REASONS

FOR

Extending the MILITIA ACTS to the difarmed Counties of Scotland.

T is with the utmost pleasure I find perfons of all ranks agree in opinion, concerning the expedience, and even neceffity of raifing a militia in Scotland. That nation has not of a long time more justly difcerned her true interest, nor' taken more spirited and effectual measures to promote it. Though my way of life has, of late, led me a good deal into the world, and, by that means, afforded me frequent opportunities of hearing upon this fubject the fentiments of fome of the most enlightened, as well as most uncorrupted of my countrymen; yet I fcarce have heard one folid objection to the fcheme. The few objections urged against it deferve not the name of arguments, but are rather ftrained and far-fetched pretences, invented merely to justify the opposition of those who are predetermined against it, but predetermined by fe-В cret cret motives, too bafe and fordid for them to avow.

One objection however I must except from this number, because it has been frequentlyurged by some gentlemen, of whose integrity and love of their country I am well assured. It is this.

Will it not be dangerous to train to the exercife of arms, the inhabitants of those counties difarmed by act of parliament, upon account of their known difaffection to the prefent royal family? What proofs are there of their principles being changed? or what fecurity have we, that, when provided with arms, and taught the use of them, they will not again rebel, and once more attempt to fubvert our liberties and government?

This argument has little weight with me, who am thoroughly acquainted with the fentiments of the difarmed part of Scotland; yet, as it feemed to ftumble the gentlemen who ufed it, and may perhaps make fome impreffion upon others, I fhall fuggeft fome few facts, which I flatter myfelf will weaken, if not totally deftroy its force. This opens a field of very important inquiry, which demands to be difcuffed at fome length; I hope, therefore, the reader will pardon me fhould I detain him longer than either he or I could wifh. I addrefs myfelf only to the ferious and inquifitive. The fubject is of great importance, ance, both to the honour and fafety of the united kingdom; and, without aiming at wit or indulging fatire, I fhall deliver my fentiments concerning it with the utmost plainnefs.——I fhall endeavour, in as few words as possible, to shew, firft, That though the late rebellion broke out in the difarmed counties, yet even then the difaffection of these counties was not fo general as is commonly believed. And, next, That the measures purfued by the government fince that time, have almost totally eradicated any remains of that principle; and that arms may as fafely be trusted in the hands of those living north of the Tay, as of the inhabitants on the fouth of the Tweed, or of the Trent.

In fupport of the first affertion, we have only to confider how many men the northern counties contain, and then to remember how few of these rose in arms in the cause of the pretender.

The difarmed counties, as they are equal in number to those indulged in the use of arms, fo, without exaggeration, it may be faid, they equal them in populousness. They comprehend the greatest, and, if we except Edinburgh and Glasgow, the best inhabited part of Scotland. The number of people in this kingdom, at a moderate calculation, exceeds 1,200,000; and as a fifth part of these are commonly confidered as able to bear arms, B 2 there are in Scotland, by that computation, above 240,000 fighting men, and confequently 120,000 in the difarmed part of it.

Now let us fee how many of these followed the standard of rebellion. The pretender landed about the middle of July, and, notwithftanding the hopes of future rewards, the profpect of prefent plunder, and the affiftance of feveral chiefs of clans, at the battle of Prefton, fought Sept. 21. his whole train, for it deferved not the name of an army, did not exceed 2500 men; and even this handful contained many, whofe chiefs, by burning their houses, carrying off their cattle, and other acts of violence, compelled them to take arms. So that of 48 fighting men, one only engaged in rebellion. 'Tis true, the army of the pretender increased confiderably after that victory. But this acceffion, excepting a few clans, confifted of men offering themfelves promifcuoufly from all quarters; men, who engaged not fo much from difaffection as a love of novelty; many indeed from the defperate flate of their private affairs, the very dregs and refuse of mankind, of which every country unloads itfelf annually into whatever armies levy recruits in it; not to mention the crouds of giddy and thoughtlefs people, who, without inquiring into the juffice of the caufe, are ever ready to flock round a victorious flandard.

Whoever is acquainted with the temper of the the Scotch nation, knows, that, in times of faction or rebellion, the inhabitants of that country are feldom either neutral or cool. Every man takes a fide with keennefs, and does not remain an inactive spectator of those events by which the fate of his party is decided. Thus for every man fo much attached to the caufe of the pretender as to take up arms for him, the difarmed counties contained at least fortyeight zealous adherents to the prefent government. The fuccefs which for a long time attended the rebellion, was not a proof of the ftrength or valour of the rebels, but of the impotent condition of their opponents. For had the friends to the government been as well provided with arms as its enemies, the rebellion had been ftifled in its infancy, and had never grown . that gigantic monfter which afterwards appalled all England, and fhook the foundations of the British throne.

