounced the service of the French King.—Prays that he may be exempted by name out of the Bill for removal of Papists from London and Westminster.

Walter Innes, Esq., to James, Duke of York. He was a servant of the late Queen's mother, and then a gentleman usher under the King; but when the late oaths prescribed by Parliament were to be taken, he withdrew from service by leave of the King, who recommended him as gentleman usher to the Queen on the first vacancy. He has waited for 8 years.—Prays the Duke to ask the King to give him a pension for life out of the Exchequer.

Richard Grahame.—The castle of Maryburgh, Queen's county, Ireland, is in the King's grant. It was built by Philip and Mary, and all tenures by patent are held of this county by his Majesty's castle of Maryburgh. The last comptroller, Sir George St. George, sold his place to Mr. Fancok of Athlone, clerk to one of Cromwell's secretaries, who suffered the castle to go to ruin. 'Graham's family living in the county were always in the King's service till Cromwell came. His grandfather died in 1626; his troop was given to Sir Adam Loftus, Thomas Graham being lieutenant. The petitioner's uncle, George Graham, died in August 1643, and his troop was given to Sir Henry Titchborne. His uncle, Lieutenant Peter Graham, both were all Grahams who laid down their arms when Cromwell arrived in Ireland, and never any were in command since.—He prays the office. Signed by R. Grahame.

The Earl and Countess of Tweeddale's memorial to the King for payment of arrears of sums of money arising under family settlements. (3 large pp.)

Edward Willett, merchant, in Rouen, Case of.—In 1615 an English frigate on the coast of Barbary took a French vessel of the value of 12,000 livres. The French owners got letters of reprisal on the English, under which the owners of the letters in 1646 executed them on Humphrey Willett, the petitioner's father. There were law proceedings. The representatives of the French owners commenced proceedings against the petitioner.—He prays a letter to the English ambassador at Paris to interfere.

Mr. Lucy's case, in Parliament. He was M.P. for Yarmouth, Isle of Wight, and complained of certain persons seizing his coach and horses as distress for a small rent the day after it was due, and afterwards detaining them on other grounds.

Father Patrick, abbot of Thuley. His executors pray that the King will order Lord Preston in Paris to afford them his protection against certain claimants of the estate of the abbot who died in France. Mr. Daniel Arthur in Paris will explain matters to Ld. Preston.

1688, Dec. 17.—Petition (in Italian) of the Duchess della Corgna, 65 years old, in London, to the Lords of the Council. Seeing the disturbed state of this county she wished to return to Florence, her native place; and the King promised her 300*l.* and the Queen another 100*l.* Asks for money and a passport for herself and four servants.

1682, May 31st, Windsor. A paper about Mrs. Siderfin.

1684. Statement in French of the case of Mr. Primrose, a Scotch gentleman, 17 years old, who, while drinking at a cabaret, got into play at dice with Marales, a Portuguese gambler, who got Primrose to sign a promissory note for 200 louis.

MEMORIALS AND PETITIONS TO THE KING OF FRANCE AND TO LORD PRESTON.

Memorial by Lord Preston to the King of France, made before he had seen the King, about insults to his servants by servants of the Count of Nassau.

John Connel, M.D., an Irishman, for 28 years resident at Toulouse, but naturalised in France. Prays the King's leave to go to England for 6 months.

Mr. Justel. Memorial to the King by Lord Preston. By the King of France's leave Justel went to England as librarian to the King of England. As he had been one of the King of France's secretaries for 20 years, he hopes that King will allow him to sell a portion of his effects in France, notwithstanding the edict which forbade Protestants so to do.

A paper in French of objections to Justel's wish.

Mary Walmesley. Order by the King of France in council regarding her application to settle an allowance on her daughter Elizabeth Walmesley then in the convent of St. Mary, Fauxbourg St. Jacques, Paris.

1682. James Munro, with Rauger, and other English merchants, whose ships were in 1676 taken by Cherbourg privateers. (A liasse of 4 papers).

1682. A memorial by Lord Preston on the subject of the Cherbourg privateers.

Philip Doughty and Frances Napier.—State of the case between them. Doughty had lent money to Napier.—And copy of Lord Preston's memorial on the subject.

Thomas Hudson, an English gentleman. Two papers about the dispute regarding a horse hired by Hudson.

Inventory of the baggage of the Chevalier Bond, his wife, brother, and son, carried by him to England, all old except some clothes. (1 p) 1682 and 1683. Copies of certificates of the appointment of Louis le Vasseur to be physician extraordinary to Charles II.

1682. Robert Lang, English consul at Marseilles, successor to Sir Richard Colston.—Memorial by Lord Preston to obtain recognition by French officials of Lang's appointment.

1682. Extract of a letter by Lang on the subject.

Pierre Lauze, of Lyons, asks leave to journey between France and London.

Messrs. Allain and Strick. Lord Preston's memorial for them regarding a French vessel chartered by them from Limerick to Rochelle.

David Patriarche, Abraham Aubain, Michel du Pré, and Rachel de Cartry, merchants of Jersey.—Memorial for them by Lord Preston. They sold stockings and other woollen things. They complain of silver coin received by them in France for their goods being impounded in France, because coin was not to be exported.

Another memorial by Lord Preston and petition by the said Jersey merchants on the same subject.

Droit d'Aubeine. Several papers. The names of the deceased English being William Cary, Thomas Wordcot, William Cary, William Huntington, Sir John Barlasse (Borlace).

The privileges and liberties of Scottesmen within the realm of France.—Copy of Henry the Second's charter of 1558.

Petition by the scholars of the Scotch College at Paris, that the King would grant them "en aumones" "deux Minots de sel, et l'exemption des droits de gros et d'entrée pour dix muids de vin par an."

1684, Sept. Copy of the Lord Advocate's memorial for the Scots' privileges.

William Ord, a Scotch banker, died at Paris. Lord Preston's memorial for the heir, who feared under pretence of the Droit d'aubeyne, for which the Scots were exempt.

William Broun, a Scotchman. Latin letter by him to Louis XIV. Complaint that being about to return to his country he was arrested by a bourgeois at Dunkirk. There are numerous quotations in Latin and Greek.

1684. Scroll of a memorial for Lord Preston to give to the King regarding the Scots' privileges.

Mr. Carew and Courten Charleton, both English.—On a dispute regarding the sale moneys of ships during the life of Charleton's father, Charleton asks (some Court) that Carew, who he says is "un plaideur et un chicanneur," may give security for the costs of his appeal.

1683, Genoa. Some memorials by Lord Preston and other papers regarding offence given to France by Genoa having fitted out new galleys.

Edward Ingram, Viscount Irving, Sir John Bland, Bart., Edward Nicholas, Thomas Bond, William Digby, and Richard Hill, Kts. Their long draft petition to the King of France regarding some accusation which Michael Morules, the Portuguese, had brought against them, in the matter of the note which he obtained from Primrose.—And copy of a letter to or by Mr. Le Croissy on the subject.

Louis Wescomb and John Wescomb. Memorial by Lord Preston regarding y^e goods of Louis Wescomb (deceased), seized by French privateers, and a paper of official extracts.—John Wescomb was English consul at Bayonne.

Louis Wescomb and Humphrey Willet.—A memorial by Lord Preston regarding their goods seized by privateers.

Another on the same subject.

Some papers about passports, anchors for the French navy, &c., &c.

Languedoc. 107 close pages in French, being an address to "Monseigneur," by the French Protestants of Languedoc in favour of their doctrines and practice.

1682. Latin letter by William Broun, similar to that to Louis XIV. mentioned above.

Edward Knight. Petition to Lord Preston about his son Silas Knight, detained in Morlaix convent, in France.

Le Sieur du Vidal, cavalry captain and major in the regiment of Auger. Memorial to Lord Preston, complaining that having been engaged by the Sieur de la Chesnaye, the governor of the young Duke of Northumberland to attend on and accompany the young Duke on a visit to the armies in Flanders, he was after three months' service dismissed with his pay simply.

French copies of brevets to St Moise Viridet, ministre. 1676, April 1. It seems that Viridet wanted to remain as a minister in England. He had been chaplain to the Duke of Ormond, Viceroy of Ireland, and had the French church in Dublin, and wanted to remain there. He married a French lady.

Gilbert Garret, a British subject, lately in attendance on his master Only Vernon, Esq. (deceased), at Blois. He was unlawfully put in prison and detained 30 hours, and only obtained liberty by paying unreasonable fees. He prays Lord Preston to take into consideration that great injustice.

James Rafter, a galley slave, sentenced in 1676 for 5 years, and now for want of means cannot obtain his liberty. Prays Lord Preston's assistance.

A volume containing many letters and papers relating to Orange and Luxembourg, and King Charles the 2nd's mediation between France and Spain.

Among them are:—

1682, June 10, Madrid. Sir H. Goodricke to Señor Marques de Balbaçes (Spanish copy).—As the Marquis says that the Spanish ambassador has not informed the King of Spain, or any of his ministers, of the King of England's desire to accept the King of France's proposal for him to mediate, Goodricke gives him official notice.

1682, June 25, Madrid (Spanish copy). Don Pablo Spinola Doria to Sir Henry Goodricke. His King having seen the paper which Goodricke wrote to him on the 10th instant on the King of England's offer to mediate between Spain and France, answers Goodricke that he is pleased with the King of England's good intentions for public peace.

1682, June 23, London (French). Copy of the letter by the Ambassador of Holland to the King and his ministers.—They have had an interview with the 3 ministers of state, and the 2 secretaries of state, and the Duke of Ormond, on the subject of the resolution of their high mightinesses of the 23rd of June touching the general peace and the prevention of hostilities on the side of France. The King and the Duke of York are to give them a private audience on the subject to-morrow. After speaking of their desire for peace, they say they have given French translations of the resolutions to Mr. Conway, to be communicated to the King and Council. The King and Duke of York are much pleased with the desires of the Dutch. For the last two days the French ambassador has spoken peacefully. In London there is great alarm at a report seemingly invented that in Spain there is a design to arrest the property of English subjects in the Spanish fleet, and that the States are privy to the plan. The truth is that the anti-court party make use of anything to foment the hope of war. Ronquillo has complaints to make on the destruction of woods in the county of Namur by the French, who have cut down 3,000 chains.

1682, July 1st, Westminster. C. van Beuningen, Envoy Extraordinary of the States General to King Charles 2nd. Has told the Prince of Orange of the King's intention to try and prevent the King of France from continuing his rigorous and irregular proceedings at Tournay by the Prince of Ysinghien against the goods of the Prince of Orange, and the Prince of Orange thanks the King. The Prince of Orange hears that the Parliament of Tournay, doubtless instigated by the King of France, and at the request of Ysenghien, has decreed execution on the barony of Warneston sur l'Is for 69,500 francs for the Prince's use, who threatens to take possession of the barony when he returns from Paris, as appears by the accompanying letter. Asks King Charles's interference.

1682, July 5, Warneston. (Copy.) Anthony Govet to the president and counsel of the Prince of Orange. He informs them of the decree of the Parliament of Tournay.

1682, July 1st, Berlin. (Copy, French.) The Elector of Brandenburg to the city of Amsterdam. Reproaches the report that S. M. D. [Angleterre ?] and he had concluded a Treaty with France to their prejudice.

n. d. 8 pp., French. Extracts from the resolutions of the States General of the United Provinces in favour of the mediation of the King of England. (Indorsed, "In answer to the memorial of the Elector of Brandenburg's Envoyé.")

1682, July 1st, London. Copy (Spanish) of memorial of Don Pedro Ronquillo to King Charles 2nd. Complains of the French excesses in the Low Countries. He says that the Marquis de Grana has intention to retaliate on the goods of French in the King of Spain's states. He thinks it proper to give this notice. He asks the King to give reply to his proposition and give his opinion.

1682, July 21, Windsor. (Copy, French.) King Charles to Ronquillo. Compliments Grana on his deference to his (the King's) opinion. Some months ago the King of France proposed that the King of England should mediate, and the latter communicated it to the King of Spain. Hopes that the governor will do nothing to prevent an accommodation.

1682, July 23. Memoire of M. Potekusa (Envoy Extraordinary of Denmark), to the States General. Hopes they will act for peace, either joining with Denmark to the Elector of Brandenburg and their other allies, or uniting against those who intend to disturb the peace. Advises them to resolve speedily and accept the propositions delivered at Frankfort, although a little hard. If the King of Spain delay to assent to the mediation, the King of England will get tired and take up offensive alliances.

Dt. of Lord Preston's speech in French to the King of France on his attack on the Prince of Orange's states.

1682, Aug. 11, Orange. Procès verbal by the Court touching outrages by the French.

1682, Aug. 12. Another about the King of France's demand to send to France all scholars professing the reformed religion, &c.

1682, Sept. 1. Continuation of procès verbal.

1682, Sept. 9. Another

1682, Sept. 4, n. s. Copy of letter of the Pensionary Fagel to Van Beuningen.

Sept. 4. Copy of the Dutch minister's memorial to the King of England.

Sept. 8, Paris. Memorial of Wassenaer, the Dutch ambassador, about Orange.

Sept. 9. Extracts from the resolutions of the States on the subject.

Sept. 11. Extract from letter of M. de Starenberg, containing the answer of M. de Croissy about the walls of Orange.

Sept. 15. G. de Wassenaer, the Dutch ambassador's, second memorial.

1682, ^{Oct. 1} Sept. 21, London. (Copy, French.) Memorial of the French ambassador.—The King of Spain is adverse, and his ministers on all sides are exciting Europe to war, and the King of France has been put to great expense. Nevertheless he holds to his offer of the 19th of March. But if the offer is not accepted by the last of November the King of France will not be bound.

1683, June 3, Windsor. Don Pedro Ronquillo's memorial to the King. Although the ministers of Austria, Sweden, and the United Provinces have offered Him the general mediation of all differences between them and their allies, and the Crown of France and his, he by his King's express order presents him the general mediation in the most precise and positive form possible, in order that by virtue of it at the same time there may be treated and adjudicated all differences between his Catholic Majesty, the Emperor, and other kings, princes, and states, their allies, and the King of France and his, being sure that this is the sure way to treat, adjust, and conclude a general firm and lasting peace.

1683, Oct. 28. (French, copy.) Letter by the King to the Count d'Avaux, his ambassador in Holland. (3½ pp.)

1683, Nov. 16, London. Don Pedro Ronquillo to (Mr. Secretary), in reply to the answer given to the memorial of the 3rd instant. (6 pp.) He refers to the last conversation, in which he says that in effect Jenkins said on the King's part—1st. That as for the exigency there was for the reply to Ronquillo's memorials, he thought Ronquillo's mode of proceeding extraordinary, knowing that in the state of his affairs he could give such an answer as Ronquillo desired. 2nd. That he had declared many days before that he did not let himself be led into a foreign war, and that was shown by the last conspiracy which he had discovered. 3rd. That he had followed the same course to preserve peace for four years, and with good success, as the King of Spain knew. 4th. That he took it ill that Ronquillo in his last memorial, had spoken of the wishes of his subjects, since no prince did not take it ill that another should state what his subjects desired.—Ronquillo replies at length, says he has been 32 years in his King's service.

LETTERS to Lord Preston (and others) in 1688, from England, Amsterdam, Copenhagen, the Hague, Hamburg, Stockholm, Christiana, Vienna, and Ratisbon.

1688, Nov. 1, Derby. [Sir] Henry Hunloke and George Vernon to [Lord Preston]. According to your commands we proposed the deputation to Sir Symon Degge, wherein he desired to be excused by reason of his age; . . . and concluded that a blank commission was invalid; . . . we did consult with him and Mr. Adderley what we should do in this present conjuncture to secure our king and country, . . . and concluded that all we could do at present (being but two qualified dep.-lieutenants, and Mr. Gladwyn, one of them now at home not well) was to summon both horse and foot to be ready at one hour's warning, which we have issued out warrants for, and sent them to Mr. Gladwyn to sign. And we are all of this opinion, and find it by experience:—1st. That it is disgusting to the country in general to obey any orders or to act under any Roman Catholic, or not qualified lieutenant, or other inferior officer, which is the reason we do not send Mr. Sympson his commission. 2nd. That your lordship's answer that you are sufficiently qualified to all intents and purposes will not give satisfaction to our gentry to act under your lordship, because your lordship may rely upon a dispensation to be such a qualification, and they will not admit any thing to be so, but the taking the oaths and test in due time as the law requires. 3rd. That if you please to write a letter to us, and certify your taking the said oaths and test in what place and at what time, with the date of your commission, and that it be done as the law requires, that then you'll please to send down deputations and commissions for all those gentlemen that lately went out, a particular list of which is inclosed, and enforce this with a letter from the King to command them upon their allegiance to serve (if his Majesty shall so think fit), we hope to prevail with many of them so to do, and will freely offer them either our assistance, or to resign, and leave it wholly to them, which may be best for his Majesty's service . . . for in this time of more than ordinary danger most persons expect to be courted to freely offer their lives and fortunes; . . . we will not want it if courtship will do . . . We will meet here again on Thursday next (or sooner), or the next day after we have any certainty that the land is invaded; and then will without any question raise a force to keep the country quiet. But if there be not that necessity, we think it most for his Majesty's service not to raise the men till we have got the assistance of such other dep.-lieutenants as that we may justify distresses for money, redresses upon complaints, imposing fines for non-appearance or other defaults; all which we cannot now do . . . P.S. Should there be any invasion before we have any further instructions from your lordship we will endeavour to get the deputation accepted.

1688, Nov. 2nd, Dublin.—J. Ellis to Lord Preston.—Congratulates him upon his appointment to be Secretary of State.

1688, Nov. 3rd, York. Sir J. Reresby to Lord Preston.—It having pleased his Majesty to remove my Lord Sunderland from his office of secretary, and to accept your lordship in his place, I hope you will allow me to address to your lordship in such things as it is fit his Majesty should be informed of from these parts, both from the great respect I owe to your lordship, and the particular knowledge you have of our country. My Lord Duke of Newcastle left this place upon Wednesday last for Welbeck. The whole horse of the county (being seven troops regimented and called together for twelve days) were dismissed the 4th day; and the regiment of this city and Anstey drawn together for 14 days was ordered by his grace to be sent home, after continuing four under arms, except I see cause to keep them two days more. A letter sent last night from my Lord Langedale, directed to the Duke, for some of the militia to be sent to Hull by order from above (which I sent by express to the Duke), hath made me exceed the time of having his regiment under arms, so that I continue them till his grace his further order. The enclosed is a libel, which I send with its cover directed according to the endorsement to a sword cutler of this city. The last post brought it to me as soon as he received it. I have informed myself all I can amongst the booksellers and others to find if there be any more dispersed here, but cannot find or hear of any. I am told by a gentleman lately come from Burlington, that a master of a vessel comed from Holland the last week informed him that Sir Jo. Hotham, Mr. Gee, Mr. Will. Harbord would have hired him to bring them into England with the fleet, and that they have contracted with a very small boat for that business, he refusing to serve them. P.S. I am since informed by Mr. Crake, that told me the news of Sir Jo. Hotham, that the Burlington man, named Caxby, came not from Holland so lately as I mentioned, and that the three gentlemen were to bring with them twelve horses.

1688, Nov. 3rd, Dover. Wm. Stokes (mayor) to Lord Preston at Whitehall.— . . . This day between the hours of ten and eleven, about half seas over, I discovered the Dutch fleet, which are very numerous, and judged to be about 300 sail of capital ships of war, and others attending them; off this port part of the fleet lay by and put out their colours, being of several distinctions, till the rear of the fleet came up to them, and about 5 of the clock this afternoon all the said fleet steered away a channel course westward, and are all sailed by this place . . . Since the writing hereof a sloop of ours, called the Observer, was sent out of this harbour to discover the Dutch fleet, but was chased back by a frigate of their fleet, who fired one gun at the sloop and then bore away to the fleet.

1688, Nov. 3rd, Custom House, Deal, twelve at noon.—Nat. Franklin to Lord Preston.—There is now seen just without the Goodwin Sands, near the South Sands head, sailing westwards at least 140 ships supposed to be the Dutch fleet. P.S. The wind here east and by south.

1688, Nov. 4th, Cowes Castle.—Pet. Gallors to Sir Robert Holmes, Governor of the Isle of Wight, at Yarmouth.—There is just now one of the officers of the customs come from the east part of the island, who brings news that there was at break of day some 200 sail seen off the island, which is supposed to be the Dutch fleet . . . The bearer hereof is sent on purpose, by whom we expect your honour's order what we must do; the drums are beating now to have our company in arms, and likewise to order the boats off East and West Cowes to sail for Yarmouth.

(1688, Nov. 4th, about 9 of the clock, Brading. Tho. Knight to Sir Robert Holmes at Carisbrook Castle.—This morning was seen, which are still in sight, a very great fleet, but being very far off I cannot give an exact account, but I think it must be the Dutch fleet.

(1688, Nov. 4th), Sunday in the afternoon, 3 of the clock.—Sir Robert Holmes to Lord Preston.—Just now I have received the enclosed. I had a messenger a little before that brought me the same account, and several since, who tell me that they draw nearer and nearer the island, so that I do absolutely conclude them to be the Dutch fleet; pray acquaint his Majesty with it that he may take such measures as in his wisdom he shall think convenient.

(1688. Nov. 5th), Monday, 7 of the clock in even.—Tho. Knight to Sir R. Holmes, at Carisbrook Castle, or to Capt. Holms or Capt. Serl to be sent as above.—This evening came to anchor in Santelins (St. Helens) Road 3 Dutch ships, a man-of-war, and 2 flyboats, the flyboats having 30 guns a piece. I suppose they came from the fleet, for they came in from the southward; they sent a boat to shore, but he made no stay, for I sent to apprehend them. P.S. A man came in to tell me he spake with the Dutchmen that came on shore, and they told him that they did expect 30 sail more to be here this night or to-morrow if the wind stand fair; they are of the fleet.

(1688) Nov. 5th, Isle of Wight. Sir R. Holmes to Lord Preston.—Yesterday by an express I gave your lordship an account of the sight we had of the Dutch fleet; had they designed for this Island or Portsmouth they might have been in yesterday by two or three of the clock in the afternoon; but we had no further sight of them all that day, by reason of a great fog that rise in the afternoon, that we could not see above two leagues off to sea; when we saw them last they stood to the westward, the great ships with their topsails upon the cap, and many of them with their lower sails brayed up, which I suppose was their men-of-war staying for their loaded ships. The militia was out upon the hills all this day, and we could perceive nothing of the fleet, but 16 sail of ships we saw to the eastward; what they were I can give no account; I do verily believe that this fleet is bound for France by the course they steered when we last saw them; had they intended to land in any part of England they would have stood in nearer for our coast. There is 12 ships come this afternoon to Bembridge Road, which we take to be English men; if this Dutch fleet did in the night haul in for our shore they may be ashore in Lyme Bay this day, which you will quickly hear of at London, if so . . .

1688, Nov. 5th, Custom House, Lyme Regis.—Henry Browne to Lord Preston.— . . . From the hills to the west of the town we have seen a fleet of ships about 4 or 5 leagues hence off Topsam. I told 46 sail great and small, but do believe there are more close under the land . . . Just now are some come from the west 4 miles off, and say they have told upwards of 80 sail, of which one was a flag ship, and are at an anchor near Torbay.

1688, Nov. 5th, Newport, 10 of clock at night.—James Serle to Sir Robert Holmes at Yarmouth.—About 10 o'clock I received the enclosed, and the messenger reports that there are 3 Dutch ships of 40 guns a piece, and 500 men on board each ship, and that 8 or 9 of the men came ashore and told some of the countrymen at St. Hellens that their fleet were gone to land their men in Lyme Bay, and after intended to harbour their ships here, and that their design was to have provisions here on fair terms, otherwise they will have it by foul.

1688, Nov. 5th, York. Sir John Reresby to Lord Preston.—I have just now received orders from the Duke to be communicated to the deputy lieutenants for the seizing my Lord Lomley, if in these parts, which shall be obeyed; but his last appearance, I hear, was at my Lady Doltons, which is in the North Riding; and the high sheriff now here hath sent on the said orders to the deputy lieutenants there, to be forthwith put in execution if he be within that limit. The same care will be taken to seize the horses of Sir Hugh Chomley, or others that shall be found in more than ordinary number, which the Duke caused to be searched for (by such method as he thought fit) before he went hence, and told us that there were none found or heard of more than what gentlemen kept for their private use, I presume he gave an account of it to my Lord Sunderland. We hear from good hands that the Dutch fleet was at the Goree on Tuesday, and ready, as it was guessed by their posture, to set sail . . .

1688, Nov. 5th, York. The same to Dr. —. —. In return to the kindness of your letters and intelligence, I have to tell you that nothing very extraordinary hath happened here since the Duke's departure. The East Riding foot militia, consisting of 600 men, rendezvous at Beverley on Friday, marcheth to Hull on Saturday to reinforce that garrison by virtue of a late order. I keep the regiment of this city and Anstey under arms, something beyond his grace his directions, fearing that by the example of London some insolvency may be offered by the rabble to the chappels or Rom. Catholics here, upon the occasion of this day. I have also ordered the standing company to be in arms all this day in another part of the town. I find no retraction in the gentry or the generality of this city and county from their former professions of duty and service to His Majesty, especially upon the threatening occasion; and my being lieutenant-colonel to the Duke of the city regiment (which I officered by the chief and loyal citizens in two days' time), gives me a good opportunity to understand and find out how things go here; but I hear the Duke intends to give up the regiment to Sir Hen. Slingsby (whose other commands will not allow him to attend it), and these I must also lay down. I spoke to the Duke again concerning your son: he said he was unwilling to put out any man that was in. I told him every Custos rotulorum either did it or the Lord Chancellor would do it without him, and his right would suffer in not being concerned in the change; therefore, if he would not recommend positively, he might do it conditionally, that is in case his lordship saw cause to change, which he will certainly do, and your best way will be to insist upon that. I pray you speak to my Lord Marquis of Powis to remind his Majesty that if either Mr. Butler, my lieutenant, be out, or to be put out, my son may succeed him. Upon the drawing forth of the city regiment to exercise the first time, a whole troop of young citizens of the best quality offered me their service as volunteers to attend me to the field, which I accepted, and they have declared their readiness to serve the King if there should be occasion; but could we find men we are altogether useless for want of ammunition, which I have often represented. Sir Hen. Belasis is here; I meet him sometimes, but he never visited me but once. P.S. We hear nothing from the North, only the Duke writes he hears the Prince designs landing in Northumberland. P.S. . . . I have just received orders from the Duke of Newcastle to call together some dep.-lieutenants for seizing Lord Lomley, if in this Riding.