I have often heard Englifhmen talk, as if all the difarmed counties were difaffected, and their whole inhabitants attached by intereft or principle to the pretender; nor was I furprifed to hear this from them who have little accefs to be acquainted with this part of the kingdom. But it fills me not only with aftonifhment, but indignation, when Scotchmen utter the fame fentiments. They, at leaft, ought to know their own country. The difarmed counties are Perth, Kincardine, Aberdeen, Invernefs, Nairn, Nairn, Cromarty, Argyle, Forfar, Banff, Sutherland, Caithnefs, Elgin, Rofs, and part of Stirling and Dumbarton fhires.

Let us take a view of these, first, as separate counties, in order that we may difcover, whether they ought, without diffinction, to be branded with the infamy of difaffection or not; and with regard to them I shall affirm nothing that is not notorious to every Scotchman. The lower part of Stirlingfhire, which is the most fertile and populous part of that county, is inhabited wholly by Prefbyterians of the most zealous kind. And the fame may be faid of the low country of Perthshire. And among the northern counties, Elgin, and the most confiderable part of Ross, are distinguished for the bigotted attachment of the people to the Prefbyterian form of worthip. It is well known, that in Scotland a Whig and a Prefbyterian almost convey the fame idea, fo steady and unfhaken have the professors of that religion always been in their loyalty to his Majefty and the prefent government. The large county of Argyle has often given proofs of the fame loyal principles. Few private men from the low country of Aberdeenshire joined in the late rebellion; and it was owing to the influence and example of a fingle man, rather than the general difaffection of the county, that the fame observation cannot be applied to the gentlemen of it. The fhire of Sutherland has been been long diftinguished for its loyalty. Not to tire the reader with a long enumeration of particulars, we may affirm, (nor can any perfon who has had proper means of information contradict the affertion), that there is not one of the difarmed counties, in which there will not be found many gentlemen of undoubted attachment to the prefent government, who are both qualified and willing to act as militia-officers. And I ask the most fcrupulous and timid of those who oppose the measures for which I contend, if he can devife any expedient more effectual for adding authority and weight to the caufe of Whiggifm, than the placing fuch gentlemen at the head of the armed force of those counties?

There is another method of difcovering the temper and difpolition of the difarmed counties, particularly of the Highlands; and that is, by taking a view of the different clans. Nothing will be more furprifing to an Englifhman than to be told, that the moft confiderable of thefe are now well affected to the prefent government, and that fcarce one of them is in fuch a fituation as to become formidable to it. Nothing however is more undoubtedly certain. The Campbells, the moft numerous, the moft wealthy, and the moft powerful of all the Highland clans, have always been eminent for loyalty; they derive their lineage from a family more uniform in its attachment to the interefts of liberty, and which has fuffered more in that glorious caufe, than any other in Great Britain. A younger branch of that name holds of a Nobleman, whofe loyalty to the prefent government is undoubted, and who enjoys confiderable employments under it. The Grants, a numerous clan, have been uniformly loyal. The Macleods, during the late rebellion, took arms in defence of the government, and were ufefully employed in its fervice. Every thing that becomes a virtuous man and a loyal fubject, may be expected from the education and good qualities of the young chieftain of the Macdonalds. The Mackays, the Monroes, and the Sutherlands, have always been diftinguifhed as much for their loyalty as their bravery.

Difaffection feems therefore only to be lurking among those few clans who engaged in the late rebellion. Even among them, I will venture to affirm, though it may feem a paradox, there were many neither tainted with difaffection, nor disposed to revolt. Ignorant, flavish, and uninformed, they drew not their swords in the cause of the Pretender, but of their own chieftains; nor from any disgust conceived at the old form of government, or hopes of bettering their condition under a new, did they aim at subverting it, and erecting another in its stead; but they blindly followed their leaders, the chiefs of their name, to whofe will they had, from their earlieft years, imbibed a blind fubmiffion. Accordingly we may obferve their conduct varied and fhifted, now for and now againft the government, according to the whim or principles of their chieftains. The Frafers afford a ftriking inftance of the juftnefs of this remark. That clan, in the rebellion 1715, were in arms on the fide of the crown; in the late rebellion they remained long quiet and undetermined, till their crafty mafter, feduced by the allurements of a promifed dukedom, called them forth to join the pretender; and the fame clan, nay, the fame individuals, are now fighting his Majefty's battles in America.

I beg leave to add one circumftance more. The Popifh religion, the most natural and the moft powerful motive of difaffection and rebellion, is by no means of extensive influence in Scotland. The whole number of Papifts in that kingdom does not amount to 20,000. A good number of these are to be found in Nithfdale and Galloway, and other parts not within the limits of the difarming-acts. Few gentlemen of the Popifh perfuafion have confiderable property, or are at the head of many vallals. Other caufes of difaffection may be overcome; and where the people are generally Protestants, and even a great majority of them Presbyterians, the charge of difaffection cannot possibly be universal.