(1688, Nov. 6th), Isle of Wight, Tuesday, 12 at night. Sir Robert Holmes to Lord Preston.—Notwithstanding all the alarming truths and lyes that I have had relating to the Dutch fleet, there was no sight of them last night at 5 of the clock, neither in Lyme Bay or thereabouts, for I have a master of a hoy now with me that came from Weymouth last night, and betwixt Portland and St. Albans this morning there could not be a ship seen to seawards, so that I am still of my old opinion, that they are gone for France and landed at Sherbrooke (Cherbourg) or thereabouts; the last sight we had of them off our hills from the Island, those that were upon the hills could discern that they stood their course directly in for Sherbrooke. I have sent a hoy this night to Portland, with orders to look into the bottom of Lyme Bay, and if there be any wind I hope to have her returned to-morrow night or Thursday morning; whatever I can learn your lordship shall know to inform his Majesty. The 3 Dutchmen I writ your lordship of, 3 ships that came into St. Ellens Roads and went out again last night in the night, after they had sent a boat with 5 hands on shore, two Englishmen and three Dutchmen, one of the Englishmen having discoursed with a seaman that lived near St. Ellens, the said seaman knowing him to be a Poole man, he asked him from whence they came and whither they were bound, he told them that they came from the fleet, and that the Prince of Orange was gone to Lyme to land his army, and so soon as that was done that the fleet was to come hither to harbour about this Island; and that night or this morning there was 30 sail more of the Prince's fleet to come for this place, and the rest of the fleet was to follow so soon as the men were landed, and that they did not come hither to do the Island any hurt, but were come in an amiable way to buy provisions and what else they wanted for their money as formerly they did, if refused them peaceably they must force it, but with as much respect to the people as they could; the guard of dragoons I had there went down to intercept them; upon their approach they took themselves to their boat and rowed on board, and so soon as it was dark they sailed away, two flyboats 30 guns apiece, and a man-of-war of 40 guns, having 1,800 men on board the 3 ships; so soon as they were missed this morning, the capt. of dragoons that commands to the eastward sent a couple of men upon St. Katherine's hill to see what ships they could discover; one of them brought me word that they could see but 3 ships standing over for Cape de Hague; little wind; this confirms me the more that they are gone for Sherburn; this I send open for the Duke of Berwick to peruse. P.S. Since I writ this I heard that those 3 ships that I writ to your lordships about were seen again at St. Ellens.

SIR
F. GRAHAM,

1688, Nov. 6th, Yarmouth, one of the clock, Tuesday morning.—Sir Robert Holmes to Lord Preston.—Since I writ to your lordship this evening these enclosed came to my hands, about 12 of the clock, which I sent to the Duke of Berwick to peruse, and to convey to your lordship for his Majesty's sight. I shall not be able to oppose these people, being master of this island, except the little forts and castles that may hold out for some time. Part of the militia is grown mutinous already, and refuses to follow their commander's orders, as I am afraid they will do everywhere where his Majesty has occasion to call for them. Yarmouth and Hurst I put my stress upon, and will defend both to the last. I hope his Majesty will give me some speedy relief; for want of one troop of horse to keep this militia in awe the island will be lost without striking one stroke for it; God knows how I shall be dealt with by this militia I have drawn into Yarmouth and Hurst for want of 100 men to keep them in awe. Portsmouth can be in no danger, their army being landed in Lyme Bay; so that if his Majesty pleases to let me have but two companies from thence to help to secure these two considerable places it would be of mighty use to his Majesty hereafter. When the rest of these ships appear I will give your lordship an account . . . (Lord Preston has written at the back of this letter, "His Majesty will give his orders by Mr. Blathwayte.")

1688, Nov. 6th, Priory. Wm. Stephens to Sir Robert Holmes.—I have not been long enough at Priory to give you any large account, only to let you know I have quartered Capt. Series troop on St. Helens side, and Coll. Holmes, his troop, at Binbridge [Bembridge]. I have spoken with the woman at Binbridge, to whose house the men from on board the Dutch ship came; she says that the men told her there were 600 sail, which were gone for Lime, and they did believe were landed, and that they could have been in England sooner but that was the time that was appointed by some that had promised to meet them. They enquired what papists were in the Island and where the King was. They told her they knew they were to have no provisions here, and did thank God they had no need. They told the woman that their army was 60,000; there are besides those 3 ships three more of greater burden E.S.E. of Binbrig white cliffs. I have not seen Major Knight, neither have I any of the militia, only I have ordered Capt. Oglander to quarter his men at Braden . . .

1688, Nov. 6th. Aboard the Leyden, and before Torbay. (Admiral) Ar. Herbert to Mr. Andrew Toker, at Lyme.—To you, as a true Englishman, I address this letter, with the enclosed declaration, by which you will see the Prince of Orange his good intentions. I hope that all true Englishmen and good Protestants will join with him in his so just and generous undertaking, and with all speed repair to him to Torbay, where he is landed with near 20,000 men for the defence of the Protestant religion, and the liberties of England.

1688, Nov. 6th. Aboard the Leyden, and before Torbay.—(Admiral) Ar. Herbert to Coll. Strangways, at Abotsbery.—(At the back "not opened.")—Encloses the declaration.—Says that the Prince of Orange landed yesterday in Torbay with a good force both of horse and foot, and that he knows Coll. Strangways enough by character to have a particular esteem for him, and expects he will join his person and interest in this so just and generous design, in which consists no less than the preservation or total ruin of our religion and liberties.—P.S. Please to direct your letter for me commanding the fleet as Lord Admiral General.

1688, Nov. 6th, Dover. Wm. Stokes (Mayor) to Lord Preston.—I am this day given to understand by Coll. Tooke, Deputy-Governor of Dover Castle, that it is his Majesty's pleasure that a guard of the trained bands of this town be set at Dover Castle to guard 200 prisoners lately taken at sea by his Majesty's ship the Swallow. In obedience to which command the drums are now beating to raise both companys of this town, to receive them at their landing here, and to convey them to the Castle; and I shall be always ready to discharge my duty to his Majesty in this and all other affairs, but I humbly beg to acquaint your honour that the castle stands in the county and out of the liberty of the ports, and that it hath been impracticable for the portsmen to be called out of their own liberties, and I conceive it may be very hazardous to this town in a time of such eminent danger to lessen the strength thereof. And therefore pray that as soon as it may consist with his Majesty's service we may be discharged from that attendance . . . (Lord Preston has written at the back, "They shall be dismissed as soon as possible.")

SIR
F. GRAHAM,
BART.

1688, Nov. 6th, Lord Langdale to (Sir John Reresby). I own my obligation for your care in the dispatch to the Duke of Newcastle, from whom I received an answer on Sunday that he had ordered Coll. Hesketh's regiment to draw together and march hither, but believing that the King may perhaps think it not necessary to make use of the militia at this time, since the storm is fallen on another quarter, I have sent the Lt.-Governor to consult with you about it, being unwilling to give unnecessary trouble to the country till I know his Majesty's pleasure therein. This morning the Lt.-Governor finds himself so indisposed that he dare not undertake the journey, which forces me to send this by another hand, who cannot discourse you in the affair, therefore I beg the favour of you to stop the march of Coll. Hesketh's regiment till I receive further orders from the King, which I will send you as soon as they come. Yesterday I had a letter from Burlington that gives me notice there are two Dutch men-of-war on that coast, which renders it so hazardous to remove the guns, arms, and amunition from Scarborough that some course should be taken to secure them till they can be removed, which if the Duke of Newcastle will be pleased to do by a company of the neighbouring militia I will take all imaginable care for their removal. The enemy is passed by Dover, and I do not question but our fleet will follow them; that the encounter may prove prosperous to the King shall be daily prayer of, &c.

1688, Nov. 7th, Yorke. Sir John Reresby to Lord Preston.—One of the enclosed is a letter from my Lord Langdale to stop the militia, which I have sent him word it was not in my power to do; but have sent a copy of it to my Lord Duke, and presumed to write to Coll. Hesketh and to advise him not to march from Beverley (where the regiment is to meet on Saturday) till his grace give him further orders. The other are two certificates concerning Chambers, the Scarborough master of a small vessel whom your lordship heard was taken thence, and clapt on board a Dutch man-of-war, but since set on shore at Hartlepoole, as your lordship will find by them. J. Brachell was master of the Dutch vessel, Will. Chambers of the Scarborough. There is a letter from the mayor of Stoodone, another from Sir David Foulis where these certificates were given upon oath (viz' the originals) which are gone to the Duke of Newcastle, to whom they were directed and who will certainly give your lordship a more perfect account of particulars. P.S. The high sheriff gives his humble service.

1688, Nov. 7th, Rye. John Spaine, mayor, Robert Hall, and Lewis Gillart to the Principal Secretary of State.—Enclose a paper [not there] about the Mary of South Yarmouth, William Dore, master, laden with hay from Holland, about which he had formerly written. Dore confesses he had 450 guilders per month.

1688, Nov. 7th, Lyme Regis.—Robert Burrbridge, mayor, to Lord Preston.—The enclosed letters and declarations were voluntarily delivered me by Mr. Andrew Tucker and Robert Summers, as you will see by the enclosed examinations on oath; which declarations have been communicated to none of this town, and according to my duty have now sent them you.

1688, Nov. 8th, Dublin. [Coll.] Grace to Lord Preston.—Having lately given your lordship the trouble of a letter I would not give this second trouble, had it not touched the King's concern in this kingdom; neither would I trouble the King in it if my lord deputy's hands had not been tied up, by making his report already to the King of the matter, which stands thus:—The King made me Governor of Athlone, the most considerable inland fortress in this kingdom. The Lord Ranalagh by a surprise, I suppose, prevailed with his late Majesty to grant him and his heirs all the lands and profits that have been the support of that government, being about 500*l.* per annum, and did oblige himself by covenant in the said grant to keep the castle and storehouses always in repair, yet he has not to this day bestowed one penny towards the same, by reason whereof the King's stores and arms are exposed to the weather and the King's castle is so out of repair that I am forced to lie in an alehouse. I have writ to the King lately on this subject, but since my letter to the King I find now occasion for giving your lordship this trouble, which is that I hear from very good hands that the disaffected party do meet in great body well armed in the night time in several places in this kingdom, and particularly near Athlone, where my Lord Cooloon has some well wishers, which makes me apprehend that the Prince of Orange may send Cooloon and some others hither to give a diversion. If that or any other trouble happens in this country, Athlone, for its natural strength and commodious situation to keep magazines and stores to answer all the parts of the kingdom, being in the very centre thereof upon the great navigable river of Shannon, will be the first place any enemy will covet to have. The loss and prejudice of this to the King's concern may prove greater than I can imagine. I think it very unreasonable to expect that the King should be at the expense of repairing that castle and storehouses when my Lord Ranelagh hath the profits of the same, and is bound by covenant (as appears by my Lord Deputy's report) to keep the said castle and storehouses in repair; and I think it as reasonable for the King to cause the rent and profits of that place to be sequestered towards repairing the place, which if his Majesty will do, and I believe my Lord Ranelagh will not oppose it, having received already about 6,000*l.* by that place, I will immediately go on with the work night and day till I put the place in a posture of defense. . . .

1688, Nov. 8th. Extract of a letter from Mr. John Wiely, minister of Lith, near Whitby, in Yorkshire. It was sent to Robert Otterburn, Esq., at Gray's Inn.—On Monday last there appeared very near the shore, betwixt Sandsend and Whitby, a very large Dutch frigate of 70 guns, who took from on board a Scarborough Ketch the master, and sent the vessel home, telling the men they should not take care for their master, for he should fare very well, and more that they designed for the Frith in Scotland. On Tuesday another great ship shewed herself, and our fishermen tells us of 20 sail which they see some leagues from the shore; so 'tis believed they intend to land there.

1688, Nov. 9th, Gislbrough. (Sir) Da[vid] Foulis, Wm. Chaloner, and J. Trotter to my Lord.—The last night we had a strong alarm of the landing of our enemies, upon the firing of Eston beacon about 9 o'clock which kept us up till we sent to know the cause, which at last proves thus upon our strict examination. The High Constable of Langbrough (Will. Silliborne) coming from Yarm about 8 o'clock last night was most confident he saw the beacon of Ormsby then on fire, upon which he sent to the watch for the beacon of Eston to set that on fire, which was done accordingly, and occasioned the firing of the beacons of Mask and Up-leatham; but the High Constable finding his mistake, sent to all the beacons immediately not to fire them, and we are very certain it was so well effected that none was. . . .

1688, Nov. 9th, Hull. Lord Langdale to Lord Preston.—Having received yours of Nov. 6th, I did immediately write to the colonel of the militia regiment, which did by a former order muster this day at Beverley, and acquainted him with the King's commands, whereunto he returned me answer that he would to-morrow dismiss them. Since the enemy is resolved to pursue so wicked and barbarous a design, I hope it will prove to their own confusion, which will be to the satisfaction of all good men. I beseech God bless and preserve his Majesty, and I do not doubt but God Almighty will assist him in the defense of so good a cause. I beg pardon that I did not before this present my wishes of joy and success to your lordship in your new employment.

1688, Nov. 9th, York. Sir John Reresby to Lord Preston.—I received the honour of your lordship's . . . The orders to recall the militia regiment raised for Hull are received by Coll. Hesketh by this time, and they are upon their return, but I fear the eleven companies of the Duke of Newcastle's regiment expected there very speedily (as I find by a letter I this day received from my Lord Langdale) will not answer expectation as to time, it not being as yet in perfect condition to march. By letter received yesterday from the Duke at Welbeck I find the distance the Dutch are landed at from hence makes him judge it unnecessary to come hither for the present, or to call the militia together, further than to keep one regiment of foot and two troops of horse for the security of this city, and to prevent any sudden rising or meeting of such with whom they may have intelligence, which the deputy lieutenants yesterday agreed to, and have recommended to his grace as necessary to be done whilst the danger continues. The inclosed is a libel received from Holland by Jo. Field, of Hull, marchant, from an unknown hand (as he pretends), which when he opened he presently sent away to Sir J. Kaye, a justice of the peace of the West Riding, by the way of Ralph Spencer, his acquaintance in Leeds. But R. Spencer, opening the bundle, carries it to one Potter, a nearer justice of the peace (as the enclosed information will make appear). He put it into the hands of my Lord ffairfax and some other dep. lieutenants, who presently gave it to me (vizt. last night at 7 o'clock) to send up this day to your lordship. I must add further that upon strict enquiry, and some knowledge of this Field, he hath the repute of a very loyal man, and not likely to have received or dispersed this maliciously.

1688. The information of Ralph Spencer, of Leeds, in the co. of York, merchant, taken upon oath the 4th day of Nov. in the 4th year of the reign of our sovereign Lord King James the 2nd.—He received a little bundle from the hands of William Milner, of Leeds, junior, merchant, which was sealed and directed as followeth: (To Mr. Ralph Spencer, per Leonard Bayly), in which sealed bundle he found a printed pamphlet containing 28 pages in a large folio, intituled, "A memorial from the English Protestants for their Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange."—He immediately brought the same to Thomas Potter, Esq., one of his Majesty's justices of the peace.—He believes the said pamphlet came from John Field, of Hull, merchant, by reason that he received a letter from the said Mr. Field sealed up in the said bundle.—Signed by Ralph Spencer; sworn at Leeds before Thos. Potter.

1688, Nov. 9th, Wellbeck (Holograph). The Duke of Newcastle to Lord Preston.—Your lordship's letter of the 6th I received yesterday, and immediately writ to the deputy lieutenants and to Col. Hesketh from marching his regiment to Hull. . . . no doubt before this, my friend, Mr. Roland Tempest, has represented me to your lordship with all the respect a faithful servant to your lordship can have for your person and family. I was a playfellow to your worthy father. My wishes of joy should have been immediately presented to your lordship but that the Earl of Sunderland has pleased to be very civil to me. I assure your lordship I have an entire resolution to serve your lordship to my poor interest. I humbly entreat your lordship to do me the favour to present my humble suit to his Majesty that I may be employed where there is action. . . .

1688, Nov. 9th. Tho. Morgan to Lord Preston.—Asks Lord Preston to get him off from being sheriff of Monmouthshire, which is an employment, unless his Majesty will be graciously pleased to free him from, will be his utter ruin; and he doubts not, if Lord Preston represents his case truly to the King, it will procure his favour.—Has spent much time abroad.—Gives an account of how his estate is encumbered.—A jointure to his mother-in-law, Lady Dorvel, of 1,500*l.* per annum.

Another letter of the same date from Tho. Morgan to the same effect.

1688, Nov. 12th, York. T. Rokeby (late sheriff of Yorkshire) to Lord Preston.—Is glad that Lord Preston's uncle has come into the shrievalty of that county.—Asks Lord Preston to assure the King of his desire to serve the King in all ways.

1688, Nov. 13th, York. Sir John Reresby to Lord Preston.—Several deputy lieutenants of the three Ridings meeting this morning, according to appointment, to call up the horse of the whole county (with order to bring money and ammunition for one month) for the better and more immediate defence of this city and county, in case of any disturbance or insurrection, and for other matters relating to the lieutenancy, it was moved and generally consented to that the gentlemen and principal freeholders might have notice to appear here according to the enclosed summons. The declared intention of which was to take their engagements and concurrence for the defence of this country for his Majesty's service. One of these was sent to the Duke of Newcastle, and others were despatched to the several gentlemen to desire them to be here at the time appointed. And I was desired to send your lordship the enclosed, that the King might know the loyal measures we were upon. But several gentlemen that were promoters of it were surprised this evening by notice they received from the clerk of the peace of the West Riding (and particularly Sir Henry Goodrich and Capt. Tankard, both deputy lieutenants, and who behave themselves with great zeal at this time for the King's service) that they are left out of the commission of the peace dated in September last. They seem not much disturbed at it, but I fear this discountenance upon them (as well as upon above 20 more of the principal gentlemen of the West Riding under the same circumstance) may, if not speedily remedied, discourage or divide that country, that is in so fair away of unanimity in this time of distraction. My lord, it is my duty to lay plainly before the King whatever I fear may obstruct his service, especially now. I presume, by the date of the commission, that this was the result of former measures, and if it be now a mistake the sooner it is rectified

(or some encouragement sent down that it will be so) the better, for if this impede not we hope for a very good success, and an exemplary one from this meeting. —P.S. For the liberty of St. Peters in York there is also a commission of the peace of the same model come down, where the chancellor and all the doctors are left out, &c. It is here discoursed that the postmaster of this place is to be put out. I do not desire to be necessary to his removal, but if it happen, there is none fitter in this city to succeed him than Mr. Dawson, whom your lordship knows. Dr. Johnson tells me that he acquainted you with a late petition I made to the King, that my son might be admitted lieutenant to my own company, which place, as I hear, is vacant by one Butters being put out, that is (by being long bedrid) incapable for that service; if he be not broken I do not desire the succession; if he be (or that it is intended), I hope the King will not deny me that acceptance of my son into his service, and into a company which I bought at the price of 900*l.*; and if your lordship do me the honour to appear in it, I hope it may much contribute to the success . . . The Lord Thom. Howard is custos rotulorum to this commission.

1688. Nov. 13th. Copy of the summons to the Deputy-Lieutenants of Yorkshire to meet at York on the 22nd of Nov., mentioned in Sir John Resesby's letter of the 13th Nov.

1688. Nov. 13th. Fragment of a letter from the Earl of Carlisle to Lord Preston, about a pass for some person; but name and place are gone.

1688. Nov. 13th. Lord Melfort to Lord Preston.—The two persons whose names are enclosed are of the gang of Mr. Purefoy, seized, as the King tells me, by your lordship's order. His Majesty has commanded me to send this by the bearer, who will attend any messenger you send to apprehend these two with the company of Mr. Foxon, one of whom is said to be of some quality. There must go some guard to be near for the better securing the prisoners. This must be immediately gone about. I am commanded by the King to tell your lordship this.

1688. Nov. 15th. Resolution.—Lord Dartmouth to Lord Preston.—This is, my dear lord, to congratulate, rather indeed the King than yourself, in being in his service, and I heartily wish it had been sooner for the sake of both. With all the letters from the Admiralty that are sent me, none ever came to me yet from anybody till my wife sent me the good news. I am sure your lordship is a sharer with me in my misfortune, for such I shall ever esteem it, that I was not able to meet the Prince of Orange, tho' I am sure none of my friends need be ashamed of being so, for I did everything to the utmost of my power, and I hope God will yet enable me to serve my master better. Nothing shall be wanting on my part, tho' my task hath been very hard hitherto; but 'tis an ill fate to do all I can and then be ill thought on to; but I know the King's justice, and he is, I am sure, the best able to judge for me. So that I have the comfort of his favour, I care not what a malicious or envious court think or talk. . . .

(1688.) A petition of John Pepper, gent., to Lord Preston. States that he is in the custody of a messenger by his lordship's order, and is desirous to clear himself of any charge against him, and, being unfit to undergo the expenses of a chargeable confinement, prays that he may be brought to a hearing before the King and Council.

1688. Nov. 16th. T. Johnson to Mr. Warr. The enclosed petition is concerning the business I spoke to my lord this morning, and I desire that you will be pleased to deliver it to my lord with speed. (Lord Preston writes at the back "Pepper to be here to-morrow morning at 9 of the clock.")

1688. Nov. 16. Whitehall. W. Blathwayt to Lord Preston. Encloses an abstract (but does not state on what subject.)

1688. Nov. 17th. T. Jackson to his son, Mr. Charles Jackson, at the General Post Office in Lombard Street.—Upon Thursday last my Lord Delamere summoned all, or very many of his tenants, to meet him at Boden; and there met him a numerous company both of his tenants and others, to whom he made an eloquent speech and declared for the Prince of Orange; and they generally applauded his design, and have promised cheerfully to accompany him; and this day, it is said, they are to meet again and to begin their march. He said the Prince had foot enow, but wanted horse, and so each of them brings a horse, and he promiseth them to find them arms. It is said divers gentlemen send him men and horse; but in my next you shall have more certain notice. P.S.—It is said my Lord Delamere will raise a thousand; others say, he and his associates will be 4,000, and will march this day. There was one John Savage, a papist, who went to the King's army in the beginning of this week. I think on Tuesday last, and this last night his house was plundered. He lived near to Agden.

(1688), Nov. 21st or 24th,* Exon. — to Mr. John Condy, at his chamber in Lincoln's Inn.—The troubles here in Exon forced me for some days to shut school and house and to retire into the country, and this is the reason that I have not answered your last sooner. When the Prince of Orange came hither the county was in no posture of defence, no beacons up, the train bands by long disuse so out of order as not easy to be put in order. For some days none of our gentry appeared; but now most of the gentry of the county have made visits to the Prince, and, as 'tis said, have resolved to defend the established laws and religion. Several noblemen and gentry are also come from other counties, as also many of the King's soldiers daily repair hither, which gives the Prince great content and confidence, as I am told. As far as I can guess the army brought from Holland consists in 16 or 18 thousand, which behave themselves with great civility, which gains much upon the people. At the first coming the Prince began to raise new forces, but we are now told, and I believe it to be true, he hath put a stop to the raising any new forces. Most of the soldiers are moved eastward. The Prince went out this morning; but, 'tis said, will return within few days. Here is a petition to the King for a free Parliament promoting in this county, and, 'tis said, the gentry will also associate for their common defence. The Prince, we are told, has here from Cornwall 1,000 of tinniers, and just now comes a report that several of the county are marching into Plymouth. There have been various reports concerning the Earls of Bath and Huntingdon, the officers in Plymouth Fort, &c.; but I find little certainty therein, and therefore write nothing. The government of this city and of the port is committed by the Prince to some commissioners, of which, 'tis said, Mr. Seymour is chief. The clergy continue the prayers for the King; but have received severe command not to mention the Prince of Wales. As far as I can guess the gentry of the western counties resolve to assist the Prince. Several pamphlets are scattered here to justify this expedition of the Prince, but I have not seen any, and can give little account of them, save that the generality of people seem to favour the cause. . . .

1688. Nov. 21st. — to Mr. Richard Musgrave, at the Chancery Office in Chancery Lane.—Saturday last the Prince went 8 miles to view the Lord Cornbury's and the other troops which came to him, and ordered them their pay, which is in arrear, and a month's advance. This morning his Highness marched towards Salisbury; the baggage and artillery marched yesterday. Our town hath been full of gentlemen from many counties; Dorset and Somerset came in very briskly. Most of ours have offered their service to his Highness. They are provided with all things that can be useful in such an expedition in abundance, especially with the sinews of war. Coll. Lutterell hath a regiment which is to be here with some others; Mr. Sp. Seamor another, and is one of the Council. Since you desire a list, take it in part as underneath: the Prince being gone there's little more at this time.—E. of Abbingdon, E. of Montross, Capt. Burrington, Major Northcote, Mr. Edm. Cary, Mr. Ifulford, Mr. Lee, Sir Wm. Drake, fr. Drake, Capt. Cholwick, Dean of Exeter, Mr. Beavis, Coll. Port, Mr. Elwill, Capt. Martyn, Capt. D. Rolle, Mr. Northleigh, Sir Wm. Portman, Coll. Lutter[ell] and his brother, Major Palmer, Mr. Speak: Seamor, Mr. Th. Seamor, Capt. Rodd, Mr. Hatton Compton, Capt. Brewer, Mr. Row, Mr. Wharton, Mr. Russell, Coll. Bampfild, Coll. Tho. Wyndham and his son, Capt. Est, Sir J. Fowell, Coll. Rolle, Mr. Champenown, Coll. Cooke, Sir Tho. Lear, Mr. Stawell, Mr. Mallett, Capt. Tydecomb, Capt. Braddon, Sir Rob. Pye's son, Sir Rob. Peyton, Mr. Geo. Courtey, Sir fr. Northcote, Mr. Roope, Coll. Godfry, Capt. Osbourn, Capt. Hooper, Capt. Colman, Sir P. Prideaux, Sir B. Wray, Sir H. Carew, cum multis aliis. (Endorsed by Tempest. A letter from Exon containing a list of several in the P. of Orange's army.)