One

One obfervation more, and 1 have donewith what I have to fay on this head. Certain principles of government grow at fome times fafhionable, as well as certain cuftoms and modes of drefs; and it very often happens, that a lucky turn in the fentiments of a people fhall effectually introduce or explode principles, which government has laboured in vain to eftablifh or root out. Since political knowledge began to extend itfelf, and fince the publication of fome ingenious works in that fcience, it is plain that the tide has run very high in favour of Whiggifin, and attachment to the prefent government, the only principles that a man of fenfe would not now-a-days be afhamed to avow.

I shall now proceed to shew the efficacy of the measures pursued by the government, to extinguish every spark of disaffection in the northern counties.

The political fteps taken in confequence of the laft rebellion, were wife and prudent, and will reflect eternal honour on the administration which advifed them.

To make men free, they clearly faw was the way to make them loyal; and therefore the parliament abolifhed the hereditary jurifdiction of the nobility and gentry of Scotland. By this fingle act, the lower people are freed from flavery and oppreffion. These courts where the judges were always ignorant, often partial, and and moft commonly indeed both judge and party, are now, thank God, at an end. A regular, equal, and eafy administration of juflice by sheriff-deputes and their substitutes, is introduced in their stead. Besides, by means of roads made through the Highlands, the sentence of the civil magistrate receives prompt execution in the remotest corners of that wild country.

The abolition of thefe jurifdictions has alfo given a fatal blow to clanfhips; and as the people daily tafte the fweets of freedom and independence, they, from a principle of gratitude, become daily more and more attached to the government to which they owe thefe bleffings.

The next ftep taken by the government was no lefs wife and politic, and still, if poffible, more humane. Not contented with making the Highlanders free, it withed also to make them rich and industrious, The Highland eftates forfeited to the crown by the rebellion of their proprietors, were not fold for payment of debts, and purchased, as in other cases, at an easy rate by the friends of the rebels : But the government discharged the debts from other funds; annexed the effates to the crown; and has appointed truftees to apply their annual produce to the purpoles of establishing manufactures, of introducing a more rational fystem of husband-ry, and training up the young people to ha-C 2 bits bits of induftry and mechanics. The eftates themfelves are alfo divided into confiderable farms, and conferred at an eafy rent on fuch of the inhabitants as are most diffinguished for loyalty, induftry, and fobriety. Who can doubt, if this gracious and humane conduct is fleadily purfued, that, in a very flort time, even the name and memory of difaffection will be forgotten?

It feems not to have been the intention of the difarming-laws, to fuppofe any incompatibility between what they enact, and the employing of the militia in those counties. For it is expreisly provided in statute, Geo. 1. cap. 54. § 6. That nothing in that law shall extend to hinder the lieutenants of counties, their deputies, the militia, and fenfible men under their command, to keep or receive arms out of his Majefty's magazines, and to ufe them during the time that the militia and fenfible men shall be called out. Clauses to the fame effect are inferted in the laws of the prefent King concerning this matter. From which it is obvious, that the parliament did not confider the arming a regular militia in that part of the kingdom, as in any degree inconfistent with those ends which it had in view.

Befides, the difarming-acts are not perpetual; they were only temporary expedients, and ceafe to be in force at the expiration of feven years, to be computed from the 1ft August 1753.

1753. It was forefeen, that fuch a change might be brought about in the fituation of the country, fuch events might happen as would render that precaution no longer neceffary. Have not the wife measures taken by the administration produced that very change upon the difpofition of the Highlanders which was expected? Is it not the eftablishment of a regular and well-disciplined militia in Scotland, which will at once make our former precautions superfluous? What rendered the Highlanders fo formidable to the reft of their countrymen? was it not because they were accustomed in some degree to the use of arms, and retained the martial fpirit in its full vigour, while the inhabitants of the low country were enervated by the arts of peace. In all ancient contests, the latter, as brave, and better armed and difciplined than the Highlanders, maintained an evident fuperiority. Will not the eftablishment of a militia reftore matters, in fome measure, to their former fituation? If they shall again be fo desperate and ungrateful as to take arms against the constitution, they will not pour down from their mountains, upon a country unguarded and defenceless; but will be encountered by men trained to arms, and animated with fuch zeal for their King and country, as will prompt them to act with vigour.

But though the chance of a new rebellion in Scotland be fo inconfiderable, that it can fcarce fcarce alarm any perfon acquainted with that country; the gentlemen who have taken the trouble to prepare the plan of an act for extending the militia-laws to Scotland, have framed it with fo much caution as to exclude almost the appearance of danger. By their fcheme, the number of private men to be raifed in Scotland, amounts to 6000; and the difarmed counties may contain, as I have already obferved, nearly one half of the whole inhabitants of that kingdom; they propofe, that only 2199 men should be raifed in these counties. For my own part, I should have had no apprehension of danger to the Protestant fuccession, although one half of the whole number had been raifed in the difarmed counties. For there, I am convinced, private men as zealous, and officers as loyal may be found, as in any other corner of the kingdom. At the fame time I cannot but commend the conduct of the committee, who, by their prudent distribution, have done much to quiet the fears of those who have had little access to be informed about the ftate of the northern counties.

I thall conclude the whole of this differtation, already too long, by reminding you of the late conduct of the government towards the inhabitants of the difarmed counties. "Lam far from condemning the jealoufy which has been entertained of them, or from cenfuring those laws laws which were intended to deprive them of the means of difturbing the government. While the happy revolution brought about by King William, and the expulsion of the family of of Stewart, were recent events, and the paffions of men remained in full vigour; fuch fufpicions and precautious were both prudent and neceffary. The effect, however, of these re-gulations, was not equal to the expectations of those who devised them. The Highlanders were exafperated, and not reclaimed; and, upon the flightest occasions, reforted to the standard of rebellion. It is only by confidence that gallant men can be gained; and be it faid, for the honour of the age in which we live, we can afcertain the truth of this maxim, not only from theory, but from experience. Our Sovereign generous, becaufe he is brave, his ministers intrepid, because they are upright, have embraced a measure long rejected by the timidity and caution of our former rulers; but long withed for in Scotland by many perfons of the greatest fagacity, and of the most loyal principles. Since the commencement of this war, eight battalions, confifting wholly of Highlanders, have been raifed. They are allowed to wear their own drefs. The private men have been levied in those parts of the country whole principles are most suspected. The officers are all native Highlanders, or connected with that country. The heads of the the most difaffected clans have been trusted with the command of fome of these battalions, and with commissions in them all. Not a few of these gentlemen bore arms under the pretender and his fon in the laft and former rebellions, and fome of them were called directly out of the armies of France into the fervice of Britain. How repugnant' is the whole tenor of this conduct to the ideas of those overfcrupulous perfons who object to the extension of the militia-laws to the northern parts of Scotland? What then have been the effects of this meafure? Has the King's generofity been abufed? Shall his minifters be taxed with rafhnefs, or do they merit the praise of prudence for arming this people, whom the gentlemen I oppofe reprefent as unworthy that truft? Let the world judge. In every action the Highlanders have not only done their duty, but have diftinguished themselves. The fame men who, fifteen years ago, threatened to overturn the conftitution of their country, are now fighting in defence of its rights and posseffions. Instead of aiding the arms of France, they are now employed in oppofing them. By the confidence which his Majefty has reposed in them, they are from being rebels converted at once into good citizens; and what was formerly the weaknefs of Great Britain is now rendered no inconfiderable addition to its strength. Nor is the falutary and reclaiming influence of the measures which I am applauding, confined folely to those Highlanders who are already in arms. It extends to the whole body of that people; ever man among them has now his chieftain, his brother, or at least (according to their own phrase) some one of his kindred, who has been honoured with the King's commiffion, or who has entered into his fervice. The effect of these connections is felt by all men; but among the Highlanders, their charm and operation is almost incredible. Every man among them is of courfe interefted in the fuccefs of the British arms: they must be folicitous about the glory and profperity of their country, and cannot but with well to a conftitution, in defence of which their companions have drawn their fwords, and to a King whom their friends have bound themfeves by a folemn oath to fupport.

Shall then the laws concerning the militia be carried on in imitation of that extensive and generous plan, the good effects of which we have to happily experienced; or thall they be circumfcribed by the fcruples of timid and narrow-minded men? It is a maxim in domeftic life, That to difcover ftrong fulpicions of a wife, or a fervant, is the certain way to render the former unfaithful, and the latter difhoneft. The fame holds in political government. The fufpicions and diftruft which former administrations difcovered of the High-D landers.

landers, certainly cherisched their prejudices, and tempted them to rebel. Let them be treated as good citizens, and they will become fuch. As the legiflature has, by the wife laws I have already mentioned, communicated to them the privileges of freemen, and endeavoured to diffule among them a spirit of industry; let not the continuance of an invidious diffinction fix upon their minds the impreffions of being lefs trufted than the reft of their countrymen. What Scotchman would confent to a partial militia, by which those brave men who have been fo fuccefsfully employed in defending us, are denied arms for their own defence? or could see, without indignation, half Scotland deprived of the benefit of this falutary law?

FINIS.