1688. Nov. 21st, Exeter.—J. J. to [his mother] Mrs. James, Brownlow Street, nigh Gray's Inn in Holborn. —In my last from Taunton I writ for some things to be sent to Exeter, but I desire you would not send them, by reason we are on our march for Salisbury. This

* Tempest has endorsed the letter as being of Nov. 21 but the figures seem 24 at the head of the letter.

SIR
GRAHAM,

day there was commissions for three regiments given out before I came, and in one of them Watt. Vincent is a Capt. The Prince does not design to raise any more as yet, but I do not question to get a commission in little time. In the mean time I must wait with patience and serve as a volunteer.

1688, Nov. 21st, Salisbury.—F. Grahme to [his brother] Lord Preston.—I received yours with the enclosed for my brother, which I will give him when he comes, which will not be till to-morrow. I received 4 commissions from Mr. Warr, which I desired Lord Middleton to get signed. He told me he would send them to you himself. The King was to have gone this day to Warminster, but was taken 3 or 4 times yesterday with bleeding at the nose, which hath prevented his journey. He was last night blooded, and went very early to bed; but is this morning, thank God, very well. There is just now news come that Sarsfield hath had a brush with some of the enemy 5 miles beyond Warminster. He having intelligence that there was some of them thereabouts, went out with a party and met with them, who were about 400, of which 30 were killed, 6 taken prisoners. They were most of them Scotch, and commanded by one Cambel. We lost 3 men, and young Webb, that belonged to the Prince, mortally wounded. P.S.—Mr. Innis is your servant.

1688, Nov. 17th, Letter from Exon. The Prince hath appointed commissioners for the managing the revenue, which are my Lord Wiltshire, Mr. Herbert, and Mr. Roe. Yesterday they collected the monthly duty of excise for this city, and say they will have the whole revenue. They have been with me about ours, and said they would have all the money that was received here; but I, being a Deputy, and Mr. Parsons wanting, Mrs. Parsons hath persuaded Mr. Roe (who is her kinsman) to suspend the matter till Mr. Parsons comes home, she having sent for him. The Prince is gone this morning to Ottery with a great number of English and foreign noblemen and gentlemen to view some of my Lord Cornbury's dragoons, and some horse of my Lord of Oxford's, who are come to his assistance and returns at night. Several gentlemen of the county come in every day to him; but our magistrates are suspended during the Prince's stay here, they not complying with him. The army is so great that I am told this morning Sir William Waller's regiment, that was almost full of new raised men, is disbanded. Some time next week the Prince marches from hence, but will leave two or three regiments here.

1688, Nov. 18th, Salisbury. Extract of my Lord Feversham's letter to the King.

1688, Nov. 19th, Post Office, Exon. Alexander Sampson (endorsed as addressed) to Mr. Frowde. This post, Plymouth, Dartmouth, Pottness, and Barnstaple bags were opened by the Prince's officers. Mr. Symour, sometimes Speaker of the House of Commons, Sir Wm. Portman, with several gentlemen of Wilts, Dorset, and Somerset came hither to the Prince Saturday night. P.S.—Mr. Parsons is not come home yet.

1688, Nov. 21st and 22nd. Extracts of letters taken in the mail from Exeter to London, all dated 21st Nov. 1688, intercepted Salisbury the 22nd Nov. 1688:—

No. 1. The Prince marched out this morning with a mighty full and splendid court. Prince hath a large train of artillery, at least 60 pieces. The Dutch and English were yesterday in sight of each other in Tor Bay, but stormy winds will prevent their fighting. The Dutch are 60 sail of men-of-war, the English but 30.

No. 2. The Prince and many hundreds sign a paper for a free Parliament.

No. 3. With much difficulty we are got to Exeter, we are about 20,000 strong. The Prince will not raise many new regiments by reason he expects the King's army for the most part will come over to him. This day we marched for Salisbury. Inclosed I have sent you the declaration, which I hope will come safe. In another paper I have sent you the speech to the army, with a form of prayer, and another paper I could send, a memorial from the English Protestants to their Highnesses, but I fear the bulk will make it miscarry. This is directed to one Campleshon at Lord Ferrer's.

No. 4. The Prince marched out of Exon this morning. The greatest part of his forces are about Houniton and upon the march eastward. The prince hath, as near as I can learn, 25,000 fighting men, 120 pieces of cannon, and arms more for 34,000 men. All the gentlemen of note of this county are come to assist the Prince and a great many of the adjacent counties. Speaker Seymour is left Governor of this place, part of the army is as far as Dorchester. As I am informed we have now a report that Plymouth is taken.

No. 5. For some days none of our gentry appeared, but now most of the gentry of the country have made visits to the Prince, and, as 'tis said, have resolved to defend the established laws and religion. Several noblemen and gentlemen are also come from other counties, and also many of the King's soldiers daily repair hither. The soldiers are marched eastward. Here is a petition to the King for a free Parliament promoting in this county, and, 'tis said, the gentry will also associate for their common defence.

1688, Nov. 22nd, London. H. W. Ludolf to (Lord Preston).—Thanks his Majesty for his liberty, but he will have little cause to rejoice at it if a pass is not granted to him, and his horse and 250 guineas restored to him. Hopes the King is too generous to be displeased at him for being true to his master, and will not discourage honesty so much as to let him suffer for endeavouring to find out his Highness, upon whom he has his only dependence.—Lord Huntsdone refuses to restore the horses, under the frivolous pretence that they are the Prince's, whereas he bought the black one, and the gray was given him by the Prince for this expedition. As to the money, he must submit to his Majesty's will and pleasure whether it is not reasonable that he should have an attestation that so much money was taken from him, and whether the said money ought not to be secured, till it is known where the Prince is, what he is doing, and whether he ought to be used as the King's enemy. Indisposition by a bruise on his head prevents him from waiting on his lordship. . . .

1688, Nov. 22nd, York. Sir Ric. Graham to Lord Preston.—The 13th instant 10 deputy-lieutenants for the West, North, and East Ridings of this county issued out warrants for the meeting of the horse militia here this day, with a month's pay, and also a request to all the lords and gentry to meet them here to advise about matters of moment. Three days since I received my patent for High Sheriff (for which I humbly thank your lordship), and the day after I came to town to settle the affairs belonging to my place, where I met with the Duke of Newcastle, who let me understand he believed this meeting was to request his sacred Majesty to call a Parliament, to which we both in the presence of most of the deputy-lieutenants and other gentlemen of the county declared against, and refused to join with them in anything of that nature; and my lord, to show his dislike, went out of town last night. This day about one in the afternoon, whilst the deputy-lieutenants and gentlemen were in the city hall about framing and subscribing an address to the King to the same effect the Bishop's was, my Lord Danby, his son, my Lord Dunblane and other lords and gentlemen, mustered up a number of horse and seized upon the King's soldiers, the guards of the town, and are now at the governor's lodgings to seize him, and the keys of the city. They have shut up the gates, and I expect every moment to be taken into custody. This being my duty I could not omit any time of signifying it to your lordship, with my humble duty and service to his gracious Majesty, in whose service I will lose the last drop of my blood before I do the least act that may be disloyal or prejudicial to his Majesty's interest.

1688, Nov. 22nd, Salisbury.—The Earl of Middleton to Lord Preston (holograph).—I am to acknowledge the favour of your Lordships of the 20th. As to the Bishop of Bristol's desire, his Majesty told me he would consider of it; but as to Sir Ed. Hales's project of mounting mortarpieces, he will by no means allow of it; nay, tho' there were disorders in [the] city, he would not have them made use of, since they could not destroy the rioters but the city itself, in which principally consists the wealth and strength of the nation, and consequently his own. Besides it might so far exasperate the people all over England as to cause a general defection. I send your lordship the pardon with the blanks filled up, which his Majesty would have printed in the Gazettes, both English and French. His Majesty would have the Lord's petition reprinted, with his answer to it, which I send you, as I took it this morning from his own mouth. It must have no license nor allowance to it, of which your lordship will be pleased to give Hills a caution when you order him to print it. We have no certain intelligence of the enemies being removed with their main body. His Majesty rested very well last night, and is so this morning, tho' he bled a little at nose both last night and this morning. . . .

1688, Nov. 23rd, Oxon. Bras. Nose. (Dr.) Jo. Meare to Lord Preston.—It was my fortune to be lately in a pretty full company of persons of note, where your lordship was mentioned as I thought to your disadvantage. The discourse was concerning the sending of the bishop to the Tower: and it was positively averred by a person of good note that your lordship gave the King that advice either in his bed-chamber or closet, I have forgot which. I pray I may not dissent from him in that particular, having had some knowledge of your lordship's sincere affection to the Church of England, and therefore I conceived your lordship could not be author or abettor of that unhappy Council. If your lordship think this accident worth your notice, I will endeavour to do your lordship all the right I am able.

1688, Nov. 24th. Rob. Brent to Lord Preston.—I hope Mr. Tempest gave your lordship an account of the letter I had from Sir Henry Euery's son out of Darbyshire. I have here enclosed an abstract of two letters I just now received, and shall give your lordship the best account I can of what occurs from time to time.

1688, Nov. 24th, Salisbury. The Earl of Middleton to Lord Preston (holograph). I have received your lordship's of the 22nd; villainy upon villainy, the last still greater than the former. This morning Roger Huett brought news from Warminster, that Lord Churchill's grenadiers went last night over to the enemy, that Maine was gone in pursuit of them, but is suspected to have gone after them. The Duke of Grafton and Lord Churchill are missing, and not doubted but they are gone after them into the enemy. These two last went from hence. We have had no advice from Warminster but what R. Huett brought, which would make one imagine that the whole brigade is gone, commanded by Kirke and Trelawny. It was lucky that the King's bleeding at nose hindered him from going thither, where they might have seized his sacred person, which God long preserve. The King marches this day to Wallop with all his troops, and so by Andover to London.

1688, Nov. 24th, Saturday, Andover. The Earl of Middleton to Lord Preston.—This evening his Majesty arrived here very well, and commands me to send to your lordship to desire you to speak to my Lord Craven and Lord Godolphin to send the Queen's coaches with parties of horse to be ready for his Majesty at Eggham on Monday morning . . . P.S. (Holograph). I have nothing to add to what I writ this morning. If you could imagine what a hurry I was in you would pardon me for not writing in my own hand.

1688, Nov. 25th, Harteley Row at 7 o'clock at night.—The same to the same.—(Holograph.) Last night from Andover the Prince of Denmark went away to the Prince of Orange; he was not in bed at 7th moment; he was accompanied by the Duke of Ormond, Earl of Drumlanrigg, and Mr. Hen. Boyle, and not above one or two of his own servants. At Bathurst, a courier brought word that Kirke, Trelawney, and most of the officers of their regiments were gone away at the same time; without doubt they joined the Prince. Capt. Fox is the only remaining officer in Trelawney's, but the common men of both have stood firm to their duty. These are sad accounts. His Majesty has commanded me to signify to you that it is his pleasure that the Lady Churchill should be immediately confined in the E. of Tyrreconnell's lodgings in St. James's House, and none admitted to her except her servants; and that likewise Mrs. Berkeley should be confined to the Knight Marshall's her father's house, with the like strictness. His Majesty will be to-morrow, in the afternoon, in town.

1688, Nov. 25th, Andover, half-an-hour past 4 in the morning. The same to the same. Some time after 10 o'clock last night a great number of men from Warminster, and from other places, being on account that things are not so bad there as at first they appeared; that Kirke, Trelawney, and Maine were at their quarters, and only 20 dragoons and 10 grenadiers were gone over, and about 100 men of the horse, and 100 of the foot. The officers, Coll. Berkeley, four captains, one lieutenant, and 100 men of the horse, and 100 of the foot. One gentleman of the guards is gone. The reason this news came not sooner was, that Mr. Leueson, whom they had sent to inform the King of this matter, has not since been heard of, so that 'tis thought he is either killed or taken prisoner. P.S. There is no account of the Duke of Grafton and Lord Churchill, but 'tis not doubted but they are with the enemy. Coll. Oglethorpe desires he may not be named in the Gazette upon this occasion.

1688, Nov. 25th, Andover. 7 in the morning.—The same to the same.—I am to signify to you his Majesty's pleasure that you forthwith give order for seizing and securing the goods and furniture of my Lord Churchill, both at the cockpit and his house at St. Alban's, and likewise that the same be done by the goods of Cole and Rogers, the two lieutenants of grenadiers; they being supposed to have the pay of the troop in their hands. His Majesty would also have the clerk of my Lord Churchill's troop taken into custody and his goods secured for the same reason. This your lordship is to communicate to my Lord Godolphin that you may together concert the best measures for having these, his Majesty's commands, executed accordingly. I forgot to tell you in my last that my Lord Litchfield has the regiment of foot guards, and Coll. Maxwell Berkeley's regiment of dragoons; the other commands are not yet disposed of. There being some mistakes in the account I gave you this morning, I send enclosed a copy of what Coll. Sarsfield wrote to the King.

[Col. Sarsfield's letter to the King.] Sir,—Just now came to our quarters, Mr. Forester, who had instructions from Mr. Blathwayt, by your Majesty's command, to bring you account of the deserters, whose names are as follows:—Of the horse grenadiers, Lieut. Cole, Lieut. Rogers, the first carried with him some grenadiers under pretence to convey 500*l.* to my Lord Churchill, the other 13 at 8 o'clock last night. At the same time there went off from Coll. Canan's regiment the four captains and the captain-lieutenant and a quartermaster who was upon guard, and made his guard believe he was commanded upon a party; there went off in all from that regiment 42 private soldiers, of which there overtook us five of the men that refused to serve, tho' they went as far as Sherborne, and all the rest were of the same mind, and would come back, but that their officers threatened to send a party after them, and if taken should be all hanged. Cave, our brigadier, whom I told your Majesty would desert, went off at the same time. Coll. Maine and I were together when we heard of this matter, and endeavoured to overtake them with 20 horse which were all we had upon the main guard, but 'twas in vain, for they were gone too far.

1688, Nov. 26th, Otterden, near Feversham. John St. John to Lord Preston.—I crave leave to advertise your lordship that I am retired with my family into my mother's in Kent.—He seems to have lately come from India, and complains of exorbitant imposts on his apparel; he says, "Sir Joshua Child is the man who persecuteth me thus, and determined long since my ruin, because I had the courage to speak against the other Child in India . . . I am entred upon a very useful and pleasant subject, viz., 'Tractatus de 'concitandis affectibus,' which I styled thus: 'Eloquentia, triumphans,' and knowing your lordship to be a pattern of learning, as well as patron to the learned, 'tis not unlikely but time and leisure may invite your benevolous aspect on a subject of that nature."

1688, Nov. 26th, Portsmouth.—The Marchioness of Powis to Lord Preston. Since you were pleased to enclose the Queen's letter you will not be offended that I send the answer in the same manner, and at the same time assure your lordship that the Prince doth not only continue in health, but is considerably improved by his journey, as I hope all his friends will find him at his return, which I wish may be as soon as may stand with his safety.

1688, Nov. 26th, Northampton, 4 o'clock afternoon.—John Selby (Mayor), Tho. Atterbury and Edward Knighton (justices), to his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State.—These are to acquaint his Majesty from the Mayor and justices of the town of Northampton that this present afternoon, about 2 or 3 of the clock, there came into our town two troops of horse, most of them armed with back and breasts, swords and pistols; one troop commanded by one Mr. Adkins, and the other by one Mr. Chapman, both Buckinghamshire men; it is reported that they are the Buckinghamshire horse. They declare nothing of their design, and demanded no quarters, but quartered themselves. And they report divers others are to meet them here. Of this we judge ourselves in duty bound to acquaint your Honour, and desire some orders from his Majesty which ways in these affairs we shall proceed. And assure his Majesty we shall in all duty appear and continue ourselves his Majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects and servants. . . . P.S.—Since this letter divers other horse and carriages are come into the town, and 'tis reported the Earls of Northampton, Manchester, and Scuresdale, and my Lord Grey are with them; the number we cannot tell, they came in the night, many country gentlemen with them. Our zeal and duty to his Majesty required this letter to be expedited by a particular messenger. 9 clock at night. (Seal of the arms of the town with legend, "Northampton, anno 45.")

1688, Nov. 27th, Monday, Reading.—The Earl of Feversham to Lord Preston (holograph in French). I have just received the letter which you wrote to me by sorry Mr. Proctor was so ignorant or neglectful of his duty as to have certified nothing to your honour of the receipt of that letter by yesterday's post. Hence I counted myself obliged to give you this trouble, and to assure you that his Majesty's commands shall be signified to our senate with all possible speed.

1688, Dec. 8th. . . . to my Lord Preston.—On Saturday last I left Exeter, where by the Prince's command are printed two impeachments of high treason against the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. The former in the nature of a manifesto, the latter by way of artiching. I would have got one of each, either by money or interest, but which I in vain attempted; that against Sir Robert Wright being articles, I copied as far as I could by stealth, which are as followeth:—

1. Allowing, abetting, and procuring the dispensing power with a non-obstante.

2. Trial of the Lord Devonshire, non per paribus, and extravagancies of his fine, being 30,000.

3. Ejecting the President and Fellows of Magdalen College without a trial to make room for outlaws.

4. Turning out Lenthall the inheritor of the King's Bench prison from an office his ancestors purchased with the sale of two lordships, amounting to 20,000 and upwards, before any judgement obtained on the demurrer.

5. Turning out Marshal Glover, who holds under Lenthall, without any trial, though the last term he allowed his right and acted as marshal for six years, the purchase of which place was 2,000 pounds, and this against the opinion of all the counsell at the bar, who knowing the justice of his cause pleaded it in forma pauperis.

6. Denying John Arnold, Esqre., to take out a writ of attaint, though (upon an argument at bar) justified to be law by Finch, Holt, and others.

7. His notorious taking of bribes in the face of the sun to that degree of corruption as is a shame to any court of justice.

And now, my good lord, as nothing ought to make a people rebel against their lawful Sovereign, so no corruption or injustice should be suffered in the King's ministers. I have now had the honour to serve in all the Parliaments since the restoration, but never heard the like of these articles, if true. Let these things, if possible, be redressed, for 'twill truly and really advance the honour of the crown, which is the whole intent of this notice, and I know if the King is informed of this, he will speedily look into and redress it. The manifesto and articles are designed to be dispersed when the Prince comes near London. God of Heaven preserve his Majesty, &c. P.S.—If either of the two printed papers can be procured your lordship may depend upon them in 20 hours after obtained, having ordered a servant to attend in Exeter accordingly.

1688, Dec. 6th, J. (Bishop of) Bristol to Lord Preston.—Mr. Gwyn acquainting me that the Congé d'Elire for Exeter has passed your lordship's office and the privy seal, I desire to tell you that I hope your lordship has offered to his Majesty the business of the commendam, for without it the bishopric will rather be a prejudice than an advantage. I took care with my lord elect of York that he should not dispose of it, and I am confident your lordship has been mindful of it to the King. If there should arise any scruple about it the Bishop of Ely (to whom I have writ fully about it) will give full satisfaction. . . .

1688, Dec. 7th, Bartlow. Lord Maynard to Lord Preston.—Knowing how apt at this time all people that are missing are to be said to be gone to the Prince or to the lords that are in arms, I thought it my duty to acquaint your lordship that I am far from having such design, but am at this private place in Cambridgeshire, ready to obey any summons or commands that the King or your lordship shall lay upon me.— . . . finding his Majesty had no further use of our attendance, I took the first opportunity of getting into the country, it agreeing much better with my health than the London air; but I shall leave it to attend on his Majesty at the Parliament, or sooner if he has any commands for me. . . .

1688, Dec. 7th, Christ College, Cambridge.—Joh. Covel to Lord Preston.—Yesterday I was sworn into my office of Vice-Chancellor, and immediately I paid all due respect to his Majesty's letter about our next chancellor, by communicating it to the Senate, as it was directed. We are allowed by our statute 14 days for our election after certain notice of a vacancy. . . . His Majesty leaving us to the liberty of the statute in that point I presume to take some little time to advise with our heads about it.

1688, Dec. 8th, Thriberge.—Sir J. Reresby to Lord Preston.—The restraint I have been under ever since the surprise of York would not permit me to write sooner to your lordship, and to declare my innocency in the whole matter. It is true I did consent to the meeting of those gentlemen that acted the thing, but I truly believe (what was pretended) that it was only meant to declare their fidelity and adherence to the King; when it was acted I had nothing to trust to (the guard of the standing company being first surprised), but the militia, which refused to obey me and revolted to them. So that being left destitute of help I was easily taken and presently confined for refusing to join with my Lord of Danby, my Lord Lumley, and the rest that assisted to this revolt. Since Saturday last I am sent to my own house, but under condition of abiding there till their further order. I beg of your lordship to lay the contents of this before his Majesty that he may understand my hard share in this matter, and know at the same time that I shall ever endeavour to preserve that duty and obedience which I owe the King, whom God preserve.

(1688.) The true state of York being taken is thus.—The Duke came on Monday to York, 19th of Nov.; called his deputies together; if they did not intend something more by their meeting on Thursday, then a declaration of their loyalty; some of them said they intended a petition for a free Parliament to be speedily called. Then the Duke told them he could not concur with them, and would be gone, which he did on Wednesday after. The Governor was of the Duke's opinion only, and was not at the hall on Thursday to sign the petitions. On Thursday whilst the gentlemen were forming and signing the petition one Mr. Tankard runs into the hall and cries the papists were up in arms and had shot at the militia troops that were called together that morning, pretending to go to Doncaster by the Duke's order. At that alarm all the gentlemen ran out, those that were privy to the design having their horses and arms ready, and joined with the militia troops, the captains being only made acquainted with it the night before, and with my Lord of Danby in the head of them, my Lord Lumley, who never appeared before, my Lord Dunblain, Lord Willoby, Lord Horton, Sir H. Goodrick, Sir Jo. Keye, Lord Fairfax, Mr. John Darcy, and many others, first went and secured the guard of the standing company, tho' it was doubled before the Governor had notice of the risings; when he had intimation of it, he sent for his horses, and sent to the four troops and the militia company to come to him which, they refusing to do, as he was going to get on horseback to go to them, Sir Harry Belass comes with a troop of horse and secures the door, and my Lord of Danby followed with the greatest part of the horse, who took the Governor, and used many arguments, as I hear, to persuade him to join in so unanimous a design; but he refusing, my lord confined him, the capt. and lieutenant of the standing company, in which condition they are at this time, and are not allowed to write; they have since seized the stores, which was but 3 barrels of powder and some old rusty arms, and the King's money that [was] in the hands of collectors of hearth, excise, or customs, and that of the archbishop's collectors. Forces do not join much to them as yet or come in; they have taken Capt. Villar's company of granadeers, and Capt. Witham's; they seize arms, but nothing else of papists, and their horses; they have taken some priests. Mr. Fane, the Privy Councillor, Mr. Wortley Montague, and several others are with them. I hear they have sent for the high constables and freeholders to appear at York this week, but it is believed few of them will come in. . . .

1688, Dec. 8th, Southwick.—(Coll.) Rich. Norton to Lord Preston.—It is much against my temper to complain, but truly the miserable condition of my poor neighbours in the Isle of Portsea, wherein Portsmouth stands, inforeth me; there are not many houses, as his Majesty knows, and of them not above 5 or 6 public-houses, and 2 or 3 of them being drunk out are laid and laying down, and yet there are 8 troops of the Lord Cornbury's dragoons which are and have been quartered on them a fortnight, to the utter ruin of many poor families, for they are not only on free quarters, but do much damage in their barns; but what is yet most grievous, they are so many of necessity quartered in every house, that many of our poor inhabitants with their wives and children have not been in bed since they came; and as abundance of them very sickly, that if it continues thus it will be a total ruin of the island, for people were not very forward to come thither in time of peace for the sickness of the place. If his Majesty's affairs require it we must submit; I say we, because I have a house where I keep one servant at board wages, upon whom 12 are quartered These inhabitants did make a complaint to the Lord Dover before he went, who would have thought of easing them. I believe, but he went away P.S. Oh my lord, could I enter into particulars it would move compassion. I doubt his Majesty does not hear of the murders committed and attempted by the strangers, and particularly of one seaman that it is said was the very immediate instrument of saving his Majesty's life when like to be cast away toward Scotland.

1688, Dec. 9th, Dover.—Wm. Stokes (Mayor) to Lord Preston.—Gives an account of an attempt that was yesterday made by some of this town on the castle here, which is as follows, viz.:—About 30 of the inhabitants of this town appeared in the market-place yesterday about noon in their arms, declaring they were informed some Irish forces were on the road coming hither, as also that a considerable force of French were designed to be landed in these parts; and that therefore for their own safety they were resolved to secure the castle; from which I endeavoured, by all the arguments I was capable of using to divert them; but that had not the intended effect upon them, for they immediately marched up to the castle, and this morning I have (with some of the principal inhabitants of this town) been up with them to dissuade them from persisting further in this matter; and have some reason to hope that as soon as this false alarm is over, and their fears abated, they will be reduced to such a composure as may consist with their duty and the peace of the kingdom.

1688, Dec. 13th, Portsmouth.—(Sir) E. Vaudrey to [Lord Preston]. Puts his commission of Lieutenant-Colonel in Lord Preston's hands, having reduced himself to the private capacity of the Duke of Berwick's gentleman of horse, and acting no more as a soldier.

1688, Dec. 13th, Portsmouth. Coll. Robert Ramsey to Lord Preston.—I would not miss the opportunity of writing by Sir George Barklay, who will give your lordship an account how all things stand with us in this garrison I am most concerned for my poor wife and child. After the misfortune of my master 'tis not reasonable I should be concerned for myself.

1688, Dec. 13th, Westford.—Richard Graham to Lord Preston, at his lodgings in Soho Square.—I thought fit to let your lordship know what is become of us; upon Tuesday, when we heard the King's letter to the army, the Scots horse and dragoons retired to this place called Westford, which, being surprised, our officers sent one to the Prince, and this day he came back with the Prince's answer, which was for us to lie here, and our commanding officers to come and speak to him. I thought to have come in to your lordship, but then I thought it not fit to part with our standard, so long as any stood by it. Clavars hath lost most part of his regiment, some being riders, but most part gone off, both officers and soldiers. For my part I will do nothing till I see your lordship . . .

1688, Dec. 15th, Faversham.—Tho. Jenner, R. Graham, and P. Burton to Lord Preston.—Travelling towards Canterbury on Tuesday last we turned down to Faversham to avoid the rabble that were arisen both before and behind us; all of a sudden the road being very quiet over night, and we were no sooner got into our inn, but were seized upon by the magistrates and military men for Romish priests, albeit we were in no disguise, nor could find it prudent to make use of our passes, but have burnt them; and since albeit they are abundantly satisfied what we are, yet can not get off without orders from above. They have thus long detained us to satisfy the rabble which makes this place very dangerous to be in, as the King himself can too well tell; he knows of our being here, and has been graciously pleased to move in our behalf, and therefore must earnestly press you for your favour in obtaining an order to be dispatched to us for our getting out of this very troublesome place, and what is done herein will be sent to us by the care of the privy purse, who was with us here, and knows our condition and the full state of our case, and so does my Lord Middleton.

1688, Dec. 17th, Windsor (holograph).—The Earl of Feversham to Lord Preston.—I have given an account to his Majesty of my imprisonment, which I cannot but think very extraordinary, but I will not trouble you with it, having writ to the King at large, who I do not doubt will speak to you of it. I desired him not to be impatient about it, for I am very quiet as to myself, and I hope he will think of himself more than of anybody else. This is not a time to dispute very much. I am afraid I writ to the King about granting me a pardon for all the crimes imaginable. I do not desire that the crime that I am accused be inserted in it, which is to have disbanded the army; I would leave it to you to do what you think fit in it, but pray let it be dispatched as soon as it can be, for I see it may be very good, as innocent as one can be, to have a pardon, especially at this time. P.S. I have writ to the King that I have acquainted you with what I desire of him if he can do it, so I desire you to speak of it to him as soon as you can. I have appointed Mr. Bridgmont to wait upon you about my pardon; it is not Bridgmont of Middleton, but he that was in the privy purse . . .

1688, Dec. 22nd, Stapleford. Lord Sherard to Lord Preston.—Upon the 18th day of this instant month of December was brought before me (being one of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Leicester) one Mr. Gervas Cartrit of Belgrave, in the county aforesaid, accused for being a priest and saying mass, and was then by me committed to the gaol of the said county; and upon the 19th day of the same month one Mr. William Bennet, of Stanton Harold in the same county, was brought before me, and upon his examination he did confess that he was a jesuit, and had received priests orders, and was then also by me committed to the gaol; all which I thought it my duty to acquaint your lordship, being one of his Majesty's Privy Council.

1688-9, Jan. 14th, Rose Castle. Hugh Todd to Lord Preston.—I received from my Lord Bishop the new year's gift your lordship was pleased to honour me with The rules of the church, as well as the distrust I have of my own ability, would not allow me to solicit for such a promotion, but seeing your lordship thinks me some way fit for it, I most humbly accept your presentation After I had waited on my Lady Mary I have been at Arthuret, to acquaint the parishioners with the care your lordship has had of them; and to let them know that I intend to go and reside amongst them as soon as ever I can dispatch my concerns at P.S. The M.S. is ready for your lordship's service.

LETTERS FROM MINISTERS ABROAD.
Amsterdam.

1688, Nov. 19th, Amsterdam.—Dan. Petit to Lord Preston.—We received yesterday 5 English mails at once, and among them letters which brought us the good news of his Majesty's having named your lordship to supply the place of Secretary of State. . . . The Earl of Middleton being pleased, when I first removed hither to execute the place of consul for the nation, to order me to correspond with, and to transmit him all such papers, libels, as well against as for his Majesty's Court which this place did afford, I have hitherto used my best endeavours to acquit myself thereof.—Asks if he shall continue the correspondence as above-mentioned with his lordship.

1688, Dec. 3rd, Amsterdam. The same to the same. —Foreign news Trade and navigation are dead in these provinces; all eyes expecting to see the event of affairs in England. Several privateers have been sent out lately, and commissions are daily given out for more, so that the seas will be filled up with them. But tho' trade be at a stand, yet our impertinent writers are not to ceasing to exercise their pens upon no less than great kings and princes; witness is an oracle (so called by the writer) published four days ago, the most infamous of all the libels that ever has been made, and whose author justly deserves to lose thousand lives, if he had them. Mons. van Beuningen is within these 3 days fallen into a new distraction, and is now closely kept at his house. We want 3 English mails.

1688, Dec. 4th, Amsterdam.—The same to the same. —Foreign news. One squadron of the State's ships that are in England are to return under Vice-Admiral Bastians. It is spread here that a secret alliance between England and France, lately concluded, is to be made public.—Mentions the illness of Prince Casimir, Governor of Frisland and of Mons. Fagell, the pensioner of Holland.—There is no trade here at present, and the exchange is now nothing but a place for entertaining of news. . . .

1688, Dec. 17th, Amsterdam.—The same to the same. —Movements of imperial troops.—Marshal Humieres has held several secret councils with some French commanders, as that of Huy, in the country of Liege, of Bonn, and others, but concerning what is not well known tho' suspected by the Elector of Brandenburg, Bishop of Munster (as I am told) that they will open their passage into Westphalia, and break through to the provinces of Groningen and Frisland, being two of the Seven United, and by those means terrify and oblige them to recall the Prince of Orange out of England It is said that the States General expect an answer from the Prince of Orange whether he can miss and send back a certain troop which he has with him. And in case that he cannot, they will not only recall their infantry and cavalry, but also give immediate orders for new levies Fagel died on the 15th instant. We want at present three English ordinaries.

(1688.) (Indorsed as received Dec. 24th.) Amsterdam. —The same to the same.—Foreign news.— P.S. It is reported that the Prince of Orange is sending over 6,000 new raised English to serve the States.

1688, Dec. 31st, Amsterdam.—The same to the same. —Account of the Emperor's doings.—The Elector of Brandenburg, the Electrice, and two of his brothers were expected this day at the Hague. The occasion of their journey is said to be chiefly to visit her Royal Highness the Princess of Orange, and to see this country. Three days past arrived in the Texell some few ships, bringing over some Swedish troops; more are expected daily. The States have resolved the building of 36 new men-of-war. It is said that three deputies are to go over into England from the States, viz., Messrs. de Witsen, de Dickfelt, and Van Odyck, all three men of great experience and quality.

1688, Jan. 4th, Amsterdam.—The same to the same. —Foreign news.—The Elector of Brandenburg arrived with his Electrice on Saturday last at the Hague; they are lodged at the Prince of Orange's old court The enclosed French paper contains remarks made on the French declaration of war to the States General. I wish in case Marquis D'Albyville should leave the Hague that I may be so happy to be ordered to step thither as agent or secretary for correspondence sake, as I did before his arrival, and that until another minister did come there Copenhagen.

1688, Nov. 24, o. s., Copenhagen. Gabriel de Sylvius to Lord Preston. Congratulations on the King having appointed Lord Preston to succeed Lord Sunderland.

1688, Nov. 24, o. s. The same to the same. Congratulations on the King having appointed Lord Preston to succeed Lord Middleton.—Expresses his regrets at the rash attempts of the Prince of Orange, and states the goodwill of the Danish Court to King James.

1688, Dec. 1st. The same to the same. Has not written since Nov. 24. The Danish King and Court are much interested in King James. Begs Lord Preston to send news.

1688, Dec. 2nd. The same to Mr. Tempest. Thanks Tempest for his letters of 27 Nov. and 4 December. The Court of Denmark are much interested for King James. They refrain from expressing an opinion on the conduct of Prince George until they hear the exact truth about it. Asks news.

1688, Dec. 2nd. The same to Mr. Warre at Lord Preston's office. Is glad to hear from Warre's letter of December 7 that the (Warre) is chosen jointly with Mr. Graham to fill the place of Mr. Cook. Asks him to write often and tell news. Wants especially to know the result of the conference of the Commissioners with the Prince of Orange.

1688, Dec. 22, o. s. The same to Fergus Graham, Esq. Congratulations on his appointment to succeed Mr. Cook. A letter from Holland yesterday announces the intention of King James to depart secretly with his wife and the Prince of Wales; but as letters from that quarter are suspicious, he wants news from England. Asks for news and expresses his sympathy for the King.

1688, Dec. 25, o. s. The same to Mr. Tempest. Acknowledges Tempest's letter of the 11th, announcing the flight of the King and Queen with the Prince of Wales. Does not write to Lord Preston because he knows his lordship has no orders to give, but asks Tempest to sound Lord Preston for regulations for his (Sylvius's) conduct. In the meantime he (Sylvius) remains quietly at home, and does not go to court.

1688, Dec. 29, o. s. The same to Mr. Tempest. Has heard by letters from Holland of the retreat of the King, his capture by fishermen, and his being brought to Faversham, and that bleeding at the nose again attacked him, and could not be stopped, and that he died. Asks for news. In the meantime he still keeps at home.

The Hague.

1688, Nov. 9th, late at night, Hague. Marquis d'Albyville to Lord Preston.—I have received no letters or news from England since yours of the 26th of last month. This fleet has been cruelly dispersed, and as carefully kept from the knowledge of the people. The Prince was the first who returned, and followed but by few ships. Their orders were in case of a storm to return from whence they sailed. Herbert is missing for two days and two nights with 12 men-of-war he had with him; three days after, seven men-of-war came into Gorée, and 4 to Helvoetsluys; every day since some of the men-of-war and ships which carried the soldiers returned. Some of the English volunteers and the Scots lords were thought lost, but they arrived yesterday morning; 2 or 300 of the Prince, his guards of both horse and foot, and 300 of Col. Cutt's regiment are given for lost; divers of their men-of-war are rendered unserviceable, others are prepared; the loss of horses is considerable, a greater number is bought than has been lost. The soldiers have been very ill used, which makes them murmur in a high manner. All means are now used to appease them by giving them some fresh victuals. The Prince has not stired from Helvoetsluys nor was her Royal Highness to see him; he is very impatient to be at sea again, and would fain venture with what ships are ready, but he will be persuaded to stay till all be in a readiness, which can not be till the end of the week or the beginning of the next; so that till then he cannot make use of the wind, which is turned favourable for them. The heavens have another storm in store for them before they land; the soldiers are much tired and dejected, not one soul was admitted to stir out of their ships. His Lieutenant-Colonel Babington, who has Sir Harry Bellases his regiment given him as they were to be embarked. The assurance the Prince and States continue to have of success is more than I can express. Philipsburg is taken, Coblenz besieged. The Duke of Hannover marches with 25,000 men to oppose the French in the Palatinate. Prince Waldishe with near so many more marches to oppress Mareschal de Humieres, who is in the country of Liege. They satisfy themselves that the King must make war next spring against France, and that the war must continue till he retires all his conquests. They make no doubt of this, since England for the future must depend of the Prince of Orange's will and pleasure.

1688, Nov. 12th, Hague. The same to the same.—I have sent an express on the 10th. Yesterday in the afternoon, the [Prince] has set sail with the whole fleet, towards Yarmouth they say, with a favourable wind, so that on Sunday they believe here the Prince will have most of his men landed; nothing else is heeded or thought of here, but this enterprise of the Prince, of whose success they make no doubt at all. Her Royal Highness continues here; she went to the Brille to see the Prince before his departure . . . The French privateers have taken a considerable prize, and brought her to Dunkerck, a ship that was going to the Indies; she had 6,000*l.* ready money on board of her. The Prince his manifesto is not yet published here. I believe you have it there ere now; however, I send you one in Dutch by the way of Newport, doubting not but the packet boat will be stopped for some days.—P.S. 'Tis true that Mr. Sidney hath my Lord of Ossery's regiment; Bellasis' regiment is given to Lieut.-Col. Abington.

1688, Nov. 12th, Hague.—Duplicate of the above, except the postscript, which is omitted, but on a separate paper in a different hand is P.S. I am told by a considerable person that the allies have resolved to besiege Bonn as soon as they shall hear of the Prince of Orange's landing in England.

1688, Nov. 16th, Hague.—The same to the same.—The several advertisements sent to the Prince by express boats, and by men sent to him that the seaports in the north were well provided, and good orders given in all those parts; he was advised from England to land in the West, where he might be assured towns and men sufficiently would declare for him, and surprise the Court, being not expected to land there. Letters from both the Courts of England and France assuring that he would land at Yarmouth, or somewhere in the north, and finding no men-of-war at Calais and Dunkerck, and having same assurance the King's fleet would not engage, divers captains having declared they would not fight against their religion, as they have been informed, made their resolve to sail towards the west, and it is said to land some men in the Isle of Weight, to keep Portsmouth blocked up, and by the manner they will dispose of their fleet, and reinforce it constantly with fresh ships. They will interrupt all communication with France, and be ready there to invade it justly with England in the spring. This is their language, as exorbitant as you lordship may think it, and as unpracticable. Brakel, whose ship was leaky, of 70 guns, two men-of-war more fitted, and one fitting near ready, and 7 victualers not ready, having been left behind, it was thought the Prince stayed a while for them beyond the banks, but he waited there for the return of one he sent to England, who came that very night. The people at Rotterdam, and in all the sea ports, began to exclaim and murmur against the Prince for losing so much time, since the wind and weather proved so favourable, for they think they will be received with open arms everywhere. On Friday the 12th Vice-Admiral Allemond returned to Helvoetsluyse from the fleet to take care of the ships remaining, and one Capt. Flagg to take command of the ship that is fitting. On Wednesday the 3rd of Nov. were dispatched 2 vessels, with above 50,000 of the manifesto of the Prince, one into the west and another into the north, believe into Scotland, and one Robinson in a ketch, and another employed for scouts. A yacht of Sir Hugh Owen in Wales came from Milford Haven to Rotterdam about two months since, pretended to be laden with coals, but brought eight chests of silver, and hath lain at the Brill ever since the fleet hath been ready, and so soon as the fleets sailed, went away to Wales to carry advice. Sir William Waller was expressly sent for by the Prince to Cassell, and embarked in the fleet to make use of him in his free Parliament, I believe. Eighteen boats with about 700 men arrived at Rotterdam on Saturday, Nov. 13th; three regiments more are expected, and ships ready to take them on board I sent your lordship the Prince his manifesto by the last packet boat, tho' I believed you had got it there already; now it is sold publicly and in all languages, as well as this enclosed fine picture, which infamous liberty they may as well take as the Prince to speak in his manifesto so basely as falsely of the supposed great belly of the Queen, and of the supposed Prince of Wales, whom God preserve, and the King his father to punish these abominations. . . . P.S. The packet boats are now suffered to go freely from hence.

1688. Nov. 19th, Hague.—The same to the same.—I am much afraid his Majesty's fleet has been too much towards the north to be able to overtake the Dutch fleet in the Channel. The Prince of Orange declared he apprehended to meet with her, and nothing more than to meet with a tempest when he would be at sea, and when scattered to be fallen upon by the King's fleet. Four regiments of foot are come to Rotterdam and thereabouts, and more are to follow to be in readiness to be embarked when the Prince sends for them. Several ships at Helvoetsluyse and Amsterdam are to be made ready for their transportation Van Tromp is reconciled to the Prince. Two fire-ships are amaking ready at Rotterdam and more at Amsterdam. The English nation may believe what they please, they certain an absolute conquest is intended; and the Church of England may believe what they please, she will hardly be able to subsist when a Presbyterian prince and army will have the command. Her Royal Highness told myself more than once that there was little or no difference between the Church of England and the Presbyterians, and she goes constantly to both churches. As soon as I received the King's commands by your letter of the 2nd of Nov. I sent to desire access of the Princess; her Royal Highness sent me word by her secretary, She saw no men since the Prince his departure, that I might tell him what I had to say, and if I scrupled at that, I might write to her, which I have done, and enclosed the declaration of the witnesses, and that it was by the King's command. This afternoon her Royal Highness was pleased to send me with her said secretary, Mr. D'Alone, this message, that she does not wonder at all that after what has been publicly talked of and generally believed of the matter contained in the same paper the King should think of means to convince the world of the contrary; but as for her, that she thinks she neither ought can at this distance nor ought in other respects judge of it, being it is of a nature that nothing but a Parliament can satisfy therein the minds of everybody. . . . P.S. I doubt 4 regiments at Rotterdam will be sent as yet, for fear they should be intercepted by the King's fleet. I have seen a letter of the Queen of Swedes, mentioning the Pope's acceptance of his Majesty's mediation betwixt him and the King of France, and wherein she expressed a very great concern for his Majesty in the present conjuncture.

1688, Nov. 19th. The same to the same.—I received two letters from your lordship; the first gave me intimation of my Lord Sutherland's removal, which would have been very sensible to me, his lordship being my great friend, but that it must be for the King's service, since his Majesty would have it so. I knew this long time that when any such removal would happen your lordship would not fail to come in, his Majesty having been pleased to express some such thoughts upon occasions that were offered to speak of your lordship, and his Majesty can bear me witness I said I knew no man fitter for the employments, and on whom his Majesty could more rely.

1688, Nov. (23rd), Hague. The same to the same.—There is no express come yet from the Prince of Orange either to her Royal Highness or to the States, but letters came from Dartmouth to some at Utrecht, by the very same express that brought the King the news of the Prince his landing, that he was joyfully received in all them parts, and able to reinforce his army with in a pace from Cornwall and Devonshire. It is believed the States have sent orders, or are about sending them, to their fleet to find out my Lord Dartmouth and fight him, for to have the communication free with the Prince. They have resolved to raise 3,000 horse and some foot. Two of the four regiments come towards Rotterdam for to be embarked are commanded back to their garrisons; two more remain in the town in boats; they have leave to go abroad all day, and at night they must sleep in their boats. Her Royal Highness sent for the deputies of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, of Dorts, and of Harlem, to let them know how happily the Prince had escaped the English fleet; that the hand of God appeared in it, for that if they had met such a numerous fleet would have sustained a great loss; that he as happily landed and desired to have 10 men-of-war in readiness when he would call for them, some thousands of men. I apprehend, and upon good grounds, that when the King would call his forces from the north these men would have been ordered to land there; but my fear of that is over for the present, since those two regiments have been sent back, and that the States having two days ago resolved upon letters of mark against the French, they have likewise resolved to set out nine frigates against the French privateers, and to save charges, order them to be employed as the Prince would have occasion; it is not yet known if this will serve the Prince his design. He wrote just as he was setting sail from Helvoetsluyse to the Duke of Zell, that he had no great loss by the tempests, but that he would have been disappointed of his design if the King's fleet had been at sea for divers days after the tempests, so dispersed his fleet has been; that he was sure of success so that he were but once landed. There was never such praying in these countries as is now daily for the success of the Prince's enterprise, and all the predicants give [God] thanks for the late tempests, being the cause of his having changed measures, and of his happy landing on the west. All the officers taken with the 200 men of Col. Babington's regiment by one of his Majesty's frigates deserve to be hanged, and above all the major of the regiment, one Colomby, formerly a page to Sir William Temple, and afterwards a great creature of Col. Sidney on all occasions, speaking infamously of the King. P.S.—Ten thousand copies in Dutch of the declaration of witnesses of the birth of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales have been already distributed; they begin now to believe him truly the King's son, but some will never believe it. Pensioner Faguel has declared to some foreign ministers that he believes it. They say that the English have been the cause that the Prince made mention of it in his manifesto: for his creatures here of the States find now that it must do the Prince a great deal of prejudice and dishonour to have said anything of it in his manifesto. Don Pedro Ronquillo writes that the more the King yields the more insolent the people grow, and apprehend much the success of affairs. The Spanish minister here makes his Court to her Royal Highness with the least news that appears favourable to the Prince. Its reported here that the Duke of Lorraine is dead, and there is some likelihood of it. Two men-of-war of the State's fleet, which had the Duke of Holstein's regiment embarked upon them, have been separated from the fleets, went into the Isle of Wight, as they say themselves, were well received there, and no money taken for what victuals they had; at last, not knowing where the Prince was, they resolved to return home, passed at night thro' the English fleet, and arrived at the Brill the day before yesterday, which made the States assemble extraordinarily at night time, upon an apprehension that they were two Frenchmen of war that had some design upon the Brill.

1688, Nov. 30th, Hague. The same to the same.—We want two posts occasioned by the contrary wind and stormy weather. I send to his Majesty by his own command a particular account of what present forces are ready to be sent to the Prince, or where he shall command them, to be conveyed by Brakell, five men-of-war more, and some 24 capers, which shall carry 24 guns a piece; a resolution likewise newly taken by the States General to send out about 20 men-of-war commanded by Van Trump, and on which they intend to embark 10,000 men for some extraordinary design; this cannot be so soon executed. I think it convenient the Queen should see it in the King's absence. These enclosed lists of his Majesty's sea and land forces sent by the Ambassador Van Citters to the States General, which he was ordered to purchase at any rate, your lordship will be pleased to send to the King; that by the exactness of them his Majesty will be able to judge by whom they must have been given. P.S.—They can not get ready but nine capers to go along with Brakell. They give out here that my Lord Colchester is gone to the Prince of Orange with 300 of the King's Guards. They have had no news yet from the Prince, but what the letters of London brought.

—The list of his Majesty's troops and Army.—Received Nov. 1688. An addition to the Ambassador Van Citter's letter, dated 19th of Nov. 1688. Mentioned in the above letter. (3½ pp., folio.) Sum total, English, Scotch, and Irish, 32,031 men, horse and foot.

1688, Dec. 2nd,* Hague. The same to the same.—I forgot to insert in my letter of yesterday that the States General have resolved the raising of the 22 penny upon all real and personal estates. They resolve likewise to send a 1,000 horse besides the foot, which will not prove 3,000, along with Brakell; they want small vessels to transport them, all imaginable diligence is used to get them from all parts Mr. Gee, of whom I writ in my last letter, who is gone with a young son of his with the Prince, and in good equipage, is a Yorkshire man, of the west part of it, and was formerly a Parliament man for Hull; a bitter enemy to the King, as all the rest of them, who took an oath here amongst themselves before their departure, as it is now known, that they would never lay down arms till they made the Prince of Orange King, and laughed at a free Parliament, tho' the King should call one, if they cannot get together a powerful army, which they doubted not of. The Duke of Lorraine is now upon the mending hand. The States have not heard yet from the Prince and long to hear from him, and it is not believed they will send away these forces now at Helveltsluc till they hear from him. I am not without some apprehension they may be ordered for the north. Your lordship may be pleased to let the King know of this resolution of the States to embark a 1,000 horse. They assure the Princess has heard yesterday from the Prince, and since she says nothing they conclude his affairs go not so well. They have great expectations, having, as they say, assurances before the Prince's departure that the city of London will declare after the King goes to his army. P.S.—There is no packet boat come since that which brought the letters of the 9th. I gave order to hire a boat expressly to carry over these and my precedent letters, if one may be had for money, for there is an order of the States none should go without leave.

1688, Dec. 3rd, Hague. The same to the same.—I have solicited very earnestly the French Ambassador, tho' without order, to write to the King his master, (which he assured me to have done effectually) to cause some incursions to be done into these frontiers in hopes it would prove a means to deter the States from parting with these forces now embarked and expecting the Prince his orders where they shall be sent, for I am not without just cause of fear they are destined for the North, tho' I have great assurance given me they are intended for Scotland. What the French King will order a little time will shew. The landing of these men in the North of England would prove so ruinous to the King's affairs induced me to motion this from myself, and declared at the same time to the Ambassador that it was without any order from Court. The States Commissioners are to go this day or to-morrow, to meet the Elector of Brandenburg at Weesel at his own request. To this I have only to add the enclosed memorial of the Emperor's Envoyé, to which the States have not yet returned an answer, and some letters of Van Citters in Dutch as he writ them to the States; your lordship may have them I have also enclosed of your office one of my Lord Mordaunt's. This Ambassador writes in other letters that he is kept as a prisoner, that nobody of his friends that give him intelligence dares come at him, his house being beset by spies and soldiers, and they say now he is threatened by the Papists; as I do not believe nothing of this to be true, I think it convenient he should be sent to, to write the truth to the States, and that I know the certainty of it. I am sure he is not threatened as I have been by the English and Scots traitors whilst they have been here, and am daily by the rabble here, my chapel pulled down, my house pillaged, and myself and family cut into pieces, yet I am not afraid nor do I write or complain of it. Six weeks before the Prince his departure, and as yet, my house is beset with spies that no man or woman can come at any hour of the day or of the night but it is known; all persons of quality that are Roman Catholics are advertised to come no more to my chapel; a world of the common people do daily flock hither to pray for the preservation of their Majesties, and of his Royal Highness.

1688, Dec. 4th, Hague.—The same to the same.—I have not heard from your lordship nor from any of your office by the last packet The deputies the States send to the Prince of Orange believe they shall be able to go next week; they are drawing up their instructions; in the mean time they have conferences with the Elector of Brandenburg, who arrived here with the Electrice two days ago, and are treated extremely kind and splendidly by her Royal Highness, who does them all the honour and civilities imaginable, and sits up with the Electrice at play and conversation till three in the morning. They are to go to Amsterdam in a day or two, being invited thither by the magistrates. A great frost begins in these parts, and their (there are?) fears likewise of incursions of the French, which will cause disorders if they make any, and make them exclaim against the Prince for not sending back some of their forces, now that he hath done his business.

The contributions that the French do gather in Germany, Juliers, and Cleves are very considerable

(Decayed.)

1688, Dec. 10, Hague.—The same to the same.—As I was going to confirm to your lordship, the detention of the forces that have been embarked at Helveltsluc, the Flanders post brought such dismal news of the 6th from London that makes my heart sink

1688, Dec. 14th, at the Hague.—The same to the same.—He is shocked at the King being so infamously betrayed as Monsr. Benting's letter to the Princess of Orange of the 6th mentions, which came by an express, as well as in another express by sea of the 7th from Herbert P.S. The pensioner Faguel is abandoned by the physicians, and so is the Prince of Friseland. They raise here 3,000 horse and 2,000 foot, more forces will be raised. Here are printed in Dutch, but first in English by Farguson, Burnet, Wildman, and Farguson, 40 or 50 articles against the King; this they left to be printed here in case of success.

1688, Dec. 17th, Hague.—The same to the same.—A duplicate of this sheet has been sent your lordship by Flanders, but not of the other sheet. Mr. Wynn hath the cipher in his hands.—Three packets are wanting from England, and some comfortable news to such as live in grief and sorrow, whilst all the world here [is] overjoyed for the daily straights that the King our master is reduced to—such and so general a desertion of their King's as they speak of was never heard of in any age since the creation. The treachery of Churchill they say was known these many months would happen, as well as that of the rest who went over to the Prince, and of all those who declared for him, and of many more who are not yet declared till the Prince appears nearer. Those of the States declare openly that no King was ever so ill served and so betrayed. They exclaim against the ever infamous treachery of Churchill, a man so raised by the King from nothing, made a Lieutenant-General but a day or two before, which I knew not. If I were but assured that the King, was in health, it would revive my decayed spirits; nothing but such a sad and monstrous experience could convince his Majesty that so many men that he had raised to employments and honour, and so many men who have eaten his bread for so many years, and so many who got considerable estates by himself and by the King his brother, could be capable of the most enormous treachery that ever was committed The ships which transported the Prince of Orange's army into England are commanded home, and to be conducted but by a few men-of-war. They could wish here they had a good part of the Prince his army, for they apprehend very much an invasion of the French, if the frost continues which begins—these four days. Prince Wall to come with what force he hath towards Mastrick; and its proposed to send some of the burgers of the inland towns to the frontiers, till men are raised It is proposed, and believed it will pass, that

8,000 seamen shall be raised, and 16 men-of-war equipped to be sent to the Straits, and the raising of 18,000 landmen more will be proposed in a few days. The Elector and Electrice of Brandenburg have some thoughts of coming hither. The pensioner Faguel dyed on Tuesday last, and hath declared to some friends of his before his death that the Princess and Prince of Denmark have been engaged from the very beginning of this invasion, and that the Prince of Orange would not hear of it till he had first assurances from them. The Prince of Friseland who was taken desperately ill, being at church, by a vomiting of blood, and since despaired of, is now somewhat better. Comte d'Avaux went away yesterday for France; he and the States ambassador are to be exchanged at Monts or thereabouts. The French ambassador had a guard given him three days before his departure. The Emperor and Empire have not yet declared war against the French King. Many believe the Princess of Denmark may come hither to see her sister, and live here till affairs are settled in England. I cannot believe she will leave England. News came this morning from Flanders by an express come thither to some private [] out of England, that the King finding [himself] reduced to so great extremities was forced [to call] a Parliament for the 15th of January; the news was not public in Flanders, for no letter makes mention of it, but one come to a considerable Jew here, who communicated presently to her Royal Highness in the morning, and about noon she communicated the news to the States General, who appeared not a little surprised at it, and sent presently some of their members to this Jew's house to know how he came by the news. The Princess was extraordinarily surprised, and asked if it was her father or her husband that called the Parliament. All the Prince's friends are extraordinarily troubled at it: they doubted not but the King would be taken, fly away, or be killed; and the Prince presently proclaimed King. I send your lordship an infamous printed paper in Dutch which has been sold here for some days, at last forbidden and seized upon by the States; it is the King's process. The Protestants of England's memorial to the Princess and Prince of Orange composed by Major Wildman and Burnet, which I sent over long since, contains almost the same points; here are likewise prints made of his Majesty, the most infamous and insupportable that can be imagined. My Lord C writes hither that there has been a great massacre of English in Ireland purposely given out to have the Irish there in England massacred.

1688, Dec. 20th, Hague.—The same to the same.—I received your lordship's letter of the 4th of this month . . . what I wrote in cipher in my last is most certain, and not in the least to be doubted of. Now that the King has called a Parliament the world will see what unreasonable, unchristian, and unjust things will be aimed at and desired by the Prince and his party. They assure here already the Prince of Wales will never be acknowledged. Your lordship's letters will come without danger of being intercepted, addressing them to the Postmaster of Harwich, for he sends one of the packet boats with them. The States resolve to propose the raising of 13,000 men more, as I have intimated to you in my last, finding little hopes of seeing here so soon any part of those forces the Prince hath with him, and that they must provide against France . . . Her Royal Highness Court is overjoyed to hear the Prince so successful, and I am oppressed with groans and lamentations for it

1688, Dec. 21st, Hague. The same to the same.—The news we have from England are melancholy indeed There is great joy at Court for the success of the Prince of Orange his designs. Some of States begin to think affairs go too far, that they could not believe it, that so general a desertion was never heard of, of so great and so good a King. I send you Van Citters his letters which are printed here, wherein are seen such lies and such shifts as is unworthy of an ambassador's pen. The Prince of Orange does call with great earnestness for the rest of Holstein's regiments, and for no others. They say the Prince was to send Macay with 6,000 foot and 500 horse into Ireland, and to send the Duke of Ormond along to reduce that kingdom. They write hither likewise that my Lord Dartmouth would not conduct the Prince of Wales into France. I am sorry in so unfortunate a conjuncture to be necessitated to desire your lordship to speak to the King about recovering the payment of a little sum that is due to me till the 5th of Nov., 760*l.*, for to pay off all my debts here, for which the common people threaten to pillage my house and chapel, glad to have the pretext to demolish this last, which I have built myself, and have never put it to the King's accounts nor many other expenses. . . . I am overjoyed to hear their Majesties are in health, and the Queen with child.

Hamburg.

1688, Oct. 30th. Hamburg.—Sir Peter Wyche to the Earl of Middleton. I'm to beg compassion for my distractedness to which as good providence gave some lightsome intervals by driving the Prince back, so by the letters of this day they are continued, he having been with his fleet in those harbours on Friday, but resolved again to venture. And as I'm now wanting two posts from your lordship's office, by the reports our enemies send abroad, his Majesty is not to have 10 for their 100, so general a defection is there to be of his subjects through the whole kingdom. As we have heard nothing for some time of Herbert, 'tis now advised he had ventured through the Channel, and by correspondence laid designed for Bristol.—Foreign news.

1688, Nov. 2nd. Hamburg. The same to the same. Foreign news.—The obstinacy of the Prince to pursue his design, and the very fair weather and wind he hath had these 3 days, makes me fear his Majesty may have very unwelcome guests. May they be entertained as they deserve. The inclosed for his Majesty was sent to me this morning from the Consul at Elsenore 1688, Nov. 6th. Hamburg.—The same to the same.—The Holland letters of this day, guessing that the Pr. (who set sail on the 1st inst. from Helvoetsluce with as fair a wind as could blow) might be landing in England on Saturday, if he intended for any place in Kent; this may be as importune as 'tis uncertain whether 't will be so or no, being scarce to come to hand by the parity of reason that these 4 ordinary's. I have not had one word from your lordship's office. We are well warranted from a general deluge again, therefore there are hopes his Majesty may not be overwhelmed as Germany is by the French, who find but weak resistance Foreign news.

1688, Nov. 13th, Hamburg. Sir Peter Wych to Lord Preston.—Having for three weeks lived very miserably on the bad entertainment of the Holland reports, yesterday I received two ordinary's disorderly from Whitehall, and amongst the happy circumstances of his Majesty's affairs that your lordship had succeeded my Lord Myddleton as Secretary of State.—Compliments.— . . . I received this day printed what was done at the extraordinary Council on the 22nd of the past, and the attestations of the Queen Dowager and of other persons of eminency, which so baffle the odious and villainous scandal of the supposition of the Prince of Wales. I read it over with great exultancy, and the thought was present to make it be translated into high Dutch, and to have it printed, for never poison was so operative as that black scandal so maliciously aggravated in that villainous libel, (the memorial of the nation to the Prince and Princess of Or.), and I may say there is not a Protestant Prince or subject on the continent not infected. A strict alliance is treating betwixt the King of Sweden and the Princes of Lunenbourg, in which the Duke of Holstein hath great hopes, and is too partial to the Pr. of Or., by which the King of Sweden made him promise to do for him when the capitulation was made for the 6,000 men 1688, Nov. 16th, Hamburg. The same to the same.— No English letters are come this day. I am not a little disquieted by those from Holland, which confidently say the Prince and his forces are landed in several places of the west, possess 10 or 12 miles along the shore, have plentiful markets made for them, and that the people declare for the Prince, which God avert. As every Protestant in Germany is for the Prince, so is your lordship to observe out of the enclosed letter from Vienna that the Catholics wish him not ill, if by his mad design England might be made espouse the common cause (as 'tis called) against his M.C.M.

1688, Nov. 20th, Hamburg.—The same to the same.—Foreign news His M. C. Majesty hath lost all hopes of persuading the Elector of Bararia to be neuter, and 'tis wondered that the Pr. of Orange and the States have accepted a neutrality for the county of Meurs upon the Rhine, belonging to the Prince We hear his M. C. Majesty hath confiscated an estate of Mareschal Schomberg's which lies near Paris, and that the King of Portugal may withdraw his pension of 16,000 crowns yearly 1688, Nov. 23rd, Hamburg. The same to the same.—By receiving no letters from England, and by the reports which come hither from Holland, (by which there were to be a most general and most rebellious desertion of his Majesty. I am in no small discomposure and perplexity, and the concern is too great at home to draw any steady attention to what is done abroad 1688, Nov. 27th, Hamburg. The same to the same. Foreign news.—This day I received from your lordship's office the advices of the 20th inst., by which I see his Majesty is going to his army (God send him victorious progress and a triumphant return), and that some arch rebels have endeavoured to desert; but I am armed against the frightful reports of Holland (which make the Prince 20,000 strong, and say he was within 18 miles of London, where 40,000 apprentices were up declaring for him), and seeing no advantages the King's enemies have got against him, am confident he is to subdue his last rebels and reign happily in himself and in his posterity

1688, December 21st, Hamburg. Sir Peter Wych to Lord Preton. The bruit which came hither from Holland by the last ordinary that the King, Queen, and Prince of Wales should have left the kingdom, being confirmed to me this day from your lordship's office by a letter of the 11th from Mr. Tempest, the amazement is too great to be so soon recovered, and the distraction I am in makes me inapt for business.

1688, Dec. 21st, Hamburg. Sir P. Wych to Mr. Tempest. (Holograph.) The consternation yours of the 11th put me in that the Queen and the Prince of Wales one day and the King the next left Whitehall and went beyond sea is too great to be over so soon or to permit me to do any business. By the news come hither 'tis not known who is in place, therefore I must expect my fate amongst the rest of the King's ministers, which will be much the worst by what you obliged me to do by orders from my Lord Middleton, to assist to all my power him who came over for to fetch the stags which the Duke of Zell presented his Majesty, who hath engaged me in 200*l.*, which on the news was asked me this day, and a letter shewed me that Mr. Graham had refused to pay the bill, tho' he promised to do it at sight. . . .

1688, Dec. 25th, Hamburg.—The same to the same. (Holograph.) I am so unfortunate as not to have had a line from you or from any else in two posts, when we are tortured with what is advised from Holland, and with Monsr. Citters' letters to the States giving an account of what passed at London and at Feversham from the 11th to the 14th inst., which are printed and came hither this day

1688, Dec. 28, Hamburg.—The same to the same. (Holograph.)—Tho' three posts from England were due to me this morning yet not a letter came, and I am yet in the same distracting agony what is become of his Majesty at Feversham; all the letters and prints we see make it uncertain whether he be alive

1688, Jan. 8th, Hamburg.—Sir Peter Wych to Mr. Tempest. The 7th post being come hither this day without any letters from England, and we being assured by all those from Flanders and Holland that his Majesty was arrived in Flanders and already with the Queen and Prince of Wales at St. Germain, I being reasonably to doubt what is become of his Secretaries of State, shall forbear writing any more till I have further information, which I expect every post day with great impatience. None doubts but there is with you a great embargo, and that we are not to hear of or from you till it be thought fit to take that off. . . .

1688, Hamburg, Janry. 18th. The same to the same. (Holograph.) . . . We have yet no English letters: know not who's in office and what hath been done since the 11th of December, the date of your last letter By letters I have seen from Paris it is out of doubt but that the King, Queen and Prince of Wales are at St. Germain, by which an embassy only can make our Egyptian darkness and ignorance of what is doing in the nation. 'Tis guessed you are in labour of some great design and settlement, which requires some time to be brought forth.—Foreign news.—The 8th post from Holland is this evening come without any letters from England.

Stockholm.

1688, Oct. 24th, Stockholm.—Edm. Poley to Lord Middleton.— . . . The rendezvous of the troops which the Hollanders are to have is put off till to-morrow, but they are now only to expect the being sent for He had I am extremely rejoiced to hear (from Mr. Wynne) that his Majesty's affairs are in so prosperous a condition, and that he hath so little reason to be afraid of his enemies; and, as it is my duty to wish that the prosperity of his Majesty's affairs may still increase, so I do not doubt but it will. The good or ill news from England seems to have some effect upon the outward appearance of the measures of this Court, but their resolution as to their inward meaning seems to be settled, nor do I think that they are grounded upon any ill success that they either wish or expect in his Majesty's affairs. . . .

1688, Oct. 31st, Stockholm.—The same to the same.—I am assured that there are three Holland ships arrived at Gottenbourg to transport the thousand men which they are to receive from hence. It is said that those three ships, being in company with some merchants or others, did at first cause some consternation upon the coasts of Denmark and Sweden, where they were taken at first for the forerunners of the whole Holland fleet. The Comte de Linschöld, whom I have formerly mentioned to be much in favour with this King, is named Governor to the young Prince, and hath 4,000 crowns a year pension for that service, &c.—Other foreign news.—The Queen Mother returned on the 29th in the evening. The master of the ceremonies had promised me I should hear from him when she returned, but not being so good as his word, I wrote to him last night to solicit my audience of the Queen Mother upon the birth of the Prince, but I have not yet heard anything from him. Your lordship will have observed by its being put off so long that there hath been some difficulty in it; from what intrigues it proceeds I cannot tell, but they are such, it seems, as have influence upon the Queen Mother. I should have had this audience before the arrival of the Envoy of Queen Christina (had the Queen Mother been in town), and long before the coming of the Envoy of Lunebourg, but they have had occasion given them, I suppose, to demand private audiences of her, and so have had audiences in private in the country, but they have so much avoided letting me know that a private audience would be acceptable that they seemed afraid that I should believe it would; so that since they have thought fit to let it run silently so long, it must now be public or none; and I wonder the more at it because they endeavour at the same time to have me believe that they would by no means want respect for his Majesty nor civility for me. Till I have the Queen's answer I must expect her pleasure.

1688, Nov. 14th, Stockholm. The same to the same.—The troops which the Hollanders are to have from hence are not yet gone, because the ships are not enough to transport them. . . Gives an account of the proposed raising of men.—They have taken out of the Guards the worst men they can find. They were ordered to march yesterday or this day, and so in three weeks or a month may chance to be at Gottenbourg.—Other foreign news.—In my last of the 7th I did mention my not having then had an audience of the young Queen, nor indeed have I yet had it; but five days since the master of the ceremonies wrote a letter to me, in which he says that having desired to know the Queen's pleasure concerning my audience, he had received for answer Que sa Majesté étoit encore indisposé, même que sa Majesté aroit taché de se faire habiller, mais que sa Majesté ne l'avoit pu souffrir, et étoit lost que sa Majesté seroit en meilleur état. J'attends ordre de son ex. en avant. Thus far I have reason to believe my audience is not desperate; but, seeing it is put off still, and not being certainly sure but that it may still be put off, your lordship will be pleased to give me leave to tell you what reasons I have for my doubts. When the Queen Mother came to town I wrote to the master of the ceremonies to put him in mind of my audience, and I have here enclosed the billet I sent to him that you may the better judge of the whole business. He knowing I also expected an audience of the young Queen, went likewise to know her pleasure when I might expect one, and by chance (at least as I believe very innocently) shows the note which I had written to him, and the young Queen's name not being in the note, it was thought fit by some. I suppose, in whom she hath much confidence, to take this pretext to frame a difficulty; so that about two hours before I had the Queen Mother's answer for appointing my audience, there came a kind of a butler to me from the young Queen about beer which her Majesty seems to like brewed after the English fashion; and when he had delivered his message he sent me in a billet, of which I have also enclosed your lordship the copy: I bid one ask him who sent him with that billet? He answered that he did not know what it contained, but that he was ordered to show it me. I desired to know how he came by it. He answered that he did not know from whom it came, but desired that when I had read it he might have it again. I must confess I did not think I ought to be pleased with this billet, and so

F. GRAHAM,
BART.

SIR
GRAHAM,
BART.

I kept it, and bid him who brought it return the answer which I caused to be written to it, and which I have also here enclosed. The billet had been sealed and broken open again before it came to me, and I do since find that they who wrote it sent it sealed to one of the Queen's lady's, who hath great intimacy with and a great ascendancy over the Queen. She, finding it according to her heart's desire, sends it to me by this butler, and bids him not tell who gave it him; and the lady who was named in it had no hand in it. Soon after this man was gone I had my audience appointed by the Queen Mother, and about an hour after there came one to me who they tell me is a secretary to the young Queen. He told me he came from the young Queen, who had commanded him to give me a paper, which he did. He added that indeed he did properly belong to the Princess, but that the Queen had sent him. I, looking upon the paper, found it to be the answer I had sent, which the Queen had returned me commented with her own hand, and from the place to which she had added her last observation the rest was rent off. I did not then perfectly imagine what it might mean, and did tell him that I did hope I had never given the Queen any occasion to think I wanted any respect for her Majesty or to believe that I had any intention so to do. He answered me that the Queen was enough satisfied I had not, nor did intend it, and so we parted. From all this I must humbly leave it to you to judge if I am to expect an audience. . . .

1688, Oct. 30th. (Endorsed.) Copy of my letter to Monsr. Grönberg, master of the ceremonies, to solicit an audience of the Queen Mother, which was enclosed in the above letter to Lord Middleton. (French.)

(Endorsed.) A copy of the answer to the billet brought me by one of the Queen's servants, together with what was added to it when she returned it. (French.)

1688, Nov. 28th, Stockholm.—Edm. Poley to Lord Preston.—Has received his of Oct. 30th, and is glad that since his Majesty has made alterations in the secretary's office he has made choice of his lordship in a place of so much honour and trust.—“I give many thanks for the account you were pleased to command Mr. Griffith to give me of the 6th inst., that his Majesty had that evening been informed of the Prince of Orange's and the Holland fleets being seen upon the coasts of Devonshire, and that there was every hour expected the news of their landing. I am very sorry that the Prince of Orange or the States General should think there should be either justice or interest in so ill a design. . . . There are arrived some Holland ships at Gottemborg, but there are yet more expected, nor are the commissaries yet come, who are to muster, and to embark the 1,000 men, which are to be transported from thence, and there is so much ice already in the mouth of the harbour that some will imagine the troops will be scarce able to remove this winter, at least from that port. . . . Your lordship will have seen my letters to my Lord Middleton of the 7th and 14th inst. How I stand in this Court as to the audience I am to have of the Queen Regent upon the birth of the Prince of Wales, and it continues still in the same state, nor do I find, as far as I can guess from outward appearance, that I shall ever obtain it.”

1688, Dec. 5th, Stockholm.—The same to the same.—Here hath happened little since my last of the 28th Nov., except only that the appearances of preparations towards putting themselves in a condition to act in the spring do daily increase. Orders are given for recruiting all the regiments, and what other provisions are requisite towards the artillery are carried on with the same diligence.—Other foreign news.

1688, Dec. 12th, Stockholm. The same to the same. The troops which the Hollanders are to have from hence are at length gone from Gottenbourg. The Dutch commissaries did arrive, and the accounts are adjusted, and the troops have set sail.—Other foreign news.

1688, Dec. 12th, Stockholm.—Edm. Poley to Mr. Tempest.— . . . At present intelligence from home is more precious than usually to disappoint the enemies we have abroad, and who, having thought fit to invade us, do also think fit to send about such accounts of our affairs as do represent them to be in a much worse condition than I hope they really are. A foreign army in England must make them bad enough; but they do endeavour to make them yet worse, so that an account of what happens will be a double obligation. . . .

1688, Dec. 19th, Stockholm. The same to the same.—That the six ships which have carried some troops from Carlserona into Pommern are come back again safe will be news, no otherwise than this being a very dangerous sea at this time of the year it may be looked upon as a piece of good fortune. . . . The Hollanders take much care to represent our affairs very ill in England.

1688, Jan. 9th, Stockholm. The same to the same.—Since my last to you of the 2nd I have had no news from England, but such as the Hollanders will let us have, which is generally as ill as they can make it, and indeed so very ill by these two last posts as if they wrote more what they wish than what they hear, so that as I will not believe it, so I will not mention it. Most foreign affairs seem to depend upon the success of ours, and as much here as anywhere, with all in quiet here in expectation of what may happen in England, and of the meeting of their Diet, which still continues fixed for the 4th of the next month. . . .

Christiana

1688, Dec. 1st, Christiana in Norway.—Dan Butts to Lord Preston.—This post brings me the news of your lordship's succeeding my Lord Middleton in that honourable office.—Offers his congratulations, and has asked Lord Middleton to give him a recommendation to Lord Preston by this post.—You will find in the office a number of complaints from this place, many of which have been redrest by my Lord Middleton; but there yet remain some for your lordship, which in regard have the whole winter before me. . . . I acquainted Lord Middleton in my last to Dr. Wynn that I design next month to be at Copenhagen. I shall be better able from thence to inform you than now I can, not knowing how far Sir Gabr[i]el have proceeded in the Treaty. . . . I have no account who succeed Dr. Wynn or Mr. Cook under your lordship, so must expect your commands with whom I am to correspond. . . . it is as necessary that I have the truth of things here as it is to send it to Copenhagen, for this is a great kingdom and our commerce very great, and the chief of our intelligence come from Holland, and is composed of nothing but lies. Our last letters brought us the news of the Prince being landed, and of the good posture his Majesty was in to receive him. I cannot think so unjust an undertaking should prosper any better than when they sent the late D. of Monmouth. . . .

Vienne

1688, Nov. 14th, Vien. (Dr.) Thomas Lane to the Earl of Middleton.—I have had the favour of a sight of the Prince of Orange's letter to the Emperor brought hither by Mr. Hopp, Envoyé Extraordinary to this Court. Its preamble is the King of England's engagements with France contrary to the interests of the empire and Christendom, the body of it, that he does not design to act anything either against the King's personal government, or against the Prince of Wales, the just succession, and that he has himself [at present] no just pretences to the Crown. . . . would make rather a friendly than [] visit into England to engage that no [] and the King to put themselves upon such a foot as shall securely proceed so far as to repress the insolence and injustice of France; that he would not disturb the Catholics in England either in their persons or free exercise of their religion, but would have the Protestant religion secured so far that their adversaries should never be in a condition to offer violence to it; and that these were the utmost of his design he protests before God and the Emperor. If a man was to rob a house he would never tell the people within whose doors were shut that he designs to rob them and take away their money or lives, but only would enter to keep himself warm or to find out some fellow h— that had done him mischief, &c.—[This] my lord, with a great deal more than I can say or think upon the subject, Card. Bonoisi was pleased yesterday to represent to his Imperial Majesty, who received it with a great deal of passionate concern, and said as the beginning of the enterprise was set in his knowledge, so he owes the success to the attainment of power, and as the Card. was pleased to wait upon the Emperor upon my solicitation, and so he bids him tell me he would do anything for the safety of the King and the Prince that could in his circumstances be required.

1688, Nov. 28th, Vienne. The Earl of Carlinford to the Earl of Middleton.—I have had a pretty constant account of what passed in Holland in relation to their preparations for the invasion of England, and of their declarations and libels for the promotion of that affair, which I have not failed to represent to the ministers here as the thing deserves, and to shew the contradictions there are betwixt the public pretences they give out at this Court and in other places, and those they in these papers design to communicate to their friends and partisans, especially since I have the declaration of the Prince of Orange in my hand in which the Prince of Wales his birth is so scandalously questioned that it must be put to the judgment of his own Parliament; this does astonish and strike with horror all indifferent men, so that the most considerable here express a just sense of the just consequences such violent proceedings may have, and are too good natured to blame more than the Emperor himself; but was he willing he cannot in this exigency assist us: the most conclude here that the preservation of Holland is necessary for the conservation of the empire, and therefore tho' they do not love these undertakings, they will not disoblige them, but as to the present proceedings within the kingdom of England I am as much a stranger to as a man can be that has not received a letter thence for above a month. The Marquis de Albaville is always in such haste that he has not time to inform me here of what he receives from you, so that all I can do here is only in general to represent that I do not question the King when at liberty will most readily do all things the treaties oblige him unto, and that he will not encourage an unjust violation or infraction of a truce in any potent neighbour; had I any particular instructions as to these points it might prove much more satisfactory. . . .

1688, Oct. 28, 31; Nov. 14 (2), 21, 25 (2).

1688, Nov. 25. One of the letters of this date is indorsed by the Marquis de Albaville: "This is a copy of the Marquis of Luzingnem, the K. of France his Envoyé Extraordinary at Vienna, to Count d'Avaux, which I think fit the King should see." Tempest's note adds that the Marquis d'Avaux was at the Hague—Luzingnem says that he has received a print containing the resolution of the States General on the present affairs of England.—That at Vienna they began to despair that the design of the Prince of Orange could succeed that winter, but d'Avaux tells that he would try once more if the winds were favourable; and Luzingnem hopes that God, in spite of the prayers of the Protestant churches, will not be more favourable to such pernicious designs. "I am assured that some days ago the secretary of the English Envoy, in the absence of my Lord Carlingford, who has gone to Inspruck to see his brother, had delivered to the Emperor a letter on the part of the King his master, by which he notified to him that it was with great grief that he learned on all sides the King of France's infractions of the truce which he (the Emperor) had guaranteed on attaining the empire; and that he would use his good office with the King to engage him to desist from his enterprises and observe the Treaty of truce, and that if his remonstrances were ineffectual he would wish to join his forces to those of the empire to compel him; but that the pernicious designs of the Prince of Orange against his own safety obliged him to look after his own private interests; and he even begged the Emperor that in such a conjuncture he would assist him and send to the States General a person of confidence, who might dissuade them from assisting the P. of Orange with all their forces. The same secretary had also orders to solicit the Nuncio and the Ambassador of Spain to back his request to the Emperor: but they both answered that it was now too late, and that the Prince was too far advanced in his enterprise and so it would be useless to send any more."

(The news in these advices is nearly all about the Turks and Turks.)

Ratisbon.

1688, Dec. 24. Ratisbon.—(Sir) Geo. Etherege to Lord Preston. "The Majesty has been so shamefully betrayed at home that our nation has justly lost the little reputation it had recovered, honour and honesty are looked upon by foreigners to be no more of the growth of our unhappy Island. A Parliament is called I hear. I wish it could be such a one as would sincerely labour to establish a healing peace among us by having a due regard to his Majesty's prerogative, as well as to the privilege of the subject. I must confess the greatest good I expect from it is, that it will open the eyes of many well meaning men who have been grossly imposed upon."

1688, Dec. 24. Ratisbon.—(Sir) George Etherege to Mr. Tempest.—"While things go so ill in England I imagine you are not very curious to know what passes in the empire . . . I have received your letter of the 4th instant, which is so obliging that I am impatient to be personally acquainted with you . . .

1688, Jan. 28th. (Sir) George Etherege to Lord Preston (L.S.). On Saturday last a certain paper came to my hands which I find was read a day or two before in the hall, of re et correlatione to most of the members of the Diet, by Danckleman, the Elector of Brandenburg's deputy. I send it to your lordship translated into French. I believe you will be very much surprised at the insolence of this deputy, who durst publish in so august an assembly so infamous a libel against his Majesty. To vex me the more, I cannot prudently at this time take so much notice of it as I should, but must wait for a more favourable conjuncture. In the meantime all I can do is to expose the weakness and deceitfulness of his arguments in such places as are proper. The States of Holland and the Protestant Princes who are engaged in the Prince of Orange's design, recollecting themselves that a war begun by them on the account of religion may be of dangerous consequence, should it be taken notice of by the Roman Catholic Princes before they have proceeded so far as to fix the foundation of that vast building which seems to be projected by them, have ordered their ministers, especially those who are employed in the empire, to insinuate and declare that the invasion of our country by the Prince of Orange is not so much to establish the affairs of the church as to regulate the affairs of State, in order to lessen the greatness of France, and is purely grounded on a politic interest. They hope with this to amuse the Roman Catholics, while they carry on their own business; but to make this theme take, the Prince of Orange should have made another manifest. I wish all our countrymen who are misled by an apprehension that their religion is in danger were well informed of these practises, that they may be no longer cheated by any tinsel-pretexts. The foolish and impudent author of the inclosed is so confident of the success of his party that he already places the Prince of Orange on the throne, regulating the affairs of England. The house of Austria can do nothing without the help of this Almanzor; he will do them justice against the French, and fight for all the Princes who will favour his ambition; no wonder, since it is to make way for so general a blessing that his Majesty is unjustly attacked under the name of evil counsellors, and the Prince of Wales presumed to be supposed. Notwithstanding the pains he takes to dissemble, he is not able to hold out to the end of the chapter, his praising a notable pamphlet called L'Europe Esclavée si l'Angleterre ne rompt ses fers, which was written by the same foolish zealot who made Le Croisade des Protestants ou prière sur l'institution des Chevaliers de St. Paul, discovers what his principles are at bottom.

ADDITIONAL MANUSCRIPTS OF SIR ALEXANDER
MALET BART.

SIR
A. MALET
BART.

An account of the greater number of Sir A. Malet's manuscripts is at p. 308, of the Appendix to the Fifth Report of this Commission. Some others having been brought by Sir Alexander from his country seat, he very obligingly laid them before me.

Among them is a very good 16th century copy of the "Tree of Commonwealth," written by the notorious Edmund Dudley:—A copy of Henry the 8th's letter indicating the mode by which his title as head of the church should be made known, and directing erasure of prayers where the Pope's name was used.—Latin notes of the controversy between Bucer and Alasco on the important subject of ecclesiastical vestments.—Law treatises by the celebrated Serjeant Dodridge.—A French treatise on the Spanish Monarchy, and an English treatise on the independence of Scotland.—Copies of a letter by Beza, and of some letters between the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of St. Andrews (temp. Eliz.), and curious information about the latter.—Narrative of the proceedings of the Scotch Lords who followed King James to Stirling in 1585.—Account of the conference between King James and James Gibson (a minister of the Church) in the same year; and a singular account of disgraceful proceedings before the King in a church where he had requested a prayer to be offered for his mother just before her death.

There is a copy of a long apology by James Maitland for the conduct of his father, the celebrated William Maitland of Lethington, directed against the equally celebrated Leslie, bishop of Ross; it contains a list of all the works composed by the Bishop so far as known to the writer.—Several papers on Ecclesiastical Law.—Copy of a law case regarding customary descent in the Island of Sark; and of another law case about forfeiture of land on marrying without consent. Archbishop Laud's zeal in the cause of learning, and his munificence in giving manuscripts to Oxford are well known: here is a copy of his letter to the University on the occasion of a gift of MSS.—There are two petitions which are very noticeable; one because of the great age of the petitioner, more than 98 years; the other because of the inhuman ferocity shewn to a son by a father, that father being a justice of the Court of Common Pleas.—William Noy had the honour of suggesting the revival of ship money; and here is a wordy and rather obscure letter by him on the subject directed to Sir John Coke.—An account in French of the descent on the Island of Rhé.—A printed broadside addressed to Oliver Cromwell styling him Emperor of the Western Isles; and some interesting papers by Dr. George Harbin on Charles I., Archbishop Laud, Clarendon's History, and Queen Anne's right to the Crown.—Also extracts from Bishop Turner's memoir of the events of November and December 1688.

A folio of the 16th century begins—

This boke named the tre of comon welthe was by Edmond Dudley, esquier, late counsellor to King Henry the vith, the same Edmond at the compiling hereof being prisoner in the Tower in the furst yere of the reigne of King Henry theight. Theffect of this treatise consisteth in thre special points, that is to say, furst in the remembrance of God and of the faith of his holy church with the which thinge every christian prince hath nede to begynne. Secondly, of some condicions and demeanours necessarie in every Prince both for his honour and for the suertie of his contynewance. Thirdly, of the tree of Commonwelth, which togeth people of every degre. Of the condicion and demeanour which thei should be of. (37 leaves perfect.) It supplies lacunæ in, and a little (verbally) varies from, the printed copy.* There is a MS. of the same No. 2204, Harl. MS. See Biographia Britannica. See also Strype's life of Stow.

4 pp. the end wanting.—The King (Henry 8th) to , reciting that he had abated the usurpation of the Bishop of Rome, and united to the Crown Imperial of his realm "the title, dignitie and style of supreme " hede immediately under God in erthe of the Church " of Englonde," which the bishops and clergy have approved by oath and writing under signs and seals.—Tells them that considering it would be beneficial if the bishops and clergy would preach against Rome, he has sent letters to the Bishop of the diocese "in part " whereof ye be our Justices" to teach and preach on Sundays and other feast days the word of God, and that the said title belongs to the Crown, and to give warning to all abbots, &c. to do the like, and to command all schoolmasters to teach the same to the children, and cause all prayers, &c. wherein the Bishop of Rome is named, to be erased. Ends "diligence whatsoever shall " be in your powers." [See No. xxxii. of Collection of Records, &c., Vol. 3 of Burnet's History of the Reformation.

p. 80. Ends, And as touching the former, namely, the multiplicity and abundance of words, the Statute of the Dissolution of Monasteries made in 31. Hen. VIII., may yield us a perfect type. (It is of ambiguities and amphibologies and special interpretations.)

1676, Feb. 15th.—The Duke of Buckingham's speech in the House of Lords.—Begins, I have often troubled your Lordships with my discourse in the House. (19 pp. and 2 lines.)—He moves the King to give us a new Parliament.

Extracts from Journals of the House of Lords of the 15th and 16th of June.—Motion to attack the Duke of Buckingham.—Then they considered the offence of the Earl of Salisbury, and my Lord Chancellor's speech to him, and his speech to Lord Wharton. (16 pp.)

Saturday, 17th Feb. Ends with the Duke of Buckingham's committal to the Tower.

Discours "de Regno Hispaniæ," (French, 17½ pp.) Begins, La Monarchie d'Espagne qui avec un cours de perpetuelle prosperite. . . . Ends, Disposition plus propres quelles se voyent a present pour en espérer les effects. (Temp. James I. The writer says, the Palatine had 7 children, and was an obstinate puritan.—It is written in favour of an alliance between France and England and other Princes to recover the Palatinate.)

(23½ pp.) That the Crown of Scotland was not subject to England. Begins, Some English historians, lawyers, and heralds do too frequently abuse the world. Ends, to serve ourselves against the invasions of old friends. (It is indorsed by Harbin.)

The following are all finely written fair copies:—

1580, March 16th, Geneva.—Beza, his epistle to Mr. James Howson. Begins, Beasti me literis tuis egrotanti redditus (2½ pp. large folio). He is grieved to hear that the contest about pseudo episcopacy continued.—Has finished his book called Iconas, dedicated to the Queen.—He sends a copy less elegantly bound than hers to George, Earl Mareschal of Scotland, and desires the approbation of Buchanan and D. Junius.—Ends, Vale vir eximie et observande frater.

Propositiones Ministrorum Scotiæ, serenissimo Regi oblatae (1½ p.). Begins, Princeps civilia curat negotia cæterum Magistratui in Ecclesiam ejusque ordinem nullum jus est.—These are followed by 1½ pages of categorical replies, all in Latin.

n. d. To my Lord's Grace of Canterbury, A. Archbishop of St. Andrews (½ p. Latin). The Archbishop of Canterbury's chaplain tells me that he (Canterbury) cannot confer on the articles which he sent without St. Andrews gets the Queen's permission. He regrets they should have got to Walsingham's hands, and he does not know how they became ventilated.

1583, Jan. 4th, Lambeth.—Jo. [Archbishop of] Canterbury to the Archbishop of St. Andrews. (Latin ¼ p.) He himself gave the articles to the Treasurer. He has told Walsingham what the Archbishop of St. Andrews asks. Thinks Walsingham will keep the copy. He (Canterbury) keeps the articles which St. Andrews sent. If he can get the Queen's permission to discuss them he will write about them.

SIR

SIR
A. MALET,
3 ART.

n. d. London. Patrick Sanct. [Andrew] Episcopus to the Archbishop of Canterbury (Latin 1 p.). They have sent the articles into Scotland to inflame the faction. —He has written to Beza at length, and the Geneva pastors, and has advised them to peace. He has been accused of wishing to restore papacy, so he must preach four or five sermons declaring his faith.

1584, 10 Cal. April, London.—John Colville a Scot to T. Beza.—(Latin 3 p.).—While he was in exile in England the Archbishop of St. Andrews came from Scotland and pretended he was sick and was going to Lorraine to the waters, and stopped in England 3 months, and endeavoured the ruin of the church: and endeavoured to alienate from them Queen Elizabeth and her councillors, to whom he affirmed that we were factious. St. Andrews had daily feasts and conversations with the Ambassadors of France and Scotland, not without suspicion of wickedness.—As to the state of the kingdom, into the Scotch Parliament have got a lot of turn coats, almost all papists or atheists, or at least sworn friends of Mary the Queen Mother and the Guises; they strive to upset religion, but dare not declare open war, but use calumny so that some of the writer's friends and our true professors of the faith are prisoners or bails.—Accuses "our bishop" of using the services of a poisoner (venefica), and accusing the ministers of treason, so he was cited by the Synod, but would not appear. To avoid excommunication he (the Bishop) got an embassy, and the King befriended him.—Goes into the doings after Darnley's death.—Leaves the theological part to Melvin, then in exile in England.

1584, Jan. 10th, Holyrood House.—To the Archbishop of Canterbury (English 1½ p.). Says that he wants advice which he will impart to his master and sovereign.

1584, June 16th, St. Andrews. Patrick Archbishop of St. Andrews to the Archbishop of Canterbury. (English.)—On his return to Scotland the King held his Parliament, when he restored the estate of the Bishops.—If the Queen had employed him further he might have been of more use.—Ecclesiastical matters.

1585, Jan. 16th, Leith.—Andro Hunter to Mr. Carmichael . . . Masses are said at Dumfries in the chapel of Glen. Great is the resort of the inhabitants of that town thereto. Lords Maxwell and Herries with many of their friends which be there in proper person. There is four mass priests besides the Abbot of New Abbey, two of them are Englishmen and two Scotchmen. You remember one Hault who escaped out of the Castle of Edinburgh. You have heard of Aure, the old Abbot of Dumferline's son, but he changes his name. And there is one Alex Makquharrie.—Comfort the brethren of England . . . I have not met with Mr. Andro Melvell, nor Mr. James. My hearty commendation to Mr. Feild, Dr. Pennie, the good neighbours on the Brigg, Mr. Claybroyg, Mr. Shotten.

The Platform of the Church of Scotland.—At Holyrood House, 17th Feb. 1585.—About bishops, assemblies, jurisdiction, (2 pp.).

The narrative of the proceedings of the nobility of Scotland against the oppressions of religion and laws of that land, and abusers of the King's Majesty's ears and person. The Earls of Anguise, Mare, Bothuel, &c., Lords Hamilton, Maxwell, Humme, Herese, Cambusskenneth, Dryborough, Baislay, Coudingham, &c., Lord of Cefurd, Dumlanrigge, Coldingknowes, Wedderburne, and others. About 2000 or thereabouts came to St. Ninian's chapel, about a mile from Stirling, on the 1st of Nov. 1585. On the morrow, after some resistance, they entered. The Earls of Crauford, Montrose, Rothnes, Glencarne, Arroll, and the Col. fled to the Castle.—There was a parley. The nobility sent their demands, and the King sent answers. (2 pp.).

The proclamation published by the nobility of Scotland, containing the cause of their repairing to the Castle of Stirling to the King's Majesty the 2nd Nov. 1585. (1 pp.).

The conference and reasoning between the King and James Gibson, minister at Penatland, 21st Dec. 1585, at Linlithgo before the secret Council (4 pp.).—It is written by way of question and answer between the King and Gibson. Inter alia he preached a sermon, and said his persecutors were Capt. James Stuard, Col. Stuard, William Stuard, and Lady Jesabel.—(The King admitted that Capt. J. Stuard was not good.)—At the end Gibson subscribed the King's articles.

The King asked if Gibson was at a Castle of Dunheath. Yes was the answer.—The King: I trow you were in it then as John Knoles went into the Castle of St. Andrews when the Cardinal was sticked.—Gibson—You speak contemptuously of that man of God. So it was concluded either I should be carried to the strait ward in the Castle of Edinburgh.—When I had subscribed "James Gibson, Minister of God's word."—In disdain of that the King said—It is the style you take all of you.

The order and accidents of the Synod Ecclesiastical at Edinburgh 10th May 1586. (2 pp.).—The first, second, and third duly sent in a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury by Richard Fletcher.

Certain articles reasoned and concluded by a General Assembly touching the policy and discipline of the Church. The King's Commissioners being present at Edinburgh from the 10th to the 21st of May thereof, to pass in laws in times to come.—14 articles.—First, the whole realm divided into 52 Presbyteries. (1½ pp.).

1586. Narrative of him who was an eye witness of the same. In Feb. 1586 the King ordered the Minister of Edinburgh to have a general prayer for his mother "that it would please God to deliver her from the present danger, or at least to turn her heart and take her to his mercy."—They declined, because she was all her life an enemy of the Gospel.—The King called John Acarons, who ordinarily read the prayers before the sermon, and he said he could not, because Mary had often told him not to pray for her. The King then appointed the Archbishop of St. Andrews to serve on a Sunday, and went to St. Giles with his nobility and Council: the King was in his gallery.—The Archbishop found the pulpit occupied. The King called on the occupant, by name, Mr. John Cowper, I have appointed another for that place and therefore avoid the place.—Cowper refused, saying he was appointed of God. He then began to menace and threaten the King.—There arose a wonderful cry in the church, chiefly by the women. They rose from their stools and cried to the King, Oh! God, what is this? The King retired and consulted. The Archbishop was put into the pulpit by the guards and preached. During the sermon there was a great noise, the King's horses in the bread market having kicked down some of the bakers' stands. The church doors were shut, and the Archbishop was alarmed. He prayed for the Queen according to command. He kept close to the King's heels, afraid of being stoned. The following Friday the King made Mr. Wallis Magumkel preach; and at the end of the sermon the King made a speech to the congregation from his gallery.

Folio of 74 leaves.—1616, April 11, Antwerp.—An apology for William Maitland of Ledington against the lies and calumnies of Jhone Leslie, Bishop of Ross, George Buchanan, and William Camden as authors, inventors, and surmisers, and divers others as followers of those for the most part strangers of divers nations, and believing, or seeming to believe, some of the foresaid authors as oracles in truth so far as they writ of Scotch affairs, or the Scotch historie specially mentioning of the said William Maitland. Written by his only son James Maitland. Begin. It is wele known and manifest to all that knowes me that since the death of my father 1573. Ends. The Queen of England being altogether unwilling to graunt to our Queen in proper person [] als litle desyrous or willing to graunt to Her Majesty's neighbour againe her rebels in Scotland, and being formerly resolved no way to permit. atel. (The author is here taking up the Queen of Scotland in captivity at Bolton Castle.)

I do not know whether this defense has been printed. I have extracted the account which the author gives of the writings of John Leslie, Bishop of Ross.

herbert and others following him in these 5 points touched are not warrantable, and that a layman both in these two and in other ecclesiastical causes (as always heretofore hath been used, and as by the laws ecclesiastical being not repugnant to the laws and statutes of this realm is prescribed) may be cited to answer or to testify upon his oath before an Ecclesiastical Judge, notwithstanding the said president of a writ of prohibition, which is proved, we hope, to carry no such meaning as is enforced, but such as is meet that all Ecclesiastical Courts should still use and observe.

Endorsed 1632, March 1st. An opinion concerning a war with France. (Latin, 16½ pp.)

Beginis, Cum tot tantique in Hispaniarum regnis atque provinciis inveniantur peritissimae prudentissimi doctores miror quod sit quod mihi V. Majestas tanti ponderis materias atque negotium commiserit. (It is addressed to the grandson of Philip the Second).—It seems to be the opinion (in answer to a request for it) on the question what the King ought to do for the defense, propagation, and extension of the Catholic religion. He ends by saying that the King should remain in peace with all Catholic powers always, but should not hesitate to fight them in defence of the faith.—It is stuffed full of quotations from the Bible, the fathers, and the classics.

A law case in English between Capt. Fautrons and Symmons. Queen Elizabeth, seised of the Isle of Sark, in the seventh year of her reign, granted it to Helier de Carterett and his heirs.—Carterett grants 2 or 300 acres to Helier Goslin in fee; Goslin conveys it to one John Vatrej in fee, who dies leaving three sons, John the Appellant, Cardine and Joseph, and two daughters Jeane and Bertran. Cardine hath issue Elizabeth who was married to Thomas Symons the defendant.—John entered as heir at common law to John the father; Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Cardine, claims her father's part of these lands, whereof John the grandfather died seised, or pretended to be descended to him, and from him to her, by the custom of the Isle.—They deny the custom in the Isle of Sark.—No one witness to prove the fact.—The point is whether by law the elder brother is heir, or all the children.—This is the argument, there is no judgment. (19 pp.)

22 Car. II. The great case between Charles Fry and Ann his wife v. George Porter, that there shall be no relief in equity against the forfeiture of land limited over by devise on marrying without consent, &c.—Gives many particulars concerning equity.

The case was, Mountjoy, Earl of Newport, now of Newport House in Middlesex, had two daughters; Elizabeth married the Earl of Banbury with her father's consent, who had issue A. the plaintiff, and Ann married to Mr. Porter without her father's consent, who had issue D. Both daughters died.—The Earl devised the land to his wife for life, the remainder to Ann in tail if she married with the consent of his wife, and the Earls of Warwick and Manchester. If without consent, or if she died without issue, to George Porter the defendant.—Ann married Charles the plaintiff without consent and without notice.—It was decided by Lord Keeper Bridgman, with the assistance of Kelyng the Chief Justice, Maynard and Bridgman, &c.—No relief.

1640, Nov. 6th, Lambeth. Copy of Laud's letter to the University of Oxford sending MSS. and giving the number and quality of them.—He says they are few, but like to the former, if not equal.—Among them are 6 Hebrew, 11 Greek, 34 Arabic, 27 Latin, 2 Italian, 2 English, 5 Persian, and one other, being large, contains the history from the beginning of the world to the end of the Saracen Empire.

Petition on parchment to Queen Elizabeth of John Willoughbie, doctor of physic, æt. 98 years and more, for services to her grandfather and father on this side of the sea and beyond; as also to Edward VI. and herself when infants.—He had spiritual promotion, but in Queen Mary's reign was despoiled because he married.—Asks for a lease or reversion of the manor and rectory of Hampesthwaite with the appurtenances for 60 years, co. York, of the yearly value of 25l.

Petition on vellum to the Queen, of Thomas Colepeper, late of Aylesford, co. Kent, gent, who, in Queen Mary's time, falling into the company of Sir Thomas Wyatt, was attainted of high treason.—He obtained pardon, but having forfeited all his lands, &c. he was forced to make further suit to Queen Mary to be restored, which was granted to him and others, so that they should pay fines to Commissioners. By misinformation he was set at 1,200 marks, which was more than his lands were worth. He has paid much.—Asks her to acquit him and his sureties of the balance.

Petition on vellum of George Browne to the Lord Protector (Somerset). He was son and heir to Sir Umfrey Browne, Knight, one of the King's Justices of the Common Pleas.—He complains of his father keeping him out of lands descended from his dead mother, who died in child-bed of him.—As soon as he attained 21 his father called him home to speak to him up into his chamber, and wanted him to seal a deed; he wished to read it but was denied; he refused to seal. His father drew his dagger, and so frightened him, that he put his seal.—Asks for relief.—(The Protector sent a letter.) Since his (the Protector's) going into Scotland his father sent to Chelmsford, where the petitioner's son and heir was at school, and took him away, whereupon the petitioner sends his wife and servants to demand the child. This was refused, and the petitioner's father commanded his servants to shoot at petitioner's poor wife and servants with bows and arrows to kill them. He took the servants and sent them to gaol at Colchester.

THE MANUSCRIPTS OF SIR HARRY VERNEY, BART., AT CLAYDON HOUSE, CO. BUCKS.

SIR
H. VERNEY,
BART.

The collection consists of a great number of deeds, wills, charters, and papers of all kinds, one of the earliest being a charter by Richard, Earl of Cornwall, in 1256, concerning the estate of Penley, which afterwards belonged to the first Sir Ralph Verney. Some curious records and documents of the Abbey of Abingdon (part of whose estates came into the hands of the Verneys) are here and are still unpublished.

The number of private letters is unusually large, amounting to many thousands between 1630 and 1699, besides a very large number in the next century; they have been preserved and marked by Sir Ralph Verney, M.P. for Aylesbury in 1636–1643, and for Buckingham in 1680, 1685, and 1689, and his son Sir John Verney. The late Mr. Bruce edited Sir Ralph's Notes, taken in pencil during the sitting of the Long Parliament, which include the record of the King's attempt to seize the five members; and in 1853 he edited the Verney Papers; both for the Camden Society. He was preparing to proceed with his history of the family at the time of his lamented death. He begins with wills, deeds, &c. relating to Sir Ralph Verney, Lord Mayor of London in 1465, and afterwards member of Parliament, who was knighted by Edward IV. for his loyalty to the White Rose. The history goes down in 1639, when we find Sir Edmund Verney, Knight Marshal and standard bearer to King Charles I., much distressed at the course which events were taking. He is described by Clarendon as "a man of great courage and generally beloved," that "he did not like the quarrel and heartily wished that the King would yield and consent to what was desired. He had, however, eaten the King's bread and served him near 30 years, and would not do so base a thing as to forsake him, and chose rather to lose his life." About two months after this conversation which took place at Nottingham, after the raising of the standard, he died fighting at Edge Hill, where, it is told in the letters, "he would not put on arms or a buff coat." His son, Sir Ralph, whose sympathies were all on the side of the Parliament until 1643, was on the most friendly and intimate terms with his father: their letters to each other are very numerous and on all subjects, and on one occasion when Sir Edmund seems to have been distressed and troubled by some steps in his son's political course, their common friend, Lady Sussex, interfered to make peace. She was Eleanor Wortley, who first married Sir Henry Lee, of Ditchley, and then, in succession, the Earl of Sussex, Warwick, and Manchester. Her letters are very amusing.

Two of the standard bearer's sons, Henry and Edmund, were officers in the King's army, and in 1642 are letters of rebuke from them to Sir Ralph for his political conduct. Col. Henry Verney's letters from the Low Countries and different parts of England are often interesting; in one he mentions the taking of the King's cabinet at Naseby. Edmund became Lieutenant-Governor of Chester, and was slain at Drogheda three days after quarter was given him. Another son, Tom, was a wild scapgrace, who was sent off to the Barbadoes, but soon returned penniless. He seems to have joined the King's army, and was more than once a prisoner. He is always soliciting money from Sir Ralph.

In the years 1640, 1641, and 1642 are many interesting letters from Sir John Leake, halfbrother to Sir Edmund Verney, showing the miserable state of Ireland and of the English troops who could not get their pay and were half starved.

In the latter end of 1643 Sir Ralph Verney, having refused to take the Covenant, voluntarily exiled himself; he lived many years at Rouen, and then at Blois, but made long journeys into Italy and elsewhere; letters for him are addressed to Ralph Smith. Before leaving England he got a protection for his house at Claydon, and shortly after his departure the King gave a certificate that he had left the kingdom with his license, and that no person was to interfere with his rents; but in 1644 the Parliament sequestered the estates, and in 1644 the place was much harassed with soldiers. In 1647 the sequestration seems to have been removed. During this time his friend Sir Roger Burgoyne, who had taken the Covenant and remained in London, kept up an active correspondence with him on public and private affairs; as did also his mother's brother, Sir Alexander Denton, of Hillesdon, who married a Hampden. In December 1644, he mentions a report that the Queen of Sweden had intercepted some letters of the English Queen, and transmitted them to the Parliament. Dr. William Denton, brother-in-law to Sir Edmund, and physician to the King, was also an active correspondent, and his letters, which are interesting, have been largely drawn upon.

In 1653, Sir Ralph returned to England, as on the 16th of December in that year he gave an account of the House of Commons on the 12th of that month resigning their authority to Oliver Cromwell at Whitehall.

In the beginning of 1660, Sir Roger Burgoyne comments on Monk's ambiguous conduct, and gives an account of proceedings in the House of Commons.

In April 1662 the Duke of York's marriage is mentioned, and in October the sale of Dunkirk, and in November the creation of James Crofts to be Duke of Buccleuch and Monmouth, and a plot, by Ludlow and others, against the King. In 1675 in an account of the weavers' riots in London, and of a duel in a theatre where Sir T. Armstrong killed Mr. Scrope. In 1676, it is told how the King supped with the jockeys at Newmarket, and in December he is said to knighted William Chiffinch, whose name will be recollected as occurring in one of Sir Walter Scott's novels. In 1677, is a notice of the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Shaftsbury and Salisbury, and Lord Wharton being sent to the Tower; and of Sir John Shaw's intention to sue the town of Golchester for his wages as their burgess in Parliament; and there is a letter by Lord Wharton to Sir Ralph Verney (dated from Woburn) asking Verney's influence with the Lord Keeper to get his total release:

Accounts of other duels and highway robberies are numerous.

1678, the King dined with Sir Geo. Jefferies at his house in Buckinghamshire, and drank to him seven times. Some of the letters deal with Oates' Plot.

In 1679 Sir John Verney (Sir Ralph's second son) afterwards created Viscount Fermanagh, notices an order by the Lord Mayor forbidding the crying of news books in the street. There is an account of the trial of the five priests (in Oates' Plot); a notice of the rebellion in Scotland; of a duel in which Otway the poet, was a principal; and of how Nell Gwyn interceded for the Duke of Monmouth.

In 1683 it is said that a place for bull fighting in Westminster was being prepared.

In 1684 Dr. Barebones took a lease from Gray's Inn, of land in Gray's Inn Fields, for the purpose of building; this displeased the Gray's Inn gentlemen and there was a riot.

When James the Second's son was only 11 days old his portrait is mentioned as taken by Kneller.

Dr. Denton's letters give an account of Monk's conduct in 1660, and of a variety of public affairs; a particular account of the death of the Duchess of York in 1671, and of the building of a Greek church in St. Giles' Fields in 1677.

The letters of Dr. Henry Paman give interesting accounts of the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Commission in 1686 against the Bishop of London, and of the King's proceedings against the universities.

Sir John Verney (son of Sir Ralph) married a daughter of Ralph Palmer, of Little Chelsea, and the Middle Temple. From one of Palmer's letters it seems that he had soldiers quartered in his house at Chelsea. In 1706 he mentions that he had been hunting with the Queen's hounds on Putney Heath. He twice mentions Dr. Garth. Palmer's letters (1685-1716) give town and court news.

Several letters from the Countess of Sussex.

1640. A letter from W. Alton, with certificate on parchment, from the town of Bucks, of what has been done upon the poll money as well upon the Act as upon the order of review of the same—charge and discharge, 155l. 9s. 2d. (The town and parish consisting of the ancient borough and five other hamlets, viz., Borton, Bortonhold, Lethenborowe, Gawcott, and the Prebend End.)

1639, Jan. 28. Edmund Verney, at the Hague, to his brother Mr. Ralphe Verney (no address given).—English news.—(In July he was at Grimeston.) Other letters by him.

Letters from Henry Verney; one from Breda.

1640, July.—The Countess of Sussex to "Swite Mr. Verney." She does not like her portrait, the face is so big and so fat that it pleases her not at all, it looks like one of the winds puffing—"but truly I think it is like the original. If ever I come to London before Sir Vandicke go, I will get him to mend my picture, for 'tho' I be ill-favoured I think that makes me worse than I am."

1640, last of July, London.—Strafford to Sir E. Osburn, vice-president of his Majesty's Council of the North and the rest of the deputy lieutenants.—After &c., being this afternoon at the council board. (About a petition from the gentlemen of Yorkshire). (1½ p.)

1640, Aug. 31, Bath. Ralph Verney to the Countess of Sussex.—He says his father is not well, he fears the worst, and hopes the best.

1640, Sept. 10, York. Edmund Verney to R. Verney.—When they came to Newcastle they were very busy; scarce three hours' rest in the twenty-four, all the time they stayed there, and since, no less hastily employed in running away:—they were beaten.—"This is certain, if Lesly had pursued his victory he had cut us all off.—We had neither cannon nor ammunition by us, but went on like sheep to the slaughter. My father is daily expected here."

1640, Sept. 25. Camp near York. The same to the same.—The King doth so much sympathize with the Lords, that he tells them if they will have him disband his army he will do it, but they unanimously said No; but yet I fear two months is the longest. All the news that I can learn I have written in my father's letter.—Grieves at the thought of disbanding.

1640. Henry Verney at Breda to . . .

1640, Oct. 15. Edmund Verney to R. Verney.—Camp near York.—I hear the Scots say they will do all things the English shall desire them; and, 'tis the best of their play, for the plague is so violent amongst them, that they are much weakened, and I am confident not able to stand against us; but for all that, state policy I dare say shall keep us in pay this two months, and so make us necessary evils to maintain your Parliament.

1640, Oct. 8. Warrant to Sir W. Uvedall, Treasurer-at-Warr, to pay Dr. William Denton for his entertainment as one of the physicians to the Lord General's train and person. The pay was 6 shillings and eight pence per day, from the 1st of September last, exclusive, to the 29th, inclusive.

1640, Oct. 9. Camp near York. Edmund Verney to R. Verney.—The Scots are unreasonable.—They ask 40,000l. for a month's longer treaty, but we have a company of noble lords that vow to pay them in leaden coyne. The Scotch lords come to treat with the King and ours on Monday next at York.

1640, Oct. 23. The same to the same.—Hopes that we shall fall together by the ears when the Lords are from us.—About Wednesday or Thursday the King takes his journey towards London, and a little before the army marches from York 20 or 30 miles more northward.

1640, Oct. 28. The same to the same. To-morrow morning I march from York towards Ripon.—The Lord Lieutenant is like to stay with us this fortnight—his garrison is Ripon.

1640, Dec. 10. The same to the same.—I have lately been at Newcastle, where Lastly used us but indifferent, for he bid me twice, or thrice, get about my business; but that was I did not stile him his Excellency, but indeed I found infinite civility from the Earl of Ancram's eldest son, the Earl of Lothian.

1640, Dec. 18. . . . to

Good cozen.—He hears that there is a charge preparing against him in the House of Commons.—Tells him to ask the House that the writer may wait upon them. (This relates to the Lord Keeper.—See Journals, 2, 55.)

1640, Dec. 4. The Park.—Sir John Leeke to Sir Edmund Verney. . . . I write this purposely to give you to understand of the petition and remonstrances

SIR
H. VERNEY,

our Lower House of Parliament exhibited to the now Deputy, and that they might be suffered to go into England a selected committee to make good the grievances, for we groan unsufferably under them. P.S. I received lately a most courteous and kind letter from my old mistress the Lady Mary Wrothe. She wrote me word that by my Lord of Pembroke's great mediation the King hath given her son a brave living in Ireland. We hear from good mouths that our Lord President must be removed, for which I am sorry heartily, for he is, and always hath been, my good and noble friend, yet if it please his Majesty to think him fit for other employment, I then wish with all my heart I had as good a friend in his place. It is worth 1,000*l.* per annum from the King, a troop of 50 horse and a company of foot, with some other duties and perquisites it may be worth 2,500*l.* per annum. I could wish you had it, if you could be content to part from the eyes of your master, or think this a better place than the marshal's; it is a thriving place, for our noble president doth thrive exceeding much. But if you shall not hold this a place for your content, then put to all your friends and power for honest Barrymore. Oh it were a blessing and a fortune unexpressible for that noble lord and his, then might he soon pay his debts, and make Castellyon flourish. Receive this from my dear mistress. Lastly from myself I have so much ambition that I do desire you were the Deputy. Examples have been that in Queen Elizabeth's time some of your rank and some of meaner condition as Sydney, Fitzwilliam, Parrott, Chichester, after a lord, and this Wandesford, lately dead. Let Sir Ed. Verney have some ambition either to be our governor or our kingdom's governor. I pray take this close to you as things not impossible. In the next place I have sent you the copy of the Irish Remonstrances.

Letters by the Countess of Sussex.

1640, Jan. 15. North Stainely near Ripon.—Edmund Verney to R. Verney.—This I will say for you of the Parliament, you are the worst paymaster I know.—Next Tuesday we have six weeks due to us, and unless there be some speedy course taken for the payment, you may well expect to hear that all our soldiers are in a mutiny to the ruin of the country, for they are notable sheep stealers already.

1640, Jan. 24. The same to the same.—Unless you send me a speedy supply, it is much doubted that all you wise heads can scarce keep our soldiers from a mutiny, and then woe be to the poor county of Yorkshire.

1640, March 8. The same to the same.—Unless money comes he believes the House of Commons will have a petition either to redress their grievances or cashier them.—He sends a ballad lately composed by one of the malcontents. (It is not here.)

R. Verney to Lord Barrymore.

A schedule of fees by prescription, received and taken in the prison of the Marshalsea.—Copy certified by John Strange.—Fee for every discharge, 5*l.* between the K. Marshal and other officers.—On commitment, 13*s.* 4*d.*, to the K. Marshall—other fees.

Letters from Henry Verney at the Hague.

1641, i.e., 1642, Feb. 10. He says that he is glad to hear that Edmund is gone captain to Ireland.

Lady Barrymore, at Castle Lynn, to (Edmund Verney.)

1641, March 29, Dublin. Edmund Verney to Sir R. Verney.—He complains of bad pay.—Your first vote was, I remember, that the soldier might be richly rewarded before any lands were disposed of, and is this the way to give them leave to have as good pennyworth as those extorting citizens and others who, I dare say, tremble to hear what our men daily do; for there are not more daring soldiers in Christendom than those we have.—We last Monday stormed the Castle of Carigmaine, and took it, where to be a common soldier (tho' the service were most desperate) expressed as much courage and resolution as could be expected from brave commanders, and why should not these men receive another kind of reward than their 8*d.* a day? (for the manner of the storming and Sir Simon Harcourt's death he refers to a letter to his father). If you adventure any money in land, let it be in Leinster or Munster.

1641, April 16. The same to the same.—He hears that lately Sir Henry Tichborne marched from Tredagh to Dundalk and took it, turned the rebels' three cannon on them and routed them.

1641, June 7. R. Verney to the Countess of Sussex.—His mother is dead.—Expenses of the soldiers. They are obliged to coin plate. Thinks it the very best thing to remove Bishops from the House of Peers; he conceives, if it be desired, we shall do our best endeavours to abolish them as the Scots have done.

1641. Letter from Henry Verney at the Hague.

1641, June 19. A memorandum of Col. Goringe, taken on the 19th of June, being an answer to five interrogatories. (About the bringing up the army). (3½ pp.)

Copy of a letter to Col. Goring.

1641, June 28, Greenwich.—G. (Duke of) Buckingham to Sir E. Verney, Kt.—Telling him he shall have in haste the lieutenancy of Whaddon Chase, and may take as much sport there as he pleases.

1641, July 2, York. Edmund Verney to Lady Verney and R. Verney). (2 letters.)

1641, July 7, Barbadoes.—R. Gregorie to Sir E. Verney.—Telling him about his son T. Verney's doings in Barbadoes, and sending a bill.

1641, Jan. 26. T. Verney at Gravesend.—He is about to start for Barbadoes.

1641, Sept. 24. E. Verney, at Claydon, to his brother Ralph; and other letters from Claydon.

1641, Oct. 17, Claydon.—E. Verney to R. Verney.—He is glad to hear of his going to London.—“I hope the main business is to provide us our money.—I pray do you stand stiffly for it, for otherwise you will have men of better quality follow the highway law than yet do, and for my part I can not think it robbery to arrest a parliament man there, hearing you have all engaged your words to us, which, by the rule of honesty, should be as firm as your hands, but, however, I am so partial in my affection to you that I have sent up my pistols to guard you, and directed them, &c.”

1641, Nov. 24, Fish Street.—Thomas Verney has come back; he borrowed money at Canterbury.

1641, Dec. 11, West Chester.—E. Verney to R. Verney.—I hear that Kit Roper with four more captains and their companies are cut off to 14 men as they were attempting to relieve Tredah. My colonel's regiment is much desired, and if we have a fair wind shall be there in four or five days.—He says that Lord Parson's son is home and has good intelligence; his friends think that Dublin will be besieged before we can get over. He thinks they will be obliged to send much greater forces to Ireland.—Urges that pay should be sent.

1641, Dec. 12. T. Verney.—He wants to return to Barbadoes.

1641, Dec. 18, West Chester. E. Verney to R. Verney.

1641, Jan. 4. A letter from H. Verney at Breda.

1641, Dec. 25, West Chester.—E. Verney to —The rebels are strong before Dublin.

1641.—Two other lists, dated Dec. 21 and Dec. 27th, with subscriptions and autograph signatures of each subscriber; upwards of 130*l.*

[1641?], Oct. 1, Yoghall. Sir John Leeke to Sir Edmund Verney. The other two letters gave you notice that the deputy hath brought into the King's power three counties, and they have submitted themselves to the King's mercy. It is conceived the King will take the fourth of each county. My Lord Clanricard hath most of his lands fallen into the King's mercy; a great plantation will be and excellent lands; my Lord Clanricard or his son or my Lord Wilmote can best instruct you: be quick for many gape after this plantation; these lands are in the province of Conawght, whereof my Lord Wilmote was governor many years. If you may, without hurt to yourself, speak a good word for me, I shall bless you. I have little hope of the sour deputy.

[1641?]. The same to the same.—The affrights and terrors we here live in cannot well be expressed, but by such as suffer and feel the distraction, whereof many are come for England that can relate it as eye witnesses, which you will hear of before this letter can come to your hands, as the noble Inceyquin and Mr. Jepson . . . Lady St. Leger and Lady Inceyquin and many children have left.—You may perceive by these great personages going away our danger I am most miserable for tho' I have friends, yet no friend to lend me 10*l.*; no man will part with a penny of money; I nor my wife have in purse 40*s.*; we have 20 good cows, which may have none to-morrow; such is the case of many men; I have barrelled beef and pork, and some little wheat and meal

H. VERNEY,

for a month; God help us, and send the English forces to us, our hearts would be light and our courages strong, for those English we have here have got good things about them and themselves, and their goods got into strong towns. The country is abandoned, and nothing left but their cattle and a servant or two in their house. I hold yet in the park, but on Monday or Tuesday I must to Yoghall, my wife is in that extremity of fears that I must not delay longer but leave the lodge, neither will I maintain the lodge with my life and what I have, &c.; my lord allows me nothing to it. P.S. Barrymore takes the field to-morrow with 60 dragoons and lancers. Broghall goeth to the rendezvous as strong if not stronger.

1644, Jan. 10, Yoghall. Sir John Leeke to Sir Edmund Verney— Clomell, the key of Munster is taken on Saturday last; Dungarvan and the castle is taken both by the treachery of the townsmen; Kilkenny ten days since was taken by the Lord Mont Garratt and his four sons and sons-in-law. My Lady Ormund and her children are in the castle and there imprisoned, Mountgarratt is in the castle with a force to secure the lady, but a false heart. I am now come to Yoghall with my company, where we are as secure as in any Irish town; God knows there is no security but where a good English garrison doth secure. The virtuous Lady Kilnalmechy hath commanded this letter, which she will deliver to you with her own hands; she can give our miseries to the life. My Lord of Broghall went before the town of Dungarvan, the next day it was surprised, with 60 horse and 50 foot, and took the praye of the town, which consisted of 120 cows and horse, and near 400 sheep, and carried them to Lismore, which was 8 miles. The present Monday, the 10th, my Lord Dungarvan intended to have met his brother at Dungarvan with 80 brave armed horse and 100 foot, but when 25 of his horse were ferried over, an express came to my Lord Dungarvan from my Lord President to command him into the field to join with him and Barrymore, which army will be near 400 brave horse, besides 1,200 foot, and some pieces of ordinances; Barrymore hath 60 Dragoons which hath done good service and execution; this army carryeth a brave resolution though but small in number, yet courageous and discreetly commanded; they fight for honour and their lands, all is at stake; there is not a country can hear of but the county of Corke but are in action; Oh! we sigh and grieve for the English forces, we believe they will come, but the kingdom will be so near losing, or at least destroying, that the regaining will cost more blood and charge than the first conquest did or all the wars in Queen Elizabeth's time. We hear this night that Dungarvan is fortified with 2 or 3,000 men, and as is noised, under command of my Lord of Ormund's only brother; the rebels are so strong between Dublin and us that the Earl of Ormund cannot come from Dublin where he is, either to succour his wife, his country, or chastise his brain-sick brother; his country is more infested than any of our parts. Three Lords of the Butlers are in action I do believe that whosoever shall live to this day twelvemonths shall see such a dearth and famine as hath seldom or hardly been known in Ireland; what cattle the rebels cannot come at, we are inforced to barrell up, for if the rebels take our cattle (which they have done in infinite number, both of fair sheep and goodly cattle as most in England), what they hath they kill with their skens and let them lie and stink. The first work they did was to rob all the English of their cattle, to starve them which cannot subsist of roots and oats as they do. To conclude, our state is lamentable, if we but look to what was, to what now is, and to what of certain must be. For my particular I know not what to do in the turmoils; cattle I have in the park, but how long I am not certain, yet we are in a safe place as long as Yoghall continues good. Monies are not to be had for anything unless arms, swords, and muskets, which are gold and silver, and friends too; friends for money are not; plate, household stuff are not marchantable . . . There are not any women of quality but are come to England, nor any that have wealth . . . The old Earl of Cork is full of distractions, not like the man he was; his sons are most noble, and you should hear brave things of their undertakings and performances I shall be loath to leave Ireland until the fire burns my heels. I beseech you send me a case of pistols and a close hilt sword. I have a desire (tho' I am old) not to be an idler; a word from a friend or yourself might gain me a company to be garrisoned in Yoghall. I believe it not very difficult, considering my Lord of Leicester is my noble friend, and this virtuous Lady Kilnalmechy my anchor to trust to, for so hath she offered and promised P.S. This Wednesday morning, the 12th, we have ill news; the rebels are within 4 miles of Lismore; my Lord Dungarvan sent out xxiii horse under the command of his cornet, Honest Jack Travers, who were by an ambush betrayed and himself slain, and 2 footmen; 500 were of the rebels well appointed.

1644, Jan. 10. Eleanor (Countess of) Sussex to (Sir Ralph Verney) These distracted times put us all in great disorders, but I hope we shall not be killed yet; I think you are in greater danger than we in the country. Your Parliament flies high, but truly it's a happy thing, I think, they have so much courage to stand to maintain their right; and the good town of London it seems will do so too; truly the act's to be commended; surely the King's party will be so weak, that he must yield to his Parliament If we now be overcome we are undone for ever. I hope those gentlemen the King would have from your house shall be safe; the stand is much for the general good, that it was a miserable thing if they should suffer It was a blessed thing those gentlemen was from the Parliament when the King came, he had ill-counsel surely to come in such a way.

1644, Jan. 11, Dublin. Edmund Verney to Sir R. Verney . . . There is a great grievance amongst us, which is that the Vice-Treasurer demands, and indeed stops, out of our pay 6d. in the pound from common soldiers and all; in the first northern journey we paid the 100th penny, and that was thought too much, and therefore the last year we paid nothing, but this is such an exaction that I dare say his place shall amount to 20,000l. yearly. He saith he has a patent for it . . . but it is now referred to the Parliament of England In your vote I hope you will do us right.

1644, Jan. 22. (Received.) The Countess of Sussex to Sir Ralph Verney . . . We have been at our designs to-day, and there was something read from your Parliament to have all the train-bands in readiness. They are all in great fear at St. Albans, and even here, they say, have brought arms and guns to defend them. I hope I shall be safe here tho' I have neither. It is ill news to hear there is a peace between Spain and France; sure they will come upon us and help Ireland. I pray God keep us from the misery that other nations have suffered by war.

1644, Received Jan. 29. The same to the same I pray God there may be agreement betwixt the King and his people, and that poor Ireland may have some help.

1644, Jan. 30. Printed form of exemption of Earl of Sussex from the payment of impost of certain wines for his Lordship's own expense in his household. Addressed to William Leachland, Esq., Mincing Lane.—Signed by the Earl of Manchester, Lord Saye and Seale, and E. Newburgh, and John Culpeper.

1644, Feb. 12, Dublin. Edmund Verney to Sir R. Verney. I pray do you and the rest of your brethren of the Parliament cast your eyes on soldiers' miseries, and send us some monies, for in earnest without it we cannot subsist, for the state of Ireland is now of that condition that he is held a rich man that can maintain himself. All the news that I could think of I have written to my father, where I know you may learn it; here is your old friend Sir James Dyllam who often remembers you.

1644, March 4, Dublin. The same to the same For the business at Swords, I was there myself, you were much misinformed in that relation; you mention 13 to be lost, besides Sir Lorenzo Cary, the rebels to be treble our number, and also intrenched, whereas we lost but 4 in all, and were double the enemy in number; neither had they any other intrenchments than a small work more like a garden ditch than a trench, which is like the rest of their soldiers which they have hitherto expressed to us. I believe they lost 100 at that time. Ireland is full of castles and truly strong ones, and thither the rebels fly, not daring to give us a meeting, altho' treble our number. I will not say but that the want of arms, ammunition, may be much the cause of it, but truly I do believe them to be of a very cowardly nature My colonel was last night sworn a Privy Councillor, and lives in mighty esteem here, and I think not without desert; it is wondered that ye have not yet settled him in his government of Dublin, or in some other place of as great honour and worth. I wonder to hear you say you have not yet heard of the vice-treasurer's demand, when I know my collonel informed the Parliament of it six weeks since. I pray let us know when ye intend to send us money, or whether ye intend to send any, that according to your resolutions we may serve you; this is an age when you have most need of us, and this time you choose most to abuse us, I'll assure you we scarce think it a forfeit of our honours even at this time to quit your service rather than to continue it on these conditions. I admire how you think we live; we have bellies to feed and backs to cloth as well as you; we want yet the hardiness to go naked, neither have we been bred like camelions to live on air; there is scarce a captain in the army, but what to his soldiers and his own necessary expenses, he is 40*l.* worse than he is worth, and believe me that which is worse than all this is, that the army cannot subsist without it; 'tis not here as it was in Yorkshire; here the inhabitants are neither willing nor able to lend, and it is sport to them to see us undone. Our soldiers have lived upon nothing this month but salt beef and herring, which is so unusual to our men that came last out of England, that of our 2,500 men, I believe we have 500 sick; then judge what will be the event if money come not speedily.

164½, March 4, Yoghall. Sir John Leeke to Sir Edmund Verney. I have sent four several letters to you and had good hope I should have [heard from you] by some of our new landed troops under the command of Sir Charles Vavisor, a noble gentleman, and who doth assure me he left you well he hath brought over 1,000 as brave carcasses of men as ever I beheld with my eyes, and would fain be in the field and fighting; they had well hoped that they should have fallen to pillaging the Irish of the town of Yoghall, and meeting with some Irish women that had mantles and crucifixes about their necks, which the soldiers tore from them, but by their commander were quieted; the priests are all stole out the town, and no mass said yesterday being Sunday; we expect this day or tomorrow, if the wind hold fair as it is, to see my Lord of Inciquine and Mr. Jepson here. The very noise of the landing the troops have blown away the rebels that lay near Yoghall; but about Lismore, where Browhall hath killed and hanged many, some loss he hath received, as a brave gentleman, his cornet, the rebels did use very cruelly before their departure by dragging a gentleman out of his house and binding his hands, laying him on a bank, and shot him to death; four poor English that were there they hanged, drawing them up to a hovel post and held them until they were dead, and this was done within Lismore precinct; the rebels were xj collors in one place and 8 or 9 in another, but they vanished in a moment to the mountains. Their general, the Lord Mount Garratt, is fallen from the Lord Roch and gone into his own country with 6,000 men; they when they were together marched by my Lord President's house, but did no offence, for the house was strongly fortified and some ordinance. They marched 4 miles farther to Mallo, Mr. Jepson's town, where were two castles. Mr. Jepson's house is very strong and well appointed, the other a small castle not bigger than an ordinary steeple, but 25 good men at least, and a stout commander; the rebels summoned the castle, but they were answered with musket bullets; in short they killed near 200 rebels and hurt many, at last powder failing they accepted quarter, and went to Mr. Jepson's castle; the English lost very few; the next day the rebels parted their army. Killnalmechy keeps his town of Bandon Bridge, where he doth brave things; he hath killed and hanged many, but this last week he fell most bravely on the enemy; 400 of the rebels came near Bandon with some provision and necessities of usquebath, wine, bread, some munition, and there appeared 3 cart loads. Killnalmechy drew out 200 musketteers, and himself and 70 horse put them to rout and ruinage, killed 104, took prisoners and hanged them; many prime gentlemen were slain. We know not what is done at Dublin or in the north, the ways are all blocked up, and have not heard from Dublin since Christmas. I wrote to you that you would please to send us some money by Incyquin or Jepson: I hope to hear by one of them. Our lands are all wasted, and we shall have no profit this many years, which made me request you to do your best for a company. My Lady Killmalmechy would not fail. The parks is not profitable to me. I have got 4 soldiers to keep the house; I was not able to maintain six men, for two of mine are there, and I believe that Dungarvan will take the park into his own keeping, and but two men in it; he imparted so much to a friend of mine. Since I wrote the other side I have had some conference with Dungarvan, who is determined to keep a guard of six men in the lodge, and take it into his own hands, to keep cows and other provision for his keeping house in Yoghall, whither he doth intend to send for his lady ere long; thus am I outed, and this is the reward I dreamt not of from Dungarvan, but I must submit to his own profit; this is of long determined, but he vows to me that if it may be in the power of himself or friends to do me good he will do it as to his brother; these were his words, but I believe nothing. My refuge is now a company, or I cannot subsist, or some other thing from my Lord of Leicester, to whom I have this passage written; if it shall please you to second it, I shall be ever bound to you. I would fain live; here no man hath any thing nor shall not this many years. The stock of English sheep and cattle are almost destroyed; the rebels stole the English sheep from a friend of mine; some days after the English troops took some of the sheep and other cows from the rebels; the troops sell the sheep for 12*d.* and 6*d.* the piece when their skins were well worth 16*d.* and so sold; thus all turns as mischief to the poor English; little or no restitution unless the proprietor be in pursuit and recover. Tom Badnedg is by me, and doth desire you will please to attempt a company for him; he will give any gratuity you shall think fit to any friend you shall intrust in the business; he is now a captain of the guard of our Yoghall; it is credit but not a pound profitable: his diligence and care is a great security to the town. We have many Irish and few true hearted as we fear, but our English are a bridle in their nose, yet the townsmen profess and protest much loyalty. I beseech you strain your power to help us here. We have letters that Incyquin and Jepson are at Tanton and Minhead, but want some necessities or they would have been with us ere this: they are longed for. While I am writing a messenger is come in from the army that assures us my Lord President hath regained Dungarvan with the slaughter of many. The castle holds out, but cannot long; in it are men of quality as Sir Nicholas Walsh and some of the Bullers, one a collonel. There are 5 or 600 cooped in betwixt the sea and the black water, which must fail. My Lord Barrymore is in the field with the President, and hath most bravely and loyally behaved himself to the great terror of his countrymen; it will be a most bloody war, for none can be spared. The Irish women are most cruel in execution. I pray God bless you in England and knit your hearts in unity; trust no Papist, for here they betray their dearest friends.

[164½, March 8. (Received.) Tim. Tyrrell to Sir Ralph Verney.—I understand by the people that were with you at Grendall, that yourself and Sir Richard Pygott gave them orders at your last meeting there to make a new tax among themselves, which I hear they have do[ne] [mu]ch to my prejudice. The old rate which we have constantly gone by being laid aside. . . . I expect the benefit of the Act, which is this, that we should go by the pound rent, or otherwise by the usual way, of the same rate which with us hath been always by the yard land. . . . And truly I will never yield to any other than what was formerly, for I conceive so long as the King hath his money there is no farther enquiry to be made in our estates, &c.

164½, March 8, Castle Lyons. Magdalen Fawkener to (Sir R. Verney) We are here in a most pitiful and lamentable case as ever poor people were in: God help us; we have and hear of nothing but fire and the sword, and pitiful sights of poor people stript naked as ever they were born, and we can expect nothing but famine, for they destroy all. They which at Michaelmas last were worth 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* now beg at our door. My Lord behaved himself gallantly in this business, for we have 50 familys in our house for safety, and five times as many in our other castle, and none of my Lord's own country is yet in rebellion, but we fear them every day, and look to be besieged and our town fired, for the enemy takes our cows and cattle to our very door. God help us all; we know not what to do.—The writer asks Sir Ralph to get in some money that belongs to her, because the estate of the gentleman she has engaged to marry is lessened by reason of the times.

164½, March 10. Sir John Leeke to Sir Edmund Verney.—Since I sealed up this other enclosed letter we have other and fresh occurrants; the first and sudden, is Dungarvan's speeding to the King and Parliament, I believe for supplies, and them with all possible speed. My Lord President, with his own and the new regiment of Sir Charles Vavisor, have rescued Dungarvan with the castle from the rebels, killed 300 at least, and gave quarter to 80 that were in the Castle; the reason of that favour was the sudden rising of the Lord of Muscary, who, contrary to all men's expectation and his own vows and protestations, is now with 7,000 men within five miles of Cork. The President is, notwithstanding, got into Cork, but hath not power sufficient to keep the field, but doth strengthen all our towns until new supplies come, and then he will not be pent up. Broghall hath taken in a castle and done brave things. Lastly, for myself, I am most miserable; money I have none, rent none to be paid. . . . Complains bitterly of his position and prospects. P.S. My Lord Dungarvon had set sail this day, but that the wind is not fair and the weather exceeding foul.

1643, March 16, Castlelyons. H. (Countess of) Barrymore to Sir Ralph Verney. . . . I live every hour at the mercy of our increasing enemies, and dare not as yet stir, because the safety of so many depends upon my stay here, and we have daily the objects of the Papists' cruelty, which doth somewhat terrify me. . . . And much like to be worse without your grave Parliament men do speedily send us more aid.

1642, March 20, new stile, Hague. Henry Verney to Sir Ralph Verney.—Asks for money, as without it he shall never get higher in the army.

1642, March 23, N.S., Hague. The same to the same. — Says that Sir Thomas Stafford cannot, as yet, promise him a company until he has moved the Prince, but he will delay no time to get a grant for the first company that falls, so that in 5 days he (Henry Verney) may give a near guess of his power.

1642, March 27, Magdalen Faulkener to Sir R. Verney. —P.S. Since I writ this letter we are fled from our own house, for the enemy have so great a number against us that my Lord durst not let my Lady and the children stay. I think the next remove will be into England, for the enemy pursues us everywhere, and vows all our deaths, because we will not go to mass.

1642, April 10, S.N., Hague. Henry Verney to Sir R. Verney.—The last week the news was here that Sir Simon Harcourt was dead, but since that we hear to the contrary.—As soon as I heard of it I acquainted Sir Thomas Stafford of it, and desired him to move the Prince for a grant of the company, but tells me he did but could not get an absolute promise. . . .

1642, April 22, N.S., Rotterdam. Henry Verney to Sir Ralph Verney. . . . When I went to take my leave of his Highness he encouraged me much in promising to do for me with all, and has given me an act under his own hand, voluntarily of himself, to remain in the army this summer; it is a favour and a great one I can assure you, I dare swear it is the first he hath given to any of a strange nation in his life. . . .

1642, April 22, N.S., Rotterdam. Henry Verney to Sir Edmund Verney. This last week I received two packets of letters from you, one I had of Sir Thos. Stafford, and the other by the post. My Lord Goring's letter I read and sealed it up, and gave it him with my own hands; all he said to me then, he would write to you about it. The next day meeting me in the street he called me to him, and gave me this enclosed letter to you, with all he said he would do more for me for your sake than he would let me know; the next day, when I took my leave of him to go to my garrison, he seemed much troubled when he received your letter and discontented with me; I, perceiving of it, desired to know wherein I had deserved so much his displeasure; his answer to me was I had liked to have put so great an affront upon his Lordship as he would not have befallen him for 500l. I desired to know what it was, he replied in standing for one of the companies without his consent. The truth is I did not tell I knew his resolution; I confess when I desired him to recommend me to the Prince for one of the three fortunes, and would not then, I must needs say I did my best to engage my friends to recommend me to his Highness to obtain one if I could, and had it not been for his Lordship, as sure as God is in heaven, I had had one. What he hath written to you I know not; he talks much in taking the Prince for his witness, for the great recommendations he gave me. Truly, sir, experience to my misfortune must give me leave to tell you from my heart I cannot believe him, for on Sunday last Sir Thomas and I went to the Prince, he to recommend me for the next company, I to take my leave of him for my garrison. First Sir Thomas Stafford went in, and as he tells me, his Highness hath engaged himself to do for me with the first convenience he can. I must ever acknowledge myself much bound to Sir Thomas as long as live, for I dare take my oath he hath done his best to the very utmost of his power to advance me. I desired him afore I went to the Prince to engage the Queen to speak to his Highness; he assured me he durst not mention me to her, thinking it might prove a prejudice to my fortune. Now before Sir Thos. came forth he sent for me into his chamber, and talked with me near half an hour, as Sir Thomas can testify, of my garrison, and about the state of my captain's company, withall I telling him that it did not go for the field without asking of him leave or employing of any friend; voluntarily of himself he sent for his secretary and caused him to write an act and signed it whilst I was in his chamber to attend him this summer in the army, withall assuring me to perform what he had promised to Sir Thomas when occasion offered. I daresay it is the first act that ever he gave to any officer of our nation; indeed all the friends I have say I may take it for a great favour, for it testifies much he intends really to do for me. I confess I do not doubt it now, for I find by my Lord, if I may believe him, that he will rather help me than seek any more to prevent me. This occasion of going for the field by the Prince's will unexpectedly both cause me to advance the next half year's salary of a friend, one Mr. Kilvert, beforehand. . . .

1642, April 5 & April 7. The Earl of Warwick to Sir Ralph Verney.—Two short letters asking Sir Ralph's attendance at the meeting of the committee for the Posts in the Exchequer Chamber, for settling the Earl's business concerning the Letter Office.

1642, April 12, from on board the "James" in Tilbury Hope. The same to the same.—Certain interested persons, who cannot get the sequestration of the office continued, now oppose it as a monopoly. Asks Sir Ralph's attendance in committee on Thursday next.

1642, April 15. The same to the same.—The House have appointed Thursday next, at 7 in the morning, for the Earl's counsel to answer the objections of the opposers of his patent. Asks Sir Ralph to attend.

1642, May 3. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to Sir R. Verney. . . . I am very glad you have so good news from Ireland, I pray God they may have victory still, and then I hope there will be an end of that war; sure the King will hardly have power here to overcome; the Parliament will govern. The King certainly will be very displeased with your message.

1642, May 7. Margaret Eure to her nephew, Sir Ralph Verney. . . . O! that the sweet Parliament would come with the olive branch in its mouth, it would refresh and glad all our hearts here in the north. We are like so many frightened people; for my part if I hear but a door creak I take it to be a drum, and am ready to run out. I hear poor Sir John Hotham is so affrighted if anything comes but near him, that when our goods come to Sarborow (Scarborough?), he sent to know what they were. God knows as there was nothing but clothes and two hogs-heads of wine; the poor wretch is deceived if he thought to have found anything else.

1642, May 13. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to Sir Ralph Verney. I am sorry to hear the King's anger still increases against his Parliament; I fear these times will make us all suffer one way or other. . . .

1642, May 15, S.N., Hague. Henry Verney to Sir Edmund Verney.—The two companys and the command of my coronells are now disposed of, neither of the lieutenants did prevail for either, for the Queen recommended one Mr. Gerard, and my Lord Goring the other. Since this I have been with Sir Thomas Stafford to desire him to get a grant of his Highness for the next fortune that falls; his answer to me was since that they had promised him one of these and failed, he did not believe they intended to oblige him at all, and to ask them again he would not, whereof seeing him so unwilling, I entreated him to move the Queen to recommend me to the Prince, he replied he durst not, for he said, and was certain, her Majesty would not be pleased to speak for me; with all like a noble friend, as he conceived, he told me the reason of it: think but of Wickcom and Alsberie, and you may both easily find the sense of it. The truth is, I believe, he has tried her and was denied. I dare swear he hath done his best to his power for me, tho' truly I find by him that I am far more unlikely of getting a company than I was the first day he came here. My Lord Goring hath been the occasion of this and none else; had I observed the least unkindness from him it would not have troubled me; his being my enemy I am confident will cast me out of my colonel's good opinion. and then to get higher it is impossible. All the hopes I have in the world is of Sir Thomas Stafford's staying here, and that I fear but little, for I cannot by no means get leave to go for the field. This day the patents are given out. The 24th of this month, n. s., the whole army meets about Forne. Our Queen will be there to see them in battle.

A letter of the same date to his brother Sir Ralph Verney. . . . This next week our Queen and Princes go to Amsterdam, where it is thought she will be most royally entertained, and have some great present given her.

1642, May 17, Hague. Lord Goring to Sir Edmund Verney. It is about 7ten days since that I wrote to my

SIR
H. VERNEY
BART.

SIR
I. VERNY,
BART.

son to give you an account of this business which it seems your son hath strictly charge me withal. . . . It happened upon the death of Sir Symon Harcot and Sir Henry Paget that your son did put in for a company, or at least for the command of my son's, in case Captain Vivian, who then commanded the same, should remove; but this was known to me by accident, and by no address of your son's, till many days after the Prince had been moved for him, and all the town full of it. . . . 'Tis true that afterwards, when some had awakened your son therein, he then came to me and moved me to move for him; but I told him in the most civil language I could that I could not at that time serve him, nor had he reason otherwise than as he was your son to expect ought from me at any time that did not think me worth the speaking to, meeting and conversing so oft as we did; but notwithstanding if hereafter he durst trust me, his father's son should never want the best service within my power; whereupon he left me discontentedly, as was observed by others as well as myself, and till now I only saw him but passing by. At the same time there was the Queen engaged for Charles Gerrard for one company, myself for Vivian for the other, as many years before, for the first that should fall, and for the command of my son's company there was the ancient of his company and two other lieutenants of great experience and long service in these countrys that put in for it, to all which I made answer that I would engage myself for none, but should only beseech his Highness to give my son such a one as might be most fit to discharge the trust, which was of more consequence to my son than both the company's. . . . Whilst this was in agitation Lieutenant Pye came over with my son's express recommendation and most earnest desire to the Prince that he might succeed Vivian in the command of his company, which within very few days after he had. This is the full truth of the business. . . . P.S. Notwithstanding your son's little regard of me in this business (setting aside my not speaking for him upon these changes, which was impossible for me to do being so engaged), I appeal to the Prince of Aurange what I said to him of your son as well as yourself.

1642, May 21. Margaret Eure to Sir Ralph Verney. . . . The news here is that the Parliament men intend to come down with 20,000 men to attend them. . . . the women in this country begin to rise, there hath been a hundred with the King, and above, to have their grievances redressed, and he hath given them so good content that they say he is as proper a man as is in England. I wish you all to take heed of women, for this very vermin have pulled down an enclosure, which some of them were put in prison for it by the justices; they had their pipe to go before them, and their ale and cakes to make themselves merry when they had done their feats of activity. . . . I wish all war well ended, for things stand in so ill a condition here as we can make no money of our coalpits, if rents fail, and if those fail, we shall be in a hard case.

1642, May 30, Dublin. Edmund Verney to Sir Ralph Verney. . . . The enemy runs from us whensoever we meet them, but if we chance to overtake them we give no quarter, but put all to the sword. We want both men and money, and we hear ye have good store of the latter, but that ye keep it for other purposes, which doth not at all please us. I should not think it policy to disoblige so gallant an army, but ye have all the wisdom amongst you. . . . I fear ye take an ill course, if we cannot subsist here we must go where we can; we came to make our fortunes, not to starve.

1642, June 6. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to (Sir Ralph Verney). . . . These miserable times will make us suffer many ways; the King's party grows so strong that certainly he will overcome the power of the Parliament; they come in abundantly to him I hear at York daily; if there should be any blows I know not what will become of us.

1642, June 9. Sir R. Verney to (Lady Barrymore). (Copy.) You are so hardened by this writer's sufferings, that neither fire nor sword can fright you into England; 'tis truth there's little left that may invite you hither, the unhappy distractions of this kingdom having not only reduced ourselves into a sad condition, but made Ireland far more miserable. Till these are settled here, I shall not expect to see the rebels quiet there, especially considering these distempers have wrought so many doubtings in the minds of men, that I fear 'twill be very hard to raise a considerable sum of money, unless there do appear greater hopes of peace than yet are evident. Peace and our liberties are the only things we aim at; till we have peace I am sure we can enjoy no liberties, and without our liberties, I shall not heartily desire peace; both these together may make us all happy, but one without the other, I must confess, can never satisfy.

1642, June 14. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to Sir R. Verney. . . . Your father sent me word the King hath given him leave to stay till he sends for him, I am very glad of it, for when he goes I doubt the love of the Parliament he will lose quite, which I fear will make them do him any ill office they can. I am sorry to hear the Lords are raising money and horse; truly if they send to my Lord we will part with none. I hope they will not, for we are poor, and my Lord of his estate but tenant for life. . . . Your Parliament still go so high that I fear we shall all be ruined by it.

1642, June 14, Castelleynes. Mag. Faulkner to Sir R. Verney. . . . This last week Carealalahaud Castel is taken, and the Lord Roche's castle, a country burnt within 40 miles of us. It was taken by my Lord, and the 10 regiments we have here. The Lord President is past all hopes of life, and he is General of Munster, but he was not in the field this quarter of a year. My Lord is very good, and he doth take great pains and care for the help of the English.

1642, June 20. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to Sir R. Verney. . . . P.S. I hope in God we shall have no fighting; truly the Lords protestation, methinks, is a very good one, to defend the King's person and estate and lawful prerogative and privilege of Parliament. Methinks every one should subscribe to this. I am loth to eat in pewter yet, but truly I have put up most of my plate, and say it is sold. I hope they will have to borrow no money of my Lord, if they do we must deny it, 'tis enough for us to pay the subsidies. They talk strange things of my Lord of Essex, that he will fetch the King to London, dead or alive; this is high, methinks, for people to talk so. . . .

1642, June 22. (Received). Margaret Eure to Sir Ralph Verney. . . . I am in such a great rage with the Parliament that nothing will pacify me, for they promised us all should be well if my Lord Strafford's head were off, and since then there is nothing better. I think we shall be undone with taxes, and if we have no rents neither, it will be a hard case. This day the King hath set forth an answer to a book as came forth 26th of May; I hear as he will set but one more forth, and that shall conclude all, and so much for writing. We hear strange news from London, which is, that many have offered to keep horses for the Parliament to fight against their King, and that my Lord of Holond is general, which puts me in the most comfort that we shall have peace, for he hath good fortune not to fight hitherto; I hope he will prove lucky still.

1642, June 22, Trimme.—Edmund Verney to Sir R. Verney. . . . I have this two months been removed into the country, 20 miles from Dublin, to a place out of all roads, out of which we cannot go two miles without 40 or 50 men. . . . The army is now marched into Conaught; it marched by Trimme, where I lie in garri-son, near which we took in a castle as they passed by, which held out 3 days' seige. Lieut.-Col. Kyrke and my Lord Renneloes Captain Lieutenant were shot before it, but I hope they will both recover it. We had some 20 men slain and 30 hurt besides, but when we took it in, we put some four score men to the sword, but like valiant knights errant gave quarter and liberty to all the women; it argues a great deal of honour and gallantry in us that we will do anything at all in the service of such bad paymasters. . . .

1642, July 14. Sir R. Verney to Will. Roades.—My father is gone towards York. . . . I pray bring me, or else take order, that I can have the assessments made at Wasing, Fifield, and Crommarsh towards this 400,000l. bill.

1642, July 21. Sir Edmund Verney to Will. Roades. . . . I pray have the carbines at home in readiness for the defence of the house if need be, and have powder and bullets ready.

1642, July 29, Rath Coffy Castle. Ed. Verney to Sir R. Verney. . . . I was two months together at Trimme, and was no sooner returned to Dublin, but was commanded forth 8 days' march, and the next day after I came home was commanded to Rath Coffy Castle, 12 miles from Dublin, where I have been this fortnight, but I believe I shall not continue here above a fortnight longer. I may truly say I have had no resting place this 3 months. My Lord of Ormond hath promised me I shall go into the field when he himself goes, and I hope it will be to no other place than Kilkenny. Here is a report of an army of Irish is marching from thence towards us, but being from Dublin I can write you no certainty. We hear very good news from England,

SIR
H. VERNY,
BART.

which is, that the King and Parliament are agreed : I pray God it be true.

(1642), Aug. 2, York. Sir Edmund Verney to William Roads (his steward). I pray have a care of my house, that rogues break not into it. Have store of bullet and powder, and get somebody to lodge in the house, that may defend it if need be. Have my waggon in readiness, if I should at any time send for it. Get in all such moneys as are owing you with all speed, for we shall certainly have a great war.

1642, Aug. 7, York. Dorothy Leeke to Lady Verney. The King is in very good condition and increaseth in strength every day; we have nothing but good news to send you.

1642, Aug. 22, S.N., Breda. Henry Verney to Sir R. Verney. The opinion, I see, of the great ones most at the Court is, that my father and you are all for the Parliament and not for the King, which here I find they take not kindly truly as times go now and considering the difficulty of getting me a company, I need not much regard it, for let me travel where I will, so I go not to hold a more baser place to make a fortune and less belief, I cannot find; and were it not more to obey my father's will and my friend's desire than any love I bear to my masters the States, the devil, their godfather, should serve them, and not I.

1642, Aug. 24. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to (Sir R. Verney). The King is sending over to the Queen. I hear by Mr. Bakon, who, I believe, hath it from his brother at Court, that the King is very much inclined to peace, and pressed much he is to go on in this way of war by some ill spirits he gives his ear to 1642, Aug. 23. Dorothy Leeke to Sir R. Verney. This letter cannot come to your hands before our army shall meet with the enemy, for they are very near us; my uncle will not be amongst them, for the King has given him the standard, and he must go no further than that; it will not remove this 3 or 4 days, and so long he will be safe. Prince Robart is gone with the army.

1642, Aug. 29. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to Sir R. Verney. We shall have no fighting, for the King hath neither money nor men; there came in few or none at all after the standard was set up; it seems the King sent and gave much of his money to the trainbands in Yorkshire and other places, thinking to make them sure to him, and when he would have had them they all fell off, and said they would not fight against their brethren; and every day his army lessens; they fall away from them. This young man was at Coventry—two or three and twenty was killed, one of my Lord Seidmor's brothers was shot in the arm so close to his shoulder that his arm must be quite cut off. What the Lords proposition was to the Parliament, I presume, by this time you know. My Lord Dorset sent me word he would wait upon me within few days; but I presume that was but in a compliment. I hope he doth not intend it; he had, he said, brought that which would bring peace if the Parliament would hearken to it; sure now they may make their own conditions now.

1642, Aug. 30, Breda. H. Verney to Sir Ralph Verney. There is within this six days my serjeant-major Killegre, and my Lord Morgins gone for England; ours, as the report is, for the Parliament, and Dolman for the King; there are to go divers captains and other officers from hence to England with speed. I was much importuned by a friend of mine, one Gibb Jarebb, a captain of our regiment, a month ago that went colonel, to agone with him, but being not master of my own desires, durst not adventure to accept of a command under him. P.S. On the 24th of this month the Prince Elector landed at the Hauge.

1642, Sept. 1. Dorothy Leeke to [Lady Verney]. I had writ to you before I received yours, and have sent you all the news; by the difference of my relation and that which you have heard already, you will be confirmed in your opinion of our Cavaliers (Cavaliers?). I am confident they will differ extremely. For my confidence of our having the better of the Parliament, I do not remember, but if they will promise to fight no better it will strengthen my hopes; but I cannot see, if we have the better, how you will suffer; for sure your father will have power to save your husband, and if the King fail I believe my uncle will hardly come off with his life, or any that are with them.

1642, Sept. 5, Cuddesdon. Cary Gardiner (Sir Ralph's sister) to Lady Verney, in the Peach (Piazza) in Coven Garden. I hear news here which I hope is false, which is, that your husband is become a traitor, but I cannot believe that he will live and die with the Earl of Essex to bear arms against his father, but I hope that is but his mind when he is amongst the crowd, but when he comes to take counsel with his pillow I hope he is more wisely minded; but indeed the world now account it policy for the father to be on one side and the son on the other.

1642, Sept. 5, Cuddesdon. Sir Thomas Gardiner to Lady Verney. Were not your parliamentary officers so busy in stopping and opening letters I would presume to write oftener to you, but I hate to have my secrets laid open to everybody's view; not that I am conscious to myself of any ill in them, for in that respect I would not care to have them published to all the world, but me thinks 'tis neither fit nor just that those things which in their own natures were meant for a private conference betwixt one friend and another, should be read openly in Westminster Hall, and those things which were intended for the closet to be proclaimed at the cross. But I am resolved to venture, and will rather put myself upon the carrier's fortune than be any longer unmannerly. You say that you never had more cause to be sad than now. But I believe that neither King nor Parliament have any quarrel against women, who never did either hurt save only with their tongues.

1642, Sept. 5. (Received). The Countess of Sussex to Sir R. Verney. I hear my Lord Fakelande and my Lord Spencer went through St. Alban's on Saturday; I imagine it was with some propositions from the King. I long to hear how your father takes your protestation to the Parliament; I fear he will be much troubled at first, but in a little time I hope will make him pass it over; I find by your father's letter you sent me down, he a most sad man, I pray God he may do well; I fear all his troubles together will make an end of him; he was at Kailingeworth with the King. I heard from my Lady Monmouth.

1642, Sept. 16. (Received). The same to the same.—I am truly sorry to hear the King is removed from Nottingham. I fear he will make this a tedious business, and much blood will be spilt before there be an end of it. I wish my Lord Marquis was as safe as the other lords that hath offended and are taken; if he have the better of it certainly it will be much disadvantage to the Parliament side. Sir Thomas Dicke, I believe, is not at all pleased with his son Roger's being strength to my Lord Harfort. As I am thus far of my letters I hear the King hath sent another message to your Parliament. Your father will suffer many ways, I fear, if the King goes on in this way he begins. Your father saith very little to me in this letter; he saith not a word of you; he hears the Parliament think the King can make no forces able to encounter theirs; he tells me by this Saturday he will have 1,000 foot, well armed, 2,500 horse, and 1,800 dragoons, which, he thinks, is an army able to encounter with any forces. I thank you for letting me know of my Lady Devensher coming up, I shall be in an ill case if she comes, having neither dishes nor plates.
